PUBLIC SERVICE REFORM ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Loiselle that Bill C-26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee H; and the amendment of Mrs. Catterall (p. 6131).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I want to point out to hon. members that there is a mistake in the Projected Order of Business. It indicates that there would be only 15 minutes remaining out of the five-hour period allocated. On checking we find that there are in fact 66 minutes left or, if you prefer, one hour and six minutes.

[English]

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-26 will change the federal labour legislation and will affect most employees. It has been in effect for almost 25 years without any significant change and everyone concerned agrees that it is time for new legislation that will provide for changing times and changing economic conditions as well.

After considerable discussion over the years the Prime Minister announced in 1989 that the government would be bringing this in as a major initiative. It took about a year to get the white paper on PS 2000 tabled. It was supposed to have come out of discussions between Treasury Board on the one side and the employees' organizations on the other. Treasury Board's spokespeople insisted that there had been real communication between the two, real discussions, real consultation, but the representatives of the employees unanimously said that there had not been any real communication, that there had not been any real discussion. They might have been talking one side to the other but no one was really listening. There was no real consultation, no real attempt to arrive at a common ground with respect to the major changes being made. This was perhaps one of the main concerns of the employee organizations.

Anyone who has been in public affairs, in the public eye, anyone who has been a member of Parliament in recent years, knows that there has been increasingly bad blood between the employees and the employers in the civil service. That has been evident. I suppose the hardest evidence we have had of that, of which the whole community became aware, was last year when there was the job action, when there was work stoppage, not total stoppage but significant work stoppage.

The evidence was there that the labour organizations themselves doubted whether they would be able to get their employees out on the picket line. There was real doubt within the labour organizations generally, not just within labour organizations representing government employees.

The government was confident, and I think this was obvious from the way they handled the situation at the time, confident that the labour organizations would fail to get any large number out on the picket lines. There were polls taken, there were votes taken and the votes in some areas were not very strong in favour of the strike, in other areas they were strong. In general, there was this real doubt within the labour movement itself and certainly the government was confident that the organizations could not get their workers out.

The fact is they did get them on the picket lines. Sure there were problems within the organizations but nevertheless there was widespread support for the work action taken. I submit that was excellent evidence there were problems between the employers and the employees, problems that have not been resolved to this time.

From what employee organizations had seen of PS 2000, the white paper, and from the discussions they have had, there was real doubt that any of the changes being suggested were going to improve the situation between workers and management.

That was what it was all about. That is what PS 2000 was supposed to achieve, an improvement in relations between the employees and the managers who were running the government service. The employee organizations doubted whether anything in this would improve employer–employee relations. If we do not do that, there is no point in going through this exercise at all.

There have been discussions since the legislation was introduced and there are still problems, but at least we are now contemplating the bill going to a legislative committee. In that venue, there will be an opportunity for the employer's and employees' representatives to sit down together and to bring to the attention of the public what the real concerns are on both sides. I am sure there are concerns on both sides although not very many on the part of managers since in the opinion of the employees, at least, the managers have achieved everything in this legislation that they could hope to achieve and have given up little to the workers.

If that feeling prevails, if there is not something changed as a result of the discussions or if there are no changes in the bill itself, then it is not going to bode well for the future and relations will not improve. The people who will suffer will not be just the employees but the people receiving the services that the employees are providing.

I said that members of Parliament are very much aware of the bad feeling because they hear constantly from people in their ridings who are having trouble getting what they feel is a reasonable level of service from public servants. The public servants themselves are not happy in what they are doing and some express that in the the way they deal with people who are coming in with their problems.

There are some problems that are dealt with and yet not dealt with in a way that make the employees any happier with what is being proposed. One of the main things is this business of contracting out, where there is no consultation and no co-operation. The amount of contracting out is increasing. The employees suspect that it is increasing in part because the government wants to have control without having any arguments with the people who are involved in it.

• (1020)

In part, they feel that it is just simply being handed out to friends of government as a way of rewarding them for whatever. This is a concern. It is a concern expressed even by the Auditor General who raised the question as to whether or not the government is saving money with its contracting out. Indeed the Auditor General went so far as to say the government is not saving money. It is costing the government more to get the service it is getting by contracting out than it was costing previously, with its own public servants doing the work.

The government has been challenged time after time to produce some evidence of what is being saved. Treasury Board has said yes, it is saving money. There are no figures, nothing at all to go on. There is simply a statement to the effect that the government is saving money by contracting out.

If there was any evidence, one would think that the government would be very happy to table it, to publicize it and show where it is saving money. The fact is that the government has declined to do this. It has ignored every invitation to produce some evidence. It has ignored even the Auditor General's invitation to give evidence that it is saving money. As I say, I think the union's case is well supported by the lack of action from government in proving that contracting out is saving money.

This is continuing. Under the legislation before us, there is nothing to slow down that process at all. Certainly the government has said it will look after the employees. That is in the bill to some extent, and a spokesman from Treasury Board has said that this will be done. The employees will be looked after. They will be given job opportunities in other departments.

I suppose we saw some evidence of that last summer when the bill was in to move the National Energy Board from Ottawa to Calgary. There was quite a bit of negotiation between government and the employees of the energy board to make sure they had some opportunity to move with the board.

In the end, there were some who were not going to have jobs. They were going to be let go, and again the promise was held out that something would come up for them as soon as possible somewhere else.

That is just one small example of the kind of contracting out—that is not contracting out, that is another situation—and it is where the employees were going to be looked after. In the legislation and in the discussions they were told that government would look after those employees whose jobs have been done away with due to some contracting out process.

That is one of the problems that the organizations representing the workers is most concerned about, the fact that contracting out is handled in the total absence of any information as to why the government is doing it from a cost saving point of view, evidence that it is really working. Yet the government is going to proceed with it, pursue it and it is not going to discuss any of its actions with the employees.

That is one of the problems but there is another one. There are some union concerns about job reclassification. Once again, management is taking unto itself the authority to do as it sees fit with respect to reclassification. Once again, the union is having no input. It is not being consulted. The members are simply being told what is going to happen to them, when it is going to happen and that does not make for a happy work environment either.

I had occasion to visit the office of one of our major employers in Canada in the private sector. It is a public company operating in the private sector. They were giving me—I am going to be spending more time with them—a rundown on some of their activities and some of the ways in which they are working.

Right at the top of their list is an endeavour to make employees throughout that organization, over 100,000, feel that they are a part of it, that they are not just something that is used in the same way as materials coming in are being processed, but that they are really part of the team that is going to try to make that company successful.

That is what PS 2000 is supposed to be about. It was supposed to make government employees feel they were part of the process of serving the public. In making them feel they are part of it, in making them feel they are one of the partners in that process, they would be happy at their work and their work would be done better, more efficiently. Of course the public in dealing with those people would also be happier that they were being treated more fairly.

This legislation has failed. Pay equity is something that is still talked about, and we have gone to court over it, but the legislation does not really do anything to say it is going to be any better in the future than it has been in the past.

If the legislation, PS 2000, the whole process, were supposed to make conditions better between workers and management, it has failed. Unless the organizations representing the workers believe that a real attempt is being made to do this, to accomplish this, unless they believe they are really being involved in the process of deciding what is going to happen then it is not going to work.

I fear we may see more of the kind of job action that we saw last summer, which did nothing to improve relations; indeed it made relations that much more difficult.

PS 2000 once again will be a total waste, a waste of effort, a waste on our part of passing the legislation if it is not going to achieve the co-operation and the good will it was supposed to achieve. If the process before the legislative committee does not meet with success—and I sincerely hope that it will for the sake of all concerned—then it would seem to me that it would be better not to make the changes we are contemplating simply because we have gone this far down the road and we should proceed. That is not good enough.

If we do not come out of the legislative committee with an agreement on all parts—that is the members of the committee themselves and the witnesses who have appeared there from Treasury Board and from the various organizations representing workers—if we do not come out of there feeling that we have achieved something worth while, it is better to leave it the way it is and try again to see if we can come up with something that is going to serve government and Treasury Board, that will treat the workers fairly and make them believe they really are partners in the process. Then in the end all of us together will have served the public better by having produced something that is going to improve the level of service offered by government employees to members of the public generally and make them feel that their government is working on their behalf rather than simply taking advantage of the present system where it has the votes, the control, can pass any legislation it wants and do whatever it wants with respect to the workers until such time as there is a change in government, to which I think almost all of us are looking forward.

It could be better. It should be better. Twenty-five years is a long time for the same process to remain in effect. I believe out of this process something good could happen. It will be up to the members of that legislative committee to listen to all the witnesses, to hear what they are really saying, and to come up with something better than the legislation before us, legislation that will be acceptable to Treasury Board but legislation that the worker organizations will believe they have been able to change in the interests of employees and the public generally.

The committee will work. The committee will produce something. It is in its hands whether what it produces is something better than what we have right now or whether the committee has failed.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief in my question. The member talked about this opting out process or this contracting out process and how it affects the morale of the Public Service.

• (1030)

I would like to suggest to members that it does not work in an economic sense or efficiency sense. In Toronto we have several examples where the constriction of the Public Service has caused an incredible backlog in processing, specifically the refugee cases in our community. What we have experienced is that the service has broken down because public servants just cannot manage the load. The delay in processing refugees has created a backlog of close to 50,000 people. There has been a drain on our social services in the city of Toronto. Health care in the last year, just in the greater metropolitan area of Toronto alone, has cost the treasury close to three billion additional dollars.

All governments are really concerned about deficit and debt. This contracting out process is contradictory to the objective. It is done in the name of streamlining and efficiency but in fact a more bungled situation has been created than one could ever imagine.

There is another thing I would like to suggest to the member. Quite often a lot of this contracting out is not as efficient as the people who do the job within the Public Service. I notice the Minister of Supply and Services is sitting in the House today. He runs an organization that works on revenue dependency. I am sure he would bear witness to the fact that he has within his realm of responsibility public servants who frequently, week in week out, month in month out, do work that is as efficient if not more efficient than contracting out. If it were not that way, why would the minister be in the business of printing? Obviously the Government of Canada must be doing his printing more efficiently.

My question to the member is: Does he not think that the government endangers not only efficiency but is in danger of adding to the national debt because of this motivated gesture of cutting back public servants?

Mr. Stupich: Mr. Speaker, in the PS 2000 hearings there were examples given exactly in line with what the member was saying, examples of work that was done by outside contractors. Of course they were not familiar with the work and the work had to be redone by government employees at greater cost to correct the mess. In fact there was additional cost in that the contractor was involved as well.

One example is weather reports that were being prepared by the government service for the city of Calgary and for the Minister of Transport. The government said: "You cannot provide this service to the city of Calgary. You have to stop it". The city had to employ some outside outfit to do it. The bill was ten times the $600 per month it was originally costing. Then the Ministry of Transport decided to use the same service. I can only suspect that it too is paying ten times what it was paying for the work that was being done within the Public Service.

There are many examples like that represented. The Auditor General himself raised the question and suggested that the government was not getting value for money in contracting out.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. The hon. member for Bourassa.

Mrs. Marie Gibeau (Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to thank you for this opportunity to express my support for Bill C-26, the Public Service Reform Act.

The federal Public Service is one of the cornerstones of our parliamentary democracy. It advises members of Cabinet on policies and programs, offers Canadians a wide range of programs and services, represents the country's interests abroad and protects our sovereignty at home. It is an important national institution. Its operations are critical to the administration of this country and to our ability to settle constitutional matters and meet the challenges of a global economy. In other words, it is indispensable to the kind of country we live in.

The last amendment to the current legislation on the Public Service goes back 25 years. As we all know, things have changed considerably since that time, and we have witnessed a kind of cultural revolution in the management of people. Our concepts of leadership and authority are no longer the same. The level of education of employees has increased, and participatory management, training and development have replaced time and motion studies and what used to be called time cards. Advances in computer science have reduced both geographical and hierarchical distances between employees.

The federal Public Service, like private organizations, has been reacting to these changes for some time. It is restructuring, reducing the number of management levels, downsizing and becoming increasingly result-oriented. Public Service 2000, lauched two years ago, has given new vigour to actions that were already under way. Ten task forces were asked to suggest ways of making specific areas more cost efficient and more effective. Proposals covered over 300 areas in need of reform.

The reports and the feedback they generated were tabled in a white paper in this House more than a year ago by the President of the Treasury Board. Where legislative changes were not required, many administrative reforms have already been put in place.

Bill C-26, the Public Service Reform Act before the House today, is one more step towards making the Public Service capable of meeting the challenges of the twenty-first century. The bill provides for amendments to the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act, the Surplus Crown Assets Act and the Financial Administration Act. These amendments will make the Public Service more flexible, more efficient and better equipped to focus its efforts on serving the Canadian public.

These amendments are not intended as a thorough reform of the legislation I just mentioned. They are aimed at simplifying and updating certain provisions which, according to the government, should be changed because they are outdated and no longer serve a useful purpose in productive management of Public Service resources.

Perhaps I might explain very briefly the nature of these amendments. First of all, the proposed amendments to the Public Service Employment Act would simplify staffing while ensuring that measures to protect against abuse as well as measures for effective redress are maintained. In some cases these measures would be enhanced. Bill C-26 would confirm the mandate of the Public Service Commission to uphold the merit principle and provide reliable mechanisms for protecting the staffing system against political and bureaucratic favouritism.

It would contain a new provision on transfers which would make it easier for departments to assign employees to other positions at the same level. This provision would increase opportunities for public servants to acquire new skills and work experience. The proposed amendments would provide protection against abuse and, more specifically, ensure independent review by a third party. Managers would have less trouble filling positions, since the bill would contain provisions concerning probation and security classifications.

The present legislation's provisions for demotion and release would be consolidated and transferred to the Financial Administration Act. A common system of redress would be available under the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

• (1040)

The amendments to the Public Service Staff Relations Act would modernize the rules governing collective bargaining, increase the number of dispute settlement mechanisms and considerably simplify job classification in the Public Service.

Employment equity groups would benefit from the bill's provisions. As a national institution, the federal Public Service must reflect the diversity of the people that it serves. The bill would expressly provide for employment equity programs. It would specify the role of the Public Service Commission and Treasury Board Secretariat in this regard.

The bill would make it easier for departments to meet unexpected workloads and respond to seasonal and short-term fluctuations. It would be easier to hire casual employees for periods up to three months and it would be possible to extend their appointment for three months.

The amendments to the Public Service Staff Relations Act would recognize the right to free collective bargaining and public servants' right to strike. Reducing the number of occupational groups, which is now 71, could simplify collective bargaining considerably. The number of levels within these groups is also to be reduced.

Bill C-26 temporarily establishes legislative authority to extend this reduction for a six-year period during which union affiliations would be respected. It is estimated that about 100,000 classification actions are taken every year.

The proposal seeks to extend the scope of dispute settlement methods. Arbitration boards are to be selected in the same way as conciliation boards and the parties would be allowed to appoint members to such boards and extend their advisory role so that they can look into a broader range of issues.

Furthermore, the Public Service Staff Relations Board would be given a greater choice of dispute settlement mechanisms. Bargaining units could submit all their outstanding issues to binding arbitration.

Finally, pursuant to the proposed amendments to the Surplus Crown Assets Act, departments could dispose directly of their surplus assets or have Supply and Services Canada do so for them. They would receive the proceeds of the disposal, which they could spend as they saw fit. These amendments should improve the management of surpluses, increase revenue and especially reduce the cost of storing and handling surplus goods.

Mr. Speaker, I ask hon. members to support speedy passage of this bill. With these major reforms to the way the Public Service is run, our administration could continue to be considered one of the best in the world.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I salute my colleague for a well delivered speech. She touched on a lot of points that I agree with. One specific thing that she referred to in her speech which I am not concerned about is political patronage. Very few people in this country understand that political patronage is practically non-existent in this country. It is a myth. Most Canadians think it is the politicians who decide who will fill most of the senior positions in the Government of Canada and in the Crown corporations. That is a myth.

My concern is the real patronage that exists in the Government of Canada, the bureaucratic patronage. This is one thing I remember from 1980 to 1984 when I worked across the street in the Langevin Block with Mr. Trudeau. People used to accuse us all the time of political patronage. I could not believe how wrong those accusations were. Really, the bureaucrats had more of a patronage operation than anyone could ever have imagined. In her speech the member said that this bill is going to minimize, improve or reduce a lot of that bureaucratic patronage. I wonder if the member can explain how she feels this bill will do that. If such is the case, it is an aspect of this bill that I would personally support.

[Translation]

Mrs. Gibeau: I would like to thank my colleague for his question which, as usual, is a very practical question and is not tinged with partisanship.

The objective and the spirit of the reform proposed in this legislation is to give back to bureaucrats and civil servants the power to make decisions and their pride in being public servants. I would almost say that our government, our system, has the best methods in North America, if not the western world, for choosing the most qualified people. We have wonderful tools, tests and procedures for selecting the best person. Unfortunately, some of our administrative policies meant that those qualified people, once they had been selected, were subject to arbitrary processes that kept them from using their skills. Through the more relaxed and simplified measures that we want to implement with the bill we are presenting today, we want to eliminate the red tape and enable those people to fully use their skills and not be subjected once again to old bureaucratic laws that go back 25 years. Of course, these laws were amended over the years, with new clauses, measures, conditions, et cetera, but they always made it possible for someone to beat the system. The object of this initiative is to give back to people the responsibilities and authority that go with their level. That is the first objective.

The second objective is certainly to make decisions on collective bargaining, the selection process and customer service more open. Once again, as we were saying earlier, the objective is not to satisfy the needs of the government, nor is it to satisfy the needs of the union or the public service. The objective is to make sure that our citizens, our constituents, do not have to go from one department to another and put up with undue frustrations because the system is too cumbersome. I personally experienced those frustrations when I was elected to the House of Commons and saw how cumbersome and hard to penetrate the government administration is, because it is complicated and there are little empires. For instance, in many departments, a small group looks after women, another one looks after native people, and yet another one looks after the disabled. We could certainly together with the Public Service—because there are also bright people there who know how the system could be improved—ensure that our constituents, citizens and the Canadian people are provided with top-quality services.

In some countries, it is an honour to be part of the public service. Unfortunately here in Canada there is too often a tendency, not to ridicule civil servants, but not to give them their due recognition because of the bureaucratic system. That is exactly what Bill C-26, which is tabled today, is about. I thank the member for the question.

[English]

Mr. Mills: I thank the member for that answer. I think she has hit upon something very important here. The principle is correct, but I am not sure that there is a mechanism to check to see whether or not the principle of fairness is going to be implemented.

Two months ago when we were dealing with the Bank Act in this House of Commons, someone on the floor of the House, I believe it was a Liberal amendment, put forward an idea.

• (1050)

It put forward the idea that if a consumer did not feel that he or she was being treated fairly by a banker, a complaint could be made to the Superintendent of Financial Institutions.

If the complaint was found to be worthy, to be true, then that complaint would go on the annual report of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions to the House of Commons. This was an accountability measure to make sure that banks were not just treating people within their own power and within their own bureaucracy.

I would like to suggest to the hon. member that as we are refining this bill, maybe there could be some kind of an appeal mechanism not unlike the one we have put into the Bank Act.

For example, suppose I were to apply for a job and I felt I had the competence to get that job. But I did not get the job plainly because of bureaucratic patronage. Obviously I would have substantive reasons to believe that.

Would it not be a good thing to make sure that there were some kind of an appeal court for public servants if they felt the reason they did not get a job was because of bureaucratic patronage?

[Translation]

Mrs. Gibeau: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his question and for this opportunity to provide him with an answer I am sure he will be pleased to hear because it is yes, such a mechanism is indeed provided for.

Some of the proposed amendments to the Public Service Employment Act would offer a measure of protection against abuse, for instance an independent review by a third party. Thus, people who feel they have been wronged would have access to a mechanism which is mentioned in writing, defined and explained in the proposals that have been put forward.

This in no way limits the responsibility and accountability of the employer and the managers. The checks and balances system is still being applied. The spirit in which this legislation was introduced by government is to let it be known that our civil servants, our managers are competent. Generally speaking, in principle, our people are competent and there is no abuse. However, if someone feels there is abuse, mechanisms are provided to deal with this.

[English]

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, I want to address very briefly this piece of legislation that, in my view, has tremendous implications for how the services of the Government of Canada are delivered and how people interact with their government through the bureaucracy.

Let me say at the very outset, Mr. Speaker, that I totally agree that this bill should be referred to committee, as has been proposed by many speakers to your left.

We believe that the implications, the ramifications of this bill, are such that we understand that many people will want to have some input, including of course people in the Public Service, but most of all I believe people outside of the Public Service.

I have just come from the Standing Committee on Public Accounts where the Government of Canada explains to various departments how more than $100 billion is spent.

The biggest problem that we face in public accounts is the complexity of the material provided to us that is allegedly designed to provide information not only to members of the House of Commons and to Parliament generally, but also to the people of Canada.

If we are going to seriously consider changing the way in which the federal Public Service functions in terms of, for example, accountability, giving more flexibility to managers, being able to deal with issues at various levels, being able to provide more direct service to taxpayers and to clients of various departments, then we are going to have to at the same time address how we are able to account to the people of Canada for the money that is spent. I think we are a long way from that and that is why a special committee of Parliament should be struck to review this entire concept. It would be very simple.

I know a number of colleagues have already addressed the question of morale in the Public Service. We are in a post-strike situation where there are still many, many problems to be resolved within the Public Service, public servants' relationships with senior department officials, with management people, and even among themselves.

I do not want to get into that because we are serious in suggesting that this bill should be referred to a special committee of the House. This would allow people to come before us and express their views on the whole gamut of subjects.

For example, many people are concerned with contracting out. Should there be less? Should there be more? How should efficiency of contracting out be measured? What is the basis on which members of the Public Service should be promoted? Should it be automatic? Should it be just a question of sitting around long enough to qualify for a promotion? Should merit increases be automatic? There are so many questions that should be put.

I believe that part of our problem in this place is that we suggest that there should be consultation and there should be reference, there should be an opportunity for input. Then we go ahead and tell everybody what should be done.

In a bill of this magnitude, with the kind of impact it will have, even the terminology used, the year 2000, all of that lends itself to supporting our position that the bill should be referred to committee.

There should be sufficient opportunity for Canadians. There is a tremendous concern about whether or not Canadian taxpayers are getting the best possible return on their tax dollar.

Is efficiency a priority, not just part of a system of becoming more efficient, but is it the priority? What does efficiency mean in the Public Service? Does it mean turning around letters of enquiry dealing with income tax or GST or Canada Pension Plan or is it dealing with the problem that is raised in the letter?

How are we going to cope with the tremendous changes in technology? What is going to be the impact of having the technology that will allow people all over Canada to work in the Public Service?

I know that my friends in Ottawa rightfully repeat quite often that there are Public Service personnel throughout the country, but there are more in some regions of the country than in others.

In Atlantic Canada, for example, we have public servants but they do not get paid the same as public servants in other parts of the country, in some instances because there is a regional pay system.

There are so many questions. They are legitimate questions and they come from all sectors. Surely members of the Public Service have a right to significant input on changes that will directly affect them and their families, their futures, their careers, their rates of pay and their responsibilities.

Why would we wish to proceed with a bill that has really not garnered very much support from any of the important sectors that are involved on a day-to-day basis with the kinds of situations the bill gives rise to, but also in terms of how the public perceives it?

We are going through a recession. We are dealing with the Constitution. Very few Canadians, other than when the strike occurred, on a day-to-day basis think about what the Public Service is doing in this country unless they have had an experience, good or bad, with someone in the Public Service in trying to get some answers or to get some help and avail themselves of the kinds of facilities available through the Public Service.

I want to take just a couple of moments to address an area that is a specific concern of mine. That is, regardless of how this reform comes out I hope it will be after it has been scrutinized by a special committee that provides for a great amount of latitude from the people who come before it to express their point of view. Regardless of how we arrive at the end result, we have to have enhanced accountability in every sense of the word.

Canadians are frustrated with the system. We as members of Parliament are very often the lightning rod for that frustration. People look at us and suggest that we are not able to perform adequately, that we are not efficient and that we are not getting the kinds of programs in place that are required in this country.

As much as that is valid and as much as we must say mea culpa and that we take our own responsibilities, I think it goes far beyond that. Many Canadians are questioning the system: the role of the member of Parliament, the role of the Senate certainly, the role of provincial politicians, the role of municipal politicians. All of us are suffering from the cynicism and again, as I admit candidly, much of it well deserved, but the system is far greater. Ask any woman or man who has sat in this place and who is now gone from this place. I think Pierre Elliott Trudeau put it very well: "Don't get too far off the Hill and you become a nobody. Perhaps when you are back in your constituency a few people may recognize you".

Ask the people who have passed through this place what they have contributed, how they have performed, how efficient they were, what kind of impact they had on policy. Many people are constituency politicians. There are all kinds of ways of assessing them. We go through an assessment, and we like to go through the assessment, I might point out, every four years. I am told that tradition will change and that we might have to wait five years. I will let Canadians address that question.

The cynicism and the frustration that is directed toward the system also includes, and we have to be honest about this, a feeling that the Public Service of Canada perhaps is not as efficient as it should be. There is the question of contracting out, all of the frustration that was generated, for example, during the strike. We all remember how people were responding to situations that had a direct affect on them. Other than that, perhaps people were relatively apathetic. However, when people were in lines, could not get into airports, could not get passports, could not get various programs approved or applications and so forth, there was a high degree of frustration.

We might think that is gone, but I think it is in the best interest of the Public Service to have a thorough look at what we are proposing. That is why I want to emphasize accountability. If we are going to be accountable as politicians and if we are going to pay the price every four or five years, whatever the case might be, that is one thing. In the Public Service there needs to be accountability. That is going to become very difficult if we look at how the proposals in this legislation allow for decision-making to take place. Are we going to have a more rapid response to problems? Are we going to deal at regional levels and even local levels with specific problems, or are we going to have a greater attempt to make sure that accountability is taken care of, in other words that we cover any decision we make very thoroughly to make sure no one is left out to swing in the wind. I think that is a legitimate concern on the part of public servants, to find out what the decision-making process being proposed implies and what kind of responsibility will rest with the person making the decision.

The public servant has a stake in this, but the Canadian people also have a stake in it. Is it going to be more efficient or are we going to have more people trying to make certain that at some point in time they are not found to be responsible for an incorrect, improper decision or a decision that had very bad results?

These are the questions that I believe must be addressed because of the notion of accountability. The accountability aspect of everything we do now in public life is critical. We must understand that Canadians are insisting that politicians and public servants be accountable and that the system of accountability be as transparent as possible. The best example of that is in Public Accounts where people are far more concerned with the expenditure of $100,000, $200,000 or $1 million than they are with the expenditure of a billion dollars, because the system confounds them when they look at the larger issue. They are unable to deal with it adequately.

I was told yesterday by an individual with whom I was discussing this problem that it is common currency in the senior levels of the Public Service to suggest that part III of the Estimates, for example, which deals with a lot of the details as to how money is spent in this country, is not being used by parliamentarians. There is a tremendous expense in generating this information. Departments work for weeks and months at putting together the information that flows through that process and eventually comes out in a series of books that would fill a counter 10 to 12 feet long. The sad fact is that that senior public servant is right. They are not being used.

Are they not being used because parliamentarians and the Canadian public do not want to use them, or are they so complex and difficult to deal with that no one has the expertise or very few people have the expertise to use them?

The question that will have to be asked at some point by parliamentarians is: Is the production of this information by the bureaucracy and by government designed to inform Parliament and the public, or is the exercise designed to fulfil the necessity for disclosure?

In my view of the world, disclosure does not equate with information. People can disclose, for example, how to build a nuclear weapon. That does not mean that I can build it. The information is not something that I can digest or transpose into concrete acts.

What we are dealing with in my view is a system that purports to be accountable, that legislatively is supposed to be accountable, but that in fact spends a great deal of its time making decisions that no one can really track down in terms of being able to tag accountability on to an individual.

We all know that our tradition in this place rests on ministerial accountability. If anybody believes that that still holds true today except in the most blatant of cases where ministers are completely out of line, they are being very naive.

The most experienced people in government now make sure that every avenue is covered so that no matter what happens no one individually is accountable.

If we are to look at legislation like this, which is going to put people in a position where they can make decisions at local and regional levels in a very different way from what is being done now, are we going to make the system more useful to Canadians, or are we just going to create a system where a lot more people have to make sure they can cover their tracks?

I hope that accountability of people in the Public Service and transparency in making sure that people understand what is being done will be key points that will be reviewed when this legislation is referred to a special committee.

The stakes are very high. This country has a lot of good men and women in the Public Service. We need to make sure that we reassure them as to exactly what the rules are. What are they going to be expected to do? Is it going to be a pass the buck system? Is it going to be a cover every avenue system? Is it going to be a system where people are given opportunities to make decisions?

We stand behind them when they make the decisions because they know the parameters under which they are functioning when those decisions are made.

The initiative is a laudable one, to move our Public Service into the 21st century. Certainly Canadians want people to be able to make decisions. We have too much government, layer over layer of government from the municipal level to the provincial level to the federal level. We have all kinds of special agencies, review boards and all the rest of it.

Surely the objective is not to make life more complicated for the public servant or for the public. I do not think the government has gone far enough in making sure it has consulted widely enough, that there has been sufficient opportunity for discussion, debate and input.

That is why I recommend strongly to the government that it accept our recommendation that this bill not be considered at this time, that it be referred to a special committee, and that that committee make every effort to function in a way that will restore confidence in the Public Service on the part of the Canadian public. At a time when morale is suffering in the Public Service, the men and women in our Public Service should be provided with the confidence required to do their jobs properly. They should know what is expected of them and how the system is going to work. They should have had a say in how it is going to evolve and feel relatively comfortable with what is finally proposed.

In closing, may I say that most Canadians have the highest respect for the people who work in our Public Service. In northern New Brunswick we have a government office in Bathurst, in my constituency, that deals with matters across the country. It was decentralized in the 1970s. It has hundreds of public servants who do magnificent work. I know that because I deal with them directly. Northern New Brunswick suffers from very high unemployment. The people in the Canada Employment and Immigration complex in Bathurst exemplify in my view so much of what is good in the Canadian Public Service.

Most of the employees are bilingual. My constituency is bilingual. They function internally in both official languages of Canada. They provide services in both official languages of Canada. They provide services in an area where the client base is oftentimes frustrated and unhappy with its lot, and rightfully so.

I want to emphasize that no one is seeking to delay because we are not sure how we want to deal with the bill. What we are saying is that it is absolutely essential that public servants have their say about working conditions, about responsibility, and about accountability. They should have their say, as I mentioned, in the face of technological advances that are being made month by month, technological advances that will change the way they work, will often change where they work, will certainly change the way Canadians get information from the Government of Canada.

I do hope, if we are able to bring the government to our point of view, that this bill be referred and that Canadians, some of whom all too often are too quick to criticize, will come forward with constructive suggestions as to how together we can all improve the way taxpayers' dollars are used to employ men and women who provide the services that government is committed to giving to the Canadian people.

My colleagues and I will not be supporting further consideration of this bill. I do hope that we will be able to agree on referring it to a special committee as has been raised by so many of my colleagues during this debate.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have a short question for my colleague who has been a member not only of this House but of the legislature of the province of New Brunswick for many years and a former minister of fisheries in that legislature.

My question has to do with the process of accountability. I would like to be specific. In Pearson International Airport in Toronto we receive people virtually 16 to 18 hours a day. They come to the city of Toronto and other related cities throughout the Niagara horseshoe area for tourism opportunities. They also come to look for business opportunities, to invest. They come to review opportunities and to hold trade shows which will result in further exposure for people from all over the world.

One of the biggest complaints we receive is at the point of entry where quite often people will wait sometimes as much as an hour to be processed because of the length of queues at the customs entry point. I realize there are other parts of the world a lot worse than Toronto.

In terms of process and accountability it would seem to me that would be an area where the Government of Canada might be a little penny wise and pound foolish. In other words, it might ask: "What does an extra hour wait mean for somebody coming to this city to invest $100 million or to bring a trade show that might bring with it 4,000 or 5,000 tourism delegates?" A lot of people walk away from our city or first enter our city with not quite the right taste. I am talking about Toronto now, but I believe it happens in other cities throughout Canada as well.

In the process of accountability how does the member think we should address specific problems like that one to make sure they do not continue? We hear enough complaints from our constituents, but sometimes I think we get bogged down in this House in our ability to solve those problems. I would appreciate the hon. member's views.

Mr. Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, I think all public servants working in Canada, whether it is at an airport, processing income tax returns or dealing with war veterans problems, only want one thing. They do not want to bear the brunt of decisions beyond their responsibility.

I agree that customs officers throughout this country, not only those dealing with duty and that type of thing, but those working in immigration and those who have a dual responsibility depending on where they work in the country, can face very difficult situations. They are doing what they can.

The decision to staff areas is obviously made somewhere else. All too often the people in the firing line are those who have the least to say about how their particular responsibility is going to be carried out. I sympathize with those public servants who find themselves in very awkward positions through no fault of their own. They are working as efficiently as they can. They are dealing with the problems presented to them by individuals looking to enter the country or people looking to deal with customs requirements. Surely the accountability has to be with senior management, and this is where the transparency aspect comes into it to some extent.

We cannot demand services, and I think taxpayers are aware of this, without knowing what the cost will be and what the benefits will be. I think this is the point my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood was making. It is not just a question of the overhead cost or the fixed cost. It is also a question of what benefits can be gained or lost by efficient, appropriate use of our resources. When we review the proposal put forward by the government in this legislation, we need to be able to devise a scheme and a system where we can much better determine productivity, decide what is in the best interest of the public servant, the best interest of the client, and what is best for the country.

It is not an easy task but certainly the accountability level has to be identified. It should not be left to people who have very little input into the decision-making process to bear the burden of whether it is cutbacks, financial restraint, improper staffing, or a lack of capacity to explain exactly why delays take place.

I sympathize with my colleague. I do not think we have as yet understood the need to be conscious of evaluating the benefits of what we do with our human and financial resources.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise with my colleague from Acadie—Bathurst a question concerning accountability in the Public Service. Michael Binder wrote an article for the magazine Optimum, a management magazine published by Supply and Services, in which he said this very interesting quotation:

> One is tempted to ask, "What's the problem? Fundamentally, the problem is this: We are overmanaged and underled."
> We rely on rules and regulations, systems and procedures, rather than on our people—our managers and leaders.
> And, in spite of stacks of volumes of directives and procedures: accountabilities in the system are still confusing (as a look at the responsibilities of any deputy minister quickly shows); we expect our managers to administer millions of dollars, but barely trust them with taxi chits—authorities are not commensurate with responsibilities; our process of allocating resources is still, by and large, incremental, arbitrary, and definitely not based on scientific analysis of needs or effectiveness; and recent surveys by the Auditor General and Dr. David Zussman of the University of Ottawa, revealed a level of frustration on the part of managers, a weakening of the sense of belonging, and a loss of pride. Managers feel profoundly that there is not a great deal of interest in telling them what is really going on, and they are far from where the action is.

In light of a number of recent developments, including the breakdown of the traditions of ministerial responsibility we saw demonstrated most recently in the Al-Mashat affair, these comments by Mr. Michael Binder are quite apropos. I wonder whether the member would be willing to comment on that.

Mr. Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, it is fundamental to our system that the actions of public servants be defended by their superiors where those actions or conducts are compatible and follow the procedures that are put in place. This is the kind of thing that has to be addressed when this legislation is reviewed.

I refer to the quotation that was put forward by my colleague on clarity. People want to know what is expected of them. They want to know what kind of latitude and flexibility is available to them. Flexibility is one of the words being used in promoting PS 2000. This bill reflects that. But what does it mean? Does it mean flexibility to achieve or flexibility to avoid?

Unfortunately there has been a magnification of certain abuses. In any system or in any human activity there are bound to be examples of abuse, waste, or whatever. These are the kinds of things that are highlighted and to which the public responds, whereas, as my colleague has put it, most public servants as well as most employees in the private sector do their jobs and do them as well as they can. We need clarity, transparency and rules. People need to know what is expected of them. When they do what is expected of them and they perform their duties within the parameters set by management they should be defended.

The Al-Mashat affair is just a symptom of people not knowing whether they will be defended. Are they doing the right thing? Should they be covering themselves as opposed to doing something, making a decision and taking risks? It is difficult to define every possibility.

Surely that is the objective, however. We look forward to a special committee of the House dealing with these issues and hearing from the people both in the public and private sectors who will be directly affected by this type of legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before giving the floor to the next speaker, it is my duty to inform the House that the first five hours of debate have now expired. The length of the speeches is now 10 minutes, without a question and comment period.

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, it was almost 25 years ago, in 1967, that federal Public Service employees in Canada received the right to free collective bargaining together with the right to strike in support of that negotiating process.

It is significant that today, 25 years later, we are introducing the PS 2000 initiative which includes a series of steps and actions to modernize the application of our complex system of Public Service staff relations throughout our federal government administration.

I would like to address the dispute resolution improvements which are contained in the Public Service Reform Act, the proposed legislation in the form of Bill C-26 which is now before us.

This legislation has several provisions which will facilitate the resolution of disputes arising during the course of collective bargaining in the Public Service. As well the bill contains expanded provisions for resolving rights disputes. Those are the kinds of disputable obligations which arise out of a collective agreement or out of arbitration awards.

The intent of labour relation recommendations in the PS 2000 white paper has been to improve the government's relationship as an employer with Public Service unions. The main way to achieve this is to create greater flexibility in the dispute resolution process. We believe that the elimination or the modification of overly rigid, inflexible rules and procedures will enable the parties to work out their differences in a much more constructive manner.

Over the years it has become apparent that the current limitations on the scope of arbitration, coupled with the inability of each party to choose its nominee, has made the arbitration route unattractive to some unions. Arbitration awards are currently limited to such matters as rates of pay, hours of work, leave, standards of discipline, and so on. This has acted as a disincentive to choose arbitration over the conciliation or strike route.

The government therefore proposes to amend the Public Service Staff Relations Act to increase the scope of arbitration to cover all matters which are now the subject for conciliation.

Another proposed improvement to the current system would permit each party to choose its nominee for an arbitration board. Only where the parties cannot agree will the Public Service Staff Relations Board be authorized to appoint the members of an arbitration board.

Amendments to the Public Service Staff Relations Act are proposed to provide, where the parties so agree, a single arbiter who can be appointed instead of a full arbitration board. Another avenue has been opened to provide greater flexibility in conflict resolution. In other jurisdictions the parties are permitted to refer bargaining issues to a single conciliator instead of to a full conciliation board. The bill proposes that where the parties jointly nominate a conciliation commissioner, the PSSRB will be required to appoint that person.

There is always room for new approaches to resolve collective bargaining disputes. The PS 2000 white paper proposed the introduction of a new method designed to keep open the possibility of agreement before the positions of the parties became so entrenched that the only recourse would end in a less than perfect solution.

Bill C-26 before us provides for a voluntary choice for the parties to select a fact finder. The fact finder would define the points in dispute and make non-binding recommendations. However these recommendations would be made public early on in the collective bargaining process before the position of either side became too entrenched. After the appointment of the fact finder the parties would continue to negotiate. They would know, however, that a third party's views on certain questions would eventually be made public and they would be disciplined in their negotiations to consider that reality.

Bill C-26 incorporates another method to help in resolving disputes between the government of the day and public servants. As the law now stands, unions that have agreed to take the conciliation-strike route have no choice but to follow this route with respect to the resolution of all issues. Bill C-26 will open up a new option. The parties by mutual agreement will be able to refer any or all issues in dispute to a form of binding arbitration.

This means that outstanding issues could be referred to a third party for decision early on in the negotiation process so that everything is not on the table at the end of the day. This clears the way for the parties to deal with other issues and perhaps to reach agreements on separate elements of the package one at a time. This provision is called an alternative dispute resolution and will provide greater flexibility to find solutions to problems.

I am sure members of this House will be concerned about what is termed "essential employees" who carry out duties that must be continued during a strike because they are necessary, essential and in the interests of the safety or the security of the public.

Bill C-26 gives effect to the white paper recommendations that the Public Service Staff Relations Act be amended to provide an independent mechanism to resolve disputes about the designation of positions. These amendments are modelled after the provisions of the memorandum of understanding between Treasury Board and the Public Service Alliance of Canada which was signed on August 7, 1990. Both parties found this arrangement to be entirely satisfactory. The process is designed to have designated positions determined in advance of a round of collective bargaining. This removes the contentious nature of issues, particularly of this issue of designation, from the bargaining context and enhances the smooth operation of the dispute resolution mechanisms available to the parties.

The proposed amendments to the PSSRA do not deal only with collective bargaining rules. They also improve the rights of individual employees. Under the current system the predominant practice has been for the Public Service Staff Relations Board to designate its members as adjudicators. Bill C-26 would permit the parties to select adjudicators of their own choosing, providing a greater flexibility to the parties.

Bill C-26 also provides for the consolidation of employee redress with respect to all cases of termination of employment that do not remain under the PSEA. This means that employees will be able to grieve a management decision to terminate their employment through the full grievance process to third party adjudication.

Many unions have demanded that so-called policy grievances be subject to review by the Public Service Staff Relations Board. We are concerned that this could work to the disadvantage of the effectiveness of the grievance process. Therefore Bill C-26 proposes a compromise. When both parties agree, a matter relating to the interpretation of a collective agreement which could be the subject of an individual employee grievance to the PSSRB can now be referred directly to the board.

Bill C-26 also proposes other amendments which will enhance the smooth operation of the collective bargaining system. Of particular note is the provision which provides for a basis for master bargaining. When the parties agree, negotiations can proceed to conclude a single collective agreement which is binding on more than one bargaining unit. This is not a new provision but is an important one because it supports the current practice which reduces the probability of conflict.

In closing I would like to mention another provision about the collective bargaining process which concerns the period of notice to bargain. Bill C-26 improves this provision by 50 per cent by stretching it from two months to a three-month notice period which will permit the parties to commence the bargaining process earlier and will enhance the deliberate objective and prepared approach to the entire labour negotiation system.

These new provisions to improve the scope and the capacity for both the government and the Public Service to conduct the bargaining process and to resolve disputes are welcome changes in federal government administration. They will help to set new standards of expeditious and efficient collective negotiation and should significantly reduce levels of conflict and occasions of confrontation. Such results will most certainly contribute to improving staff relations and morale and ultimately to improving service to our common constituents, the citizens of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on Bill C-26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act and the Public Service Staff Relations Act. It is obvious to all of us, whether parliamentarians, civil servants or government services users, that it is a good idea to review such a legislation that has been in effect for 25 years with a view to improving it for the benefit of us all.

We must give the public service of Canada an enhanced tool, a legislation in step with our times that will serve us well into the 21st century. We all agree that there is a need for the legislation governing the public service operations to be renewed in order to better serve the people of Canada. However I intend to vote for the six month hoist proposed by the Liberal member so that all parties in this House have a chance to examine the draft legislation and come up with a legislation acceptable to all, that is to say the Canadian people, the civil servants, the unions, the managers as well as all the political parties represented in this House.

The House Committee on Public Accounts, on which I have been sitting since 1988, has looked into the Public Service 2000 issue. In its report tabled November 5, 1990, the recommendations made to the government included the presentation of a working document and the establishment of a special committee of the House of Commons on public service reform. This committee would carry out consultations with employees, the public service unions and other interested parties. I want to point out today a few areas where this bill is flawed.

[English]

The weakness which I wish to underline today is as follows: deployment, the merit principle, contracting out and the political rights of public servants.

On the subject of deployment, this is a new terminology and a new activity. Simply put, deployment means transfer. In this case the transfer is of an employee from one position to another. The process is definitely not simple and has the potential of becoming one which lends itself to administrative patronage. The problems with deployment are seen in clause 34. The deputy head or the manager has exclusive rights to make deployments within his or her jurisdiction.

Presently transfers are subject to the merit principle and can be appealed. The right of appeal has now been removed. The deputy head makes the decision for deployment and also hears complaints.

The government proposes that it has made the system fair by adding clause 34.2 which states that deployment will not take place without the consent of the employee, "unless an agreement to be deployed is a term or condition of employment of the employee's current position".

This section is fraught with many problems. First, how much coercion will be put on the employee to consent. There may be harassment and pressure put on the employee to convince him or her that refusal of a deployment will affect future career prospects and even job security. One wonders how soon it will become a permanent condition of employment that an employee sign an agreement to be deployed.

My second point is on the merit principle. The Public Service Employment Act and the present principles under which the Public Service functions are based on the merit principle. Appointments are always made based on selection according to merit after competition is held. Bill C-26 will change this. Clause 10(2) proposes to eliminate competition and allow for appointment as measured against given standards rather than against the competence of other candidates.

Canadians must be guaranteed that their Public Service is non-partisan and employees must be assured that they have the right to advancement based on competence rather than bureaucratic patronage and favouritism.

The role of the Public Service Commission is once again being severely curtailed by this bill. Gone is its power as watch dog and its responsibility to safeguard the merit principle. Managers will now have the right to move employees without regard to merit.

A figure on the total amount spent by the government on contracting out is still not known. The government has no mechanism in place to provide Canadians with this figure nor does it have any system in place to prove the cost effectiveness of this practice. There are many stories of contracts gone wrong and of duplication of costs, all this at the expense of jobs.

The public accounts committee attempted unsuccessfully to get specific details on the issue of contracting out. In its seventh report to the House tabled on November 5, 1990 the committee asked the Auditor General to examine the cost effectiveness and the effect on morale of this practice of going outside of the workplace to have jobs done.

All of our efforts in arriving at a bottom line amount have been were stonewalled by the government. However, it has been estimated that during the current 1991-1992 fiscal year the government will spend $5 billion contracting out services. The government cannot or will not account for the amount of work done outside the Public Service. It cannot guarantee that this practice is cost effective and now it enshrines in law the fact that it can lay off employees when their work is transferred to an outside agency. This does little for morale and will do little to assist in the implementation of the changes in Public Service 2000. Employees will always be living in the shadow of having their jobs gone to contracting out.

Finally, political rights of public servants. It is important to note that this issue has been left out of the bill. I repeat, has been left out of the bill. It is definitely time that legislation recognizes the need for clear, common sense rules which will liberalize the restrictions now placed on these employees to take part in political activities at various levels.

I mention clarity because this is a most important issue. When standards and rules are simple and clear there can be no misunderstanding. The rights of individual public servants should be weighed against the need to maintain an efficient, professional and impartial Public Service. Right now, public servants do not know with any certainty what they can or cannot do politically.

In August 1988 the Public Service Commission addressed the issue by telling its employees: "Exercise appropriate judgment and consider your specific circumstances in deciding the nature of your participation in political activities". This did nothing to provide practical guidance.

On June 6, 1991 the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that the prohibition against public servants working for a candidate or a political party violated their freedom of expression as set out in section 2(b) of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The Supreme Court also stated that legislation should be enacted specifying the limits of political involvement.

I believe that public servants who do not take part in either direct distribution of government funding or in the decisions around the granting of contracts should be able to participate at a particular level of political activity. Those in very public positions should be restricted. However, the guidelines have to be established and made clear, not left to guesswork.

I intend to propose amendments to those sections of the Public Service Employment Act which the Supreme Court declared contravene the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I will also be demonstrating in committee that the 1979 D'Avignon report contains several very interesting suggestions, as do the reports of other countries concerning limitations and definitions of political activity for public servants.

All of this will solve the dilemma our public servants find themselves in today when there is so much confusion and no definition given to the political rights of public servants.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to comment on Bill C-26, which I think is an example of the worst possible way that one could imagine of trying to reorganize the Public Service, by doing it in a way that is completely at odds with the views of the Public Service employees themselves and which only serves to aggravate an already bad situation with respect to morale in the Public Service sector and with respect to the relationship that exists between public servants and the government.

There is a great deal of suspicion, and rightly so, I believe, on the part of public servants about PS 2000 which this bill seeks to implement. The government would be much better advised to re-establish a healthy relationship with their employees and proceed from there rather than trying to impose, by legislative fiat, what cannot be achieved at the bargaining table.

It is part of a trend in Canadian politics, which I think has been aggravated by the current government, and has its origins really in the rhetoric of the Conservative Party, going back to when it was in opposition. They sort of made a career out of attacking the Public Service. You see now, after years in government, that this attitude on their part is coming to fruition in this legislation.

I have a great many public servants in my riding. The Western Canada Taxation Data Centre is in my riding and twice in my parliamentary life I have had occasion to be on the picket line in front of that taxation data centre, back in 1980 I believe it was, when the clerks were on strike and, most recent, during this much larger strike that we all know about that happened last year.

It is unfortunate that Public Service employees have come to situations where they feel that this is their only alternative. If you go out on that picket line, Mr. Speaker, you will see that we are not talking here about a highly politicized group of people who are out to make political trouble, we are talking about a great many people who have not been politically active or involved but who simply feel that an injustice is being done to them in the work place and that they have no choice in the final analysis but to respond in the way that they are responding, by being on that picket line and by supporting the strike.

Even more recently, although it is not in my constituency, I had occasion to join members of the Public Service Alliance who were on strike at the Royal Canadian Mint in St. Boniface. That strike has since been settled but it went on for an awfully long time. It hurt a lot of people and it did not have to be that way.

I firmly believe that where there is a will, there is a way in these kinds of situations. That applies to every situation and I think that the government has taken a kind of attitude to these negotiations which has not permitted negotiated settlements to be reached when they should have been reached. Instead, we had a great many strike actions which could have been avoided.

I want to talk a little bit about the whole notion of contracting out. This is one of the things that really bothers me. I think the evidence, if it were to be accumulated and documented down to the last detail, would show that contracting out is not a way of saving money. Time after time, it is an occasion for people who have no commitment to the particular project, to the particular department or to a particular task that the government is undertaking, to be hired on a short-term basis, to come in and do a particular job, make a buck and get out.

Often, although I am sure this is not true of everyone, the real and only goal is to make that quick buck. Often the public servants have to come along later and clean up the mess left by these private contractors or redo the job that was supposed to have been done by the company to whom the contract was given.

What we are talking about here is a form of long-term commitment to the well-being of a particular project or task, or department or whatever. This whole notion of contracting out, of fragmentation, of commitment is a form of degrading what I would call this whole notion of vocation; that people take their place, particularly public servants, but people might also have this kind of notion about their employment in the private sector.

There is the notion of vocation, that you are here to do a good job, you are here to serve not only your family by earning a living, but you are here to serve your community and your employer by doing a decent job, doing a job in the context of knowing that next year, the year after and the year after that, you are going to be around to answer for the quality of the job that is done.

How well you do your job will have an effect not just on you personally, but on the work place and the goals which you have set for yourself and your fellow workers. That is not the kind of society that we are moving into, Mr. Speaker, with all this contracting out business. People are just sort of random particles in some kind of molecular windstorm where everybody is contracting out here, there and everywhere and doing this job and that job and no one having any sense of cohesion, commitment or community.

It is all just a question of lining up individually isolated, unconnected opportunities to make money. I see this whole debate about contracting out as part of a larger debate about the nature of work and the nature of our relationships with each other.

I deplore it as much for that as I do for the more obvious and I think politically compelling reason, that it does not save the money the government claims it does. In fact, what it becomes is a sort of a boondoggle for people who are connected to the government, who receive these contracts over and above the availability and the ability of the public servants who are there to do that kind of job and who know how to do the job.

I have seen it not just in the Public Service but also in the railway where CN is obsessed in some of its sectors with contracting out. It brings in people who are not railroaders and who do not have the same kind of lifetime commitment to working on the railway. They come in and do a particular job, and the next day they are working on something else completely different.

Maybe I am just old-fashioned. Maybe I am more conservative than the Conservatives when it comes to this kind of stuff. I think we need to preserve the notion that people are involved in a particular vocation, that people are involved in a particular industry, and that they are not just kind of jumping all over the place wherever there is money to be made, for governments foolish enough to think that contracting out is the way to go.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I understand we are on 10-minute speeches at the present time. Therefore I will certainly reduce my 20-minute speech to 10 minutes in accordance with the rules of this House.

I want to say that my party has put forward an amendment to the substance of Bill C-26 at second reading. A good number of Canadians have a certain impression of public servants across this country which in its totality is somewhat incorrect. They are not, I wish to underline for the House and the Chair, individuals who have chosen this particular life because they want to live off the political hide of government. Many have chosen to enter the Public Service because they believe quite substantively that it is a career of serving their country, of serving a particular agency of the Government of Canada, and of serving the people of Canada in that particular endeavour.

It ought to be said clearly that most, if not all, of the public servants I happen to know in my constituency and across this country are men and women who have demonstrated a capacity to work extremely hard and, on some occasions, under less generous working conditions than that of other individuals.

That is not to suggest in any way that members of our Public Service are working in conditions which are akin to other jurisdictions in foreign countries. I do want to place on the record that I have a tremendous respect for those men and women who are serving in the Public Service of Canada.

For instance, I think in my own constituency of those individuals who work so diligently in Employment and Immigration, in National Health and Welfare, in Secretary of State, in the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, and in all other agencies of the Government of Canada in my constituency and indeed on the island of Cape Breton. There are examples of individual public servants who may from time to time have arguments, confrontations and misunderstandings with individuals including myself. By and large they work very hard. They are extremely dedicated and they have a clear appreciation of their role and its importance for Canadians across this country.

In many respects this government when it comes to our public servants has been seen to create an environment of confrontation thereafter resulting in low morale. I have never seen in my years in Parliament representing constituents and interfacing with government agencies such low morale in the public servants of this country. It is little wonder when we review the treatment they have been given over the last number of years and equally so the sort of spin that is put on the Public Service of this country.

I draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, the examples we had in this House. We had ministers of the Crown who intervened in debate on back-to-work legislation and left the impression intentionally or otherwise that members of the Public Service were fat cats who had a pretty easy route, were not unemployed, and therefore should be grateful for whatever the Government of Canada would give them in terms of compensation, both monetary as well as non-monetary.

In my view that is the lowest form of politics. It is the politics of envy.

I stand in this Chamber as I have on many occasions to echo the sentiment in my district that unemployment is at an unacceptably high level in this country. But I do not like governments or ministers of the Crown playing one off against the other as we have seen done by the Government of Canada over the last number of years, particularly the last number of months.

It is very easy to criticize someone who has a job because he or she may want better employment equity laws and regulation, someone who wishes to have better health and safety regulations or someone who wishes to have better compensation for the effort, for the hours, and for the dedication given to his or her particular portfolio in whatever capacity, and to interface that with the unemployed who have no opportunity for meaningful jobs.

I do not like that. I do not think it is needed. I do not think it adds to the level of debate. It certainly produces, as we have seen in the Public Service, a very low morale. It serves only to disunite Canadians as opposed to uniting Canadians on an important issue such as the public sector.

I would have thought that the Government of Canada, through the minister responsible and particularly members of cabinet, would have looked at the Public Service in the way members of the private sector and of non-profit organizations are now pursuing. There is a real desire by some organizations, private and non-private, to try to bring into the fold their employees and to have shared objectives, courses of action and strategies with their employees in order to better service the clientele in the private sector and public sectors across this country.

We have seen the exact opposite with this government. We have seen a government that has run a cabinet like a corporate board. It seemed to forget, or perhaps to a greater extent purposely put aside, the concerns of the rank and file, the workers of the Public Service in terms of what they can do in achieving the goals of the government to improve services to all Canadians. I find that kind of attitude to be disconcerting. If the Government of Canada were to achieve some of the goals it has laid before Parliament, if it were to subscribe to its agenda, it must seek the assistance of public servants. They must be able to interface without fear of retaliation, without fear of additional contracting out of services. What they say and do must in fact be appreciated. I do not think that is the case with this particular government. I think it has done everything, intentionally or otherwise, to alienate the Public Service, thereby resulting in poor morale. One has to question in some instances whether or not the objectives of public servants as it sees them are being achieved.

I would hope the Government of Canada would stop using the public servants of this country as whipping boys and whipping women in a debate over the Canadian economy and over the recession we are in at the present time. It is essential that they be paid reasonable compensation for their efforts and for their dedication, but I also believe that they should have a meaningful say in terms of the delivery of programs, in terms of the administration of the Public Service not only for their betterment but also in achieving the objectives of the government. Of course the ultimate object is providing top quality service for Canadians from coast to coast.

[Translation]

Mr. Clément Couture (Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, my speech this morning will be relatively brief.

Public Service 2000 is indeed an excellent initiative and will certainly prove worthwhile for all Canadians. All members of this House have great respect for Public Service employees. We need them, and we realize that they are doing an excellent job.

I do not think it is in any way disparaging to Public Service employees if we look for ways to improve efficiency and renew a public service which seems to have been operating on the same principles for the past 25 years.

In my speech this morning I want to express my support for Bill C-26, and I will explain why. Public Service 2000 will achieve the following objectives: Initially, change internal management rules to make them more flexible, more effective and more service oriented. Throughout this initiative, we see there is a very real respect for all public service employees. Our purpose is simply to make certain adjustments to the technological developments that have taken place during the past 25 years, to change the rules and make it easier for the public servant to do the job he has to do as part of his duties.

It is clear that the Public Service must concentrate on providing better service to all Canadians. This also means updating the rules on collective bargaining, staffing and human resource management. The reform will be prepared by a task force created in January 1991, which will be responsible for simplifying the position classification system by abolishing occupational categories, reducing the number of occupational groups from 71 to 23, and simplifying classification standards and reducing the number of classification levels.

I repeat this will make the Public Service far more responsive to all its employees and help it to continue improving services to the public.

Despite all these changes, many groups will continue to exist, such as specialists and technical jobs, but the administrative sector will be consolidated in a single occupational group to be known as general services.

Classification standards will be consolidated through the use of a universal position evaluation plan, which will be instrumental in establishing a system providing for equal pay for work of equal value. This standard in the Public Service, which we find in all private sector bargaining, is certainly one of the standards most appreciated by public servants, and will also be appreciated as such at the functional level.

Consolidating occupational groups will substantially reduce the range of pay scales and thus simplify administration.

As I said before, my speech will be brief, and I am about to conclude. I am sure all parliamentarians will support this initiative because after 25 years, it makes sense to make Public Service operations more effective and more service oriented, for the benefit of all Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to stand and speak on this bill. I am not in support but in opposition to the proposed bill.

As you will recall, Mr. Speaker, the Standing Committee on Public Accounts made a recommendation to the House of Commons that a special committee of Parliament be empowered to consider the principle of the bill as well as its substance in the total context of PS 2000.

Our caucus and our party support the recommendations of this committee for the reason that we should look at the thrust of PS 2000. The whole idea behind it came from that which the Prime Minister announced on December 12, 1989. He announced PS 2000 which he called: "an initiative to renew the Public Service of Canada". At the time the Prime Minister explained that the purpose of the initiative was, first, to foster and encourage a Public Service that was professional, highly qualified, non-partisan and imbued with a mission of service to the public; second, to recognize that its employees are an asset to be valued and developed; third, to place as much authority as possible in the hands of front-line employees and managers; and, fourth, to provide the scope for different organizational forms to meet different needs but in the context of a single Public Service.

These are the principles and I think they are generally good. If we are looking for professionalism in the Public Service it is there. Our Public Service is highly qualified, non-partisan and its mission is to serve the public. The first objective is met. I say this with the knowledge that we have one of the finest public services not only in North America but perhaps around the world.

The second point concerned recognizing its employees as an asset to be valued and developed. That is a question mark. The reason I say this is that over and over again we have seen very low morale in the Public Service. While the thrust of 70 per cent of the PS 2000 was to create some attitudinal change in the Public Service, we have seen the morale at an all-time low. Why is the morale so low? It is for a lot of reasons.

First, look at the question of how we treat our public servants and where we are hitting them the most. We are hitting them the most in their pockets. Look at the cost of living in our society. The increase in 1991 was expected to be 6.4 per cent, but what we paid our public servants was 5.2 per cent.

In 1990, 66,000 public servants earned less than $29,000 per year. Compare this to the poverty line which for a family of four is $29,800. When we look at this group of people two-thirds of them are women working in low paying jobs.

The idea of promoting them within the work force has not taken off as we thought it would. Other than morale the public servants are also concerned about the question of downsizing.

At a time when there is tremendous pressure on the Public Service to provide quality service, which in my view it is doing, we have seen since 1983-84 a decrease in the Public Service. In 1983-84 we had approximately 258,000 employees. In 1990-91 we had 221,859 employees. That means that 35,000 to 37,000 employees have been removed from the payroll of the federal government. This is at a time when we have to increase the number of public servants in the work force in order to guarantee that we are providing quality service to our communities.

Instead of increasing the number of public servants what the government has done is contract out. The Public Service Alliance calls it the $5 billion scam. If the government is to respond to this allegation by the Public Service Alliance of Canada, what it should be doing is setting up a task force to look at the value for dollars invested when it comes to contracting out. This is a challenge for the government to respond to or it can accept the allegations of the Public Service Alliance of Canada.

Second, consider the downside in the Public Service. I have challenged the government in the past and I will repeat it. I believe my colleagues will join me in saying that there should be a study as to whether we have a surplus or a shortfall when it come to public servants. I can assure you we have a shortfall.

I will use examples from Immigration Canada. Nowadays people who are looking for service at Immigration Canada have to line up at 6 or 6.30 a.m. in order to get to the counter. In order to obtain an application form from citizenship courts all across the country one has to wait more than eight months. Health and Welfare is another area the government should look at.

These are some of the areas we are concerned about. More important, the whole question is about reforming the Public Service so we have fully productive, co-operative, non-partisan, happy and easy going public servants. What the federal government should be doing is involving the public servants themselves.

I know in its proposals it has indicated that it approached the Public Service Alliance of Canada which represents a large segment of public servants but did not get its support. Speaking personally as an employer, the federal government has a moral obligation not to proceed with any legislation that is not supported by its employees and their representatives.

The call by my colleague from Ottawa South on the government to set up a special committee prior to dealing with this legislation is a valid one.

The reason I say this is that there are a lot of issues out there that the government has to look at before it implements any kind of legislation.

Nobody could have put the issue before the public as well as the union has done in terms of the various pieces of information that it has put out to its members, in terms of the various studies it has done, and in terms of the various analyses it has done.

Having said that, I think the government has taken an initial good step toward reforming the act. The way it is doing it suggests it is not the proper way. It has to sit down with its workers and with the representatives of the workers to try to get them to buy in.

The reason I say this is that in the 1990s and beyond the year 2000 we must have the support of our workers if we are to come up with any kind of productive good legislation. We will not be able to have a fully productive society if the public servants who are providing those services to our society are not happy and looked after.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to take part in this debate as the representative of the people of Halifax because Halifax, as many in this House are aware, is the third largest Public Service town in the country.

We have many different areas of the Public Service in our city. We have the civilian employees of the Department of National Defence. We have Health and Welfare. We have National Revenue. I could go on and on and on. In the greater Halifax—Dartmouth area there are approximately 20,000 to 30,000 employees of the Government of Canada.

I agree with my colleague, the member for Ottawa—Centre, that the time for reform and legislation relating to the Public Service is long overdue. I am afraid however that the government has laboured and brought forth a mouse. It is a mouse that is not going to do much for either morale or for the sense of pride and accomplishment workers want to have in their work.

We have a tremendous Public Service in this country. It is hard working, committed and there for the public in practically every area of endeavour. These public servants are going through a time which can only be described as extremely difficult. These public servants are experiencing what can only be called a malaise because of a lack of response to their very real needs.

One example of this malaise is the regional disparity with regard to wages. There is no phrase that can galvanize my constituents faster than the phrase regional rates. Atlantic Canadians enjoy the lowest rates of pay and the greatest disparity with comparable private sector salaries in the country.

I have here in front of me some figures that I received from Halifax. They represent the electrical installing and maintaining subgroups. In other words they are electricians. They make more than $1 less than two of the other five zones of labour, more than $2.50 less than the fourth, and a full $3 less than the fifth.

Over and over again it has been said with regard to regional rates that the cost of living is not lower in Halifax than it is in most of the other centres of the country. Indeed, in a great many respects because of freight rates it is higher than in lots of other places in the country. Private sector electricians are paid comparably to their colleagues in other regions of the country. The public sector is not.

My second example of regional rates of pay is pipefitters. Again they receive $2 to $3 less an hour than the other zones. Woodworkers get $2 to $3 less than other zones. Why should workers in Atlantic Canada be singled out for significantly lower, indeed the lowest regional rates of pay? Is there anything in this to change that situation? No, there is not.

I move on to a second area and that is the lack of equal opportunity for women, visible minorities, aboriginals and disabled persons. In other words, this government is not subject to its own pay equity laws. It would be laughable were it not so serious.

A year ago a group of women in the Public Service at the government's behest came forward with a report that shows us the problems for women in the Public Service of Canada. That report is titled Beneath the Veneer, and from it a new expression became common currency, in English at least. That expression is the glass ceiling. There is not a woman in the work force, Public Service, private sector or Government of Canada who does not know what a glass ceiling is. Every woman who works outside the home has butted her heat against the glass ceiling at one time or another.

In the Public Service of Canada we are supposed to set an example and lead. We are supposed to show that we are the most equitable, the fairest. We should be the shining light for the private sector, provincial and territorial governments to follow. Our light is pretty grimy at this stage of the game.

The fact most particularly that this government is not subject to the pay equity legislation ought to make us ashamed to show our faces in public. A government that is not subject to its own laws is disgraceful.

The next item I want to refer to is downsizing. There is no question that some downsizing has to take place to make us more competitive. We are all aware of that and know the problems here. Downsizing done in such a manner as to shake the morale of the entire federal Public Service has hardly been handled in a way that one would expect, not just from caring employers but reasonably intelligent employers.

In the six years since this government began its downsizing program, 13,000 positions have been cut and 24,000 workers have been affected by the downsizing with precious little warning and with precious little cushion. This is something else that is foreign to the traditions of the Public Service of Canada. In the past in the Public Service of Canada there was always a sense that if jobs had to go because of changes in the way we do things—whether we are talking technology, downsizing or tight times in the budget—it was done in such a way as to optimize the next set of choices for the worker. It was not just done like some mad axe killer rushing through departments and chopping off people's heads.

There has to be and always has been in this country a sense of caring and concern for workers and the people. I keep coming back to the phrase of Robin MacNeil of the MacNeil-Lehrer report on public broadcasting in the United States. He said when President Bush talked about a kinder and gentler America: "There is one. It is called Canada".

Well, no more. We are losing that reputation. We are losing that edge but, worse of all, we are losing that compassion. When we lose it with regard to the federal Public Service, when we as the representatives of the people do not stand up and defend the federal Public Service, we are cutting our own throats. These are the people who are supposed to put the policies of government into force. If they have no trust and faith in the policies of government, how well are governmental policies going to be brought to the rest of Canada? Not very well at all.

A final area that I want to talk about is contracting out and laying off those who perform the services. A recent court decision ruled that the government could not legally contract out work and then turn around and lay off those who had been doing that very work. At the very least, it is putting the cart before the horse.

However the government seems determined to go ahead with this bill and ignore the recent decision. It is not sensible. When we look at the approach this bill takes and the history of government policy toward the federal Public Service, it is almost as if the Public Service were in an adversarial position with the government. If that were the case, someone misunderstands the situation.

Those of us on this side of the House do not misunderstand the situation. When I return to Halifax on weekends and during the breaks in the legislative year, I talk to many, many federal public servants. I hear their concerns and their wishes to do a good job and take pride in their work. But their overriding concern is that their jobs are not valued. In the Atlantic provinces they are not paid what they are worth and what other workers doing the same job are considered to be worth. I hear that there is an absolute crisis of confidence of public servants in their government.

While there is a crisis of confidence among public servants toward their own government, the business of Canada cannot be done in a way that benefits all Canadians. We have too many crises in this country right now. This is one that government policy can alleviate. The government should act.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak against this bill. As usual, I have an hour of material and nine minutes and 30 seconds to condense that material into the appropriate timeframe.

As usual I want to quote from our Prime Minister in his infamous book Where I Stand, now appropriately called "Where I Stood". It reads: "Our belief was that the adversary system of labour relations ultimately produces just that, adversaries. It was our intention, and we conveyed repeatedly and emphatically to both our union leaders and our employees directly to go the extra mile to avoid hurtful confrontations throughout our system that inevitably affect morale, productivity and ultimately profits". Often we agree with what the Prime Minister said at that particular time, but obviously he no longer agrees with what he himself said.

I have an abundance of statements by public servants from across this country. They, better than anyone else, can say exactly how they feel. I wish I had the opportunity to read all of their statements from Newfoundland to British Columbia, but I want to highlight just a few of them before I get into some of the specifics.

Rather than having a lean, efficient machine to move into the 21st century, Canadians may wake up to find that the tune-up done by the mechanics of PS 2000 was really some backyard mechanizing done by Curly, Moe and Larry. A cynical comment you say, but perhaps appropriate.

Claude Parent from Montreal says: "All inspectors will tell you that our work is only a smoke screen now, hiding reality. Now inspection is aimed at companies rather than the Canadian public. American border inspections went from all loads to one out of twenty and finally went up to one out of five because of pressure from technical and professional employees".

Does this have an affect on our daily lives? It has an affect on our economy. May I suggest that foreign manufacturers are continually dumping products into our country and steel is one of those products. We do not have the inspectors to inspect appropriately the shipments of whatever is coming into this country. This has a direct impact on people and a direct impact on the economy of our country.

Karen Fougere from Yellowknife says: "We have UI agents who are asked to work two or three hours of overtime every day and they do not care about your home life or your family".

We in Sault Ste. Marie can appreciate that statement simply because about a year and a half ago our UI people were asked to work overtime every day. They worked all weekend to meet the requirements of 5,000 workers who were registering to apply for UI benefits. They registered these thousands of people twice. The point is that they had no family life whatsoever. I think the downsizing of our work force, along with the downsizing of all the manufacturing outlets in this country, has a negative impact.

This bill is indeed complex and I suspect very few people will get into the intricacies of it. It is a complex bill that impacts 150,000-plus individuals who work for the government, but they work for 26 million Canadians and have an impact everywhere in their daily lives.

We had a labour dispute just a while back. The walk-out affected a wide range of government services. It delayed traffic at airports and harbours. It closed waterways and jammed border crossings. Ships carrying Canadian grain bound for China were halted. Convicts at a B.C. prison complained of strike related hardships and rioted. Industrial production staggered as imported manufacturing components were delayed at border customs posts.

It impacted the whole country. I think the government believed that politically it was not a bad idea and that Canadians would turn on their public servants. Well, it backfired. There was a great deal of sympathy for the people who worked for us and that tide of sentiment really turned around.

As Premier Bob Rae suggested, to legislate a zero per cent increase and ask for co-operation really borders on the ridiculous. The treatment of people in that way is no longer acceptable. We are not going to get into the intricacies of the bill, but we went to a special presentation that suggested what we require above all is a 70 per cent attitudinal change, a 20 per cent mechanical change, and a 10 per cent legislative change.

Our suggestion is that we work on the attitudes first. If we need an attitudinal change of 70 per cent, let us work on that. Do not bring in legislation that is extremely unpopular with the workers of the country. It is going to be very difficult for them to co-operate because it will impact them most directly. Let us deal with the attitudes of the government, the employer. Let us work on those attitudes first. Let us win the confidence of the people who work for us.

In PS 2000 there is an indication that consultation was not carried out the way it should have been to come to a consensus that meets at least with the grudging approval of the workers. There are small areas of positives in this bill, and I will cite the concept of probation to try to give both sides of the picture. You should undergo a probationary period only one time. Previously if you transferred to another position you would have to undergo another probation for that particular occupation. We accept the concept of one probation. If you are good enough to perform government service in one occupation, I suggest you are good enough to serve in another occupation.

It will also facilitate the placement of people in new positions and shorten the time periods so we will not be left without public servants in appropriate positions.

Of course we have some problem with the concept that merit may be set aside, that more subjective decisions may be made by managers, and that the competency of people may not be the final judgment. We are not here to suggest that anyone would make arbitrary patronizing kinds of decisions, but that potential is there. The fear of public servants is that merit will be set aside and these other considerations will take its place.

I would like to mention contracting out. One of the direct implications of this bill is that if work is taken out of one department and put into another department, the manager has the authority to lay off a person within the confines of his work area. We are suggesting with the bent of this government on contracting out that we are convinced there is a $5 billion scam. It is not saving. It is costing taxpayers money. We should not allow that area to lose its work force. There is no protection whatsoever for the employees.

Another major problem is that we are undertaking to overhaul a system that is indeed antiquated. Rather than tackling the system as a whole, however, we have decided to tinker with it. The tinkering is taking place in a rather simplistic fashion. We will just sort of place these thousands of people into this category. The category will be unwieldy and impossible to deal with.

Rather than overhauling the system, as I think public servants agree should be done, we are going to tinker with the system to the detriment of workers. I think in the end this will be to the detriment of Canadian services. I repeat that I think it is somewhat popular to dump on public servants and to bash them because they are the most visible of all workers. Everybody sees them. They are on the front line serving the people. I think the vast majority of them want to serve and they want to serve well. However, with morale at the lowest level possible how do we anticipate that things will get better?

We are opposed to the PS 2000 Bill C-26.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to offer my comments on the legislation we are presently considering before this House. They are items of great importance not only to the Public Service but to all Canadians who on a daily basis utilize the very valuable assistance that only the Public Service of Canada can render to the people of Canada. These are in areas so important that they affect the day-to-day activity of all of us who work for the Government of Canada.

These are areas such as contracting out, the very important area today of employment equity, how we treat our casual employees in our community, and the prospects of doing away with the merit principle which is certainly contrary to the position of the party I represent and speak on behalf of today.

It is an unhappy fact that labour relations in Canada have never been worse in our history. The labour unrest of last September and October revealed a country at odds with itself. Workers were most unhappy. Workers were frustrated and feared for their future. They were dealing with an uncaring government which seemed oblivious to the damage it was creating in the labour relations field.

It is very obvious to everyone that the Public Service is in need of fundamental reform in Canada today. Canada's Public Service totters along backed by legislation enacted in 1967, and before that in 1918. It certainly is time that we took a look at the complete system of negotiating with the employees of the Government of Canada and provided new, forward looking guidelines for the 21st century.

It is essential that in doing so we legislators provide the very best model we can formulate. After all, Canadians in the civil service were once regarded as a model for all other countries in the world to follow.

It is evident that those days are long gone and Canada's Public Service personnel have never been unhappier, never been so demoralized and never been without clear-cut goals. Certainly we all know this affects the service that is rendered to the average Canadian on a day-to-day basis.

• (1240)

It used to be that the Public Service was expected to work toward the interests of Canada as a whole, but over the last seven years it is evident that the Public Service has become another target for so-called privatization in the questionable attempts at reform. I will return to this later.

As I said a few moments ago, the Public Service is in dire need of reform and revitalization for the years ahead. That brings us to PS 2000.

It is the view of the Official Opposition that PS 2000 has been a spectacular flop. Far from being an exercise in democracy, this legislation provides for an arbitrary list of reforms. No one was consulted. Where was the dialogue? The Standing Committee on Public Accounts of the House of Commons found the document lacking in several respects and recommended the establishment of a special committee of the House of Commons to hold hearings to review PS 2000.

What did this government do? It went ahead with the preparation of legislation, ignored the recommendations of an all-party committee of the House Commons, and announced that the only review would be through a legislative committee.

We on this side of the House should be a little more used to the methods employed in this legislation as it is so apparent that this government has been using its mandate in many other forms and particularly to control the activities of the Public Service of Canada.

The intense dissatisfaction with this government demonstrated so strongly last fall with several weeks of strikes in the public sector points to the pressing need for a complete overhaul of labour relations in this country.

It is essential that an omnibus bill of this sort address the most pressing needs of the Public Service. In some respects we on this side of the House are prepared to countenance certain clauses of the legislation that do in our view strengthen Canada's Public Service.

There are all too many areas where we have serious questions about the bill's suitability with respect to progressive employment practices. As an example, the runaway trend toward contracting out which this government favours is really a way of privatizing the Public Service in Canada.

Casual workers employed where extra help appears to be needed at any given time do not enjoy the security of the work place or the security of employee benefits. We have grave reservations about the hiring of so many casual employees in Canada.

The government has increased its contracting out budget in the Public Service from $2.7 million annually in 1984 to the present and current $5 million projection today. Public sector workers could provide the services required given a more flexible system and enjoy more harmony within the work place. Why hire outside workers and fail to protect them with the basic benefits we all should enjoy as employees of the Government of Canada?

Therefore, the contracting out, the downsizing, the privatization concepts that are being put in place, and the use of short-term, temporary or contract employees all add to the disharmony we see today in the relationship this government has with its Public Service employees.

For those of us who spent some of our former careers at the bargaining table along with employers, employees and labour lawyers like myself, there is today an enlightened approach and a new vision that we could adopt for the 21st century. At the end of the bargaining process, when we leave the table and the deal is struck, the people who usually negotiated that contract are no longer in the work place. The bargainers have gone elsewhere and are no longer responsible for those for whom they bargained. The labour lawyers have gone to some other labour confrontation or some other endeavour. That only leaves the employer, the employee, the supervisor and so on in the work place who must work in harmony.

It is important that at the time of the bargaining process everyone involved realizes that at the end of the day people must work together. People must work together in harmony. People must understand the terms under which they work and the employers must have the responsibility and the security of knowing what their future holds.

I suspect very much when I analyse what has happened within this country, especially since last October, that that harmony does not exist. That spirit of co-operation is no longer in place. The labour relations this government has projected for its Public Service is causing further deterioration in the feeling that this country of ours can be a great country. I suggest to this government today that it take that lesson, start to unify and make those areas between Government of Canada employees and the people who administer its contracts much better.

I thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity today in making that contribution.

Mr. Maurice Tremblay (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I am of course very pleased to take part in this debate on Bill C-26, especially because, if you consider for a moment, politicians depend heavily on the public service in running the country. No theme in Public Service 2000 is stronger than improved service to the public. However, this improvement in service will come mainly from administrative measures such as training and professional development, consultation, customer surveys and service standards. That is why the existing legislation, which has become obsolete over a quarter of a century, must be changed.

Almost all the provisions of the bill relate to the objective of improved service. In some cases, the connection is direct, as with faster staffing for example; in others, it is less so. For example, simplified administrative procedures will free managers and employees and give them more time to serve their customers better, which is obviously the basic purpose of the public service.

Reduced paperwork and administrative red tape and fewer management levels will save money and thus make more resources available to improve front-line services to the public.

There are many important connections between the bill and service to the public. In the field of staffing, for example, transfers will be used to rapidly reassign employees to where additional resources are required. This will foster enthusiasm and especially creativity, two characteristics of good service.

Use of casual employees, will also help meet short-term requirements. Furthermore, the classification system is now being simplified to respond better to work place requirements. In its present form, the system is poorly adapted to the needs of a staff whose abilities are increasingly diverse. It does not make it easier to reassign employees quickly in an ever-changing environment and it creates unnecessary distinctions which are very costly and waste a lot of time.

The present system, needs vast resources—more than 100,000 classification actions a year. Imagine. From now on, the number of occupational groups will be considerably reduced as will the number of levels, we hope. Both initiatives will help smooth the traditional hierarchical structure and make the process more service-oriented.

As for employment equity, we have known for a long time that the quality of service to our different public section depends in part on the representativeness of the public service. The new act specifies that the government will be able to launch employment equity programs without having to go through all the red tape of the past. Once again, the Public Service will benefit from that measure.

Bill C-26 includes several reforms concerning staff relations, all of which are aimed at improving the service to the public and streamlining the present procedures. The scope of the arbitration process is extended, which will encourage people to use that process rather than to go on strike.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, the administrative work that is necessary to exempt civil servants from collective bargaining will be reduced. It is the positions that will be exempted, and not the employees that fill those positions; consequently, it will no longer be necessary to reopen a file every time a position is filled by a new incumbent.

Public Service 2000 is essentially an exercise aimed at improving the service to the public by increasing the motivation of employees, giving more freedom to managers and making them more accountable, as well as providing the Public Service with better systems to satisfy the needs of its clients. This exercise must take place with fewer resources, fewer formalities and fewer levels of management; as well, centralized systems that are too rigid will have to be replaced. The savings that will result from this exercise will be used to improve the service to the public.

The bill on the reform of the Public Service enables us to eliminate those obstacles that prevent us from providing a first class service to the public. To sum up, this bill makes the staffing process less rigid by authorizing an increased use of transfers, as well as simplifying the classification process. It also authorizes the hiring of temporary employees more quickly than before, to face short-term needs. Finally this legislation eliminates obsolete provisions concerning eligibility lists, probation periods and dismissals.

Employer-employee relations will be improved, thanks to amendments that will encourage the increased use of arbitration, will facilitate the identification of managers and confidential employees to be exempted, as well as speed that process.

It is very important that the Public Service be more representative of the different clients it serves. That is why this bill provides for employment equity programs. I therefore urge the members of this House to pass this bill as quickly as possible so that its provisions can take effect immediately.

[English]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate in debate on this very important Bill C-26 I think it is important to remember part of the history of the dealings in which the government has engaged in bringing this bill before the Commons.

In December 1989 the Prime Minister announced that he was launching an in-depth study of the Public Service. As a result of the lengthy study which was called PS 2000 we were to receive a white paper. In fact we did receive it but the white paper was called a policy paper, not a discussion paper.

Notwithstanding the fact that the white paper was reviewed by the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, the bill has been introduced without the benefit of further study by that committee as recommended by it.

The recommendation was that the bill be studied by a committee so that the principle of the bill as well as the details could be subject to review before its passage in this House at second reading.

The government has rejected that very wise, very sound advice. Why has it chosen to do so? One can only assume that it is because the government in its actions has displayed a very high-handed approach in its dealings with the Public Service of Canada.

I need not go back over history to prove that point. Members of the public and members of this House will well recall the really shocking treatment the government meted out to its public servants recently in the course of the strike. For the first time in our history, certainly since the Second World War, the government legislated the members of the Public Service back to work without any binding arbitration arrangement. It legislated a zero per cent increase which even its friends in Toronto did not do. A one per cent increase was negotiated in Toronto while this government legislated back at zero per.

I think all Canadians were appalled at the government's callousness and the manifest unfairness it portrayed in the course of proceedings on that bill. It had already given a 4.2 per cent increase to management in the Public Service, and then it legislated the people in the lower echelons of the Public Service back to work at zero per cent.

Mr. Dick: That is untrue and you know it.

Mr. Milliken: The Minister of Supply and Services says that is untrue and I know it. I know that in fact it is the opposite and he knows it. He was there. He knows that the 4.2 per cent increase was given in February 1991 before the budget came down. If he has forgotten I suggest he take a look at the budget documents which indicate that was in fact done. It is public knowledge. It is on the public record.

Mr. Dick: You are misinforming the public. It is untrue.

Mr. Milliken: I challenge the hon. minister to rise and participate in the debate if he disagrees with what I say. He knows a 4.2 per cent increase was given in February 1991 and a zero per cent increase was legislated for the remainder. In fact, I recall he had an opportunity to participate in the debate on that bill. I do not recall that he did.

As my friend from Gloucester says, the Minister of Supply and Services is a great defender of the Ottawa Public Service, except in the case of some of these bills.

I want to turn to the fact that this particular bill is based on a policy paper which was prepared by a group of individuals put together by the government for the purpose. Ten task forces were created to deal with 10 different areas of interest in respect of the development of the Public Service. If you look at the list it all sounds very reasonable.

Who sat on the task forces? Thirty-one deputy ministers, twelve assistant deputy ministers and nine heads of personnel sat on the task forces, that is who. There was not a single representative of any of the Public Service unions and no one from the lower echelons of the Public Service. They were all high ranking public officials who sat on these task forces devising ways, in their view, to improve efficiency in operations of the Public Service.

There is no doubt the changes recommended could lead to greater efficiency, but I suggest that fairness and proper treatment of persons employed in the Public Service are liable to be sacrificed by the terms of this bill in favour of political or administrative expediency.

I introduced a private member's bill in this House, Bill C-234, to amend the Public Service Employment Act in part. The purpose of the bill was to ensure that persons appearing before the Public Service Commission for hearings, grievances on promotion, transfer and whatever, got a fair hearing. They would have been able to see the documents that were used by the other side against them. They would have had an opportunity to bring witnesses to the board and cross-examine witnesses presented on the other side.

The new bill does not contain any of those procedural safeguards. It takes away some of the powers the Public Service Commission had in respect of transfer and moves them to the Treasury Board which of course is the employer's own board.

The purpose of the Public Service Commission was to establish an independent body that would deal with the Public Service and keep it as much as possible at arm's length from the government to avoid political interference. This bill goes a long way toward breaking down that arm's length relationship and that aura of independence and responsibility the Public Service Commission has exercised in this country for most of this century.

I see my time has expired. I will continue my remarks after the lunch break.

HEART MONTH

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, this week Canadians celebrate Valentine's Day. We remember our loved ones with hearts and flowers, but February is heart month when thousands of volunteers of the Heart and Stroke Foundation work with the public to increase awareness and request assistance to combat Canada's number one killer, heart disease.

Progress against this quiet but devastating disease is being made. Over all, the death rate for Canadians under 65 has dropped by 36 per cent. However, health and welfare reports that cardiovascular disease costs our economy almost $17 billion every year.

Much work still needs to be done and when a volunteer for the Heart and Stroke Foundation comes to your door this month please have a heart. Please help overcome this number one heart killer.

NEW FLYER INDUSTRIES

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, New Flyer Industries, a bus manufacturer in my riding, is waiting to find out if it will receive a $12 million contract to supply 60 buses to Las Vegas Transit.

Despite a very competitive bid, the third lowest and the lowest one which meets all the needs of Las Vegas Transit, the city of Las Vegas may not award New Flyer the contract simply because it is not an American company.

New Flyer has complied with UMPTA, the American's watchdog, by honouring all of the requirements of "buy American". One of these is that 60 per cent of the content of the vehicle being sold must originate in the United States. New Flyer conforms to this rule to be eligible to compete in the U.S. market. In fact it imports $17 million more from Americans than it exports to them.

What is more frustrating is that to meet another requirement of "buy American" it has had to establish a manufacturing depot in the U.S. for final assembly of vehicles. New Flyer has three facilities in the U.S. to remain eligible to compete in the U.S. market.

But what is the possible return on this investment when the U.S. simply refuses to buy Canadian? That is not free trade; it is extortion. The Canadian government should wake up and smell the coffee.

The Americans are always looking after their interests. Perhaps we should do the same for a change and abrogate the FTA or at least have the Americans respect the spirit of the free trade agreement while it is in place.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, Canadian farmers are being asked to be part of a solution even though they are not part of the problem.

Our grain and oilseeds producers are being rendered paupers by a subsidy war between the U.S. and Europe.

Our supply management producers are being asked to give up a lifetime of effort and investment to satisfy American demands to enter our markets, this demand from a country which has barred the world's dairy products from access to its market since 1954. Again we dance while the U.S. calls the tune.

Canada has developed a system in dairy which is the envy of the world. A recent American farm publication has stated: "threatened as it might be, the Canadian dairy industry continues to earn the respect and envy of dairymen in the U.S. and elsewhere".

Our government must not allow the destruction of this industry. Our dairy industry must not be sacrificed on the altar of conciliation to the big economic powers.

In Atlantic Canada alone 6,250 jobs depend on the dairy, egg, and chicken industries; in central Canada, over 70,000; in the west, over 20,000.

It is time for Canada to say: "No more". Canadian farmers are getting nothing out of this GATT deal. We lose again.

CANADA GAMES

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport, I have the pleasure to inform the members of this House that we are celebrating today the 25th anniversary of the Canada Games.

Since the first games held in Quebec City in 1967, some 31,000 young Canadians have taken part in the games per se and 120,000 in the eliminatory heat, thus gaining invaluable competition experience.

The Canada Games tradition will be carried on during the 1993 Canada Summer Games to be held in Kamloops, British Columbia, and the 1995 Canada Winter Games in Grande Prairie, Alberta.

These Games were a springboard for most of the young athletes who are currently representing our country at the Albertville Olympic Games.

I would also like to announce, on this special day, the creation of the Roland Michener Award which will be presented every two years to a promising young athlete participating in the Canada Games.

Mr. Michener, who passed away last year, was renowned as a jogging enthusiast and as a champion of sports and fitness. It seems only fitting to honour him by making sure that future generations of young Canadian athletes keep alive the memory of such a remarkable man.

Let us celebrate together, this anniversary of the Canada Games.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, there are some 225 supply managed farms in my riding of Northumberland.

These farmers are worried about the outcome of the GATT negotiations in the coming weeks. As well, any losses in agriculture negatively impact on many other areas of our economy.

Farming is vital to our economy in terms of trade revenues and its spin-off support to agricultural suppliers, handlers and processing industries. Farming supports the rural lifestyle of many in Northumberland.

Canada's supply management system has provided stable prices for our dairy, poultry and egg producers and secure supplies for Canadians for more than 20 years. A changed system would put at risk the livelihood and rural life-style of thousands of farmers in Northumberland, risk some 70,000 jobs in Ontario and a $10 billion industry.

I urge the federal government to support farmers in my riding of Northumberland and across Canada, and to do everything it can to protect Canada's supply management system from being destroyed at the current GATT negotiations.

Canada's supply management is the best system for Canadian dairy and poultry producers.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, we are nearing what we hope will be the successful conclusion of the Uruguay round of the GATT negotiations.

For the first time in GATT's history, agriculture will be included. Canada has presented its position to strengthen and clarify article XI. This is of extreme importance.

The federal government together with the provinces and the agriculture community developed this negotiating position and this is the position that Canada maintains.

Canadians benefit from a system of supply management which ensures a secure supply of reasonably priced, quality products. A strengthened and clarified article XI, will ensure the future of supply management and prevent future international challenge.

I wish to assure supply managed farmers of my support for their industry and this position. Producers can be assured that the Canadian government will continue to fight to strengthen and clarify article XI.

PALESTINIAN REFUGEES

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, this Saturday, Kuwait, a country Canadians fought to liberate during the gulf war will impose impossible residency restrictions on its Kuwaiti-Palestinians.

In essence, it will kick them out, but most Palestinians have no homeland and other Arab states have their own refugee problems and refuse to accept them. Without a permit, the only alternatives are paying a fine or going to jail.

About 1,000 Kuwaiti-Palestinians have family in Canada willing to sponsor them, but the Canadian government is doing nothing. Unlike the U.S., Canada has refused to fast track Palestinian applicants and Canada has no immigration or refugee desk in Kuwait.

The Canadian Embassy in Riyadh currently takes two years to process its applications, but these refugees need Canada's help in two days.

When will the minister take action?

MACEDONIA

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister's meeting with President Kiro Gligorov caused great concern to numerous Canadians of Greek origin until they were informed that this was not an official visit to exchange views on international development.

I would like to take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to assure Canadians of Greek origin that the Government of Canada is responsive to the concerns they have expressed. Mr. Gligorov was in Canada on a private visit and his meeting with the Prime Minister was not considered an official visit.

I would like to assure Canadians of Greek origin that Canada will continue to work toward a peaceful resolution of this crisis. As well I congratulate the Prime Minister on his efforts.

NATIONAL NETWORK FOR RESEARCH INTO TOXIC SUBSTANCES

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, Ottawa has decided that the headquarters of the national network for research into toxic substances will be located in Guelph, Ontario. Montreal, however, is the main centre for research in an area that is also part of the Quebec Government's industrial strategy. Even Minister Landry, who announced the decision in Montreal yesterday, was not able to explain this preference. The explanation is that last year, Ottawa spent 51 per cent of its research and development budget in Ontario and 18 per cent in Quebec. Some people said at the time that Ontario had better facilities, which is hardly the case here.

The federal government's decisions consistently ignore Quebec's development strategies. We saw this last year with Hibernia, and we see it now, to a lesser extent, with this decision. The truth of the matter is not the kind of wishful thinking we hear at constitutional conferences but the decisions that go against the interests of Quebec. Quebecers are fed up with empty words and hypocritical smiles. They realize it is up to them to defend their own interests.

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I rise today on behalf of the supply management farmers in my constituency of Sarnia—Lambton in support of our government's continued pursuit of the strengthening and clarification of article XI of GATT.

Our federal government remains firmly committed to maintaining our supply management system and our marketing boards under article XI, as the supply management leaders have told us to do, and that is what we will continue to do.

For years, as a government we have accommodated the position of the supply management leadership. The decision to continue to negotiate for clarification of article XI is in their hands. We have supported their position right up to this date and we will continue to do so.

Our Prime Minister has taken every opportunity to make our position clear to the leaders of GATT member nations, including leaders of the European Community and U.S. President George Bush.

The representatives of our supply management industry and our government have made it very clear that the Government of Canada's negotiators are to stand firm with respect to having article XI strengthened and clarified. Our negotiating team is sticking to that position.

Our federal government has a strategy of consulting our supply management leaders with respect to the development of the GATT negotiations—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

CANADA POST

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, Canada Post has struck again. It has not been satisfied in closing hundreds of small rural post offices across this country, nor has it learned from its fight last year with the community of Mabou, Nova Scotia.

No siree. Now Canada Post has set its sights upon Petit de Grat, a small, thriving community in Cape Breton. The people there learned two weeks ago that Canada Post has decided that their post office must close. No consultation with community members, no reasons or discussions; only the most cursory of public meetings to review options after the fact.

[Translation]

The only option the community of Petit-De-Grat wants is to keep its post office open. I also want the post office to stay open, because as a meeting place it provides an excellent service to many customers, especially senior citizens and the handicapped. When will Canada Post and this government realize they are making a big mistake? When will they stop reducing services while raising rates? When will they stop abolishing essential services and start treating Canada's rural population the way it should be treated?

ECONOMIC RECOVERY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, according to an editorial today in La Presse, the kind of solution the opposition parties have in mind to deal with the present state of the economy smacks of outdated State interventionism.

Their solutions are half a century old, and they ought to know they will not work today. In the thirties, some kind of balance could be maintained by creating a deficit to fight the recession and subsequently working up a surplus to pay back the debt. Nowadays we do not start with a clean slate. The Liberal federal deficit is considerable, and we can no longer count on this pendulum action.

That is what appears to be happening in Ontario, where enormous amounts of additional funds have already proved insufficient. The same phenomenon occurred in 1982, when the Liberal government doubled its deficit from $14 billion to $28 billion and was never able to bring it back to its original level.

For the time being, the Leader of the Opposition with his economic recovery strategy, projects the image of a predecessor, not a successor to the Conservatives.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, once again the issue of user fees has taken centre stage.

Yesterday the first ministers agreed to further consider the idea. I ask: Have the premiers and the Prime Minister forgotten recent history?

User fees in many disguises have been tried before but never worked. They are too expensive to administer and they entangle doctors, nurses and hospital staff in billings. They will shut hospital doors to the poor.

The World Health Organization in its 1990 report finds these fees damaging to over-all efficiency and equity, inefficient as revenue raising devices and do not decrease hospital costs.

The provinces are desperate for money after cuts in transfer payments. User fees are straws to be grasped.

The next step belongs to the federal government: protect the Canada Health Act, rescind Bills C-69 and C-20, renegotiate transfer payments, institute meaningful reform and once and for all end the federal-provincial showdown over medicare, a Canadian right of citizenship.

CANADA GAMES

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, today is the 25th anniversary of the Canada Games. The Canada Games have encouraged sport development and provided over 150,000 young athletes with valuable, competitive experience in Canada since the Games' inception in Quebec City in 1967.

Through participation in sport, young people learn many valuable life skills such as overcoming obstacles, remaining humble in victory and resolved in defeat.

Amateur sport is also important for character development requiring discipline, effort and energy to produce pride and a positive self-image. The most valuable lesson learned from participating in a sport is how to be a team player, how to be part of a group who are assembled or organized for a common purpose, and how to contribute your unique and distinct talents for the collective benefit of the team.

It is fitting that the memory of a very distinguished Canadian will be remembered and passed on to future generations of young Canadian athletes. Roland Michener's name will continue to be synonymous with a vibrant fitness and sport enthusiastic Canada through the Roland Michener Canada Games Award.

As we wish the Canada Games a happy birthday, may we all as Canadians remember you have to be a team player to overcome obstacles and to become victorious.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

BREAST IMPLANTS

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of health. The minister will know that more than one million Canadian women can expect to fall victim to breast cancer. At the moment 150,000 Canadian women have had breast implants that they thought were safe and on occasion after occasion after occasion this minister and his predecessor have stood here in the House and said the Meme implant was safe. We now know that for at least five years that information was known to be false.

I want to ask the minister of health why he failed in his duty to protect Canadian women.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, what the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the department do is advise people of the assessments we make on any kind of medical device based on scientific research by experts in the department or elsewhere.

I worry when the member says today that the evidence is that the breast implant, particularly silicone breast implants, are not safe. I would like to ask the member if she has any scientific evidence to support what she said and to provide the evidence.

We are dealing with the health of women, yes, but we need evidence when we make that kind of statement.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, in and of itself that statement merits the minister's resignation. The fact is when there is any shred of doubt, surely the balance of the responsibility of the government should fall on protecting Canadian women and not selling implants.

My second question is for the same minister. We know that 150,000 women in Canada are wondering today whether they are in danger of cancer. For car owners, a federal government system informs them of mechanical problems. Why does a similar system not apply to women about their own breasts?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would first of all like to tell the hon. member that the government does not sell or fit breast implants, despite what she said at the beginning.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, I think that any medical act, particularly implantation of a mammary prosthesis, is done by a physician, who is a responsible professional. The message we have always given is that if women have problems with a breast implant, they should see their doctor. We give the same message today. I must remind the hon. member for Hamilton East that she should know that the Meme implant was taken off the market in April and that silicone implants have not been available on the market since November.

[English]

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister. This government might not be selling but they are certainly supposed to regulate.

I have spoken on many occasions in this House of Commons on the dangers of implants and silicone gel.

What in the world is going on here? I am not interested in what the minister might do. I am interested in what he and the previous minister have failed to do in this House. Will the minister investigate the product review process within the health and welfare research branch immediately? Will the minister take immediate steps to ensure an effective safety process, even secure reprimands where necessary?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the Department of National Health and Welfare now has a review process not only for breast implants but for all medical devices. I repeat again that all medical devices, in particular those which are implanted in the human body for more than 30 days, are subject to an extremely serious process by the department, in co-operation with the companies, to ensure that the device can be used in a satisfactory manner. That is what we did and that is what we do. I repeat what I said: No silicone mammary implants are available on the market now to anyone.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Employment and Immigration a question on behalf of a constituent.

Mrs. Gina Pacciarotti is a 44-year old single mother with three children. Her husband passed away six years ago. After working for Cooper Canada for 23 years she was laid off over a year ago. Her UI benefits have run out and she is in a desperate situation.

What advice does the minister have for Gina Pacciarotti and the hundreds of thousands of other Canadians who are as desperate as she is?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for raising an individual case in the House. I will be pleased right after Question Period to sit down with him and see how my department can be helpful.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Domtar Paper Mills at Red Rock in Nipigon announced yesterday it will close its paper machine in May. Over 400 workers will be laid off indefinitely. This government has done nothing to save jobs in this vital industry of Canada, the forestry industry.

What specific actions will the minister take to ensure that those 400 jobs will be maintained at Red Rock?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the department's industrial adjustment service consultants have already met with the company and the union to discuss the establishment of a comprehensive assistance program for these workers. An IAS agreement and committee are already in place.

Further discussions will also take place very shortly to determine what kind of additional help is required.

EIC and the company will be contacting the municipality in the near future to discuss the establishment of a community adjustment committee. We hope these measures will be helpful to the affected workers.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday the premiers sent a message to this government and to the Prime Minister that job creation must be a priority. One thing the government can do to create jobs is to change direction with the government's monetary policy.

A study by Informetrica, for example, states that this government's monetary policy since 1989 has added $5.6 billion to the deficit and cost Canadians 139,000 jobs.

The government has an opportunity to lower the deficit and create jobs by lowering the dollar. Will the Prime Minister direct the Bank of Canada to lower the dollar, to stop propping the Canadian dollar up to an unrealistic level?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the monetary policy of the Government of Canada has produced interest rates that are down 7.5 points from their high in May 1990. Interest rates today are at their lowest in almost 20 years. The inflation rate, which ran as high as 12.9 per cent for a period of some years in the early 1980s, in the last six months has been under 2 per cent and appears to be in that general 2 to 3 per cent neighbourhood next year. This is the result of effective monetary policy. These are the fundamentals that one has to get right before all of the job creation prospects can come to pass.

The provinces acknowledged yesterday—and I think, by and large, all of the premiers—that the concept of throwing borrowed government money at make work projects does not work, that restraint is very important and that co-operation among governments is very important. So I thought that yesterday's meeting was very constructive and helpful because it showed the governments of Canada working together to provide the kinds of durable jobs that Canadians need.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker.

I am sure the premiers would agree, as would the Prime Minister, that spending $30 billion a year on unemployment does not work either. It certainly does not work for those Canadian families who do not have any hope that there will be a change and that this government will begin, not to just have make work projects—nobody is suggesting that—but to create real jobs and build the infrastructure of this country.

An Informetrica study says that, without a change in policy, the economy will continue to suffer from high unemployment, minimal productivity growth, a high deficit and high taxes.

Will the government change its economic policy and put the country back to work?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of monetary policy is to have lower interest rates, lower inflation and a strong currency that is respected throughout the world.

The fact is that we are achieving these goals and it is important to note that as inflation falls the value of the dollar goes down. It has lost 4.5 cents in recent months, I think.

It is generally accepted that the results of the monetary policy pursued by the government and the Bank of Canada are beneficial. We have a serious problem, of course, in job creation. But starting from this base, which is quite strong and impressive, all levels of government are now able, with the private sector, to create lasting employment and that is what we want to do.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): The fact remains that 1.5 million Canadians are out of work and that tens of thousands have given up looking for work. That is the reality of this government's monetary policy.

Yesterday the Minister of Employment and Immigration stated in the House that there were 300,000 jobs available in Canada but that we did not have the skilled workers. My question for the Prime Minister is this: Just where are the 300,000 jobs? If it is the case that they are lacking skills, why has this government cut back on skills training, cut back on education?

Will the government in this next budget show that it is investing in a skills training program so that the laid-off workers can get those 300,000 jobs?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I carefully stated yesterday that this 300,000 figure is our interpretation of the help wanted index.

All the hon. member would have to do is travel across Canada, talk to employers and she would understand. She should also ask herself why she opposed the amendment to Bill C-21 which has seen training money going to unemployed Canadians, rising from $1.2 billion to $1.8 billion this year. That is for Canadian workers.

EMPLOYMENT

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Northern Ontario has long suffered high rates of unemployment. As a result of this, many have exhausted UI claims and are now on social assistance. They are no less unemployed than those receiving UI benefits and yet no retraining through UI is available to them.

Will the minister consider integrating programs so that all unemployed have equality of access to retraining programs and UI?

• (1430)

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): I will not use the word pathetic, but I remember this Liberal Party of Canada opposing the amendment to C-21, the Unemployment Insurance Act, which would have allowed this government to give unemployed workers exactly what the member is now asking for, that is training. We have in place programs worth $1.8 billion that allow for the training of the unemployed this year.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Young people's hopes of finding their first job are dimmer every day. Young Canadians such as Anna Nozza of Saint-Léonard want to work in order to contribute fully to our society.

Can the minister ensure this House and young Canadians that a training program to help young people find jobs will be introduced in the next budget?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, being from Quebec, the hon. member surely knows how enthusiastically my provincial counterpart, Mr. Bourbeau, implemented training programs for those young people in that province, which we support with the federal programs.

If the Liberal Party is asking me today whether I will go to Quebec and set up a new training program, the answer is no, I am not prepared to do that. However, I am prepared to continue to have discussions with Mr. Bourbeau in order to see how the Canadian Jobs Strategy can best serve the interests of young Quebecers.

AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRY

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, since free trade, Canada has lost 40 auto parts plants and 19,000 auto parts jobs. Given this government's dismal record under its trade deal with the United States, can the government assure us today that it will not give away even more auto parts jobs under the coming deal with the United States and Mexico?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is talking apples and oranges. He is linking the free trade agreement to the auto pact. He knows that the auto pact was not a part of the free trade agreement. There is a problem today with the North American market for automobiles. The production of automobiles is down in the United States because sales are down in the United States. In Canada, where close to 90 per cent of our production goes to the United States, those sales are down because of the lower sales in the United States. That is the problem, not the free trade agreement and not the auto pact.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, the minister has to get his head out of the sand. We have lost 49 auto parts plants, and they are not coming back.

Let us look at another aspect of this problem. The European Community is now debating whether by the end of this century Japanese automobiles will be either 15 per cent or 17 per cent of that market. Today in Canada, Japanese automobiles account for 36 per cent of our market. What concrete action is this minister prepared to announce today to ensure a fair level of Canadian content and Canadian jobs in our auto parts sector?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I would say to my hon. friend that we on this side of the House do not like to see those auto parts manufacturers disappear at all because that costs people jobs.

Mr. Peterson: Well, then act.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): My hon. friend should contain himself and wait for the rest of the answer.

In the negotiations that we are having with the United States, as I said yesterday in the press conference in Washington, one of the key considerations is the status of the auto pact. We are committed to ensuring the maintenance of the auto pact unless there is a better arrangement that we can put in its place that will improve the position of the Canadian automotive workers, whether they are in the parts companies or in the assembly companies. That is the objective we have set out. It is one of the things we held to firmly in our negotiations this weekend.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): I would like to follow up on an issue with the minister of health that has been raised many times in this House by my colleague for Mission—Coquitlam and by myself.

Yesterday Dow Corning was forced to release information on the safety of a silicone breast implant, information that it kept secret for over 20 years.

The minister refused today to ban these implants, saying that he wanted solid evidence that they were unsafe. He has received evidence from Dr. Blais of his own department who was dismissed from his own department for raising these concerns.

Dow Corning's own scientists have said that their actions were inexcusable and they made comparisons to the Pinto gas tank disaster and the cover-up around that.

Will the minister today stand up, give assurances to Canadian women, and ban the use of silicone breast implants in this country? Will he do that?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I repeat once again that there is no silicone gel breast implant sold in Canada today. It is very clear.

Second, the member talked about Dr. Blais. Dr. Blais was invited twice by his peers to make his point in front of experts to prove that what he said was right, and it was dismissed twice. If there is any evidence that Dr. Blais has which would be acceptable to other scientists in Canada, I would be delighted to agree with that.

The information released by Dow Corning yesterday was considered by our department. If there is any possibility that we were misinformed, I will act immediately. In the meantime, I repeat that breast implants are not available in Canada now.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, although there is a moratorium, silicone breast implants are in stock in doctors' offices. The minister does not know that they are not being used.

Will the minister now call for a full and independent inquiry into the approval process that was used by his own health protection branch for silicone breast implants in Canada?

He spoke earlier of an internal audit. That is not good enough. Canadian women deserve to know the process on how these implants were approved for use in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has put her question.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the Department of National Health and Welfare monitors all questions dealing with medical devices.

The hon. member should speak to her colleague from Mission—Coquitlam whom I met with last summer, along with other women. I informed them that the Department of National Health and Welfare would undertake a broad review of the system as it applies to medical devices. She and the others agreed at the time.

We are working on that file. As soon as information is available, I will provide it to her and to all Canadians.

AGRICULTURE

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

In view of the fact that eight provincial ministers of agriculture, representing 88 per cent of dairy production in Canada and 81 per cent of poultry production, and at this point the majority of premiers, have signed a declaration in support of supply management and rejecting tariffication in any form, will the Prime Minister assure this House that he will support the premiers, the provincial ministers, and Canada's poultry and dairy producers in their cause to retain the best marketing systems in the world that have not required subsidies nor contributed to world surpluses?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have been doing this in excess of two years.

In regard to the questions raised we did not need, although we appreciated, the recent support of the provincial premiers. We have been in the forefront of fighting the case at the GATT in respect of article XI, its clarification, its strengthening. There has been no change in the Canadian position.

The minister of trade, the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of State for Agriculture and myself have met with world leaders to press our case at the GATT and elsewhere. There has been no change in our position. We stand fully behind the Canadian producers in what we view as a most important, not only political initiative and economic initiative, but a social one inasmuch as it impacts very strongly on their lives. We want to defend them. I will be meeting with the farmers very soon in this regard.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): On that same topic, Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Agriculture. The Quebec Minister of Agriculture signed a declaration supporting supply management as an agricultural system and rejecting any form of a tariff system. Can the Minister of State for Agriculture assure this House today that he supports this declaration from the Quebec minister and Quebec producers as being the only true means of safeguarding agriculture as it has been built up in the last 20 years within GATT?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I can assure my colleague that everybody was in agreement at the meeting of agriculture ministers held here in Ottawa last Thursday and Friday. Ministers from every province and the federal minister all agreed on the Canadian position. I should tell my colleague that I personally met Mr. Dunkel on several occasions, as well as the delegates in Europe and here in Canada, to reaffirm the Canadian position.

We are experiencing difficulties; that is a fact and we do not deny it. But the Canadian position was jointly with the Canadian farmers, and it is with them that we will continue to defend it. I urge my colleague not only to support the Quebec Minister of Agriculture but also the Canadian Minister of Agriculture who defends that position, because together we will be able to maintain the Canadian position.

TRADE

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, United States congressmen have had an opportunity to review the consolidated document that represents whatever progress has been made toward an agreed text of the U.S.-Canada-Mexico agreement.

Will the government afford members of Parliament the same opportunity to review the document in response to the all-party call of more than a year ago "for close consultations with Parliament as the North American free trade negotiations proceed"?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend knows, I will be meeting with the standing committee to discuss the NAFTA tomorrow.

I just remind him that there have been six reports tabled by the Government of Canada since July of 1991, up until the middle of last year, which set out a number of aspects of relevance to the free trade negotiations. We have had extensive discussions with the provinces, with the private sector through the International Trade Advisory Committee, as well as the industry advisory groups on international trade. I will have some further things to discuss with my colleague, as well as other members of the committee, tomorrow to provide them with an opportunity to have confidential briefings, but I stress the word confidential because that is the basis on which the briefings have been provided to both the Americans and the Mexicans by their governments.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the reason why all parties joined in the request for closed consultations is to understand what specifically the national interests are which—and I use the minister's phrase in that regard—this government intends to defend in these negotiations.

Does the government hope, for example, to initiate improvements in the free trade agreement with the United States in such areas as energy, dispute settlement and, as he has just indicated, with regard to automobiles?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I have said all along, as has my predecessor, that if there are ways by which we can agree with the United States to improve upon the terms of the free trade agreement between the United States and Canada during the NAFTA negotiations, we will do it.

One of the areas that we—

Mr. Peterson: So it is up for negotiation.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I would encourage my hon. friend from Willowdale to hold himself to his chair again. He is a little excited.

An hon. member: Or else what?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the minister could complete his answer.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): With such provocation, it is difficult, Mr. Speaker.

On the question of rules of origin, my hon. friend is very much aware of the difficulties of the interpretation of the rules of origin and the lack of clarity. That is one area that we are expending quite a bit of effort on that will help the automotive industry as well as other industries that are affected in a similar way.

MINING

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

The mining industry ranks fourth in the Quebec government priorities for regional agreements. It would not even qualify for a Canadian olympic medal, be it gold, silver or bronze. Will the minister give us the assurance today that the mining industry will take one of the first three positions, thus ensuring help can be provided to the Quebec mining industry as soon as possible?

[English]

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, this has been part of the discussions between the Government of Canada and the Government of Quebec and principally led by my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

I understand he is having a meeting with Madam Bacon next week. Hopefully, some progress can be made on that file at that time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

As the minister knows, last week Anderson Mutang Urud, an internationally respected spokesperson for the Penan and other indigenous peoples of Sarawak, Malaysia, was arrested. He is currently being detained without charge.

Will the minister tell the House what action she has taken to express the very deep concern of Canadians about Urud's arrest. Specifically, will she send a strong message to the Sarawak and Malaysian governments that this detention of a spokesperson for aboriginal peoples and protection of the Sarawak rain forest is profoundly unacceptable to Canadians, and that Urud should be released forthwith?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, certainly, as the hon. member suggests, we are aware of the arrest and the detention at the moment of Mr. Urud.

We are attempting through our high commission in Kuala Lumpur to get to the bottom of what has happened, why he was arrested and what kinds of charges we might expect to be laid. When we have ascertained all the facts, I will determine whether any other action should be taken.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, it appears likely that Mutang Urud's arrest was intended to demoralize those Penan Indians with whom I met together with Urud last month who are peacefully maintaining a blockade to protect their rain forests from total destruction.

I want to ask the minister whether she will urge the Sarawak government not to move to violently dismantle this barricade as the government has threatened to do. Will she join the many, many Canadians in supporting the Penan Indian proposal for a biosphere reserve to protect this threatened rain forest?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Canada has been very active on the subject of the tropical rain forests in Malaysia.

We do believe, of course, in a balance between the ecological and the economic values. We are working very closely with the Malaysian government bilaterally, through our development assistance programs.

We are the third largest bilateral donor and the largest per capita donor to their Tropical Forest Action Plan and we will continue to be very involved on that subject with them.

CANADIAN ABORIGINAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT STRATEGY

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism.

It involves the issue of CAEDS, the Canadian Aboriginal Economic Development Strategy. CAEDS, as you well know, Mr. Speaker, is one of our more successful projects, a virtual unsung hero.

As a matter of fact, it has become so successful that a project backlog has developed. Some of my constituents have spoken to me, expressing some concerns in terms of the ability of aboriginal people to economically develop themselves. As a result, they have asked me to ask the minister what he is prepared to do about this backlog.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague for recognizing the importance of this program.

It has in fact generated over 1,000 businesses on and off reserves across Canada. It is extremely successful. The applications were two and a half times greater than the previous program. Because of this, we have had to put in place a number of reforms to speed up the treatment of applications. I would like to tell my hon. friend that we now have a streamlined project approval system through regional boards. We have an expanded network of offices now for this program across the country and, finally, we are allowing some of the aboriginal organizations to work with the clients to speed up the process, all of this to help create jobs and entrepreneurship on and off reserves across this country.

JOHN CRISPO

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. John Crispo, a Tory nominee to the board of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, spoke recently in an inflammatory and irresponsible way about bilingualism in the Public Service, citing selective figures which he called, and I use his words, "staggering and devastating". Mr. Crispo implied that official bilingualism, and I use his words again, "is working against unilingual English Canadians getting high level federal jobs".

The fact is that 77 per cent of senior management jobs in the Public Service are held by anglophones.

An hon. member: And not one unilingual French.

Mr. Gauthier: Will the Prime Minister call Mr. Crispo, tell him that the impression he left with his comments is wrong, dead wrong, absolutely wrong? Will he ask Mr. Crispo to get his facts straight or keep his mouth shut?

Mr. Speaker: I have to advise the House that the question may be of significance, but it does not fall within the jurisdiction of the government.

Ms. Copps: It certainly does.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member can put his question again and I will listen to it.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, he is an appointee of the government. Who the heck am I supposed to ask this question of? I am sure somebody took that decision.

Will the Minister of Communications answer the question since he is responsible for the CBC?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, your first comment of course is absolutely right, but I can say on behalf of the government with assurance that Mr. Crispo does not speak for the Government of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, the people of Canada expect the commissioner of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, a Crown corporation, to take their mandate seriously which is to promote national unity and serve the interests of the Canadian people as a whole. I ask the Prime Minister again: Is he prepared to call his friend, Mr. John Crispo, and tell him to get his facts straight before making statements? Will he tell him that the facts—

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Last Friday, the Minister for International Trade admitted in this House that he had failed to prepare himself and to do an impact study of the Dunkel GATT proposals.

Will the Prime Minister please tell this House why his minister shows such wanton disregard toward Canadian farmers. Why is he not interested in the 100,000 jobs that could be at stake?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the question that the hon. member puts is similar to a question his colleague from Prince Edward—Hastings put yesterday, but they differ entirely from what the deputy leader of the Liberal Party in the House, the member for Hamilton East, said the government was doing.

We were criticized for seeking the co-operation of the supply managed groups before we even identified what tariff numbers could be found in the Dunkel text. After we had received their approval, we provided them with the numbers and said: "Will you agree with those numbers? Are they appropriate?" So far we have not had a response.

When we do that, the member for Hamilton East says that the government has changed its position. The government has not changed its position. If you wish to have an impact study, then I would like the Liberal Party to present that to the supply managed agency. If they request it of the government, we will work with them.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, no one should have to tell this minister to do his job. He should know on his own to do those kinds of impact studies.

I have a supplementary question for the minister. As he is no doubt aware, Canadian farmers do not want tariffs. On the other hand, they are very curious to know how much damage this government's proposals and Mr. Dunkel's will do. What specific measures will the government take to protect the farmers at the GATT negotiations besides telling us that it has no intention to even consider the damage it is itself causing?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, we must be careful not to try and score political points on the backs of our farm producers. I have recently met personally with people from the International Agricultural Trade Office, the UPA president and spokespersons for the milk producers. We have mutually agreed to exchange, at their request, information on the figures that could be involved. However, no formal request for an impact study has been received because the Canadian position is to stay away from tarification, altogether.

We are advocating the strengthening of article XI. That is the Canadian position. It has not changed and it is obvious to me that we do not intend to change it.

WESTERN GRAIN TRANSPORTATION ACT

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

The Supreme Court has said that the Minister of Transport was the decision-making authority in the Oldman dam case. The Minister of Transport would also be the decision-making authority with regard to possible changes to the Western Grain Transportation Act.

Given that the Minister of Agriculture has initiated cross-Canada talks relating to possible changes to the WGTA, has the Minister of Transport undertaken his responsibilities and initiated an environmental assessment process as the Supreme Court and the government's own guidelines have said he should?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the judgment of the Supreme Court was handed down a few days ago. We in the department have started examining the contents and the repercussions of this judgment on the involvement of Transport Canada in these matters.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of the Environment. The Oldman dam decision is quite clear. It says that the environmental impact assessment was a planning tool that must be completed during the decision-making phase and it must take into account social economic factors.

Is the Minister of the Environment prepared to exercise his responsibilities for the well-being of the environment and advise the Minister of Transport of the full scale of his responsibilities, or is he prepared to immediately initiate an EIA of the proposed changes to the WGTA?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): The decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in the case of the Oldman dam has far-reaching consequences, as the the hon. member will know. The Supreme Court seemed to say about the present guidelines that there are two elements that would kick in in an environmental assessment process: (a) a federal jurisdiction being involved and (b) an affirmative regulatory power. These conditions are cumulative. After that the federal government would be asked to act upon that.

We are still examining the consequences of this ruling of the Supreme Court. Once again, I think we have to realize that they are far reaching. We will examine the consequences and get back to the member as soon as we have a good idea of what we think our course of action should be.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Agriculture. He just told the House that the government would never agree to a tariff system.

Will the government promise not to sign any agreement at GATT that would go towards a tariff system? Is the minister prepared to say the government will never sign any agreement whatsoever that would be a threat to the four pillars of Quebec agriculture?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I realize that members of the Bloc québécois would like to make some political capital out of all this. However, if they really want to scare Quebec farm producers and the dairy industry, perhaps the members of the Bloc would care to explain to farmers the risks involved in separation. Producers who have 48 per cent of our industrial milk quotas may wonder what happens to Quebec farmers after separation! I think that is a far greater threat, whose consequences are not even known, while at GATT our position is clear: to defend Quebec farmerse and the right to maintain marketing boards in Canada. That is Quebec's position, but we do not know the Bloc's position on what I said just now.

• (1500)

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of State for Agriculture has spent the last two years making a big show of saying there was no risk at all and that he was ready to put his seat on the line. Is the minister prepared to repeat today that he is ready to put his seat on the line if article XI is not reinforced?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, quite frankly, and I say this for the benefit of farm producers who may be listening, I think the issue is far too important for us to get into this kind of debate.

The important thing is for people on all sides of the House, including the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party, if they are willing and the government, to rally behind Quebec and Canadian farmers, defend their interests at GATT at this vital moment in the talks and ignore these diversions that might expose farmers to far greater risks.

[English]

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to get into this present constitutional fight but thank you for allowing me to ask a supplementary question of the Prime Minister as a result of the question of the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex.

A week ago the Prime Minister, in answer to a question on supply management said at page 6369 of Hansard, in answer to the same type of question, that Premier Bourassa has full confidence in the Minister for International Trade to negotiate the new GATT agreements, and he thinks that Quebec is better protected by the plan on which we are now working than with the present formula.

My supplementary question is this: In view of the answers from the Prime Minister, the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of State for Agriculture that there has been no change and they are going to defend the present system, could the Prime Minister please explain the answer he gave a week ago, when he said that "Quebec and Canada is going to be better protected by the plan on which we are now working than with the present formula."

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the explanation is very simple. As I remember, it was a statement in le journal La Presse and that it was a direct quote from Premier Bourassa.

Mr. Speaker: I will take a point of order but I want to tell the House that I have a question of privilege which I have to get to.

PRIVILEGE

CRITERIA FOR ADMISSIBILITY OF QUESTION DURING ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I am astonished and rather shocked that I was unable to put my question to the government or at least to the minister responsible for the CBC.

I may refer the Chair to Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, citation 359, which reads as follows:

> 359. The Speaker expressed some general principles in order to clarify the regulations—

In other words, the guidelines to be used in asking oral questions in the House.

> "A brief question seeking information about an important matter of some urgency which falls within the administrative responsibility of the government or of the specific Minister to whom it is addressed, is in order".

Further on, at 359 (6), we read:

> (6) A question must be within the administrative competence of the Government. The Minister to whom the question is directed is responsible to the House for his present Ministry and not for any decisions taken in a previous portfolio.

My question concerned an appointment made by this government, I imagine by the minister, to the Board of Governors of the CBC.

[English]

—Here we have a person who has been named by this government, I take it on the minister's authority, to sit on a board which is responsible for CBC administration, CBC being the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, a corporation dedicated to the unity of this country and a corporation dedicated, in my view, to explaining to Canadians the realities and possibly, even the duality of this country.

I received a statement yesterday which had been made by a Mr. John Crispo, a 1991 nominee of the government or of the minister to the Board of Governors of the CBC. I am trying to bring some light to this subject and some truth to these questions by having Mr. Crispo at least look at the facts before he puts out these damaging statements that he has made.

I want to read from the transcript of the Majic 100 radio broadcast—

Mr. Cooper: Order.

Mr. Gauthier: It is important that you understand the facts or do you want to bury them? I heard a person call for order. The Speaker will—

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment.

I have some problem with the question of privilege. The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier asked a question during Oral Question Period and that question was addressed to the Prime Minister. Unless I am mistaken, I thought that the question did not deal with government administration. Upon reflection, it may be so or it may not, but I still do not have the transcript before me. However, if the hon. member wishes, I can consider his position and I might be able to hear his arguments tomorrow. That being said, I do not believe it would be appropriate now for the hon. member to present arguments concerning all the details relating to the situation. Naturally, since the question is very important, the hon. member might consider it more appropriate to give me the opportunity to examine the precise question. Afterwards, I might be able to make a decision.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to pursue that issue. If you want to take the matter under advisement, it is up to you. However, I would like to state clearly that as members of the opposition, we have the right to ask the government questions on issues strictly related to the administration of this government. Again, I refer you to paragraph 6 of citation 359:

> A question must be within the administrative competence of the Government.

I believe that all members of the opposition now ask themselves what criteria apply, since, based on my understanding of it, we no longer have the latitude to ask the government questions. The Prime Minister is the leader of that government and if he sees fit to refer the question to one of his ministers, that is his decision, not mine. However, I do know, that it is not fair to leave a question unanswered today, because tomorrow we will not know if the questions we asked meet the new criteria just stated. With all due respect I find it difficult, Mr. Speaker, to understand your argument.

[English]

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment on the point of privilege raised by my friend from Vanier.

The issue, Mr. Speaker, as I understood it, and I agreed with your observation, was whether the question was in order in terms of what is appropriate to be put in Question Period.

Historically this has been a period during which members sought information from the government about government operations. We know that it has expanded to a time period each day where members call the government to account for actions of the government within the competence of government.

• (1510)

What we have here is a statement made by an individual who is a member of the Board of Governors of a Crown corporation. Basically it was asking about the propriety of that question. It opens all kinds of questions, whether it is appropriate to suggest that someone in that capacity has no right to say things which are offensive. They have every right to say whatever they choose. It would be most inappropriate for the government to attempt to censor the comments made by anybody in that position. This on its face would make the representation inappropriate.

As to the representation whether the Prime Minister would call up a citizen to criticize the comments that he made in respect to this most important and vital issue, I would really question whether it is an appropriate submission or representation to be made in Question Period.

I would hope the House would allow the Speaker to follow his suggestion, that he be allowed to look at the "blues" to see whether it is an appropriate question for Question Period. In the meantime, I would not like the record to indicate in any way, shape or form that this government has identified itself with those comments, that Mr. John Crispo is speaking for the government or even the CBC. He was a citizen expressing a point of view, a point of view with which I do not agree if the quote is accurate. I am not suggesting that it is not, but sometime quotes are not fulsome in giving the full views of individuals.

It is not the position of this government or of any minister of this government. If there is a dispute with Mr. Crispo it should be handled by way of private conversations between the hon. member and Mr. Crispo, who is a private citizen and not a member of the government or someone for whom the government is responsible.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to say that Mr. Crispo is no ordinary citizen. Mr. Crispo is sitting in a most important place at this time in our country. The statement he made is the kind of statement that got the hon. minister who just spoke in trouble with another party in his province.

Surely someone in this House should at least stand up and say what we think of his views, not privately. I personally feel insulted and I will tell you why. These statements are unacceptable. This country is going through a crisis and here is a man who is repeating exactly what is being said in Alberta. That code word. That is exactly what it going on in western Canada because I go there. These are the code words that are well understood by some people who say French is being shoved down their throats.

This is a very important question. Mr. Speaker, you were so concerned about the future of this country that you made a speech about your concern. We cannot allow these kinds of statements which are inflammatory and only confirm what individual people may think.

I have never said, as my colleague has said, that 77 per cent of senior public servants are anglophones, whatever anglophone may mean. I have never said how many unilingual French speaking people there are in the 23 per cent left. I could go across the country and say in French: There is not a single unilingual Canadian in the federal hierarchy who speaks French, there is not a single one.

[English]

We know there are none. I submit to this House that you will take that under your usual cool consideration and come back because we need an answer. We need an answer because we could talk for hours and ask what percentage of the people work in Agriculture Canada. How many people are working in Energy Canada? If le Commissaire aux langues officielles says 75 per cent, of course it is disastrous for English Canadians. It is terrible, but you have to express yourself in both languages if you want to work in the official languages office. To choose this one and excite people who are easily excitable these days is not in the good interest of Canada.

I think it was a genuine question from someone, somewhere, and you are the highest authority for the House. You will tell us the kind of rule we can use because we would like to know who will deliver that message. It will not be done in a private chitchat saying "Little naughty boy, you should not have said that. I hope next time you will act and behave better". We are not going to be satisfied with that. I am not going to be satisfied with that.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Yes, Mr. Speaker, while you are reflecting on the question of privilege raised by my colleague, and I certainly want to take an opportunity to check the record and review it very carefully, I do want to say something in support of the points which have been raised. The government House leader has alluded to the fact that the comments in question were made by a private citizen.

Not only is the member a private citizen, he is well beyond that. He occupies a position of some seniority in a very major and important Crown corporation in this country. He exercises responsibilities of both an administrative nature, as well as a quasi-judicial nature on the Board of CBC. I believe that, so it is just not—

Mr. Beatty: It was in order.

Mr. Dingwall: The minister will have an opportunity to stand in his place. He could have done it at Question Period.

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment, just a moment. I have listened very carefully to the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, the hon. member for Saint-Denis and the government House leader. I am now hearing the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond.

The point is whether or not the question put, which I do not have in front of me yet in "blues" form, is seeking an answer which is within the administrative competence of the government. At the time I thought it was not. I have told the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier very clearly that I would look at it and I would consider the situation. I may ask the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier to address the Chair further, but we are now getting into another debate which goes way beyond the question that has been raised.

There are two issues here. Was the question within the orders? There is another question. As a Canadian I am as aware of the other question as anybody in this Chamber. I have my own views which of course I am not going to say here. We are all aware of the other question, but it is not the place to debate the other question.

I said in my remarks to the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier that it was clear to the Chair that the question raised was serious and in fact very important.

[Translation]

However, I would ask all members to give the Chair time to consult the blues, and subsequently, perhaps it would be appropriate to come back to the House. For the time being, however, I don't think it would be appropriate to pursue the second question. The hon. member has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: Just very briefly, Mr. Speaker. In determining whether or not the question was in order, it would seem to me that the Chair must determine whether or not the individual was a private citizen. I submit—

Mr. Speaker: Quite so. I am well aware of the position of this particular individual.

• (1520)

I know perfectly well who this gentleman is and probably so does every member of the House. I am going to be guided by the question as it was put because that is where I made my decision. That is my responsibility.

I would ask hon. members to co-operate with the Chair and allow me to come back to the Chamber and perhaps assist all hon. members.

Again I say to the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond the importance of the second issue is not lost on the Chair.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, the comments which have been referred to by my hon. colleague directly affect the workings of the Government of Canada. Specifics have been made with regard to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, specifics have been made with regard to the Privy Council Office and the Prime Minister's Office which I would think come under the direct administration of the Government of Canada, namely the Prime Minister and/or the responsible minister.

Second, we are not asking that Canadians not have freedom of speech. The question was asked today to give the Government of Canada an opportunity to clarify a situation which those of us on this side of the House, and I would presume others, have some real difficulty in understanding the perceived and actual de facto linkages between the individual in question and the Government of Canada. That was the purpose behind the question.

Mr. Speaker: I have to do my duty. This is getting into a whole debate about the second question which I just described. There are a lot of members here this afternoon so that could go on all day. It is not appropriate for me to permit that.

I am going to do the very best I can and I think the very best is all that a Speaker can do under the circumstances.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I want to address the point that you raised because the essential question before the House is whether or not the question put by the hon. member was in order.

The government is held to account each day in Question Period for matters within its administrative competence and I come here every day prepared to respond to any question which is addressed to me relating to matters under my ministerial competence.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the decision you made was the correct one. What we had today was not a question but a representation that the Prime Minister should take such and such an action.

Second, Mr. Speaker, the fundamental question which you raised correctly is whether or not the issue that was raised relates to the administrative competence of the government itself. The answer to that is very clearly that it does not. The government is not responsible for—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The difficulty we are getting back into—and I appreciate that everybody is trying to help—is the very debate that I do not think ought to proceed this afternoon.

I have a question which is on the record. As soon as I see it I will take a look at it. I may have been in error, but I will take a look at it.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, before making adjudication will we have an opportunity to make further argument?

Mr. Speaker: I made it very clear that I will take a look at the matter and if I think it is appropriate that the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, who is the person who raised the question, should address the Chair further I will invite him to do so.

I thank the hon. member. We may have had enough for the moment.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Loiselle that Bill C–26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee H; and the amendment of Mrs. Catterall (p. 6631).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands as two minutes left.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to be able to conclude my remarks in two minutes but perhaps after the amendment has been voted on I will get another opportunity to speak on the main motion and could complete my remarks.

The bill we have before us, as I indicated this morning, is unsatisfactory. Perhaps in the two minutes I could mention four of the particular problems that it creates.

Clause 10 states that job applicants may be evaluated according to a set of standards rather than to a ranking system in which one candidate is compared to another. In other words, we are abandoning the principle where we hired the best qualified person and replaced it with the principle of hiring a qualified person. In other words, you meet the standards, you get hired and it does not matter whether you are the best candidate or not. That used to be the test for hiring in the Public Service. The government is abandoning that. They are lowering the standards. That is not correct. That should not be done.

Clause 16 of the bill states that the commission may appoint someone to the Public Service for a period of up to 90 days and there is a further provision for an extension up to 125 days. In other words, there will be no examination, no tests and no benefits payable to these employees during this 90 day period. It is a carte blanche for the government to hire people and then rotate them around through various government departments without having them meet the normal qualifications or pay the normal benefits under the act. That should not be the case either.

Clause 18 of the bill states that a deputy head of a department may decide on his or her own that an employee has abandoned his or her post and therefore is no longer employed. Previously when that determination was made the Public Service Commission had to hear evidence and make a finding. That is no longer the case. In other words, dismissals can happen if an employee is away for a period of time. The head of the department can decide that the employee has abandoned his or her post and dismis that person. There is no apparent dealings with the Public Service Commission in respect of that. Again the government is proposing unfairness, high-handedness and improper rules.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, and I see my time is about to expire, in clause 19 the government has provided that increased contracting out can take place notwithstanding a decision of the Federal Court of Canada which said that contracting out would not result in the discontinuance of a function. The government is now saying it is. It is circumventing the decisions of the court that were placed there in order to safeguard employees in the Public Service.

This bill is bad. The minister should withdraw it at once.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, like all my colleagues on this side of the House, I want to speak against this bill and indicate, as others have done, that the Liberal Party opposes it. It has the usual fancy and provocative and apparently substantial title, PS 2000, but on examination we find that it is an unacceptable bill.

The government has departed from a long tradition of moving forward changes in the law affecting the Public Service by some measure of consensus, some types of parliamentary hearings, and has failed. We recommend in this case that it return to that procedure and that a special committee of Parliament be established to consider the principle of the bill, as well as its substance in the total context of the so-called PS 2000 program.

If such a project were undertaken by the government it would be following the recommendation of the public accounts committee which was a recommendation made by the committee including its own members.

We want to indicate that we support the clauses of the bill that contribute to strengthening the Public Service and its ability to serve the public and improve labour relations. I was proud to see that my colleague, the member for Kingston and the Islands, emphasized this particularly in his closing remarks. We oppose the clauses of the bill which undermine the merit principle. He explained in some detail how this principle was undermined without adequate safeguards that destabilized the Public Service and discouraged the hiring and retention of highly qualified individuals. We also oppose the clauses of the bill that reduce accountability. We have substantial amendments to propose to the bill which we will do at the right time.

There are many problems in this country and so many of the causes can be put down to simple mismanagement by this government. In one file after the other, government mismanagement has taken a country with so much going for it, with such a determination to stay together, and virtually brought it to the verge of destruction.

This government's mismanagement of the Public Service has caused the first ever massive walkout of public servants in the history of Canada. It has brought the morale of the Public Service to an all time low.

The harsh and arbitrary treatment is causing a loss of competent people. The management of its own employees is incompetent in a time of change. If it cannot manage the Public Service we should not be surprised to see that the larger issues—the constitutional issue, the tax issue, the federal-provincial relations issue the survival of the health care of Canada issue or the university issue —are mismanaged.

It has asked the Public Service to do more with less but now the message is clear, to do less with less, and the Canadian public is suffering as a result.

We not only encourage the government to abandon this procedure and establish an all-party committee to examine the reform of the Public Service, but we also ask it to listen to members of the opposition and to public servants themselves on the reform of the Public Service.

This has not been done. The Public Service as a source of advice and opinion has been shut out and whatever advice has been forthcoming has been ignored, just as the views of Canadians on the GST were ignored, just as the views of the poor in tough economic times when the cap was put on the Canada Assistance Program were ignored. Just as senior citizens were betrayed by this government so were the public servants.

The approach has been high-handed and dictatorial. PS 2000 has proceeded on the basis of top down, heavy-handed dictates that are outdated and do not work. The idea of the old theme, "let the managers manage" is a 1962 theme from the Glassco commission. We are now living in 1992. We are seeing the dismantling of another of the institutions of our nationhood. Just as VIA Rail, Air Canada, mail service, the CBC, Petro-Canada have helped build Canada from coast to coast, the Public Service has provided services to Canadians wherever they are and carried out the will of Parliament in all corners of Canada.

The enormous increase in the use of contracting out, a form of privatization of the Public Service and the use of short-term employees have all contributed to diminishing services and the weakening of the Public Service as an instrument of public policy.

Our party believes that Canadians deserve to have accessible, quality services delivered efficiently by a professional, non-partisan Public Service that treats all employees with respect and fairness and is responsive to the needs of Canadians.

The Liberal Party is committed to the partnership between the public sector and the private sector and to the partnership between the government and its employees on whom it relies and should rely for policy advice to carry out the programs, services and regulations mandated by Parliament.

The Liberal Party supports the revitalization of the Public Service to better allow it to adapt to rapid change, to create an environment in which employees can be creative, innovative and adaptable to changing needs of its clients and the nation and to attract and retain competent, dedicated employees.

We believe that change can best be managed in a climate of mutual trust, co-operation and consultation with its employees, including respect for basic collective bargaining rights.

We are committed to the accountability to Parliament and to the public for both the use of human and financial resources.

Today we have seen an example of the government's disastrous approach to problems in the Public Service. During Oral Question Period—Mr. Speaker, I can assure you I do not intend to discuss a ruling the Chair has yet to make, but it so happens to be what we are discussing today—there was a reference to the appointment of Mr. John Crispo to the Board of Governors of the CBC. In his comments Mr. Crispo attacked an aspect of the Public Service and more specifically the aspect of being subject to the Official Languages Act.

The government, did not answer right away. It knew what Mr. Crispo said since it has the same access to the media that we do I would have expected the government to respond during Question Period. If that is against the rules of the House, it could at least tell Canadians what it has done to counter Mr. Crispo's comments and tell the truth about the Official Languages Act and the impact it has within the Public Service. But, no, it tried to avoid a response. Maybe it has a right to do that. The Chair will rule at the appropriate time. However, even if it cannot give an answer here, it can at least tell Canadians.

I see I am running out of time, but I must say, this is a perfect example of the government failing to protect our national institutions and the Public Service against remarks that are not true and that attack the government's policy, a policy it even defended in the answers it gave. I hope whatever the Chair's ruling will be, that the ministers will find a way, either here or outside the House, to correct the position taken by their appointee, Mr. John Crispo.

[English]

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I rise today on the motion that Bill C-26, the Public Service Reform Act, receive second reading.

The Public Service exists to serve Canadians by delivering to them the programs of the Government of Canada and to assist ministers in devising effective policies and programs necessary for the good government of Canada.

I am sure that members of all parties support the fundamental principles for renewal of the Public Service set out in the 1990 report entitled Public Service 2000, The Renewal of the Public Service of Canada.

Seldom in our history has a program of organizational change been undertaken of the scope and magnitude of PS 2000.

Bill C-26 would provide a necessary underpinning for many of the PS 2000 reforms. It is a valid and reasonable package of amendments which deserves, in my view, our support.

I trust that we can debate this measure in a constructive and non-partisan manner that will help build a better foundation for Canada's Public Service.

The legislation by which the Public Service is currently governed goes back 25 years, and a review was necessary. Over the years there have been several proposals to reform the Public Service. There was an exhaustive review of employer-employee relations by Jacob Finkelman, in the mid-seventies. We had the d'Avignon committee in 1977. There was the Lambert committee in 1979, and recently several Auditor General reports made reference to the need for reform.

• (1540)

In his latest report the Auditor General sounds very favourable to this initiative. In spite of some reservations about the accountability framework, I think he can easily be reassured on that.

[English]

In addition, members will be familiar with the 1990 report Beneath the Veneer which recommended that government should place more effort on achieving more equitable opportunities for employment in the Public Service.

The proposals of Bill C-26 reflect many of the recommendations made in these previous reports and, in particular, proposals specifically addressing employment equity issues.

In my view, it is now time to get on with enacting the necessary legislative base to implement the PS 2000 reforms required for the renewal of the Public Service of Canada.

I think that we sometimes take for granted the role of national institution played by the Public Service of Canada, which represents the country as a whole and is represented in every region of the country. As a matter of fact, 67.5 per cent of its employees work outside the national capital region, all over the country and the world.

The Public Service also reflects the linguistic duality of Canada as well as how important justice and tolerance are for the Canadian people. Moreover, it is pivotal to our parliamentary democracy. There is even a body, the Public Service Commission, created by Parliament to ensure that appointments and promotions are non-partisan and to prevent both political and administrative patronage.

Canada is not the only country in the world where the need for renewal is recognized. Others have already started to improve their public service in an effort to enhance their national and international competitiveness. Australia for instance has just gone through the gigantic task of simplifying classification, thereby reducing the number of occupational groups. In Great-Britain, the Prime Minister has announced the implementation of the citizens' charter which will make it possible to establish standards of service and to make civil servants more accountable.

In Canada, the renewal process undertaken by the Quebec government results from the amendments to the legislation governing the Quebec civil service since 1983. A legislative committee of the Quebec National Assembly has recently set out to assess progress up to now, and this should give a boost to this renewal attempt based essentially on the same principles as PS 2000. As for British Columbia, it has embarked upon an initiative to provide the public with better quality services.

[English]

Canada's future prosperity depends on competing successfully at home and abroad. The president of the Public Policy Forum, an organization that brings together business, labour, the academic community and government, has recently stated that the quality of the Public Service is a major factor in Canada's international competitiveness.

Canadian enterprises must be adequately supported by an outward looking, innovative and results oriented Public Service. Research has taught us much about what encourages high performance in human organizations, such as maintaining a client centred focus, involvement of employees at all levels in decision making, instituting a continuous learning culture, exploiting new technologies and striving for improved management skills.

For the Public Service this will mean many changes. There will be more delegation of authority to front line units, dismantling of unnecessary central controls and enhanced accountability. Above all, there must be a rededication to service to the public.

But not only the Public Service is in favour of the reforms contained in Public Service 2000, Laurent Thibault, president and director general of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, said that he fully subscribed to this important exercise involving many issues. He said that the goals we had set of simplifying procedures, decentralizing authority and responsibility and increasing efficiency are exactly what major corporations do to take their place in world markets in the 1990s.

I would like to point out to hon. members that the idea of this public service reform came from within. Instead of the traditional inquiry presided over by an eminent person who considered the changes to be made, the Public Service itself decided to renew itself. Many public servants, at all levels, had a deep desire for change. They wanted a new management philosophy, not only new planning systems imposed by central agencies. In other words, what they wanted was a change of mentality in the organization.

One of the most important reforms of Public Service 2000, will be to reduce the number of occupational groups by about two thirds. Bill C-26 will amend the Public Service Staff Relations Act so as to spread this restructuring over several years. In particular, there will be a job evaluation plan that will be the same throughout the Public Service. This plan will be free of gender bias and be based on the provisions of the Canadian Human Rights Act concerning equal pay for work of equal value. Union representatives will of course participate in developing this plan.

In conclusion, this reform has been too long coming. It is now time to join our efforts so that the federal Public Service can help Canada achieve its national objectives, at least in the next decade.

[English]

It is my earnest desire that the bill receive third reading as soon as possible. I would urge that the committee report back to the House by the end of March. There will be ample opportunity to consider improvements to the bill and I am confident that members will put aside differences and take full advantage of this window of opportunity.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, in spite of the content of the legislation before us, I am still pleased to have an opportunity to address Bill C-26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada.

I and my colleagues in the New Democratic Party oppose the bill before us, I think for very good reason. We are also pleased, however, to support the hoist motion put forward by my colleagues in the Official Opposition.

On June 18 of last year the Conservative government introduced this bill in the House of Commons. Known as the Public Service Reform Act, the bill proposes changes to a number of existing acts, including the Public Service Staff Relations Act, the Public Service Employment Act, the Auditor General Act, the Canada Lands Surveys Act, the Financial Administration Act and the Surplus Crown Assets Act.

The majority of changes proposed by Bill C-26 affect the Public Service Staff Relations Act and the Public Service Employment Act. This bill represents the first major revision to PSSRA and the PSEA since these acts first came into effect in 1967.

Many of the bill's proposed changes flow from the recommendations of the Public Service 2000 task forces and the subsequent report entitled Public Service 2000, The Renewal of the Public Service of Canada issued in December 1990. Very glowing terminology—the renewal of the Public Service of Canada.

It is therefore not surprising that Bill C-26 falls considerably short of its objective of reforming the federal Public Service. The PS 2000 exercise was notorious for its lack of meaningful consultation with federal Public Service workers and their bargaining agents. Hence the so-called reform of the Public Service is based almost exclusively on the beliefs, perceptions and objectives of senior government officials.

I have taken the opportunity over the last year, certainly the last few months, of discussing the entire PS 2000 initiative and its so-called consultative processes with a wide cross-section of federal public employees within my own constituency and other areas of British Columbia. The comments I made a few moments ago are based in large part on the comments I received directly from those employees, whether they be bargaining unit employees at the so-called lower levels, whether they are middle management or some of the senior management in that region. I stand by those comments in light of those conversations and in light of listening to a great many people who are among those most directly affected.

The bill sets out the government's agenda for the so-called reform of the Public Service. It follows on the recommendations made in PS 2000 last year. What this bill does, very briefly, is allow the government to continue to contract work out.

The government now spends in excess of $5 billion on contracting out. There is no accounting for this expenditure and no study of the cost effectiveness of contracting out despite appeals from many quarters to introduce that kind of financial and managerial responsibility and accountability.

For a government that has a budget the size of the annual expenditures of the Government of Canada to refuse to follow some kind of financially responsible policy before embarking on a major so-called reform of all the legislation affecting the delivery of public services by the federal government and its agencies is the height of irresponsibility.

For a government that claims to be fiscally conservative and financially responsible, it more than makes us wonder about the credibility of its claims.

The bill increases the unilateral discretion of managers in the deployment of staff. It provides mechanisms for increased evolution of managerial responsibility and accountability.

Finally the bill attacks the job security of public sector workers.

Just as important, the bill does not address the serious problem of low morale in the Public Service. It does not take a lot of wisdom to be able to detect in conversations with public employees from one coast to another the fact that there is a serious deterioration of morale in the federal Public Service in the last while. That stems not only from the inadequacies of the so-called reform process that has given rise to this bill, but many of the other policies that simply do not make sense. For instance, the long waiting lists for what used to be services such as UI that were carried forward with some efficiency, nowadays if you get one little hitch you are lucky to get your claim processed within two months.

Offices of members of Parliament from coast to coast, certainly in the province of British Columbia and most certainly in the interior where we have seen some juggling and centralization of some UI functions, have seen that deterioration of the morale not only of workers but the total collapse of confidence among the people being serviced and the ability of this government and its agencies to carry on anything with any modicum of efficiency whatsoever.

The bill does not do anything to modernize the collective bargaining process. The Public Service Alliance for instance will still not be able to bargain the issues of classification and staffing levels.

I have no direct experience as an employee within the Public Service of Canada, but as a long-time employee I do in the forest industry in British Columbia.

We devised a jointly negotiated and administered evaluation program covering some 50,000 people in the western most part of Canada a number of years ago.

When you have the very difficult task of evaluating job categories and job content, weighing and grading, and everything that is involved in any sophisticated process of evaluation of job categories and classifications, it is the height of lunacy not to attempt to carry that through on a jointly negotiated and administered basis.

Anyone who knows anything about anything in the labour force must realize that what causes problems in workers' minds is not so much how much they get, but how much they get for their labours in relation to what somebody working alongside them gets. The pecking order is what is important when it comes to people's feelings in industry, and it does not matter whether it is the private sector or the public sector. This government is absolutely nuts if it does not realize that and give up on any process that has to be as complex as this one in trying to do it unilaterally. It simply will not work and it will create one headache and one storm after another.

Some of the employees want to make staffing classification and deployment of staff bargainable. They want an adjudication process to hear grievances on the above and they want an end to contracting out of work.

Finally, in terms of the contracting out issue, in the forest industry of British Columbia we do not have major strikes very often. The two we have had in the last 10 years have been of two and four months' duration. It is interesting to note that both of them were over this exact issue of contracting out.

If the federal government wants a fight on its hands, a total breakdown in the efficient operation of the Public Service and ill will on the part of the population and its own employees, there is nothing better designed to provoke that kind of confrontation and breakdown than to insist on contracting out through some philosophy of sheer doctrine and sheer dogma.

The most dangerous kind of politician is the one who believes his own b.s., if you will pardon the expression. I for one am very afraid that is the kind of government we have. That is why it is dangerous and why this bill has to go. That is why this government has to go.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, as the representative to this House of a great number of public servants in Nepean, I am glad to add my support to the motion that Bill C-26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada, be not now read the second time but be read a second time this day six months hence.

Nobody in this House will question the need for reform of the federal Public Service, and I think the minister has just said that. At present, Canada's Public Service operates according to legislation developed in the 1960s. Since that time, the business environment has changed substantially. Principles that were taken for granted 25 years ago no longer apply today. New words have replaced the old. Privatization and globalization, unheard of in the 1960s, are now on everyone's lips.

Certainly our Public Service needs a thorough overhaul to help Canada meet the needs of a new century.

Bill C-26, as it now reads, is not the answer. As the Liberal critic for human rights, I cannot help but notice how severely Bill C-26 treads on the basic employee rights that most people across Canada have come to expect in this day and age, the last decade of the 20th century.

Over five years ago, in 1986, this House implemented the Employment Equity Act. This legislation was enacted to ensure that no individual would be denied employment opportunities and benefits for reasons unrelated to ability.

In enacting employment equity legislation, the federal government realized that discrimination on the basis of sex, colour or religion would not stop unless laws were implemented to ensure that merit was the main guiding principle for hiring and advancement.

• (1600)

The government felt so strongly about this that by law it became a watch-dog to ensure that employment equity programs were put in place in all federally regulated businesses.

It is too bad this government sees no need to apply this basic right to its own hiring and advancement processes. There is an employment equity clause in Bill C-26, but it is so vague and weak that it is meaningless.

Bill C-26 states that the Treasury Board may request the Public Service Commission to implement employment equity programs. The Employment Equity Act is in place because for other organizations may is not good enough. What if the Treasury Board does not feel like implementing this kind of program? What if it decides that anti-discriminatory legislation is not cost effective?

The government insists that other employers must not discriminate. I insist that they must place the same responsibility on themselves.

This bill increases opportunities for discriminatory practices even further by absolutely removing the merit principle as the basic precept of hiring and advancement. According to the bill jobs will now go to a qualified candidate instead of the most qualified candidate.

Try as I might, I cannot think of a rationale for this clause other than a blatant opportunity to facilitate political patronage. What private sector employee would interview a number of candidates for a job and then choose the second or third best because that person was capable of doing adequate, if not very good, work.

The merit principle is already severely eroded despite legislation that demands it. What kind of Public Service will we have and what kind of morale will there be when all our government employees are second best?

At the moment some of the discriminatory practices allowed for in the bill would be controlled by the Public Service Commission. It was established in 1919 as the Civil Service Commission, to prevent management abuse and ensure fair treatment to employees, particularly concerning hiring.

The Public Service Commission will be transformed by this bill from a watch-dog to a lap-dog. Many of its personnel functions will be weakened or removed. According to the bill, the PSC will no longer have any role in the demotion or termination of employees.

That task will be in the hands of deputy ministers and the Treasury Board. Bill C-26 will deprive the PSC of any strength and independence that it now has. When Public Service Commission powers decrease the powers of the individual managers will increase.

I am sure that most managers in the Public Service perform to the best of their ability and do their jobs with integrity, but what of the ones who do not? The bill will give managers sole responsibility for so many personnel practices. Deputy ministers will hire and fire. They will deploy people as they see fit. There will be no means of redress.

The government has proudly asserted that deployment, although regulated by managers, will be voluntary. How voluntary will it be when deployment can be included as a term of employment?

By leaving the primary personnel responsibilities in the hands of individual managers, the bill will pave the way to favouritism on the one hand and harassment on the other.

The stated rationale by this government for this change in hiring policies within the Public Service is that simplification is needed. At the moment, it often takes as long as six months to fill a Public Service position.

The government claims that competitions are costly and time consuming. Yet only 12 per cent of the government's operating budget is devoted to personnel. There is no question that government hiring processes need simplification, but removal of the merit principle is not the way to achieve that result.

To fully ensure that Public Service employees will have absolutely no power, the government is also using the bill to enfeeble the unions.

Bill C-26 will deny the unions the right to negotiate such issues as classification and promotion. Perhaps even more dangerous, the government has appropriated for itself the right to eliminate the right to strike for certain people in certain positions.

Initially this action may indeed weaken the unions so that they cannot speak out against abuses within the system. However, in the long run it will create a monster. By designating significant numbers of employees as ineligible to strike, the government will place union control firmly in the hands of young, inexperienced and probably more radical employees. At the lowest rungs of the government ladder, with nothing to lose, these new leaders will have no reason to compromise with the government that put them in such an unfortunate position.

The bill will also severely damage job security. Contracting out has become commonplace. The bill would allow managers to lay off employees because their jobs were being contracted out. A 1989 Supreme Court ruling stated that such lay-offs infringe on the rights of Public Service employees for fair opportunity for advancement. It looks like once again this government is saying: "Don't break the law, change it".

Over the past five years the number of term employees in the Public Service has risen dramatically. The bill would facilitate the hiring of casual employees without competition. This again would be a blow to the merit system. At the same time, these casual employees would receive absolutely no job security or benefits.

Finally Bill C-26 offers no protection to whistleblowers. In 1967 such a provision may not have been necessary, but it most certainly is now. In fact it was probably necessary then too but just not commonplace. A number of states in the United States have recognized the need for such a provision and this government has been given ample opportunity to understand what whistleblower protection is all about. Only last week a private member's bill was put before this House concerning whistleblowing. Only one member of this government could be bothered to speak to that bill, and he spoke out in opposition.

For the past few minutes I have indicated some of the many reasons the bill is not yet ready for second reading. I am sorry now to have to add that I am not surprised at the remarkable inadequacy of the bill.

If I were to make a pair of shoes I would most certainly have to consult a shoemaker and someone who sold leather. If the shoes were to be good ones, comfortable to wear and able to fulfil the needs of the wearer, would it not be worth my time to consult someone who wears shoes? From the outset of the creation of Public Service 2000, the government has excluded those people who will be most affected by this bill.

The unions were called as witnesses but they were given no role in the final creation of the bill. Both the Auditor General's report and the public accounts committee recommended the bill needed more work and should be studied. The government has chosen to ignore them. By excluding the unions and the public, the government has once again acted in bad faith.

There is one statistic that I must commend the government on. The government has proudly asserted that Public Service 2000 and Public Service reform is only 10 per cent about legislation. It says that 20 per cent is machinery, but the lion's share of 70 per cent is about attitudinal change.

I ask this government not to blast this atrocity into law. Let us roll up our sleeves and take this bill back to the table, to a special committee of Parliament. Let us consult thoroughly with those who will be affected by this bill, instead of destroying what could be a great institution. The Public Service could lead Canada into the 21st century with pride.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, since there is only one Tory here and it is too late for him to learn, I want to call for a quorum count.

And the count having been taken:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is a quorum. We will resume debate.

[English]

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Etobicoke—Lakeshore is raring to go these days. He wants to go to another party. We have a party in mind for him and are willing at any time to entertain his ideas. He should restrain himself for the minute, although I suppose if he is that anxious to come over I could forgo speaking. If he wants a few minutes to think about it, that is fine. I want to thank my friend from Regina—Lumsden for drawing a crowd for me. I owe him one.

Mr. Siddon: Get on with it.

Mr. Simmons: The Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs says: Get on with it. He has been talking to somebody. Oh, if he had only got on with it when he was in fisheries, we would be in much better shape these days in Newfoundland and Atlantic Canada.

My friend and colleague from Ottawa West has the solution to this bill. Give it the six-month hoist. Get it out of here until it is ready to come in here.

First of all, let us go to the motherhood issue in this bill. Do we need some renewing of the Public Service? Do we need to recraft legislation that has been in use for 30 years? The answer is yes. That is pure motherhood. Nobody on either side of the House argues that issue, that there is need for some updating of the mandate under which the Public Service operates. That is not at issue at all. It is characteristic of the way this government operates.

For example, when it was going to bring in the goods and services tax, it couched it in terms of replacing an admittedly bad manufacturers' tax. It gave the undertaking at that time that it would be revenue neutral. Therefore, all across this country, people in this House and elsewhere said: "Well, you cannot argue with that. That is pure motherhood. They are going to get rid of a bad tax and they are going to bring in a good tax in its place and they are not going to collect any more money". Well, you could not be against that or you would not be normal, would you? That is motherhood.

What went wrong along the way? What always goes wrong with this government? It says one thing and proceeds to do the exact opposite.

Take the free trade issue as a second example. There it came with the motherhood approach. "Canadians, would you like to trade more freely with your friends the Americans?" Well, the answer to that question is yes, because we have been trading about 85 per cent of our commodities for many, many years without a free trade agreement. Who could be against more trade which means more jobs and so on? That is the way it was put to us. Of course that is not what came out the other end of the pipe. It knew from the beginning that it was about to sell the shop.

I give those two examples in terms of tax and in terms of free trade where the government said one thing and did something very different.

There are many other examples, but in terms of my debate this afternoon, since I only have a few minutes, the third example in tandem with the tax issue which I have mentioned and the free trade issue is this particular bill, the so-called Public Service Reform Act.

The rhetoric on this says that everything is going to be sweetness and light if we could only get this bill through. That is what the President of the Treasury Board said a few minutes ago. They say that their goal is to eliminate a good part of internal red tape. Who could be against that, if that is what they are going to do?

Let us look at what the court said they are doing, because the court, fortunately, thanks to the union, has had an opportunity to have a look at the government's nicely stated objectives. Here is what the court had to say fairly recently, indeed within the last 12 days or so. On January 30, the Federal Court said that this proposal "departs substantially from the merit principle". Anybody who did not have a brass face, who did not have an absolutely brazen face would have withdrawn the bill as soon as the court said that and would have said: "Court, you are right. Court, we respect your finding", and they would have gone back to the drawing board.

This government has had many opportunities to do the right thing here. It has had lots of advice to do the right thing. The public accounts committee, an all-party committee of this House, told it last spring. Before proceeding with the idea of reforming the Public Service in such a massive way, however well intentioned that reform may be, the public accounts committee said: "Before you do that, before you take on this massive reorganization and restructuring of the Public Service, why do you not have a special committee of the House?"

Is this such a far-fetched idea, coming as it does from members of all parties, including Conservatives, who sit on that public accounts committee?

As if that were not enough, along comes the Federal Court in the last couple of weeks and tells the government that its proposal "departs substantially from the merit principle". The judge who made the ruling did not stop there. He went on to say: "It would be defeating the whole purpose of the Public Service Employment Act which is to ensure that appointments to the Public Service are made on the basis of merit".

Particularly since 1919 with the establishment of a Public Service Commission, over the last 73 years we happened to have in this country—and it is no accident—one of the best public services in the world. Why fix it if it is not broke? If we have a system that has served us so well, why tamper with it?

We only have to see how this government operates to see why. It is never comfortable with anything it cannot control. That is why it has taken offices that over the years have been above the fray like the secretaryship of the Privy Council, the most senior public servant, and it has made an effort to politicize the holder of that office. We have seen people like Paul Tellier, Derek Burney and Norm Spectre being forced to be the apologist for this crowd.

One of the hallmarks of our bureaucracy, before this government took office, was that people such as those I have named and others were always above the fray. They gave advice to the government but they did not speak for the government.

We have seen that change, change for the worse. We have seen the public servant become politicized. Now we see the heavy hand of the government trying to institutionalize that politicization. We see it now say "it is not enough". It will not be required from now on that the individual applying for a job be the best qualified. He will just be one of the qualified people.

This opens the door. This opens Pandora's box to all kinds of abuse, to appointments on anything but merit, to flagrant patronage. It is not something we have had in our Public Service over the years and it is not something we should allow right now.

There are some good things in this bill. My colleagues, in particular my friend from Ottawa West, have already made reference to these.

We will oppose the principle of the bill at second reading because of the reasons I and other colleagues have stated. We do not oppose a reform of the Public Service. What we do oppose is this rating of the merit principle and a number of other issues that my colleagues will mention in debate. That is why we have been saying: "Let's not throw the whole thing out. Let's put it to a special committee".

My friend from Ottawa West in her wisdom has moved the motion which does not throw out as such, but buys time for this government on the heels of the court's decision, on the heels of the advice of the public accounts committee, on the heels of the advice by many dozens of members in this House, that this government come to its senses and push this issue to committee in order to get some advice and come back with a better crafted bill that will serve this country and serve the people who are part of a very magnificent Public Service.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Ottawa Centre—Immigration; the hon. member for Haldimand—Norfolk—Pork Industry; the hon. member for Don Valley East—Metro Toronto; the hon. member for St. Boniface—Education.

• (1620)

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, I wish somebody would get up and organize a crowd for me because they do not seem to last long on the government side, with two exceptions.

I want to begin by saying that I have heard speakers from all sides of the House on this bill saying nobody is against reform of the Public Service. That may be motherhood to old members, but it is not to me unless and until the reform contains the maximum participation and involvement of representatives of the Public Service employees. If they do not have any say in that reform, they do not have much of a union.

There is an old saying by a very famous Welsh politician, made when he was inaugurating the National Health Services in Great Britain in 1945–46. All the Liberals, all the Tories, all the editorial writers, and all the experts predicted it would not work. It would be disastrous. All the people would be rushing to the doctors' offices and to the hospitals and abusing the plan, et cetera, et cetera. There were predictions of a public which would destroy the National Health Service before it got off the ground.

That famous Welsh politician, bless his Labour Party heart, made a statement in the House of Commons and in a little book called In Place of Fear. That was: "If you want to get the best behaviour out of people, the first thing you have to do is give them a chance to behave". If you want to get the best behaviour and the best service out of your Public Service, you give them a chance to behave. You give them the fullest opportunity to take part in any so-called reform of the Public Service.

I want to say something about contracting out because it has become a real growth industry in Ottawa and some provincial capitals. We have thousands of extremely competent people in our Public Service, both federally and provincially, who have such a variety of expertise and training and learning and experience that they could take on almost any task one could imagine that a government, federal or provincial, could conceive it wanted to look into.

Since about the middle seventies, this growth industry has been really operating. If you were a middle or senior level civil servant or a senior official in a Crown corporation, you put in a minimum number of years to get your pension or get a nice fat buy-out on your contract. Then you started a consulting firm and you bid on all kinds of contracting out contracts. With the kind of contacts you have built up in the Public Service, in the government, former, present and future hopeful cabinet ministers and so forth, you are in there like a burglar. Contracting out is hitting $5 billion a year. The government will not give us any details. It will not even give details to the Auditor General.

There are some instances when you have to contract out, or you should. If, on the rare occasion there is no expertise or facility anywhere in the federal government service to look into a certain matter in which the government is contemplating legislation, one would have no choice but to contract out.

If your public servants, with their best expertise, come up with a report that you have some doubts about or you would like to have double-checked, you might put out a contract either to verify or dispel what your public servants came up with. That is another instance where it would make some sense to contract out.

The overwhelming majority of contracting out cases that have gone on could have been done just as well, I suspect, for less money; certainly not any more money than was being spent.

On the whole matter of getting the best behaviour out of people, you have to give them a chance to behave. When the government brings in legislation that flies in the face of other labour legislation, you are denying that principle about giving them a chance to behave. There is another world famous, internationally recognized, historical figure who made a statement well over a hundred years ago. He was questioned about activities of certain labour unions, and he was requested to take part in that dispute on the side of the employers. He refused on the following grounds: "You have to remember labour is prior and superior to capital and without labour capital cannot function". Stupid employers and stupid governments do not learn that at their peril, if they have not learned it.

Regarding arbitrarily defining job classifications, there is a mechanism in place already to do it with representation from government and employees' representations under the Canada Labour Code or before the Public Service Staff Relations Board. The mechanism is already there. If agreement cannot be reached between the government and the employees, the mechanism is in place.

We should not arbitrarily remove the ability of representatives of the employees to have a say, to negotiate job classifications and to define them. They should have a say in what the appropriate units would be for collective bargaining. If anyone knows quite a bit about an appropriate union for collective bargaining, it is a labour unionist. He would know just as much or more about it than the employer would.

On the whole matter of eliminating jobs in the public sector, some of that has gone on through contracting out. The government is not giving us all the facts, figures and details on the $5 billion it spent. It will not even give them to the Auditor General. One must be pardoned for being a little suspicious. The government can claim that it has frozen the Public Service, that there is a net reduction, or that the Public Service is no larger than it was a certain number of years ago. It has not told us how many people were involved in the contracting out, and who got paid fat fees. That is why it is such a nice growth industry in the Ottawa Valley.

This is part of collective bargaining. It is part of the kinds of rights that working people have earned. The bill is improper and inappropriate. I hope the government members will have some second thoughts about it, the three who are here, and withdraw the damned thing.

Let us not even bother having a vote on a six-month hoist. Just pull it off the table, send it over to a committee, ask it to look at it and report back.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I want to say today that I have had first-hand experience in dealing with the President of the Treasury Board on the item of Public Service 2000, having chaired the public accounts committee for three years.

I have a number of letters here that were sent to me by the minister at that time. I want to say that the Liberal Party opposes clauses of the bill that undermine the merit principle without any safeguards, that destabilize the Public Service, that discourage the hiring and retention of highly qualified individuals—and I do mean discourage them—and that reduce accountability, which is probably one of the worst of all. Everyone must be accountable.

We oppose the bill on that basis and we also oppose it on the basis that the President of the Treasury Board did not keep faith with the public accounts committee of this House of Commons. I will point out at what stage this happened.

On November 8, 1990 I tabled this recommendation and many more in this House from the public accounts committee. Item 17 of that report says:

> Your committee considers that there is a need to pause once the task force recommendations have been put in final form—

That is the task force recommendations, not the legislation. It continues:

> —before proceeding with the introduction of legislative amendments in the House. The process of Public Service 2000 must be changed to allow for meaningful and open consultation with greater involvement of front-line employees.

Our recommendation 18 was:

> Your Committee recommends that the Government give consideration to:
> (a) tabling a discussion paper prior to proceeding with the introduction of legislative amendments and/or administrative changes and that this discussion paper set out the principal conclusions and recommendations arising from Public Service 2000;
> (b) referring the aforementioned discussion paper to a Special Committee of the House on Reform of the Public Service and that the Special Committee conduct a consultation process involving employees, the Public Service unions and other interested parties and report back to the House within a reasonable period;

We wanted an answer from the government on this and other recommendations by November 30, 1990. On December 10 the President of the Treasury Board, with whom we dealt a great deal in the public accounts committee, sent me this letter which said in part:

> I am pleased to inform you that the Government will shortly be issuing a White Paper setting out its policy for the future of the Public Service. This will afford an opportunity for consultations with Public Service unions and other interested groups on this important subject, following which the Government would intend to introduce appropriate legislation.

He went on to say about the public accounts committee:

> I agree with you and your colleagues that it would be desirable for the Government's legislative proposals for renewal of the Public Service to be considered by a special House committee—

I repeat, by a special House committee. That was very clear indeed, and he says it right here in his own letter to me:

> I would intend to table a motion to that effect.

The reason I said the minister did not deal in good faith with the public accounts committee was that no special committee of this House was set up. The government simply barged through and did its own consultations and then turned around and put its own ideas in legislative form and brought in this bill, which we have before us today. He did not keep faith with what he put in writing in his own letter.

On January 25, 1991 I wrote to the minister about this very matter: "I am writing you regarding your response of December 10, 1990 which, by the way, I read to the members of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts". We were delighted that he was going to set up a special committee. "In particular, I would single out again the recommendation in our seventh report that a discussion paper be referred to a special committee of the House on reform of the Public Service. You clearly state in your letter of December 10 that: 'I agree with you and your colleagues that it would be desirable for the government's legislative proposals for the renewal of the Public Service to be considered by a special House committee, and I would intend to table a motion to that effect' ". I went on to say: "To my knowledge no such motion has been tabled".

On March 15, 1991 the President of the Treasury Board wrote this letter to me which said: "Thank you for your letter of January 25, 1991"—this came in almost two months later; it is the urgency he gave to the letter of January 25 that I appreciate—"on Public Service reform in which you asked if it was my intention to pursue a reference of this important matter to a special committee if the House leader's agreement is forthcoming. In my letter to you of December 11, 1990 I indicated that we would establish a special committee of the House to deal with the legislative aspects of Public Service 2000". There is a little catch word in here. It says: "to deal with the legislative aspects of Public Service 2000, the government's Public Service reform initiative".

We did not ask to deal with the legislative proposals. We as a public accounts committee asked to deal with a paper in which the government laid out its views and that the paper should be discussed by an all-party special committee of the House of Commons. That was not done. He is throwing in this legislative proposal here instead of keeping faith with his original letter.

The minister says: "I am pleased to confirm that it remains the government's intention to do so once we are satisfied that adequate consultations have taken place with interested parties on the legislative proposals required". What he is saying is again that it is the legislative proposals which he is going to bring forward to the House, not his original commitment that he was going to bring a paper before the House which could be studied by an all-party committee and in which all elements of the Public Service of Canada could have a hearing.

The government is dealing in high-handed ways with its public servants. That is why it had a massive walkout not very long ago; it dealt with the public servants as if they were secondary citizens.

We have a tremendous Public Service in this country and once you start destroying the morale, destroying the quality, destroying the invitation of bright, young people of this country to go into the Public Service because there is a challenge there, the Public Service of this country is going to suffer.

I have another one where the President of the Treasury Board wrote me a letter suggesting under what conditions his officials from Treasury Board should appear before the public accounts committee. The committees of this House have the power to demand that public servants and other agencies appear before them. Here we have the President of the Treasury Board, who is supposed to be in charge of government expenditures, saying that only under certain conditions should his officials appear before the public accounts committee.

Mr. Speaker, I see that you are giving me the high sign, but I just want to put these facts on the record. The minister has not kept faith with the parliamentary committee. He has rammed his legislative proposals into this House. He has still retained the capacity to contract work out. We were told by the public accounts committee that it had no records of how they were going to save money or how much money they saved by contracting out.

If you do not have any statistics to show how you are going to save money by contracting out then why are you standing in this House and saying that we save money by laying off public servants and contracting the work out? You have failed to prove that. In fact you say you have no statistics to prove it and you are still saying that you are saving money.

Bring back decency in the treatment of public servants. Treat them with decency. Give us an honest—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The hon. member for Malpeque.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on this legislation, Bill C-26, the Public Service Reform Act. I must say at the beginning that I too will be voting against this bill on second reading. I feel it will have a negative effect on the whole Public Service and the way services are delivered to the Canadian people.

I am sure everyone in this House agrees that reform is necessary. The legislation under which the Public Service operates at the moment was passed in the 1960s. Certainly times have changed since then and we do need reform and new legislation. This bill before us today is certainly not the answer.

I am opposed to the legislation for several reasons. I know today my time is limited. In the time I have I want to try to outline some of the reasons why I will be voting against this legislation at second reading.

As our critic for this legislation has suggested, and I certainly support the suggestion, this bill should be sent to a special committee of Parliament and studied there in detail. During the study the groups affected by this legislation should be consulted with a view to amending the legislation so it will better serve all Canadians.

The vast majority of public servants live in Ottawa, but in my province of Prince Edward Island we have the Department of Veterans Affairs which employs approximately 500 Islanders. Before too long we hope to have the GST processing centre in Summerside which will employ 300 to 400 people. As well as those two major government departments, we also have other federal public servants in my province.

Many of these federal government officials live in my riding. I have talked to many of them. I know they are really concerned about the legislation we have before us today.

Before I explain my objections to this legislation, I want to set out how we in the Liberal Party see the Public Service.

We believe that Canadians deserve a public service that delivers accessible quality services, is professional and non-partisan, treats all employees with respect and fairness, and is responsive to the needs of Canadians. That is how we in the Liberal Party see the Public Service. I must say that our party also supports the revitalization of the Public Service and we want to help public servants adapt to the rapid change.

As I said, the legislation it is operating under is old legislation. It is from the 1960s, and certainly there have been many changes in our country since then. We do need new legislation, but, as I said, the legislation we have before us today is certainly not the answer.

To sum up, we support a Public Service that is professional and non-partisan, that can provide Canadians with the high level of service they deserve for their tax dollars.

I am opposed to Bill C-26 because many parts of this legislation go against the principles I have just read. This legislation jeopardizes the merit principle in the hiring process because it does away with the competition process.

Right now, when an opening occurs, a competition is held and the person who gets the job is the person who finishes number one in the competition. This is as it should be, if we are going to get the best qualified people in our Public Service.

Under Bill C-26, when an opening occurs managers would only have to establish minimum qualifications for the position. In other words there is no competition. They can hire anyone who has the minimum qualifications. The best qualified candidate would not necessarily get the job.

It really disturbs me that we are talking here about legislation which could mean that in hiring for positions in the Public Service the best qualified person would not get the job.

For example, in my own province of Prince Edward Island, if the manager in one of the departments wanted to hire a lawyer who was a member of the Prince Edward Island bar, then he could hire any lawyer who is a member of the Prince Edward Island bar. It would not necessarily have to be the person best qualified. If being a member of the bar was the only qualification then the manager would have the leeway to do that. Indeed the manager could simply hire a friend of his.

I am against this legislation because I think it will open up the hiring process to abuse and favouritism. This legislation also jeopardizes the merit principle by changing the way employees are transferred within departments.

Right now competitions are held so that we get the best qualified person for the position. Under this proposed legislation that would no longer be the case. Managers would be able to move employees to any other position without regard to merit or other employees who may be equally or maybe better qualified.

If that were the case, what would happen to the morale of the Public Service if managers decided to favour their friends?

I have real problems with the government doing away with competitions for Public Service jobs. This is certainly not the type of system we want. I believe it will open the way in the hiring process to abuse and favouritism.

I know you have indicated that I only have a minute left, so I simply want to wrap up by saying that I will vote against this legislation at second reading for the reasons I have just outlined. I have a lot of other reasons which I do not have time to speak about today. Certainly, even with the two I have raised, there has not been ample time to go into them in any depth.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, it is important to debate Bill C–26, because of the implications it will have on the Public Service. It is important to discuss it from a number of points of view.

One point of view is what it does not do, and the other is what it does do. This bill does not address the real problems within the Public Service of Canada but addresses some concerns the government believes it has because of its inability to treat employees properly in the operation of government service.

We have heard a good deal today about the discretion this bill will provide to managers. That sort of discretion will permit and even encourage favouritism to be used rather than merit in the operation of the Public Service. It is no wonder that the Public Service Alliance of Canada and the other unions and professional associations that represent workers in the Public Service are very concerned about the operation of this bill. They are very concerned about the rationale and motives the government brings to the introduction of a bill of this sort.

There are at least three major problems within the Public Service which this bill does not even attempt to address. If the government were serious about improving the Public Service and the lives of those employees within it, it would do something to address these concerns.

There is a serious problem of morale within the Public Service, as we have seen from the events of last summer and as all members of Parliament see when we meet members of the Public Service. This bill does not attempt to address the problem of low morale.

There is also concern out there among the employees and the public at large that the service rendered to the public has deteriorated considerably over the last few years. Those of us who deal with a large number of unemployment insurance claims in our offices, or with Revenue Canada, know that the period of time to deal with these issues has grown. In that period of time the lives of Canadians are affected in an adverse manner. We have problems with the deterioration of service to the public, not as a result of problems with the employees who are doing the best job they can, but because of continual cutbacks and pressure on the resources within the Public Service.

There are problems, as we have seen so vividly recently with the collective bargaining process within the Public Service. There are many issues which the Public Service Alliance of Canada is unable to bargain which would be the subject of collective bargaining were they not in the Public Service. They are reasonable matters such as job classification and staffing levels. Again Bill C–26 omits to do anything about this particular problem. Instead the bill encourages and allows the government to continue to contract out work, to continue to undermine the full-time employees in the Public Service.

The government now spends in excess of $5 billion on contracting out. There is no effective accounting for this expenditure and no cost study available to the members of the House on the effectiveness of this contracting out. It would appear to be more of a philosophical issue than a practical economic issue.

This bill does nothing to address this concern. Indeed, it allows the government to contract out even more, which is not in the interests of the employees in the Public Service or of the consumers of services provided by civil servants.

It also increases the discretion of managers in the deployment of staff. One big problem with giving managers extra discretion in the way in which they treat employees is that they will use favouritism rather than merit to address their concerns. One of the advantages of having firm rules with regard to promotion and allocation of jobs is that it cuts down on the opportunity for managers to pick and choose who will get merit, who will be deployed to certain tasks, and so on, on the basis of who they like rather than who will do the best job.

The discretion of managers, if administered fairly, is desirable. Within the Public Service at the moment, as we all know, there is an increasing distrust by the rank and file members of their managers and part of that is the frustration that gave rise to the events of last summer.

Rather than make sure that these decisions are made fairly and on the basis of clear rules, what this bill wants to do is enable them to be made even more unfairly and with more discretion.

Also this bill provides mechanisms for increased devolution of managerial responsibility and accountability. Rather than make those mechanisms more effective, it attacks the job security of public sector workers. One thing that causes more concern among workers, more concern in terms of their ability to do their job and their effectiveness and their sense of commitment to the work place and to their job, is uncertainty. To create more uncertainty in the Public Service is to do a disservice to the employees and their families and also to the Public Service itself and to those Canadians who receive those services. It does not help to make the lives of civil servants more insecure.

The employees within the Public Service who after all know their jobs better than anyone else, who know what is required within their frame of activity in order to effectively and properly service the public, have asked for very modest changes on the whole. They do not want this bill, they want to have the real concerns of the Public Service addressed. They want to be able, as they should, to bargain in the same way as they might in the private sector over such things as staffing, classification and deployment of staff, perfectly reasonable expectations that this government should respond to positively rather than throw out.

They also want an adjudication process which will appropriately hear their grievances on such issues as staffing, classification and deployment. Again, a reasonable request. Surely it is appropriate that their positions should not be changed, that their place of employment should not be changed arbitrarily, and that there should be some procedure for making sure that that was fair.

They want an end to contracting out for two reasons: first, it adversely affects their jobs, their opportunities for promotion and their security, not an unreasonable concern for an employee; and second, and more importantly, as they have voiced so often, contracting out has given rise to a deterioration in the service rendered to the public and very often sees duplication of costs, which has not given rise to savings. If the rationale behind the government's response for contracting out is that it saves money, it clearly has not done that and the government is not even prepared to prove the economic benefits or detriments of the scheme one way or the other.

We can only be concerned about the lack of openness on the results of any study the government might have made about the economic effectiveness of contracting out.

• (1700)

Once again this government is going after workers in the Public Service rather than trying to nuture their ability to do their jobs effectively. I think we would see clear support across this country, not only within the Public Service but outside, for opposition to this bill.

THE ENVIRONMENT

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT TO CONSTITUTION

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake) moved:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider amending the Constitution Act to recognize the right of every person in Canada to a safe and healthy environment.

[He said: Mr. Speaker, to paraphrase the words of Saint Exupéry, we do not inherit the environment from our ancestors, we borrow it from our children. We have a responsibility, each and every single Canadian, to act as good stewards of our environment for future generations. This responsibility falls on us as individuals, how we act in our consumptive patterns, the choices we make on a day to day basis. This responsibility falls to us also at the community level, how we work together to promote a way of living and growing that maintains and enhances our environment.

This responsibility also falls on the shoulders of government, municipal, regional, provincial and federal.

No matter how we draw our political boundaries, the environment encompasses and transcends those boundaries. The responsibility of the federal government is more than the sum of its parts, the parts being mere historical, political creations. This includes federal ridings, cities, regions and provinces.

The air in my home riding of The Battlefords—Meadow Lake does not heed provincial boundaries. Poisons and toxins, if they are in the air, move from community to community, from province to province. CFCs spewed in the air from other provinces and even other countries impact on radiation levels and climate changes which affect all of us.

Effluents released into the water table and pesticides which are brought into the water table do not honour the provincial boundary, for example, between Saskatchewan and Alberta, which forms much of the western boundary of my riding. The water table was there before the creation of the provinces and will remain, we hope, long after. It is how we choose to act or not act which will determine just how we leave it for future generations. Mammals, birds, fish and plant life pay no heed to these boundaries. Disease and genetic damage impact interprovincially and internationally.

This environment, these biosystems we borrow from our grandchildren, require the federal government to play a strong role. As Chief Seattle stated in 1893: "Whatever befalls the earth befalls the sons of the earth. Man did not weave the web of life, he is merely a strand in it. Whatever he does to the web, he does to himself".

The motion before us today asks the House to recognize that the Constitution should be amended to recognize the right of every person in Canada to a safe and healthy environment. All Canadians are aware that our environment is suffering irrevocably in many ways. Families know that our children are inheriting a land that is diseased and weak compared to the one we inherited. We have not done a good job as stewards.

Governments continue to turn a blind eye to environmental damage in order to please and placate the efforts of big business to continue to drive down the costs, often made more expensive in the short term by environmental regulation and protection. The Mexican trade deal threatens to push our various levels of government even further in reducing environmental laws in order to compete with the joke that is Mexican environment enforcement.

Tracts of forests, one-third the size of Japan, are sold to Japanese industry. While our government joins the chorus criticizing the destruction of the Amazon rain forests, it assists the continued destruction of our country's own lungs, our rain forests and our boreal forests. The ozone layer smack dab above our own country has thinned to the extent that the environment minister has urged young children to stay out of the sun. What have we come to? Has the minister also decided that in the future he will urge young plants, animals and fish to protect themselves from the dangerous radiation levels caused through CFC production? Clearly this is a timely motion.

The federal government in its constitutional proposals has at the same time recognized the need to address the environment and put forward proposals which serve to further threaten the environment, belying our trust as stewards for future generations.

The Canadian Council of Ministers on the Environment says Canadians are making unprecedented demands on their government to preserve, protect and repair all aspects of the environment. The council also commissioned a study by Resources Future International, an institute for research on public policy, which found that almost nine in ten Canadians feel that their long-term health already has been affected by pollution levels in their area. Three-quarters of our population feels that pollution is a major cause of cancer. Perhaps most alarmingly, 85 per cent of the population considers pollution problems already serious enough to threaten the very survival of the human race.

In introducing the green plan, the Prime Minister stated: "Canada's natural development has shaped the development of our character and spirit. The challenge we now face is to build upon our economic strength in harmony with our environment, the basis of our health and our prosperity".

The recent decision of the Supreme Court of Canada on the Oldman dam further underscores the federal responsibility in environmental matters. The Supreme Court's decision stresses the federal role and takes a view of the environment which extends to include a community's livelihood, health and other social matters.

This motion, therefore, is most urgent as it provides an opportunity for the government to alter its current course as outlined in the federal government constitutional proposals. The current proposals would not only prevent us from moving forward as a country but would in fact be toxic to the growth of a mature and responsible attitude toward the environment.

While it is true that there is a proposal to recognize the environment in the Canada clause with a commitment to sustainable development, it is only a symbolic gesture which is empty in law and meaning. Put simply, it is unenforceable.

Proposal 22 would transfer to the provinces the authority for non-national matters which are not specifically assigned under the Constitution, hence the environment. This would further shoulder the provinces with the mantle of being pollution havens. Industry would be able to continue to offer up shop with the attractive spin-offs of job creation and related economic growth to the province most willing to ignore or reduce environmental standards. This would pose the same threat to the environment that the current free trade talks with Mexico pose, that of pollution havens.

Proposal 24 would transfer powers relating to forestry and much of energy, mines and resources to the provinces. The federal government has also set out in its constitutional proposals recognition of the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces in the following areas and to withdraw from these fields in a manner appropriate to each sector. It outlines tourism, forestry, mining, recreation and housing.

The government also proposes to discuss with the provinces for the purpose of administrative and/or legislative delegation wildlife conservation and protection, transportation of dangerous goods, soil and water conservation. The proposal to guarantee property rights in the Constitution stands in stark opposition to the intent of my motion today, to recognize the right of every person in Canada to a clean and healthful environment.

It does not take a fortune teller to see big business dumping toxins no matter how foul into any water or land on its property, pointing to property rights as a defence for doing whatever it wants on its own property. Environment and communities be damned in a case like this. Further erosion of the federal government's power not only ignores the inherent transboundary nature of the environment, but it would severely restrict the ability of the government to participate in international treaties concerning the environment as well.

As my colleague, the member for Skeena, has stated: "This is a bottom line vision for the boardroom, not a survivor's manifest".

The constitutional proposal package offers a symbolic and unenforceable reference to the environment proposed for the Canada clause. It is nothing more than a cheap political effort to mislead Canadians into believing that the environment is a Conservative constitutional priority.

In fact the January 1992 all-party House of Commons Standing Committee on the Environment found many locations where the package undermines or handicaps avenues to protect or enhance the environment.

According to the Canadian Environmental Law Association, Canada may be the only country to have adopted or amended a Constitution since 1975 which did not include recognition of the right to a clean environment. More than 20 countries now have environmental rights entrenched in their constitutions.

We missed an opportunity in 1981-82 when the Constitution was patriated and before Parliament. We neglected the environment in the ill-fated Meech Lake Accord. We missed an opportunity just last fall when I proposed that this Parliament draft a bill of rights guaranteeing the environmental rights of all Canadians.

The federal government attempts to bypass serious environmental protection in the Constitution during these talks and it comes at a particularly bad time with the United Nations Conference on the Environment and Development slated for Rio de Janeiro in only four months' time.

The government's constitutional proposals would hinder our ability to play any significant role, much less a leadership role, in such areas as global warming, forestry, biodiversity, biotechnology, marine pollution, and fisheries.

To sum up, the current big business-federal government constitutional proposals stand to gut the federal declaratory power; cut the federal role in wildlife conservation and protection; cut the federal role in soil and water conservation; cut the federal role in forestry; cut the federal role in mining; and frustrate any ability to play a leadership role in international environmental protection.

During times of economic recession, like those we now face due to federal economic and political mismanagement, levels of government are pressured even more to reduce environmental protection for its citizens in order to compete with these big business interests.

During the environmental Olympics, when levels of government are inclined to compete to cut corners on the environment and leap high for business investment, we must remember it is the people of Canada and the wildlife, plant and animal, for which we are stewards. That is really what this discussion is all about.

Entrenching in the Constitution the right to a healthy and safe environment is more than just words during constitutional talks. It is essential, absolutely essential for maintaining the integrity of the planet we are leaving to our children.

Ensuring every Canadian's right to a safe and healthy environment would realize a very, very substantial step forward. There are several leads which could be followed in this regard.

Just six days ago the leader of the New Democratic Party, the member for Yukon, announced a proposal for a social charter which would place in section 36(1) of the Constitution the responsibility of the government to ensure a clean environment.

The government of Ontario has recently initiated a task force on an Ontario environmental bill of rights which sets out to examine the public's right to a healthy environment; improvement to protection through improved court access; the escalation of public participation; whistleblowing protection; government responsibility and accountability for the environment.

The governments of Yukon and the Northwest Territories both have provisions to protect the environment.

The Northwest Territories adopted the Environmental Rights Act in 1990, providing environmental rights and allowing individuals to sue other individuals for contaminating the environment.

In 1991 the Yukon government enacted its Environment Act which provides that the people of Yukon have the right to a healthful natural environment allowing individuals to sue the government and other individuals if this right is infringed.

Support for my motion is support only for that which surely each and every member of this Parliament and every Canadian should expect, that the environment we all share should be safe and healthy. Implicit in this is a number of implications and assumptions.

We as individuals and as government have the responsibility to act to protect the environment. The Western Canadian Law Association in its October 22, 1991 brief to the Standing Committee on the Environment calls for a Canadian Constitution which acknowledges that Canadians bear a personal and collective responsibility to protect the local, national and global environment.

Ensuring the right to a safe and healthy environment involves recognition of what the West Coast Environmental Law Association calls the precautionary principle of environmental protection.

Gro Brundtland, chair of the World Commission on Environment and Development, stated: "I will add my strong support to those who say that we cannot delay action until all scientific facts are on the table. We already know enough to start to act and to act more forcefully. We know the time it takes from decision to implementation through practical effects. We know that it costs more to repair environmental damage than to prevent it. If we err in our decisions affecting the future of our children and our planet, let us err on the side of caution".

I also support the principle of polluter pays. Assigning financial responsibility for actions that have adverse environmental consequences is a principle of obvious importance in our market based society.

The federal government's current proposals for dealing with the environment in the Constitution are based on the very same principles that come into play in the free trade agreement, privatization, and deregulation.

These proposals are based upon the lowest possible wages, the lowest possible job protection and the lowest possible ecological standards. Carte blanche for developers and the short-term interests of big business bottom lines are the winners in the constitutional proposals, and not the environment that we are borrowing from our children.

As the Assembly of First Nations' brief to the Standing Committee on the Environment reminds us, the earth and its biosystems existed as a whole before humankind. European economic and political development commenced the true partitioning of land with various enclosure acts. Our way of looking at the environment to date is to try to package it into contrived political boundaries and play political football with issues too important to consider a game.

If we are to survive we must mimic the natural life systems of the earth. A Constitution must serve to divide responsibilities for the environment as the environment exists crossing politically created and redefined borders.

In order to recognize every Canadian's right to a healthy and safe environment, we need a strong federal role in international issues. Catastrophes such as deterioration of the ozone and global warming need concerted federal attention.

The federal government's proposals would lead us exactly the wrong way down a one-way street. The trend to provincial pollution havens implicit in these dangerous proposals must be reversed.

There is good reason for a strong federal role in the environment. The West Coast Environmental Law Association stated: "The environment is Canada's national heritage. Every Canadian has a right to have that heritage protected. It follows that every Canadian has a right to reasonable protection of all of the Canadian environment, and not merely the environment of the province in which he or she lives. It is important that the federal government set minimum environmental standards so that the provinces are not tempted to compete among themselves to attract industry by cutting environmental standards".

This call to recognize the right of every person in Canada to a safe and healthy environment is the first step in protecting that heritage, in honouring the trust of borrowing our environment from our children.

I ask the House for its support.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, let me begin by saying that I welcome this opportunity to discuss the hon. member's proposal. Indeed it is an important one.

• (1720)

It is an important one, particularly in light of the fact that the goals which the hon. member is seeking to achieve are indeed the same goals that the federal government is seeking to achieve.

Where we differ is with respect to the question of how best to achieve those goals. The hon. member, as you know, is proposing that we should establish and entrench an environmental bill of rights.

In our mind that is not the best approach for the preservation of the environment in Canada. We agree with him and I am sure all members of the House would join with me in saying that we share a common goal of striving to ensure that the environment be protected not only for this generation but for future generations.

We believe that his approach, and I know it is a view shared by others, would in fact fragment the environment because it would be based upon the assumption that the environment could be managed in isolation of its social and economic context.

I am of the opinion, and I believe it is an opinion shared by many in this House, that the best way in Canada both in the past and in the present for us to resolve our differences with others, to resolve the problems which are common to all of us is through a process of dialogue and co-operation.

In our minds the process of dialogue and co-operation first of all must include working in concert with other levels of government because it is very clear that they indeed have important roles of responsibility.

I think the judgment on the Oldman reaffirms the fact that the provincial government indeed has certain areas of responsibility. I might say in passing that I was pleased to see the Oldman decision reaffirming the philosophy of the government as practised in the implementation of the EARP guidelines and certainly as proposed under Bill C–13 which will be coming back before this House in the near future.

We believe if we are to work towards the attainment of our common goals we must do so in co–operation with those same provincial governments, with their municipal governments, with business, with the employees of business, with environmental groups, and with the public at large.

We believe that the key to the achievement of sustainable development is indeed the establishment of important environment and economic links and partnerships.

We fear that an entrenched environmental bill of rights would have the result of undermining that proposed partnership between all sectors of society which we feel is required to meet the challenges posed by environmental degradation.

We fear that that would occur because we fear that it would lead to a confrontational approach to the resolution of problems rather than to a co–operative approach.

I accept and I understand that on occasion there must be recourse to the courts. I think that is an inevitable by–product of our legislative process and the manner in which we have accepted responsibility under the federal system for the various areas of governmental duty.

I firmly believe as well that if we can wherever possible avoid that recourse to the courts which sometimes leads to a confrontational approach, it is in our collective interest to do so.

We do not believe that we should in any way limit the flexibility of legislatures. We believe that in some cases the very high cost of litigation can actually serve to deter the rights of individuals to be a part of the process.

Speaking philosophically, I very much prefer a system of co–operation and partnership which accepts the fact that no single level of government, no single player in the process, has the sole responsibility for development and for the protection of our heritage now and in the future.

This government has begun working in the right direction as we have tried to establish a system whereby there is room for public participation. Indeed there is encouragement for public participation as outlined in Bill C–13.

We have begun to move in the right direction in establishing these partnerships and linkages. In doing that I accept the fact that the Canadian people, as demonstrated during the consultations to the green plan, are asking us as a federal government to accept the very significant role of leadership in that process.

I for one believe that we have a responsibility to act as Canadians have told us to do and to accept the responsibility of providing leadership and perhaps even a greater degree of responsibility in certain areas and other levels of government. But I am firmly of the mind that if we are going to succeed in the long run, it will not be because one level of government has attempted or achieved a greater degree of superiority over others. It will be because we will have worked out a philosophy in Canada whereby Canadians, irrespective of where they live or of which part of society they may be a part of, have come to the conclusion that it is in our common collective best interests to work together toward a common goal.

As a federal government, I am proud of the leadership which we have provided to date. I am proud of the green plan, the six year long–term strategy, the first of its kind in this country. I am proud of the financial commitment of $3 billion that has been made available for the implementation of that plan. I am proud of the fact that that green plan to a very significant degree is a direct result of a fairly extensive and, in the minds of some, perhaps somewhat laborious process of consultation with others. I am proud of the fact that the green plan represents, according to my calculations, a recognition of approximately 80 per cent of the plans and goals identified, proposals put forth by Canadians in this proposal.

I am pleased that prior to accepting my present responsibilities, the federal government put forth the Canadian Environmental Protection Act, which has put into place a system of clearly defined responsibilities, a holistic approach on the part of the government, an approach that accepts the need for nationally consistent standards of environmental quality.

I am pleased that with the presentation of Bill C-13 to the House, which will hopefully be coming before us for debate in the next weeks if not days, there is a system put in place where the public has a clearly defined role to play. We accept the fact that we are in a very real sense simply stewards on occasion acting on their behalf.

Some of the success of the strategy we have put in place is evident in the work of the Canadian Council of the Ministers of the Environment, of which the federal minister happens to be the chairman at the moment. Here I think you have good evidence of the ability of governments to work together, to put together national plans to prevent and reduce urban smog, to put together strategies to reduce packaging materials by some 50 per cent by the year 2000.

What I see operative in the activities of the Canadian Council of Ministers of the Environment is a common determination to address the problems at hand without worrying too much about who is responsible for what part of the process.

I would look as well to the unity proposal which is before us and to note that for the first time there will be reference in our Constitution to the area of the environment and to the concept of sustainable development, but indeed it will be part of a new section too, the very important Canada clause.

All of these steps in my mind are being achieved because we accept the fact that governments at all levels must work now and in the future, as we have begun to do in the past, with their counterparts elsewhere, and with all those players who are part of society.

I would note in closing that the problems which we face as Canadians are not necessarily unique to us as Canadians, and that has been very evident in the House these last few days with the attention being given to the question of the ozone layer.

I would say in closing that the type of co-operation and partnerships which I envisage being required are required of international partners as well. I simply close by alluding to the Montreal protocol, one of the best examples of the international community coming together. Initially there were some 25 nations that signed. I think the number is over twice that now, understanding as they do that internationally as well as domestically the solution to sustainable development is not necessarily found in constitutions or on pieces of paper, but in a desire and a strategy of working together by forming partnerships and linkages throughout Canada and throughout the world.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, let me first of all thank the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake for submitting such an interesting and very important motion to us. He has always shown great interest in the environment and with this motion today he is presenting a subject of the utmost importance because the whole country is interested in making Canada's Constitution the best for present and future generations.

I really want to thank the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake for his initiative.

[English]

The intervention to which I just listened by the parliamentary secretary unfortunately was not very focused because of the fact that he used half of his time to elaborate on the government record, thus engaging in a neat and clever propaganda exercise.

He did, in all fairness, devote part of his time to the motion, but in his critique I wonder whether he really read the motion by the member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake. The parliamentary secretary said that if such a motion were to be adopted, it would isolate the environment. It would undermine the partnership to achieve sustainable development. He said it would lead to a confrontational approach. Imagine, he envisages a confrontational approach from this motion. It will limit the flexibility of legislators who prefer a system of co-operation and partnership. I am paraphrasing the parliamentary secretary, of course, but I am pretty close to what he said.

He said that he wants to work toward a common goal. Then he elaborated as to why he is proud of the green plan and the government record. Well, we will leave that for another occasion.

The motion by the member for the Battlefords—Meadow Lake wants an amendment in the Constitution to recognize the right of every person in Canada to a safe and healthy environment. Mr. Speaker, I ask you whether a clause, a phrase of this nature in the Constitution, would have the effect of undermining partnerships to achieve sustainable development. That is absurd. I ask whether it would limit the flexibility of legislators. If anything, it would give legislators increased incentives, a goal to move toward because it is in the Constitution. What on earth is the parliamentary secretary trying to get across in rejecting this motion?

It would impede a system or a culture of co-operation and partnership. For heaven's sake, if such a right were in the Constitution, and since members of the business community, the labour community, government, and the political sector are all persons who have the right to a healthy and safe environment, you have here a cohesive, bonding reason for moving in that direction.

It seems to me that the more one thinks about it, this motion would actually help enormously to achieve the major strategic goals that the parliamentary secretary has in mind. I wish the parliamentary secretary had told us why he would not like to have such a proposal in the Constitution from a constitutional point of view. It may be because he has some well-reasoned arguments. To argue that sustainable development is in the proposal of the government for the Constitution is a fine and interesting exercise in public relations, but the way it is phrased in the proposals—and I am referring to Shaping Canada's Future Together— one must conclude that it has very little value in enhancing or protecting the environment. This is what the member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake is trying to get across to us. His motive is to protect the environment.

What can we do and what can we say in this limited time? The notion of entrenching environmental rights probably dates back to discussions in the early seventies at the time of the Stockholm conference, that there are many ways of accomplishing this goal, that it can be done through an environmental bill of rights as many parliamentarians have attempted to do, including the Speaker of this House in the late seventies by way of amending the Constitution, as the member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake is proposing, by amending the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, if you like, or by rigorous enforcement of good legislation—he did not say, but that is where the parliamentary secretary comes from and I have to agree with that approach definitely—or by the integration of the environment into economic decision-making. You could achieve it that way.

There are some who would like to amend section 7 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms so as to make it read, and I quote: "Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of person, and a healthful environment, and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principle of fundamental justice". This insertion has been recommended by a number of constitutionally interested parties.

One also ought to recognize the work done by the Canadian Environmental Law Association when it appeared before the Ontario committee on the Constitution. They laid out a convincing argument in favour of a constitutional guarantee for a healthful environment as well, and also provided a clear definition of shared responsibilities that both the federal and the provincial governments have in relation to environmental methods. In their presentation they supported the proposal by Professor Gibson to amend the charter by creating a new section 15.1, 15.2 and 15.3, which for the lack of time I will not be able to read into the record.

The government proposals are really not filling the vacuum that exists around us. If you look at them, you find a commitment or a proposal in the preamble to the objective of sustainable development. We dealt with that a few minutes ago, which however is of very little value.

Then there is a proposal for the entrenchment of property rights in the charter, a measure which has been actually rejected by many organizations and individuals because it poses a threat to the environment, for years actually. Then there is a proposal to abandon to the provinces certain administrative legislative responsibilities in wildlife conservation, in transportation of dangerous goods, in soil and water conservation, which are counterproductive one must say.

As to the economic union that is proposed by the government, no mention is made of integrating the environment and the economy as part of their concept.

• (1740)

One must conclude that the true meaning of sustainable development has not really reached the level of the policy makers in Ottawa.

It is against this vacuum that the member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake comes forward with his proposal, a novel idea which urges the government to do something about the situation.

When it comes to substance in an initiative of this kind, I find it very regrettable that the government, instead of being supportive and co-operative, finds it necessary to defend itself on record and use arguments which really do not stand up to close scrutiny.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the mover of the motion, the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, and to the Liberal member for Davenport, who both invited us to support a motion which I find most interesting, and which reads as follows: That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider amending the Constitution Act to recognize the right of every person in Canada to a safe and healthy environment. One could only wish that this would apply every day and every second, especially when we consider the damage suffered by the environment and this planet throughout our history.

This motion deals with an issue that concerns us as Canadians. It also refers to a commitment we made, as a government, to help protect and preserve our natural environment, for ourselves and for our children. It is a responsibility that our government takes seriously, and I will give a few examples later on.

I believe that our current constitutional debate and our commitment to protect the environment reflect a concern to leave our children a country and a planet where they can lead a good life. I believe that through co-operation and dialogue, we will be able to meet the challenges facing us, both on the Constitution and the environment, as we are about to enter the 21st century.

I admit I support the lofty principles in this motion. And who would not? However, I must say it is not the best time in the world nor the best attitude one could take in the circumstances. What I mean is, Mr. Speaker, that adopting immediately a motion that urges us to enshrine this right in the Constitution would be putting the cart before the horse. After all, we have a constitutional committee that is about to suggest what to do and how to do it in the circumstances, among other things. I think we would do better to wait for the committee's report before we commit ourselves. In fact, I would prefer to mention the successful action taken by governments at various levels and by agencies and private citizens, who will make certain actions part of their daily lives. I am not sure this motion should be adopted, in the circumstances. Once again, I would prefer us to concentrate on concrete action such as government legislation.

So, I suggest that the best guarantee the Canadian people can be given as regards a clean and healthy environment is to direct our efforts toward sustainable development. The idea is to take into account the environmental considerations relating to each of our decisions and to account fully to the public for each of our actions.

Economic growth entails some environmental hazards—no one can deny it—because it draws heavily upon all our natural resources. On the other hand, we know that the growth of the economy depends on wise environmental decisions. As mentioned in the green plan, the environmental aspects have to be considered on a day-to-day basis and not in retrospect.

On December 11, 1990, we released our environmental action plan, namely the green plan in which we reiterated unhesitatingly our commitment to sustainable development because we firmly believe that a healthy environment is our surest guarantee for a strong economy. After all, we tend to manage our resources wisely in times when our economy is thriving. Economic growth also enables us to protect the quality of our environment by investing in the required pollution control and prevention infrastructures and technologies.

The green plan therefore challenges all Canadians—men and women, individuals and governments, First Nations and NGOs—to work together toward achieving our environmental goals.

This reminds me of the collective effort the green plan calls for, as illustrated by the following example. The finest of names can appear on the door of a restaurant or a business or on a sign, but however enticing the name, it does not tell much about what you will find inside. Personally I prefer going in and checking for myself what the food is like without paying too much attention to the sign. However great the merits exhibited and the wishes formulated in public, so long as we do not suit the action to the word and do no follow through, we will not necessarily foster this kind of co-operation.

Mr. Speaker, sustainable development cannot be achieved unless government leads the way, all the way down the administrative ladder. Sustainable development must be an integral part of our daily lives and sustainability must guide all our decisions. For that, we must involve people at the grass roots and bring these virtues and values into principles. The government is determined to fully consider the environment in evaluating projects and policies. This is the idea behind the reform of the federal environmental assessment review process.

You see two things that this government has done: the green plan and the proposed legislation on the table, Bill C-13. They call for action and show this government's convictions and virtues.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind you that our government has given much greater importance to the role of environment minister, so that environmental issues take the high priority they deserve in federal decision making. Furthermore, our government has set up a Cabinet Committee on the Environment, whose mission is to carry out our ambitious environmental program and to ensure that the government's policies and programs fully comply with our environmental objectives. The Minister of the Environment is also on the very important Priorities and Planning Committee of cabinet.

All this is to tell you again, Mr. Speaker, that the actions, regulations and responsibilities assigned to the various decision-making levels in the federal government attest to these convictions. The ministers and legislation like C-13 are a good illustration of it.

In conclusion, I want to say that this is the position taken by the government, to make the environment minister an influential member of Cabinet and to give him the instruments he needs to carry out his mission and allow Canadians to judge whether or not the government is doing a good job of meeting its objectives.

That is what I wanted to say to you, Mr. Speaker. I see that my time is up.

[English]

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to say a few words about the motion of the hon. member. I know he is a sincere member of this House and I think his motion is put forward in all sincerity. It is useful to review it:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider amending the Constitution Act to recognize the right of every person in Canada to a safe and healthy environment.

On the surface I do not think there are too many Canadians who would say the hon. member was off base in putting forward a resolution like this one. It has a lot of merit to it. I think it has a lot of depth to it and I think it should be reviewed seriously.

I guess if I might make a criticism of my colleague I would say the temptation is large right now for Canadians to make the Constitution into some kind of a shopping list for all the good things we might want to have in our society.

We saw this in the last few weeks in the constitutional conferences. This last weekend in Toronto we heard aboriginal leaders say that they would like the Constitution to say that they are a distinct society. We have certainly heard Bob Rae, the premier of Ontario, arguing that the Constitution should contain a social charter. We have heard the National Action Committee on the Status of Women and Judy Rebick say that the Senate should be restructured so that it is gender specific, that there are certain seats set aside for women, for example.

I have been advocating that the Canadian Constitution should contain property rights: the right of an individual to own property. I have argued that the Constitution should give more rights to Canadian citizens. If I had my way I would like to see a constitutional amendment requiring a balanced budget in this country. I would like to see the government's proposals for a stronger economic union as part of it.

Basically a lot of us are looking at constitutional change now in a way that is quite divorced from the fundamentals that got us into this. We have a country that is in jeopardy of falling apart because of a fundamental misunderstanding between Quebec and the rest of Canada. Maybe it is time we resisted some of these temptations.

I wanted to say that because although I think the constitutional amendment proposed by the member is a good, sound and sincere one we are may be falling victim to the temptation to put everything on the constitutional table.

As far as constitutional rights or environmental rights in the Constitution per se go, I would make a couple of basic comments. I believe we do not need more words on paper. I do not think that is going to help the environment. Changing words in the Constitution is not really going to help the environment, but I think changing attitudes will.

The problem is not so much with Them, with a capital t, and by that I mean governments or institutions or constitutions.

I do not think it is right for us as individual Canadians to sort of institutionalize our environmental problems, to put them off into something where we do not need to worry about them every day because some court, some institution, some level of government or some body of politicians is looking after them. I think that may tend to blind us to the reality that we are all polluters in our daily lives. That is what we really need to address.

I am not sure that the hon. member's motion, if adopted, would not really give people false assurances that the problem is looked after because it is stuck away in the Constitution somewhere. I do not for a minute want any of us, by doing so, to try and absolve ourselves of the personal responsibility we all have for environmental protection and maintenance. Instead, I think it would be useful if we were all concentrating on helping people know what they could be doing in their individual and daily lives in order to help the environment of Canada.

Too often in this place we pretend that government is going to be able to solve problems. What is government? Government is a representation of all of us, our country, our society. All of Canada is represented here in the House of Commons. We are all trying our best to represent what our constituents want, but if we allow our constituents to think that we can solve all these problems without them I think we are making our problems even worse. The Constitution is nothing but the rule book of this society and no rule book can really help the environment; it is people who have to do that.

I think we need to change the way people think and act and not change the rules that govern our society. That brings us right back down to the basics.

I do not want to diminish the hon. member's attempt to do something for the environment but, with respect, I think all of us have those tools within our own grasp. I do not want to be hokey about it, but we can all reduce, recycle, re-use and rethink. We can all attack our own environmental problems in our own households. It starts in the kitchen. It starts in the garage. It starts cutting the lawn. It starts with all those little things we do daily. Maybe we ought to be putting more energy into communicating those kinds of things rather than constitutional change.

All of us can conserve energy. You get in your car and you start driving. There are things you can do to conserve energy while you are doing that. When it comes to heating our homes and all of these little daily chores, there are things we can do to help the environment. We can protect water. We can take care of hazardous wastes. We can stop putting that fertilizer junk on our lawns. We can do a lot of things that will help.

In terms of protecting the air quality in individual households, we do not need to use CFCs. We can make sure our cars are tuned up. For goodness sake, there are basic common sense, fundamental things we can do every day to achieve the objective the hon. member is trying to achieve through legislation, constitutions, institutions and bodies of politicians.

We are talking about actions, not words. I think they go way beyond what any constitutional change could do.

A few moments ago the hon. member across the way from Toronto took a little shot at property rights and the environment. Lest anyone who is listening to these debates gets the wrong impression, I think it ought to be spelled out pretty clearly here that the entrenchment of property rights in the Canadian Constitution in no way abrogates the rights of society to protect, maintain and promote a healthy environment.

Putting property rights in the Canadian Constitution is simply giving back to Canadians a right they had historically until 1982 when the Canadian Constitution was changed. I know there have been environmental activists who have been attempting to scare Canadians by saying if you give people the right to own property, surely you are giving them the right to abuse that property, in other words to pollute that property.

I want to make it clear that our Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and our Canadian Constitution now say societal rights abrogate individual rights, and that is the way the courts have interpreted it. Our right as a society to protect the environment and the common good in no way gives individuals the right to abrogate that.

• (1800)

I will conclude on that note. Again I would like to thank my hon. colleague for putting forward this motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 is deemed to have been moved.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, when I filed to raise this question, at the time Mr. Jerez's family was still in Canada. The latest information we have is that it has unfortunately been deported to its home country.

In my supplementary question to the minister I had raised the question of the cost of the refugee cases presently in the system. At that time I indicated to the minister that according to his own figures we have so far spent in excess of $300 million on refugee cases.

According to the latest information we have been able to obtain, only 4,000 people have unfortunately been deported out of this whole system. Of 100,000 refugees in Canada, at a cost of $300 million, if you work it out per refugee who has been deported it would be approximately $75,000 for every refugee.

At that time I called on the government to review this whole process and to look at the amount of money we are spending. The United Nations High Commission is spending around the world approximately $400 million. I call on the government to explain to us on this side of the House and to Canadians why it does not step up its efforts and perhaps consider the question of amnesty as one of the options or to speed up the process and take into consideration that there are many families out there that are hurting.

Mr. André Plourde (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, I am pleased to provide additional information on the questions raised by the hon. member for Ottawa Centre on October 10, 1991 concerning the case of Guillermo Jerez.

The minister maintains what he said on this subject. Mr. Jerez's case went through all the steps of the refugee-determination process, including a complete review of his request by an independent tribunal.

The minister is convinced that this case received the full treatment under the process, which is recognized as the most generous and most equitable in the world, Mr. Speaker, a process that is both firm and fair. Canada can be proud of its record in respecting human rights and recognizing refugees.

PORK INDUSTRY

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I stood in the House on October 9, 1991 to bring attention to the problems facing Canadian pork producers. On that date I asked the Prime Minister if and when he was going to stand up to the Americans and demand that they honour the free trade agreement.

U.S. trade officials have now slapped a $22 per hog duty on live hogs being shipped to the United States from Canada. That is a 300 and some per cent increase. Once again we are seeing a steady erosion of our trade relationship with the United States. It has become increasingly protectionist and as a result violates the spirit and the letter of the free trade agreement. We are seeing this now in the negotiations at the GATT.

I am not the only one who realizes that Canadian interests are being threatened. Canada's two chief negotiators of the free trade agreement have warned, and we saw this a few weeks ago in the papers, that Canada may have to terminate the deal unless the U.S. violations of these rights stop.

I am mad because all along we have said that this is a bad deal for Canada. The fact is that the government did negotiate the deal, and unfortunately it favoured American interests over Canadian. The fact is that we have an agreement. We are going to have to live with it and we are going to have to stand up more to the Americans as they violate this agreement.

While we try to make the best of a bad deal, on the infrequent occasions when the deal actually benefits some Canadian companies the Americans try to undermine any advantage we have. The point is that we do not have to let them get away with it. The Prime Minister has said that he has a very good relationship with the President of the United States. I asked on that date that the Prime Minister use that relationship to tell the American president to live by the spirit of the free trade agreement.

We have to challenge the Americans and let them know that they cannot push us around in the trade area. We must act now and stand up to them. I do not mean by carefully phrased warnings by the Prime Minister. I mean by a tough unequivocal position so that the Americans will realize that good relations between two countries are not a given and that they should not be taken for granted.

Remember that the longer we allow the Americans to renege on their commitment to free trade, the more vulnerable Canadian outputs and jobs will be to American competition. In respect to the pork producers, they have been continuously harassed by unfair American countervailing duties which are a blatant violation of the free trade agreement. Just when our pork producers thought that their trade problems were over, considering that two trade tribunals ruled against the American countervailing duty, they have once again been harassed by the Americans. I am wondering if this is ever going to stop.

I call again upon the Prime Minister to let the Americans know that Canada will not roll over and play dead on this issue.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to respond this evening and to talk a little bit about the trade agreement and the countervailing duty on hogs. We have to point out to the hon. member that countervailing duties have been taking place since 1984, which was well before the free trade agreement was established. The only process to go through at that time was the GATT, and we know how prolonged that was.

The free trade agreement has at least allowed us a timeframe that is more acceptable to live with these actions that have been brought against our Canadian pork. On swine and pork imported from Canada in 1984 and in 1985 there was a countervailing duty of 4.39 cents Canadian per pound.

On live swine, again it is true that since October 1991 the countervailing duty for 1989–90 has been raised to Canadian 9.32 cents per pound, a 107 per cent increase from the last review.

The government is reacting to those actions along with the industry. We have stood consistently with the industry in all these actions that have been taken, and we will continue to do that.

Following an investigation on pork, the U.S. imposed a countervailing duty of 3.6 cents Canadian per pound on imports of fresh chilled and frozen pork from Canada in September 1989. This action has led to a three-panel request from Canada. A free trade chapter 19 panel on the subsidy finding led to a reduction of the duty from 3.6 cents Canadian a pound to 1.4 cents Canadian a pound. If we had had to work without the free trade agreement we would have had a lot of difficulty and we would still have been with the original figures rather than that reduction.

The chapter 19 panel on the question of injury to the U.S. pork processing industry reversed the U.S. International Trade Commission finding that Canadian pork exports to the U.S. were causing injury to the U.S. industry. As a result of these successful challenges under the review mechanism established by the free trade agreement, the countervailing duty on pork was removed and all duties refunded. I think that has been very successful. We have a mechanism in place to look after these challenges.

In addition, the GATT panel request by the federal government found that the U.S. did not act consistently with its obligations under the GATT in deeming that subsidies to hog producers were automatically and fully passed through to pork processors.

• (1810)

In conclusion, the mechanics in place under the free trade agreement proved to be of benefit to the industry and the Government of Canada.

The hog producers of this country have acknowledged this fact and are satisfied at the outcome of these démarches. It is our objective that the trading rules be respected. We will challenge any action that is unfair to Canada.

METRO TORONTO

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, the intersection of Eglinton Avenue East and Don Mills Road in my constituency is considered to be the geographic centre of metropolitan Toronto.

In fact, there is more motor vehicle traffic at that intersection than at any other intersection in all of Canada. In addition, there are more jobs in that immediate area than in any other part of metropolitan Toronto with the exception of the downtown core.

There used to be more jobs because there has been a great change in the job situation in recent weeks and months. IBM on the northwest corner of the intersection is laying off some 10 per cent of its 2,000 employees. Imperial Oil on the northeast corner of that intersection is laying off employees as well. In the nearby East York, North York, O'Connor, Bermondsey industrial area one-third of all of the plants are now vacant.

That is just the tip of the iceberg because in May 1990 the unemployment rate in metropolitan Toronto was 4.7 per cent.

In January 1991 it was 7.3 per cent and today it is up to 10.1 per cent. The problem is not just in metropolitan Toronto as you well know, Mr. Speaker. The problem is right across our entire country, right across Canada. We have the highest unemployment rate of the 17 largest advanced industrial countries in the world. That is clearly unacceptable.

How are we going to turn that around? How are we going to get the economy moving again? Mr. Speaker, as you are aware, I have written to the Prime Minister and suggested five initiatives.

One is the 5 per cent down payment. The other is the use of the Registered Retirement Savings Plans as down payments for home purchases. The third is getting the value of the Canadian dollar down. The fourth is a one-year reduction in personal income taxes, and fifth is a $14 billion municipal public works program.

Last week the government announced it was moving on the 5 per cent down payment and that is great. Clearly we need more if we are going to get our country moving again. If we are going to increase the spending power of the people who are unemployed and out of work—we have over 10 per cent of the country in that category—we really need a public works program in the neighbourhood of about $14 billion to be spent on municipal works such as transit, roads, sewers and environmental projects.

Where are we going to get that money? That is an awful lot of money. We have a debt and a deficit problem. According to the calculations that have been done by Professor Pierre Fortin of the University of Quebec in Montreal, if we could get the unemployment rate down from 10 per cent to 7 per cent we would generate some $14 billion in savings on an annual basis.

That is based on the finance department's own calculations and figures. That is just by reducing the amount we pay out now for unemployment insurance and welfare and increasing the tax revenues.

We cannot wait for some medium or long term recovery in this country or a recovery in the United States. We need action now and we need it from the minister.

[Translation]

Mr. André Plourde (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take the opportunity to tell my good friend from Don Valley East how much significant ongoing aid the present government is giving to the Toronto region. The key role of the federal government in Bombardier's acquisition of de Havilland is an example.

Industry, Science and Technology delivers programs and provides services continuously. The regional office in downtown Toronto is responsible for delivering these programs. The Biotechnology Development Program is a good example of an initiative that directly benefits the Toronto region.

ISTC played an important role in implementing this program which led to the formation of a non-profit organization under private sector control, with over 100 members from all parts of the biotechnology community in metro Toronto. This program is meant to promote the trade and research position of this leading edge centre in Toronto with the biotechnology industry.

Also, the Federal Business Development Bank is participating actively in some local business development initiatives in this region involving training courses and advisory services adapted to companies' needs. The FBDB, in co-operation with Employment and Immigration, also offers a training program for some unemployment insurance recipients in the Toronto area to help them set up businesses.

The government is also active in the Toronto area in a co-operative venture with the Ontario Department of Industry, Trade and Technology and the FBDB through a program for women entrepreneurs in the region.

I am sure that Toronto's considerable advantages in terms of development, together with this government's programs and services, will help lay the foundation for lasting prosperity in metro Toronto.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, this evening I want to address the questions that were raised in the House of Commons on October 11, which is just a bit more than four months ago. On that particular day I raised two points.

The first one was a reference to the Commission of Inquiry on Canadian University Education which had reported a need to place greater importance on distance education, continuing education and the internationalization of education. It pointed out as well that there was a need to attract students from aboriginal backgrounds and less affluent families, as well as handicapped Canadians and women. My question to the Secretary of State on that particular day was:

> How and when will this government act so that we can regain Canada's competitiveness?

I am just going to refer to a brief part of the answer and I want to quote the minister:

> I will be reporting back to the House as soon as that review is completed and that should be very shortly.

What does very shortly mean? It is now over four months since I raised that question and received that particular answer.

My supplementary question dealt with the student loans program to help these people that I just identified in getting a post-secondary education. I referred to people with low incomes, to women, to disabled Canadians, and to our aboriginal peoples. I asked why something had not already been done, when it was going to be done, and so on.

The minister, to his credit, indicated that I had already asked the question before and was patient enough to answer again, but he did not say a whole lot more in his other answer than he had previously. He did say, though:

> Madam Speaker, I have already answered the hon. member's question more than once. I have told him on many occasions that the Student Loans Program is already 27 years old, has never been changed and needs a thorough going over.

He did say as well that he was very close to tabling a review of the Canada Student Loans Program.

Yet today absolutely nothing has been reported. Why the delay? We are in a country, we all know, that has roughly five million people who are poor and living either at or below the poverty level. Most of them are women and over one million are children. As we speak right now, two million people are receiving social assistance. Almost two million people will be fed at food banks this year. Right now, almost 1.5 million Canadians are unemployed.

This kind of inquiry, this kind of review or study is needed. It addressed a number of important questions. I am still waiting to hear what the government is going to do with it, as well as what it is going to do with the Student Loans Program. I am waiting with bated breath.

• (1820)

Mr. André Plourde (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer the question raised by my colleague from St. Boniface on October 11 concerning post-secondary education in Canada.

First, I would like to remind you that the government is committed to support post-secondary education based on excellence and equal access. We all recognize the importance of education to build a country, as well as the essential evolution of the system, based on new requirements.

It is in this perspective that the Secretary of State supported the commission of inquiry on university education in Canada that was set up by the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, we have paid approximately one third of the costs, that is $250,000, incurred by the commission chaired by Mr. Stuart Smith.

The commission tabled its report in October 1991, and since, the AUCC has formed a task force to study the report of the commission.

The group, headed by Mr. Brian Segal, rector of the University of Guelph, is composed of university rectors, as well as representatives from the private sector. This group will recommend, by June 1992, specific measures to be taken as regards the themes and the problems raised in the report of the commission.

Distance teaching meets the needs of those who find it difficult to go through the traditional education system, namely the students in remote areas. Canada is a world leader in that field. Several provinces have undertaken innovative projects. For instance, the Télé-Université du Québec, TVOntario or the Knowledge Network in British Columbia, illustrate the efforts made by universities and colleges to facilitate accessibility to post-secondary education.

There is an increasing demand for post-secondary education. In fact, Canada and the United States have the highest participation rates in the world as regards post-secondary education. Moreover, one of the main trends right now shows that the number of adults, and even relatively old people, participating in these post-secondary education programs is constantly increasing. That is why adult education is another option that the government is taking a close look at.

The Constitution

SPECIAL DEBATE

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to order made on Wednesday, February 5, 1992, the House will continue the debate on the adjournment motion for the sole purpose of allowing members to make presentations on the results of discussions they have had with their constituents on the constitutional issue.

I would like to recognize at this time the hon. member for Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington. Then I will recognize the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, followed by the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway.

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have this opportunity to speak on the very important subject of the renewal of Canada's Constitution, where we are going and what my constituents have been telling me about Canada.

We are fortunate to live in the most favoured nation in the world, but all too often we have a tendency to think, as we listen to news reports or sometimes pessimists, that Canada is a lost cause. Let me say I do not believe this pessimistic view.

Generally speaking I have been close to my constituents over the past decade and beyond and I believe that today there is a tremendous frustration with our political system, petty partisan politics, our confrontational system, and the parliamentary system which dominates the media.

As Canadians we are overgoverned by existing bodies such as municipal, provincial and federal government agencies, boards, commissions, and it goes on. We should consider a reformed House of Commons that would better represent the regional interests of our nation. A more effective and representative House of Commons would eliminate the need for a Senate, either appointed or elected.

Under our present system of voting in the House of Commons there is a great deal of pressure and even intimidation on members of Parliament. The only free vote is a secret vote, as was the case in the selection of our present Speaker of this democratic Chamber. MPs must be more responsive to their constituents. This would lessen the need for the daily adversarial tone of this House and hopefully improve the decorum of MPs.

Today almost every individual I talk to, young or old, tells me they are repulsed by the petty and childish actions of elected officials playing to the media, and particularly to the TV cameras in this House.

At this point my constituents, as I believe most Canadians, are very concerned about our economy. The public debt load and economic downturn have forced governments at all levels to make the tough decisions of raising taxes, cutting services or increasing deficits in order to continue to provide programs and services which all Canadians have come to enjoy and expect.

The harsh reality is that while municipal governments blame provincial governments for the lack of funding and provincial governments blame the federal government for the same woe, there exists only one taxpayer from whom to reap the revenue.

Governments of every level are realizing, albeit some more slowly than others, that responsible fiscal management is absolutely essential. It is most refreshing to hear the premier of British Columbia say: "You can't spend your way out of a recession".

Certainly there is much more to being a Canadian than economic considerations. However, we are failing Canadians who find it necessary to stay on social assistance generation after generation and many aboriginal people who live in Third World standards amid alcoholism and poverty. Our system must encourage and not discourage individual initiative.

Canadians who have fallen into the cycle of social assistance have had their work ethic destroyed by welfare just as socialism has destroyed communist ideology throughout the world.

The working poor of Canada are becoming more and more frustrated with the ever-diminishing fruits of their hard labour and business investments. Canadians are concerned with the economy, but in the end economic prosperity depends on national unity.

A divided country creates a climate of uncertainty, and political uncertainty leads to economic and social stagnation.

If we are wise as well as bold, we have an opportunity here at this moment to create a modern, efficient and dynamic Canada for a new century and beyond. As we debate and discuss the renewal of Canada's constitution, I feel that now more than ever it is important that we remember and consider the legacy left to Canada by the monarchy and the debt which we owe this part of our past for its contribution to Canada's distinctness in North America.

Unlike the United States and many other countries, Canada has been fortunate enough not to have to endure a civil war, largely thanks to our monarchy. The United Empire Loyalists who supported the monarchy permitted and encouraged the development of representative institutions to serve Canadians well.

It is certainly not my constituents' suggestion that we return to our past but I would urge all Canadians to appreciate and perhaps be guided by our heritage.

For over 200 years the Crown has given Canadians a common purpose. Today as we search to redefine that purpose we must not forget that legacy.

I have no hesitation in supporting Quebec's right to its culture, system of civil law, religion, language and traditions which were guaranteed in the Quebec Act of 1774. Any constitution should go a long way toward these definitions by simply recognizing what has been a reality since being provided by the Crown over 200 years ago.

Canada is graced with not one, but several distinct societies. The first is the native people, the original inhabitants of Canada who have participated in Canada's development through their efforts supporting the Crown in its resistance to countries such as the United States.

The second is the French inhabitants who brought to Canada their own system of culture and language and who have made an enormous contribution to Canada's unique identity in North America.

A third distinct group in Canada are the United Empire Loyalists who have also put their own stamp on the Canadian landscape, playing major roles in the founding heritage of Ontario and Nova Scotia and by bringing the system of law and government institutions which have endured to this very day.

Fourth, many cultures from around the world have made and are making Canada the best place in the world to live.

Hyphenated Canadianism is divisive. My own heritage is that of a United Empire Loyalist. My ancestors came from all over Europe, yet I am a Canadian, not a Dutch or German Canadian, or even a European Canadian, but a Canadian of European descent.

Canadians want a country that reflects the diversity of the regions and upholds the integrity of the whole.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member could file the rest of his speech with the Clerk.

Mr. Vankoughnet: All Canadians are very distinct in that they live in a society like no other certainly in North America, nor for that matter in the world.

However, the defining of what might make and what we might do separately, the respect for human rights, the freedom of speech, social solidarity, the harmony and the right of the individual to satisfy his or her basic needs, an attack on any part is destruction of what we know as a whole. We must not be a nation of navel gazers but we must offer objective assessments of what changes will be and a strong assessment of what changes should take place in a united Canada that are necessary in what is certainly a changing world.

Bilingualism in Canada should not mean all Canadians or all regions of Canada should speak two languages.

However, small post offices for example in my riding just this past week have been told that they cannot have their income tax forms because they do not happen to have the French forms because of printing delays. People in my riding feel that this is an aggravation and was not the intention of this regulation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member can file the balance of his speech with the Clerk.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I too wish to participate in this debate on constitutional renewal. The purpose is an agreement reached among the respective House Leaders of the different political parties in this House.

Over the last number of months, since the issue has been seized with the special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, I have met with many of my constituents who have voiced real concerns to me about the constitutional process and, more importantly, the substance with which we are dealing.

Many of my constituents believe that a number of the 28 proposals just ought not to be on the table for discussion. I would say a vast majority of my constituents with whom I have spoken believe it to be important that we as parliamentarians resolve the issue of constitutional renewal as expeditiously as possible. That is not to suggest that we expedite the process for the mere sake of expediting the process. It means that we do so with prudence. It means that we do so with sincerity. In the end, members of my constituency want to have this matter resolved and resolved forthwith.

When I travel the streets, when I go to the shopping malls, to Tim Horton's for a coffee, to the Legion to speak or at any of the functions which I attend, I have yet to have a constituent come up to me and say: "You know, I do not like that distinct society". I have yet to have a constituent come up to me and say: "You know, the declaratory power is kind of vague" or "I do not fully appreciate the consequential effect of the meaning of the inherent self-right of our aboriginal peoples". I have never received representations. I have never been questioned by my constituents on such specifics. I have been asked repeatedly where we are going with regard to the Constitution. We want Quebec. More importantly, we want the people of Quebec to remain members of the Canadian family.

I say this to my colleague opposite and I say so sincerely. The majority of my constituents want to see the people of Quebec remain in a renewed and united Canada. What they have been telling me about constitutional renewal is to get on with the task at hand.

I have in the past differed with Quebec governments and that may continue in the future, as it should, on whatever the issue may be. Surely as Canadians we can come to appreciate our differences, whatever they may be, wherever they may be in this country. The fellowship and the understanding that we as anglophone Canadians ought to have for francophone Canadians should be at the highest level.

Perhaps I say so because I am biased. I have family members who are of a francophone nature and I say so with great sincerity. Mr. Speaker, I have to tell you that my constituents, both on the issue of constitutional renewal and on expediting the process that we now have before us, have repeatedly on each and every occasion that I have met with them said: "What about the Canadian economy? When are you going to give to the people of Canada some real action with regard to the Canadian economy?"

As I said, I am not stopped in the coffee shops, at the Kinsman Club or at the various breakfasts or the dinners that I go to as their elected representative and asked specific legal questions, whether it be on the residual power, whether it be on the Council of the Federation. I am certainly asked about high unemployment. I am certainly asked about the medicare problems in this country. I am asked about the mobility of Canadians from coast to coast. That is what Canadians in my constituency are talking about.

That is not to suggest that constitutional renewal is not important. It is important and we must underline that. Equally so is the disunity within our country for a variety of reasons, one of which is the poor economic situation that Canadians find themselves in today.

I urge members from all political parties who are on the special joint committee to continue the process, to continue to do it with this maxim, which is in the best interest of all Canadians from coast to coast. Upon completion of that process, Quebecers, Newfoundlanders, people from out west, people from Ontario, people from all across this country, want us as members of Parliament, as representatives, to put the same time, the same energy, the same resources into resolving some of the most fundamental economic questions that this country has had to face in well over 100 years.

We must in the best interest of the country and also because of the people we serve have the same kind of enthusiasm and energy to provide action plans for resolving those problems that we have, as I have mentioned earlier, in medicare, to resolve some of the real underlying problems with regional inequalities, regional opportunities. That is what Canadians in my constituency have been telling me and telling me in very plain language.

Whether it be the unemployed steel worker, the displaced coal miner, the individual who is seeking to become part and parcel of an older workers' adjustment program, whether it be students who are seeking financial assistance to pursue their post-secondary education or better still seeking summer employment, they want the Parliament of Canada to work on their behalf.

I close with this, Mr. Speaker. I know governments when elected with a majority believe in their hearts that they have a mandate to implement measures which they believe to be important. I suggest to members opposite that one should be prudent about moving on matters which do not enjoy the support of Canadians from coast to coast.

I say that not because it is not prudent to do those kinds of things. I use as an example the GST. I talk about free trade. There are all sorts of other issues, but there is a limit to what Canadians will accept no matter what the government is.

I urge all my colleagues to keep the best interests of the country at heart so that we can come together as a nation and renew our federation by keeping Quebec within the Canadian family. Keeping the people of Quebec is more important than the Quebec government, just as the people of Nova Scotia are much more important than the government in Nova Scotia.

I am confident that with goodwill, prudent judgment and the willingness to compromise on behalf of us all that we can resolve our constitutional dilemma and get on with building a strong economy which I believe Canadians are equally concerned about and on which they want some concrete and specific action.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to be able to rise and participate in this debate on the historic crossroads at which we now find ourselves in attempting to draft a new Constitution for Canada.

I represent the constituency of Burnaby—Kingsway in British Columbia. I will be holding a public forum in my constituency this spring following the tabling of the parliamentary committee's proposals on the Constitution. At that time I hope to have an opportunity both to listen to my constituents and also to share with my constituents some of their concerns and my concerns with respect to the future of this country.

This evening I want to take the opportunity to speak not as the member of Parliament for Burnaby—Kingsway but to speak on behalf, if I may, of another constituency in this country, perhaps a broader national constituency which I have both the honour and the privilege of speaking on behalf of as the only openly gay member of this House.

In the years that I have had the privilege of representing Burnaby—Kingsway in this House, I have tried to give effect to the concerns and the aspirations of my constituents.

Tonight, I want to speak on behalf of the community of lesbians, of gay men and bisexuals in Canada who have deep concerns about our exclusion from the Constitution of Canada, our exclusion from a very fundamental element of the Constitution of Canada, the Canada clause.

[Translation]

I speak on behalf of the gay and lesbian community in Canada which represents about 10 per cent of the population: our children, brothers, sisters, parents, employees, friends and neighbours. We are everywhere in Canadian society. We have made a tremendous contribution which, sad to say, has gained recognition only now, during the AIDS epidemic. Many Canadians appreciated that contribution after hearing about artists, dancers, actors, musicians, choreographers and so many other men and women who died as a result of this epidemic.

[English]

I say on behalf of this community that I remember all too vividly what I proposed back in 1981 as a member of the Constitution committee, the inclusion of the words "sexual orientation" as a prohibited ground of discrimination in article 15 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I was told by members of the committee at that time—I will never forget these words—that we cannot include every barnacle and eavestrough in the Constitution of Canada. My amendment was defeated by a vote of 23 to 2.

I am not a barnacle, I am not an eavestrough and fortunately, in the intervening years, the courts of Canada have ruled that section 15 of the charter of rights must be implicitly read to include sexual orientation.

We are still waiting for the Government of Canada to finally show some leadership, to keep the promise that it made in 1986 to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to similarly include a prohibition of discrimination based on sexual orientation.

I want to take this opportunity to draw to the attention of the House and through the House to the members of the special joint committee on the Constitution of Canada a profound and glaring weakness in the proposals which are before that committee. I speak of the proposals with respect to the Canada clause. In the Canada clause proposals the government has stated that the purpose of the Canada clause is to "affirm the identity and aspirations of the people of Canada".

In its present form, the Canada clause refers to a commitment to fairness, openness and full participation in Canada's citizenship by all people without regard to race, colour, creed, physical or mental disability or cultural background. Those are all very important grounds which should be included in the Canada clause. Those grounds exclude sexual orientation. They exclude my community and they exclude hundreds of thousands of Canadians who happen to be lesbian, gay or bisexual.

By excluding us, by rendering us once again invisible, we are denied our role in the formation of Canadian identity. As Professor Cynthia Petersen of the Faculty of Law at the University of Ottawa has pointed out in her brief, which I will be tabling shortly: "The proposed Canada clause does not constitute a full description of Canadians as a people because it ignores the participation of an important segment of the country's population".

I would urge the committee to recognize this injustice, to recognize what I hope is an oversight and to amend the Canada clause to include the words "sexual orientation". There have been many similar representations which have been made to the committee.

I am going to be tabling briefs which have been submitted by the University of Ottawa Faculty of Law, by the Association of Lesbians and Gays of Ottawa, by the group Parents and Friends of Lesbians and Gays, the AIDS Committee of Ottawa, a school trustee in Toronto, Catholic priests in Ottawa, the British Columbia Public Interest Advocacy Centre and many others.

I know that at the most recent constitutional conference in Toronto there was strong support for the inclusion of sexual orientation in the Canada clause and a number of workshops adopted that proposal unanimously.

The B.C. Council of Churches has urged the government and the committee to move forward on this.

The group, Parents and Friends of Lesbians and Gays, submitted a very eloquent brief to the parliamentary committee in which they pointed out that social permission that already exists in our society to regard homosexuality in a derogatory light is further reinforced by the silence of the Canada clause on sexual orientation.

Parents and Friends of Lesbians and Gays point out that we are excluding their children and all the other homosexuals who make up about 10 per cent of the population.

One of the more eloquent letters that I received came from a woman in Halifax, Nova Scotia who wrote to the committee and said:

> It has come to my attention that I have been left out of the draft Canada clause. My families, on both sides, have resided in Canada for seven generations, but this clause, proposed in order "to affirm the identity and aspirations of the people of Canada" has ignored me—I hope the committee will reconsider the Canada clause and add sexual orientation to the list.
> After seven generations of roots in Canada, and my own life of contribution to the country, please don't leave me out just because my life partner is a woman. Our love for each other harms no one, and should not be the basis for exclusion from our country's citizenship.

At this critical time in our nation's history, when we are seeking to bring in as many Canadians as possible, I would hope that the committee would recognize it is important, indeed essential, that we include those Canadians who happen to be lesbian, gay or bisexual as well in this statement which reflects all of Canada.

I say this at a time when there is too much hatred, too much violence directed at lesbians and gay men. As the Parents and Friends of Lesbians and Gays have pointed out, the most hateful lie of all is the lie that somehow deals with homosexuals as being child abusers. It is a lie, a despicable lie which has been broadcast by a member of this House, the hon. member for Scarborough West, in a letter that he sent to all members of this House, an example of hate literature in which he urges members of the House not to include sexual orientation either in the Constitution or in the human rights code because he said this will lead to the recognition of paedophilia.

I would hope that his colleagues in the Liberal caucus and indeed the leader of the Liberal Party would speak out and make it clear that this man does not speak on behalf of the Liberal caucus and the Liberal Party and that he will be removed from any responsible position within that caucus.

In closing, I want to pay tribute to the men and women from across Canada, from coast to coast to coast, who have written to the parliamentary committee urging it and the government to recognize that we as lesbians, gay men and bisexuals will not be excluded from the Constitution. We urge the government and the committee to ensure that the Canada clause does in fact include sexual orientation.

I have the honour of tabling, pursuant to the provisions of the Standing Order, a number of briefs and letters which have been submitted to both me and the committee urging the committee to ensure that this injustice is remedied.

Mr. Allan Koury (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak this evening during the special debate on the Constitution, to inform hon. members of the views of my constituents in Hochelaga—Maisonneuve.

"Shaping Canada's Future Together". We tend to see the government as a static institution, as a machine that was built and put into service a long time ago. Our democratic system exists thanks to its citizens and, like them, keeps growing and developing.

Today's Canada is not like the Canada of 1867, any more than its constituent legislation, which has been amended many times by the citizens of this country. The way we govern ourselves depends on how the courts interpret the Constitution, on our customs and on agreements between provincial legislatures and the federal government on the exercise of their respective powers.

These elements, which allowed our country to develop, continue to do so, providing a great deal of flexibility, and, under the present Constitution, make it possible to conclude a host of agreements with certain provinces and regions, without the risk of being bound by one special agreement that might not have worked.

Many other changes will probably occur. The process is already under way. In the case of the distinct society, it has slowly evolved throughout the first hundred years of Confederation, or, as in the case of the social charter concept and an equitable Senate, it is merely a glimmer on the horizon. As in all parliamentary systems, these changes will not be the work of a single government and will probably give rise to stormy debate, but I hope that finally, the majority will agree to these changes.

We are concerned about relations between French Canadians and English Canadians and the division of powers between the federal government and the provinces. These issues have always been on the agenda, and the search for common ground and a way to adjust to the current situation have been constant in this process. The recognition of the French Fact, limited at first in 1867, now affects Canada at various degrees.

Is Quebec a distinct society? This question many of you are asking yourselves deserves an answer. There are people who wonder why the government insists on entrenching in the Constitution the recognition of the distinctiveness of Quebec society, while others are convinced that such recognition will give Canadians an inferior status. We must demystify this proposal, the intent of which is simply to acknowledge a sociological and political reality.

First of all, it must be pointed out that it is only one among the 28 proposals the government has put forward. The recognition of Quebec's distinctiveness was proposed in an attempt to meet the expressed needs of that province for recognition and respect, while at the same time preserving the fundamental equality of all provinces and all citizens.

The idea is to reaffirm that we approve and respect Quebec's distinctiveness. The preservation and promotion of the French language in Quebec and the distinctiveness of our culture cannot be taken for granted by Canadians whose mother tongue is not threatened.

Canadians should be reminded of the institutional refuge provided by Quebec for six million of my fellow French-Speaking citizens and of its powers as first line of defence against the power of assimilation exercised by the 300 million other North Americans around us. In this context, by recognizing the distinct character of Quebec society in the Constitution, we are not granting Quebecers anything that other Canadians do not already have. This acknowledgement only ensures fairness.

Should we opt for the Canadian solution or a sovereign Quebec? In the end, Quebecers and Canadians will have to choose between a Canada in which Quebec can find a suitable place and a sovereign Quebec, which would mean the end of Canada as we know it. There are people who are in a hurry to push Quebec out of Canada and tell Quebecers things like: "Move out of there quick, but bring the furniture along". Indeed it would seem that illusion mongers have made a strange discovery, they have realized that Quebecers want to keep their Canadian citizenship, their Canadian passports, that they are quite happy with the economic and political system that has provided them with one of the best standards of living in the world, second to only one other country, that they are confident in their currency and are proud of their history.

Well, our country makers thought of a clever plan. Let's separate, they say, and keep from Canada whatever we like, whatever serves our own interest. Very original! How can we take seriously those who want independence for Quebec, but who say: Canada is unacceptable, however we want to keep the Canadian dollar; Canada is unacceptable, however we want to keep the Canadian passport and the Canadian citizenship.

Quebec's future within our federation must concern all Canadians. Our problem is that one quarter of our population, living in the strategic center of the country, wonders if we want them there, if they should leave. Therefore we are challenged to react to this possibility and find a way to allow Quebec to preserve and promote its own distinct society. However, those who believe that to ask the question that way is a form of blackmail, those who think this is all a bluff are dangerously mistaken.

The economic unity of Canada concerns not only big companies, merchants and bankers. We all suffer when commercial barriers between the provinces are higher than those between European countries. This goes way beyond profits, it affects employment and consumer prices. Our potential is that of our descendants.

They challenge us to find solutions to this problem, and to find them together. According to polls, the Canadian people want the constitutional review to take a back step to the economic issue because of the exceptional seriousness of the recession and its consequences. If this was a brand new issue, nobody would object to this way of thinking. Unfortunately, the constitutional issue has been around for so long that it is now closely linked to the future of our economy. There cannot be of course the necessary confidence for a real economic recovery as long as the political uncertainty resulting from the constitutional deadlock prevails. It would be a mistake to believe that investment decisions can be taken when, because of the incertainty about the future, the rules of the game remain unknown. In Quebec, our economy had already suffered enough before the 1980 referendum and since the failure of the Meech Lake accord for us to consider putting off the question once again.

I now ask all Canadian men and women to think about all that we have accomplished together and to all that we risk losing with the splitting up of this country. Citizenship does not offer only advantages, it also brings some responsibility. How could we tell our parents, who have passed on to us with pride and confidence one of the most beautiful country in the world: "I have not been able to pass on your inheritance to your grand-children. Because of negligence, weariness and apprehension, our generation has turned its back on a glorious past and has given up a brilliant future."

To love Canada, to want to make it better is not a denial of our Quebec origin nor of our pride in our roots. On the contrary. Who are the people today who serve best the interests of their fellow countrymen? Are those the men and women who want to build an even better and more prosperous Canada for their children to enjoy, a Canada within which Quebec may continue to develop safely and freely? Are they the ones who want to split up and weaken Canad, those who want to isolate Quebec and shake its economy, those who build or those who sulk?

In Canada, we always go for the peaceful solutions. Peoples of the world admire us for that quality that our ancestors valued. We have to build a better country with a better solution to save this great country. It is our blessing, our present to the people around us, our duty towards ourselves and the future generations.

[English]

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to participate in this special debate in the House of Commons tonight.

As a member of Parliament I like to keep my ear close to the ground. I like to be listening to what my constituents of Winnipeg—St. James are saying. In the next few minutes I want to offer what I have been hearing from my constituents.

First of all, I would say that within my constituency on this issue of constitutional remaking and the renewal of Canada, there is a lot of good will and a lot of generosity.

My constituents of Winnipeg—St. James feel a bit more comfortable with the constitutional process now than they did with the process during the Meech Lake debate. I think it is mainly because this process is a bit more open. They feel that there is an opportunity for Canadians to provide input, as opposed to Meech Lake where most of it was done behind closed doors. There is that improvement. I am glad to report that.

I can tell you from what I have heard from my constituents in Winnipeg—St. James. They do not want Canada to break up. They do not.

I hear very little of the phrase: "Well, let Quebec go". I heard quite a bit of that a couple of years ago out of frustration and out of concern about where the country was going. I do not hear a lot of it now.

They do not want the country to break up. Canadians really love their country. They really do. They are not very flashy about it. They are not very demonstrative about it, but if you scratch them a little they will show they indeed love this country.

With respect to this constitutional crisis—and that is what it is when the future of the country hangs in the balance, we have a crisis—my constituents are telling me: "Let us get this thing settled. Let us get this work done. Let us get on with the job because it is dragging us down as a country. It is dragging us down as a people." This wrangling, this constant talking about the Constitution is hurting all aspects of Canadian life. So they are saying: "Settle it. Settle it quickly and let us get on to other things, for example the economy".

When I take a stroll down Portage Avenue, a major artery that goes through my constituency, I can assure you that if I am stopped by 20 constituents and those 20 constituents have some political issues on their minds, 19 out of the 20 will be talking about the economy. They see the unravelling of the economy. They do not like the direction it has taken in the last several years. They want us politicians, especially the politicians on the other side of the House belonging to the government, to seriously tackle the economic issues facing this country. That is the number one issue.

However, my constituents understand you can do wonders with the Canadian economy, but at the end of the day if you do not have a country, all is for naught. We have wasted our time.

So we do have to deal with the constitutional issue. Unfortunately, we have had this terrible convergence of two crises, a constitutional crisis on one side and an economic crisis on the other. Usually one crisis is enough for any country. Canada is in this terrible situation of having two crises coming together at the same time. It makes for an unbelievable burden.

I have faith in the country. I have faith in the people that somehow we will make it. It is going to be a close call, but we will make it. That is what I hear from my constituents.

One of the other things that my constituents tell me is that they see this as a top–down crisis. This is not a crisis in Canada that is percolating up from the masses, from the working people. This has been created largely by a group of elite in this country, academics, politicians, media people, who have made an industry or a business out of the Constitution. I sometimes wonder whether any fiddling and any changes in the Constitution will satisfy these people.

A lot of people, especially in my constituency, are very frustrated with these people who constantly badger us about the Constitution. That does not in any way detract from some of the real problems. I am not advocating status quo insofar as the Constitution is concerned. There is a limit to what can be done with the Constitution.

My constituents in Winnipeg—St. James are saying that they do not expect all 28 elements in the current package to survive this current round of negotiations or debate. They expect a package with fewer elements, something in the line of four or five. Let me touch on these elements.

There is no doubt about it that from my end of the country they want Senate reform and that has to be in the package. They want Senate reform to give the west a larger voice at the centre. I do not think the people in the west are interested in building up their capitals. They want a strong central government, but they want to be a major player in that central government in this reshaped Parliament. That is why they want an elected Senate, that is why they want an effective Senate, that is why they want an equitable Senate. If we do not get Senate reform, I do not think we are going to get a deal.

The distinct society is so important to our friends in Quebec. There is no doubt that some time ago, particularly when the term distinct society came on the scene, there were a number of western Canadians and constituents in my riding who felt a little uncomfortable because they interpreted it as being a declaration that Quebec was special. With the focus now on distinct society, I think the people now realize that what it is in the main is a recognition of difference.

Quebec is different. It has its civil code, it has its culture and it has its language. There is a difference. That is what the distinct society more or less is all about; it is about recognizing that difference and helping Quebec to preserve that difference or distinctiveness.

There are still concerns out there that it is possible the distinct society clause could be misused by some future Quebec government. So there are still concerns about how it would fit into the charter and how it would fit into the Constitution.

Most western Canadians have enough generosity that if they feel that it will be used in a positive way to preserve the difference of Quebec, the culture, the civil code and the language, and will not be used against certain people in the province of Quebec, they can accept it. I think generosity and good will will accept it.

Western Canadians accept the inherent right of aboriginal people to self-government. They accept that in broad general terms, but they certainly want to know a lot more about it.

With respect to the division of powers, my constituents in Winnipeg—St. James, if I understand what they are telling me, are saying: "Yes, we will look at a new arrangement of powers as long as it does not come at the expense of a strong national government". They want a strong national government, but they will look at some re-arrangements of powers. After all, what they want is whichever government can do the best job. Sometimes it will be the provincial government or sometimes the federal government, but they do not want the powers of a strong national government diminished.

In conclusion, just let me say that my constituents are saying that if we get through this crisis, and I think we will and they think that as well, let us not allow it to happen again.

We have to start selling Confederation and federalism in this country called Canada to ourselves in a better way. To a great extent federalism is in trouble because we have never sold it. A lot of people do not understand it or we have just taken it for granted that it would be there forever.

Let us learn some lessons from this debate.

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this tremendous and special opportunity to address the Chamber and Canadians in all four directions of this great land.

If I may, I would do this first as one who represents Wetaskiwin, which in Cree means hills of peace in ka kanadak, our clean land. At the outset I want to thank our Prime Minister and our minister for national unity for allowing me to serve with 29 other outstanding Canadians on the special joint committee on a renewed Canada. Our hearings and the recent conferences have allowed us an opportunity to listen to many, many views from concerned leaders and citizens who all want to build a stronger and more united Canada.

The views of my constituents on all of the 28 government proposals have been presented to me both personally and by correspondence. A questionnaire was circulated in my riding at the beginning of January. In it I asked my constituents to respond to the government's initiative by expressing their agreement—strong agreement, disagreement, strong disagreement or indecision—with the proposals and providing personal comments. At the present time we have received over 250 responses to the questionnaire and I am hoping we will continue to receive further input. Several of my constituents have expressed how pleased they have been to have the opportunity to respond to the proposals directly and to make their views known.

If I may, I would now like to report by way of summary the percentage of those constituents who agree with the federal proposals.

Proposal No. 1, 73 per cent; 3, 81 per cent; 4, 50 per cent; 6, 64 per cent, 7, 52 per cent; 8, 86 per cent; 9, 70 per cent; 10, 72 per cent; 11, 75 per cent; 12, 82 per cent; 14, 79 per cent; proposal 15, 56 per cent; 16, 73 per cent; 17, 84 per cent; 19, 60 per cent; 20, 63 per cent; 21, 74 per cent; 22, 79 per cent; 24, 86 per cent; 25, 65 per cent; 26, 83 per cent; 74 per cent for proposal 27; and 28, 64 per cent.

I concluded my questionnaire with a 29th question, which read: "If the proposals that I agree with are achieved, then I will accept the proposals I disagree with". 148 respondents disagreed with this statement, 63 agreed and another 30 were undecided.

As is evidenced by the preceding statistics, the majority of people who responded to the questionnaire supported almost all of the proposals in part 1 of the package. Notably, one of my constituents made the helpful suggestion that the word "tolerance" in the Canada clause phrase "the importance of tolerance for individuals, groups and communities" be replaced with the word "respect".

There was again a majority of support for the proposals outlined in both part 2 and part 3 of the federal package. There was significant agreement with both House of Commons and Senate reform. There were also a substantial number of comments made on the need to provide the west with greater political power and on the issue of transfer of power to the provinces.

After mentioning the general support that exists in my riding for many of the proposals, I feel it is important to acknowledge the strong disagreement that was expressed with regard to proposal No. 2, recognition of Quebec's distinctiveness and Canada's linguistic duality. The sentiment of equality of the provinces and the view that no province should receive special status was repeatedly expressed. Proposal 5 regarding aboriginal constitutional process was the other proposal which did not receive a majority of support.

Since the Four Nations of Hobbema are in my riding, I sought several meetings with the chiefs and councils to listen to their views. Unfortunately for me, they decided to reject all the proposals, preferring instead to support the Assembly of First Nations' position.

In a recent letter, one of my constituents wrote that if he disagrees with something it has to be proven to him that his position is wrong, that I should not just expect him to accept it. Thus, I would like to try and briefly respond to some of the concerns my constituents have expressed. I speak only as an individual member of Parliament who is also a treaty Indian when I share different quotes which express what I would like to say.

I recall the first meeting the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs had with the National Chiefs when an elder, Chief Peter O'Chiese, said: "We have to lift each other up". That to me has since been of great significance during all our hearings, as have the four great values of honesty, kindness, sharing and strength. These values could perhaps be reflected in our Canada clause along with reference to the Great Spirit.

Perhaps too our preamble could state, as Lord Denning said in the 1970s in a court case in London, that no government can break the treaties as long as the sun shines, the grass grows and the rivers flow. My own dad, a World War II veteran, used to say that these are the three principles on which our great country was built.

Mr. Speaker, I know you and my rodeo colleagues in the gallery tonight will agree with what I am about to say. The sport community in Canada also has a tremendous contribution to make to the issue of national unity. What is that fantastic feeling and positive spirit we have all experienced when we succeed as an athlete? That feeling is being Canadian. Coincidentally, we will all share that positive winner's feeling again during the next two weeks in Albertville when an athlete wins a medal or does their personal best on our behalf.

I am reminded of an outstanding brief I received from Margaret Barber of the Sports Federation of Canada. In her paper entitled "National Unity Through Sport", Barber writes that: "Canada identifies with its athletes, with its sports. Canada as a nation has been fortunate to count among its members some of the world's finest athletes both past and present. Those athletes came from a melting pot of cultures and backgrounds. They are by virtue of their diversity truly Canadian. The power of sport is real". She said: "There are a multitude of lessons to be learned as a nation from sports; understanding, tolerance, acceptance, respect, cultural identity, the ability to experience and share without losing that which makes each of us unique and individual. Perhaps it is time in light of the present problems facing the nation and our concerns on national unity to make better use of sport to understand ourselves as a nation and indeed to help keep us together".

A couple of days ago athlete Sylvie Daigle was selected to be a flag bearer in Albertville. She was quoted as saying: "I came here for Canada. Yes, it is hard but at the same time, we are all one country here. And if you win a medal it is for Canada".

Earlier at the 1984 Olympic Games in Los Angeles Alwyn Morris, the only indigenous athlete to win an Olympic Gold, held high an eagle feather.

Barber's brief echoes the sentiment that this image of success evokes: "If you have it in you to dream, you have it in you to succeed". She continues: "If you have enough dreamers left in Canada, perhaps we have enough left in us as a nation to succeed in our efforts to retain and strengthen our own national unity and identity. Perhaps sport can help us turn these dreams into reality".

In conclusion, I want to declare my belief that this constitutional process will succeed. In the words of a citizen from Leduc: "I cannot express to you how important the successful conclusion of this endeavour is to myself, my family, my country".

At a time when our country looks at itself to determine what make us uniquely Canadian, my daughter, Teddi, wrote the following words to help me in a poem called "The Rainbow":

Long before Columbus
Our grandfathers spoke of
The white from the north
The black from the south
The yellow from the east
The red from the west
Hundreds of years later
We live together
but not in harmony
Why can't we be like the rainbow?
Red, orange, yellow, green, blue, indigo, and violet
All one in peace with its own identity
No conflict, no war, no prejudice
Like the rainbow.

I believe we will come through 1992 and into the future as winners by dreaming of success, by focusing on our common strengths and by recalling positive feelings of sharing kindness and respect.

As a young person, Mr. Speaker, we have all probably tried to walk on one rail along the railway tracks. It is difficult. Yet if a friend walks along the parallel track and you hold hands together you find you can walk for miles together. Perhaps it is because you truly help each other by lifting each other up.

In this Canada round I believe just as when an athlete wins, when Quebec wins, when an Indian wins, all of Canada wins.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have this opportunity to bring to the House of Commons the views of my constituents as they have expressed them to me in a number of forms and forums over the last year and more. I want to begin by saying that, as with the debate in this House, the debate in Ottawa West is optimistic and pessimistic, full of hope and full of despair, but marked by a great will to keep Canada together.

The views on how we can do that differ as much as they would among any of us in this Chamber, but the will to keep Canada together is the strong and binding thread through all the submissions I have heard in person, in meetings, by phone, by letter.

My first couple of opportunities to discuss the Constitution in a concerted way with constituents was in two visits to schools. I thank those young people particularly for taking the initiative to organize the kinds of sessions where they were focusing on what they wanted the country to be for their future. They felt strongly that the diversity of this country, whether it is French and English, different cultures, different races from different places, the different geography of our country, the different regions of our country, are all something that is part of their Canadianism. They do not identify being Canadian with being somebody who happens to live in this particular region. The message I got very clearly from them was that all of Canada is part of their own identity.

They, too, like everybody else I have heard from had very differing views and I am sure it will come as no surprise to anybody in this House who has been talking to and listening to their constituents that aboriginal concerns and environmental concerns are at the top of the agenda for young people as they are for other Canadians.

We developed questionnaires that were distributed twice in the constituency, once to a group by mail and second, made available to everybody in Ottawa West through the means of my householder. We have had over 700 responses to that householder questionnaire. We have done an analysis of both groups of questionnaires.

What was a little more difficult to analyse was the time that hundreds of people took to write down their own thoughts, sometimes in a brief note, a brief comment on the questionnaire, sometimes in a letter of many pages, sometimes in a full brief, which a number of them have submitted to the committee. I think this level of response indicated a community that has been always very conscious of its role as the nation's capital. Yes, it is a community distinct from its federal role. I know it is hard for people outside the national capital region to realize that, that there really is a community of three-quarters of a million people here, the vast majority of whom have very little to do with the federal government and certainly nothing to do with the vision that the word "Ottawa" creates anywhere east of the Ottawa River or west of the Ottawa River, outside this region.

As someone who has grown up in this community, I can tell you that the sense of responsibility as the nation's capital and the sense of pride as the nation's capital is strong in this region. We have been proud to develop in our community the ability to deliver services in both official languages long before many communities across this country.

We have been proud to promote the diversity of cultures that are represented in our community and to give them means and vehicles to communicate with one another and with the community at large and to respect those diversities in the delivery of public services.

We have also recognized that we have a role to play in Canada. We have a role to demonstrate that here in the nation's capital many different groups from many different backgrounds, from the two founding language groups of this country and including our aboriginal people, can live in peace and in harmony and can make this a stronger and better community as a result.

Those feelings were all reflected in the responses we received to over 700 questionnaires. We asked people what was important to recognize about the nature of Canada. Almost without exception the rights and freedoms of individuals as recognized in the charter were important to people.

Second most important was the role of aboriginal peoples in Canada.

We drop down a bit then to the importance of recognizing the equalization of economic opportunities among regions; again a great commitment to the diversity of Canada, to our differences, but to our right to share equally in the wealth of the country.

Recognition of two official languages was important. The diversity of cultural heritage was important. The distinctiveness of our regions was less important. I think that reflects a very strong bias in this community to the wholeness of Canada. Our diversity is important but less important than our wholeness.

People were asked how important they thought it was for the federal government to be able to set national policies and standards on certain issues. The environment was inevitably number one, with virtually 100 per cent saying that the federal government has got to be responsible for the environment.

We set up a special constitutional discussion in Ottawa West on the environment and the Constitution because people were seriously concerned that the constitutional proposals virtually ignored the environment. They were concerned about the impact of property rights, the federal government's ability and the ability of all of us to work together as individuals and as governments at all levels to protect our environment.

They were concerned that the proposal for the economic union ignored the whole concept of sustainable development, of integrating whatever we do economically with the protection of our environment and the preservation of our resources for future generations.

In only a few moments I cannot possibly do justice to the wealth of concern for our country and love for our country that I have heard expressed from the people in Ottawa West in the last year and more. What they are looking for is leadership. They are looking for us to put aside the differences that they feel are superficial to the continuity of Canada. They want us to make that our number one goal. They want that because Canada is important to them. They also want it because we have other issues we must get on with—and they want us to get on with them—such as child poverty, unemployment, developing Canada's scientific basis to create more and better economic opportunities in the future.

I know time is short, and so I simply want to conclude by saying that I share the view I have heard from the vast majority of my constituents. Certainly there have been diverging opinions and there have been some unpleasant opinions expressed, but they are all important and they all have to be taken into consideration.

For me, my country is not Canada without Quebec, and I am not a Canadian in a country without Quebec.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to acquaint this House with the opinions of my constituents from Saint-Hubert and their analysis of the future of Quebec in general and the proposals of the federal government in particular.

I must say at the outset that to a number of my constituents the refusal of English Canada to sign the Meech Lake Accord was interpreted as a clear and simple rejection of the distinct society in one of the two founding nations of this country. My constituents cannot accept the status quo, nor offers which would be inferior to those of the Meech Lake Accord. When they look at the constitutional future of Quebec, they do not focus solely on economic considerations. They have a clear and broad understanding of the issues, and are conscious of the differences of opinion, but they are also tired of the continuous misunderstanding in English Canada.

Mr. Speaker, for the Quebecers in my riding of Saint-Hubert, the failure of the Meech Lake Accord, the tabling of the federal proposals and the comments heard during the various conferences and consultations confirm an unreconcilable evidence. We are faced with a totally different view of the territory on which two nations co-exist, against their will, for historical reasons. For my constituents, this unreconcilable difference is evident in many respects.

First of all, English Canadians want a strong central government in Ottawa. Quebecers want a strong government in Quebec City; English Canadians want to centralise powers in Ottawa, Quebecers want to centralize them in Quebec City; English Canadians want a country where everybody uses English as the language of communications; Quebecers want to live, work and create in French.

English Canadians have their culture, their theatre, their cinema and their television. Quebecers also have their culture, their theatre, their cinema and their television. English Canadians have a deep affection for the Queen and her family, for the British monarchy, which they consider very important. Quebecers have no interest whatsoever for that institution, particularly when the Governor General is unilingual English. English Canadians are proud to be Canadians. Quebecers identify themselves with Quebec and are proud to be Quebecers. English Canadians consider that Labrador is part of Newfoundland. Quebecers still consider that territory as belonging to Quebec.

The list is long, Mr. Speaker, and could go on and on. This exercise may seem tedious to you, but it is important and necessary if we want to fully understand what my constituents say, particularly when they claim that the existing proposals of the federal government are meaningless, that they are not formal proposals and that we should not even waste our time dealing with them.

In fact, these proposals which Ottawa made in September, are another blatant example of what is irreconcilable. The leader of the Bloc Quebecois, Lucien Bouchard, was the first to sound the alarm, to point out the Machiavellian power grabbing by the central government which led Quebecers to believe its proposals were fabulous.

When the president of Sun Life of Canada considers the federal proposals reasonable and attractive, any good Quebecer must not only be puzzled, but very, very suspicious, and he or she must look twice at these proposals. Indeed, John Gardner, president of the Sun Life Insurance of Canada stated, last November 8, that the federal proposals were, and I quote: "a reasonable and attractive initiative".

Quebecers in my riding, like all Quebecers in general, cannot be fooled. For them, Ottawa's proposals represent a considerable retreat from Meech, for three reasons. First, the distinct society clause is now entrenched in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms as a constructive rule applicable only to the Charter, while in Meech it was applicable to the entire Constitution.

Second, the Canada clause, section 2 of the Constitution, lists several characteristics including, in sixth place, a basic responsibility for Quebec to preserve and promote its distinct society. This section is being diluted and will virtually have no effect, except a vague constructive effect, like that of a preamble.

Third, a limitative definition of the concept of a distinct society is given—language, culture and civil law—which of course restricts its scope.

When I talked with my constituents, I clearly received the following message: Put forward some demands for Quebec, we want more powers. That is essentially what they told me.

Thus, when we examine the federal proposals concerning the distribution of powers, we see that in general no new power is given to Quebec, contrary to the recommendations of the Allaire and Bélanger–Campeau reports, except labour force training, which will be subject to federal standards which will be established pursuant to the new powers to manage the economic union.

In its proposal No. 24, the federal government only recognizes provincial authority in areas in which the provinces already have exclusive jurisdiction, namely tourism, forestry, mining, recreation, housing and municipal/urban affairs. Furthermore, within this framework, the federal government even says it is committed to research and development in Canada and to its constitutional obligations towards international and native affairs.

In conclusion, the federal proposals are less than Meech. Meech already was a minimum, as everyone said, including Robert Bourassa and Gil Rémillard. It amounts to a reduction of the distinct society clause, and a limitation of its interpretation in the Charter. There is no more constitutional guarantee that Quebec will have three judges on the Supreme Court's bench. There is no more veto for Quebec. In short, as was so well put by one of my constituents: "We have been had since the very beginning of our history, that is since 125 years, and history repeats itself. We are given candies in exchange for meat."

For my constituents the solution to this constitutional debate is clear: Quebec wants its independence, its sovereignty. Quebecers want control over their own destiny and their own values. They want to exercise exclusive control not only over their cultural affairs but also over their social, political and economic affairs. The citizens of my constituency have understood that they need a sovereign state in order to have respect for their differences, their distinct character and their culture.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The next four speakers will be the hon. member for Edmonton East, the hon. member for Red Deer, the hon. member for Acadie—Bathurst, and the hon. member for St. Albert.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I left Vancouver with my family at the age of eight. We moved south into the United States. My dad took us down there because he had a job there. We did not move far, only about 100 miles maybe, down to a town call Everett, about 25 miles north of Seattle. That is where Boeing 747s are made.

I entered grade three there and was immediately confronted with new classmates urging me to speak some Canadian for them. I jabbered glossolaliacally, as best my eight-year old imagination would allow, and that seemed to satisfy them. I made some friends and some of them became very good friends.

I lived in the United States for a total of six years. During that time I saw many things, not all of which I understood with my young mind. The things that I saw included tremendous acts of generosity by individual Americans toward their fellows. I watched on the television screen as that nation slowly descended into the black dementia of the imperial war in Vietnam. I watched on the television screen as elements within that society shot and killed some of its finest. I watched some of the friends I made in school growing up anticipating entry into the American Armed Forces and cultivating, therefore, a series of attitudes that they thought appropriate to that fate, attitudes that ran the gamut from personal courage and self-reliance on the one hand to the most appalling forms of racism and ethnic hatred on the other.

For me, those six years were a period of intense learning and reflection because I never lost the feeling that I, although being among these people, was not of them, that I was something different. Being a Canadian set me apart in the United States.

When my family came back to Canada, to Edmonton, on December 1, 1966 I remember to this day crossing the border for what was to be a long time and the tremendous sense of relief and well-being that I felt as the car crossed the little border point in southern Alberta. We proceeded up roads I had never travelled before through winter far deeper and colder than anything I had experienced before to what was to be our new home.

That experience as a child has indelibly marked me. It has left me with a passion for the preservation of that which preserved me as a youth, which is to say that Canadian identity, whatever it may be, served almost as my cocoon in those six years I lived in the United States.

One of the reasons I sought election as a New Democrat was seeing what is being done to my Canada, the future that is being shaped for it by those who now rule in this country and seeing what I still believe is the pursuit of a course that can only end in catastrophe for this country.

I do not believe that the majority of Canadians, given the choice to express themselves, would willingly go down the road that this government and other provincial governments in this country have mapped. I believe that given the time to reflect thoughtfully on the problems confronting the country, Canadians will come to reasonable, workable solutions.

It is on the basis of that belief that I mounted a two-day constituent assembly in Edmonton East.

After several invitations had been sent out, invitations to every person in the riding through the vehicle of the householder, 21 persons and five organization representatives filled in the ballots, out of the 36 persons and 15 organizations that attended. In addition, of the 84 ballots mailed 16 had been returned by January 7, which is the deadline I had to set in order to get the report ready to present to the standing committee.

I will not read the entire report because I do not have time and because quite frankly hon. members can read it for themselves, but I would like to convey some highlights. First, of those 42 who turned back ballots, 76 per cent want a reformed Senate. There is no surprise there. Fifty-five per cent favour the Triple-E model, but 40 per cent opted for a Senate elected by proportional representation. Sixty-two per cent said any reformed Senate should have the same powers it has now.

With regard to aboriginal peoples, 76 per cent said amendments to the Constitution affecting aboriginal peoples should only happen with the consent of those peoples. There was strong agreement, 71 per cent, that there should be a commitment to the entrenchment of aboriginal peoples' inherent right to self-government in the Constitution.

Almost two-thirds of all respondents thought sexual equality guarantees in the charter should be extended to cover the entire Constitution, and only 26 per cent wanted to ditch the so-called notwithstanding clause. Fifty-eight per cent wanted to keep it in some form or other.

Half rejected the federal government's plan to grant itself new powers to ensure the efficient functioning of the economic union, but the proposal to narrow the Bank of Canada's mandate to strictly that of fighting inflation was rejected by 60 per cent.

The idea of guarantees of collective rights of the sort found in the so-called social charter was endorsed by 60 per cent of the respondents, with only 26 per cent opposed. The endorsement per cent of these guarantees is as follows: clean air and water, 62 per cent; minimum standard of living, 60 per cent; decent health care, 60 per cent; a right to an education and a job, 60 per cent.

Almost the same level of support, 57 per cent, was expressed for the use of referenda and again 57 per cent of the respondents liked the idea of recall.

Sixty-four per cent opposed property rights for corporations and although 52 per cent thought property rights for individuals was a good idea, 72 per cent agreed that even if such rights were enshrined they should be subject to being overridden in cases of expropriation for socially necessary purposes.

Alberta has been in the news a great deal of late because of the remarks of our premier regarding bilingualism and multiculturalism. The majority, 53 per cent, thought bilingualism should be reviewed. However, only 29 per cent thought it should be eliminated and 34 per cent thought it should be kept as is or expanded.

Similarly with multiculturalism, 38 per cent said eliminate it, but 19 per cent said it should be kept with restrictions, and 28 per cent said it should be kept or expanded. A total of 47 per cent said keep it in some form.

In this regard, the premier of Alberta does not speak for my constituents.

Last, I should note that almost two-thirds of the respondents rejected the contention that Quebec should have a different constitutional relationship with the rest of Canada.

I do not agree with that. However, it is my duty to present that to this House. It is my duty to present it to the constitutional committee, which I have done. I would like to table the full report of our constituent assembly and I will cheerfully provide individual copies to any member who would request one.

Let me close by saying the Canada that served me so well in my youth continues to serve me and my family, my friends and loved ones. It is a Canada that I believe must change to survive and grow. I believe that survival, that growth, is of fundamental importance to those who will come after us. I believe that they too have every right to enjoy the security that being a Canadian affords us all and that has served me so well.

I pray we in this House, we in this country, have the wisdom to find the path to that new growth.

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate and report the views of Canadians in my riding of Red Deer.

What we are doing tonight is something that should happen in this Chamber far more often. A common concern expressed very strongly to me when I go home is the question: "Why do individuals members of Parliament not better represent people like me? Why aren't my views expressed on the floor of the House of Commons?" This debate allows that. Individual members of Parliament are reflecting and reporting the views of their constituents on the Constitution.

The issue of the Constitution tends to be dominated by those who report it, being major players. The media constantly reports politicians' views, academics' views and views of special interest groups. In this debate, we are reporting the views of our constituents, the ordinary Canadians, our friends and our neighbours, the many people who came out to share their ideas, their thoughts and their love for this nation.

It is the people we represent who make these short reports so important. For a constitution to work, in order for it to be the basis for a nation to grow in unity and strength, it has to reflect the values and the commitments of the people it serves. Constitutions are not for politicians and academics. Constitutions must be for people.

When the joint committee cancelled its scheduled meetings in my riding in November, I went ahead and held these meetings. I am glad I did. The people who attended the November meetings in Sylvan Lake, Innisfail and Red Deer told me repeatedly that this was the way the issue should have been addressed in the first place. I was told we did not need high-priced commissions, or even special joint committees. Members of Parliament should be the ones who listen and should be given the opportunity to debate, to reflect and to represent the views of their constituents. I quote one of the more blunt contributors: "I am glad to see you are finally doing what we elected you for".

Coming out of this first series of meetings, I was told that the economy was every bit as important as the Constitution. Building on that demand, I held a second series of public meetings in January in which we discussed both the economy and the Constitution.

I also held a constituent assembly of high school students. Every high school in the riding was invited to select three students. The group met at Red Deer College and spent a full day debating the 28 proposals in the constitutional package.

The summary of my constitutional meetings and the student constituent assembly has been shared with both the minister and a special joint committee. Yesterday, two participants from the high school assembly, Barb Ellingson from Innisfail and Paul Abbott from Red Deer, had the opportunity to meet with the joint committee and elaborate on the recommendations made by their constituent assembly of high school students. They did an excellent job of representing their constituents and communicating their positions. Most of my comments will be based on the other series of meetings we had.

This last weekend the minister said that this is not the time for inflammatory rhetoric or phrases. Debate, according to him, has moved beyond that. I would hope that he and the rest of you who are listening would note that some of the comments I have collected were made prior to the recent conferences. People and positions might have changed, matured if you will, but there is still a strong sense of frustration, in some cases alienation, and it would not be fair to the people I represent if I left those comments out.

Many of the people who talked to me at my public forums are absolutely and completely frustrated with the apparent never-ending constitutional discussions. Almost every meeting concluded that the economy was equally important but that it does not seem to attract the same attention. We know we cannot go back in time, but questions raised more than once were: "What was wrong with the way things were? Why did we not leave the Constitution until all Canadians were committed and agreeable to the terms of repatriation?"

It is obvious to me, listening to the national debate and especially listening to my constituents, that there are serious questions facing us and differing views on how they should be answered. I have had representations on the need for strong central powers and others equally strong appealing for more provincial powers.

There was agreement, though, that we need to clarify the areas of jurisdiction and that those who claim responsibility for programs must have the legal responsibility to fund them. There are far too many areas in which people see a duplication of services and expenditures.

Institutional reform is one of the key recommendations in the government's proposals on constitutional renewal. The main focus in my province on institutional reform is the upper chamber. The very strong feeling from Albertans is that the Senate needs a major overhaul to better protect regional interests. That is the reason for Alberta's demand for a Triple-E Senate—elected, effective and equal. Senate reform is a major issue to the people of Alberta and we cannot overstate our feelings about the need to change the Senate. There is impetus to change the House of Commons as well, to make it more representative of the views of our constituents. Strong feelings surfaced about the behaviour in this place. The daily Question Period was referred to as a circus. Heckling, catcalls and general conduct was described as childish. Opposition for the sake of opposition without offering alternatives and blind obedience to party policy and block voting were both considered and called mindless.

People expect more of us as lawmakers and leaders than they see. We need to clean up our act and set an example. We need to show Canadians that we are working for them and for Canada.

I cannot state strongly enough or often enough that the overwhelming feeling that came out of each and every one of my meetings is that we are committed to Canada and that our Canada includes Quebec. We want this nation to be unified but there is some resentment over what is being perceived as Quebec's demands.

The phrase, distinct society, has been mentioned by other people. There is a growing acceptance of the distinct society proposal from the recent workshops. At the time of my meetings there was still concern because people were uncertain and unclear about what was meant by a distinct society. Almost everyone who attended our meetings recognizes and accepts the historical reality of Quebec's place in Canada. We know Quebec is distinct. We accept the historical rights of Quebecers to the French language, culture and the use of the Napoleonic law. No one had a problem with that.

The concern expressed was extensions and applications in other areas that might diminish the rights of others. In almost every meeting the question of bill 178 came up and the use of the notwithstanding clause to enforce it.

The sign law does not affect anyone in the province of Alberta. It has absolutely nothing to do with the Constitution but it does have a lot to do with the attitude and concern about the application of the distinct society clause.

The point I must emphasize to accurately reflect the expressed views is found in a quote from my meeting at Sylvan Lake where it was said: "We are concerned about the word 'distinct'. No one should be given a special label. When all is said and done, we have to be equals. We are all Canadians. I do not mind the way it is worded in the proposals as long it is not used for something else".

Someone else said to summarize and end the meeting: "Quebec must stay. We all lose if they go. Your job is to keep the country united but not at an outrageous cost".

The essence of all the meetings is that if we do truly want to keep this country united we have do more than come up with a Constitution that we can all accept, we need to understand each other better. We have to get to know the regions and other Canadians and understand their needs, their wants and their aspirations. There were many suggestions given on ways that we could accomplish this. It was pointed out that the cost of air flights in Canada is prohibitive. It is cheaper to head south and visit the United States than it is to travel east or west in Canada. It has been suggested there should be travel incentives developed to encourage Canadians to visit other areas. There should be student exchanges to develop understanding among the young. Our educational system has to be expanded. We must put pressure on the powers that be in the educational system to ensure that students learn the history and geography of this great nation and learn to better appreciate it.

An immigrant who has taken up Canadian citizenship ended up telling the rest of us at our meetings that to truly appreciate Canada, it seems one must back away and look at it from another nation.

At the Rocky Mountain House and Red Deer meetings the environment emerged as a very hot topic. The message was that the environment is important to all of us. Also that there is one level of taxpayer in this country and that taxpayer wants rights protected but resents two layers of government doing the same thing and apparently being in conflict with each other.

From my meeting in Nordegg, I quote: "We need strong guidelines and we need one level of government to enforce them". From Rocky Mountain House another quote: "We need strong environmental guidelines but they should be there to help and guide industry, not to kill it".

Concerns were raised about the aboriginal people. The Innisfail group said that 10 years is too long to take to resolve these problems, that we need a commitment to fast track the program. The general consensus was that we need to redress the valid concerns of the aboriginal people. As one person said: "Let us be careful we do not entrench apartheid". There is great support to get rid of the Department of Indian Affairs and allow the aboriginal people the right to self-government.

This was done with a limited understanding of the term self-government. It is awkward to approve or disapprove of something that has not been properly defined. The position taken is that we need to develop a country where a Canadian is a Canadian. We should not be French, English, Indian or whatever. We should be first and foremost Canadian with the same rights and responsibilities.

To my groups, economic union is an issue that is so basic and makes so much good sense that no one could understand why it is not a given. We have to eliminate interprovincial trade barriers and broaden the common market within Canada.

To quote one of my meetings: "It is ridiculous to watch other countries work to develop trading blocs when we have not even developed free trade within our own country". The overwhelming message I received was that people in this country want a nation, a nation that stands free and stands for something.

They do not want a splintered nation of isolated regions. They want a nation of proud, unified Canadians. We in Alberta are proud of our province and its place in Confederation. To quote one of my participants: "Of course, we are proud Albertans. We are Canadians first".

Mr. Speaker, there is a lot of frustration out there. There is still a large degree of irritation and anger. There is also a lot of misunderstanding and questions but there is also a lot of patriotism and a tremendous amount of love and appreciation for this huge, sprawling country of ours.

Canadians love this land. We want to preserve our national heritage of clear skies, clean water, productive soil and most importantly, our heritage of tolerance and understanding.

A friend in Red Deer challenged me and though what he said might be a little simplistic it was sincere. He said: "It is time for Canadians to stand back from their obsession with their own problems and appreciate what we have. It is time that we recognize that Canada is more than two founding nations". He said it was time for me, as an MP to stand up in Red Deer with a French speaking Canadian, the president of the Native Friendship Centre, representatives of the language and cultural groups of our city and proclaim, "We are all Canadians, and we are all proud of it". I am proud of it and I am glad to represent the people of Red Deer.

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, it is a great privilege for me today to act as the spokesman in this House for the Acadian men and women of New Brunswick who met to discuss about the Constitution.

Of course, everybody is asking for the protection and promotion of their rights, the recognition of their specificity and, for some, a distinct status. With full knowledge of the facts, we would be ill advised to question the expectations put forward by many organizations and communities. However, if there was ever a group whose claims deserved to be heard and to whom we should pay particular attention in this debate, it is the francophones living across Eastern Canada, including Newfoundland and Labrador. They are a minority in every Atlantic provinces, but their history, not to say the history of their survival, is an eloquent testimony of a people's will to be recognized and to take the place they deserve and which is theirs.

In 1849, in a speech he was delivering in Montreal, Louis-Joseph Papineau spoke of the Acadian as a vanished people. He was one of those who believed that the 1755 deportation had achieved its goal, that is to wipe out forever the presence of the descendants of the first French settlers in America. The former Quebec Premier, René Lévesque, also talked about francophones outside Quebec as "dead ducks" In 1991, a Quebec writer stated before the Bélanger-Campeau commission that francophones outside Quebec were only "warm corpses". These statements reflect the lack of knowledge of many persons on Acadia and its people; but mainly they underestimate the determination shown by this people.

Stirred by their will to survive as a people, despite their dissemination on a wide territory and the fact they had almost no rights in the last century, New Brunswick Acadians managed to maintain their culture, language and specificity. The institutional infrastructure they gave themselves is just as good as the infrastructure of any other linguistic minority in this country. Let me remind you, Mr. Speaker, of their fight to get education in their own language and religion, a fight that began with the Caraquet riot in 1875 where Louis Mailloux died, becoming a symbol of those fierce battles.

What about the collective will they showed on the political front by succeeding in 1960 to elect as New Brunswick Premier one of their own, the hon. Louis J. Robichaud, whose program on equal opportunities allowed Acadians, men and women, to get at last their share of responsibilities in the daily management of provincial affairs and to get the benefits of a system that they did not before have access to?

The year 1963 marks the foundation of Moncton University, a university responsible for educating a very active and increasingly professional Acadian youth. The Mouvement coopératif acadien is also an example of collective success, with over 215,000 members and more than one billion dollars in assets.

In January 1992, the president, Mr. Raymond Gionet, said and I quote: "The Mouvement coopératif acadien wants Acadian men and women to achieve economic and social self-sufficiency by enhancing their quality of life and preserving their linguistic and cultural identity". A view I share, Mr. Speaker.

To stay in the business field, Assomption Vie has now become a pillar of an important financial group, the Groupe Assomption. Established in 1903 by Acadians deported to the United States, the Société Mutuelle l'Assomption always tends to promote the economic, social, and cultural development of Acadian communities. Several other groups play a key role in the development of Acadians, such as the Société des Acadiens et Acadiennes de Nouveau-Brunswick, the Fédération des Dames d'Acadie, the Société nationale des Acadiens, the Conseil économique du Nouveau-Brunswick, and so on.

So, you see, Acadian men and women in New Brunswick and throughout Atlantic Canada are far from being "dead ducks" or "cadavres chauds". They are dynamic Canadians who are willing and able to take part in the renewal of Canada. As they have showed in the past, they can significantly help the Canadian nation to develop and flourish.

However, I would like to add that the Acadian people I represent recognize the fact that the distribution of powers is severely unbalanced and that the structure and powers of some of our federal institutions are seriously flawed. They are convinced that it is imperative to bring Quebec back into the Constitution and to recognize that province as a distinct society. In short, they are in favour of these changes, while being aware of the fact that it cannot be done without a great deal of openness, flexibility and generosity from both sides.

Acadians are also aware of the fact that they have benefited from the federal official languages policy which has helped their culture flourish since the 1960's and which has helped them obtain, in 1969, the promulgation of the act that made New Brunswick the only Canadian province that is officially bilingual.

In 1981, Bill 88, an act recognizing the equality of the two official linguistic communities in New Brunswick, was passed unanimously by the provincial legislature. If we cannot agree on what is required to promote and protect what Acadians have acquired, I insist that Bill 88 must be entrenched in the Constitution because, as I said to Prime Minister Mulroney and Premier McKenna in February 1991, and I quote: "In this time of uncertainty and at the dawn of profound and dramatic changes that will forever transform the face of Canada, the entrenchment of Bill 88 represents a concrete and positive measure for the most dynamic francophone minority in the country, the Acadian community of New Brunswick".

The unrelenting efforts of those men and women who contributed to the development of Acadia for more than two centuries must be used as an example and a source of inspiration to help us ensure the future of our children as francophones in this new Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when you read Shaping Canada's Future Together where federal proposals are listed, you notice the concept of preservation of linguistic minorities outside Quebec. I think Acadians in New Brunswick are far beyond that stage. Our Constitution should entrench the promotion of minority groups in Canada as opposed to mere preservation. In that regard I share the following recommendation by Victor Goldbloom, our Official Languages Commissioner: "We recommend the inclusion in the charter of the goal of promoting French and English speaking minorities in Canada and support their development".

The constitutional reform Acadians want cannot be negotiated without taking into account a number of basic principles such as national unity, primacy of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and recognition of fundamental linguistic rights.

Other principles are necessary such as the stated role of the federal government in equalization, regional development and support for essential ingredients of national identity, including the protection of official language minorities. Linguistic duality cannot be restricted to a Quebec–Canada relationship and to the recognition of a few linguistic rights in the Constitution. Mr. Speaker, linguistic duality should include recognition of linguistic communities which have a legal status and are endowed with the means to assert their cultural sovereignty and representativeness. That is why I support the following recommendation found in the report of the New Brunswick committee on Canadian federalism. I quote:

> That the Constitution be amended to include a clause recognizing the equal status, rights and privileges of the English and French communities in New Brunswick and that this equality include namely the right to have different educational and cultural institutions necessary to protect and promote both communities.

As the years went by, the Acadian community succeeded in setting up homogeneous linguistic institutions in the fields of education and culture as well as in the social and economic fields. Acadians are proud of this success which enabled them to progress at all levels and to stop the plague of assimilation.

Acadians have a future full of promise and it should be even more brilliant if their institutions are protected from hazardous political decisions.

If the federal government takes into account the claims of New Brunswick Acadians, both men and women, Acadian communities in the other Atlantic provinces could benefit from it.

The leadership shown by New Brunswick Acadians regarding constitutional matters is not an isolated initiative within the big Acadian family, but a well-considered strategy that 230,000 Acadians in New Brunswick chose so that their brothers and sisters in other provinces can benefit from their eventual gains.

I conclude, by quoting the first speech ever given by Senator Louis J. Robichaud almost 40 years ago, at the beginning of his political career in the New Brunswick legislature. He said:

> Our province is some kind of miniature Canada by the mix and the mentality of its ethnic elements. Let's try and profit from that situation by bringing the two groups and the two cultures to enrich one another. Let's be united forever.

I understand that we are allowed to table documents that are consistent with our presentation in the House. In that light, I would like to table this document that reflects many other views from the province of New Brunswick with respect to the propositions put forward by the federal government on the Constitution.

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this constitutional debate in the House of Commons this evening. It is an opportunity for me as member of Parliament for the federal constituency of St. Albert to communicate the opinions of the citizens of my riding.

I am grateful to all the constituents who communicated with me. It is obvious they are proud to live in a country that is free and peaceful. There is no doubt that my constituents are Canadians first. I am proud to represent the constituents of St. Albert.

A Canada united and strong is precious to me for what it is and what it will be. We are a young country, building on the northern half of this continent a society which is just and free, peaceful and prosperous, a society which cares for its people. I am proud to be part of this country.

My parents emigrated from Belgium. To them Canada was the land of opportunity and to me it remains so. I am the son of immigrants. I am proud to be a Canadian.

Many of my constituents are experiencing alienation, a feeling that our political system and our institutions have failed them. Many feel that the west must have a stronger voice in the decision-making process. Many hold strong views on constitutional reform. The Fathers of Confederation in 1867 united four provinces together into a federal system. Other provinces were to join later. Responsibilities were shared between the federal government and the provincial governments. The face of Canadian society has changed dramatically in the last 125 years yet the division of powers and responsibilities has remained the same.

It is evident that the people of St. Albert desire change. They want to be involved in the process. They want to see a more equitable balance between national objectives and regional aspirations. Many of my constituents are concerned about the future of Canada. They are frustrated with the apparent slow process or slow mechanism to bring about change. So many different voices are calling, requesting to be heard and understood, a consensus among Canadians must be found. I believe Canadians working together can find a way.

The Right Hon. Prime Minister has appointed, a native Albertan, but first and foremost a great Canadian, as Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs. My constituents say without hesitation that he is the best man for the task of ensuring that Canadians remain united.

Constitutional discussions by Canadians have been held from coast to coast to coast. The members of the all-party constitutional committee are listening and will be reporting to the House of Commons by the end of February. On behalf of the residents of my constituency, may I express our appreciation to the members of the committee. May the Lord bless its deliberations.

On the road to constitutional reform, there are many issues to address. In the limited time available to me, Mr. Speaker, I will touch on a number of key issues which my constituents consider important in the ongoing discussions. There is support in my riding for Senate reform. My constituents are of the opinion that the appointed Senate has failed to protect regional interests. The Triple-E Senate, elected, effective and equitable, along with proportional representation, received strong endorsation.

The distinct society is a Canadian historical reality. In the Quebec Act of 1774, the British Parliament recognized the distinct society by allowing Quebec to retain its French language, its cultural and civil law. In the British North America Act of 1867, it was restated by the Fathers of Confederation. Quebec has always been distinct. I know there are some people who have difficulty with the word distinct. In French, distinct means different. In English, there are many interpretations from not identical to superior. Quebecers are different, but then many would say that Albertans are different. We are all Canadians, we are equal.

As knowledge of our Canadian history grows and the intent of this clause is better understood, the support for distinct society is growing.

[Translation]

Canada is a bilingual country. In 1969, the Canadian government passed the Official Languages Act. The majority of people in my riding accepted that legislation. The former Prime Minister of Alberta, the hon. Peter Lougheed, said: "Bilingualism is the essence of our country". I am pleased to have the option of speaking in English and in French.

[English]

My electors want a strong central government that will deal with the unity question, the economy and the environment. There is strong support for aboriginal self-government and for full movement of people, goods, services and capital across Canada.

Canadians are anxious to settle the constitutional question and to move on to the economic issues of the day. In a letter I received recently, a Grade 6 student writes: "Canada is my country. I love my country." and she asks "Don't Canadians care about Canada?". An 80-year-old gentlemen tells me: "We don't need the Council of the Federation. We have too much government as it is.". A woman in my riding said: "If we are to save the country, the media better stop dramatizing our differences and focus on what Canadians have in common.".

I share my constituents' concerns about the decorum of MPs in the House of Commons, the constraints of party discipline and the need for more free votes.

Canadians working together have built a nation that is respected and admired around the world for its high level of freedom and opportunity. Unfortunately too many Canadians take Canada's successes for granted.

Today there are forces at work in Canada that would divide this country. They want to destroy our Canada. The constituents of the federal riding of St. Albert want a united Canada redesigned to meet the challenges of the 21st century.

Thomas D'Arcy McGee was right about Canada's future when he said: "Each generation of Canadians has left the country more prosperous, more self-aware, more respected in the world".

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say in beginning my remarks that, like many Canadians, I think it is difficult to concentrate on constitutional matters when we know there are so many people across this country who are suffering job losses and really have very deep fears about the future for themselves and for their children.

In Vancouver East this is the view of many of my constituents. Yet at the same time they care very much about the future of Canada.

Tonight I would like to take this opportunity to put on the record the conclusions of two organizations that met and are meeting in Vancouver and particularly in Vancouver East. They are very concerned about a special constitutional issue, that issue being the protection for minorities which is so important in our Constitution.

I would like to table one report which is entitled Rule of Law Betrayed, a Charter with an Expedient Override. This report was prepared by members of Coalition 33, most of whom are Chinese Canadians and it is a Vancouver group.

The second report I will refer to was prepared by my own Vancouver East federal riding association following a series of meetings we had over the summer months. We also concentrated on the protection of minority rights so that will be the topic of my presentation tonight.

Minority groups in British Columbia and across Canada have experienced racism and discrimination in the past which must never again be tolerated. We must remind ourselves of our history. The racist Chinese head tax, an exclusion act, the internment of Japanese Canadians, the denial of the vote to Asians and aboriginal people, the discrimination against black Canadians and persons of colour in all regions of Canada, and the rights of women and persons with disabilities continue to be ignored.

When the charter was first approved in the early 1980s, section 15 was passed in Parliament and these groups thought their rights would be protected under the law. Section 15(1) reads:

> Every individual is equal before and under the law and has the right to equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination and, in particular, without discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age, or mental or physical disability.

Section 15(2) allows for affirmative action programs to be developed.

Minorities soon learned that equality rights were not as well protected as they thought because section 33, which is known as the notwithstanding clause of the charter, allows federal or provincial governments to override the equality rights which they thought were guaranteed.

Both of the organizations which I referred to in Vancouver have studied this dilemma very carefully and they have concluded that section 33 should be repealed. It should be repealed because it can be used by provincial or federal governments to override the rights of minorities. The Canadian Ethnocultural Council and its many affiliated organizations across the country also support the repeal of section 33. New Vision Canada, an organization dedicated to providing non-partisan political education to racial and ethnic minorities, also has begun a national campaign to amend the Constitution to ensure that equalities which are guaranteed in section 15 are not suspended by the application of section 33, the override clause of the charter.

We have a lot of concern, growing concern, as minority groups are studying these matters and becoming much more aware that indeed rights they thought were enshrined in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms really are at risk because of the override clause.

In my riding of Vancouver East, in meetings on this subject of equality rights, we considered several alternatives, all with the goal of protecting section 15 and the equality rights section from the override by section 33. I would like to just very quickly present the conclusions and the recommendations which we came to, which have both the ideal solution—which is, of course, the repeal of section 33—and also some of the interim things that could be done because it may be difficult to get consensus on complete repeal during this round.

The first proposal we would make is that the override clause in its present form is unacceptable. The purpose of enshrining basic rights in the Constitution is to prevent government expediency from implementing policies that discriminate against minorities and also disempowered groups. We agreed with Coalition 33 and also the B.C. Coalition of Persons with Disabilities that section 33 is a very frightening clause, especially for minorities.

On the other hand, we also recognized the concerns of many of our own members that judicial decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada are often very regressive. We have seen this in some of the decisions that have been made already in charter cases. Also governments that are concerned with collective rights feel the need for more flexibility, and therefore are in favour of an override clause of some type.

However, it was our opinion in Vancouver East that any override clause must never override equality rights with the loss of protections for minorities.

Our second option was that while we prefer the repeal of section 33 from the Constitution, we recognize that political realities may make this difficult to achieve. Therefore, we recommend that any override clause must be difficult to invoke. Specifically, we propose that a special two-thirds majority of government and Official Opposition members of Parliament should be required. This would allow the override to be invoked in emergencies but would prevent it from being used as a simple political expedient by governments. It is interesting that our recommendation is much tougher than the 60 per cent majority which was proposed in the government proposals.

The third option that we suggested was a final alternative which we hope will be achievable in this constitutional round. This proposal is that at the very least the override clause should never apply to section 15 of the charter. This would require an amendment to section 33 which would read "notwithstanding a provision included in section 2 or section 7 to 14 of this charter". You notice that we changed the number from section 15 to section 14. This amendment removes application of the override clause to equality rights.

Minority groups and Canadians concerned with protection of equality rights have deep concerns that their rights may be overridden in the present Constitution. Experience has shown that they are valid concerns and fears, that there is a great risk with section 33 still in our Constitution.

We appeal to the parliamentary committee on the Constitution and to the government decision-makers, both provincial and federal, to amend or repeal section 33 so that this can never happen.

In conclusion, I would just like to say that, like most Canadians, we hope that constitutional renewal will be completed expeditiously with recognition of the distinctiveness of Quebec and aboriginal Canadians and the inclusion and protection of the rights of all Canadians in a multicultural Canada.

I say once again that I would like to table the report that I referred to earlier in my remarks so that it will be available to the constitution committee.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have an opportunity to speak here this evening on behalf of my constituents and try to represent the views that they have expressed to me in regard to their feelings toward the current constitutional debate that is going on our country.

I would like to begin by quoting Edward Blake some half a dozen years after the beginning of Confederation when he said: "The future of Canada depends very largely upon the cultivation of a national spirit. We must find some common ground on which to unite, some common aspiration to be shared and I think it can be found alone in the cultivation of that national spirit to which I have referred".

That has been the driving guideline by which most of my constituents have approached their national government. My constituents believe that it is absolutely essential for a national spirit to have a strong national government. We cannot galvanize the will of this country unless the national government is in a position to manage national programs. It is, after all, from national programs, whether they be health care, educational standards, economic standards, environmental standards, and only when we have the approach of national standards that we can create this spirit.

My constituents are telling to me that right now there is too much decentralization going on in this country, that there is too much of the national fabric being dismantled. They are concerned that in this process of Constitution, in the effort of the national government to try and accommodate the various requirements or the various demands of the provinces, that spirit might be weakened to the point where the will to want to hold it together will no longer be there in some regions of our country.

On behalf of my constituents, we want to reaffirm the position that we took in 1984. We were a community that had some concerns about the Meech Lake Accord. We had a very strong campaign on amendments to Meech Lake and we were concerned about Meech Lake for two very specific reasons. First, we were concerned about minority rights. To be specific, the distinct society clause was a very controversial issue in the last campaign that I participated in and to this day. Quite frankly the mood has not changed that much.

If distinct society means that no culture is less than or greater than another culture, my constituents have no problem with the distinct society clause, but if distinct society means that there is a preferential status given to a particular group then my constituents were opposed in 1984 and they are opposed today.

That is essentially the clear message that I am getting on that very controversial clause. It would be fundamental to my constituents that a clarification on what distinct society means be laid out clearly in the current constitutional debate.

There is another area that we talked about during 1984 and we continue to talk about. You must remember in an urban centre like downtown Toronto we have people coming from all over the nation. For example, I have over 5,000 people in my riding from the province of Newfoundland. The people in my community are concerned about those regions that do not have the same resources as Ontario or even Quebec. They want a strong national government so that on economic matters the strong can help look after those regions that need help. They need help in terms of quality of life, the standard of life, resources to universities, resources for making sure that environmental standards and programs can be maintained.

Where they may not have the resources in their own province, their own region, they count on the national government to say to Ontario: "Listen here, you must share with those disadvantaged regions". That is part of the process of building a national spirit.

I hear repeatedly that we are in very tough shape economically right now in Toronto. We have very tough unemployment problems. We are losing industry, manufacturing specifically, because of the world conditions, some say partial free trade problems and a whole mixture of things. I am not going to pit it at any particular issue.

We know in our community, and I hear this repeatedly, that our best way of working this out is by making sure that this government, this room that I am speaking in right now, this nation's boardroom, not only speaks for Toronto and not only speaks for Ontario, but speaks for every region of the country so that the standards that my children enjoy can be the same standards that the children enjoy in every other region of the country.

We cannot do that, Mr. Speaker, if we so decentralize the national government that it basically becomes almost like a maitre d' to the 10 provincial premiers. My constituents do not want that to happen.

Right now the Government of Canada is supervising probably the loosest federation anywhere in the world. Its powers have been so diminished that when we do get into deep problems economically. It is very tough to manage our way out of them. My constituents are begging me to take the message that this Government of Canada must be strong.

It is not only in terms of domestic issues. Quite frankly, we have to be concerned about who speaks for Canada internationally. Right now we have provinces that have trading houses or consul houses in 20 or 30 different countries in the world. For example, you can go to Italy right now and you will have an Ontario House there, a Quebec House there and a New Brunswick House there alongside the embassy.

The same exists in Japan, Hong Kong, Paris, and England for people who are looking at Canada for investment opportunity, for joint ventures or for trade.

I have talked to some of these people and they want to know who speaks for Canada internationally. Is it the province of Alberta? Is it the province of Ontario? There can be no mistake that internationally there should be one voice speaking for Canada and it should be the Embassy of Canada, representing all of the provinces. How can a province that does not have the resources of Ontario compete in international affairs? It cannot. It counts on a national embassy to represent all regions properly.

In summary, my constituents are saying to me that we must have a strong national government. We must have national programs and national standards because that is where we create national will.

If we are to have a distinct society, it must be defined in a way where no culture is less than or greater than any other culture. If we can use those things as our guiding principles, then they will create values of caring and approachability and an action oriented community that can be the envy of the world.

[Translation]

Mr. Ricardo Lopez (Châteauguay): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate this evening on the future of our country.

I have the pleasure and the honour to represent the riding of Châteauguay, which has a population of approximately 100,000 people, of which some 20,000 are English-speaking and 80,000 are French-speaking. The francophones and the anglophones, as well as other ethnic minorities in my riding, are all proud to be Canadians.

I truly regret that some dream merchants try to capitalize on certain aspects that could divide us as Canadians. Our country has a lot more in common, a lot more things that unite us than that divide us. Unfortunately, some people derive great pleasure from denigrating it and to showing only the things that divide us, while dismissing everything that unites us and makes us envied by the whole world.

Do you know, Mr. Speaker, there are millions and millions of people throughout the world who have one dream, and that is to become Canadians. Some Canadians say that it is unbearable in our country and they find all kinds of metaphors to describe our country as bad and mean. It seems to me that those people should realize that there is nothing to be gained by destroying but there is everything to be gained if we can set aside some differences—and those differences do exist—and work together to make this country even greater, even better than it is now.

Today, I call upon the common sense of Canadians who have always shown great generosity, flexibility and understanding. Proof of that is the attitude they displayed by accepting me as a Canadian and electing me to the House of Commons. I believe there is clear evidence that Canadians can be flexible, generous, understanding, and that they can live together.

I represent a riding in the province of Quebec where some bitterness and after-effects still linger following the patriation of the Constitution in 1982, when Quebec was excluded. These after-effects are serious, among francophones as well as among anglophones. I hope that this time around we will take that into account and be able to give to Quebec, as well as to the rest of Canada, their place in our great and beautiful country.

What do Quebecers want? I do not think their objectives are to diminish in any way the greatness or the wealth of Canada.

On the contrary, I think Canada will come out of this enriched and even more beautiful. The fact that Quebec wants to be recognized as a distinct society does not mean that it will consider itself as superior or have any more privileges than the rest of Canada, not at all. Quebecers are only asking to be recognized for who they are. Whether we like it or not, Quebec is a distinct society—a fact acknowledged in the British North America Act—with a different culture and language and its own Civil Code. Many arguments support the notion that Quebec is indeed a distinct society. It seems to me that wanting for all of this to be entrenched in the Canadian Constitution is not such a big deal.

Quebec is valuable to the rest of Canada and vice versa. The fact that we speak French, that we have two main languages and cultures—I say main because there are many cultures in Canada, but two main languages and cultures—only makes Canada richer. Everyone's dream is to come to Canada. Wherever I go and talk to the people—as you know, I have travelled around the world twice and lived in 35 countries, so I have met quite a few people—all they can think of is: how can you become a Canadian? It is hard to understand that while all those people dream of becoming Canadians people already here who take it for granted try to malign them. It is completely baffling. There are people who say that Canada is harmful to Quebec's interests, but how do we reconcile that with the fact that Quebecers were able to develop their full potential with the rest of the country's citizens, without any restrictions, and that they even have the right to come to the House of Commons and denigrate them when they feel like it? It seems to me they have never in any way been oppressed or deprived of their freedom.

Since Quebec is an asset near and dear to us all, we should all try to understand Quebec's point of view. Quebec has been hurting since 1982. Let's try and understand this and try and bring Quebecers back to join the rest of Canada so they will feel truly Canadian and be proud to carry a Canadian passport. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that if we manage to reconcile and recognize the existence of these two founding peoples of our country, both the anglophone majority and francophones, especially in the province of Quebec, I don't think the going will be quite as rough as people would have us believe.

I am sure that many of Quebec's claims could be satisfied without even touching the Constitution. As the previous speaker pointed out earlier, there is a certain amount of duplication by the federal government and the provinces. In the first place, this duplication costs us a lot of money, and in the second place, it creates a certain amount of rivalry between the provinces. I think that in the interests of all concerned we should start eliminating these areas of duplication as much as possible. We could do the same thing about federal employees in quite a few departments. If we could conduct this exercise in good faith, I am sure that many of Quebec's demands could be met. And as far as the distinct society clause and perhaps the division of powers is concerned, Canada is not going to stop breathing just because of that. Canada is a great country, but with Quebec it is even greater. Quebec is very rich as part of Canada. It seems to me we could bring this commonality of interests together, Mr. Speaker, and it would be in the interests of all Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I have had many conversations with constituents of Fraser Valley East about the future of our country.

It is not news to say that they distrust politicians, myself being excluded from that group. They wonder if we are listening. They are sceptical and are looking for action. They are concerned about the future of Canada. They do not want to see the country torn apart. They question the sincerity of the governments resolving the present problems.

They say that having more free votes in the House of Commons is a very popular initiative. For too long members have been seen as being Ottawa's representatives in the ridings, rather than being the ridings' representatives in Ottawa. I am told by many that this change will go a long way to improving people's confidence in elected members.

There is a feeling of alienation. People feel that even when they have their say it does not make a difference. They feel alienated from their own government and they feel alienated from other parts of Canada.

I can tell you that the people of Fraser Valley East are just like many other Canadians. They are tired of feeling left out. This is their country. They work hard and are proud of their contribution. They want to feel included in their country. Sometimes they feel, as do many other British Columbians, that being on the other side of the Rocky Mountains is like being in Siberia.

Like many Canadians, residents of Fraser Valley East want to be clearly represented in Parliament and they say more freedom from party discipline is an important first step toward that end.

The people of Fraser Valley East are concerned about what goes on in Canada. They are concerned for a united Canada, yet there are many national policies they question. They wonder about the official languages policy and multiculturalism. They question the approach being taken to resolve the issue of aboriginal rights. They see these policies in a negative light because they find them to be driving people apart rather than bringing them together. They see these policies as building walls instead of bridges. What they want to see is cohesion and a real sense of nationhood.

They do not want to see a broken Canada. They want to see a united Canada, where all individuals have the opportunity to go wherever they want in Canada and to be whatever they want. They want to see their government committed to fairness. The people of Fraser Valley like other Canadians are very concerned about the future of Canada.

Because they have felt left out for such a long time, when my constituents read the 28 proposals they wondered why it seemed that there was so much for Quebec. Why are we left out? From where they stand, they see this as unfair and this gets their backs up.

The issue of the distinct society is a sore point to many. They acknowledge that Quebecers are different; they speak a different language and have a different culture. They say to me: "Fine, distinct in fact is one thing; distinct in law is another". From where they stand, they distrust the concept of distinct society. They are wary of too much power for the provinces. They see this as divisive and they see the concept of distinct society as contributing to further divisions.

Constituents of Fraser Valley East want to see a strong federal government that will work to keep Canada together. Until they see the historical background on how Canada was put together, there is that great question mark. All and all, people do not understand enough about Canada's history.

The people of Fraser Valley East want to see a strong united Canada. Many people have written to me over the seven years that I have been a member of Parliament and national unity has been a concern.

In recent years, the concern about the future of Canada has increased. I read the letters and listened to what people had to say and after they were done with airing their complaints they told me that they believe in this country and wonder why we are having so many problems when we have it so good.

My constituents say: "Look at other countries. We have so much going for us and we seem to have such problems just getting along with each other". The bottom line is that they do not want to see us throw away such a great country.

Rosedale is a small community in Fraser Valley East. The Canada Day committee, which normally organizes festivities on Canada Day, got together and went over the 28 proposals. The chairman, Fred Brian, and the secretary, Mary Sash, worked with 16 other concerned citizens of Rosedale to come up with a comprehensive brief that they submitted to the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs. Several other individuals have contacted me directly with their views on the proposals.

Although I have given the House a taste of what Fraser Valley residents are thinking, I must make a few qualifying statements about some of the comments that stand out from the rest.

People who have been to Quebec generally hold views that are different from the majority of those constituents who have not. These people found Quebecers to be warm and generous. They found that the hospitality was overwhelming and that in reality, the people of Quebec were not much different from any other people they had met.

Sure, they spoke a different language, but they were hard-working people who, much like British Columbians, felt a little left out of the goings on of their government. It seemed that the feelings of alienation were shared.

The British Columbians with whom I spoke and who have visited Quebec often tell me about the history of Quebec and the fact that Quebec is a culture of six million francophones surrounded by a sea of some 20 million anglophones. So maybe they are right to feel a little paranoid about their culture and language.

These British Columbians still do not like the fact that Quebec has a sign law which limits English on outdoor signs. What people are telling me is that we need more understanding. British Columbians feel left out. So do many other Canadians, including Quebecers. In many ways they are not left out at all, but if they feel left out, they are.

The perception often denies the fact. People want to believe they are involved. They want to be part of the larger whole. They want to be heard. They want to see their views acted upon. The perception has to change.

People have to feel that they are included. They have to feel that they are on the same footing with Canadians in other provinces. The only way to do this is to ensure that Canadians understand one another. In the heat of anger many say that this group or that group should go their own way, but when they keep talking and they explore all sides of the issue, they admit that they are simply frustrated and that they really want a united Canada where all people feel included.

My parents came from Shawville, Quebec. They moved to the prairies and I was born in southern Saskatchewan. I live in the Fraser Valley of British Columbia and I am proud to serve my country in this House of Commons.

I am a Canadian and I can tell you that I have a lot in common with my constituents. We are proud Canadians who care deeply about our country. We believe in fairness and we believe in justice. Compromise is fine if the trade-off is mutually beneficial.

We know there are certain costs involved with keeping the country together, especially a country as broad and diverse as Canada. We in the Fraser Valley, much like Canadians from other parts of Canada, want to be understood. We want to be included.

In closing, I would like to share with you a quote from a letter I recently received, simply signed "John". This constituent writes: "My deepest hope is that our country will be able to elect some leaders who can distinguish between good and bad proposals and act accordingly, leaders who stand for what they see to be right. I trust that after we have finished this round of consultations, we will be that group of leaders who can indeed distinguish between good and bad proposals and act accordingly and may each of us reach a mutual understanding for our country".

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that members of Parliament were given the opportunity such as we have this evening to speak in the House to what the constituents in our ridings have to say on the current constitutional issues before us.

All of the constituents in my riding of Northumberland have indicated to me that as far as they are concerned, the major issue today in this country is the economy. They wish to see our economic circumstances turned around so that we are able to find jobs for all of those who are unemployed, training for those who need new skills, and literacy for those who are unable to cope with reading and writing skills in our society.

On the other hand, although that was recognized as the most important issue, there are many people who spoke to me in my constituency of Northumberland about the issue of the Constitution and how strongly they felt about that.

There were many people in Northumberland who recognized that, although the economy is the major issue today in our country, they understand the linkage between us finding a resolution to our constitutional impasse and the well-being of our economy.

Before the present 28 proposals were put before the House of Commons and the Canadian public in general, last June in my householder, which all members of Parliament are able to send out to constituents, I included a questionnaire on providing the opportunity to respond to some questions which seemed likely to be the subject matter of proposals put forward to the Canadian nation with regard to constitutional issues.

By October, when I sent out another householder, I had a total of 941 responses.

At that time, before we had the government's 28 proposals, I had a sense of where people in my riding were coming from. For example, when asked about our attachment to two official languages in this country, our bilingual policy, I had 45 per cent of people respond in the affirmative and 46 respond in the negative as to whether our Constitution should recognize our attachment to two official languages. We had a situation in which there was almost an even split on that issue.

A larger percentage of people showed support for our multicultural characteristics as a nation, 56 in the affirmative versus 31 not supporting that.

The distinct character of Quebec did not have as much support. It was two to one against recognizing Quebec's distinct society, but certainly since that time and with the proposals that were put before the people of Canada and in my riding of Northumberland there has been increased support for recognition of the distinctive characteristics of Quebec.

The largest support expressed was by the people of Northumberland for the recognition of the historical role of aboriginal people within Canada.

There was overwhelming support for the notion that we must have unrestricted trade barriers among the provinces. There was overwhelming support for a reformed and elected Senate. There was also support for the idea of the Senate approving appointments to federal agencies and institutions. There was support for the idea that the federal government and the population of Yukon and the Territories should decide when a new province is to be created.

Subsequent to the government having tabled its 28 proposals, I have had several meetings with constituents in the riding of Northumberland, a total of over 12 meetings. By the time I had presented a report to the joint House of Commons–Senate constitutional committee, I had 12 meetings. I have had additional meetings in my riding. I have had over 500 people attend these various meetings and discuss with me their views of the 28 proposals.

I would like to share this evening the response of my constituents to the government's 28 proposals. The meetings should be described as well.

I had advertised in my householder and in local newspapers that I would be holding four public forums throughout my riding. I held those forums in Hope township, Hamilton township, Warkworth and Trenton. Besides that, my other meetings have been held in private homes, in schools and in churches by different groups at their request throughout my riding. As I said, over 500 people have attended these various meetings and they have represented populations from across the whole of my riding, people in Port Hope, Hope township, Cobourg, Hamilton township, Brighton, Warkworth, Trenton, et cetera.

With the exception of one public forum held in Trenton, the general consensus at my meetings was that those present were very concerned about the uncertainty of Canada's future and wished, above all, to maintain a united Canada with a strong federal government.

However, all those who attended my forums did express the view that there were limits beyond which achieving the above desired result would not be worth while, and it is important to note that.

The one public forum I had that expressed a diverse opinion from the others expressed the view quite strongly that our present bilingual and multicultural policies should be scrapped in favour of an English only official language policy, and basically a commitment to Anglo-Saxon Christian values as the basis of the Canadian cultural identity.

Other meetings, happily for me, were all much more accepting of our country's official bilingual policy and multicultural policies as long as they applied equally to every province. There was great concern expressed about the English only law as it exists at present in Quebec. Although the majority of people supported our bilingual policy, they felt that it must apply to all languages equally.

There was mild acceptance of the idea of a reformed Senate and Supreme Court appointment process. There was strong acceptance of native peoples acquiring self-government and recognition of their inherent rights.

There was mild response, both negative and positive, to the issue of entrenching property rights and there was mild acceptance of the idea that Canada needed free trade in persons, goods, services and capital.

I have presented the findings of Northumberland to the joint committee and it has the document from which I was reading. As a follow-up, I would like to read a letter which I received from the Corporation of the Town of Port Hope which I feel in general expressed the views of my constituency. It was informing me of a resolution passed by the Port Hope Municipal Council on November 25, 1991 which states: "Whereas we are first and foremost Canadians and, whereas our country is in grave danger due to the constitutional crisis and, whereas our forefathers and our citizens have fought and given their lives to preserve this great country as one nation, therefore be it resolved that Council of the Town of Port Hope contact the leaders of the major political parties to urge them to set aside their political agendas and differences and work together as Canadians to resolve this crisis and develop a Constitution acceptable to all of our citizens, and furthermore, that the only acceptable solution to this issue will result in an undivided nation from east to west called Canada."

I would like to say that I concur with the majority of my constituents who hold the same view.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): If the hon. member has anything else she would like to file with the Clerk she may do so as far as her notes are concerned.

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, this evening I will be brief in my commentary due to the fact that I know there are a number of members of this House who want to participate in this particular debate. I think it is important that we all have the opportunity to stand in this House and discuss our opinions or points of view on the future of our country. Like many others who have spoken this evening in the debate and in other parts of this discussion, I had the opportunity to bring together a community committee which took a long, very deliberate look at the proposals that were brought forward.

The process the committee went through was twofold. Along with discussing and explaining to the members of my constituency, they also took the time to listen to the concerns and opinions of the people who live within the constituency. As a result, they drafted quite a significant report.

I was very fortunate in the fact that they, along with many other community groups, had the opportunity to come before the joint House and Senate special committee to make their presentation. I truly believe they delivered a very significant message on behalf of the constituents of Selkirk—Red River.

I do not particularly agree with all the points that were brought forward, but I do know that the work of the committee truly reflected what they received as well as the information they brought together and their own discussions.

I would like to commend the work of what has been called the Schreyer committee in Selkirk—Red River for its efforts. I truly hope that in the future when we go to the next stage that the opportunity to once again participate in whatever manner the discussions of the legislation proposed by the government.

It is my opinion that as we talk about the efforts of the past, it is more important that we endorse the efforts that will actually start this evening because the joint special committee has now set aside its public hearings and now goes into the process of writing a report. It is important that all members of the House endorse their efforts.

In my mind and with the time I have spent with the committee, I think there is a real effort to come up with a proposal that the government and the provinces will be able to work with so that in the very near future we will be able to resolve probably, the most important issue in the country today.

It is important that all Canadians understand that. I use a personal experience: "You never win an argument but I have always been able to negotiate a good arrangement". I truly believe that is the basis of whatever we will be able to resolve.

I believe that the future of my country is not only in the hands of the joint committee, it is in the hands of the government, members of this House, the premiers in the legislatures and all Canadians. It is my sincere hope that all Canadians will take the time to understand and respect how the other citizens of our great country feel about themselves and about each other.

I look forward to standing in this House in the very near future to debate the legislation that will come forward on behalf of the government.

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, it is certainly a pleasure for me to speak tonight in the House of Commons on behalf of the York-Simcoe Constituents Committee for Constitution Change.

These people from the riding of York—Simcoe have dedicated virtually every Saturday morning since the end of September to study, to understand, to question, to challenge the proposals brought forward by the Prime Minister and the government on September 29 last.

These people began this with the dedication and the belief that their contribution to this country, a few hours a day spoiling virtually all their weekends for other activities, would make a difference. They were prepared to make these kinds of sacrifices. They believe very strongly in a united Canada.

Seventeen people started the end of September on this particular committee. They took the challenge to focus the debate that was out there in the country on the various proposals that the government had put forward. They took as part of their objective a need to foster a broad discussion among various groups in the community. In addition to those Saturday morning meetings they had five or six public meetings spread throughout the riding.

As part of their objective they were going to attempt to facilitate the achievement of consensus. They were going to try to get an understanding among people as it related to those particular proposals. They were going to make changes. They were going to propose changes and refinements and alternatives to the proposals that had been presented.

Of course, they were going to concentrate their efforts on the three main areas, defining Canadian identity, change and more responsible government and economic reforms to encourage growth and prosperity, all very laudable objectives.

Who are these people in my riding? They are people from throughout the riding of York—Simcoe. They are from Bradford, Georgina, Tecumseh, Newmarket, just a wide selection of people. They are teachers, students, business people, municipal leaders and representatives from minority groups. There are even a couple of lawyers. They all get along. They had their differences, they argued and debated, and debated very strongly and were able to come up with proposals and recommendations on virtually every one of the proposals the government brought forward. I am very pleased to be able to present this document to the House tonight on behalf of these people.

I want to talk a little bit about some of their comments concerning the process and what they went through. I am going to quote a few things from their report. One of the things they said was that during the course of these hours of work—reading, researching—, preparing for the public forums, preparing to hear neighbours' opinions—these members became more—aware of what Canada means to all of us. "We came to appreciate the richness of our French-English heritage, the cultural diversity new arrivals contribute to our national fabric, the things we share in common as well as our differences". Most of all, this group of people in York—Simcoe believe that they are representative of the people from Halifax to Victoria, they are Canadians who are very proud to be Canadians and they want to make Canada work.

The committee felt that its mandate was to consider a Constitution which must serve Canada for many years to come and so requires a long-term view. They were not looking for quick fixes. The committee endorsed the recognition of the French speaking society of Quebec as distinct from the rest of Canada. They felt very strongly about the provision for self-government for our aboriginal peoples because they felt it was long overdue. These Canadians felt that this constitutional debate and the wrangling and everything else that has gone on, whether it be in the media or in this House even, has long focused too much energy on what divides us. Maybe it is time now, Mr. Speaker, as they report: "Canadians now need things of a positive nature, things that we can reflect on with pride and identify with as symbols of our Canadianism, things that are Canadian". That is what these people talked about.

The Canada clause which identifies many of the values associated with being Canadian is an essential ingredient of our new Constitution. That is what this committee felt. They said: "Canada, geographically one of the largest nations on earth, is beautiful and diverse, abundantly endowed by nature, with a fascinating history, a rich multicultural fabric, a democratic history and a caring social tradition that we are proud to call our home".

They went on to discuss a number of other things. I do not have time tonight to get into all the details, but they brought in a report that suggested the Senate should have equal representation from the provinces as well as the territories. They felt that could be balanced out by including in the votes that take place in the Senate the rule that the votes must represent 50 per cent of the population. They felt that was a way of balancing out the difficulty with the Senate. I think that has a lot of merit.

They also mentioned another interesting aspect. Through their debates and discussions toward the end of the process they recognized that when they talked about the provinces they were really including the territories. They felt that this was a good time to bring the territories closer to provincial status in this country.

There was obviously much concern about the aboriginal situation and their right to self-government. Because of our affiliation with the aboriginal people in Georgina Island there was a lot of love and respect for what this group of Canadians has done. My committee group felt that self-government should be addressed on an individual basis, on a band-by-band basis, but at a much quicker pace. They do not want to wait for 10 years, they want to do something now if the band is ready and able to do so. They really felt it should be the responsibility of the band to do that.

There are a number of suggestions that they made, as I said, relating to virtually all the proposals. I am sorry that I am not going to be able to get into all the details of them tonight in the time allowed me. But I do want to say that these people worked very hard and were very honoured and privileged to appear before the joint parliamentary committee yesterday. They really feel that they have been part of the process.

I want to conclude with a letter from one of my constituents, Mr. Sergeant of Bradford. This is what he says:

> Am I going to sit back and let someone take a piece of my country away from me? Or am I going to fight for it like they do in other countries? I think it is time we all stood up for Canada. I have had enough; I think it is time to put an end to this Quebec separation once and for all. I am a man of English heritage. I married a girl of French heritage. We were both born and raised in Toronto and together we raised seven children. Would we not represent both sides in thought, heritage and country?

He asked me if it would help for him to get involved because, he said, "We are prepared to go to Quebec and talk to those people in Quebec and convince them of the need to keep one united, strong country together".

Mr. Speaker, the people of York—Simcoe have been heard and I am very proud to be able to represent them tonight. I will table their report.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, "Canada is a society of freedom, tolerance and compassion". This is the message in the opening of the new federal government constitutional proposals entitled Shaping Canada's Future Together.

I would like to say at the outset that my party, under my leader Mr. Jean Chrétien, has earlier stated the framework upon which we will examine the final package to be presented in this House.

• (2130)

Let me just mention a few of them. We would like a Canada that will set out the will of Canadians to live together in a federal state, the principles of which we would like to be sharing together.

We would like a Canada committed to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms to preserve and strengthen fundamental rights and freedoms.

We would like a Canada with a strengthened economic union where barriers between provinces would be removed. We would like a Canada where the division of powers exists which best serves the needs of people, not governments or bureaucrats or politicians, and a system that will provide the flexibility to meet the changing demands and challenges of the future.

It is because of these constitutional proposals and the future of this country that we are here tonight in this place to speak to all who will hear in the hope that they will listen.

I believe Canada can be many things. It is a beautiful nation that sweeps north to south and west to east with wonderful people who have hearts as large as the country itself.

Above all, Canada is what you make it. It is a place where caring individuals and likewise a caring government can make a difference. It is like a lovingly sewn patchwork quilt, with each square of a different design. Today the quilt is worn around the edges and is beginning to fray, but my own square of Winnipeg North still has hope that this quilt may yet keep us warm even in these troubled times.

The economy has made my people afraid for this coming year. They are afraid that they may lose their jobs or never be able to find one. It is their foremost concern. I am pleased to say that my leader has announced on behalf of the Liberal caucus a five-point proposal on emergency economic reform to bring Canada back to work.

I am equally pleased to say that this government has already agreed to adopt one of our economic proposals. These proposals are timely for my constituents who fear for their families and their futures.

To them, for the most part the constitutional talks are like a conversation on the other side of a door. Bits and pieces reach your ear, but the whole escapes you.

They find the 28 proposals too large, unwieldy and time consuming to compete with their everyday thoughts of living. Yet they do indicate to me that there are three or four key issues which warrant federal attention.

First, the distinct society. They want this issue front and centre of the constitutional debate. They want it settled. Most have only kind words for Quebec and they want a united Canada.

"Lay this issue to rest," they say, "mend the tear."

Second, a reformed Senate. My constituents feel the west is underrepresented in Ottawa and we want an elected, effective and equal Senate.

Third, aboriginal self-government. The future health and viability of our native people also concerns the people of Winnipeg North. Many of my constituents come from other countries and now call this country home, but they do not believe it is right to displace one people for another, one race for another and one culture for another. All can live in this country in harmony, independent and with dignity.

Fourth, they would like a strong and caring central government.

I have had more time to study the proposals. That is part of my job. I believe the things I will say might also be the feelings of my constituents.

I look at my colleagues. I know most of them personally through our years of working for the communities of Canada. I feel with them a communion. I trust that I can speak freely with you about my feelings for our future in the country we call home—for most, their country of birth; for me and others, our country of choice.

What will the future hold for our country? Where will we be when the ink has dried on our new constitution, further behind or further ahead? That is up to you and me.

Here in Canada many things were taken for granted for many years. People believed they would have jobs, a home for their families, enough money for retirement, a bright future for their children. These are some of the things we take for granted as our due, but just being Canadian is not a guarantee we will have all these things. We have to fight for them.

There is one statement in particular in the new constitutional proposals that should spark a revolution. The government said: "In response to criticism—the Government of Canada commits itself not to introduce new Canada-wide shared-cost programs and conditional transfers in areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction without the approval of at least seven provinces representing 50 per cent of the population".

What does this mean? To me it means no day care. What about our children? Seven years ago the government promised the mothers and the fathers of this country that they would have universal day care, universal child care. Now the government is using the Constitution to leave by the back door.

We need a strong and caring central government to protect the social interests of our people and all Canadians.

A few short months ago we passed the 20th anniversary of the multiculturalism policy in this country. Would a bill like that be passed without a strong federal government? Would a bill like that mean anything? How could the policy be enforced without a strong central government? Multiculturalism means equality for all.

Who would defend the environment, the Rafferty-Alameda dam, James Bay, Carmanah, aluminum in the St. Lawrence, Great Lakes poisons, ozone depletion? The federal government may not do enough, but I guarantee the provincial governments would do less to fight big business for habitat, wildlife and humanity.

Without a strong central government, what weight would Canada carry on international issues? How would Canada fare in international trade where the game is quickly changing? Words like "globalization", "free trade", "automation" and "subsidy wars" conjure up images of a marketplace that is on shifting sands, where small business is squeezed out and large businesses lay off thousands or jump the border.

Only a strong caring government backed by a constitution of conscience can face the world and represent all Canadians on these issues; not just the east, not just the west but all Canadians.

In my experience, Canada is a living, breathing thing, always changing. If the government is suggesting the provinces be allowed to perhaps set their own goals and their own agendas, for example immigration quotas, and this is written into the Constitution, how would it change as Canada changes? It is very very difficult to amend the Constitution, as we are witnessing today.

It is also very difficult to write a constitution. For example, many of our social programs are crumbling under our feet. Medicare is being attacked from all sides. The Canada Health Act without protection may be a mere mention in a history book, not a working piece of legislation, unless free medical care is guaranteed a right of citizenship. The same is true of our educational system. Family allowances, social assistance, pensions, income security, there is merit to entrenching all these values in the Constitution. These rights are our rights, but for how long?

Perhaps the people who have rights are the ones who fight for them. I do not mean through violence. I mean people voicing their concerns loudly and clearly to the government. This is how we carve a place for ourselves in the new Constitution.

Just last week I joined a round table discussion of Canada's top scientists, members of the Canadian Institute of Academic Medicine who were concerned about the adverse impact of national disunity on our national institutions. The scientists provide us a model of how harmony can be achieved among people of diverse cultures, languages and areas of expertise.

They have continued to spontaneously converge to harvest mutual benefits from their work. They continue to discover new vistas, useful in diagnosis and treatment of humankind's diseases. The reason, I believe, is that they work for a common good. This force drives them to overlook geographic and ethnic origins or other tongues.

We could all learn from our academics and scientists. We must learn if Canada is to remain one country.

Following our debate tonight, the joint committee for a renewed Canada should take to heart our views and those of our constituents for whom we speak before finalizing its report later this month.

In the final analysis, the constitutional package must be submitted to a national referendum. Only a constitution of the people by the people and for the people will bind us together as Canadians.

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, it is a real privilege to be able to speak on the constitutional proposals as presented by the government.

In my riding of Delta we recently had two meetings on two evenings in two areas of the electoral district to discuss these proposals and to find out just what the people of Delta had in mind and what they thought of the government's proposals.

At the time I promised that I would bring the report of the meeting to my colleague, the right hon. Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs, and to the co-chairs of the special joint committee on a renewed Canada.

I found that both of these meeting were very productive. I found that the people of Delta also appreciated very much the opportunity to present their views on the Canada we will be looking at in the future.

I do appreciate the fact that these meetings were both hosted by local community organizations, one by the Scott Road Business Association and the other by the Delta Chamber of Commerce, and by two very capable chairmen, Mr. Peter Podovinikoff and Mr. Sean Hogan. They did an excellent job. They brought focus to the meetings and helped to speed it along to keep the consensus and played a great part in the success of both of those evenings.

These events were designed to give the residents of my riding the opportunity to make known their views and concerns. My function was just to present the proposals with overhead projection and to listen and to see what the people felt and thought.

Out of the 150 people who attended the two meetings, approximately 35 had the opportunity to express their views. Their statements lasted anywhere from two minutes to fifteen minutes, but they all were thoughtful and sincere and obviously from the heart. I really appreciated the attitude and the atmosphere of the meetings as the people sought to seek a consensus and to understand the points of view of other people.

The general comments ran from very supportive to staunchly opposed to certain sections of the package. There was certainly no consensus. When the meetings were concluded those who attended at least left with a better understanding of the proposals and also what their neighbours and their community thought about the whole proposal.

Since it was not possible for the joint committee to meet in the Delta area, it was felt that this type of representation gave the people of Delta the opportunity to be heard. As I said, these conceptions have already been presented to the committee and to the right hon. Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

On the specific concerns that were mentioned at the meetings, we went through the various proposals. On reaffirming the rights and freedoms of citizens and on the issue of property rights the vast majority was strongly in favour of property rights. Many people commented that it was a mistake not to have included these rights when the Constitution was repatriated in 1982.

The point was made on many occasions that all of the other constitutionalized countries of the world guarantee the right to property and that it was high time that Canada caught up with the rest of the world. Others pointed to it as a fact that was necessary to restrict the power of government over the people.

With regard to the notwithstanding clause, raising the majority to 60 per cent from 50 per cent, all of the participants who spoke on this item were unanimous that if it had to exist then strengthening it was a good change.

However, several speakers called for the total removal of the distinct society clause from the Constitution. Most cited the controversial Quebec sign law as a significant irritant to the rest of Canada and therefore justification for striking the clause.

It was pointed out at the meetings, again by the participants, that it was the western provinces that insisted on being a part of the charter in the first place and therefore it must play an important role for all the provinces.

On the matter of the distinct society clause, this was probably the most widely debated of all the issues in the meetings and people were very passionate on both sides. Those who spoke against the inclusion of this clause considered that it gave to one province a more significant role than the other nine.

One individual, for example, asked if a distinct society will be a sleeper clause that will be used to justify more powers for Quebec down the road. It was recommended that a limiting clause be added to it.

Another participant argued that Quebec's distinctiveness is an issue that was dreamed up in the minds of politicians. It was said that the official recognition of distinctiveness would further compound the problems that were created by the English and the French.

The criticism of culture being included in the distinct society clause was that Canada's many cultures have continued to flourish without official protection. The oriental population of B.C. was given as an example of a group of people whose language and culture has continued to flourish without the use of constitutional protection.

However, 14 out of the 22 people who spoke on the issue were in favour of the recognition of Quebec's distinctiveness. Several cited history to prove that Quebec's distinctive language, culture and civil code have always been a fact in Canada. One observer said that we should walk a mile in a Quebecer's shoes and realize that if the situation were reversed, we would also fight for the preservation of English culture and language if we were surrounded by a population of 250 million French.

It was even said that the rest of Canada should learn from the pride that the people of Quebec have in their heritage and culture. Over all, people on this side of the issue said that they could not imagine Canada without a distinct Quebec.

On the matter of aboriginal self-government, again the opinions were divided. Some felt that it was a positive step and called for a shortening of the ten-year timeframe. Others however said that we should all just be Canadians and not further subdivide into groups. These individuals questioned the effects on the environment and on our nation's resources. Others were unclear as to how self-government would affect the Indian land claims process.

As far as the House of Commons and more free votes was concerned, it was unanimous that if not all House votes could be free, then at least there should be more of them.

Several people called for a change in the rules governing votes of non-confidence to free up the control of caucus. They emphasized that the member's primary responsibility was to represent the will of his constituents and that must come before the role of the party.

The matter of Senate reform is also a hotly debated item. Many called for the abolition of the Senate; others called for the Triple-E Senate. On the matter of election, all but one individual agreed that it must be elected. There were various views on the timing of these elections. It should be effective.

Some argued that the Senate should have the same powers of the House on all issues and not merely a suspensive veto on important issues. Others claimed that this was just a duplication of the House and would be futile.

As far as equality was concerned, most people felt that it should be fully equal, that is that P.E.I. should have the same number of senators as Ontario and that this would be no more odd than the present situation where we have gross misrepresentation in the country. There was no consensus of the numbers of senators needed.

As far as the economic union was concerned, the majority of speakers were in favour of the economic union proposal and social benefits to all regions of Canada. However, they did raise concern over the opting out clause and complained that it lacked clarity and was going to be a point of real contention down the road.

One gentlemen also pointed to the language of a common market as being too divisive and making Canada sound like a collection of separate states. For the Council of Federation, nearly everybody felt that it was just one more level of government and we did not require it.

I see that my time is just about gone, Mr. Speaker. I would like to table the remainder of my speech so that it can be on the record. It deals with the general themes.

I would like to conclude by saying that although there was a diversity of opinions and a diversity of thought that was represented in the meetings, there was a consensus that we wanted to hold Canada together, that we needed to have meaningful dialogue between the various factions. There was a general sense of good will and a desire to understand those with different and opposing viewpoints.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will accept all those documents from the hon. member.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to say thank you to my hon. colleague from Delta for the remarks he has given. Surely we have been listening to many of the same people in our constituencies over the recess at Christmas time.

Before I begin to express the feelings and ideas that the constituents of Beaver River have impressed upon me, I would like to first of all thank all the members of this House for allowing this debate to take place. It is a refreshing and welcome change to see this place used as it should be, and that is as an instrument for democratic representation.

By various means, a constituency-wide questionnaire and a series of public meetings over the recent recess, the constituents of Beaver River have voiced their opinions on every one of the 28 constitutional proposals put forward by the government. Many have suggested, however, that while they agree this round should in fact be a Canada round which attempts to satisfy all Canadians, the bulk of proposals are simply too large to deal with. The majority with whom I spoke in Beaver River feel that a constitutional agreement can never be reached with so many proposals on the table. I will therefore attempt to narrow the issues down to those that seem to be most prevalent in the minds of the constituents in Beaver River.

One of the most contentious and certainly the most salient proposal is that dealing with distinct society status for Quebec. In a special constitutional questionnaire I sent from my office to every household in Beaver River, I asked the question: "Should Quebec be recognized as a distinct society in the Constitution as defined by its French-speaking majority, unique culture and its civil law tradition?". The vast majority, 79 per cent, said no to recognition while only 21 per cent said yes.

Beaver Riverites, however, are not adverse to acknowledging that Quebec is really a distinct society. What they are adverse to is enshrining this principle in the Constitution. They worry that by doing so in the Constitution, Quebec will be granted not just a special status within Confederation, but in the final analysis, a superior status as well. Those in Beaver River agree and believe in equality. They believe in the equality of all provinces. They believe that their province is as equally distinct in terms of culture as is Quebec. Distinct society status for Quebec is therefore unacceptable to the people of Beaver River.

That is the symbolic part. The mechanical part is this. Although a distinct society has been defined since Meech Lake, it remains all-inclusive. Many commentators in the constituency have expressed concern over the aspect of culture as outlined in the new proposal. How would the word culture be interpreted in the courts? Leon Dion, a respected Laval political scientist, has expressed the opinion that in Quebec "one cannot separate culture and the economy". Thus, it seems to those people in Beaver River that this new definition would be deficient in limiting the power a distinct society clause would have when applied to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Only by restricting the definition rather than making it inclusive might the people of Beaver River accept such a proposal.

Proposal 4 of the government's package deals with aboriginal self-government. This item is especially pertinent to my constituency as approximately 9 per cent of those residing in Beaver River are aboriginal peoples. At present, there appears to be a polarization of attitudes on this question. In my household survey, 49 per cent agree that the aboriginal population of Canada should have the right to self-government while 51 per cent disagreed. This close result seems to be the product of the absence of a concrete definition of what self-government is. As with the definition of distinct society, Beaver Riverites are weary of the broad parameters of the rights and jurisdictions that aboriginal governments might exercise.

One would surely not want to entrench the simple words self-government, leaving it entirely to judges to fill in its practical meaning. It is therefore difficult for the average citizen to comment on the substance of self-government until some actual details of the plan emerge.

Constituents through their letters to me have also expressed a reluctance to say yes to self-government without some prior agreement on taxation and spending measures. Many in Beaver River recognize the plight of the aboriginal peoples of Canada in their struggle for self-determination. They also recognize, however, that the politics of embedding specified cultural, ethnic or racial groups in the fabric of the Constitution is a dangerous game. It may inevitably lead to a competitive, antagonistic relationship between these different groups.

In perpetually exacerbating the differences among Canadians rather than outlining the similarities, many in Beaver River feel that the spiral of ethnic based politics will surely lead further down the road to disunity.

Of all the 28 proposals set down by the government, Senate reform is by far the most important to the people of Beaver River. Time and time again my constituents have implored that this country be given an equal, effective and elected Senate. Nothing short of the Triple-E model is acceptable. Eighty per cent of those who responded to my constitutional questionnaire indicated that elected and effective are not enough. Neither is a two and a half-E Senate enough, or a so-called equitable Senate. The constituents of Beaver River have waited a very long time, in fact decades, to have this basic democratic principle enshrined in the Constitution. They have watched as senates the world over have balanced representation of the majority with representation by region. This basic democratic right can no longer be denied. The citizens of Beaver River ask for a Triple-E Senate and nothing less.

Finally, part III of the government's document: "Preparing for a more prosperous future" received a generally warm reception in my riding. Constituents are, for example, overwhelmingly in favour of broadening section 121, the Common Market clause. Most believe that the provincial and federal governments should work more closely to create an economic union which would facilitate the elimination of trade barriers between the provinces. Still, some questioned the efficacy of such an amendment, in that it seems to clarify an existing power and then proceeds to add restrictions to that exercise. Nevertheless the principle of free trade between the provinces is in accord with the attitude of Beaver River.

Other proposals in this section, however, are not acceptable. A good number of constituents tend to disagree that the mandate of the Bank of Canada should be to achieve and preserve price stability only. The concern is that the proposal here is too narrowly defined. Future monetary authorities may wish to address themselves to interest rates, exchange rates or growth rates, not simply the rate of inflation. Writing this proposal into the Constitution would effectively handcuff policymakers in dealing with unforeseen events to come. This is the feeling of the constituents of Beaver River.

These then are some of the fundamental concerns and ideas voiced in my constituency which I heard time and time again over our five or six week recess. These are not the concerns of constitutional experts, lawyers or professional politicians. These are the concerns and ideas of ordinary Canadians, people who care about this country from sea to sea. These are the concerns and ideas that we, as members of Parliament, must listen to and act upon if Canada is to remain truly strong and free.

I would like to finish by saying that I am conducting a contest in my constituency right now for all high school students called the New Canada contest. It gives young people an opportunity to respond to what kind of new Canada they want to be part of in the 21st century. The contest closes in March. We are going to celebrate with a couple of winners of that contest having a chance to come to Ottawa and spend a couple of days here to see the hub of Canada working. I am excited and want to continue to promote the fact that young people really do care about this country.

"DEGRASSI TALKS"

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I rise to tell you about an event that will be taking place later today at the National Library here in Ottawa.

My colleague, the Minister for National Health and Welfare, will be joining six members of the cast of the popular television show Degrassi High and Ottawa area high school students. They will discuss issues of great importance to teens and young Canadians such as drugs, sex, depression and child sexual abuse.

I would like to congratulate the cast and the crew of Degrassi High, who are here in the House today, for producing a new series entitled Degrassi Talks. Filmed at different locations across Canada, the actors talk to young Canadians about these issues. They tell real life stories encouraging discussion of these very crucial subjects.

I am sure the House will join me in congratulating the cast and the crew of Degrassi Talks and in commending Health and Welfare Canada for sponsoring such a unique program.

BREAST IMPLANTS

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of my colleague and former Islander, the member from Nepean, in calling for an investigation into the product review process within health and research branch. It certainly appears that in the case of silicone gel breast implants, the process did not serve Canadian women as well as it should have.

The onus should be on the producer of a product to prove that the product is safe rather than on others to prove that it is harmful. If there is uncertainty, then surely we should err on the side of safety to protect the health of Canadians.

An estimated 150,000 Canadian women have these implants. The moratorium on sales is not enough. How can this government be satisfied with its actions if the implants are still in stock in doctors' offices and hospitals across the country.

This government must move to recall these products so that we can be guaranteed that they cannot be used. The lack of action on this issue is appalling.

FIRST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the First Ministers' Conference on the economy. Certainly in Atlantic Canada we are feeling the recession in a very tangible way and appreciate the leadership shown by all first ministers in working co-operatively.

While I do not advocate a spending spree by governments, I urge the governments to move on projects that will be done in any case, just do them sooner. I note that the three maritime premiers spoke in support of the fixed link to Prince Edward Island. It is projects like this that will provide the encouragement and the jobs that the business community needs right now.

Another approach is to encourage a call at western diversification, IST and FDBD to expedite private sector applications and cut any red tape for really good projects. Banks should also be urged to participate in the resumption of the economy by loosening up their credit requirements for consumers.

Being a retailer for 20 years, I have never seen tighter controls on consumer financing as right now. The missing link now is confidence.

The combined influence of all the premiers and the Prime Minister will go a long way to resolve this confidence and encourage people to resume their business and buying.

PHARMACEUTICAL INDUSTRY

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, the Minister for International Trade has said that Canada will proceed with legislation to restrict generic drugs regardless of the GATT negotiations.

Before we even consider this, Canadians should first recall this government's promises on Bill C-22. For example, are there 3,000 new jobs in the pharmaceutical research area that were promised by the former Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, now the government House leader? No, the government no longer even talks about jobs.

Are there more jobs in the manufacturing area? No, we have lost more than 700 manufacturing jobs since 1987.

Has price control been effective? No, not when more than 20 per cent of the drugs exceed even the weak price guidelines of the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board.

Bill C-22 was a bad deal for Canadians. We should not accept further weakening of our generic drug laws simply because the United States is forcing it on us. Let us protect jobs and lower drug prices with our own Canadian generic drug industry.

WELFARE

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, this week I read that a Toronto man who recently came to Canada seeking refugee status was arrested for fraud. He had been collecting welfare under three different names.

The most disturbing thing about this is it is not an isolated incident. Metro Toronto police officials told me last week five other refugee claimants were arrested in Toronto for fraud. These five people alone have collected $75,000 since 1990 in illegal welfare assistance.

The government has a responsibility to Canadians to ensure that our tax dollars do not continue financing these widespread incidents of welfare fraud and to guarantee that people who are found guilty of such fraud are deported without delay.

BRAVERY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, two days ago in Ottawa, Joanne Kulwartin demonstrated qualities of resourcefulness, quick-thinking and courage.

This 17-year old high school student acted without concern for her own safety in rescuing a 2-year old and his 82-year old grandfather from their burning townhouse which was thick with smoke.

Moments later Ottawa firefighters Bob Parent and Marc Asselin acted with similar courage in entering the house, climbing the stairs in smoke so dense that they could not see and rescuing 4-year old Sebastien Marier, who was unconscious under a bed.

Sebastien remains in critical condition and our prayers are with him and his family.

Meanwhile, on behalf of their neighbours in Ottawa South and my colleagues in the House of Commons, I would like to celebrate the bravery of Joanne Kulwartin and the two firefighters. Their courage, determination and willingness to risk their own safety is an inspiration to all.

Joanne, Bob and Marc, our hats are off to you in admiration and respect.

Some hon. members: Hear, Hear.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, there has been a lot of ill-informed comment lately about the GATT talks, article XI of that agreement, and the supply management system which controls imports of dairy and poultry into Canada.

For the record, there are three central questions which need to be answered.

First, is supply management a distortion of liberalized trade? Absolutely.

Second, does supply management constitute a barrier to agricultural imports? Again, absolutely.

Third, does Canadian supply management distort total world agricultural trade? Not enough to care about.

Supply management and the higher consumer prices it brings is the cost of maintaining Canada's agricultural infrastructure. For my constituents, that cost is certainly worth it.

PAEDOPHILIA

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, two days ago I received a letter from the Liberal member of Parliament for Scarborough West, the Official Opposition critic for the Solicitor General, purportedly on the subject of paedophilia and the charter of rights.

Upon closer examination, it became clear that the letter was thinly disguised hate literature directed at lesbians and gay men. The letter repeated that most—

Mr. Speaker: This is getting awfully close to a personal attack against that member. I do not know where the hon. member is going.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, the letter repeated that most despicable stereotype that we prey on children, that we are child molesters. It was silent on far more widespread heterosexual paedophilia.

As a gay man, I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that it is these distortions that lead to the appalling levels of discrimination, harassment and violence among my community, a community already devastated by the epidemic of AIDS.

• (1410)

I therefore call upon all members of this House, particularly the leader of the Liberal opposition, to join me in strongly condemning this hate literature and in reaffirming our commitment to a Constitution and to a Canada in which all people including lesbians, gay men, and bisexuals are treated with full equality, respect and dignity.

ENTREPRENEURSHIP

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, once again, the Beauce region in Quebec takes charge of its destiny. Three major partners in the region have decided to create an institute for international trade, to be located at Chaudière—Appalaches. I am referring to the network for business expansion, the Beauce economic council and the Beauce-Appalaches CEGEP.

Being aware how difficult it is for small businesses to carve out a niche for themselves and to compete on international markets, since most businesses do not have all the necessary resources, these socioeconomic partners decided to provide the region's entrepreneurs with a full range of services focusing on international trade: reception and information, consulting, training, prospecting and international marketing.

This is another example of the imaginative and energetic approach of this region to developing entrepreneurship.

MAIL ORDER INDUSTRY

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, for the past six years the American mail order industry received a free gift from the Conservative government.

This government has allowed U.S. firms to ship goods valued under $40 into Canada free of all taxes and charges. However, the Americans have been charging Canadians $8.40 U.S. for every such shipment made by Canadians into the United States. This has cost Canada over 4,000 jobs and $260 million in lost sales.

This insanity is just one more example of how this government has favoured Americans at the expense of Canadian jobs.

Today, six years later, this government has finally decided that Canadians deserve a chance. They are bringing in measures which we hope will provide reciprocity for the Canadian mail order industry.

Canada must charge the Americans the same fees that they charge Canadians for shipping into the United States. Instead of exempting U.S. shipments under $20 as they are proposing to do, Canada must give no exemption whatsoever.

Canada must at last stand up for our Canadian industries and Canadian workers.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Mr. Speaker, farmers in Durham region support the federal government's position on GATT which was developed in concert with farm groups and the provinces.

Grain producers want reductions in export subsidies to end the economic lunacy which has been part of the western world's agriculture policy for too many years.

Producers in supply management sectors want a clarified and strengthened article XI to support a system that has worked well and has not contributed to excessive agricultural production.

On behalf of Durham producers I urge the federal government to go to the wall with its position. We know that some method of supply control must be achieved to solve the world's excessive agricultural production. I find it ironic that our system of supply management has not been seriously considered by many other nations.

AID TO RUSSIA

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, every day in the news Canadians see the plight and starvation of people in Russia and the other republics.

But private citizens are responding. Led by John Powell and Sherry McNeir, two people from Ottawa and Winnipeg respectively, close to 170 tonnes of food and 6 tonnes of medical supplies have been gathered.

Given the size of the shipment, the Russian government has committed itself to sending over some of its military planes to transport the goods. But Russia does not have the money for the fuel.

The office of the Secretary of State for External Affairs has been approached to help cover the estimated cost of $75,000 but has refused, stating that its allocation for aid for Russia has been used up. What an appalling and lamentable response to the generosity of private Canadians and the suffering of Russians.

Farmers, churches, schools, and other Canadians, many of whom face uncertain futures themselves, have reached out to the people of Russia in this extraordinary humanitarian effort.

I urge the government to find the necessary funds immediately to help transport the aid, to help these major human rights issues, and to ensure this effort reaches the needy in Russia.

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, Canada's dairy, egg and poultry industries contribute over $10.2 billion a year to the Canadian economy.

The current Uruguay round of the GATT negotiations presents a do or die situation for our 97,000 dairy, egg and poultry producers and their associates.

Clearly, the stakes are extremely high. Without quantitative import restrictions, these vital agricultural industries will become integrated with their American counterparts. As a result, price stability will be replaced with uncertainty. The pillars of Canada's domestic policy for these industries will be destroyed.

But I think the members opposite will join with me in congratulating the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture because they have spoken out for Canada and Canada's farmers to ensure that Canada's position be known in GATT and that it will be maintained in GATT.

I urge the farmers in this country to get behind this government. It is their friend on this issue. Together, we will win this one for Canada.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

BREAST IMPLANTS

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question once again is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Last year 15,000 Canadian women got breast cancer and 5,000 women died of breast cancer. The issue of breast implant safety was first raised in the House of Commons in April 1990.

I would like to ask the minister on how many occasions did the manufacturers of the Meme implant violate part V of the medical devices regulations? When did he become aware of these violations, and what action did he take?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should point out, first of all, that the Department of National Health and Welfare acts in the best interests of the health of Canadian women in every area that concerns the department, and especially breast implants. As I said yesterday, and as I have said many times, the department makes decisions regarding the drugs or food or medical devices it is asked to evaluate, on the basis of the information it is given and also on the basis of scientific evidence.

Mr. Speaker, the information received by the Department of National Health and Welfare on breast implants, and especially silicone implants, did not, as far as I know, contain any erroneous data that might have led the department to decide otherwise than it did.

[English]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the minister stood in this House and said that if he had any evidence whatsoever he would act.

I have in my hand a copy of a letter that he received last October from his own deputy minister in which he cites proof that the company on at least two occasions violated part V of the medical devices regulations. On at least two occasions, according to his deputy minister, this company failed to follow Canadian law.

I want to ask the minister this: In light of this information which was passed to him last October, why did he do nothing and why does he continue to stand in his place and do nothing?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Hamilton East is in the habit of producing all kinds of documents. I do not question the letter that may have been sent, but I confess I am not familiar with the context in which it was sent. In any case, we will have to look at the letter to which the hon. member referred. I will see exactly what the reference is, and in due time I will have the appropriate response to the hon. member's question.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, for shame! This letter reveals that the company on two occasions violated the regulations for this implant product. My question for the minister still is: When will he do something about the 150,000 women who today are wondering whether the government will protect them? Why did he not act immediately after receiving the letter sent to him on October 30 last year. Why did he do nothing, and why does he continue to do nothing?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, once again, I have no comments on this document at the present time. I will comment in due time.

Perhaps the hon. member will recall that in the case of the Même, which is a manufacturer's trademark, the product was voluntarily withdrawn from the market last April, before I was appointed to this department.

As for other silicone implants, since January companies have been asked and in fact have agreed, on a voluntary basis, to stop providing surgeons with silicone implants. We have been informed by the Association des chirurgiens de la province de Québec—in fact there was a public announcement—that it will no longer use this type of breast implant.

I believe that as usual, our response was based on our knowledge of what had happened. As far as women's health is concerned, Mr. Speaker, I am aware that many women in Canada are watching this matter very carefully. That is why I said, and I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that today, no silicone breast implants are available on the market, and until I have had information to the effect that there is no risk involved, I will no longer allow this type of breast implant on the Canadian market.

JOB TRAINING

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, on January 15 the employment minister chaired a meeting of his OECD counterparts and a discussion of employment and labour market policies. At that meeting the minister recognized that we needed to develop a co-operative strategy to address unemployment created by the major restructuring of the international economy. He also said that we needed to develop training and re-employment programs.

I ask the Minister of Finance, in the absence of the minister of employment: Considering that training programs are indispensable to Canada's global competitiveness, is he still committed to the goals the minister outlined in January?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, I must repeat that we have put in place several strategies in various departments and programs.

We are maintaining our programs and we offer programs that give workers seeking employment an opportunity to learn more, acquire new skills and become better able to compete in a world of globalized markets.

We are respecting the measures that were announced and we are on schedule.

[English]

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, an internal memo in my possession from Employment and Immigration Canada reveals that the government is in the process of dismantling existing training programs in metro Toronto. The memo calls for budget cuts of 20 to 50 per cent, which will effectively kill many of the programs.

The programs in question help those most in need. They have a 100 per cent subscription rate. They have huge waiting lists. Eighty-five per cent of the graduates find work.

In an age when training is so vital to our nation, why would this government even consider or give any thought to having cuts in this most devastating economic recession? We need to train this nation. Can the minister guarantee us that these programs, and more important these people, will be protected?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, I really find my learned colleague opposite to be exaggerating.

We are continuing to dialogue with the provinces and trying to see how we can work with the provinces in Canada to be able to attain our common objective of ensuring a higher standard of living and respecting workers who are in search of employment.

I do not want to hear it said that we are not following our budget, because over the year, further to our decision in the wake of Bill C-21, which unfortunately was passed too late, we invested large amounts. We are working together with the provinces—Ontario, Quebec and the rest—to make it easier for every person who is out of work to get back into society and the economy.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

This government was warned of the devastating effects the GST could have on the economy. Since the GST has come in we have seen those devastating effects: thousands of bankruptcies, some 52,000 retail jobs lost, and a loss of $1 billion to the Canadian economy.

I want to say to the Minister of Finance that it must be devastating to Canadians, to retailers and to consumers to hear that the government's answer to cross-border shopping is to have Canadians pay more tax. The question is how do we make goods acceptable here, not how do Canadians pay more tax.

Given the effects the GST has had, will the government finally look at a solution that will work and withdraw the GST?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the information I am about to impart to the hon. member may be devastating to her. I have in my hand a pre-budget submission by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association which says in part that lower interest rates had helped reduce corporate financing charges in 1991 by $500 million and, second, I quote: "The implementation of the GST has also been of significant benefit to the manufacturing sector. The tax savings that manufacturers realized by the elimination of the federal sales tax on investment goods may have been as high as $3.5 billion in 1991".

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, this is great news, I suppose, but can the minister tell us why there are increasing bankruptcies and why we are losing billions of dollars to cross-border shopping if it so much improved the manufacturing sector in this country?

I have a supplementary question for the Deputy Prime Minister. Clearly the GST is contributing to cross-border shopping. More taxes are not an answer. I would again like to ask the minister whether he is prepared to consider removing the GST in order to increase shopping here in Canada and not outside Canada.

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member takes great joy in blaming all the ills of the economy on the GST. I will quote further from the document because that might be very revealing to her as well. It goes on to say: "Manufacturers passed these tax savings and considerably more along to the consumers in the form of lower prices".

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mazankowski: There it is, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. member: They don't like good news.

Mr. Mazankowski: "While the elimination of the federal sales tax alone would have allowed manufacturers to reduce selling prices by 1.2 per cent in 1991, industry selling prices in Canada actually declined by 2.8 per cent over the course of the year". The GST has had the effect of reducing prices and lowering the cost to the consumer, not increasing them as the hon. member alleges.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

The GST has added to unemployment. There is over 10 per cent unemployment; 1.5 million Canadians are unemployed. They cannot afford to make the purchases this minister is talking about, but people are going across the border. That is the problem for Canada.

Yesterday in this House the Minister of Employment and Immigration said that there are skilled jobs for people to take. I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister: Is it a fact that this government is prepared to cut training funds for skills training, the very skills that his minister said were needed?

In fact the memos we heard about earlier today, and I have copies here, indicate a 20 to 50 per cent cut in training. Is it correct that the government is prepared to do this and cut workers off at the knees by cutting back training?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member does not have to take my word for the fact that the GST has helped the manufacturing sector. She can phone the Canadian Manufacturers' Association herself and find out what the conditions might have been had it not been for the implementation of the GST, had it not been for the withdrawal of the silent killer of jobs, the federal sales tax.

In so far as training funds are concerned, I only repeat to the hon. member that $3.1 billion has been allocated this year and $3.4 billion is allocated next year.

JOB TRAINING

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

What is at issue is the credibility of this minister and of his government. We have been told time and time again that this government is committed to training and retraining. If that is the case, can he explain why the directors general sent a memo on December 20, 1991 asking areas managers right across the country to prepare contingency plans for three scenarios: (1) a 20 per cent reduction, (2) a 35 per cent reduction and (3) a 50 per cent reduction in community based training funds?

• (1430)

Can the Minister of Finance explain this discrepancy? Why is the minister saying one thing in the House of Commons when his area managers are being told another thing down at street level?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, I have a list of investments that we made in training our workers: programs like job development, which got $257 million in 1991; community development, $150 million; job entry, $412 million. Mr Speaker, we gave out some $19 billion in income support last year. What we are trying to do is to build an economy in which our workers can find employment and we do not intend to cut our programs.

[English]

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance is a phoney. He stands in this House and he says that his government is committed to training.

I would like the Minister of Finance to have the courage to stand and explain to the thousands of people who rely on these training programs why this government has decided to cut $100 million from community based training and why the area manager in the Toronto region says in a memo dated January 10, 1992: "We will be forced to terminate projects due to budgetary reductions".

Can the Minister of Finance explain to these people who are desperate for jobs and who want to be trained in order to fill those 300,000 vacancies that the Minister of Finance spoke about yesterday why this minister is cutting them down? Can he explain why he is cutting $100 million from community based training?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, last year we invested $3 billion in worker training and in the coming year we definitely intend to continue working with the private sector, the provinces and especially the workers, who must do their part to find work and register for our training courses.

CANADA–UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister for International Trade.

We have just learned that a preliminary U.S. customs report has ruled that Canadian built Honda Civics do not meet the North American content requirements set out in the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement and will be subject to a 2.5 per cent tariff.

I ask the minister: Doesn't this show that the free trade agreement is not providing the secure access to the American market for Canada which was its original justification by his government? Isn't this an example of rising U.S. protectionism and a blatant attempt to discourage future automotive investment in Canada?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I have spoken to my counterpart in the United States as has the ambassador. We have both made very, very clear our dissatisfaction at the way this audit has been conducted and the results of the audit. Once we see what the specific elements of the audit are, if it is appropriate we will take action under the terms of the free trade agreement.

Let me also say that we do have protections under the free trade agreement which we would not have had through the dispute settlement mechanism provisions, as well as the elements of the U.S.–Canada Trade Commission where we can discuss these things, get them resolved, and not leave them outstanding as was the case prior to the free trade agreement coming into place.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, why won't the minister admit, in the face of this latest example of harassment by the U.S. authorities of Canadian manufactured exports to the United States, that the free trade agreement, in spite of what he says, when it comes to Canadian interests is simply not working; it is a flop?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, during the time the free trade agreement has been in place, we have seen the trade surplus of Canada with the United States increase from $14.2 billion to $17.5 billion. We have seen our exports increase by $8 billion, about 7.5 per cent. We saw an all-time record high of exports in August of last year. Surely that is an indication the free trade agreement is not hurting but helping Canadian exporters.

I remind the hon. member that before the free trade agreement was in place, we did not have recourse to judicial practices where we could go to the chapter 19 dispute settlement mechanism. Now if we have disputes, we have a legal basis on which we can protest them.

BREAST IMPLANTS

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the minister of health said that he was still waiting for evidence that silicone breast implants were unsafe.

I wonder if he is aware of what is going on within his own department. Staff within the Health Protection Branch have been instructed to cut and paste company supplied data on this issue and that is how decisions are being made. Those who have objected to this process have either been silenced or sacked.

Will the minister now take this issue seriously, order an independent inquiry where all of the evidence can be presented, looked at and a reasonable decision made on behalf of Canadian women and the health of Canadian women?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in my previous answers, I referred to processes established in the department of health to deal with medical devices. I must mention, as I told the same hon. member yesterday, that we also set up a register to which women who have had a breast implant can refer to give information concerning their reaction or their level of satisfaction with the implant.

Second, within the department, I asked the deputy minister to implement a process for a thorough review not only of breast implants but of all medical devices that are used. Mr. Speaker, I think that these measures will keep us up to date and ensure that the policies of the department of health take account of women's health, especially in this case—the health of women who for their own reasons decided to proceed with the operation.

Accordingly, I met with Marcella Tardif yesterday. I talked with her at length about this subject and I think that we are doing what can be done. I repeat what I said earlier: If I have any doubt whatever about the advisability of allowing silicone breast implants back on the market, no one, including the hon. member, will again see these breast implants on the market in Canada.

[English]

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, that is a long answer but it is not an independent inquiry. It does not address the issue of taking company supplied data from Dow-Corning, cutting and pasting it and using it as departmental evidence.

If the minister will not agree to an independent inquiry, will he at least refer this issue to the status of women subcommittee of the House of Commons and ensure that all of his departmental staff who are asked to appear do appear on this critical issue?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to considering the request to refer the case to the committee on the status of women. In general, officials of the department of health who are called to testify before committees do so. Now, again, I prefer to consider the request and see, because the committees have mechanisms and procedures. If that meets this request and it is what they want, Mr. Speaker, of course we will co-operate with the committee, as we have always done in the past.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked the minister of employment what he was going to do to save thousands of jobs in the pulp and paper industry. His answer to me and to this House was that they could use the unemployment benefits that were available to them.

We have a better idea. What we want to do on this side of the House is save all of those jobs in the pulp and paper industry.

My question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Will he instruct all of his ministers, all of the Crown corporations in Canada to use only fine paper products produced in Canada. This will immediately create full employment, full production in the paper mills that produce fine paper products in this country. Would the Deputy Prime Minister issue that directive today please?

• (1440)

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, I must admit that as a government, we are very concerned about the employment situation that now exists in the pulp and paper industry.

We are therefore studying mechanisms which could meet all the needs that are specific and different from one company to another and of course we are making available to laid-off workers all our job strategy programs. We are trying in the short term to be able to meet the financial, cultural and economic needs of every worker.

[English]

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Thank you, Madam Minister for that answer. However, the job strategy is not what we had in mind. What we are trying to do is keep the jobs that the people are presently working in today.

If we could receive this direction from the Deputy Prime Minister, the Island Mill in New Westminster, British Columbia and Provincial Papers in Thunder Bay could return immediately to full production, but more importantly, to full employment.

We already know that the Americans give their U.S. mills a 7 per cent benefit in price when they supply paper. We do not and I think this bends the free trade agreement.

We know that the fine paper products made in this country beat other products in quality. They are very competitive in price. We also know that there are simple solutions at times to the employment problem.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister today: Make the directive to all ministers and all Crown agencies to use the fine paper products in this country.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his suggestion.

I simply advise him that I will take his question as a representation.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue.

The minister knows that cross-border shopping cost Canada over $2.3 billion in 1991. He is also well aware that one of the major incentives for Canadians to cross the border is the attraction of cheaper gasoline in the U.S.

Later today the minister will be announcing measures he is prepared to take to stem the flow of cross-border shopping. Will he include a reduction of federal excise tax on gas in these measures so that this inducement for Canadians to cross into the U.S. will be eliminated?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, it would be unfair of me to make part of the announcement at this time.

I can only tell the hon. member that the elements of the announcement that will be made at 3.30 p.m. in Room 130-S, which is a change of venue, are going to be based on consultations with the provinces and with the private sector. There will be consultation with the border communities and the consumers' association.

Let me point out to the House that the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party and others have said that there will be increased taxes. There will be no increased federal taxes in this announcement.

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance.

Given the impact higher gasoline prices have on forcing Canadians across the border, will the minister assure Canadians that at the very least the upcoming budget will not include any increase in the federal tax on gasoline? Why will the minister not commit himself today?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, there is more than the gasoline tax that has had an impact on cross-border shopping, it is a multifaceted issue.

If the hon. member would like me to make representations to the provincial governments which also have high gasoline taxes, I will do that as well.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

While Canada was ostensibly looking for a strengthened article XI(2)(c)(i) of the GATT, we want—

Mr. Speaker: Please. The difficulty the Chair is in is that we have an opposition motion today which refers to the whole of the GATT issue, of which we have been hearing in the House. The hon. member seems to be anticipating an order of the day, but the Chair is having difficulty with the question. He may want to rephrase his question, but it is clearly out of order at the moment.

Mr. Althouse: What efforts did the minister make in pursuing the government's so-called balanced approach to the strengthened and clarified article XI? The world has not noticed these efforts. What were they? What will he be doing to have it put in the Dunkel report?

Mr. Speaker: I think I have to stay with my original view on it. I have to advise the hon. member for Mackenzie that his question is out of order. He may want to reconsider his position and come back, but at the moment I think I must move on to the next member.

TRADE

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade. The state of Maine has an emergency bill before its Senate which is designed to stop a Canadian success story, Irving Oil Limited, in its efforts to expand its operations into the American market. This is one more example of Canada not gaining market access under the poorly negotiated Tory free trade deal. This is not a free trade deal, it is a one-way deal. What does the minister intend to do to remedy this situation?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had given me notice of the question, which is a fairly specific question, I would have been very happy to give him a response. If he could give me more information, I will get back to him.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, there is a piece of legislation in the Senate, which I am advised the minister's office is aware of, which is designed purely to stop Irving Oil from expanding into the Maine market and into the United States market. This is not an independent or an isolated event. They have tried to control the lobster industry. We all know about shakes and shingles and now there is this emergency legislation. Why does the minister not admit to Canadians that they failed to negotiate market access in their free trade deal?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): I think I heard my hon. friend say something about the legislation in the U.S. Senate. Surely my friend is aware that there are any number of bills that will be presented by U.S. senators or by U.S. congressmen as a basis for making a point. It is similar to them asking a question in Question Period. They want to get their point of view on the record. Putting a bill in is one way of doing that, not unlike a private member's bill. I think my hon. friend is aware that if there is an attempt by U.S. legislation to inhibit the capacity or the ability of companies to enter the U.S. market that is contrary to the free trade agreement, we will fight it very, very hard.

CHILDREN'S RIGHTS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Yesterday, during discussions that the Leader of the Opposition had with the Secretary-General and other senior officials of the United Nations, several matters of concern to Canada came up, one of them specifically dealing with children. Close to 50 countries, many of them very poor countries, have already completed and finalized their national plans of action and are in fact implementing them. Canada is not one of them.

I want to ask the minister why has Canada, which co-chaired the summit on children, been so neglectful in living up to its commitments of that summit? When will this government start leading instead of following in dealing with the plight of children in Canada and the world?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, before Christmas we said we would sign the convention for children and we did, as was said by the Prime Minister. I said at the time that a plan would be presented some time in March, after consultation with the provinces. We in Canada once in a while have to consult the provinces. We do and we did. I believe that I can live up to what I said in terms of March. The plan of action for children should be presented to the House in the middle of March.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): I hope the minister is faster on this than he was on the question of breast implants on which we are still waiting for a proper decision.

HAITI

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question on another humanitarian problem. There is a tragedy in Haiti. Thousands of refugees are being forcibly repatriated to misery and oppression. Canada, as a member of the OAS, has a special obligation to these refugees.

What concrete action will the government take to help these people? What representations is it making to the American government to come up with a more humane solution?

• (1450)

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the best solution for the refugees is to continue to work on improving policies within Haiti. Canada has played an important and significant role with other OAS members and the eight nations that visited Haiti to look into the situation. I often discuss it with the other ministers of foreign affairs and with people in Washington.

MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY STANDARDS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

In the Canada Gazette of December 21 regarding amendments to the Motor Vehicle Safety Act there was a paragraph that reads:

> The amendments do not require vehicles manufactured to United States and California emission standards to comply with Canadian emission levels. There are other areas of double standards in the Motor Vehicle Safety Act regarding notice of defect regulations and also the metric calibration regulations.

As the free trade agreement is phased in, these really hurt the Canadian industry. Will the minister move to either lower the Canadian standards to the U.S. standards or require that American vehicles meet our standards?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will certainly recognize that the numerous issues that he has raised in his question cannot be answered on the floor of the House. I know that one of his main concerns is related to odometers. One of the suggestions he has put forward would require the opening up of the odometers, which I think he will recognize is of grave concern to us. Our basic principle is to be concerned with the safety of the cars, but at the same time not allow illegal tampering with the odometers.

We are examining the suggestion that he has put forward on the odometers, and all the others. I thank him for his very explicit letter. I hope to be able to give him a very detailed answer very shortly.

HOUSING

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance or the acting minister.

At the First Ministers' Conference this week there was broad support from a number of premiers on the proposal for first-time home buyers to use their RRSPs for down payments. We all know that the RRSP proposal will not cost the taxpayers anything. It will provide a stimulus for the housing industry which is still steadily declining and which has left thousands of workers unemployed. In fact, housing starts were down again to their lowest levels in nine months.

I want to ask the minister why this government is not acting on this proposal now. What is it waiting for? Consumers want this proposal today.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, as you know, this government reduced the requirement of a down payment from 10 per cent to 5 per cent under CMHC insured mortgages. The housebuilders' association has informed us that this has created a great deal of activity since being announced. The housing starts in January were down. They are traditionally down in January in Canada. It is not the greatest time to start house building. CMHC is sticking to its projections that there will be 180,000 starts in this year, which is a significant increase over last year.

As far as the RRSP suggestion that has been made by certain provinces, not all, that is being considered at the present time.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, the minister will know that 8 out of 10 premiers in fact pushed for the RRSP proposal. He also knows that the private sector, as well as all the provincial governments, even an all-party committee of this House, has endorsed the concept of the RRSP proposal for first-time home buyers, including this government's own members.

When will this minister and this government stop playing politics with this issue? Homebuilders want to work and consumers want to buy homes. Why will this government not act today and announce this program?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the homebuilders have been most laudatory of the government's actions so far in housing and have let us know that. It also informed us that the increase in activity has been significant.

An hon. member: You are playing politics with the RRSP thing.

Mr. McDermid: We are not playing politics with the RRSP thing. We are looking at it very, very carefully. When you are looking at this, you are talking about retirement benefits and you are talking about housing benefits and changing the philosophy on that. It is something that is very serious and has to be looked at in great detail before a decision can be made.

TRADE

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct this question to the minister of trade.

I would like to deal with the question of the barriers which have now been put in place against exports from Canada of Honda automobiles. This is going to be something which will have very serious effects on all future Japanese investment in the auto industry in this country.

I want to ask the minister of trade if his latest step against the spirit and the letter of the free trade agreement by the United States is not in fact a sign that Simon Reisman was absolutely correct in saying that the United States was behaving like a thug in the way it was treating us in terms of our trade relations.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I made it very, very clear in response to a previous question that the government takes very seriously the implications of what has happened in this Honda audit. We are going to study it very carefully. We will be reviewing it closely with our Revenue Canada people as well as the U.S. customs people and other members of the administration. If there is a need for any further action on this through any dispute settlement provisions or any other way that we can support the Honda company here, we will do so.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, in fact there is action that can be taken here in Canada. The CAW has just suggested that Japanese cars should be subject here to the same kind of value added conditions which exist for North American cars produced in this country.

I want to ask the minister of trade if he would put into effect in this country Canadian content regulations on Japanese vehicles similar to those that affect Ford, Chrysler and General Motors and thereby solve the problem through Canadian action. Certainly that is a solution which would give us extra jobs in this country.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, one wrong does not make another wrong any better.

The hon. member is suggesting that he wants to see a closed market. Canada today has something like 17 per cent of the North American assembly production and he is saying "tighten the market". One of the results of that might be that we have less assembly production within Canada.

PAY EQUITY

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, yesterday after the Pay Equity Eleven met with the Minister Responsible for the Status of Women, the CBC reported that the minister is rarely, if ever, consulted on the matter of pay equity by her colleagues.

My question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Why does this minister not consult with the Minister Responsible for the Status of Women on a matter of such great importance to the women of Canada and the women of the Public Service?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to reaffirm here before I discuss a particular aspect that Treasury Board is still absolutely committed to equal pay for work of equal value. We are presently in front of the Human Rights Commission because when we decided to invest $370 million to correct pay equity which had not been corrected by the Liberals, we asked our employees to provide us with information that we committed ourselves to keep secret. We have now been asked to make this information public and we are contesting that. We have been advised that we should not proceed with this. We are not dragging our heels, we are proceeding as diligently as possible.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, the minister is not dragging his heels by finally pulling them out of the mud. The women in the Public Service might have a different idea.

My supplementary question is for the minister responsible for the status of women. It is the responsibility of this minister and her office to keep on top of an issue that is absolutely crucial to the equality of women and men in Canada. Why has the minister closed her eyes to the abominable situation of a government that will not follow its own pay equity laws?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I would like to assure my hon. colleague, as the President of the Treasury Board has said, that this government has indeed made great strides forward with respect to pay equity: the $317 million settlement, $81 million each year. There is a legitimate difference of opinion about some of the technical aspects of pay equity and that is now before the human rights tribunal, the appropriate place for that resolution to be dealt with, as the members of the PSAC women's committee indicated their support.

I have indicated the ongoing discussions I will have with my colleagues and with the women workers of the Public Service to ensure that those procedures move ahead as expeditiously and as fairly as possible.

WAYS AND MEANS

TABLING OF NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 83(1), I wish to table two notices of Ways and Means motions respecting amendments to the Excise Tax Act, the Excise Act, the Customs Act and amendments to the Customs Tariff. I ask that an Order of the Day be designated for consideration of the motions.

POINTS OF ORDER

ANSWER DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I want to indicate to the House that I consult, on a very regular basis, my colleague, the minister responsible for the status of women.

OPPOSITION DAY MOTION

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Before Orders of the Day are called, I wish to indicate that the government will not consider the vote that will be held later this day as a question of confidence in the government.

The government has reviewed the motion which has been placed on notice by the New Democratic Party as the subject for today's Opposition Day debate and feel that members must be able to debate this most important issue on the basis of its merits without being constrained by the question of it being a confidence motion.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, on behalf of members on this side, I want to congratulate the government House leader for this spirit of reform with regard to this particular measure. We look forward to the healthy debate which will follow Routine Proceedings today.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I too want to say that we appreciate the decision by the government House leader. Obviously he listened to some very compelling arguments concerning the need to have a free vote on this critical issue.

I think that if the vote is to go in the affirmative it will certainly send a very clear signal as to how the representatives of the people of Canada feel on this critical issue.

Mr. Speaker: I should advise hon. members I have a point of order from the hon. member for Timmins—Chapleau and then I have a short ruling to make.

ANSWER DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, and please direct me if I am rising under the wrong order.

Today in response to a question, the Minister of State for Employment and Immigration said, regarding the reductions being made to training programs, that the government had spent millions of dollars in 1991 and continues to spend millions of dollars for training again in 1992.

I wish to offer an opportunity to the Minister of State to rise and correct that statement. As we all know, under Bill C-21 the government has withdrawn all funding to training—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member very kindly asked me if I might give him some guidance. The hon. member is not content with an answer that was given. There may be good reason for that, or otherwise. However, the hon. member really is getting into debate.

It is a question of disagreement about what the facts are. That sounds like debate. If the hon. member can persuade me that it is not debate, I might out of great generosity change my mind.

I will hear him further.

Mr. Samson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. If it is debate I apologize. Very simply put, the government does not pay into the UI fund. The UI fund pays for all training that takes place today. How can the minister say that the government is paying for this training? It is not true.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member certainly has some support in the Chamber for his proposition, and there is some editorial comment as well.

I must say to the hon. member that I cannot hear him further at the moment. Perhaps he can find some other way to engage the minister or ministers on the same issue.

PRIVILEGE

CRITERIA FOR ADMISSIBILITY OF QUESTION DURING ORAL QUESTION PERIOD—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I promised yesterday that I would return with respect to a question which was put—

—by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier yesterday, a question on a subject that is of course very important to all members of this House.

[English]

I think hon. members will remember that yesterday I said there were really two issues. One is whether the question as put was in or out of order. The second is whether the subject matter of the question can be pursued in the Chamber.

I think I was correct in clearly pointing out to the House that there were two issues.

The issue I have to decide is whether the question as put was within the rules. I should say to hon. members that the substance of the issue concerned comments made by a Canadian who was appointed to a board by the Government of Canada relating to the question of bilingualism.

I have looked very carefully at the question as put which was:

> Will the Prime Minister call Mr. Crispo, tell him that the impression he left with his comments is wrong, dead wrong, absolutely wrong? Will he ask Mr. Crispo to get his facts straight or keep his mouth shut?

Mr. Dingwall: Good advice.

Mr. Speaker: I must respond to this issue in a purely procedural manner. My judgment yesterday was that it is out of order as asked; it is not seeking information.

I still maintain that as asked it is not within the administrative competence of the government.

Having said that, as I think all hon. members conceded yesterday, the issue is of importance. The hon. government House leader said:

> I can say on behalf of the government with assurance that Mr. Crispo does not speak for the Government of Canada.

Now at that point we had some discussion as to the question and perhaps we were also getting on to some discussion of the issue itself. I have to say that I remain with my ruling of yesterday. I am also indicating to hon. members that there are probably other ways to pursue the issue in Question Period.

DIVORCE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-332, an act to amend the Divorce Act (granting of access to, or custody of, a child to a grandparent).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Wilbee: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to make sure that grandparents, who are very often a stabilizing influence in family life, have equal access to the spouses in a divorce situation. Rather than having to go to court with a lot of cost, this bill would allow them access similar to spouses in the action.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Mr. Wilbee moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

JUSTICE

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I have today, pursuant to Standing Order 36, the signatures of 39 residents of Canada in support of the parents of Nina de Villiers. I draw this to the attention of the House.

These petitioners request that Parliament recognizes that crimes of violence against the person are serious and abhorrent to society and amends the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act of 1972 and the Parole Act accordingly.

These petitioners request that Parliament recognizes that crimes of violence against the person are serious and abhorrent to society and amends the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act of 1972 and the Parole Act accordingly.

EAST TIMOR

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): I have a second petition, Mr. Speaker, to present pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The undersigned 40 petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to condemn the Indonesian military occupation of East Timor and the genocide of the East Timorese people, to support publicly the right of the East Timorese to determine their own destiny by referendums and free elections, and to support these causes in the United Nations and all other international arenas.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to introduce a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, on behalf of a number of constituents from British Columbia.

They are concerned about the inadequate funding of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and are asking the federal government to ensure that proper funding is possible to enable the RCMP to fulfil its mandate and its role as the only visible police force for many communities across British Columbia and other parts of Canada.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): On another matter, Mr. Speaker, I have a petition, again from residents of the North Thompson Valley primarily in British Columbia, pointing out the petitioners' concerns regarding a plan to dam the North Thompson Valley in an effort to divert the North Thompson River into the San Diego, California area.

The petitioners are asking that this government simply announce that Canadian rivers will not be sold to the United States.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by several hundred Canadians, residents of Ontario, Prince Edward Island and British Columbia.

The petitioners point out that in October 1985 the subcommittee on equality rights of the justice committee submitted a report to this House recommending that the Canadian Human Rights Act be amended to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation in all areas of federal jurisdiction. They point out that in March 1986 the federal government accepted this report and its recommendations. They point out that the Canadian Human Rights Commission has consistently called for this amendment to the Human Rights Act and that Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba and Yukon have such protection included in their human rights acts.

Therefore they urge the government and the Parliament of Canada to act and immediately bring forth an amendment to add sexual orientation to the Canadian Human Rights Acts as a prohibited ground of discrimination.

CROATIA

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton) Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise today, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition which has been certified correct in terms of form and content.

The hundreds of signatories in my riding of Sarnia—Lambton had called upon the federal government to recognize Croatia officially. I know that these petitioners and all Canadians were pleased and applauded the January 15, 1992 announcement by the federal government giving official recognition to Croatia as an independent and sovereign state.

MINING

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and duty to present a petition from my constituents in the Dawson City, Yukon area.

These constituents, who are representatives of the Han Nation and Dawson Indian Band, are concerned about a particular piece of land where there is placer mining activity. They are particularly concerned that the Government of Canada look into this and make sure that all of the agreements heretofore made in the interest of aboriginal people are respected. That piece of land at the Klondike and Yukon Rivers called Tr'o-ju-wech'in is an extremely important piece of land.

Therefore my constituents ask the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to take all steps necessary to protect their rights and honour constitutionally binding obligations made by this House and Senate in 1867. They ask the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to prevent any further mining activity within the old village site of Tr'o-ju-wech'in.

HARBOURS

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am pleased to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents from Cardigan, Prince Edward Island.

They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to urge the government to ensure that the necessary maintenance and repairs are made to small craft harbour facilities in Prince Edward Island.

DIVORCE ACT

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition with 40 signatures that has been certified correct.

At the present there are no provisions in the Divorce Act of Canada or in any other federal legislation to provide a right for grandparents to have access to their grandchildren when parents may place obstacles in the way of such access.

The petitioners are requesting that the Divorce Act of Canada of 1985 be amended so that in no case may the father or mother, without serious cause, place obstacles to personal relations between the child and his grandparents. Failing agreement between the parties, the modalities of the relations are to be settled by the court.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present a petition signed by hundreds of residents of Quebec, British Columbia and other parts of Canada. Your petitioners call upon the House to pass legislation that would include the term "sexual orientation" in the Canadian Human Rights Act. Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba and Yukon have already passed similar legislation. It is now time for the Parliament of Canada to do the same.

[English]

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I too have the distinct pleasure and honour to rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition signed by hundreds of Canadians, a whole whack of whom are from Alberta and I believe a few from Scarborough West.

They call on this House to ensure that government and Parliament act immediately to bring forward an amendment to add sexual orientation to the Canadian Human Rights Act as a prohibited ground of discrimination. This is a wise and worth-while petition.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise today, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present two petitions.

First, the petitioners from various places such as Okanagan Falls, Penticton, Naramata, Oliver and Osoyoos in the riding of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt point out that the CRTC hearings on the Unitel bid to take over or to become involved in a telecommunications area in the province of British Columbia and elsewhere should be integrated with development of over-all Canadian telecommunications policy.

The petitioners urge the Minister of Communications to oppose Unitel's bid to compete with the long distance services of Canada's telephone companies. They also urge him to consult with all affected parties who will be impacted severely by the deregulation of the service and further urge him to hold local hearings in our communities before deciding the fate of Canada's telecommunications system.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I also have a petition from people from all over British Columbia, various other points in Alberta and throughout Canada.

They petition Parliament to ensure that the government and Parliament act immediately to bring forward amendments to add sexual orientation to the Canadian Human Rights Act as a prohibited ground of discrimination.

QUESTION ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, Question No. 49 will be answered today.

[Text]

Question No. 49—Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River):

With respect to Canada Post Corporation, a) are over 30 employees discharged each month b) are there over 100,000 employee grievances outstanding c) does it take an employee more than a year to have an arbitration case heard d) do over 80 per cent of the employees discharged have their jobs returned through the arbitration procedure e) do employees rehired after arbitration receive full pay for their time off f) does Canada Post delay the repayment of lost salaries of reinstated employees, and, if so, for what reasons?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): In so far as Canada Post Corporation is concerned:

a) In the 1990–91 fiscal year, 317 employees were discharged or released from the corporation. This averages out the approximately 26 per month. Approximately 20 per cent of these employees were "released from incapacity". In these cases the employee continues to work in his/her regular position until the matter is either settled between the parties or decided by an arbitrator. In these circumstances, the employee suffers absolutely no loss in pay. Approximately 55 of the 317 employees were discharged for their failure to meet the requirements during their probationary period. Approximately 75 per cent were for disciplinary matters such as insubordination or theft.

b) There are approximately 135,000 employee grievances in the system at this time. To reduce the number and to expedite the resolution of these grievances, a separate fast-track process was agreed to by the parties in March of 1990 (the Backlog Arbitration Resolution). It should be noted that this number is not a clear representation of the employee–employer relationship at Canada Post since a single incident often generates hundreds of individual grievances for example, if a supervisor is alleged to have performed bargaining unit work, the entire shift will be encouraged to grieve the matter.

c) In many cases, yes. Every discharge/release is grieved by either the employee or the union on behalf of the employee. Due to the number of grievances in the system, the corporation and the CUPW agreed to give discharge cases priority (agreement reached March 4, 1988 and included in Appendix "C" of the current collective agreement). Even so, many of these employees are forced to wait months for their cases to be heard. The discharge/release arbitration cases must be scheduled in the order in which they were referred to arbitration and are assigned to arbitrators (who are outlined in the collective agreement) in rotation of their availability dates. These arbitrators, who are assigned specific regions of the country, provide an average of approximately four hearing dates per month. The process is further complicated by the fact that many cases require more than one hearing date for completion.

d) No. A review of the corporations' statistics concerning arbitral awards indicated that only 7 per cent of discharge grievances were completely sustained by the arbitrator (i.e.: reinstated with full compensation and seniority and without penalty). In 57 per cent of the grievances, the employee was reinstated with terms and conditions of employment, time served or some combination of both. In many of the cases, the reinstatement (i.e.: the employee had several years of seniority or suffered from an alcohol/drug problem) or that although some form of discipline was warranted, discharge was too harsh a penalty. Finally, 36 per cent of these discharged/released grievances were either denied by the arbitrator or withdrawn by the union (i.e.: the employee was not reinstated).

e) Employees who have been reinstated by the arbitrator are paid as per the arbitrator's award. In the case of an administrative discharge (released for incapacity), the employee continues to work while the case awaits arbitration and therefore sufers no loss of pay. In the case where an employee is reinstated after being discharged for disciplinary reasons, the corporation will ask the arbitrator to determine whether or not the employee made a reasonable effort to mitigate his/her loss (i.e.: did the employee seek other employment during the period of time not worked?). In addition, the arbitrator may substitute a suspension without pay for periods up to the amount of time between the discharge and the arbitration hearing. Generally, the suspension will be of a shorter duration; however, no pay is owed for that period. Any money earned by an employee during the suspension (mitigation) reduces the pay owed by the corporation.

f) No. The arbitrator's decision is final and binding on the parties. In some cases, however, the question of mitigation is raised (see part e). In these matters, the corporation will ask the arbitrator to reopen the case to determine whether or not the reinstated employee made a reasonable effort to mitigate his/her loss during the period of discharge.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary has been answered.

Mr. Cooper: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie) moved:

That this House call on the government to support unequivocally any final GATT accord that:

(a) provides for the maintenance of viable and effective supply management programs as an essential element of Canadian agricultural policy;

(b) ensures the ability of Canada, through a clarified article XI, to control effectively imports of milk, eggs, hatching eggs, chicken and turkey, and products containing a majority of supply managed products;

(c) permits Canada to retain the Crow benefit in its present form which was necessary for the development of the Canadian prairies and which continues to be necessary for the viability of that region and the nation;

(d) reduces export subsidies that so grievously hurt Canadian producers; and

(e) requires participating governments to provide impact assessments to their national legislatures prior to acceptance.

Mr. Dingwall: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Under the provisions of Standing Orders 41 and 43(2) the respective parties have the option of splitting their time accordingly.

I am wondering if there would be a disposition within the House so members of our party would be allowed to split their time into seven minutes of speaking and three minutes of questions and answers, thereby utilizing the 30 minutes which would be given to our side.

That is the way in which we would like to proceed for the remainder of the day.

I had some consultations briefly with the parliamentary secretary as well as with the NDP House leader. I am wondering if there would be a disposition for our party to proceed that way.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I would like to indicate to the House and to the House leader of the Official Opposition that yes, we would be happy to co-operate on those conditions.

I want to indicate to him as well that we on this side, after our first speaker, the Minister of Agriculture, would also like to split our time.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43(2), again, I think that we should proceed this way. Any party will have the flexibility to break up its speakers into any segments. It should be left up to that particular organization.

The principle is certainly supported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I want to clarify one point. The Liberals have indicated that they would like to go seven and three.

On our side, we wish to do the ten and five which is an exact half-split.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I may remind hon. members that in view of the three-minute period for questions and comments, their questions and comments must be concise.

[English]

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, to begin I would like to recognize that today the House has come forward with an unusual ruling and precedent setting ruling, I hope, in that the government has finally recognized that at times opposition days can be used in the manner that today's day is going to be used. This is something that backbenchers on all sides of the House have been fighting for ever since the McGrath commission in the mid-1980s. Today we finally have the first opportunity to permit that proposal to operate.

There were attempts last fall. I was part of that effort as well. I tried to get the House to discuss the question of the need for a special grain payment of some $1.3 billion to grain and horticultural farmers. The government chose not to participate in that. It wanted to take the ruling and the precedent and the tradition that opposition days were supply days. This meant that the government and the opposition had to be opposed to each other and that if the vote were positive the government would have to fall. We tried to assure them that that would not be the way the opposition would consider such a vote in that case.

I am pleased that we seem to have come to that point today at the beginning of this debate, particularly since the topic on the table today is so important for a broad section of Canadians living in rural communities.

The GATT talks were initiated in Uruguay and have been ongoing for four or five years now. Part of what precipitated them was a grain war that had broken out between the United States and the rest of the world, particularly the European Community. When we returned here on February 3 we were faced with a Dunkel report. Mr. Dunkel is the Secretary-General of the GATT and is in charge of all of the negotiations. He prepared a report and required governments to begin responding to that report in mid-January.

We arrived not knowing yet what the response of the Government of Canada was going to be. I moved to have an emergency debate. The Speaker in his wisdom decreed that this could probably be dealt with adequately in an opposition day, and so today is the day.

The motion itself was drafted with the assistance and acceptance of a great range of affected groups, many of whom have representatives today in the House. These are people from the various supply managed marketing boards from dairy through to chicken, turkey, eggs and hatching eggs. They are all here and they were all participating in the preparation of this motion.

We are hoping that so-called balanced approach of the Government of Canada will get back in balance and that the amended Dunkel report which will be discussed in the final stages of the negotiations of GATT will contain a clause strengthening and clarifying article XI 2(c)(i). That did not show up in the report and that distressed a great many Canadians who had been watching the application of the government's strategy of its so-called balanced approach at these talks.

I know there are some members of the government who have for a long time had great difficulty with the idea of supply management and of marketing boards in general. I know this because as a farmer and a member of farm organizations during the 1960s and 1970s and before coming here, I watched, sometimes with dismay, as members of the Conservative Party would go to the wall and fight to keep any effort at supply management and marketing boards from coming into law in this country. In fact, the marketing board legislation that the country has now requires coming to Parliament each time that a new commodity is proposed to be included under supply management.

We can thank some of the people who now sit in the cabinet for that circumstance. The original act was written quite broadly so that all that needed to be done was that a majority of farmers in each of the provinces had to decide, vote for and participate in a supply management system and it could become the law. Thanks to the efforts of some people who are still in the cabinet that was made impossible. As a consequence, any time a new product needs to be added they have to come to Parliament and amend the law to include it.

I understand there are some problems with the concept of supply management on the government side. These are long standing. They are ideological and there are politics that go back a long way.

The negotiators and some of the press have been saying that it is a little difficult handling this two-track policy. We are maintaining supply management on one hand and asking for open borders and no interference by governments in trading. This is very difficult to manage. It is not really consistent with what GATT is trying to do. I think we are being a little too cute by using that argument.

First, I think when we get to be purists on these kind of arguments we should always remember the quip by a British diplomat from the last century who said: "Consistency is the refuge of small minds". I think consistency in this case can be carried to extremes. If the GATT participants are having great difficulty handling inconsistencies, how is it they can manage to have a whole section on the protection of intellectual properties when the whole concept of having intellectual property is to protect a patent or a copyright or an invention and put state proposed and state supported impediments to the free access of that idea or that invention? GATT had no problem dealing with that irrationality. The inclusion of intellectual property rights in GATT was seen as consistent because it applied a certain set of rules which would be similar from one country to the next.

That is the key. The application of rules from one country to the next is exactly what the supply management people are trying to achieve. Article XI has been a part of GATT almost from the beginning of GATT in the middle 1950s. An improved, clarified article XI with the amendments that have been proposed by Canadian producers and their organizations in making article XI 2(c)(i) would make those rules clear. It would make it clear that imports of commodities made from supply managed products that contained more than half of the supply managed product in their make-up, formula or recipe would also be subject to the kind of management system that affects those products within the country.

We have to remember that supply managed products do not become a burden on the rest of the world. They do not burden the rest of the world market. They are not dumped. Generally speaking, the process in Canada has been that all supply managed operations produce slightly less than the Canadian market needs. They try to get it very close to what Canada needs, but there is always room for a small amount of imports to take up any slack so that consumers do not lose the ability to have that product available to them.

If we understand the full implication of the special nature of agriculture production, we will have less problem with the concept of supply management. A lot of the production in agriculture is perishable product that cannot be stored cheaply and is expensive to transport. Therefore it makes sense for it to be produced in relatively small units, relatively close to the consuming population.

It is probably no accident that most of the supply managed products in this country are specifically those kinds of products that are more perishable than grains, for instance, and some of the oilseeds.

All products in all agriculture production have a special quality in that they are food for humans. Because it is food for humans, surplus production becomes something that every human being attempts to do. We always want to have at least enough food for ourselves. We usually have a small surplus in our homes available to us. This is only natural and prudent. We can argue that it comes from back in the days when we were hunters and gatherers, but that does not explain it away. It is still a necessity and it is still an understandable reason for people and for nations wanting to be able to produce most of their own food and to be close to self-sufficient.

Supply management has turned out to be a very rational way of matching domestic requirements with domestic production. It is a very rational business response to a basic production need.

It is more efficient in real terms than open market supply systems because resources are never wasted on overproduction. In other words we do not produce a bunch of stuff and look around for a market for it and, when we cannot find it, end up watching it rot, burying it, throwing it away or disposing of it by means of consumers buying it very cheap and throwing most of it into the garbage because they cannot eat it all.

It is still a very competitive system because it encourages efficient production. As proof of that, I point out that in Canada where we have supply management for chickens and milk production, our production per hen and per cow is higher than in the United States where they do not have supply management.

Supply management encourages the perfection of technology and its earlier adoption. I point to our own experience, but I would also point in this regard to the United States and the Europeans in terms of crop production. They have been using forms of supply management to take some of the land out of production to reduce the over-all production of the country. As a result they have developed systems that use fertilizer and chemicals, sometimes with irrigation, and produce average yields that are much higher than was the case before. I contend that would not have happened had there not been supply management to encourage the most efficient use of the best resources to get those yields. It is necessary for the improvement to the over-all agricultural technology to have this sort of system at work.

We are told that the business of GATT should really have been to get rid of all subsidies. Who are the big subsidizers that the GATT has been trying to get at? We hear a lot about the Europeans because we live next door to the Americans who started a trade war with the Europeans, and most of the information we get about this subject is by way of war propaganda. They are in fact at war and wars also have a lot of propaganda surrounding them.

When we look at the OECD statistics—and we should remember that the Prime Minister likes to quote the OECD as an outside, unbiased source of all statistics—we see that when we use the application of producer subsidy equivalents for comparing the subsidization levels in each of the countries, Europe in fact does have the second highest level of subsidization in the world after Japan. Japan's average level, using 1986–1988 average figures, was 76 per cent subsidization. For Europe the level was 50 per cent subsidization for its average production, and in Canada it was 46 per cent. We were only 4 percentage points lower than the Europeans. Then we had the United States at 39 per cent.

We did have some countries like Australia that only depends on 12 per cent subsidization for its production. We had others like Argentina that actually pays money in taxes before its farmers can export. It has the opposite of subsidization; its farmers actually subsidize its consumers in Argentina and one or two African countries.

What does the OECD predict would happen with agriculture trade liberalization? For Canada, taking all commodities, our production would go down 16.7 per cent, using those three years as averages. Of course grain growers are going to say: "Aha, that is because the supply management people are going to have to go out of business. Of course production in Canada will go down".

But when we look at what happens to exports under the OECD predictions in a no-subsidy world, we see that exports drop 42.5 per cent. We know that we do not export any of the supply managed products; we only export grains and oilseeds. It is obviously going to hurt our exports of grains and oilseeds if we go to a completely subsidy-free world.

We note that they predict agriculture wages will drop 8 per cent in Canada, 4 per cent in the European Community, and 5 per cent in the U.S.A. Land rental and land values will drop 53 per cent in Canada in a fully subsidy-free world, 40 per cent in Europe, and 41.2 per cent in the United States.

Our export prices will go up slightly, 3 per cent. Europe's will go up about 2 per cent, and the United States' will go up about 1.6 per cent.

Who benefits? It is not the farmers in Canada, the European Community or the U.S.A. They are all worse off. How about the consumers then? Do they get a benefit? Well, not much. European Community consumers will see a drop in prices of .6 of 1 per cent, six-tenths of 1 per cent. In the U.S. consumers will pay 1 per cent more than they are paying now, and in Canada consumers will pay 1.5 per cent more than they are paying now.

What was all the fuss about? Yes, Australia and New Zealand will benefit slightly. So will Argentina. But there is not much going for these three developed countries that I have been concentrating on: Canada, the European Community and the United States.

We see that there is not too much to be gained for Canada. Our farm output will drop and it will also drop in the United States. To get all of this, so far we have failed to protect our own grain producers in this country by allowing some clauses that will affect the way we export grains. We have failed to strengthen article XI 2(c)(i). We have not mentioned anything about strengthening or clarifying that article. We have left the families who are now producing products under supply management out to dry.

If this House does not send a clear signal to its negotiators to get a clear and effective article XI 2(c)(i) in the GATT, we will lose about 100,000 Canadian families in rural Canada; 38,000 of those are on farms, 22,900 are employees of those farmers, and 36,300 are in processing jobs that will be lost. The value of farm production lost if supply management systems go will be $4.7 billion of farm production, plus $5.5 billion that we gained by added production through processing, meaning a net loss to the Canadian economy of over $10 billion.

This is an important signal that we will be sending to our negotiators. It is extremely important that they go forward, that our government send them a clear message as to what their role will be and that the government pays attention to the motion which we hope will pass here today, and that the government comply with it very religiously because it is of grave importance to all Canadians and especially to those who live in rural Canada.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and colleagues who have worked together on this day. We believe that agriculture is an important sector of our economy, and those men and women who are involved in it feel this is an important debate and an important opportunity.

My colleague from Mackenzie put forward some arguments, suggestions and comment that I think would be useful for people around the world, particularly those in some embassies who may be watching this debate that is taking place in the House of Commons. I think they are important points and points that I would like to attempt to emphasize.

This is an opportunity I think also to clarify—we have been using that word in this debate for over two and a half years—and set the record straight on the government's longstanding commitment to a successful conclusion of the Uruguay round of the GATT negotiations. The government has been involved, as other governments have, over five years in this Uruguay round. It is an important round.

As we know, the director-general of GATT, Mr. Dunkel, on December 20 issued a text. He had worked with the countries of the world, some 108 members of GATT, to attempt to come to a conclusion at the negotiating table. He was unable to do that. He then took the debate and the proposals of governments, bound them in a text, and said: "This is as close as I can come to a conclusion. I put it out for nations of the world to look at and to then respond to it".

The GATT members assembled in Geneva on January 13 to make that response to the Dunkel text and to give their reaction. It is interesting to note that not one country of the 108 rejected the text as a basis to continue the negotiations to a successful conclusion. No one has rejected it. All GATT members have remained at the table to put their position. Canada has remained at the table to continue to put our position. The ambassador for Canada, Mr. Shannon, was quite clear in putting forward Canada's position.

The next important milestone or step will be March 1, as proposed today in the Dunkel text, where countries will be expected to table their revised offers on market access for agricultural products. They are still looking at the impact naturally at that time when all countries will put their market access proposals. Our trading partners, as will Canada, will have to put proposals forward. In general we are optimistic about some parts of the Dunkel text. On other points, particularly in regard to article XI and the strengthening and clarifying, we have grave reservations. We are continuing to pursue the position that was developed by the government in co-operation and on the advice of the stakeholders, the producers, and the provinces which also have an important role in supporting the supply managed sector of our economy in Canada that has benefited agriculture over the years.

Between now and March 1 negotiations will proceed on four tracks. Discussions on any changes in the package will take place at the trade negotiating committee.

I know that people want to be realistic and realistically any changes would have to be agreed upon by nations before they would be taken to the committee. Mr. Dunkel has said he will hear the proposals but there had better be agreement before coming into the room.

There is no longer a table that countries will work at. They will work individually with other nations of the world in an attempt to make their point understood and have it accepted.

There will be legal drafting that will take place to clean up some inconsistencies in the draft text, but that will be done without changing the balance of the text and the market access negotiations on services will develop schedules of initial commitments that will be tabled.

The market access negotiations on goods will develop schedules for market access concessions as well as the commitments on export subsidies and internal support for agriculture.

There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, since the 13 of January there have been intense negotiations among our trading partners and that will intensify once those schedules are tabled.

Having expressed what we object to in the Dunkel text, there are areas of considerable promise for establishing a freer, more stable and less distorted agriculture trading community. The draft agreement would indeed provide an improved and more secure access into foreign markets. As well the U.S. section 22 import waiver which has been a temporary waiver in place for almost 40 years, as I understand it, and the EC variable import levies would be removed. They would be as the text is written today converted to tariffs.

There is no doubt that the Dunkel proposals would allow for a better and more secure access for Canadian exports to foreign markets but the multilateral trade rules under which we in Canada benefit would be strengthened and would apply equally to all countries. That is an important point.

The agreement also defines non-trade distorting assistance or programs which governments can use to support farm incomes. That is a very important aspect in itself, but more important, once those programs are identified as being green in GATT terminology, they would not be subject to countervail. That is of particular importance to Canada because, as you know, in the agrifood industry we have to continue to have access to law in order to prosper. There has to be an end to the trade war.

Therefore, Canada like other members of GATT would have to adjust some of its support programs in order to implement the GATT proposal.

Ms. Copps: Shame.

Mr. McKnight: I am pleased to honour the member from the Liberal Party into the debate. She cries "Shame".

Canada will have to adjust some of its support programs because it does not seem consistent with logic that you would say to other countries there are areas that we want you to reduce, that you subsidize and you distort trade, and in Canada we ask that we be able to allow to continue to subsidize and distort trade.

I say adjust because we are talking here, Mr. Speaker, about the export side of the agreement. When we take a look at the trade distorting subsidies, there would be a levelling of opportunity for support.

Support can be given to agriculture in the green category. It means that we will have to work to design programs that do not distort international trade, and indeed,—

Ms. Copps: We don't distort agricultural trade.

Mr. McKnight: The hon. member from downtown Hamilton with her agricultural expertise should maybe talk to her agricultural critic or watch as her agricultural critic makes his presentation.

The difficult thing to put forward is that we do have an opportunity on the export side, as other countries will, to adjust and support our agriculture sector of the economy in a non-trade distorting way. That will be recognized by the members of GATT if we are able to come to an agreement.

My hon. colleague would know about the Crow benefit, if you want to use it. It is one example. There are a number of ways. I identified them in a document that I sent to producers who were involved in transportation talks. There are a number of ways that we could adjust that benefit and have it maintained for the producers in Canada who have found it a very supportive program. It has indeed been a necessary program and should be maintained.

There is nothing to say that countries cannot adjust in some of these export examples. Any of the changes which will create a more fair and responsible trading environment is good news for our export industry, for our red meat industry, for our grains and oilseeds industry, and other areas of agriculture where we export products around the world.

We did not get everything we wanted even on the export side as other countries have said when you look at the—

Ms. Copps: It's all over.

Mr. McKnight: I am sure, Mr. Speaker, with the arrangement that the Liberal Party has made to divide its members' time, we will be able to hear from the member for Hamilton East. She will be able to give us her opinion and her thoughts on an important segment of the Canadian economy called agriculture. I hope she will be able to do it standing, rather than sitting.

If we could continue, the proposals do not reflect what we asked for originally. It does not mean that we will not continue to work for them. We have been able to do that in conjunction with other nations.

We asked for a total elimination of export trade distorting subsidies and that has not appeared in the Dunkel text. We must remember that Canada is one of 108 countries which are involved in these negotiations that have been going on for over five years.

The Dunkel proposal does provide some opportunities in the agrifood sector and we welcome them.

I expressed our grave reservations and our disappointment that article XI was not strengthened and clarified as we had put forward. Everyone knows that is a section of the agreement that basically at this time allows border control. That allows us to have the supply managed industries that we have in Canada.

The current proposal is to put tariffs or tariff equivalents in place of border control, which we find objectionable. In the proposal by Mr. Dunkel, although article XI remains, it could not be resorted to by countries during the implementation period, which we do not accept.

It is very important to remember that this is a basis for negotiation. Canada will continue where we find strength, and wherever we can, other partners to put our position as we have over the last five years.

We hope to have progress. We are working toward that. I mentioned today why I thought this debate was important in the House, so we could come together to send a message to the world. We remain committed to a stronger article XI, and that was on the advice of the industry.

Over the past years, there has been an erosion of the ability of article XI as it is interpreted today by GATT to protect our supply managed industries. I can only draw to the attention of the House that processed products, such as ice cream and yogurt, had a GATT ruling against our import controls. It is still an outstanding ruling. There was concern there could be countervail levied against other processed products of the supply managed industry and we would lose the ability to control imports at our borders.

• (1600)

Our position has been expressed by ministers. The Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds, the Minister of State for Agriculture, the Minister for International Trade and myself on several occasions around the world, as a matter of fact, from Japan, the United States and Europe have continued to do that with the support of the industry and I believe, with the support of other parties in this House. We will continue to do that.

Our position has not changed. We have consulted with the industry throughout these negotiations. Our position was developed with the industry and that is the position that Canada has today. It is the position we are supporting in these direct negotiations with other countries.

We know from experience that supply management is an effective marketing system. It has worked and it has been working hard to evolve to market demands. It has shown its flexibility over the last number of years in being able to adjust to accommodate change.

One point I would like to draw to the attention of members is that the industry, both the processing and the producing, and the governments worked hard on the dairy task force, the poultry task force. They are designed to allow the supply managed industries to continue to adjust in the future.

Our position going into GATT was to support supply management. We have that position today. It is a position that I am quite comfortable in continuing to defend. In fact, we have intensified our consultation with government and industry which has been a constant factor over the last number of years in developing our position. I am confident that the industry is aware of the position that the government has presented on their behalf. They have been with us. They have been with us in Geneva and in other areas around the world where we have presented Canada's position, which is supported by the industry.

No one can be sure how the GATT talks will end. I know that members understand there is a benefit to freer and fairer trade in the world and there is much to gain. Although Canada is large geographically, it is not large when it comes to the strength of our economy. Canada does have a benefit in having trade law that allows us a way to defend against the pocketbooks or the treasuries of more powerful trading blocs.

As I have said, the next deadline is March 1. That date is important. It may not remain constant. It may shift. We have seen changes in the dates of this round in the past. As a matter of fact, it may be important to draw to the attention of the House that the original schedule for concluding the Uruguay round was a little over a year ago, about 13 months ago, December 1990. Because people faced the reality that there could be a failure of a very important agreement to the international economy if there was a failure of this round, we have redoubled our efforts over the last number of months to present our case.

I can assure all members of the House that it is important to the Government of Canada. It so important that the Prime Minister is inviting national farm leaders to meet with him and government ministers on Tuesday, February 18 in Ottawa to discuss the agricultural component of multilateral trade negotiations.

An hon. member: Don't take credit for things you don't do.

Mr. McKnight: Mr. Speaker, another Liberal speaks from his seat.

I would like everyone to understand how it is important to the government and it is important that we be able to come together, I would like to present a motion to amend the opposition motion.

I move:

That the motion be amended

(a) by striking out, in the first paragraph, the words "call on the government to support unequivocally" and substituting the following:

"supports the government's efforts toward reaching";

(b) by deleting, in paragraph (c), the words "in its present form";

(c) by striking out, in paragraph (c), the word "was" and substituting the following:

"is"; and

(d) by striking out, in paragraph (e), all the words after "governments" and substituting the following:

"in co-operation and at the request of affected industries to provide impact assessments."

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair will take the motion in amendment moved by the Minister of Agriculture under advisement. We will now proceed with questions and comments.

[English]

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, it is commendable that the government has agreed not to make this a motion of confidence in the government because we need to come together as a House of Commons to bring all possible pressure to bear in the GATT negotiations which are going into the last eight crucial weeks.

I really am amazed at the minister's amendment because he proposes in paragraph (e) that economic impact studies will be provided at the request of the affected industry. We were told this morning by Waldie Klassen of the Canadian Chicken Marketing Agency that their industry had asked for such an economic impact study and the government had not provided it. So I would be interested to know why the government is refusing to provide that to the Canadian Chicken Marketing Agency when it is putting in its motion now, the amendment, that it will provide it.

In the second part of that same paragraph (e), the amendment is removing the provision that economic impact studies be provided to national legislatures. What is going on here? The government is always talking about freedom of information, yet it is removing from the motion before the House today that members of Parliament be provided with those critical studies.

If we are going to support the government in any agreement it reaches at the GATT, we have to know what we are voting on. I am just dumbfounded that the government would put down an amendment which would provide economic impact studies which it refused to provide to the Canadian Chicken Marketing Agency and, I assume, to other groups. At the same time, it is removing the provision in the original motion that this information be provided to members of Parliament. Surely that is totally unreasonable.

I would like to ask the minister why the government has refused that information to the Canadian Chicken Marketing Agency and why it is proposing in this motion to remove the provision of providing these economic impact studies of, in this case, the Dunkel proposals, to members of Parliament.

Mr. McKnight: I would like to address my hon. colleague's last question. The amendment says "in co-operation with the industries affected". He will know that on January 9, some time after the Dunkel text had been delivered, which is a basis of negotiation, I contacted the heads of the supply management agencies, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and my provincial colleagues, the ministers of agriculture and said to them now that we have this text, it is difficult to argue against what is in something unless you know what it contains.

Up until that point, we had never done an analysis of the tariff numbers. We tabled, as other countries did in 1990, some numbers, but they certainly were not the numbers that were put forward out of the Dunkel text. I said we would now like to look at the text and see what numbers come out of that text. We would provide the numbers to the agencies and then ask the agencies: "Are these the numbers as you interpret the Dunkel text?"

As soon as we did that, members in some political parties and some of the supply management agencies said: "Oh, the government is looking at tariffication because they have taken the numbers from the text." It is important to understand that we did not argue on numbers because we did not have tariffication as a government position. We do not today. What we did was argue for strengthening and clarification. You cannot argue for strengthening and clarification and then say: "What about the numbers?", so we did not until we had the authority of the agencies.

I still have not received, and neither have my officials, confirmation from any of the agencies that those numbers are the numbers that are found in the Dunkel text. No one has worked with us to say that these are the numbers that we find in the text.

It appears that some members in the supply management economy are saying that because we gave them numbers after we asked for authorization, that we have changed our position. We will not be doing impact assessments unless we are directly requested to do so by the supply management agencies. We should do them co-operatively, share our knowledge and our information because to do it independently would leave out an important partner.

That is the answer to the hon. member's question as to why we put forward the amendment.

The other point that I think has to be understood is that we sat down some two years ago and designed the position that Canada has presented and continues to defend and present. It was designed with the industry and will continue to be the position put forward by Canada, and the attempt to attract support will continue and for that we need the support of the industry.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, there are more than a few questions that come to mind after listening to the minister's presentation. Nevertheless I will restrict myself to three brief questions.

The minister seems to imply that the concerns that many people are raising are premature and in fact perhaps paranoid. Therefore, I would like to ask the minister, in his honest assessment, who does he see as being the winners and losers in the Dunkel document as it stands now? If this were the basis for a final settlement who in Canada would win and lose?

The second question is about annex 7(e) and the whole question of the Crow benefit. Yesterday the negotiators said that 7(e), as it appears in the text, is not necessarily linked to the question of method of payment, yet the minister, by introducing these documents into the grain transportation hearings on the prairies, has clearly linked the question of method of payment to what is happening at the GATT, thereby undermining the support of grain farmers for the GATT process. He has further intensified those kinds of fears on behalf of grain farmers several minutes ago by introducing an amendment that would remove the Crow benefit in its present form from the motion before us.

The third question I would like to ask him is this. Although it may be a political question of whether economic impact studies are done, the Oldman dam decision has said that when policy decisions with environmental impacts are made by the government, there is a clear legal requirement that the government do environmental impact analyses. Are the processes in place to do those environmental impacts of changes at the GATT before the deadlines which the GATT process imposes upon us?

Mr. McKnight: Mr. Speaker, first I would like the hon. member to point out where I suggested that people were being paranoid and premature in their concern. I would like him to point that out.

Mr. Funk: Mr. Speaker, perhaps while I look that up, the minister could answer the other two questions that I raised.

Mr. McKnight: Maybe the hon. members would be able to co-operate. I would like to quickly attempt to answer the three questions.

Canada's objective, when we entered into this Uruguay round, was to get substantial reductions in trade distorting subsidies, in particular in export subsidies. These were positions we had developed with the industry. In the Dunkel text there is a clear definition of trade distorting agricultural support. It defines other domestic support, which is to be reduced by 20 per cent over six years. It calls for export subsidy spending to be reduced on the financial side by 36 per cent. It calls for a 24 per cent reduction in volume.

Those are benefits, and consistent with our objectives of where we—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The time for questions and comments has now expired.

[Translation]

Before resuming debate, the Chair wishes to inform the House that the motion in amendment moved by the Minister of Agriculture is admissible.

The debate will now be on the main motion and the motion in amendment.

Earlier today the opposition House leader requested and obtained unanimous consent for dividing his party's speaking time into thirds. In other words, there will be three Liberal speakers, each speech followed by a three-minute period for questions and comments.

[English]

In other words, I will give the floor to three Liberal speakers and between each speech there will be three minutes for questions and comments period.

Resuming debate, the hon. member for Algoma for seven minutes.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House today is perhaps one of the most important motions, and this debate is the most important before the House this spring for some 36,000 dairy, poultry and egg producers across Canada.

The motion itself speaks about the maintenance of the supply management system, the arrangements for import controls, retaining the Crow benefit, reducing export subsidies for our grain and oilseed producers in the international marketplace, and the need for impact statements.

This is more than just a discussion about a group of bureaucrats in Geneva arguing about the text of a 427-page document called the Dunkel report. It is about thousands and thousands of Canadian farm families who are scared to death that this government is going to sell them out during the final eight weeks of the GATT negotiations, that they are going to end up losing the provisions for import controls, the basic foundations of the supply management system. They are scared stiff that we are going to end up with a dairy and poultry industry in Canada like that in the United States, where most of the eggs are produced in Georgia and Alabama and the poultry products in California. Dairy farmers by the hundreds are going broke day by day.

That is why some 1,400 farmers paraded out of the Sir John Carling building last Friday. That is why some 2,500 farmers paraded before the meeting of the heads of governments on Monday of this week at the Lester B. Pearson building. They are concerned, and that is why there will be something like 22,000 or 25,000 farmers in this city a week from this Friday.

This is of incalculable importance to that industry. We are talking about a $10 billion industry, 36,000 farms and families, 22,000 employees and a whole dairy and poultry processing industry involving some 95,000 jobs.

This is a very important debate. It is a debate where we are calling on the government to use every diplomatic arrangement it can muster so that the final conclusion, if it is reached at GATT during the next two months, will be a retention of our supply management system.

It is a unique system. It is a system that does not flood the world market. It provides producers with a reasonable return on their investment, and it is a system that we want to keep. It is impossible to describe the adverse impact the report would have. Look at the figures provided this morning by the Canadian Chicken Marketing Agency. It says in three years, if the Dunkel report is adopted, 86 per cent of Canadian producers will be out of business. Out of 2,411 producers only 330 would remain. Within two years the production of chicken would cease in Atlantic Canada.

It is unlikely that any processing plants would survive the first several years. Within six years, which is the end of the Dunkel proposal period wherein tariffs would be reduced, there would be something like 39 producers left in the country.

The minister talks about providing impact studies. The Canadian Chicken Marketing Agency said that it had asked for them and the government had not provided them.

We are really under the gun as legislators to bring every ounce of energy and pressure to bear to ensure that these vital industries survive. Imagine 95,000 jobs. Imagine Atlantic Canada not producing any poultry products. That is the genius of this system. Areas without large populations and metropolitan areas can continue to have a viable family farm operation.

It would be impossible to exaggerate the importance of what the government must do. There is great concern that the government is saying the right thing but is not doing the right thing. I say to the Prime Minister that he should attend the meeting next Tuesday which has been called at the Skyline Hotel. He should rally the support of the five other nations which support our position, including Japan. He should get a joint statement from heads of government which calls on the other members of the GATT agreement to support our position. We do not want to flood the market. We want to give our producers a reasonable return on their investment. We want to retain the family farm.

After he has secured that joint agreement with the other heads of government that support our position, I say the Prime Minister should sit down with the President of the United States and the President of the European Economic Community and seek their support. After all, those are the two main trading blocs. They should secure a strengthened and clarified article XI in the new GATT agreement that is proposed to be put in place this spring.

So I move, seconded by the hon. member for Gatineau—La Lievre:

> That the amendment be amended by changing the period at the end to a semicolon and by adding the following words:
> And that this House call upon the Prime Minister to involve himself personally in the GATT negotiations in the interest of Canada's dairy, egg and poultry producers by meeting with the President of the United States and with the President of the European Community in order to secure their support and to do so in co-operation with other countries that agree with Canada's position on a strengthened and clarified GATT article XI.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair will consider the amendment just moved by the hon. member for Algoma.

On the three-minute questions or comments period, the hon. Minister of Agriculture.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the amendment that has been put forward by my colleague, the member for Algoma, is important and I am sure we will be able to discuss that amendment among colleagues.

I would like to draw to the attention of the House and the hon. member that the Prime Minister met with Mr. Lubbers and with Mr. Delors. He met and communicated with President Bush and has been involved over the last three months in supporting this position. He has argued reasonably and strongly on why this was important to Canada.

As I said, the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Algoma is important and I am sure I will be able to discuss it with confidence with my colleagues.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am encouraged by the minister's words. It seems to me that if the heads of five governments that support our position, including Japan which is a major trading nation, were to prepare a joint declaration that could be taken to a joint meeting with the two presidents of the European Community and the United States during these final eight weeks of the negotiations, or at the appropriate time during those negotiations, it would be a very important part of those negotiations.

Canada and Japan are members of the G-7. Their position is very important, especially when we look at how reasonable our position is. We are allowing increased access. We are reducing subsidization although there is practically none in that realm. We are not pushing surplus, cheap foodstuffs on the market and causing a problem. Our producers in many cases are being asked to solve a problem that they have not really created.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, earlier this afternoon in the House the minister made fun of me and said that because I was an urban member, "the downtown member from Hamilton", I obviously should not have interest in this issue. I would like to point out that if we are going to win this fight it is urban Canadians across the country who have to understand what is at stake. I am unlike the minister who stood in this House and spoke in the past tense about supply management. I am one who understands that tariffication is not supply management and tariffication will mean the death of the family farm in Canada.

If that minister continues to stand in his place as a mealy-mouthed apologist for the Dunkel report, you can be darn sure that every member on this side of the House including the urban members will be there. Do you know why I want to be there? I would like to quote from a speech given by my colleague, the member for Haldimand—Norfolk.

> This argument is not just about food and it is not just about farmers being displaced. It is about the ability of a nation to produce food and secure its supply of food for the present and for the future.

Effectively the Dunkel report would wipe out the family poultry business in Atlantic Canada. Within six years there would not be a single family business left in Atlantic Canada.

[Translation]

We already know the devastating impact this will have on Quebec farmers, as announced by the UPA. We know what the effects are.

• (1630)

[English]

A nation that cannot feed itself is a nation that is prey to the vagaries of not only the international marketplace but in 50 years from now if we cannot feed ourselves we will be a country that could go to war for food.

We can opt for the option of vertical integration. We can opt for the option of having 39 producers left out of the 2,411 chicken producers in Canada.

We might get some short-term dividends. We might get some short-term gains but in the long term what that will mean for consumers in the riding of Hamilton East is they will be paying more for every chicken in their pot.

The lessons of the family farm, the lessons of arable land, the lessons of the environmental questions of the 1990s are not the lessons of the vertically integrated big companies. They are the lessons learned by family farms that have stayed in the family from generation to generation to generation.

Ralph Ferguson has a legacy for his children and his grandchildren, and that legacy is to produce food, food that for Canadians is still the second least expensive in the world, to produce that food and to allow his children and his grandchildren to continue to produce it.

Is that the view of Cargill? Cargill has to answer to its shareholders who are looking for annual dividends, understandably.

[Translation]

However, there is a difference between our country and the United States. The minister referred to those among the 106 countries at the GATT talks that are against us. There is one country the Prime Minister and Minister of Agriculture will have to persuade to change its mind.

[English]

You can talk about the 106 countries. The country that we have to get to is sitting south of the border. It is the good friend of the Prime Minister. Yes, he went fishing down in Kennebunkport. He went fishing for a job. And he came up flat, not only in his own personal ambitions, but also he came up flat for the farmers of Canada.

The Minister of Agriculture has failed once again to explain to the House. Yes, we know that the Prime Minister has spoken to several international figures on this issue, but he has failed to get his message across.

Since January what specific initiatives has this government and this Prime Minister taken to get the message across that we are not going to take it any more? We are not going to allow Canadian farm families to go the way of the dodo bird. That is what the Dunkel report would do and that is what this minister who publicly is stating his support for supply management, but who privately is already—

He is already clearing the way for tariffication, although surely he must know this means the end of the family farm in this country. Yes, I am an urban member.

[English]

You can sit there with that smarmy face and smirk at me. I am an urban member of Parliament, but like every Canadian I believe there is something that makes us different from the Americans. It is that we have developed a system to protect our food supply, not only for this generation but for future generations.

We threw away our capacity to be sovereign in a number of areas with the trade deal. Remember, the government said: "Oh, yes, but we'll be able to get everything so much cheaper. Come on board, consumers, because we are going to be able to profit from this trade agreement".

In my province alone, one-third of the manufacturing jobs have gone down the tubes. Now the government is asking us to follow once again.

Well, I say one thing. I congratulate John Wise who had the guts to leave this government before marketing boards were put on the table. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that in the last election—

—he gave us every assurance that this system would never be tampered with. But he knew.

[English]

He knew that what Eugene Whelan began was going to be put to death by this government either privately or publicly. On this side of the House, we will get every member. I do not care if you are from downtown Hamilton, from downtown Wawa, or from downtown Prince Albert. We need your help to fight this fight and we need to convince this government that it has to get through to its friends in Washington to let them know that in Canada, we reserve the right to be different.

We reserve the right to remain Canadian. Above all, we want sovereignty in our food supply.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to draw to the attention of the hon. member who just concluded her address that in the Cairns group, of which Canada is a member, there are some 14 member countries: Australia, New Zealand, Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Uruguay, Columbia, Fiji, Hungary, Malaysia, Indonesia, the Philippines, and Thailand.

We cannot allow anyone to think that there is just one nation that we have to convince to accept the position that Canada has. We cannot convince the members of the Cairns group to support Canada's position. That does not mean we have stopped. That does not mean that we will not continue. What it means is we do.

I agree with the hon. member. We need the support of everyone in this Chamber and we need the support of people outside. It does not help the cause of trying to get support from countries to say that there is one country or it is one person's responsibility.

It is a position we developed jointly with the industry supported by all parties in this House. I am sure when it is voted on today, the motion will receive the support of all parties in the House. That will continue to strengthen the ability of Canada to carry the message forward and have our position accepted.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I am quite aware of the fact that the Cairns group comprises more than one party.

The minister should also be aware of the fact that his own official said yesterday that it was the Americans who were the stumbling block.

We know that this is an American and European fight. We also know, contrary to the minister's statement a few short minutes ago, Canadian supply management has not been responsible for the dumping problem. We are not part of the problem. We should not be the sacrificial lambs in the solution.

The minister said earlier that in fact some of the reasons for these changes had to do with dumping. I did not talk about dumping. The minister himself defended the potential eventuality of tariffication by suggesting that something had to be done because of the unleashing of forces of the international marketplace.

The minister should be aware that quite clearly, supply management in Canada has been a domestic solution to a domestic supply issue. It has not touched, nor has it dumped, nor has it impeded, nor has it infringed, nor has it in any way abutted on to either the American or European agricultural problems.

We have been dragged in and fingered as part of the solution. The minister's officials said yesterday quite clearly that the Europeans are prepared to come and support us if we can get the Americans onside.

I want the minister to go back to his Prime Minister and tell him: "Mr. Prime Minister, your strategy up to last January has failed and failed miserably. Your trip to Kennebunkport yielded nothing. Now is the time to rethink your strategy and we want to know specifically what you are going to do—"

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. After considering the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Algoma, the Chair is now ready to rule on the matter. This motion is inadmissible because it brings up a new concept foreign to the amendment.

In other words, the subamendment exceeds the scope of the amendment and is therefore inadmissible. I may refer hon. members to Beauchesne's, sixth edition, citation 580 (1).

> (1) The purpose of a sub-amendment (an amendment to an amendment) is to alter the amendment. It should not enlarge upon the scope of the amendment but it should deal with matters that are not covered by the amendment. If it is intended to bring up matters foreign to the amendment, the Member should wait until the amendment is disposed of and move a new amendment.

• (1640)

Mr. McKnight: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, it is my understanding that members in this Chamber could come to an agreement as to what would be in order. I think that is well within the rights.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I would rather not get into a long discussion but clearly the main amendment and subamendment deal with article XI of the GATT negotiations. This is simply proposing ways in which article XI may be amended.

Because you have suggested that it may be out of order, since the minister has already indicated his support, I would like to ask for the unanimous consent of the House as proposed.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Of course, as hon. members know, I already ruled this subamendment out of order, but in the final analysis, the House is the master of its proceedings. If there is unanimous consent to agree to discuss this subamendment, despite the rules governing this House, the Chair will willingly comply, provided there is unanimous consent.

So I ask the question.

[English]

Is there unanimous consent to have the amendment to the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): So the debate will continue on the main motion, the amendment and the subamendment. The hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre has seven minutes.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, I consider myself privileged to have the opportunity to support the subamendment presented by my colleague from Algoma, who is very knowledgeable about agriculture. For many years, he has been a great defender of farmers across Canada.

Today, as my colleague from Algoma said, we might be having one of the most important debates of the year, given the consequences of the GATT negotiations in Geneva.

Mr. Speaker, I heard the Minister of Agriculture explain the process of the GATT agreements and I would especially like to say not only to members here in the House but to many people listening that we must not forget that there is a great deal of history behind our system of supply management. Like many here, I remember a time—and I am speaking especially about the farmers I knew on dairy farms in Quebec—before the system of supply management when it was very difficult for our farmers to pull through.

We know that and I am convinced that many here certainly have relatives or close acquaintances who live on the land or are descended from people who did. They must be aware of the sacrifices our farmers have made in the past, seven days a week and 52 weeks a year. They made tremendous sacrifices to keep the family farm, and it was difficult to interest the younger generation in farming, not only because of the hard work involved but also because the rewards were often few and far between.

About 20 years ago, after much urging and lengthy negotiations, common sense finally prevailed. People realized it was time we had a system that would see to our farmers' basic needs by guaranteeing a minimum base price for their products, to ensure they run an efficient operation, and I must say most of them do. In Canada during the past 20 years, we have built a supply management system that is sound and people-oriented, a system that works within the GATT rules. This country has put a lot of money and effort into ensuring that our farmers receive a minimum price for their products, while at the same time providing a system that is fair to all 10 provinces. That was a major achievement.

Many countries see us as a model in this respect. The system was unique in that it did not cause a surplus on the international market. There was no so-called dumping by this country. It was a system that did not upset the applecart and guaranteed domestic supplies, which is extremely important. For years, security has been synonymous with defence and arms, but I think we can say, Mr. Speaker, considering the events of recent years, that agricultural self-sufficiency is also important, and I would even say it is more so than national defence.

We have seen a system develop that has served us well, both the country as a whole and the farm community. And now, after 20 years, for reasons we do not readily understand, this whole system is being challenged. Why? We are not too sure. So we send representatives to defend the system and to explain the benefits of our supply management system.

I find it hard to understand why the government has been unable to convince our partners at the GATT talks that our system is a viable one. I wonder about a lot of things, Mr. Speaker. I see the Minister of State for Agriculture here in the House, and I would like to ask him this: Do our two representatives who are negotiating for Canada have what it takes to defend this system? When I read documents from Geneva, I see that churches throughout the world, including the organization of Protestant and Catholic churches, have sent representatives to protest against the Dunkel report. Did we see this in the Canadian media? Did anyone mention this? There is a lot of opposition to the Dunkel formula, but nevertheless there are some countries, including the United States, that want to force on us a situation that world church leaders call a recipe for world-wide food shortages.

My point is that thanks to 20 years of hard work, the Canadian people and Canadian farmers, have set up a system unequalled in this world.

And I say, Mr. Speaker—and I am sure we can get the unanimous consent of this House for sending a clear resolution to all GATT participants—that Canada, that this country's representatives cannot approve the Dunkel report because it does not make sense and goes against the interests of all farmers across this country. We should not have to pay for other people's mistakes.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to my hon. colleague from Gatineau—La Lièvre. Indeed, I believe we do agree on how important marketing boards are for Quebec and Canadian farm producers. For one thing, my colleague will certainly recognize that our current position is the position Canada stated in April 1990, and later made clearer and more detailed in the fall of 1990. My hon. colleague should recognize or realize that everyone is in agreement. I can understand his passionate plea. However, would he not agree that, as we speak, the Canadian provinces, including Quebec, the federal government, the producers' organizations, the processors' organizations, the Canadian agrifood industry from coast to coast, are all behind this position? Does he not think it would be in the best interests of our Quebec and Canadian farmers that we stand united on this issue and back the Government of Canada and its negotiators in Geneva? Will he not agree with me that the Canadian position has obviously not changed and has the full support of the Canadian farmers?

Mr. Assad: Mr. Speaker, as my colleague said, the minister seems to be saying the right things, but the actions do not match the words. Like the minister, I say that with all the support we have, farmers and organizations in all the provinces agree to support supply management, but that poses a problem. I find that it is perhaps the last effort, but our partners in GATT will have to be unanimous and be firmly convinced that it is a necessity for Canada, such a northerly country, where farming conditions are exceptional, not to accept less than what exists. They must also understand that we are at a point of no return, if you will, with our agricultural system and we cannot accept a change. I am convinced that they cannot neglect the resolve of all 10 provinces and members of this House which we can show all our partners.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. I would like the first speaker for the New Democratic Party to tell us how his party intends to proceed: will they take 20 minutes each or share their time? The hon. member for Chambly.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, we will make the following clarification. I intend to speak for 10 minutes, with a five-minute question period, and then I think my colleague will share the rest of the time with me.

Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to take part in this debate on my colleague's motion regarding GATT.

The first thing that comes to my mind when we talk about GATT and the negotiations of our federal government is a Quebec saying to the effect that they talk a lot but do little. I think that pretty well summarizes our fear about how the government negotiates.

Mr. Speaker, since September 1986, the 108 member countries of GATT have been involved in a new round of more ambitious negotiations to liberalize international trade throughout the world. We were rather surprised to read in the press that the Dunkel report provided for a tariff system to replace our supply management system. It was a surprise, but we were very worried to find that out, because remember that the Dunkel report, which takes its name from the director-general of GATT, is meant to summarize the state of negotiations and serve as a basis for settling this new round of negotiations called the Uruguay round.

To properly understand the issues, Mr. Speaker, you must see how the Dunkel report deals with the question of subsidies, which we are used to as a part of supply management, especially in Quebec, because for a long time we have spent, I believe, almost $800 million a year on all sorts of subsidies for our farm sector.

The Dunkel report then affects some elements that could really put Quebec in a tight spot, and I will give you examples. It provides sanctions for equity investment such as the Société générale de financement, the Caisse de dépôt et de placement, the Société de développement industriel, Soquip, and so on, have. That means that the action taken by our provincial government can be subject to sanctions. I know that the federal government talks about theoretical sanctions. I remember that the last time we heard about "theoretical sanctions" was during the free trade negotiations. Unfortunately these theoretical sanctions became real sanctions—talk to the people at Norsk Hydro or to the people in British Columbia about softwood lumber.

The loan guarantee programs in Quebec, which are another form of intervention often used in our province, can also be subject to sanctions. Sanctions might also be taken against tax incentives and tax credits in Quebec, according to the Dunkel report. I am sure that the minister of consumer affairs is aware that this includes the stock savings plan as well as flowthrough shares, the occupational training tax credit and even the tax credit used to launch the solidarity fund.

I speak of these programs as activities that can be denounced and subject to sanctions in the Dunkel report because they are called specific subsidies. When they are specific, they can be denounced by any other country that signed the agreement. Unfortunately this could be disastrous for Quebec, not only because Quebec is different in that we have a variety of programs to support our agricultural industry, and also for consumers because if all these sanctions are applied, with free trade, foreign companies and the whole foreign agriculture industry will surely find the field quite open for unfair but legal competition.

Mr. Speaker, my colleague's motion is extremely important and I think it is quite clear, unlike the government's negotiations at GATT. We are very clear in our motion, which reads as follows: "That this House calls on the government to support unequivocally any final GATT accord that—" and this is very simple, since it does at least two things— "provides for the maintenance of viable and effective management programs as an essential element of Canadian agricultural policy". Second, Mr. Speaker, we ask the government to support unequivocally any final GATT accord that: "ensures the ability of Canada, through a clarified article XI, to control effectively imports of milk, eggs, hatching eggs, chicken and turkey, and products containing a majority of supply managed products".

Mr. Speaker, I agree that Quebec's farm sector is not the only one affected by these problems. They affect Canada as a whole, including city dwellers as customers, and people in rural areas as producers. As a consumer advocate, I have tried in recent weeks to find out whether our production system makes food and food products more expensive than they would be in the United States. I have often heard people say this, but today, a Nova Scotia poultry producer told me that in 1982, they got $1.16 for every chicken; 10 years later, in 1992, they are still getting $1.16 for every chicken.

I do not think we are paying too much for our food, but I wonder whether food is cheaper in the United States. Of course it is cheaper. However, I left the United States because I did not want to belong to a society where the individual does not count, and where the traditional farm does not count, where instead people are intent on vertical integration, big business, so-called agribusiness. Mr. Speaker, after giving up the United States to come to Canada and become a Canadian citizen, I would hate to become, oh, irony of ironies, an American living in Canada, after all those 23 years. This is just too much

I have a stake in this debate because I experienced what is happening to the United States, and I experienced what is happening to Canada, and frankly, there is no point in living like Americans and having the kind of businesses Americans have. We have something better here. Perhaps members on the other side of the House do not accept this because it isn't enough. Mr. Speaker, I can tell you that we have a standard of living, social security, medicare and all kinds of programs that make our country different from the United States. I think that one of the reasons why the current GATT talks have caused so much dissatisfaction and even outrage across Canada is that Canadians realize they are about to lose what they had gained.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to say in conclusion that I hope this government will not be "all talk and no action".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): We are now in the five-minute question and comment period. The hon. Minister of State for Agriculture.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I listened to carefully to my hon. colleague whose comments focused on several elements of the Canadian agricultural policy. He made some interesting points and I must say that I share his view completely, especially concerning the difference between the Canadian and American lifestyles. I think that we can only be in total agreement on that. I will tell him in jest, Mr. Speaker, that he should discuss the use of the expression "all talk, no action" with his colleague, the premier of Ontario. It might be of help to Mr. Rae in planning his policies for the future.

I would like to come back to a point the hon. member barely addressed and that is international trade. He described the free trade agreement with the United States as a major catastrophe. As my hon. colleague may be aware, statistics are available for the first two years after it was implemented and they show that, in the agrifood industry alone, Canadian exports to the States have increased by 30 per cent. In spite of his party's doom and gloom predictions, free trade has contributed to bringing our trade balance with the United States down from $700 million to $300 million within two years. That is not bad. I just wanted to quote these figures to my hon. colleague for future reference.

I would like him to comment on this and to know if he still thinks, as I do, that the Canadian position at GATT—which he seems familiar with—accurately reflects the feelings of the Canadian farmers, provinces and government, in other words, if you and I fully support this position and that we have no reason to tear each other to shreds. Do we agree on that?

Mr. Edmonston: Mr. Speaker, I am always impressed by the statements made by this government, because those are really statements with which nobody can disagree. However, it is not with your words—

Mr. Blais: I have figures here.

Mr. Edmonston: I will get to those figures later, but I first want to talk about your words. Nobody can disagree with the government because it says things precisely so as to get the greatest possible approval from people. But we are somewhat concerned, and we do not make this up since this feeling prevails everywhere in Canada and in every farming sector, and the minister is well aware of that. The problem is that in these negotiations actions do not follow words, which is to say that you intend to say one thing but do another one.

The minister is asking me if I think he is a liar. Not at all. I think he is mistaken because I find that people in general believe the minister talks a lot but does little. That's all. I did not say that he was a "liar".

I want to say something important about figures. It is true that the agrifood industry, that is the whole agricultural sector in Canada, experienced an increase in its sales to the United States. That is a fact. But I can tell you today that in Quebec people who were so much in favour of free trade now realize that it was not in their best interest, and the majority of them are now opposed to free trade. That is a complete reversal of opinion. In fact, whether it is with Mexico or any other country, Quebecers are fed up of hearing the words "free trade". The only thing they know is that this free trade has created unemployment, even when the government talked about implementing a manpower training program, that is some kind of retraining to help workers who lost their jobs get some training for other positions. However, nothing happened.

So you better not talk about free trade in Quebec now because unlike in 1988, the majority of people no longer support free trade. I would like to say another thing to the minister that answered before—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order. The five minute period is up.

[English]

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, until I heard the minister speak earlier this afternoon I retained some small degree of hope that perhaps the pessimists were wrong and Canada really was going to maintain its supply management system. I say "Canada", not the farmers but Canada itself. However, after listening to the minister, I fear that all is lost from that point of view.

The free trade agreement has been mentioned. When we were discussing it some three years ago we were reassured, guaranteed by the government, that the marketing board system would be maintained under the free trade agreement. It lasted for just over two years. Now we know, from what the minister said today, that he too has abandoned any hope of maintaining our system of orderly marketing.

What of the minister's choice of language? He has confidence in the system. He could only have been referring to supply management. He is willing to defend it. Supply management is not something that needs defending. Perhaps it should be sold but certainly not defended as though it were something that was lacking in some ways, as though it were something wrong. It is the best system of marketing in the whole world. Canada has been a world leader in developing its system of supply management. Supply management means exactly what the words say.

The minister said that we may have to adjust some plans that interfere with world markets, but supply management does not. Supply management could, but it does not when it is working properly. It works properly in Canada and the minister knows it. In saying he is willing to defend it, he is saying that he does not really believe in it strongly enough to go out there and sell it, to tell the rest of the world that Canada, the United States notwithstanding, is determined to maintain its system of supply management and orderly marketing.

Supply management means exactly what the words say: we manage the amount of supply. We make sure there are just enough of the various commodities under supply management to ensure that the home market is supplied. As I said, we could adjust it upward to supply an export market if we wanted to, if there were a demand, if the world needed it somewhere, if we had an agreement with some country. We could do that. It is that flexible and can react very quickly.

With our system of supply management we are able to maintain the quality. The quality of Canadian food is not surpassed anywhere in the world. We are able to reduce the cost of supplying this food. One of the speakers said earlier that the cost of food to Canadians is the second lowest in the world. That is in large measure due to our supply management system.

We do not have surpluses that we have to dump somewhere. Each commodity looks after its own production so that the amount required for fresh consumption, whether it be eggs, milk, broilers or turkeys, is just enough to supply the fresh market plus enough of a margin, which is processed by the appropriate marketing board, so that there is an ample supply of top quality food available for Canadians. We do not export any of those goods to any degree unless there is a market that has to be filled. We can react very quickly to any shortfall anywhere else. We can increase the production of any of those goods.

The price the producers receive is not outrageous. I was an egg producer during the 1950s, about 40 years ago. The cost of producing those eggs has increased fifteenfold since I was an egg producer. The cost of all the feed, the cost of everything, apart from the labour put in by the proprietor, has increased fifteenfold. The number of birds that a person looks after has increased fifteenfold. The price of the product to the consumer has increased 15 per cent. That is the case with eggs and it is similar for all the other commodities which are supply managed.

It is not possible to do it with everything. It is very difficult to do with it tree fruit because it perhaps could take five years for a tree to come into production. It is very difficult to do it with grain because the amount of production is so unpredictable, and so is the world demand. We just do not know.

We should not be tinkering with our system of supply management. We should do everything we can to maintain it. The minister did not talk too much about the other agricultural products. Of course the one on the table is grain and oilseeds, but supply management does not work there.

Even there it is not a case of support. He talked about supporting, but we are not supporting grain farmers. If we were going to support grain farmers, the best thing we could do for them would be to let them go broke and get off the farm.

Most of them are certainly not doing any more than barely making a living. We are not giving them prices that will enable them to make a good living. We are not giving them prices that will enable them to buy equipment right now. They do not even buy enough fertilizer.

They are not able to farm the way they know they could if conditions were right. Those are not support prices. We are not supporting the farmers. We are simply paying the farmers to produce wheat because we need to export it.

Why do we need to export it? We are paying some $27 billion a year in interest charges to foreigners for money they have lent us. We have to give them something. Loonies will not do, so we give them wheat. We give them oilseeds. They are the second largest source of export for Canada.

We are not looking after the farmers. We are not doing it because we like the farmers. We are doing it because we need those exports.

Our system does not need defending. We should be selling it. There are producers of everything all over the world who would like to get into our system of managing the supply for their own needs, of orderly marketing so producers can make a respectable living.

Even then they do not have control of the price. They are accused of holding up the prices, of holding people to ransom. In most of the marketing boards that have any authority to set prices there are people involved in the mechanism of setting prices who have nothing to do with production.

They are there to provide consumer input on prices. I am not sure about the other provinces but I know that, for example, in B.C. the chairman of the milk board for the longest time was a chartered accountant who knew nothing at all about producing milk. He certainly knew how to calculate.

The price of milk the producer received was calculated very closely so that the producer got the cost of production and enough margin to cover the rest of his expenses.

That is the way it is with the other boards. There are people involved in the price setting mechanism who know the costs. They get all the information. They know if there is any need for the price to change one way or the other, up or down. They set the prices very carefully. The farmers still have to do all the gambling on what will happen with respect to weather, diseases and so on.

They are totally at the mercy of diseases from time to time that can wreck people individually, and yet not the industry. Production is country-wide, from Newfoundland to Prince Edward Island to British Columbia.

Every province has some degree of supply management. Certainly the farmers in the province from which I come, British Columbia, depend to a great extent on supply management to make it possible for them to make a living, to make it possible for them to produce exactly the amount of milk, eggs, broiler hatching eggs, broilers or turkeys required by the market in that province.

We have never heard of any embarrassing surpluses. We have never heard of any shortages and we have never heard of anybody paying more than a fair price.

I am not saying that it cannot be bought cheaper somewhere else, but farmers are getting the cost of production and enough of a margin for it to be reasonable. That is fair to them and it is fair to the consumer.

We should not be defending our system of orderly marketing, our system of marketing boards. We should be out there making it possible for the farmers in other countries to learn from our experience and adopt similar systems so that they will be treated fairly and consumers in their countries will be treated fairly.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in my friend's comments with respect to the sale and the selling of marketing boards. He knows as a member from British Columbia that over the past two years, at any rate, the tree fruit industry in the Okanagan Valley in British Columbia in particular but throughout the Niagara Peninsula and the Annapolis Valley in Nova Scotia has been pushing for an apple marketing board. It has to some extent agreed that is the way apples should be marketed as the other system has worked fairly well, as he has pointed out, in the sale of eggs, broilers, chickens, turkeys et cetera.

I am wondering whether he would like to comment for the benefit of the tree fruit farmers of Canada. With his experience as a former Minister of Agriculture in the province of British Columbia, and with his vast experience in the marketing system, does he see the marketing board system as he knows it as a system for future marketers and producers of apples? Does he say that such a policy would assist the farmers in my region in the Okanagan and the Similkameen valleys to continue viable production of apples at a reasonable price?

Mr. Stupich: I thank the member for the question. I watched the development and the interest being shown by tree fruit producers for some sort of a marketing commission. I want to offer them every encouragement to take control of their own destiny to the extent they are able to.

One of the features of marketing boards generally is that they will not interfere in markets of other countries. Of course we know that a lot of the tree fruit product is exported in the case of British Columbia to specialty markets.

I would encourage them. The farmers then would be selling their fruit on the fresh fruit market which is where the bulk of the return comes from. The farmers, as with every other marketing board, accept the responsibility for taking off the market the surplus that is then processed, for example, apples to apple juice, apple pie filling, whatever.

In any case the farmers pay for the cost of that. They are getting a lesser return for the product. They own the processing plants that process their product whether it is apples, eggs or poultry meat.

I have watched what is happening. I encourage them, but the inference I took from what the minister said today was that if they were able to accomplish it, by the time they got it working the government would have pulled the rug out from under their feet and would have sold out to the U.S.A.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate today. One thing this debate is doing, and especially the discussions of the past few weeks, is to make us realize that the Canadian agrifood industry is facing major changes not only in Canada but all over the world.

To use a common expression, the agrifood industry is once again at the crossroads. More than ever, it is critical to follow the development of consumer markets. Under pressure from all sides, technologies are developing incredibly fast. Eating habits are also changing, becoming more varied. Companies develop new business strategies with a view to positioning themselves in the context of market globalization. That is to say that the stakes are high and extend far beyond our provincial borders, even our national borders. Of course, our agrifood industry is affected by all this. It has no choice but to adjust to these changes, and I think most of the people in this industry are willing to take up this challenge.

In fact farmers, processors and food retailers to name but a few are ready to do whatever it takes. Since their production is their livelihood, they are sensitive to market fluctuations. They know that if they make the right decisions, they stand to gain a great deal.

There are driving forces within this industry striving to innovate and to be competitive. As I mentioned earlier, in spite of the doom and gloom scenario predicted in 1998 of what might result from the free trade deal with the United States, here we are with major increases in our exports, i.e. between 25 and 30 per cent, for the first two years. In the dairy and poultry industries as well our exports have increased, which means that things are never as bad as we are led to believe.

Mr. Speaker, one thing is sure and that is that our agrifood industry has constantly improved. Many of the agricultural products we export compare favourably with any other in the world. It would be even more so if international trade rules applied equally to every country. That is why we are working so hard to make things move at GATT. When I say we, I mean members of the cabinet, but also our negotiators, people who support us, and I should add people in the provinces, in the food industry, in agriculture, and even, to some extent, a large number of members of this House who, despite the fact that speeches are sometimes partisan, seem nevertheless to support the Canadian position, which has the advantage of being supported by everybody.

Moreover, our message is clear. It is clear to us, it is clear to other members of GATT and it is mainly clear to the stakeholders in the Canadian agrifood industry. Need we repeat a thousand times, Mr. Speaker, that our position reflects in every detail what came out of the consultations we held with the industry? It is not the position of the Canadian government we are defending at GATT, but the position of the Canadian agrifood industry. It is our producers who came up with this historic compromise, whether it be in the grain industry, in the area of minimum access to market, in the supply management sectors for milk and poultry. I repeat, this is not just the position of the Canadian government, of cabinet ministers, of members of this House; this is the position of farmers. This is the position of provincial governments. Naturally this is the position our government endorsed, and the position I am proud to defend.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian system of supply management was set up according to GATT rules. This system today, just like yesterday, is a success. Many countries came here to look at it as a possible model for them. This a marketing model of which Canadians are justly proud. With this system our producers receive a fair reward for their labour. For their part, processors and consumers can expect a regular and constant supply of quality products at reasonable prices.

Clearly, just like in any other industries not under supply management, it is necessary to make periodic adjustments to follow changes in the marketplace. I believe people in the industry are willing to adapt, to co-operate with us in government, to make the system of supply management more responsive to the marketplace. This is what we did, Mr. Speaker, when we reviewed agricultural programs.

As I just said, the supply management system is based on GATT rules. One of the contentious issues at the talks in Geneva concerns article XI, which provides for the control of imports for supply management.

Mr. Speaker, we have noticed in recent years—and it must be mentioned—that this article XI on which we relied heavily, particularly for our supply management system, had a deficiency which may not have been foreseen 40 years ago, when the GATT was signed. However, if you read the report of the GATT panel on yogurt and ice cream, you have no choice but to acknowledge that article XI, in its present form, does not adequately protect products marketed under supply management systems, particularly processed products. And since we find ourselves with an agricultural economy in which new processed and over-processed products now represent a greater share of the market, those products must be protected through a supply management system; otherwise it will become increasingly difficult to maintain the system.

Mr. Speaker, that is why, in response to a request from producers, we drafted a new article XI that accurately reflects their needs and that should enable us to protect our Canadian system.

It is somewhat insulting—that is how I feel, Mr. Speaker—that other countries want us to give up that article or that protection so that they can change their own system, which is based on exceptions, whereas ours is based on written rules that seemed clear at the time and that enabled us to have a system. It is not right to penalize Canadian farmers because other countries want to go back to rules that are more in line with those of international trade.

I do hope that it will be possible to make our partners, the other members of the international community, understand Canada's position. We are not asking for favours. We are a trading country that always abided by the rules of international trade. So have the provinces, the producers and the processors. I believe that this is the way to behave.

The Canadian government refuses to be forced, after 20 years, to change a system that works. Canada does not unload food surpluses on the other members of the international community. Canada disciplined itself; it reduced its own domestic supplies and limited its activities to its own market. In exchange, it asked for control at the border. What Canada asks again today is the right to be able to maintain control over access to its market, based on Canadians' capacity. Mr. Speaker, Canada is asking for justice.

I ask all my colleagues in this House to support Canada's position, as you have done, and I thank most of the members who rose to indicate their support. The government is not alone in this. We must transcend the party lines, we must go beyond mere partisanship, in order to support Canadian producers. For once, we have the ability to transcend the political discussions, Mr. Speaker, and to work together—

The Prime Minister announced today that he will meet farm leaders early next week. Together we will develop our strategy. Together we have defined Canada's position, and our government is open to all suggestions regarding its strategy. We will probably have to go back to Europe to meet some people who might be able to help.

Mr. Speaker, as long as the agreement is not signed by all 108 member countries, we will fight to make sure that what we want in order to preserve our marketing agencies will find its way into the final report Mr. Dunkel will be presenting. That is the goal for which we have been working so hard and so relentlessly for almost two years.

True, we have not succeeded yet. We are honest enough to admit it. We have not succeeded yet. The fight is fierce, but that is exactly why, Mr. Speaker, we must work side by side. We do not have any other choice, but only in a great country like Canada is such historical consensus possible. I am sure we will be successful and that will make Canadians, each and every one of us, very proud.

[English]

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the Minister of State for Agriculture that farmers are concerned. They are concerned for their futures, they are concerned for their livelihoods. I know he understands that. I know he is aware of the tragic situation that will occur if the Dunkel proposals go forward.

I have a few questions for him dealing specifically with the proposals. I am wondering if he can assure farmers that if Dunkel is accepted and if the government fails to live up to its commitment to retain supply management, his government will be prepared to provide programs to farmers in order for them to survive. I am sure he is aware that if the Dunkel proposals come forward that there will not be a farm left in Canada in the next 10 years.

I am wondering if he can tell me what the Dunkel proposals would do to our safety net or our crop insurance. The minister and his officials said yesterday that they figured it would have no effect on them.

I am wondering if the minister can explain to us how this would be. I am wondering if he knows what new proposals the Prime Minister has taken. My hon. friend from Hamilton East said earlier the Prime Minister did go out and he did, supposedly, go around the world and he did go to the United States and ask President Bush if he could support us in this area. The minister knows that the Prime Minister failed because what we got was Dunkel. With Dunkel we will have no supply management left in Canada.

I ask the minister what he is doing or what else the Prime Minister is doing to help solidify support around the world for this. It is said we are going to need the support of 106 countries on this. We need one country's support right now and the minister knows that. We need the support of the United States.

I am wondering what specifically the Prime Minister is doing in Washington to get this support.

The minister is also responsible for consumer affairs. The minister knows that his department, or a department within the Ministry of Agriculture, gave the Consumers Association money to do a study on supply management. When they came out and criticized supply management in the papers and they condemned our system of marketing we heard nothing from the minister, the Prime Minister, the Deputy Prime Minister or the Minister of Agriculture.

It concerns us on this side when we hear this. We know what the ministers have been saying. They support supply management. However, they are not responding to these specific attacks on our system, especially those attacks from Canadian newspapers and from other groups within Canada that may not agree with us. The minister has been somewhat quiet.

You can see why it is not only us but a lot of farmers throughout Canada who are somewhat sceptical of whether or not this government or these ministers are really behind supply management.

Mr. Blais: My hon. colleague has raised a lot of questions. I will try to address a few of them.

I have not heard much from the member about this study from the Consumers Association of Canada. I stood up many times regarding the fact that from the consumer's point of view the increase in the price of dairy and poultry products was below the price index over a period of four or five years. I mentioned that many times. Maybe I should send the member a few of my speeches. Maybe he got them but I could make an exception and send him other copies of my speeches.

We should get back to the Dunkel report he mentioned. Canadians expressed concern about the Dunkel report as far as the agriculture side was concerned. We expressed concern the day we got the document, or maybe a couple of days after. The Americans expressed concern. The Europeans expressed concern as well. We have only one signature on the Dunkel paper right now and it is Mr. Dunkel's signature.

• (1740)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member's time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to have this opportunity to deal with agriculture, and particularly the present GATT negotiations. Since I have been elected to this House to represent the constituency of Beauce, in Quebec, I have worked hard and taken a keen interest in agriculture, as the representative of a semi-rural semi-urban county which qualifies as the kingdom of small and medium sized businesses. But beside these farm manufacturing firms, we have at least 3,000 producers of pork, eggs, poultry, particularly dairy products, and so on.

As the years went by, I have learned here in Parliament and in the various committees, that our government has worked very hard to support the Canadian and Quebec agriculture. Today, we hear prophets of doom say that in the present GATT negotiations, which have lasted more than a year, this government has sold us down the river. I wonder where that information comes from, because the Government of Canada has always fiercely supported our farmers, whatever the type of farming they do and in whatever region of Canada they live.

Last Friday, Mr. Speaker, the federal and provincial ministers of agriculture have stated again their complete and unshakeable support of our government position which is to bring to a successful conclusion these GATT negotiations. And, when I speak about the provincial and federal ministers of agriculture, I include all the heads of the various producers' unions across the country.

Canada's position within the GATT negotiations, developed in co-operation with farmers' associations and the provinces, essentially strives for a clearer definition and a strengthening of article XI, a substantial reduction of trade distorting grants and an easier access to international markets.

I must add that the Canadian position has never changed on that matter. In representing the Beauce region farmers, I have often stressed the importance of protecting the supply management system essential to milk, egg and poultry producers. I have stressed, for my colleagues and for the government, and my comments were well received and accepted, the fact that we recognize the absolute necessity of working closely with the agrifood industry if Canada's well-balanced position is to progress. Other members from regions where there is an active farming community have said the same. I was assured that government would do its utmost till the end of the negotiations to have Canada's position accepted and I myself have seen that it has indeed made great efforts, particularly during this past year.

Today, all the premiers have been made aware of this. Canada's Prime Minister has made an enormous contribution to the protection of agriculture—

An hon. member: Well done.

Mr. Bernier: It is indeed noteworthy and I am sure our three ministers responsible for agriculture would agree: the Minister of Agriculture, the minister specifically responsible for protecting the grain farmers and the minister protecting the farmers from Quebec.

There were negotiations; we know that the Prime Minister, contacted Mr. Kohl from Germany, Mr. Mitterrand from France and Mr. Bush from the United States on numerous occasions to make sure that our message be understood and not misunderstood.

The GATT negotiations are not over. We sincerely hope that the Canadian position will be recognized.

On January 13, not long ago, in Geneva, our negotiators reminded Mr. Dunkel of that. They also made him aware of our dissatisfaction concerning the recent agricultural proposals. What is important for the farmers from the Beauce area in Quebec is that we preserve the supply management systems and the other fundamental pillars of the Quebec agricultural policy, such as the crop insurance, the income stabilization insurance and the farm credit.

For many years, Mr. Speaker, the Beauce farmers and the Quebec farmers have endured bravely and have made sacrifices. It was not easy to work in the farm sector 25 years ago. I must tell you that you could not decently live on farming 25 years ago, I mean, in general.

But Quebec farmers organized themselves, they put in place some programs and systems of protection in order to improve their lot and also the quality of their products.

In the past, when you were a farmer, you could not live on farming alone. You had to have another occupation. For example, in my region, you could be a lumberman and do part-time farming because you could not live on farming alone. We became more sophisticated, we became professionals and I must tell you that by making sacrifices, we managed to put in place programs which, today, are copied or should be copied by many farmers in other countries.

With this system that we put in place, our farmers have now the right to get a fair income for their labour. On the other hand, processors and consumers can expect greater quality products and a permanent supply. And all that at a reasonable price.

So, with discipline, we were finally recognized as bussinessmen. We adopted systems and implemented programs which are interesting but expensive, expensive for all governments, federal or provincial, as well as for farmers. Thus, governments and producers paid the price. Up to now, our farmers have made too many sacrifices, their grievances cannot simply be ignored.

I want to tell you that the member for Beauce is well aware of the situation and so are his colleagues in the Quebec Conservative caucus, who show a remarkable interest to this issue. I do not need to remind you that their constant concern is to carry the message from Quebec farmers to strategic places. So the farm community can count on us.

I must say, Mr. Speaker, that some prophets of doom try to tell us that the governement stays put and has abandoned Canadian and Quebec farmers. That is not so. We can prove that our negotiators in Geneva are vigilant. Indeed, for the Quebec members of the Progressive Conservative Party, agriculture is a great cause. Even our members from regions like Montreal, for instance, or other large cities, which benefit from agriculture although there is no permanent and functional agricultural sector in these areas, since farms are located in the rural parts of Quebec, support us firmly and they also support our Prime Minister and his claims. You must know we will not neglect any action which would allow us to hope for better conditions.

As a matter of fact, the negotiations are hard and tedious, but I must tell you our negotiators are very well aware of our Canadian and Quebecer farmers' needs. In this respect, Mr. Speaker, I assure you the farmers can be confident they will have the entire support of the present government.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the speech of the Minister of State for Agriculture and, just now, to the one of the hon. member for Beauce, but I can see that both avoid the real question which is not to determine if the position of the farmers and provinces is the right one. That position is generally supported by this House, as we will see tonight at the time of the vote. The real question is what the government has done about that position. What are the results of the GATT ongoing negotiations? What has the government done?

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, what we find out now, two years after the beginning of the negotiations, is that this government has made only seven allies among 108 countries. That is what it is telling us just now, only a few weeks before the end of those negotiations. Has the government really done its homework? That is the question. Has it got tangible results to show us? That is the real question.

I heard the Minister of State say that the Prime Minister talked to President Bush. The Prime Minister talked to everybody. I do not want to know if he talked to them, I want to know if he influenced them. Did he call them to say hello? Not only did he talk to them, but did he make himself clear? That is the fundamental question. Unfortunately, according to the results reported by the government, it seems everyone the Prime Minister called hung up on him. The truth is, the Prime Minister has failed to find a single ally among all these people in spite of all his calls.

When I look at the members across the way, they have all committed themselves strongly to the farmers. They are the ones who committed themselves to strenghthening article XI. Did they deliver the goods? That is the real question. That is the question farmers are asking.

The Minister of State for Agriculture said he was ready to put his seat on the line. We will see in these coming weeks whether he has that kind of courage and whether he brings back the substantial results he promised.

What do experts say? UPA President Jacques Proulx who knows a lot about this whole issue said last week that this government is but a bunch of fumblers both politically and in negotiations.

Mr. Picotte, the Minister of Agriculture in Quebec, is beginning to wonder about the results our federal negotiators will get. Do you know what our greatest fear is in Quebec, Mr. Speaker? That our farmers will be but a bargaining chip in GATT negotiations. We are afraid that our farmers will be sacrificed for the sake of a GATT agreement.

Here is the question I would like to ask of the hon. member for Beauce. If we do not win that fight for supply management, will Canada sign the GATT agreement nonetheless?

Mr. Bernier: Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time we have heard the hon. member for Shefford get carried away and take a position that is extremely partisan, considering the subject is an international one. My point is that it is extremely important for all members of this House, irrespective of their political allegiance, to support the government, and I think we have the support of the vast majority of parliamentarians for our current negotiations at GATT.

When we talk about getting the support of 108 countries, we must not forget that for many of these countries, marketing boards are an entirely novel and revolutionary concept. They do not understand what it means. Take Mr. Lacombe, president of France's farm producers, which is more or less what Mr. Proulx is in Quebec. When someone mentioned GATT article X1 and protecting marketing boards to Mr. Lacombe, he did not even know what we were talking about. He just was not interested. He did not have the same problems with GATT that we have here in Canada.

So the important thing here is to establish a solid common front in this country. We are supported by all provincial premiers and agriculture ministers. We are supported by all presidents and executives of the UPA in Quebec, for instance, and all other farm associations in Canada.

These people realize that Canada has done a great deal to convince all those delegates from 108 countries. We have made several gains. A number of people now encourage and support us. More remains to be done, and the negotiations are continuing. It isn't over until it's over, so we have to be very careful.

Several days from now, the Prime Minister of Canada will meet the country's farm leaders and once again submit Canada's position and ask for their support. We ask the members of the Bloc Quebecois, who claim to represent the interests of Quebecers, to support our position with enthusiasm, because our position—

Mr. Lapierre: No problem.

Mr. Bernier: No problem. Thank you. We have the Bloc Quebecois' support for the vote. Thank you.

[English]

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, to understand the uncertainty in the minds of the dairy and poultry producers today in Canada I have to reflect back to the minister's statement of September 18, page 2312 of Hansard, when he said: "The policy of this government is that article XI should be further clarified and strengthened. That position has not changed and will not change until the government says it will change".

It left the door open. Then, on page 6369 of Hansard, a plan is referred to by the Prime Minister. He said that the Tories are now working on a plan to offer better protection than the present formula.

In looking at these statements it is not much wonder that the dairy and poultry farmers of Canada are fearful of what lies ahead. They are fearful that their system, which is the best in the world and has not contributed to world surpluses, will be traded away in secret, behind closed doors.

Of course, we heard the Minister for International Trade a year ago. A year ago last October he chastised the Minister of Agriculture in this House for giving the farmers such huge subsidies: $8.8 billion worth of subsidies.

Of that, $2.2 billion went to dairy farmers. That was a concocted figure. The actual figure was $267 billion to the industrial milk producers of Canada. The fluid milk producers got nothing. The difference was the difference in price between what Canada's dairy farmers received and what the U.S. farmers received. They call that a "subsidy".

Look at the difference between the industry in Canada, a healthy, vibrant industry that supplies the Canadian consumer with ample quantities of excellent products at reasonable prices, and the system of utter chaos in the United States, where literally thousands upon thousands of dairy farmers are being forced out of business.

I was very upset when I saw a newspaper headline in today's The Ottawa Citizen quoting a statement by David Simpson, executive director of the Canadian Consumers' Association and the Consumer's Group, that he: "foresees lower prices under proposed GATT rules".

Another headline in The Montreal Gazette on February 11 said: "Dairy industry mooches off Canadians who are stuck buying expensive milk". They claim in those articles that the average dairy farmer in Canada, of whom there are 38,000 in fact, is getting $15,000 in subsidies each.

That is absolutely wrong. It is absolutely wrong. Not once have I heard the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs get up and correct the record. Rather they hand out another $790,000 to the Canadian Consumers' Association to attack the best marketing systems in the world that have served us so well.

I have to ask the minister why he is not taking the lead to correct these erroneous statements. Why does he not defend his producers at home here in Canada? Is he using the same laid back tactics in defence of our marketing board systems at GATT?

I wish to point out to the minister that we did a study in my office last summer. We called it "Compare the Share" and it showed where the largest increases in price to the consumer took place.

During the last 10 years 2 per cent milk increased 19 cents a litre at the farm gate but 73 cents to the consumer, an increase of 97 per cent; cheese showed a very moderate increase to the producer and the manufacturer, but at the retail level an increase of 86 per cent. There was a 29 per cent increase to the chicken producer and 87 per cent to the consumer. This is almost double the rate of inflation and this government and the Bank of Canada jack up interest rates to control inflation, letting this go by. Yet our Canadian farmers get a return on capital invested that is about one-half of the five year average return of capital invested in the food distribution sector. How do you justify this?

I am going to give the minister a copy of that study and, hopefully, he will come to the defence of our Canadian farmers here at home, set the record straight and remind Canadian consumers and the Canadian people that they have the second lowest food costs of any nation in the world. In fact, only the United States has lower prices, and only slightly lower at that.

Let me quote from an editorial just this week in the Thumb Farm News of Imlay City, Michigan. The editor, a former employee of the USDA, said: "What is frightening for the United States consumers is that we are on the threshold of food shortages in the United States". Is that the system we are going to adopt if we move toward tariffication?

Canadian consumers through our planned marketing systems have ample supplies of high quality food at reasonable prices. We have the best system in the world. We must maintain it. Tariffication simply will not work.

These systems were established under legislation passed in this House and in provincial legislatures across this land. What right has this government to trade away these systems established under a democratic system of government, behind closed doors, in secret negotiations in the interests of the transnational trading corporations.

On February 21, thousands of farmers are coming to this city due to the uncertainty created by this government. I ask the minister to reflect for a moment on what happened in the Ottawa Valley at Crysler Farms in 1812. Do not sell these producers short. Their livelihoods and the livelihoods of their families are at stake because the government has pushed them to the brink.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I have to indicate that I concur with the position of the prairie pools and my colleague from Thunder Bay on the continuance of the Crow benefit in its present form.

Mr. Harry Brightwell (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I would like to give the member from Lambton—Middlesex the chance to correct the statement he made during the speech in which he said that the dairy farmers of Canada get $267 billion. I know he meant million dollars. When he stands up, he will indeed correct that.

I want to ask the member if he would say that we, as a nation, should stay out of GATT if we are not able to get what we need for the supply managed industries in Canada.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I thought I said $267 million. If I did say billion, it was an error and I acknowledge it.

The government held the position and that is the position it sold to producers that it was working to clarify and strengthen article XI. That is where I stand and that is what I am going to hold the government to.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment my colleague from Lambton—Middlesex. I can say that during this debate, and I say this clearly and unequivocally, there is no better person on this side of the House to lead and give guidance to all of the members, not only on this side, but on the other side with his extreme knowledge about this very complicated problem, a problem that is so vital to our community.

I meet too with the milk producers in my riding, Rudy Butenhausen, Alan Struther, Bill Vanderweiss and Steve Matazuski. They are, to a person, in agreement with what we have just heard from our colleague. Needless to say, I support that position wholeheartedly.

I want to ask our previous speaker what his interpretation is of the motion that is on the floor with respect to the Crow benefit or the western grain transportation subsidy in its present form. Does he think that this, in its present form, means just the amount of money or a change in the plan?

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I certainly concur with the position of the prairie pools that the benefit should continue in its present form. What else? I think we have to go further. I am sure the member from Thunder Bay will agree with me that the government should seriously consider wiping off the debt accumulated by Canadian seaway. We are competing directly against the Mississippi waterway that is maintained by the U.S. Department of Defence, as it maintains part of its interstate highway systems and interstate railway systems. If we are going to compete with equal tariffs on the seaway, we should put it on an equal basis of that of the U.S. Mississippi waterway.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity today to speak on this motion and the amendments that have been made to it dealing with the future of 40,000 farm businesses in Canada and a total of approximately 100,000 Canadian jobs because of the spin-offs through the communities.

My comments on the motion today come at a time when the future of an industry that I personally have grown up in and am still involved in is in jeopardy. We stand at the conclusion, hopefully a successful conclusion, to the GATT talks and the Uruguay round amendments to the GATT agreement.

Yesterday at the Standing Committee on Agriculture one of Canada's top negotiators stated that this GATT round holds much promise for agriculture. He went on to say how the round would provide predictability and certainty for Canadian farmers. What he failed to explain is why there is so much unpredictability in the agrifood industry today because of this round of talks.

I cannot express enough the effect that this uncertainty has had and is having on the rural community, on those 40,000 families, on their extended families and on the business community they are involved in. There are many families throughout this country today who do not know whether they will even be in business 12 months after this agreement takes place if this government is not successful in getting a strengthened and clarified article XI.

There is rationalization taking place in the processing industry. That has caused enough turmoil in our agricultural community and in that sector of the Canadian economy. That all started with the free trade agreement with the United States. Now we have another agreement, that if we are not successful as a nation in getting what our Canadian farmers and our Canadian consumers need out of this, it will be further devastating to the agricultural community.

We stand to lose an industry that has been both a tremendous benefit not only to the producers but to Canadian consumers. If this government cannot deliver on what it has been telling the producers it believes in, what the producers believe in and what we in the opposition believe in, there will be very, very severe problems from that. I would go on to say that the sovereignty of food supply in Canada will, without doubt, be in question.

Last week and again this week a large number of farmers from a wide area of this part of Canada were here in Ottawa. They were here on Friday, they were here on Monday and they are going to come again. I am pleased to say that a goodly number of those people travelled over three hours on a bus to be here from my riding of Prince Edward—Hastings. They were here to express their anger, their concern, their frustration and their sadness with this government's inability to date to negotiate a fair agreement at the GATT and to secure a strengthened and clarified article XI.

Why are they that nervous? They know from the assessments they have done, for example, that if the proper agreement is not reached at GATT and is not amended in the proper way, within three years the estimates are that 86 per cent of our poultry and chicken producers will be out of business, that half of our egg producers will be out of business and Canadians will be dependent upon someone else other than Canadians for much of their staple food items, many of them.

The tragedy of this is that the Canadian dairy, egg and poultry producers should not even be involved in this. There are problems in the world in the trade situation and the agriculture situation today. We know that. The European Community and the United States are pouring in Niagaras of subsidies in trying to win markets away from Canada and from each other. These problems are not the result of the supply managed commodities, the dairy, egg and poultry producers in this country.

My question is, why are these individuals, these people, these businesses being asked to be part of a solution when they are not part of the problem? That is not fair, Mr. Speaker, and they realize that. They have done their jobs well for themselves, their communities, their bankers, Canadians, the consumer, and the rest of the world. They have not dumped surpluses on the rest of the world, so why should they be penalized for being good, proper and doing it well?

This whole negotiation is about international markets. Canada's supply management system was developed by the Liberal Party. We will stand by that system, we will stand by those producers and we will insist, as our amendment says, that the Prime Minister get more involved than he has to the present date in getting the proper deal for the farmers.

Again, Mr. Speaker, they are not part of the problem.

The Prime Minister said in the past that he has talked and the Minister of Agriculture said today that he had talked to the President of the United States on the phone. This is not enough. We are not going to get the necessary impression across over the telephone. When the leader of the Liberal Party is speaking to the President of the United States on Friday, I know that he will tell the President of the United States the feelings of Canadian farmers and this party, and he will be able to get that point across, as it should have been and must be done on behalf of Canadians.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member in his comments was saying that the producers of dairy products and poultry products should not be involved in these GATT negotiations. I would like him to remember back to a time when ice cream and yogurt became an issue. Is that not the reason that we are discussing this issue today, because of the supply management areas, because we are not protected under the present article XI? Does the Liberal Party not support the clarification and strengthening of article XI? I would like the member to comment on this.

Mr. Vanclief: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is having fun playing with words. When I said that they should not be involved in this, they should not be involved in this because they are not part of the problem.

The government across the way told producers during the free trade debate: "Leave it with us. Article XI is protected. You are going to be okay. We have done this and we have done that". It knew all along that it did not protect the producers in the supply management sector in the free trade agreement the way it said it had.

What is worrying the producers today is that the great negotiator and his team from across the way have not got a very good track record on conducting negotiations. They have not been strong. They have not put the coalition of the other countries together successfully. There are more countries in the world than just the six that they keep listing that have some sort of supply management. They have not been successful in convincing the rest of the countries at GATT that a supply management system and control of production of that type of product does not cause problems in the world trade situation, that it solves problems.

They just have not worked hard enough at it. I hate to say this but I had some producers say to me the other day: "Lyle, I think they are all fluff and there is no stuff and they haven't got their heart in it. They're saying it but they don't believe it. They're free traders. They sold us down the drain on the free trade agreement and now they're sacrificing us again".

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make a point and ask a quick question here.

I have been receiving a lot of calls from my constituents and constituents in the province of New Brunswick who are concerned about these GATT negotiations. Quite clearly, they want a strengthened article XI. I ask the hon. member this: If we do not get that, what effect will that have on the agricultural industry in Atlantic Canada?

Mr. Vanclief: Mr. Speaker, we were given the figures this morning by the players in the industry that their estimate is, for example in the turkey production, that within five to six years there would be absolutely no turkey producers in Atlantic Canada. There would be a tremendously reduced number of all the producers.

I don't think I have to say anything more to the member.

The numbers would go, as would the spin-off, the community and the role that they play. The sector that has held Canadian agriculture together financially, that has made it economically viable in the last few years is the supply management sector. We cannot afford to lose that stability.

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I am also pleased to have the opportunity tonight to be able to speak to the motion and the amendments on the table and to add my voice and that of Atlantic Canada to the debate on agriculture and the GATT, particularly article XI and the role of supply management.

It is an unfortunate but growing trend in Canada that when we have an industry or an institution that is successful, which has become part of the Canadian way of life and which has become an integral part of the economic or social fabric of the nation, then that is the industry or institution we have to meddle with, we have to reorganize, privatize or dismantle it. We seem to have an obsession to either tamper with or not defend or defend half-heartedly those areas which are most successful. We seem to be ashamed of our success. This is the new world order.

Such is the situation we find ourselves in today with our agricultural sector. Our dairy, egg and poultry industries all operate successfully with little or no government support. These are supply managed industries. Now these particular industries find themselves in jeopardy. The GATT negotiations threaten to replace the supply management system.

This change, if it comes to pass, will force our supply management producers to sacrifice a lifetime of effort and investment in order to satisfy the demands of others, particularly the Americans, so they can gain access to our markets.

While the official Canadian negotiating position calls for clarification and enhancement of article XI, there is a growing concern and suspicion in the country that the government's position may be softening. Rumours persist that Canada may agree to abandon supply management boards. This was stated by Lorne MacNeill, chairman of the P.E.I. egg marketing board, when he said: "I am very scared that Ottawa will not be there for farmers. Tariffs would eliminate small producers very fast". This is typical of sentiments expressed by farm leaders and management board people across the country. I do think that over the past weeks the producers have been able to stiffen the backbone of the government in this regard.

There is an underlying fear that the government is already preparing tariffication schedules and thus weakening our negotiating hand before we actually have to decide whether to sign the GATT.

Producers believed the government was fighting hard on their behalf until the minister said in St. John's, Newfoundland, and I quote from yesterday's edition of the farm newspaper Farm and Country: "At the dairy farmers of Canada meeting in St. John's, Newfoundland, when the minister was pressed to say whether or not article XI would be protected, he is quoted as saying I cannot guarantee that article XI will prevail". This came as a shock to the dairy farmers of Canada. They believed everything was fine. They thought that as of last December. If the Dunkel report had not come out what would have happened at that time was that the government would have signed the agreement without even the supply managed producers knowing that it was going to sign away their particular commodities on the altar of free trade.

This prompted Peter Gould, who is an Ontario Milk Board economist, to say that he just cannot see the logic in Canada playing the tariffication card before the GATT poker game even starts. He goes on to say that people are saying Canada is the Boy Scout in international trade. This is very unfair to Boy Scouts. It tarnishes their image. He goes on to say that Canadians are dupes. Gould says: "We give things away before we have to". Gould and others say that the government is doing a sales job on tariffication to make it palatable to Canadians. He says: "You have the Easter Bunny, you have Santa Claus and you have tariffication. You might as well throw in the Tooth Fairy along with them".

It is essential that intervention be made at the highest level in order to lay these fears to rest. It is imperative that the Prime Minister meet with his counterparts in the U.S. and the European Community again. He must defend our supply management system when the very survival of our dairy, poultry and egg industries is at stake.

I do not think our farmers should expect or have to settle for anything less than our national leaders going to the wall to defend their interests and by extension the national interest of all Canadians.

I wish the Prime Minister and our negotiators success and support in these final negotiations.

While this is a national problem I would like to direct most of my remaining remarks to the situation in Atlantic Canada and what the impact on that region will be if our system of supply management is scrapped in favour of tariffication.

Producers are asking for clarification of article XI, not tariffication.

In Atlantic Canada the national problems are compounded by our distance from supplies and from markets. Loss of our supply management system would be a devastating blow to those industries and to the economy of Atlantic Canada.

In the words of the Milk Marketing Board chairman, Gordon MacBeath, "It would mean the end of the dairy industry in this country. We would see massive imports of dairy products from the U.S. into central Canada, and under pressure to keep their markets in central Canada, these central Canadian dairies would start moving into the eastern markets. It would be the end of the small dairy holdings."

Farm organizations throughout Atlantic Canada, the four premiers, the four agriculture ministers, and the four members of Parliament are all on record supporting in strongest possible terms the concept of supply management. They insist that Canada must not agree to the tariffication proposed. It is their considered opinion that it would be tragic if the future of supply management is not secured in these final negotiations.

Just to conclude, I would like to say that the move to tariffication would, in essence, deliberately create in our country a region which would be virtually incapable of producing basic foods. Contrary to the argument that supply management fosters inefficiency and higher prices, we will find that food prices in Atlantic Canada will actually increase.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Egmont for its presentation. I think the concerns that he has identified among farmers from his region are similar to those of farmers elsewhere. However, in my opinion, Mr. Speaker, it is five minutes to midnight in these negotiations. Suddenly, after two years of telling us that everything was going fine, that everything was under control, that we had nothing to worry about, that it was doing a fine job, at five to midnight the government tells us that it is panicking. It is forced to admit in this House, at the request of the opposition, that it has only six allies among 108 countries. Yesterday, Mr. Germain Denis, the international trade assistant deputy minister, told a committee something that worries me a lot and that leads me to ask myself whether the government has a double agenda, that is, it would take a very tough public stand, but once at the negotiating table over there, it would be shy as a child. Mr. Germain Denis, the assistant deputy minister at international trade, who is very honest, no doubt, said: "We must understand one thing about this agricultural issue. Whether in our exporting industries or in our supply management industries, the status quo is not the correct solution."

I always thought that after the struggle of our farmers during the last 30 years, the status quo in milk, eggs, poultry was acceptable and viable. I would like my colleague from Egmont to comment on that statement of the assistant deputy minister. There seems to be two kinds of speeches, one for the public and one for discreet negotiations with a double talk, a double agenda. What are my colleague's views on that? Because the results are so minor that they worry me.

[English]

Mr. McGuire: Mr. Speaker, that is precisely the feeling that the producers were receiving in January of this year that even though they put their faith and trust in government that they would fight to keep it.

They could not believe themselves that the United States or the rest of the world in fact would ask us to make such a sacrifice in the name of world trade.

We had put our entire trust in GATT. I know during the past election we said that the free trade agreement did not protect supply management systems and that we would put our faith in GATT.

Now we are finding that our negotiators at GATT and the government really have not been able to convince the rest of the world, particularly the United States, that we are not the problem. Our producers in Canada and supply management are not the problem.

The government has already caved in on the pharmaceutical side. Surely it can use that ace with the United States in particular saying: "We have already agreed to your GATT position on pharmaceuticals. Why can you not in turn, if this is a deal, say that Canadian farmers and supply market products will be able to have a waiver or an exception in this regard?"

Mr. Harry Brightwell (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my riding is Perth—Wellington—Waterloo which comprises all that great county of Perth and parts of the two great counties beside it, Wellington and Waterloo.

Indeed, it is a great county in the supply management area. In my riding I have over 1,000 supply managed milk producers and I would think between 75 and 100 supply managed poultry producers. Of course, all the milk and poultry producers are under the supply management scheme.

We are debating a very serious matter here today. It is indeed what I told the producers in my riding would happen at the end of all of the debate we have had for five years on the matter of supply management and article XI.

We are at the crisis time. This is the time when the real answers would be coming out. It was not particularly the free trade issue at the time. As the last member said, it was a matter of GATT and here we are. We are at the final end.

You would have noticed if you were in the House a little while ago or watching. I asked a question of a senior member of the opposition which was in government a long time ago and I hope never will be back there again. I asked the member: Do we need a GATT agreement?

He would not answer. He ducked the question. He simply would not answer the question. That is not a privilege that we have. We in government have to look at the greater good. Indeed we must have a GATT agreement; we must be part of it.

We have serious other problems in agriculture that demand that agreement as well. This does not take away my support for our position which was hammered out between the Government of Canada and the supply managed producers that we should stick with their position and our position right to the end.

Indeed, this might be a degree of a hazard, because if we were losing on the matter—and I believe that we are going to win on this matter at least to a degree—and we cannot debate the other factors that might come into the agreement, we could very well lose some advantages there that we could have gained had we been part of the negotiations.

I feel today and felt this particularly earlier in the debate that we have people who know something about the farming community. Certainly members of the Standing Committee on Agriculture have been speaking, but we heard about all farmers, all family farms.

I want to say that we are abusing a large number of other family farms, in fact, the majority of family farms that are not supply managed. We must keep in mind here, as a group, that the farmers are divided between supply managed farmers and those who are not. Those who are not are the majority.

That does not say, however, anything against the importance of this particular segment of the poultry and dairy operations and of the importance of supply management. Supply management has given us stability in the farming regions, particularly in my region, that was not seen 25 and 30 years ago in my capacity as a veterinarian serving these farmers.

I saw the lack of stability. I saw the people who geared up, bought the tanks and equipment, bought the cows, fixed their barns, to sell to a market in Toronto. I saw them lose that market just on a whim. I saw them fighting for price on a product that was perishable, that would not stay fresh for very long.

Now under supply management they have stability. That stability has generated a stability in rural life as well. As we go along the country roads—my farmers remind me of this regularly—in Ontario and indeed, I am sure anywhere where we have supply managed products, you see very fine, properly maintained buildings. Our dairy and poultry farmers are able to put together a stable structure and keep it up.

They are able to practice sustainable agriculture because they have a decent return on their production. Supply management has allowed them a stable rural structure.

Supply management has kept the family farm stronger than it would be otherwise. The words family farm are overused, but terribly important. The family farm as we know it is a matter of a family owning and supplying all the labour for that farm. But in the case of the family farm under supply management there are about 2.5 people working on that farm. I assume they must be supporting something like 2.5 families on average.

I would suggest that is probably the future of supply management with or without the agreement. Farms are going to get bigger and the family farm will be a place where several farm families work and have a decent life with time off.

Supply management has given us a safe and secure supply of milk and poultry products. There is little direct subsidy. We heard a figure of $267 million going directly to manufactured milk producers. What they get out of the market is based on a border that is relatively closed, not totally closed, to the import of our product and on a cost of production formula. There may be some degree of subsidy going into the products in that particular respect.

I want the non-farm people to know this because it is important. The amount of money our supply managed farmers get in any form is equal to or less than that which American farmers get through their system. They supposedly have no subsidy yet there are many areas in which they do get it. Supply management provides a product, stability and a secure and safe supply without excess subsidy which other countries would supply.

When I looked at the motion this morning, I found I was going to have difficulty in supporting it. I have two or three areas I might mention before I sit down.

I noticed that the term unequivocally was used. It did not say: Do not support an agreement that does not include this. It says: Support this if it is there. It was not strong enough that we really want to push right to the very end to support our position on supply management.

I noticed as well that in the original motion somehow the drafters of the motion in the NDP talked about milk, eggs, hatching eggs, chicken and turkey but left out other products with potential supply management possibilities. I would mention in particular the apple industry. I would think the maple syrup industry would be a logical one in Quebec.

I felt the motion lacked in that particular regard as well. The area I was particularly concerned about in this motion was the fact of the Crow benefit. Somehow the NDP, and indeed we have heard it endorsed by a speaker from the Liberal Party, would prejudge how the Crow benefit should be paid. Do not consult. Do not go to the farmers as a whole. Talk only to their supporters and prejudge how it would be paid. I maintain that we must talk to the farmers and we must come up with a consensus about the best way to handle this benefit. We must make sure they still get the same amount of benefit or an adjusted amount as it increases.

I want to say that I am totally behind this motion as amended. I was a little concerned about the subamendment from the Official Opposition that directed how the Prime Minister would get involved. We know he is involved. We know of his concern for agriculture. We know he will be there on the front lines but they seem to be pinning it down on a particular type of meeting and I was a little concerned there.

I am willing to support this motion. We in the government know how important supply management is to the agricultural industry in Canada. We will carry forward our joint position right to the end in these trade negotiations to get a successful ending.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, we have just heard a very defeatist speech from the Tory chairman of the committee on agriculture. From beginning to end, the chairman admitted defeat. He repeated several times: "If we do not succeed at GATT, if we lose—" Mr. Speaker, I wish no one such a negotiator at such an important moment.

Tonight, if I were a milk, poultry, or egg producer, I would feel terribly insecure after listening to the speech of the Tory chairman of the committee on agriculture. He certainly must be knowledgeable. All the information that he gets has led him to throw in the towel. I think this is unacceptable from government members who have taken such formal commitments to their farmers. In 1988 they even campaigned, with their hands on their hearts, promising to strengthen article XI, and touring the countryside, they said: "Your lands and your farms are not in jeopardy, we will protect them."

Just now, the Tory chairman of the committee on agriculture said: "But if we have to, we will sign anyway, even if we have to sacrifice you on the GATT altar". What about this policy position, Mr. Speaker? He told us: "We will hold on to our principles until the signing". I ask him: In the end, if you do not keep your commitments to Quebec and Canadian farmers, as far as supply management is concerned, will you sign anyway? Will you throw away your commitments, and will you sacrifice the farmers?

[English]

Mr. Brightwell: Mr. Speaker, we have seen a great example of what one of the speakers on the other side called playing with words. Regardless of how realistic and proper one is in one's statements, someone like this member will stand up and play with words. At this particular time he chooses not to be in the real world but in whatever world but that he exists in there.

Our farmers deserve and need support. I will fight to make sure that they get support in this particular regard. If we fail to get this support I will challenge anybody to say that we have the power to reach out and shake the European Community and shake the Americans and say: "You must come to our way". If we do not get the support in this particular fashion, they must have support in equal kind in whatever way we can provide under the trade agreement.

I am fully in support of their position and I am fully in support of them having their proper support.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the member for Perth—Wellington—Waterloo said that he will support the motion plus the amendment and subamendment. The subamendment does call upon the Prime Minister to involve himself personally in GATT negotiations in the interest of Canada's dairy, egg and poultry producers by meeting with the President of the United States and the President of the European Community in order to secure their support and co-operation.

The member said that we have been debating supply management and the protection of this system for five years. His government has been in power for seven years, and after five years his Prime Minister could not convince more than five other countries to support this great supply management system. This is another Canadian institution which other countries would love to have but do not have. Here is a government again dismantling it just as it has dismantled a lot of other Canadian institutions. Here is another Canadian institution that it wants to dismantle.

I speak from experience because my parents farmed for 22 years in Saskatchewan and could not support a family of six children. They had to abandon the farm and move to another way of life. Finally, for the last 20 years we have had some stability in the pricing system because we can control supply. I would like to very specifically ask the member this. If his party cannot convince more than five other countries to support this, what is the government's strategy after that?

Mr. Brightwell: Mr. Speaker, we are not in a position really to consider a strategy after that for the very reason of this play on words. How can we consider another issue than the supply managed industry that we have at the particular time. We cannot talk about these other items because if we do, we will be seen to be backing off our main objective. I really wonder whether the hon. member's family was in a group that was supply managed. Was it poultry or dairy? It was probably what we would call cash crops in the east. I digress. I and the government insist that we carry through with our main objective. Then if we fail at that point we will have to look at what other alternatives there are to support our farmers totally and properly, as they deserve. I have confidence we are not going to fail.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to be able to participate in this debate.

Having looked at the motion, I see five facets to it. I am going to limit my remarks in the time available to two of them. One is the matter of the Crow benefit. The other is the export subsidies.

In regard to the Crow benefit, members will recall that this historic benefit, dating from 1897, called for the transportation of prairie grain to export at a rate of half a cent a ton mile. "Half a cent a ton mile forever" was the expression that was used in the prairie schoolhouses for many years. Members will know also that that ended back in 1983 with the passage of the Western Grain Transportation Act, which enshrined the then value of the Crow benefit to prairie producers at what now amounts to some $720 million. That $720 million covers about two-thirds of the cost of shipping the prairie grain to export. The other third is borne by the prairie producer.

There are nice arguments ongoing as to whether this Crow benefit should continue to be paid to the railways as specified under the Western Grain Transportation Act or whether there should be a change in the method of payment so that the moneys would go to the actual producer.

That is a bit of a side issue here in the context of the discussion of the Dunkel proposals and any possible GATT accord.

Over the prairies and other parts of Canada at the present time there have been a series of transportation discussion meetings. These were commissioned as a result of the unanimous agreement of the agriculture ministers of the country back at their meeting in Kananaskis in July of last year. The 10 provincial ministers and the federal minister agreed that a number of agriculture-related transportation issues would be put out to the farm community for discussion. Among them was the matter of payment of the Crow benefit.

The fact is that the method of payment of the Crow benefit is not really part and parcel of a GATT proposal. It is true that if the Dunkel text was accepted and if a final accord is reached along those lines there could be a reduction in the amount of the Crow benefit. This would be a phased-in reduction over a period of six years. The Crow benefit could however still remain and the method of payment could remain as is.

I think it is a little bit of a side issue to talk in terms of retaining the Crow benefit in its present form in the wording of this particular motion. The fact is that nothing in the proposed GATT wording calls for a change in the method of payment at all.

I do want to also address the matter of the export subsidies. I come from a grain-producing area in southwestern and south central Saskatchewan. I would guess my constituency grows the largest amount of wheat for export in the country, certainly the highest quality wheat. I can say unequivocally that the sale of grain for export is the engine that drives my area and, I believe, drives the Saskatchewan economy as a whole. That is a fact that has been recognized, not just by the government federally, but by successive provincial governments within Saskatchewan. The fact is that agriculture is the number one item and the number one priority. It has been treated as such by this government.

We have faced over the past number of years a very unfortunate diminution in international grain prices as a result of the disastrous export subsidy wars which we have seen between the superpowers, the European Common Market and the United States. The world price for wheat has sunk to the point where it has been in the $2 range with predictable effects on our farming communities in Saskatchewan and across Canada.

This government has supported prairie agriculture through a series of initiatives from the 1985 drought, Special Grains I, Special Grains II, the western grain stabilization changes, crop insurance, the Canadian Crop Drought Assistance Program, the FSAM I and II programs and, of course, the establishment of the long-term measures, NISA and GRIP, which were designed by the agricultural community to address the need for more certainty, more stability and the need for producers to know what their bottom line would be from year to year. Those programs are in their phase-in stage and I believe in the long term they will provide a level of stability that is very much needed in that sector.

The tragedy is that we had to have recourse to various ad hoc programs over the past number of years. The farm community does not like these programs. They do not like the programs, government does not like the programs and certainly the taxpayer of the country does not like the programs.

The problem is that when we come up against the United States and the European Community in providing support for farmers, it is very difficult because we are caught on this double-edged sword. One side of the sword is our dependence on export markets; 84 per cent of our wheat is destined for export. The other side of the sword is our limited population. We have 27 million people in this country compared to some 330 million in Europe, 250 million in the United States. Farmers are tremendously dependent on exports and, at the same time, we have a very much smaller population able to find the money with which to subsidize the programs.

The programs that we have put in place cost the Canadian taxpayers, in their opinion, too much, and at the same time, do not support to the producers in the way in which, I am sure, all members in this House would like to see.

What is the root cause of it? It is pretty obvious. It is the intervention of other governments in other countries into agriculture. If we could get these major powers out of agriculture, out of this business of harmful subsidies, then I believe that our producers can compete with the best of them. There is no question that our Canadian producers can grow grain at lower cost and more efficiently than virtually any other area in the world with the possible exception of certain parts of the United States.

The objective clearly has to be to try to work internationally in any way we can to try to bring down these harmful subsidies. What I see in the Dunkel draft proposals is a considerable amount of hope. This may well be the light at the end of the tunnel for an area of our country which has been hard hit over a number of years.

The Uruguay round has been going on for better than five years. Some 108 countries have been at the table. All of them want the same thing, Every single country at that GATT table wants to have things wide open where they are strong and competitive and they want to close it up tight where they are weak or perceive that they are vulnerable to competition.

Canada is no different; 107 other countries feel the same way. What that tells me, Mr. Speaker, and I think it must be obvious to everyone is in that process of bargaining, you are going to get some of the things you want but you are not going to get everything you want. You reach some form of compromise. There is no way that Canada is going to achieve every facet, every possible objective that it has had on the table over the past five years.

In brief, the Dunkel proposals call for reductions of something like 36 per cent on expenditure outlays and 24 per cent of the volume of export subsidies. These cuts applied to the average annual amount on the base period from 1986 to 1990, put in plain terms, means a reduction of the European Community support by something in the order of 40 per cent. In terms of the dollar amount of the U.S. export subsidies, it is perhaps 50 per cent.

That can be nothing but good news for a grain and oil seeds sector that has been very hard hit. I do not believe that it would be in the interests of this country, or indeed of members of this House, to insist that Canada achieve every possible element of perfection in a possible GATT agreement.

The fact is that this draft text—I assume it is getting near the final stages because after all, these countries have been at the table for five years—if it is accepted by all of these 108 nations I think will be good over all for Canada.

Canada cannot unilaterally walk away from a process like this and leave 107 countries at the table. It cannot say: "Fine, you go ahead. We are going to drop out. We are going to leave the civilized world. We are going to function as a pariah group on our own. We are going to be at the mercies of the winds".

I think that would be a completely and utterly irresponsible approach. I have faith in our negotiators and I have faith that in the process the best interests of Canada are being pursued. Recognizing that we cannot possibly achieve every single element that we would like, all of the participants in this process are going to have take some water in their wine. All are going to come away with something less than they wish. That is the nature of negotiations, the give and take. On balance and looking at these proposals, I believe that over all, they are beneficial for Canadian agriculture and for Canada.

Hopefully it will be possible to strengthen them. Hopefully it will be possible to make the proposals better. However, I say that we cannot unilaterally walk away from an agreement that I believe over all is positive for Canadian agriculture.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I found myself agreeing more than disagreeing with the hon. member who just spoke until he got to the end and said that over all he felt that this agreement in its present form would be good for Canada.

My assessment, and that of many other people, is that this agreement in its present form would do for the structure of Canadian agriculture what the free trade agreement has done for the structure of manufacturing in Ontario. It is something we should all be alarmed about and something that we need to fight vigorously to resist.

There are two questions which I would like to address to the hon. member. In his remarks he mentioned the WGTA and the Crow benefit. I took from his remarks—and I hope I interpreted them correctly—that the amendment which the government made to our motion removing the words "in its present form" means that we can make the technical changes to WGTA which might be required under a GATT agreement and does not mean that this government is going to try to piggy back in changes to the method of payment under the guise of the GATT agreement. I think our negotiators have said very clearly that that is not the case.

Second, I would like to ask the member a question with respect to the Prime Minister's involvement in this issue. We have heard discussion today about the Prime Minister meeting with farm groups on February 18.

I assumed that the meeting that people were talking about was the Prime Minister accepting the long-standing invitation of the supply management groups to meet with them to address their concerns.

However, I have just found out that the Prime Minister has called a meeting of his own to which he has invited farm leaders from all sectors, including the grains and oil seeds sector and the suspicion is—the member might tell me that this is unfounded—that this might well be an attempt to divide and conquer the farm community. The concerns of the supply management people will be diluted in those discussions by the input and the presence of people who do not have the same concerns with this particular GATT agreement.

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the first point regarding the WGTA benefit, I must tell the hon. member that I had the opportunity during the break in January to attend eight of the transportation hearings that were in my riding and benefited very much from them. I was able to hear the points of view of producers across an area of some 25,000 square miles and from what I heard from producers in my area was that the majority of them would favour retaining the Crow benefit in its present form, that is that it continue to be paid to the railways. Indeed, I have conveyed what I have heard to my colleagues down here.

At a couple of those meetings I also was put in a position of having to intervene and was able to point out that the GATT proposals may have some impact on the method of payment in the sense that there might be some reduction in the global amount but that nowhere in those proposals did it call for a change in the method of payment.

As the hon. member knows, there are at the present time across the country some 137 of these workshop style meetings that were initiated by the federal and provincial governments. I might say in passing I think it is unfortunate that the provincial government in Saskatchewan chose to back out of this process because I am not sure it was the responsible position to take. In any event these hearings are ongoing. The input received from producers will be gathered, summarized and presented to the various ministers across the country. No doubt further meetings will be convened among the 11 agriculture ministers and some decisions may or may not be taken. That, after all, was the whole purpose of this hearing process and this entire exercise.

The hon. member also raised the matter of the Prime Minister's involvement in regard to the GATT accord and these various agricultural issues. It is the hon. member's party which posed this motion which speaks to about five items. It talks about GATT. It talks about the maintenance of a viable and effective supply management. It talks about article XI. It talks about the Crow. It talks about export subsidies and environmental impact assessments and so on.

He talks about dividing and conquering, but the fact is that I think this motion is intact. There are five aspects to it, and I think it would be appropriate for the Prime Minister to meet with farm leaders across the country so that he can talk with them about the five items which the hon. member's own party has put on the floor.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, I was involved in the supply marketing system in the dairy industry for most of my life. I remember what it was like before supply management and where it put us. It is important to note that supply management controls supply and orderly marketing.

In this case it means that farmers produce food for a fair price and are not in financial trouble. It is important to note that today the Canadian chicken agency indicated that within three years 86 per cent of Canadian producers would likely be out of business. Of 2,411, only 330 would remain.

Within two years they expect that the poultry industry will have ceased in Atlantic Canada.

I urge the government to support article XI and supply management. It is the backbone of the mixed farming industry in Prince Edward Island and Atlantic Canada, and it is a system that takes care of itself. It supplies food. If we look at the United States and the great difficulty the farmers are having there, if we look at the great difficulty in the Soviet Union where they do not have enough food, I think it is very important. We have the best system in the world today.

I urge the government to press forward and support article XI and supply management.

• (1900)

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, I think we seriously have to ask whether the government is credible in this debate today and whether the government is levelling with us. The evidence would indicate no to both questions.

I say that because the agriculture minister this afternoon certainly put his remarks in the past tense, indicating that he feels that the Dunkel report is a finished job and will become part of a new GATT agreement. In other words, the government has caved in. It has thrown the towel in.

The member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia, who just finished speaking moments ago, certainly sounded as if he had thrown in the towel. He pretty well said: "That is all we are going to get, we had better take it".

There is another piece of evidence to indicate that the government has caved in. At the agriculture committee meeting yesterday and again today when department officials or members of this government spoke, they were very happy to talk about the consequences of a new GATT agreement, that is if it has to do with the WGTA, the farm safety net programs, or consequences dealing with subsidies or prices. They will talk your head off about those possible consequences resulting from a new GATT deal including the Dunkel report.

However, if you ask them about the impact on supply management, they suddenly become mute. They do not say anything. They do not give us any information. Has one member of the government stood up today and described the possible consequences to supply management if the Dunkel report is accepted? Not on your life. They will not say anything.

We asked the government for any results of impact studies. We asked last week. It started off saying that there was not even an impact study requested. Of course we know that is not true.

Why will it not give us this information? It is because it knows darn well that it would be embarrassed with the results if they were made public. What would be the impact on self-sufficiency of food in this country? That is a very responsible request. Should we not have that information? Food is very important to us. A country should be able to feed itself. Yet when we ask the government if it has done a study with respect to self-sufficiency in food, the answer is that apparently it has not. To me, that is sheer irresponsibility. Has there been an impact study on the environment? No.

I do not think there has been any kind of impact study, or at least it is withholding the results with respect to the so-called numbers. We get the numbers from the supply management people but we get nothing from this government.

If we lose supply management, let us face it, it is the end of orderly marketing for that sector of agriculture. It is the end of orderly marketing. It is the end of stability in that sector of agriculture. There is no doubt about it.

What we will have, and let us put it in straight words, will be dog eat dog, the law of the jungle. It will be a wild, unfettered open market system. That is what we will get.

We have had one of the most responsible, stable, productive sectors of the agricultural economy and we are going to do what? Give it away. That is what it looks like. We will lose the family farm. It will be replaced by huge, greedy, gluttonous corporate farms. We will be closer to the American style. We will be closer to the United States model, which is dominated by chaos and a lot of impoverished farmers. Is that the kind of system we want? It certainly looks like it to me when you listen to the government members speaking.

What we have in the way of supply management in this country is the envy of the world. In 20 years the system has grown tremendously. It has been tremendously successful. It has given consumers a strong supply of food at very good prices, the second best in the world. In the last 20 years the market has grown 50 per cent. To me, that is a mark of success. Are we going to blow it?

Australia did away with supply management. I have a piece of news for those consumers who might think that if we could just do away with supply management we would get lower prices. Look at the Australian experience. It has not had lower prices.

What is at stake is a $10 billion industry, and possibly as many as 100,000 jobs are at stake. Let us not forget the value of quotas or the value of the investment. It has been estimated that if we lose supply management, if the Dunkel report goes through as is, quotas now worth billions will be lost overnight.

The reason we proposed our subamendment is simple. We want the Prime Minister involved in these negotiations.

The Prime Minister should be embarrassed. He goes around telling the world he is a good friend of George Bush. In fact he even goes boating with him at Kennebunkport. He is a member of the G-7. He got George Bush to help him try to get the United Nations job. Why is he not calling in a few IOUs. Why is he not getting George Bush onside? The man should be embarrassed. That is why we are proposing this subamendment, to get the Prime Minister involved, to make him put his money where his mouth is. He stands up and says: "We are for clarifying and strengthening article XI". If that is the case, get to Bush and get to the President of the European Community.

I have just one more remark, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will give you 30 seconds.

Mr. Harvard: There is still time. Let us not give up.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, the motion moved by the hon. member for Mackenzie would have sent a clear message that all of the parties and all of the members in this House unanimously support Canada's supply management system.

The amendment moved by the minister watered that down so we are now really congratulating the government whether it achieves anything or not.

Would the member who has just spoken consider this amendment to be yet one more piece of evidence of Canada's selling out its sovereignty on the altar of the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement?

Mr. Harvard: Mr. Speaker, I am not exactly sure whether I caught the intent or the import of the question. However, it seems to me that giving away supply management is consistent with what this government gave away in the free trade deal. It is the same ideology, it is the same approach to marketing. It says: "Get government out of the way, get democracy out of the way, let us have an open market system and we will leave it to the big boys. Because after all the big boys are our friends and we have to help our big friends". That is what is behind this whole thing.

From day one I have been very suspicious of the government's motives. I have been very suspicious of the government position because I think, when you come right down to it, it does not want supply management. It wants dog eat dog, the law of the jungle. That is what it wants.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate tonight. As we are entering the final weeks of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade negotiations, otherwise known as the GATT, the question the Canadian public should be asking after this debate is whether the Prime Minister, the two agriculture ministers, our Canadian negotiators and this government, are doing, have done, and will do everything possible to retain article XI.

Obviously article XI must remain in the GATT. Certainly the farmers who are here this week and who will be here next week do not believe that the government has done everything it can possibly do. We do not believe it.

Our amendment tonight is that the Prime Minister see President Bush, see our allies in Europe and say how important article XI is to this country, to our farmers, to our communities which are dependent. Article XI, for those at home who are just tuning in, relates in the GATT to our ability as a country to secure a constant supply of domestically produced milk, eggs, chicken, and turkey with stable prices.

It is an uncertain time for Canadian industry. The farmers in the east, in the Atlantic, have the most to lose if article XI is not in the GATT. We are so far away from the big markets and we are so close to the United States we could be overrun by those products.

It has been said here in Canada the production alone of these farms goods; milk, dairy, eggs, and poultry is a $10.2 billion dollar industry.

In Atlantic Canada the dairy, egg and poultry industries in 1991 employed 6,250 people. The returns for that in 1990 in those same industries, dairy, egg and poultry, was $642.4 million. This accounts for 36 per cent of all Atlantic cash receipts.

Over 50 per cent of Nova Scotia agriculture is based on products of supply managed goods. In my own riding of South West Nova—and the most recent statistics are still only 1986, these are not today's—but if you go by 1986, the last census taken, there were 79 supply managed farms.

This is only 13 per cent of the farms in my riding but they accounted for 30 per cent of the total farm sales in South West Nova. Those farm sales were $30,794,837 and every dollar counts in South West Nova as it does in all of Nova Scotia when you think of how many jobs have been lost in the area.

We are not talking beef. We are not talking pork. We are not talking mink, fox or fruit. We are talking dairy, egg and poultry in a very small area of Canada.

Supply management has given Canada a prosperous, productive agricultural sector. We have developed supply management with our domestic needs in mind only, not to go after other markets.

The fact that article XI is on the table at all is because of the absurd subsidy war between the United States and Europe. It has been estimated that if the Dunkel agreement goes ahead and quotas are eliminated, our supply managed farmers will face a massive drop in the value of their assets. I do not want to go into that because my time is limited, but this does not consider the immediate impact of quota on farm financing.

Bankers have often used 50 per cent of quota value as collateral for loans. Taking this indirect value into account, it has been estimated that under tariffication, which is what we will have in this industry if this government does not get to work fast, dairy farmers could face a drop of between 35 per cent and 40 per cent in the value of their farm assets.

According to the report that was given to us by the backgrounder here today, the industry will be particularly hard hit from the start in the maritimes and in the west. Producers and processors will be forced out of business. I take that as a direct quote on the east. It will affect all of Canada. We will not be able to compete if there is no article XI for our own domestic needs to be supplied here in Canada.

I said earlier that the question Canadians have to ask and have to ask every politician in this House is: Is this government, is our Prime Minister, actually doing enough for Canadians? I say that in light of the motion that is before us tonight, and I would like to re-read it.

We would like to see, and our motion amended the main motion before this House: "that this House call upon the Prime Minister to involve himself personally in the GATT negotiations in the interests of Canada's dairy, egg and poultry producers by meeting with the President of the United States and with the President of the European Community in order to secure their support and to do so in co-operation with other countries that agree with Canada's position on a strengthened and clarified GATT article XI".

Now I only want to say two things in the two minutes that are left to me. We cannot afford as a country not to put all our effort into maintaining article XI, because we do not have the same conditions that they do in the United States. Our climate is different; we have fewer people; and we have transportation costs that are very high for most Canadians, if they have to pay the actual cost.

We came up with a beautiful plan called supply management. I do not understand why our Canadian supply management has to be questioned under the GATT. I do not understand why our ministers of agriculture, the two of them, and our Prime Minister and our negotiators cannot from this day on be talking to our allies in Europe and in Canada. We are not hurting them with our supply management. It is a subsidy war perhaps that is going on between the United States and Europe in their agricultural forum. Why take it out on Canada's supply management?

You know we have allies that we should be going after. We do not see the Prime Minister meeting with Japan; we do not see him going after other allies that are with us on this problem. We don't see him doing anything.

That is why, as I said before, the farmers are here today. That is why they are meeting next week. Unless we impress on the Prime Minister and his ministers of agriculture to go out and start negotiating to keep article XI, I am afraid our agricultural industry will be very much depleted.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for South West Nova on an excellent speech which was very moving and factual.

In my riding of Kent I have many who are in supply management and the marketing boards. They are very concerned about the government's attitude in the GATT negotiations, and especially article XI. They feel that the government is not putting their whole thrust into fighting for the farmers.

The farmers are extremely upset. I have had many meetings in my office with the confederation of agriculture, the milk marketing board, the poultry board throughout the last few months. They feel that the government is not going in good faith and fighting on their behalf.

Being in the farming business myself, it worries me immensely because I will come up short. Maybe it is a little greed on my side. But we have the best farming operations in Canada—and I live right on the American border so I know what we are competing against with the Americans—I know the way they are being abused.

I would like to ask the hon. member if she has talked to many of her constituents and heard their feelings, their gut reactions to what the government is doing on the GATT deliberations.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have heard from many of the supply managed farmers in Nova Scotia and they are concerned. They know we live very close to the American border.

It was very interesting today. One of the representatives of the group that met us in caucus, a Mr. Crone I think, from B.C., said he lived right at the border, the 49th parallel. He saw his American neighbour's farm not in the same condition as his own farm because the American farmer was on a laissez-faire type of farm endeavour and we had a supply managed operation.

He could see exactly what his farm would be like if it would happen to him next year when there is no article XI.

Just ask the pork producers, I have a good many of them in my riding, what free trade has done. We were to have a mechanism that would protect us. It has not protected us. The pork producers have spent millions of dollars to impress upon this government that it must work harder to keep article XI and they received a slap in the face. That was not going to be followed in the U.S. Who wins in this game with the Americans?

M. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to have the opportunity today to be part of this debate. I must say, however, that this situation is of great concern for the constituents of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. In my riding, according to Agriculture Canada, there are 109 milk producers, as well as many poultry and egg producers. So if GATT creates problems in my riding, if farmers lose their livehood, they of course will suffer but so will the whole of our society, because they make up such a large part of our community.

The supply managed industry generates some $10 billion in revenues in Canada. Some 100,000 jobs are at stake here today and some 40,000 family farms are in danger. Why? Because our government is failing. That's why. Since 1987, Canada has been taking part in talks to amend the multilateral GATT agreement, the famous Uruguay round. What are some of its purposes? Well, Mr. Speaker, first, the nations want to include agriculture in the GATT provisions and in doing so, put an end to the export subsidy war going on between some countries. I think everybody wants to see that subsidy war come to an end. But that is not the point. What will be the cost of putting an end to that war? We must sacrifice some innocent people because, evidently, in the egg, milk and poultry industry, exportation is not an item. There is practically none. So they did not cause the export war, at least not the producers of the commodities that I just mentioned. And even so, Canada is not to blame in this export war, which is mainly between the United States of America and the European Common Market. In any case, the producers I just listed are not part of it and of course have nothing to gain and everything to lose.

In December, Art Dunkel, the president of the GATT negotiations, tabled a document which included all the articles on which the parties agreed; in cases where there was no agreement, he chose a middle position himself or a position of his own and put it in his report, which he then circulated. What does that document include? It includes a tariff system to replace article XI of GATT which allows us today to have quantitative restrictions at the border. Of course, those tariffs will be lowered by about 6 per cent a year or 36 per cent over six years. The tariffs will eventually be eliminated, in some cases in the short term, in others it will take longer. Of course, nothing will prevent U.S. imports from flooding the Canadian market and undermining the whole credibility of the supply management system we have in Canada.

The hon. member for Algoma put it well just now. He asked the Prime Minister to get involved personally in these negotiations; he demanded that he telephone or contact the President of the United States, the President of the European Common Market and the other parties so that Canadian producers of milk, poultry and eggs, who have nothing to do with that subsidy war, will not be the victims. What the hon. member for Algoma asks is quite reasonable. It is now up to the Prime Minister. It was up to him from the beginning, but it is not enough to telephone George Bush in Washington. The Prime Minister himself should have gone there and elsewhere to ensure that 100,000 jobs and 40,000 family farms in Canada were not jeopardized. Now we are at the eleventh hour of the last day and what should have been done has not been done. Of course, since it has not been done, or at least not done well enough, our producers are now threatened.

Mr. Speaker, yesterday in the House, I asked whether, in light of the Dunkel report, the government had at least found out what damage would be done by these measures. I asked whether there was an impact study. The minister said on page 6768 of Hansard yesterday:

—no formal request for an impact study has been received—

I have in my hand a letter dated January 10, 1992 and signed by the president of the Canadian Milk Producers Federation, who says:

[English]

"We therefore urge the federal government to provide us with such an assessment". In the previous sentence it describes that assessment as an impact assessment. Why were we not even given by the minister yesterday, and I will put this kindly, accurate information about whether such an assessment was sought and was done?

I have my opinion about it. Such an assessment was done but the government will not share the results with this House or with anyone else. If the day comes when it signs that agreement the way it is then it will have to plead guilty to causing all that damage, the proof of which will be in the assessment in question. That is why the government will not provide it.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I would like to tell the Prime Minister that the 109 dairy farmers in Glengarry—Prescott—Russell want to continue to operate their family farms. All they want is the government's co-operation and our support. They want to continue to earn their living honestly. It seems to me that is quite a reasonable request.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell spreading all kinds of gloom and doom and expressing all kinds of fears which in my opinion are not justified, just like his Liberal colleagues and NDP members have been doing all evening.

Mr. Speaker, I have a very simple question for the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. Could he mention in the House a single instance, a single statement, either in the press or on the radio, by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of State for Agriculture, that says that Canada is abandoning its position on protecting the interests of Canadian farmers, on asking for clarification and reinforcement of article XI, and on protecting marketing boards? Could he quote a single statement to that effect? I want to hear a statement in which government representatives at GATT indicated that we were abandoning those positions, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I go by the results, not by the hon. member's questions. The result is the Dunkel document we have today, which is a threat, not according to the hon. member from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell but according to the marketing boards for milk, turkey and egg producers, the chicken marketing boards and the board for hatching eggs and roasters. All these boards have told us about the potential impact of the Dunkel report. The point is not what the Prime Minister did but what he did not do. He failed to do his duty. He did not do what he should have done to protect agriculture.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to join in this debate today because for the farming community I represent this is a very important debate.

We want the people in the Fraser Valley to know that this government and members on both sides of this House are in support of what Canada is trying to do in the GATT negotiations.

To begin with, I would like to restate the government's position in the GATT talks. Canada went into the Uruguay round of negotiations in 1986 with four principal objectives.

First of all, we were seeking substantial reductions in trade distorting subsidies, particularly export subsidies. Second, we wanted improved, predictable and more secure access to export markets through a reduction in tariffs and non-tariff barriers.

Third, we wanted clearer and fairer GATT rules that apply equally to all countries, including a strengthened and clarified article XI—I will have more to say about this point later—the elimination of countries' specific exemptions and better disciplines on the use of countervailing duties.

Fourth, we wanted to see the development of a framework of rules to prevent the abuse of health and sanitary regulations as disguised barriers to trade.

It bears repeating that this position was drafted with the full co-operation of all parts of the agrifood industry. In our recent discussions with industry representatives they have asked us to hold firm to this stand, and we have agreed.

I, along with a number of our colleagues this morning, met with the leadership of the marketing agencies. In the clearest terms possible, this was Canada's position in 1986 and it is Canada's position now. It will be our position when the negotiations conclude.

The negotiators have been back at work in Geneva for almost a month now, working with the draft text prepared by Arthur Dunkel, the GATT Secretary-General and chairman of the agriculture negotiating group.

Canada has joined with the other 107 GATT members in accepting this draft as the basis for negotiations because we believe it holds considerable promise for establishing a freer, more stable and less distorted agricultural trading community.

Reductions in trade distorting domestic support and substantial cuts in subsidized exports would create a more level international playing field.

This would help to bring the agricultural trade war under effective control and allow Canadian farmers to compete on fairer terms. It would also have a more positive effect on grain and other agricultural commodity prices in the long term.

We would still be free to support our farmers through programs that are best intended for Canadian agriculture. There are no limits on how much government support can be provided if it meets the "green" criteria. "Green" support measures will be free from countervail.

That is a thumbnail sketch of what is proposed in the Dunkel text as a basis for further negotiations. However, we are disappointed that the draft text does not call for the strengthening and clarification of article XI, the section of the GATT agreement which allows us to impose border controls on supply managed products.

Instead, Mr. Dunkel would have us replace our current import quotas with tariffs and we would be unable to impose any import quotas during the implementation period. Mr. Dunkel has told us that he believes comprehensive tariffication without exception is the only possible way to reconcile the United States and the European Community.

In his view it is the possible way to secure an agreement. I want to re-emphasize that Canada does not agree with Mr. Dunkel's assessment of the situation.

While we are treating the Dunkel paper as a basis for negotiations, we have remained as committed as ever to a clarified article XI. Our ambassador made this point very clearly on January 13 when the talks resumed.

Our experience with supply management tells us that it is an effective marketing system that does not distort trade. We continue to believe that the best way to protect supply management is through a strengthened and clarified article XI. I should point out that article XI, as it stands, is not an acceptable alternative.

Recent GATT panel rulings have raised a number of uncertainties as to which processed products are eligible to receive import protection under article XI. In the past several months, the Canadian government has worked tirelessly to promote our position with Mr. Dunkel and the other GATT members. The Minister of Agriculture, the Minister for International Trade, the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds, and the Minister of State for Agriculture have met their counterparts from the United States, the European Community, Japan, Korea and other GATT members.

In replying to a question from the opposition last week asking whether he had been part of the GATT talks with other heads of state, the Prime Minister said as reported in Hansard for February 5:

> I have met with everybody from Art Dunkel to President Bush, to President Mitterrand and to the president of the European commission. We had a meeting with Jacques Delors that lasted in excess of three hours precisely on this point. We made the case, chapter and verse, about its importance not only to the nation but to each individual producer. We are going to make it again.

At every opportunity we have pushed for support for the Canadian position, specifically the strengthening and clarifying of article XI of the GATT. Between now and March 1, when all participants are to table revised offers on agriculture, the negotiations are moving ahead on four tracks.

The trade negotiations committee is discussing possible changes to the package. The major delegations will have to agree here to any significant amendments. Inconsistencies and omissions in the draft text are being addressed by a legal drafting group without changing the balance of rights and obligations. Schedules of initial commitments on services are being developed in market access negotiations. Market access negotiations on goods are developing schedules of market access concessions as well as commitments on export subsidies and internal support for agriculture.

When the country schedules are tabled on March 1, intensive negotiations among trading partners will likely begin again. All parties agree that the round should be wrapped up by Easter. That will leave us just over eight months to prepare for implementation, which is to begin on January 1, 1993.

Speaking as the member from the Fraser Valley in British Columbia, when I go to farm meetings I am surprised at the age bracket of the people who attend these meetings. There are many young farmers getting into agriculture in Canada. I know they are concerned about what is happening at the GATT talks as we are concerned here in this House tonight. I want to assure them that we are doing everything in our power to make sure that we have a successful conclusion to this round of negotiations.

This is the first time that agriculture has been part of the GATT negotiations on all levels of the GATT, which started back in 1986. Our negotiating stance has not wavered since 1986 and it is consistent to this day. We ask for the support of the agriculture community and members from both sides of this House so that Canada's position is maintained on a consistent basis as we all want to ensure that we keep the supply management system we have in agriculture in our country.

The Government of Canada is committed to supply management and we are committed to the strengthening and clarifying of article XI.

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): I have a very brief comment, Mr. Speaker. I am so very pleased that my colleague again has emphasized the government's position, that we are asking for strengthening and clarification of article XI. This has always been the position we have taken.

We also realize that Canada needs a successful end to the Uruguay round in order to enhance Canada's prosperity, to bolster exports, to improve the rules for trade, and to eliminate or reduce trade distorting effects of subsidies.

We realize all of this but we are still asking for strengthening and tariffication of article XI.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question of the hon. member. Before I do so I want to make a brief comment on this very important issue.

I have spoken in the House several times on the importance of the supply management system. My riding is in Prince Edward Island and in my province supply management products account for 17.6 per cent of the total cash receipts.

I talked to many farmers there and they are genuinely concerned about the lack of action on the part of this government.

Again, I call on the government to pull out all stops to ensure that the supply management system is protected and that article XI of GATT is strengthened and preserved.

I want to ask the hon. member why the government has not done an impact study when the dairy farmers of Canada have asked for such a study.

Mr. Belsher: Mr. Speaker, this morning when we met with the agriculture people and asked each of the groups if they wished to participate with us in doing an impact study, every one with the feather industry said yes. The dairy people said they would have to go back and check to see whether or not they could.

I am reporting what was said in a meeting this morning with 17 or 18 others. We are not debating that question right now.

The dairy people, while they may be asking us to do an impact study all by ourselves, did not wish to participate in the impact study. Whether or not they have changed since then, I was also very concerned with the ad that the dairy people of Canada ran this past week. It would serve to let people know in our country that they think that maybe the government is not fighting on their behalf. This is a sad situation.

Everything that can be done is being done and will continue to be done.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, during the member's remarks I noticed he said that one of the advantages of the current Dunkel proposal would be better prices in the long run for grain farmers.

He should be aware of the half a dozen or so projected results that I have been able to see, none of which originated in Canada by the way. Yes, they usually project some increase in export prices but when you get down to the grain farm which in our case is quite a way inland, incomes are very much lower with deals that do away with the subsidies.

The effects on land rentals are quite dramatic downward. Land and rentals are worth about one-half under a full desubsidization. The only advantage and the one that keeps grain farmers in the discussions is that we will be spelling out some rules, I hope, so that countries like the United States and the European Community, big players, cannot come in and unilaterally change the terms of trade by government actions which will now have to comply with some GATT rules.

The GATT is not going to increase incomes to farmers. We will have to rely on El Nino or some dramatic weather change to do that. This political change is not going to mean better incomes for farmers. In fact, it will have the opposite result.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to make a comment. As a person who owns a dairy quota and now understanding what supply management means and also being part of the government, certainly my representations and my understanding must be different on what we are doing, from what the member from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell was saying and the kind of accusations he was making.

The government, from the Prime Minister on down is fighting diligently and persistently for the retention, the upgrading, the clarification and the strengthening of article XI.

I attended the meeting with the supply management people this morning and certainly they did not say that we were not and I do not think they said it when they went across and met with the Liberals in their caucus that this government was not working hard to have article XI retained.

The statements they are making certainly cannot be attributed to the supply management people because certainly they did not say that to us this morning. They wanted our help. They wanted to work together with us on it and that is the important thing, that we all work together on the retention of article XI, the strengthening and the clarification. We all want to do that.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, this debate rings with a familiar sound. It was in the 1960s that a group of us came back to this Parliament between Christmas and New Years to pass the National Farm Products Marketing Act.

Tonight we are debating whether we are going to retain the very farm management system that that act set up with the farm marketing boards across Canada.

The Americans are very adept at using non-tariff barriers to go against other industries in this nation, but here they want to destroy the farm management system in this country and get rid of those non-tariff farm barriers at a time when the farm community of this country is in dire need.

There is a lot of concern out there in this country and this government had better realize that it has to fight with everybody else on this issue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on the amendment to the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment to the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the amendment to the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the yeas have it.

Amendment to the amendment agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The next question is on the amendment, as amended. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The next question is on the main motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion as amended?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Agreed and so ordered.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

• (1950)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 30(7), the House will now proceed to consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I suspect that some people were caught unaware by the decision and the timing of it. I suspect the hon. member anticipated being here for 8 p.m. Perhaps I could ask the Chair to suspend until then.

Mr. Hawkes: It is a government member who is doing Private Members' Business. He is looking forward to this evening very much. If the House could suspend until his arrival or until 8 p.m. it would be appreciated.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, in the spirit of reform that was exhibited earlier this day by the government House leader, we would certainly subscribe to the views of the chief government Whip.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I am sure many members in the House will recall that I have argued on many occasions that these types of motions ought to be passed by the House without the government falling.

I am glad to see today that we have fulfilled one of the expectations of the McGrath committee report and had a free vote, in this case a unanimous vote on an opposition day motion. I look forward to further fulfilling those expectations in future votes of this kind in this Parliament and in future Parliaments.

SUSPENSION OF SITTING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the wish of the House to suspend the sitting to the call of the bell?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will suspend the House until 8 p.m.

The sitting of the House was suspended at 7.52 p.m.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

VIOLENCE

PORTRAYAL BY MEDIA

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, a full review of the media's portrayal of violence toward and abuse of women and children, should be held by an appropriate committee of the House of Commons with the aim of making recommendations as to how better to protect innocent Canadians from being exposed to such portrayals without interfering unduly with artistic freedom and freedom of the press.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I indeed feel very fortunate to have the opportunity to speak to the House today on my private member's motion No. 534, introduced on May 23, 1991. The motion reads:

That, in the opinion of this House, a full review should be held by an appropriate committee of the House of Commons of the media's portrayal of violence toward women and children.

This review would make recommendations as to how we might protect innocent Canadians from being exposed to such portrayals without interfering unduly with artistic freedom and freedom of the press.

My comments will speak to the issue surrounding violence and abuse against women, violence against children, violence on aboriginal reserves, violence in rural communities as well as the media's coverage and the media's portrayal of these issues at the national and local level.

I wish to preface my remarks by indicating that the statistics I bring forward are not presented for sensational effect or drama. They are stated to bring to the attention and awareness of Canadians the magnitude of the problem of violence in our society.

My statistics have been gleaned from various sources, including Health and Welfare Canada, the Canadian Association of Sexual Assault Centres, transition house directors, aboriginal groups, Canadian publications, including the newsletter of the Federation of Women Teachers Associations of Ontario, as well as recent American and Canadian studies.

Canadian research indicates that the incidence of violence against women and children has escalated. In Canada in 1989, 119 women were murdered in domestic relationships. Most publications say that one in ten Canadian women is battered by her male partner. The Smith study from Toronto in 1987 suggests the number is closer to one in four women who is physically abused by her male partner.

The insidious part of all of this is that 80 per cent of the children in those homes witnessed their father's violence, thus leaving indelible scars on their developing personalities.

The Canadian Association of Sexual Assault Centres tells us that every 17 minutes a Canadian woman is raped. An alarming 84 per cent of assaulted women are raped by someone they know. Date rape is the newest form of violence for women to fear. The attitudes of young people toward date rape are disturbing.

Results of recent studies at Toronto high schools and York University found that 54 per cent of high school boys and 42 per cent of girls sampled said it was acceptable for a boy to hold a girl down and force her to have sexual relations with him if he had spent a lot of money on her, they had dated a long time, or she had led him on.

In another study, 65 per cent of the young men and 47 per cent of the young women thought a man could force a woman to have sex if they had been dating for more than six months.

Mr. Speaker, children are victims too. The true extent of physical and sexual abuse is difficult to determine because it is usually the most extreme cases which come to the attention of the authorities.

The Canadian Medical Association estimates that 8,000 children are badly injured by abuse every year. The Badgley report in 1984 claims that one of three males and two of three females have been victims of unwanted sexual acts before they reach the age of 21.

Statistics do not describe the scars that abusers leave on their victims. Men who battered consistently report that they had witnessed their mothers being battered and received physical abuse themselves. Violence was learned as a source of power and control in their first social group, the family.

The predicament of children who are captive in violent homes is terrible. In their study, "Children of Battered Women", Joffe, Wolfe and Wilson quote the work of L. Walker, and I quote as well:

> Children who live in a battering relationship experience the most insidious form of child abuse.
> Whether or not they are physically abused by either parent is less important than the pyschological scars they bear from watching their father beat their mother.
> They learn to become part of the dishonest conspiracy of silence.
> They learn to lie, to prevent inappropriate behaviour and they learn to suspend the fulfilment of their needs rather than risk another confrontation. They expend a lot of energy avoiding problems.

So continues that study.

Not every child exposed to wife battering becomes violent. But it is probably safe to say that children who witness violence will experience psychological consequences. Wife battering is a problem with so many implications that it can be believed as the invisible core of violence in our society.

Family violence and abuse affects everyone including all social, racial, cultural, religious, economic and professional classes. However, aboriginal family violence and abuse is becoming a major concern in Canada. Studies indicate that family violence is escalating dramatically in aboriginal communities. Often aboriginal people do not view the problem as one of offender–victim relationship so much as one of community dysfunction of which family violence is but one symptom.

Consequently, solutions should be viewed in terms of holistic community-wide healing processes which must be planned, developed and implemented by and with aboriginal people. At present, many social service personnel on reserves find they have neither the training nor the resources to deal with the dramatic increase in the number of disclosures of physical or sexual abuse. Indian communities must seek to empower themselves to resolve their problems. To achieve this end, they require long-term commitment from governments and their own leadership.

Violence against women and children is not limited to big cities across Canada. It is also a reality in rural Canada. Patterns are changing in rural Canada. Rural abuse has taken on a new dimension at a time where the economy of rural areas is bleak. All of the horrors of city family violence are right there along the gravel roads of rural Canada. Small communities are under stress, families are in conflict, alcohol and drug abuse are significant factors. All of these difficulties may well be the setting and may well be setting the stage in rural communities for ongoing abuse in families where there has been little prior history.

How does the media factor in all of the above, Mr. Speaker? The statistics would suggest the media contributes to and supports the culture of violence that the child sees in the home. Studies by Molnar indicate that in 1982, 3 to 11 year olds were exposed to 15 hours a week of violent cartoons. Carlsson-Paige and Levine found that by 1987 it had escalated to 43 hours a week. That was likely before the Ninja Turtles too I would suggest.

The average child could spend the equivalent of 22 school days a year watching violence on television. There is the potential for television to teach children a view which includes violence as an acceptable solution to resolving conflict. Friedrich-Cofer and Huston in 1986 concluded that television violence definitely affects aggression.

It should not be too surprising then that dating violence has become a problem in Canada. Young people from 12 to 17 years of age are the primary consumers of pornography in Canada. Check and Lacrosse in conducting surveys of attitudes toward pornography in metro Toronto high school students reported that 35 per cent of those sampled reported watching scenes of rape, torture and bondage.

It would seem imperative therefore that those engaged in media programming as well as all forms of media reporting be made cognizant of the significance of their industry as to how it impacts as a role model upon our children and youth.

Solutions to the problem of violence and abuse must come from all sectors of society, including government at all levels.

The members in this House are aware of the initiatives which have been undertaken by the government over the last number of years to deal with the questions of violence against women and children in our communities. Many organizations outside government should be lauded for having joined forces with us to implement such initiatives as the Child Sexual Abuse Guidelines for community workers. I am proud to say that this protocol was developed by working professionals across Canada and it was indeed shared by a constituent, Laura Carment, who is the regional director of Child and Youth Services, Mental Health Services, Saskatchewan Mental Health in Regina.

The recently announced $136 million federal initiative on family violence will give all jurisdictions in Canada the opportunity over the next four years to develop programs to address the specific needs in their communities. There is, of course, support for the Canadian panel for violence against women established by the minister responsible for the status of women, to investigate the extent of violence in our society and to determine workable solutions.

There are those in Canada who would suggest the minister should ultimately call for a royal commission on violence against women.

These are laudable programs and initiatives, but we can and we must do more to address the problems of violence against women and children in Canada.

As the federal government, we should seek to form new partnerships with other levels of government, non-government organizations, professional associations, community groups and the private sector, to identify, treat and prevent problems of violence and abuse.

It is with this thought in mind that I put forward the view that the media has a pivotal role to play in facing the problems in being part of the solution in dealing with violence against women and children.

Since the media is one of the primary distributors of the message, I believe it is essential that the media should be enlisted to work in concert with our national goals and framework to deal with the problems of violence against women and children in our capacity to prevent family violence.

There are many questions which must be asked, and these are just but a few. Does the media have a code of ethics or protocol regarding the programming and reporting of scenes of violence and abuse against women and children. Would advertisers consider boycotting programs that display such violence? Would viewers consider boycotting both programs and advertisers who display and/or condone violence and abuse against women and children? These and other related questions constitute a major concern to me and I urge this House to give this matter serious consideration.

I would also at this time like to thank my wife, Shirley, for the role she played in the development of my interest and concern in this subject. Together we have a vision of Canada as a country that takes true and compassionate care of its children, its seniors and those who are defenceless against brutality, a country in which the vulnerable among us can live in dignity and safety, free from violence. I hope everyone in this House will share this vision with us.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to stand in this House tonight and support the motion by my hon. colleague and good friend, the member for Regina—Wascana. I certainly support very much the motion that he has brought forward.

Perhaps the most disturbing aspect of our burgeoning technological society today is the predeliction for violence in the media, and in particular in that most influential of the media, television. It just happened that last weekend Halifax was getting its third major storm in a week and I could not step outside my house. I was flipping around the television channels and on every commercial channel, as opposed to say Newsworld or some of the other news channels or the movie channels, you had cartoons for children. In every one, every single one—and it was around nine o'clock on a Saturday morning—there was what I consider, and I would suggest what most people in this House would consider to be, an undue amount of violence.

My hon. friend mentioned the teenage mutant Ninja turtles—if I have the title correct—and those characters are extremely popular with very small children. Preschoolers in general are the ones who seem to be taken by that. On another channel there was some sort of a space cartoon where people were being decapitated, men and women both, by some sort of monster. One had a sort of eerie response to the fact that across this country children were sitting in front of those television sets, captivated by this, and getting a message that nobody really seriously could want to send to them.

We know that television is the most pervasive and popular of the media. As my hon. friend has said, we know that on average Canadian spend 23.4 hours per week in front of the television. Children spend a disproportionate amount of time in front of the television. In fact they spend more time in front of the television sets than they spend in school.

Mediawatch reported the most disturbing facts in its review of programming on R-rated television. Here are some of the figures. Women are more likely than men to be depicted nude and as going from fully clothed to either partially nude or nude. The body parts of females were far more likely to be shown in a disassembled manner than the body parts of males. That is tidying up the language. What a disassembled manner means is that women were more likely to be shown dismembered on television than men were.

Of the programs that contained a combination of sex and violence, 92 per cent had a female victim. Males were abused in only 8 per cent of cases. Women comprised 63 per cent of the instances of violence in English TV drama and 62 per cent in French TV drama. They composed an equally high percentage of those shown in what could be considered a somewhat subservient or a lot subservient manner. For example, if someone was being shown in a bathing-suit, underwear, skin-tight clothing or in a bathtub or shower scene, or grooming or unclothed, in all of these women were 60 per cent of the characterizations.

Even the media's portrayal of violence against women and children seems to go over the edge into the sensational. God knows we have enough actual incidents in our society of violence against women and children, but there is a tendency in the media today to take even these horrific situations and make them worse.

Rather that report on the daily incidents of violence against women and children, the reports tend to focus on usual aspects of this violence. For example, one only has to look at the coverage of the Polytechnique massacre and the explanations that were offered. One only has to look at the way some of the media reacted to this.

I know that my colleague from New Westminster—Burnaby, as well as the hon. minister, will remember in the report of the subcommittee on the status of women something I will never forget. It is the Maclean's magazine ad in the week after the Polytechnique massacre. It was brought to our attention in committee by a journalism professor from Carleton University. I will describe it, because certainly I read the issue of Maclean's that week and did not even notice it.

On the left-hand side is the study about the Polytechnique and there is a photograph of the flowers in the snow in front of the building that people left there that December day. On the right-hand side is an ad for the House of Birks, Canada's most famous and nation-wide jewellery and gift store. In the House of Birks ad is a head and shoulders of a woman and she is blue. In the medical term she is cyanotic. There is a chain hanging around her neck. It is quite artistic. It is quite sophisticated and, when we really look at it, it is quite frightening because in actual fact living women do not look like that; dead women look like that.

This was something that every one of us, I would wager, looked at that week and did not notice. As I said, I did not notice it. None of us noticed it until it was brought to our attention by this journalism professor. When we have something like that brought to our attention, we realize how even those of us who are attempting to fight this, for whom it has become an almost daily part of life to be arguing against these images and these symbols, can become toughened to the whole scenario. How much worse is it for small children to be influenced by images of this?

I realize that my time is running short and I want to close by again reiterating my support for the hon. member's motion. I would also like to say that I particularly liked the closing portion of his motion which says: "Without interfering unduly with artistic freedom and freedom of the press".

Of course freedom of expression and artistic freedom are very important. However, I do not think that any of us—I know that the member would agree with me on this—would stand here and say that artistic freedom or freedom of the press would be impinged upon if we said that the time has come to stop the brutality and the degradation of women, children and people in general in the commonplace production of media events.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I am also pleased to rise to support this motion put forward by the member for Regina—Wascana.

It is important for all members of this House to reinforce our commitment to eradicating violence against women and children. This is one step we can certainly take on the road to reaching that goal.

As the member who spoke before me said, the status of women subcommittee dealt with a number of issues around violence against women. This is one issue that was discussed at our committee hearings.

Some of the witnesses who appeared before the committee expressed concern about the powerful role of the media in socializing young people. They recommended that a component of the high school curriculum for young women and men should include the study of media representations of violence and the effect it has on all of our behaviours.

Judith Posner of the Association for Media Literacy informed the committee that violent imagery is portrayed by a variety of media, most of which is mainstream. Many of us think that it is not mainstream media that portrays this violence. However, most of it is mainstream: popular films, fashion advertisements, rock videos and pornography, which the member mentioned specifically in his motion.

The common themes or depictions in violent media images typically show an imbalance of power between men and women, as well as the presence of coercion. They intimate that women enjoy pain, violence and subjugation.

In certain popular slasher films, girls and women who are independent are more often the victims. They are usually the victims. Independent young women are shown to be brutally murdered in these films. The message is that you will pay a price for your autonomy and your independence.

It is important to talk about the incidents of violence in our society. Rarely does a day go by in this country in which Canadian media do not carry reports of sexual and physical assault perpetrated by trusted persons and strangers against girls and women.

The frequency with which incidents of this nature are reported in the media would leave most Canadians to conclude that violence against women is indeed a serious problem in Canada. In fact, the gravity of the situation is far greater than the number of cases in the news reports would suggest.

Research has shown that most women who are victims of violence do not report their victimization to the police. As a result, the actual incidence is largely invisible and absent from official crime statistics, and by extension from media coverage. Indeed, sexual assault and wife assault are two crimes known to be significantly under-reported relative to other crimes of violence.

A Canada-wide survey published in 1985 found that fewer than 40 per cent of female sexual assault victims and less than half of wife assault victims had made a report to the police.

Studies show us that women's reluctance to report violent attacks against them is related to a fear of retaliation that would result in further violence or death, a lack of confidence in the police, the courts, and feelings of guilt and embarrassment.

The national reporting system in Canada, the Uniform Crime Reporting System, contains statistics on criminal incidents in Canada. However, this data base includes only crimes reported to police, and records of reported incidents of wife assault are listed as general assaults.

The UCR does not contain descriptive information about the relationship between victims and offenders or about the circumstances of the offence which would identify incidents of violence against women in the family.

It is very important that we talk about the numbers of people who are victims of violence in our society, the children and the women. The member for Regina—Wascana has mentioned it but I will reiterate some of the statistics.

In 1989, 12,970 sexual assaults were known to the police. Between 1983 and 1989 the number of complaints of sexual assault made to the police increased by 93 per cent. Every 17 minutes there was a sexual assault committed in Canada and 90 per cent of the victims are female. One in four women will be sexually assaulted at some time in their lives, half of those assaults before a young woman reaches the age of 17. Between 63 per cent and 83 per cent of female victims will be sexually assaulted by someone they know, someone they trust.

There are between 14,000 and 18,000 sexual assaults in the province of Quebec alone every year.

We know that the incidence of assault against women, of violence against women, is higher for aboriginal women and disabled women. It is higher for any woman who is doubly disadvantaged in our society. The more vulnerable a woman is the more susceptible she is to violent attack.

Part of the motion presented by the member reads: "to protect innocent Canadians from being exposed to such portrayals". I would suggest that it is also important that we protect the women and children from the effect these portrayals have on the way we are treated by our society.

It has long been denied that there is any connection between violence in the mass media and actual acts of violence against women and children. However, it has been clearly shown that violence is on a continuum. Seemingly small incidents of sexism such as sexist jokes allow people to feel they have the right to put women down. This opens the door to greater acts of sexism and discrimination, right on up to physical violence and unfortunately sometimes to murder.

The portrayal in the media of women as objects, the portrayal in the media of women as subordinates of men, and the portrayal of women being violated have profound effects on our attitudes in society. They have profound effects not only on children but, as the member for Halifax said yesterday, we all become somewhat immune to the barrage of sexist advertising and the violence in the scheme of that advertising.

I am pleased to support the member's motion. I congratulate him for bringing it forward and I look forward to it being debated in committee.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to speak to this motion that reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, a full review of the media's portrayal of violence towards and abuse of women and children, should be held by an appropriate committee of the House of Commons with the aim of making recommendations as to how better to protect innocent Canadians from being exposed to such portrayals without interfering unduly with artistic freedom and freedom of the press.

I also congratulate the preceding members who have spoken on the issue for the passion with which they support the motion.

The member who introduced this motion, the member for Regina—Wascana, has identified for us in a nutshell the magnitude of the problem of violence against women and children. This is truly an indictment of a serious ailment that exists in our society.

He has identified in an outline the causes and he has identified the media's portrayal of violence as a cause of violence against women and children. In so doing he has identified another group of causes of violence, those that are not media induced.

I should just say that this House has heard on several occasions the many non-media causes of violence, such as poverty. It is known that those who live in poor neighbourhoods, those who are poor are exposed to unusual behaviour which contributes to violence.

Recently I am told that there has been the depiction on one of our postage stamps of the picture of Satan. Now that to me, not in a religious sense, introduces the question of cult. It is known medically and psychologically that cult can contribute to violence. We know the tragic results of such a phenomenon.

We have to appreciate that children's games available to the public can damage the mental faculty of children and contribute to violent behaviour. It is known; it is a medical phenomenon.

As we look at the causes of violence, both the non-media and the media causes, another question has to be asked as to what is the interactive role of both, that the sum of two influences can be more than just the additive sum, but in fact an interactive sum that accentuates the gravity of the problem.

So the question then naturally has to be asked: What types of portrayal by the media inflict adverse effects on children? To begin with, a committee that will study this problem naturally will review the literature available to it.

I am conscious of one study done at the Children's Hospital of Winnipeg, where I used to be. In fact, it concludes that violence portrayed on television does truly contribute to occurrence of violence among children.

Second, has there been any nation-wide study in Canada about the magnitude of this problem that we may not know? If such a study has not been done yet, certainly the federal government must be challenged to undertake such a study, to invite proposals for such a study from among our experts in the field so that we can undertake to define the actual magnitude as well as the available solutions that already exist.

A third question I would like to ask also is: What good value, if any, does violence portrayal serve? Is there any at all? That must be answered. Having said that I am conscious that, by and large, our media are very responsible, that they truly have at heart the welfare of our citizenry. Equally there are those who are motivated by greed, motivated by money and deliberately induce media violence. That, of course, must be looked at.

Violence is a major public health problem. Indeed, it is a major public health hazard that destroys not only the present, but the future generations as well.

So I welcome this motion and if, in fact, we would not take a vote on this motion, then I will make an undertaking to this House that I will bring this to the attention of the standing committee on health and welfare and to the subcommittee on health so that this issue, indeed, does not die after this motion has been debated in this Parliament because there is a bigger question. What can government do to solve the problem once identified, and meanwhile, what services do we provide so that those who have already been victims may now be attended to, healed and cured, so that we will only be attending to the future victims.

Mr. Schneider: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I believe that we, as parliamentarians, must make a statement on this issue.

While negotiations or discussions have taken place with members of the other parties, I believe that unanimous consent may be obtained to adopt the following motion and because of the expressed interest in the media's role, the motion reads as follows:

> That the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture do undertake a full review of the media's portrayal of violence towards and abuse of women and children with the aim of making recommendations as to how better to protect innocent Canadians from being exposed to such portrayals without interfering unduly with artistic freedom and freedom of the press.

This is moved by myself, seconded by the member for Westminister—Burnaby.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, it was indicated that the motion was seconded by the member for Burnaby. I would just like to be assured that the member from the Liberal Party has been consulted. Do I get that assurance?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 8.35 p.m., this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 148, 149, 150 and 195.

[Text]

Question No. 148—Mr. Berger:

With respect to the subsection 9(1) of the Immigration Act which requires that immigrants apply for, and obtain a visa before appearing at a Canadian port of entry, what is the average time required to process regulations exempting an individual from this requirement?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Persons applying for landed immigrant status from within Canada must meet statutory requirements which include medical and security checks as well as requiring an Order-in-Council to exempt these applicants from the requirement of subsection 9(1) of the Immigration Act.

The average processing time for Order-in-Council visa waivers has fluctuated over the last two years in response to immigration levels achievement and volume. At this point virtually all visa waiver Order-in-Council requests submitted by applicants prior to January 1991 have been completed, indicating an average processing period of 10 and 12 months.

Question No. 149—Mr. Berger:

What is the average time which elapses between the delivery of a completed application form by an individual seeking permanent resident status who is presently in Canada, and the actual landing of a successful applicant?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Persons applying for landed immigrant status from within Canada must meet statutory requirements which include medical and security checks as well as requiring an Order-in-Council to exempt these applicants from the requirement of subsection 9(1) of the Immigration Act.

The average processing time for Order-in-Council visa waivers has fluctuated over the last two years in response to immigration levels achievement and volume. At this point virtually all visa waiver Order-in-Council requests submitted by appliants prior to January 1991 have been completed, indicating an average processing period of 10 to 12 months.

Question No. 150—Mr. Berger:

Is the Department of Employment and Immigration contemplating any administrative or legislative changes to facilitate the processing of applications for landed immigrant status received from within Canada?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): There are presently no plans to amend subsection 9(1) of the Immigration Act which requires that immigrants obtain a visa before appearing at a port-of-entry.

Persons applying for landed immigrant status from within Canada must meet statutory requirements which include medical and security checks as well as requiring an Order-in-Council to exempt these applicants from the requirement of subsection 9(1) of the Immigration Act.

Recently, Employment and Immigration introduced administrative measures, namely automated processing and tracking of Governor-in-Council submissions, to improve the processing of applications for permanent residence by persons in Canada.

Employment and Immigration will continue to develop procedural changes to improve the processing of these applications.

Question No. 195—Mr. Fisher:

1. What is the current status of each Human Rights complaint emanating from within the CRTC., that is being considered or reconsidered before the Canadian Human Rights Commission or Tribunal?

2. Who are the individuals hired, what services were rendered, including a breakdown of monies paid to each individual working for the CRTC., from 1986 to present, for each internal grievance procedure and each Human Rights complaint emanating from the CRTC workplace.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am informed by the Department of Justice and the Canadian Radio–Television and Telecommunications Commission as follows:

1. There are four complaints emanating from within the CRTC The Canadian Human Rights Commission is considering three and the Human Rights Tribunal one.

Of the three complaints before the commission, one was just received and the investigation has just started. As for the other two, they originated from the same individual. The investigation of these two complaints started after the attempt of a negotiated settlement failed.

As for the case before the Human Rights Tribunal, a settlement was reached between the parties, therefore the tribunal has ceased to inquire into the complaint.

2. The following listing is set out by year, category of incidents, company name, contractor's name, description of work to be performed from contract, and cost to the CRTC:

The House resumed from Tuesday, February 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Loiselle that Bill C-26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee H; and the amendment of Mrs. Catterall (p. 6131).

Mr. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): Madam Speaker, Bill C-26, tabled by the President of the Treasury Board, could have a major impact on Canadians and, more specifically, on the Public Service. I would like to discuss the preliminaries to this legislation which were broadly based on wide-ranging consultations across Canada and, more specifically, throughout the Public Service. I intend to explain how this was done by a government that must be sensitive to public opinion if it is to gain the public's support. And finally, Madam Speaker, I will also indicate how this reform can have a major impact on the Public Service, on federal services as such and on Canadians.

Madam Speaker, as you know, it is not easy to motivate members of an organization the size of the Public Service, which has more than 200,000 employees. It is not easy to get such a group actively involved in a wide-ranging reform program and the implementation of that program. However, when we consider the process and the history of Bill C-26 now before the House, and when we look at the extensive discussions that have taken place, the consultations and the meetings, we are impressed by the tremendous participation shown at all levels, both in the Public Service and among the general public.

Did you know, Madam Speaker, that this vast consultation campaign involved setting up task forces that worked systematically? For example, on 10 occasions, more than 300 people met at one time; in all, 3,000 people made 300 recommendations. Did you know that in addition to these discussion groups, there were innumerable conferences and workshops? There were telephone surveys. There were informal contacts between individuals and even the unions, officials and members alike, participated with the government people. There were also consultations in the private sector. In short, in addition to the 3,000 people whom I just mentioned, 7,600 more were involved in these discussions.

You already see that the consultations were held in a structured but fairly spontaneous way with unexpected developments, reactions and some wonderful recommendations. Throughout this consultation process, letters were sent and more than 1,700 people who would have been unable to take part in these consultation sessions reacted personally by letter to the President of the Treasury Board and his reforms.

All in all, summing it up, 12,000 to 13,000 people had the conviction to participate, and worked on sharing their visions of what the reform should be.

I am therefore pleased to note, that this major reform bill, C-26, was developed in such a systematic, democratic and wide-ranging way. This leads me to say that this bill cannot help reflecting to a great extent the goals of union members, public servants, section heads and each department in their long-term vision of what such a reform should be. But the purpose of having a consultation was not only to come up with a white paper.

Everything that was collected and collated from these 13,000 people was passed on to the Treasury Board, which then produced the white paper. With this document, which was tabled several months ago, we returned to the grass roots, which expressed its comments, expectations and concerns, and moved on to the second phase, raising awareness. Since the recommendations had been accepted in whole or in part, we consolidated them and went back to find out what people thought of it. Here again, more than in phase 1, we gave out 247,000 brochures, 11,000 posters, 19,000 reports and 344,000 copies of the white paper, throughout the Public Service and to the public, because ultimately, the public will benefit from all these reforms.

All in all, 800,000 documents arising from this white paper were distributed, giving all their readers a chance to react or at least to find out about the proposed policies. That's not all. In addition to these written documents, Treasury Board and its president took their concern for the democratic process, information and awareness farther, by involving group leaders. They visited senior managers in various departments; 294 groups were involved in this process. Furthermore, the President of the Treasury Board himself gave several speeches in various places, again to ensure the dissemination of information. Two of them were even given before labour groups. Finally, 13 joint committees were set up.

As you can see from all this, the information and awareness phase was as extensive as the first one, the information gathering phase. Did you know that, in the Correctional Service alone, 3,500 proposals were put forward? Did you know that more than 4,500 came from Health and Welfare Canada? Does this not go to show the level of interest and participation of our civil servants from various departments across the country? Is this not solid, fabulous proof of their beliefs and concerns?

At the same time, it shows the commitment of this government which, throughout its mandate, while it introduced bold and hard changes, it never failed to dig out the facts and then release this information to better inform the public about these reforms. And that is great.

That is what brings me to the conclusion in this first part, that this approach was great. I have to thank the President of the Treasury Board, the hon. minister, for conducting such a fine operation.

Aside from this campaign and process, in closing, I would like to mention the major thrusts of this reform: to increase civil servants involvement, to give them a sense of belonging, to allow them to take part in the assessment of their own work environment. Isn't this great? So, civil servants' participation is essential, since they are the heart and soul of the federal government. What we stand to gain from all this is obvious.

Besides a greater sense of belonging and a more efficient public service, you can easily imagine, Madam Speaker, how much Canadian citizens and taxpayers will benefit from this increased efficiency and sense of belonging as well as from improved services.

[English]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to speak on the amendment of the hon. member for Ottawa West, seconded by the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, that Bill C-26, an act to amend to the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada, be not now read a second time but be read a second time this day six months hence.

I acknowledge that there has been some significant dialogue and important participation. There is still much to be done because if there were not, we would have an acknowledgement on the part of the workers, part of the people that it affects, that this is not so. There are still some concerns out there.

If this bill were adopted, it would permit an indepth study of the legislation.

I wish to say a few words about the Public Service before I attack the substance of the bill. I believe and many of my colleagues also do in the importance of the Public Service. I am a former public servant and I have a great deal of respect for them. Obviously, like any other group, we have people who are more committed, more talented than others. At the same time, the majority are very capable men and women who devoted much of their lives and their talents to our country in order to attempt and respond to the will of politicians in Parliament and to deliver the best services possible. I salute them.

It offends me to see that the Public Service can become a target for political parties of government. We sometimes forget that the salaries they have, the pensions they have acquired over the years, and other benefits as well, are not ones they have granted themselves. They have negotiated them with government that at some point in time has in fact said yes.

My objective, and I hope it is shared by many others, is not to remove some of those benefits or lessen them or somehow diluer the rights they have acquired over time, but we should be looking at how it is that we can in fact extend that to other Canadians throughout the nation. Surely that is a much preferred way of responding than it is to attempt to diminish—I say it again—the rights and the benefits that they have acquired over time. I want to point out that which they have they were granted by governments and it is too easy for them to become targets of politicians.

I want to say as well that I am offended when they become the scapegoats, often times, for the failures of political people or governments. I think the most flagrant example of that was the Al-Mashat affair where in fact they were used as bouc émissaire si vous voulez.

I want to point out as well that this bill, in my opinion and in the opinion of many others, will not create the right kind of climate or environment for change and growth to meet the needs of Canadians and to meet the needs of a changing Canada. I think that is extremely serious. There is an attempt to streamline. No doubt there is a need to streamline the way resources are managed by the Public Service and to simplify and expedite the collective bargaining process. I think most people would agree, but where we probably disagree is: Is this the best approach? Is there still more to do? What is it that can be done in order to reach those particular objectives?

There is no doubt that the new legislation does make some positive contributions. There has been some dialogue, as I pointed out. There has been some participation, but in our opinion, not sufficiently so. There are still some people who are very anxious, who are angry, who are upset, who do not understand the total agenda of government. Another positive feature, quite apart from some important participation and dialogue, has been employment equity. Equal pay for work of equal value has been addressed, but we claim it is still too vague, that it needs to be more precise.

Let me talk about the reservation quickly. Some of the proposed amendments in the bill, such as those regarding appointments, layoffs and deployments, are highly controversial. We really need to see whether or not that controversy is justified. The proposed changes would serve to give managers greater authority to hire, fire and transfer employees without adequate appeal and redress mechanisms. Surely that is a very important gain that has been made, not only by this group, but many others. We do not want to go back. There is no assurance that the actions of managers would support the merit principle. That is the fundamental flaw. We need to have assurance that the merit principle will in fact continue to be the very centrepiece of appointments to the civil service.

Deputy heads would be permitted to move employees into jobs without selection boards, without appointments, through deployment. The legislation would also allow the government to contract out work while laying off incumbents in these positions. Some federal Public Service unions contend that the contracting out of work does not save money. In fact, it would cost more. In many instances it could be done more cheaply and more efficiently by the current Public Service employees.

I find it interesting that when I asked on the Order Paper for a response to how many contracts were in fact awarded and what was the total value, I was not given that information. Supposedly it has not been accumulated. I find that shocking. Why do we not get the facts so we can put them on the table and look at them in a rational way?

The bill would make it easier to hire casual employees for limited periods. Continued turnover of employees which would result from this practice could cause a lack of continuity and lead to a decline in service to the people. Surely that has got to be our first priority. It could in fact run counter to the objectives of Public Service 2000.

The public accounts committee of the House of Commons, among others, has pointed out that there has been inadequate consultation. The government says it has been adequate, but the public accounts committee says it has been inadequate, inadequate with the interested parties before the bill was drafted and presented to Parliament.

My party is urging that the government establish a special parliamentary committee to consider the principle of the bill as well as its substance in the context of Public Service 2000.

We are concerned as well that there have been a number of extremely dysfunctional labour disputes. They have disrupted the service that has been rendered to Canadians.

The government has been chastized and will continue to be for its mismanagement of labour relations. It is this government that has caused the first ever massive walkout of public servants in the history of Canada. The relations were not sufficient to be able to hold them together to work out a sensitive and sensible agreement.

There are many public servants out there who believe passionately and unequivocally that the government cannot be trusted and that it does not listen. That is one of the problems we are in fact experiencing. If there is lack of trust and confidence, the public servants are extremely nervous about what has been happening.

I have another concern. I believe that this is another example of the dismantling of one of our institutions of nationhood. We are weakening the Public Service. It is not unlike the dismantling of VIA Rail, Air Canada, Canada Post, CBC; privatization and contracting out; or the use of short-term employees. All of this will weaken the Public Service as an instrument that serves the public and carries out the will of Parliament in all areas of the country. I am extremely concerned about that.

My party, the Liberal Party of Canada, believes that Canadians deserve acceptable quality service throughout the nation, delivered efficiently by a professional, non-partisan Public Service which treats all employees with respect and fairness and is responsive to the needs of Canadians.

I am concerned that we may be departing in a significant kind of way from the merit principle and that this may lead to additional patronage and favouritism in the Public Service.

[Translation]

I realize that the legislation before us will not necessarily protect the merit principle, in fact I believe that it will not protect it at all. It will be possible to appoint people, to transfer employees and to do many things that cannot be done now and that I think will truly weaken the Public Service.

[English]

There have been court orders and a court case where the actions of the Government of Canada have been struck down. There was the moving of employees without full consultation, without accommodating them, which is another serious flaw.

There will be a new class of casual employees who can be hired or fired within 24 hours. Managers will have a great deal of power to be potentially insensitive to people who have been in the Public Service for a long time.

As I pointed out, the Auditor General has in fact chastized government for mismanagement. My great concern is that over all not only the merit principle may in fact be simply thrown aside but the Public Service Commission, which in fact as my colleagues have said is the watch-dog, can now become very weak and perhaps even the lap-dog of government. That would be unfortunate.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to rise today to speak in the debate on Bill C-26 which incorporates in legislation a lot of the principles and ideas included in the PS 2000 review of the Public Service by this government.

There is no question that the Public Service needs modernization, that it needs streamlining, and that it needs a reduction in a number of reclassifications. Most of all, what the Public Service needs in my opinion is a radical decentralization of decision making.

It is my opinion that a lot of the pressures for decentralization of powers to the provinces currently under discussion in the constitutional debate could be accommodated by a decentralization of decision making within the federal Public Service so that decisions made by the federal government and the practices which it carries out in the regions would in fact be subject to decision making at local and regional levels rather than centralized in Ottawa.

However, I believe the number one problem with the Public Service is the problem of morale. Certainly an organization of that size, of that complexity and of that importance cannot function at the level of morale that exists today.

Why does that low level of morale exist? I think it is because of the feudal, backward, 19th century attitudes this government has taken toward its own employees. Certainly that is the kind of attitude the government took during the strike last summer which radicalized a group that never before had contemplated those kinds of actions. It was really despicable to see this fine group of people used for partisan ends, in the case of the prairies to pit farmers against working people for the political ends of the government.

This kind of an approach was further reinforced in the way the government has gone about introducing this whole notion of Bill C-26 and PS 2000. Contrary to every modern management technique which says that employees have to be involved from square one, from day one, in designing the work flow, the work place and the management structures, this government has chosen to ignore the input of its public servants and their organizations and adopt a top down approach wherein a new management structure is to be imposed on the work force. Surely all modern management theories say this is exactly contrary to the way we should go about it.

Before I go on to some of the problems I see in this legislation, I would like to pay tribute to the public servants in my constituency of Prince Albert—Churchill River. These people do a tremendous job on our behalf, on behalf of the taxpayers of Canada and on behalf of the Parliament of Canada as they carry out the duties assigned to them.

In La Ronge and Prince Albert there are manpower offices that are very much understaffed and very much under pressure because of the increasing workloads that fall on them as a result of the very high unemployment rates in that region.

We have an Indian Affairs office in Prince Albert that I think is doing a commendable job in restructuring itself to accommodate the whole movement to self-government by Indian people and their organizations.

We have a Health and Welfare office in Prince Albert that has responsibility for the delivery of health and welfare services throughout half the province of Saskatchewan, a huge geographic area with very difficult circumstances in many cases. It is doing a commendable job while at the same time facilitating the transfer of responsibilities to the Indian people.

We have a Forestry Canada office that has some very creative people in it who are working in partnership with provincial governments and various stakeholders in forestry to implement the model forest program and the federal-provincial agreements. It provides a real stimulus to the forestry industry in our community. A former minister of that department is here feeling good about what I am saying, and I think he should. It is one of the commendable developments we have seen in our community.

As well we have the Saskatchewan penitentiary which employs large numbers of people who are working very hard and in very difficult circumstances. That institution has an awful lot more inmates than it was originally designed to accommodate. There are fewer staff members than there should be. There has been significant contracting out within that institution, which both creates instability and a situation where there are people in the institution who are not as professional, I do not think, as the people who are part of the Public Service. That creates a real security dilemma within that institution and something that the government needs to look closely at.

There is also the Prince Albert National Park, one of Canada's finest parks. The work force there is undermanned but still doing a tremendous job on our behalf protecting one of the unique environments in the boreal forest in an exemplary fashion.

There are outposts of other departments, Immigration and so on, with just a few people in them who often do a very good job in isolation.

However, there are significant problems with this legislation. I think a lot of them stem from the fact that the government is trying to do by legislation things that it cannot win in the courts. This further serves to undermine the morale of public servants. As well it is a fairly despicable way to go about making changes. Some of these problems involve the threat to the merit principle, the danger of patronage and all evils associated with a non-merit type approach to hiring.

• (1040)

In this legislation we contemplate something called deployment. Under the concept of deployment there will be huge classifications created within which managers have the power individually to reclassify people, to move them from one job to another, and to fill positions without competitions.

Recently the government tried to do that under existing legislation. It issued something called the transfer exclusion order which was intended to waive the merit principle for the transfer of individuals from one position to another at the same group and level.

The Public Service Alliance challenged this attack on the merit principle and recently received a decision from the Federal Court of Canada which said that the federal government could not do it. This was a mere two weeks ago, and now the government is pushing forward legislation which would permit exactly the kind of practices the Federal Court of Canada said would undermine the merit principle, something that has been at the heart of our Public Service for decades and something I think all members of Parliament would endorse publicly.

We also have a problem within this legislation of condoning and promoting the whole notion of contracting out, which is really just a code word for privatization of the Public Service.

Again we have a situation where the government lost a case in court and therefore is trying to do by legislation what it could not win by normal channels.

The government brought forward a proposal to transfer out work, to contract out work, and in March 1990 the Public Service Staff Relations Board ruled that employees lost their jobs because the employer contracted out for service, a complete reversal of what it was obliged to do under the policy. In other words the Public Service board ruled that the government could not lay off workers because of its contracting out function.

However, within Bill C-26 we now see that where the services of an employee are no longer required by reason of lack of work, the discontinuance of function, the transfer of work or a function outside the Public Service, the deputy head in accordance with the regulations of the commission may lay off the employee.

In other words, the government has the ability to privatize job functions, to privatize jobs on a carte blanche basis. That leads to further patronage, that leads to further undermining of the merit principle, and that leads to a further degradation of the Public Service and its efficient functioning.

The last problem I have with this legislation is the whole question of pay equity. To be brief, the government talks a good line on pay equity, on equal pay for work of equal value, but we see right now before the Human Rights Tribunal government lawyers stonewalling every attempt to bring to bear the principles of equal pay for work of equal value.

This PS 2000 concept envisioned in Bill C-26 will institutionalize and create such confusion in the Public Service that it will take another 10 years to bring in pay equity.

In conclusion, I would like to say that we need a Public Service that is on side. We need a Public Service that is appreciated. We need a Public Service that is involved in the day-to-day design of the work place, and we need a Public Service that is professional and non-partisan. I think all those things will be undermined by the legislation before us.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. President of the Treasury Board would like to say something. I am sorry, but questions and comments are not allowed at this time, only 10-minute speeches. I believe that the hon. minister has already participated in the debate.

Consequently, the hon. member for Dartmouth has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, I am going to try to limit my comments today. I think I have 10 minutes on debate.

I will be up a little later on today to talk about some of the other major problems that I have with the government's approach in dealing with the Public Service of Canada. I want to speak specifically at this point in time about the motion that is before us.

It is affectionately known by those in this House as a hoist motion because it effectively takes this piece of legislation and it holds it in limbo, in suspension for a period of time.

The amendment was put forward by the critic of the Liberal Party. One of the reasons that I want to speak about this is because of the process that the government did not go through in arriving at this particular piece of legislation.

It was not that long ago the chairman of the public accounts committee indicated that before anything be done with the white paper, or the discussion paper about the Public Service of Canada, an all-party committee should be struck in a non-partisan fashion.

It would sit down, go through that particular discussion paper and formulate a piece of legislation that would look after all of the various interests put forward by those sitting around the table. Most important, it would have established a principle that before the federal Public Service is fundamentally restructured, there would be an open process by which everybody in this House could contribute.

Unfortunately, the way the House works is that when a bill is presented, no matter how bad the bill is, the government and its people on the other side dig their heels in. Somehow, it is a matter of pride that if there is something wrong with the bill then we are supposed to close our eyes and go full speed ahead.

The chairman and the public accounts committee made this very clear. The process they thought should have been followed was that the discussion paper should have been put forward. The committee should have invited input from those very public servants and other user groups, from Canadians, on what was the best structure and most efficient structure for our Public Service. But the government chose not to do that. The government chose not to have that level of consultation.

So we now have before us a bill, which as you heard from other speakers leading up to this debate, is regressive. It is a bill which is fraught with difficulties. It is a bill that literally thumbs its nose at the contribution and the worth-while efforts of our Public Service.

The hoist motion is one that I am going to support. If the government would agree with us, it would give the government an out. My goodness, when you are at 12 per cent in the polls I think sometimes you might want to do the right thing instead of the stubborn thing. Maybe it would go up a point or two.

If the government would agree to this hoist motion it would give Parliament an opportunity to sit down and to write a proper bill dealing with the restructuring of the federal Public Service, one that could probably be supported by all members, or most members in this House, and a bill that would be supported by the public servants themselves.

The problem is indicative of the treatment this government has levelled at Canada's federal Public Service. What this government has done is it has treated the federal public servants in this country as goats. Everything that this government has done that is wrong it wants to turn around and somehow blame a federal public servant for it.

My colleague from the New Democratic Party just said it a few minutes ago, we saw what it has done. It has caused the first general massive strike in our history of the federal Public Service. That is what it did a few months ago. Those very same individuals, and they are not radical unionists, are people who live on your street, Mr. and Mrs. Canada. That is who they are. All they are trying to do is an honest day's work for an honest day's wage.

This government, because of its crazy economic policies and the deficit that it drives up every second you breathe in this country, its tax policies, all those things have created a climate that it has to strike out at somebody. So who does it strike out at? That is right. Those people who the government made goats of, those federal public servants in this country.

If you listen to the government opposite you would think the federal public servants are all getting $60,000 a year, work 25 hours a week and get a 50 per cent Christmas bonus. Well, it is not the case.

I can look around right here and see federal public servants who look after us in the House. There are not many of them who are making what I would call an over-generous allowance for the days that they work in this place, or in federal offices and institutions across Canada.

The government would have us believe that they are all fat cats in the federal Public Service and that somehow they are less deserving of fair treatment by this government than other citizens of Canada would expect from their government.

We forget that the people it forced out on strike with its zero, three and three policy were not $50,000 and $60,000 a year employees. By and large, they were women in lower income groups. They were women who were getting paid $17,000 to $21,000 or $22,000 a year.

They were forced out on strike because the government would not listen to them. It will take some of those women as long as one year or one year and a half to make up for the money that they lost. There was no gain, but they finally said: "Listen, we are not going to take this type of nonsense, even if we are going to lose money".

Somebody has to stand up here and say to this government that we demand fair treatment. We do not look for anything that we do not deserve, but we demand fair treatment. But this government has poisoned the atmosphere between those tens of thousands of public servants across this country and their own government, their own employer. It has practised types of labour relations that if they are not illegal they should be made illegal.

The government came in with this bill that we are currently debating. It put things in the bill that certainly, in my view at least, are going to lead not to a Public Service that is the watch-dog on government, but could lead to a Public Service management or senior officials who become the lap-dog of government.

There are more clauses in this particular bill that are offensive than probably in any bill that I have seen since I have been here. If you really look at it, the government had plenty of opportunity to do the right thing. It had plenty of opportunity to sit at the table with the Public Service.

I am not in government; I am in opposition. But somehow I have a sense of proprietorship over the Public Service of Canada because I am one of the people who vote in here on bills and regulations and legislation that affects Canadians. So I feel some collective sense of responsibility before we go in and restructure the Public Service to talk to those people who are going to be affected the most. This government obviously does not think that that should be the case.

The Conservatives have mismanaged their own credibility, these guys on the other side, that is what they have done. They are down to, what is it today, 14 per cent, 10 per cent, whatever it is.

An hon. member: It's 12 per cent.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): It is 12 per cent is it, and it is dropping fast I understand, is that right? Dropping like a stone.

This particular bill is not one that I am going to be proud to say was passed through Parliament if indeed it does get passed while I was sitting here. I have a lot of public servants in my riding. They deliver damn good service for the little bit of money they get. They deserve a heck of a lot better treatment from the Government of Canada, their employer, than what they have received over the last four or five years from this gang opposite.

Madam Speaker, how much time do I have left here? Am I getting close?

An hon. member: You have 20 more minutes.

Madam Deputy Speaker: One and a half.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): One and a half minutes. In conclusion to the members opposite, you have an opportunity here to do the right thing.

I do not like to lecture you, but you have an opportunity to do the right thing. I do not even know if there are 150,000 Canadians left who like the Tory government opposite. But there must be one or two people that the government members might be able to pull back onside by doing the right thing so they will not be embarrassed the next time they have to call up a CEC office.

When you annoy the people who work for you, they do not do the type of work or give that extra special push.

I ask the government to look at this amendment and to see the sense in the amendment, to pull this bill away from Parliament, to give it to a special committee of Parliament, a non-partisan approach to restructuring our Public Service in this country, and to invite all of the interested players in.

In that way this place will work properly and we will have a bill that adequately reflects the needs that we have as a nation in our Public Service and recognizes the great contribution that those people who serve in our Public Service make toward Canada.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, first of all, let me say that in my experience as a member of Parliament I and my staff have been very pleased with the service we have received from individual public servants working both here in Ottawa and in my riding of Willowdale. They are very conscientious people. They care about their jobs. They care about the service they give; not everyone of course, but then not all members of Parliament are up to scratch. However, by and large we have been extremely well served on a day to day basis by our public servants who are trained, conscientious and caring.

Let us give the government some credit for having recognized that there are problems within our Public Service. A mountain of red tape and a bureaucracy and a methodology have built up which actually hampers and retards the ability of our public servants to do the type of job they are equipped to do and which only they can do and want to do.

For example, staffing procedures are so complicated today in the Public Service that they take three times as long as the private sector. If you are going to switch a person from one job to another, it is estimated that it takes 105 days to staff a position in the Public Service using internal competitions. That is one third of a year. Even in Crown corporations the time taken is about half of that. This is unacceptable.

There are so many classifications of jobs in the Public Service and so much time is spent finding out which little bracket you fit into—who can apply, who is eligible—that about 40 to 50 per cent of all job positions require a complicated classification procedure with hearings, discussions and debate. As a result, more public servants look after hiring public servants in many areas than there are actual people doing the job.

The government has recognized some of these problems and so has the Public Service. So what do we get? We get PS 2000. The procedure was instituted from the top, where the top mandarins planned to give themselves more power. They proposed some laudable procedures to cut red tape but in instituting their reports and bringing them forward, they did not involve the Public Service, the people on the front lines. The civil servants of Willowdale that I have met with were not part of that discussion. It was a streamlined bureaucracy, but if you do not involve all of the people in the decision-making process, you are heading for disaster. That is what happened. The Public Service has balked.

The people in charge of PS 2000 pulled back a bit and what did they do? They brought in their tenth report, introduced by Mr. Rawson, who I think is a very capable public servant, and tried to change their course, gearing it toward public servants; service to the clientele and service to the public. However, this process lacked the involvement of the public servants themselves.

We are reaching a stalemate. The people do not like it. This is why we as the Official Opposition have called on the government to back off. Let us, as parliamentarians, have hearings so that we can get all of the people involved and develop a consensus because without the co-operation of everyone involved—and you know this, Madam Speaker, in your work with this House and our staff— in the decision-making process they are not going to feel committed to the end result.

Let us look at how this government has treated its own staff. It has questioned the competence of its own public servants to do a number of jobs through contracting out, which is increasing rampantly. Rather than having people who are trained and on the payroll doing a number of jobs, it contracts out without any sense of accountability and without being able to explain to either parliamentarians, the Public Service, its own staff, or even its own labour pool why outsiders are better equipped to do it. Is this just an attempt to get rid of jobs in the Public Service? Until accountability becomes a criterion for contracting out, we have real reason to suspect, and so does the Public Service, that this is not in the best interests of either them or Canadians.

Then there was last summer's strike by public servants. This was when the government said: "Public servants, you get 0, 3 and 3 per cent increases, one, two, three years". At the same time the top tiers of the Public Service obtained reasonable increases or very big increases. What happened? The Public Service went on strike.

I believe the government knew that they would go on strike because that was the only alternative they had as a self-respecting body. I believe the government wanted them to go on strike so that it could legislate them back to work and take the political credit that it thought would be due to it as Ronald Reagan had apparently won the hard right in the United States when he ordered the air controllers back to work. I think the government was that cynical. If it was not that cynical, then it was just plain stupid. It knew its policies would lead to that result.

Then what do we see? The government brings in its prosperity agenda and makes a wonderful declaration: "We are going to work together; governments, business and labour to make Canada prosperous, to make Canada competitive". It asked labour to buy into its concept of what co-operation between management and labour and government is. It said: "Come and sit with us at the table". What do you think labour said? "No way, not the way you are treating your employees. We will have no part of it because we've seen what your concept of co-operation involves".

Looking at the example that this government has set, in terms of its own relationships with its own employees, is it any example for Canada's private sector and dealings between management and labour in our private sector?

I have a dismal record to present to the House today. It comes from the World Competitiveness Report and looks at working days lost per 1,000 inhabitants. The 1986 to 1988 average looked at 33 different countries. Canada is at the bottom of the list in terms of the number of days lost per 1,000 inhabitants. I will be happy to table this if the Speaker wishes.

Let me just go through some of the shocking statistics. Looking at the G-7, Canada's record is by far the worst. We are 403 times worse than Germany, 99 times worse than Japan, 16 times worse than France, 4 time worse than the U.K., 3.4 times worse than the U.S.A., 2.7 times worse than Italy in terms of our record of days lost.

The government is considering a free trade deal with Mexico. Our record vis-à-vis Mexico is 93 times worse. How are we going to compete in this world if our record of days lost, of management-labour strife in the private sector, fueled by the example of the government in dealing with its own employees is the worst in the world? We just cannot afford it.

This is why the government's initiative, in perpetuating its pig-headed view of how it is going to dictate to its own public servants, is a failure. This is why we call on the government to back off.

The importance of all three sectors working together has been recognized by the government. May I just quote two paragraphs from the Liberal Party task force on deindustrialization and economic renewal. At page 25 we said: "In conclusion, the federal government must foster a new spirit of co-operation, collaboration and common purpose among all the partners in our economic future, including business, labour, education, finance, consumers, communities and governments themselves". In order to do that we gave a practical recommendation, recommendation 11, a new approach to industrial policy, "that the government bring together the representatives of labour, business, education, finance, consumers, communities and governments to find ways to work in a spirit of co-operation and collaboration".

The best thing the government could do at the moment is accept our party's recommendation and send this whole matter of PS 2000 to a committee.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak to Bill C-26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada.

I want to say at the outset that I support the suggestion made by my hon. friend from Willowdale that the appropriate way to deal with this right now is to suspend further debate in the House of Commons and examine the implications very clearly in a special committee as to just what this legislation is all about. If anyone actually has read this legislation, has spoken to the people who are directly involved, he or she will realize that this is probably about the last piece of legislation we should proceed with in terms of developing and building the federal Public Service.

I will simply say that in the Kamloops area over the years, the dedication, professionalism and service to the public demonstrated by the federal employees has been nothing short of extraordinary. The people in Health and Welfare, Employment Canada, in the immigration department, Agriculture Canada at our research station, the airport employees, CMHC, the customs people, those working with Environment Canada and income security, those involved with fisheries, public works, to say nothing of the excellent service that we receive from Revenue Canada folks and those related with the Canadian Jobs Strategy out of Kelowna and Penticton are really outstanding, professional public employees.

These are people who have dedicated their lives to serving the public. They take that mandate very seriously. I would say that out of all the thousands of federal employees in our constituency offices, we virtually have never heard a complaint.

We have heard from time to time some concerns, but when we have examined and studied the situation, the concerns that people have had have been unfounded and misplaced. I could say that you would not find a more professional, committed group of employees anywhere, in spite of what the government has done.

I say that thinking back to not long ago, a few months back when we were entering into those contract negotiations. I suppose the ultimate in humiliation was when the employer said to the federal employees: "We feel you are not worth any increase in pay for this year. While we have given pay increases to others, and while the settlements generally in contracts being resolved around the country are coming in at somewhere between 3 and 8 per cent, we are going to offer you zero. As a matter of fact, not only are we going to offer you that, we will force that through legislation so that we do not really even have to bargain".

The signal that that sends to people who have dedicated their lives to serve the people of Canada was probably the most serious blow to morale that one could imagine. Read the books on management styles these days, study the manuals and attend the seminars on how to improve productivity in the work place, how to enhance morale and if you listen to all the things you should do. I suspect that this government does none of them.

This legislation allows the government to continue to contract out work. The government now spends in excess of $5 billion on contracting out. There is no accounting of this expenditure and no study of the cost effectiveness of this contracting out process.

This bill also increases the discretion of managers in the deployment of staff. It provides the mechanism for increased devolution of managerial responsibility and accountability and attacks the job security of public sector workers generally.

What it does not do is address the serious problems of low morale within the Public Service. It does not address the deterioration of service to the public that one is experiencing because of employee absenteeism, which my friend from Willowdale has pointed out is one of the highest in the world.

It does not do anything to modernize the collective bargaining process. Still the alliance will not be able to bargain issues of classification and staffing levels. What the workers want is to make staffing classification and deployment of staff a bargaining issue. It wants an adjudication process to hear grievances and an end to the contracting out of work. Yet this legislation goes against all of the concerns that people have registered, all of the wishes they have made clear, and imposes some Draconian form of management that is quite unbelievable.

My colleagues have identified a whole number of concerns that we have identified. Fundamentally I want to direct my concern today to the issue of pay equity. While Bill C–26 does not deal directly with reclassification, we all know that it does allow Treasury Board to define classifications. Treasury Board has made very clear its desire to implement the recommendation of Public Service 2000 to reduce the number of job classifications. While the unions agree with the principle they do not agree with the process. Treasury Board will not negotiate these reclassifications. As a matter of fact, Treasury Board will determine the appropriate bargaining units. This is contrary to other labour legislation including the Canada Labour Code which gives this power to the Labour Relations Board. We all know that Treasury Board has established the classification simplification task force. Its mandate is to develop a universal job evaluation plan capable of addressing pay equity as defined in the Canadian Human Rights Act, and to serve as the model in the development of most future classification standards. A single evaluation process is appropriate. However the last time Treasury Board agreed with the joint union–management initiative it backed off when the associated costs of pay equity were discovered and understood.

Once this classification is implemented, at least this is what PSAC certainly fears, the government will use sleight of hand to say that it has achieved pay equity without costing any money. Salary discrimination would basically disappear because the old female dominated and male dominated groups will have disappeared. The inequities are still there. They are just regrouped. The argument is totally fallacious.

PSAC believes that when it challenges the government's claim of achieving pay equity at the Human Rights Commission it will win. However this will have delayed pay equity for a long time. In fact it will likely delay it for many years.

Here is an example. Part of the reclassification would result in a general administration group which will have approximately 116,000 employees performing a very wide variety of tasks. There would be six levels within that general administration group and each level would have its own salary range. The ranges will result from slotting the old jobs into the new six salary levels based on the old salary levels. This means that the lowest paid groups remain at the lowest levels and that the highest paid at the highest level, with females at the bottom and males at the top.

In other words Treasury Board will provide a new package for the existing out of date and discriminatory job classification system. Treasury Board officials have consistently referred to how the old groups will be slipped into the brand new system. It is this discriminatory system that is currently under view by the Human Rights Tribunal.

If this government were committed to pay equity then it would proceed with the equal pay adjustment guidelines passed back in 1986. As was recommended by the Canadian Human Rights Commission, these ought to be done on existing job classifications. We should not transfer the old wrongs into a whole new structure. We should make it right now that we have the opportunity.

In 1985 the joint union–management initiative on pay equity in the Public Service was established. The government paid an American consultant, Mr. Norman Wills, over $1 million. There were 50 to 60 Treasury Board employees who worked on the initiative and 40 paid persons from the union. The study showed the gross inequities between female and male dominated groups. The government ignored this study and used its own calculations of what the pay adjustments should be. PSAC disagreed totally, and rightly so, and decided to pull out in 1989.

The case went before the Canadian Human Rights Commission in October 1990. The commission decided there was merit to the case because government rates were not high enough and were not consistent with its own guidelines and therefore referred the matter to a tribunal. The tribunal will hear from PSAC and the Professional Institute of Public Service of Canada, the Canadian Human Rights Commission, and Treasury Board. Although Treasury Board originally agreed with each step of the equal pay process, that agreement is now forgotten. Every step of the study process had to be painstakingly presented and justified before the tribunal in order to substantiate the equal pay complaints.

Each party can and will call witnesses and cross–examine. This will result in an extremely lengthy process and likely will continue into the fall of 1992 and perhaps even into next year.

In conclusion, I will simply say that while women represent half the world's population, provide two–thirds of the world's labour, and produce half the world's food, they receive only one–tenth of its remuneration and they own a mere 1 per cent of its property.

This is a chance to rectify some of these past wrongs. We should be acting on pay equity in a very serious way.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Madam Speaker, this is the first time I am addressing the House in my new role as labour critic for the Official Opposition. I hope my remarks will not be taken in a spirit of condemnation but as trying in my own way to enlighten the ministers who are here and my colleagues.

It is sans dire that over the years there has been a push to have co–operation between management and labour, labour and government, and management and government. A few years ago it was called tripartitism, but it is a recognition that those people in the position of making decisions which affect the welfare of all Canadians should be working together.

Today we are discussing in large part the public servants of Canada. I would like to put into perspective what the government says it is attempting to do and what our views are with regard to its attempt. It is my view at the outset, and my colleagues have pointed this out, that our public servants over the years have done an admirable job under circumstances which were not always the best.

This move the government is making is not designed to boost morale, and much less productivity. As a matter of fact I believe, with all respect to the minister, that it is counterproductive.

Let me quote from the backgrounder to Public Service 2000 put out by the government. The Public Service Reform Act, Bill C–26, was introduced in the House on June 18. Today we are debating its particular merits. The government claims that the legislation will streamline outmoded legislative rules which control collective bargaining, staffing in the Public Service which I want to deal more specifically with in my address, human resources management, and the disposal of surplus assets.

The Chair should be aware that I intend to introduce for greater scrutiny at a later time in this debate the third topic which I mentioned. What I want to deal with today is the whole theory of merit pay.

The government has said that the goal of PS 2000 is to eliminate a good part of internal red tape and the cumbersome and far too numerous checks and double–checks and to reduce the unnecessarily long chain of command to get approval for straightforward transactions. I am in favour of that. My party is in favour of that.

It is incumbent upon us to take obstacles out of the way of the clients whom the public servants are there to deal with.

Changes to the operations of the Public Service have already begun. I agree with that. I do not agree that they have been done under the best of circumstances. While rules and regulations are being examined I am wondering how much input the public itself has had on these changes.

I am now quoting. This is what it says: "The person on the front line at the service counter is going to have more freedom of action and the chance to use common sense and good judgment in helping Canadians to count on the government for services". Well, of course. However haven't our public servants always used good judgment? Haven't they always used common sense? I suggest that they have. I suggest that many times we have not given them the proper tools to carry out the work we ask of them. It also says: "The federal government is the largest employer in Canada". It will probably continue to be. It continues: "The daily work of its employees affects every region and all communities in the country".

I want to put on the record a few of the statistics we have been given by the government. Two–thirds of public servants are based in communities across Canada, which means that they are external to those who are living and working here in Ottawa. Perhaps erroneously it has been said that Ottawa is a fat cat city. This is where the public servants are supposed to be living high on the hog. I would suggest to the minister, to my colleagues in the House and to all Canadians that for the most part our public servants are not overpaid. In my view there could be a great debate to say that they are overworked in many circumstances. We are asking them to do more with less. That is a principle I believe we cannot condone.

Since most public servants are based in cities and towns across the country and are delivering what I call very good services every day, they should be recognized for the work they have done. They have been providing top quality work, and they have been providing cost effective and efficient services to their communities.

I set that up as the basis for my remarks today because I want to put on record the Liberal view of the Public Service. Those in my party believe that Canadians deserve accessible quality services which are delivered efficiently by a professional, non–partisan Public Service which treats all employees with respect and fairness. It must be responsive to the needs of Canadians because their raison d'être is to help the people of Canada when they are having difficulties vis–à–vis the federal government.

My Liberal Party is committed to the partnership between the public sector and the private sector and to the partnership between the government and its employees on whom it relies for policy advice and to carry out the programs, the services and the regulations mandated by this Parliament.

We support revitalization. We support the renewal of the Public Service to allow it to adapt better to rapid change. Most of all we wish to create an environment in which the employees can be creative, innovative, responsive and adaptable to the changing needs of their clients and to the nation.

It should also be noted that we hope to be able to attract and to retain competent, dedicated employees. When we say "dedicated employees", I know from having visited many of the offices in my riding and in neighbouring ridings that these front-line troops are under a great deal of stress and pressure. Over the years and still today they are performing admirably well in an economic situation which leaves a great deal to be desired.

The Liberal Party believes that change can best be managed in a climate of mutual trust, co-operation and consultation with its employees. That includes respect for basic collective bargaining rights. This was not shown to be so when unilaterally the government imposed a wage freeze for our public servants with some increases, at least it says now, of 3 per cent in the second and third years. I am not as sure and as confident as some members that this will come to fruition.

Perhaps this government, feeling a greater pinch if the economic situation does not improve, will once again be turning to our public servants to use as scapegoats, as people it can put the blame on when all the time what these people are doing is carrying out their responsibilities in a milieu, in an atmosphere which is not always conducive to working as hard as they want to.

We, in the Liberal Party, are committed to accountability to Parliament and to the public for the use of both human and financial resources.

I turn now to the merit principle. The Liberal Party supports the merit principle and will oppose the government's efforts to reintroduce patronage and favouritism to the Public Service.

I notice, Madam Speaker, that you are indicating that my time is running out, but I do give notice to all members of Parliament that I intend to enter this debate again when we continue our deliberations in the House.

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Madam Speaker, I would like to respond to some of the comments that some hon. members have made about contracting out.

First of all, I find them to be somewhat misleading and that is indeed very unfortunate. The Government of Canada believes it should deliver its programs and services in the most cost-effective way possible. To do this, it is sometimes advantageous to have work done by able Canadians in the private sector. This has occurred since Confederation.

With restraint and budget cuts to the operating costs of departments, managers are seeking the most cost-effective means of program delivery, using an appropriate mix of resources, just as they are doing in the business community.

There are many areas in which contract work is clearly both proper and desirable, such as projects of relatively short duration. It makes no sense to hire a plumber on a permanent basis if one visit is all that is needed to fix the problem. Second, perhaps the workload fluctuates throughout the year or from year to year in a given location such as snow removal or where there is a sudden and unforeseen workload generally speaking. These are areas where contracting out is not only desirable, it makes common sense.

The government is also committed to a world-class career Public Service. Are these two imperatives incompatible or mutually exclusive? I think not and I would like to look at the issues surrounding them in some detail.

First of all, what is contracting out? Opposition members and the Public Service Alliance of Canada have said that the government contracts out $5 billion worth of work per year. At least, the Alliance said $4 billion back when the bill was introduced last June. Today it says $5 billion. Neither figure is realistic so it really does not matter.

Assuming the figure quoted is derived from some official source, such as the public accounts, then the figure has to do with contracting, not just contracting out. If it is contracting, the figure would appear to include huge national defence contracts, capital projects and major construction work performed by private sector companies and the costs assessed when one government department contracts with another to perform work; for example, when Transport Canada contracts with Public Works Canada for offices for its employees and other facilities.

Real contracting out, in any meaningful term, is only a fraction of this alleged sum. So while the government does not have the staff necessary to compile and maintain exact figures on all types of contracting and contracting out costs, hon. members can be assured that the government is not attempting to hide figures it does not have.

So why are the unions and some members of the opposition bringing the issue up in the context of Public Service renewal? Contracting out occurs where work formerly done by Public Service employees is performed by the private sector on behalf of the Public Service as the result of a contract. This is what has caused government unions some concerns in the past. But contracting out does not represent a significant threat to jobs in the federal Public Service. Since 1984 less than 1,500 employees out of a work force of 215,000 people or so have lost their employment in the federal government as a result of their work having been contracted out.

For the last fiscal year, only 154 employees out of the entire Public Service of Canada—that is right across the country—were involuntarily laid off for any reason, including contracting out.

Why does the government have such an enviable record of placing its surplus employees? A comprehensive and highly successful work force adjustment policy has historically provided excellent protection to employees who are declared surplus for any reason, including as a result of contracting out work.

The policy has achieved a 99.5 per cent rate of employment security, one the highest rates in Canada. This is not a job for life, rather it is a recognition that a large employer can usually accommodate most of its surplus staff if those employees are willing to be flexible and take another job elsewhere in the system.

It is the same with responsible employees in the private sector and examples abound. For instance, it should come as no surprise that when General Motors opened its new production plant in Tennessee to assemble the new Saturn automobile, it staffed the plant almost entirely with surplus and laid-off employees from Flint, Michigan operations.

The issue seems to be what kind of protection do current government employees have when their jobs are contacted out and do the provisions of Bill C-26 in some way erode or undermine this protection? The answer is a resounding no.

It has been suggested that somehow Bill C-26 if enacted would become some sort of charter, enabling government to contract out at will and jeopardize the employment of Public Service employees. This is simply not so. It seems most unfortunate that so much heat and confusion has been generated over this issue and debate time wasted when no change of any real significance is occurring through these legislative proposals.

Let us look at the facts. What Bill C-26 does is recognize by amendment to section 29 of the Public Service Employment Act that movement of a function outside of the Public Service can constitute the discontinuance of a function and therefore can legally lead to the possible eventual lay-off of employees whose jobs are so affected.

This change becomes necessary because of the so-called Cantin case concerning the contracting out of the work of data processors in the department of customs and excise that was taken by the Public Service Alliance of Canada first to the Public Service Staff Relations Board and hence to the Federal Court of Canada.

These cases which went against the employer were decided on the technical wording of a section concerning contracting out. However, it is both interesting and important to note that the Federal Court decision contained a strong suggestion that moving jobs outside the Public Service did not constitute a discontinuance of a function within the meaning of the work force adjustment policy and by extrapolation within the meaning of the Public Service Employment Act.

This went contrary to all previous government interpretation, practice and thinking and indeed the Treasury Board has sought and received leave to take the Federal Court of Appeal's decision to the Supreme Court of Canada.

In consultations leading to a renewed National Joint Council work force adjustment directive in December 1991 these issues were fully and frankly discussed. The employer's aim in these consultations was to reach a new agreement with the unions that would ensure the government's right to contract out while at the same time protecting the rights of surplus employees.

In this regard the government announced in the February 26, 1991 budget:

> —should agreement not be reached through negotiation, the government is prepared to introduce the necessary legislation to remove barriers to contracting out.

The government was determined that contracting out would remain one option among many available to it to deliver its programs to Canadians.

As it turned out, an agreement was reached with all government unions through the National Joint Council. The new directive contains enhanced job security provisions which ensure that no one whose job was contracted will lose their employment security within the Public Service except under the most extreme circumstances or where such people had failed to co-operate with the employer's attempt to place them in alternative positions in their home area.

In short, all that Bill C-26 does is clarify in law what has already been agreed to between the unions and management through the National Joint Council; that is, if and when work is contracted out, such actions cause a bona fide discontinuance of a function within the Public Service of Canada and employees affected are protected.

Another aspect of the work force adjustment directive that is of note is the provision which guarantees that as soon as senior management of a department has decided to examine the viability of a contracting out option with regard to a departmental operation, the relevant bargaining agent or agents will be informed. The directive also guarantees that where departments undertake cost benefit analyses with regard to the consideration of a contracting out option, the analysis shall be done consistent with professional principles and practices and according to standards acceptable to the Treasury Board.

As soon as possible after tenders have been received and analysed, the department shall disclose to the relevant bargaining agents the reason behind the decision to go ahead with contracting out work, including any cost benefit or feasibility studies that may have been undertaken.

If this is not bending over backward to be fair and open with employees and the representatives, I do not know what is. The only caveat on this, and it is a most proper one, is that most departments will not share those parts of such studies that fall under the exemption provisions of the Access to Information Act concerning third party information.

All of these provisions are new. They are in addition to the information in Part III of the Estimates already available to hon. members and the public, including unions, which already provide information on significant changes in financial requirements, type of resources used and means of program delivery and they are in addition to the considerable information on professional and special services contracting expenditures that is already disclosed in the public accounts.

This disclosure details for each program the total amount spent on professional and special services together with detailed listings concerning individual and aggregate payments of significant size.

To sum up, first, charges made during the second reading debate on this bill to the effect that the government contracts out billions of dollars worth of work that its employees could do just as well are unfounded. So too are charges that the government is unwilling to provide any information it may already have on the subject.

Second, the government's work force adjustment directive continues to provide comprehensive protection for surplus employees whose jobs may be contracted out in the future.

Finally, nothing in Bill C-26 in any way erodes the employment security of current Public Service employees. That is, the change proposed to section 29 of the Public Service Employment Act merely recognizes in law what already has been effected de facto by the mutual agreement between the employers and its union.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Madam Speaker, it is an honour for me to participate in the debate on this very important bill.

Let me reiterate for the sake of the public record that I worked as a broadcaster and journalist at the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for almost 20 years. I suppose, in the eyes of some people that would have made me a federal public servant. Not so, because as you know, the CBC is a Crown corporation. Moreover, I spent more than half of my time at the CBC on long-term contracts. So I was not a civil servant. However, because of my work as a broadcaster and journalist, I certainly came in contact with public servants almost daily in my long career in broadcasting and I am certainly in contact with them as a politician.

I think I can say, without reservation and without hesitation, that civil servants are committed people, committed to their work. They are loyal and hardworking. Really, when you come right down to it, they are more or less just like all Canadians. Most Canadians are committed to their jobs. Most Canadians are hardworking and federal civil servants are no different.

I know that in the work I am doing now and in my relations with offices like the Canada Employment Centre or the immigration services or Revenue Canada, all the government offices that we have to work with on a daily basis, these are people who are dedicated and provide in the main a pretty good service. I want to put that on the record because if this bill is passed in its current form it would certainly affect their lives.

• (1140)

Public servants are telling us that they do not want this bill in its current form. They want it changed. It is incumbent upon us to take a very serious look at this bill and do it in a way that will provide very good results down the road and make it a much better bill. There is strong opinion out there that this bill is in bad shape.

Among other things that is one of the reasons we in the Liberal Party are asking that we get this bill out of the House and turn it over to a special committee. I will have more to say about that in a moment.

Something has gone wrong in the Public Service in the past few years. Something terrible has gone wrong. The morale is very low. In fact the air is virtually poisonous. That is how bad the morale is. The trust has been lost.

I suspect one of the reasons for that is the suspicion of public servants with regard to this government. They are suspicious about government policy. They are suspicious about the government's intentions. They are certainly suspicious about the government's ideology. They are in effect saying: "We have seen what the government has done with respect to free trade. We have seen what the government has done with respect to the GST. We are seeing what the government is doing in the area of the GATT as it pertains to supply management".

What are they seeing? They are seeing a government committed to privatization. They are seeing a government committed to the open market system. Public servants are very suspicious. That is why they want this bill vetted, examined, scrutinized to the nth degree.

One of the things that contributed in a major way to the current low morale, to this poisoned atmosphere, was the strike that occurred last year. Perhaps that was the low point in government–employee relations in many years.

Government more or less announced in its budget earlier last year or in effect told public servants: "Your collective bargaining rights are cancelled. You are going to get zero this year. Sorry about that, but you are not getting any increase". That to me is tantamount to cancellation of collective bargaining rights. In fact some months after that the government's own staff relations board said that the government was bargaining in bad faith.

That strike certainly contributed to the bad relations that currently exist. On one hand, public servants were told that they were going to get a zero per cent increase in their wages. Meanwhile, they were told on the other hand that federal judges, some of whom earn almost $200,000 a year, were getting 5 per cent. This is not a good way to contribute to better staff relations.

As a party we are saying: "Get this bill out of the House, turn it over to a special committee, and examine the bill in detail". One of our hopes in that regard is to get it out of a partisan atmosphere. We are saying: "Get everyone involved, get all the parties involved, get PSAC involved, get the government employers involved, get everybody involved and treat this in a very non-partisan but serious way". Perhaps we could accomplish something that way. It is because of the serious situation that exists. Somehow or other we have to get some trust back into the process. We have to get people back on friendly terms, on working terms, and maybe we can accomplish that if we choose to appoint a special committee.

After all, that is what the public accounts committee suggested. We are only following up on the suggestion brought forward by the public accounts committee.

There are many contentious issues. I am not going to go over them in detail because they have been alluded to several times in speeches earlier today. There is the contracting out issue. It really does not matter whether the figure is $3 billion, $4 billion or $5 billion that is spent on contracting out. It really does not matter what the figure is. It is a very divisive issue. It has public servants very upset. We really do not know the impact on public servants. We really do not know whether we are getting our money's worth from contracting out. That has to be looked at.

There is the merit principle which is something that cannot be lost. We cannot have as good public service without operating on the merit principle. Yet there is strong opinion that if the bill went through in its current form the merit principle would go out the window and we would have in its wake patronage and favouritism, and we cannot have that. Another concern is undermining the Public Service Commission, and we cannot have that as well.

There are many things of great concern to public servants that are not in the bill, for example pension reform, employee rights or the political rights of employees. Sometimes the issues have to do with contents of the bill; sometimes the issues have to do with things left out of the bill.

We suggest, and I certainly support it, that we take the bill out of the House, turn it over to a special committee, and give it a real good working over.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, in the very brief time I have to speak on this bill I would like to take the opportunity to comment generally on the proposed legislation. Also I would like to put on record some of the comments from my area, given the discussion and debate about a very important issue that sometimes may seem a little dry. To those of us concerned about Parliament, about government and in particular about the effective delivery of government programs and services, this kind of legislation must receive very serious consideration.

In discussing the bill I want to note that public employees in my area, primarily in the Prince George, B.C. area, have spoken to me about this legislation, basically about the report that it flows from. They have been expressing their concerns about what they see the legislation possibly doing. They are certainly going to be following this debate closely.

I am assuming that when this bill passes second reading in this House and goes to committee we will get the detailed analysis that I think is necessary. Certainly time must be set aside for witnesses from the various unions and collective bargaining agents with the federal government to have every opportunity to present their arguments and cases to the committee when it is reviewing the legislation.

As members of Parliament we have all come into contact with members of the Public Service, given the work done in our ridings, particularly by our staff.

At the airport in Prince George there is a great deal of contact between our staff and a number of service agencies. One in particular is Canada Unemployment and Immigration Commission, regarding unemployment insurance and many of the problems associated with it. In northern B.C. there has been a large increase in the number of UIC claims. Extra effort is being put in by government employees to ensure that claims are processed as fast as possible. There is work being done by employees of the Canadian Jobs Strategy on the training program side.

Given the debate in the House yesterday, we are wondering what kind of a training program we will have left if some of the advice is taken by the government in terms of what these training programs are going to do. A couple of departments will have a tough job. I am thinking of immigration. It is a very difficult post and one which our offices are in contact with a great deal. There has also been some shifting in the Prince George area. Unfortunate decisions have been made by this government to close down the Agricultural Experimental Farm in the Prince George area. On the other hand a small Forestry Canada Research Unit is being created which of course we support. We are doing some work with the minister and the provincial government and hope to make some arrangements with the new University of Northern B.C. in Prince George.

All of us have a vested interest to ensure that the public service is well represented when any legislation dealing with it is brought forward. I will be ensuring that copies of this debate are forwarded to those people in my riding who have expressed their concerns about this legislation.

I have a couple of comments pointing out the major concerns we have with this bill and what it does not do. I would like to outline some of the concerns and views we have heard from employees in our ridings and in meetings with our caucus. Our labour critic, the member for Mission—Coquitlam, has developed a good working relationship with Public Service unions and of course has co-operated when need be with the government.

The bill is going to allow the government to contract out a great deal more than before, and that is a real concern. That matter was raised when I appeared before the Prince George city council a few weeks ago. All of us know that the Canada Unemployment Centres, as we used to know them, have ceased to exist. Training programs are being contracted out to a number of new consulting and training firms that are delivering many of the services we used to expect Canada Employment to do. The public still thinks it provides these services.

It is our concern that this bill will allow a great deal more of that. I am concerned on that point because like any employer we should make every effort to develop a good working relationship with our employees, bring them along and train them. We get better service and an incredible commitment from employees when we do that. If we reduce many of the public employees simply to shuffling paper around, we are not going to have the kind of innovative work force that we need.

Some of the concerns raised were the discretion of managers in the deployment of staff, the increased devolution of managerial responsibility, accountability, and some of the attacks on the job security of public sector workers.

What does the bill not do? The serious problem of low morale in the Public Service has been raised before. The government has not given any indication of the need to develop a higher morale in those employees who work for the federal government. In fact, during the recent dispute, it certainly appeared to many that the government went out of its way to work against the relationship that was needed.

I mentioned a very serious problem with unemployment insurance earlier in my comments. There has been a deterioration in service to the public because of the increased numbers of people the administration has to deal with. I mentioned specifically the unemployment insurance program in northern B.C., the vast number of claims that have to be processed, and the incredible effort being made by many of those people to see that the work is done.

Something must be done to modernize the collective bargaining process. The Public Service Alliance, representing the majority of the employees, will still not be able to bargain issues of classification and staffing levels. It is a very important point that I know and trust the government will consider. I hope we will deal with it in committee when this bill gets there.

What do the employees want? Often it is their voice that is not heard and it is important that we raise their concerns here. They want to make staffing classification and deployment of staff bargainable. They want an adjudication process to hear grievances on the above, and that is very important. We all know of people who have made efforts in terms of promotion or classification and would dispute a decision by either a manager or a regional manager. I think that has to be included in the process to ensure it is taken care of. Of course the employees are very concerned about the need to ensure that we do not have the policy of contracting out that the current government has followed.

I would urge the government to go the distance in committee to ensure that every effort is heard and the time is given to the employees of the Government of Canada to make their case. The government must be open to improvements and suggestions. By doing that I think we will ensure better legislation and a better Public Service.

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in this debate on an issue that is of concern to all Canadians, namely the future of their Public Service. I say "their Public Service" because we must make it clear that it is neither an institution for public servants nor an institution just to serve the government. The Public Service of Canada exists to serve all Canadians.

For this reason, like so many other issues of public policy, this issue is one of balance and reasoned compromise. For a long time Canadians have properly prided themselves on their ability to reconcile important objectives and find solutions which serve the common interest. In this case it is a balance between the rights of public servants as employees and the need for a system which supports responsive service to the public.

I believe these needs have been reconciled by the government in bringing forward this bill. That is where I believe the opposition is off the mark in comments made so far in this debate. I applaud the comments made by many hon. members in support of the men and women of the Public Service of Canada which is justly regarded as one of the best in the world. This bill provides for the maintenance and enhancement of that tradition of excellence.

I would like to make a couple of broad points in support of the proposed legislation and then deal with a few of the specific inaccuracies raised in this debate. There are two predominant messages in the white paper Public Service 2000: The Renewal of the Public Service of Canada. I would urge all members who might not have read this important policy statement to do so.

The issues are fundamental to the reform legislation and our consideration of it. The first issue I would suggest is the recognition of the importance and affirmation of the government's commitment to a professional, merit based Public Service. This is a Public Service open to all Canadians of talent and commitment. It is a Public Service where entry and progress are based on skills and ability and where patronage, both political and bureaucratic, has no place.

In this Public Service people can make careers. They will have the opportunity to develop consistent with their abilities and interests. There will be special consideration given to the needs of employment equity groups, to ensure that Canada can benefit fully from a Public Service which reflects all of our citizens and their capabilities.

The Public Service Reform Act proposals reinforce this by confirming and strengthening the role of the Public Service Commission as the guarantor of merit at the most critical points, that is on entry to the Public Service and on selection of those to be promoted.

The proposals also ensure appropriate protection for public servants from patronage or abuse of the staffing system. This is accomplished by strengthening the audit investigation and appeal authorities of the PSC. There is, in addition, recourse provided against abuse of authority in the case of deployments which must, in most circumstances, be consensual. It provides for direct action in support of employment equity groups and makes it clear that the employer is responsible for this.

But we must also look at the second and overriding theme of the white paper. It is the enhancement of the service orientation and capacity of the Public Service to provide mechanisms to allow the Public Service to be responsive to the needs of Canadians and allow individual public servants to progress and contribute.

It is no surprise to those of us who have occasion to work with its women and men that the vast majority of the Public Service is dedicated to doing a good job. But many studies and commentaries, including the Auditor General's, have found that the system built up over the years has constrained responsive management and the innovations which dedicated and skilled people are capable of generating.

It is here that the issue of balance must be resolved between a system where all staffing requires a laborious process of comparison and the need for a less rigid regime which allows people to move quickly to new challenges for which they are qualified, between a staffing system based on the premise that jobs can be narrowly defined and the one best person can be identified through relative assessment, and one which provides flexibility to recognized legitimate needs of the public for responsiveness.

I would like to address some of the issues raised in error in this debate. One, for example, is that the changes proposed fatally undermine merit. The merit principle has never been an absolute concept. It has always been tempered by the context within which it was applied. It has reflected the needs and views of society at a given time, with an eye on administrative efficiency.

It seemed quite fitting in 1918 that women should be denied opportunities in the Public Service on the mere grounds that they were women. Today we would consider that view in conflict with the merit principle. Throughout many of these years francophones were at a distinct disadvantage when it came to tests and examinations that were based on curriculum of the anglophone school system. Today we know this would be unacceptable.

Yet these views were able in their time to co-exist with the merit principle. The current Public Service Employment Act contains many provisions that could be viewed by strict interpretation as contrary to the merit principle. Take, for example, the preferences that are given to veterans, to local residents and even to Canadian citizens. There is the fact that public servants are to be considered for appointments before looking at the outside market. There are priorities for appointment before all others that are given to persons facing a lay-off or returning from a leave of absence. There is the area of competition policy which allows us to limit consideration for appointment to persons employed in a particular organization or location.

I raise these examples to show that the merit principle has never been an immutable concept. It has always been balanced by other important needs, principles and values, and this is as it should be. It is our view that the needs of the public for quality and timely service and the needs of employees for opportunities for career development are important principles that need to be brought into the equation.

The merit principle, which is the selection of the best qualified person, will continue to apply to recruitment, hiring, change in tenure from term to indeterminate, and promotion within the Public Service.

Once employees have proven themselves to be the best qualified and competent in moving to a given level, little is served by requiring them to undergo a complete reassessment every time they move into similar jobs.

Members might be interested to know that although the merit principle was introduced in 1918 it did not apply to transfers. From 1918 to 1961 transfers were made by deputy heads of persons considered qualified by the then Civil Service Commission. This is exactly what we are suggesting today. Even after 1961 transfers for the most part were simply considered as a change in record content. That means they were not considered to be substantive moves of employees, and no reassessment was done.

It was not until a policy change by the Public Service Commission in 1975 that transfers were treated as appointments subject to the selection of the best qualified. A competent, professional and highly respected Public Service was developed despite the fact that transfers were not subject to the merit principle for many years.

It has been said that managers will be arbitrary and capricious in the selection of employees for deployment favouring some at the expense of others. They suggest that employees have no recourse to the manager's decision.

This has been the most disturbing part of the debate. There is an interesting inconsistency in the suggestion that the majority of those selected for management positions under the existing merit system cannot be trusted to deal fairly with other employees. If this were the case, I am not sure that it provides a compelling case for maintaining the present system. In reality I am pleased to say that this is simply not the case. There is simply no evidence to suggest that managers as a group are arbitrary, unfair, lacking in judgment or unconcerned about their employees. It is to the contrary. Public Service managers are competent and committed to both their employees and to the public interest.

There are a number of other points I would like to make, but in closing I would just like to refer to the recent decision of the Federal Court of Canada regarding the lateral transfer exclusion order. The Federal Court was not castigating the government. Rather it was suggesting that the government might well wish to follow the direction it is now taking and change the legislation. In that decision Mr. Justice Rouleau said: "Being satisfied the commission does not in some instances require more flexibility"—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately I must interrupt the hon. member. His time has expired.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Madam Speaker, I listened to the various speeches made in this House on the reforms proposed by the government for the year 2000: PS 2000. Naturally, in the time allowed to us, we could raise many issues, and I see my colleague from Ottawa-Vanier who is a great expert in this field. Of course, my own experience in it was gained when I was a member of the Quebec National Assembly. A commission, on which I sat, was set up to overhaul the Quebec government's public service. Of course, the will was there, and I am convinced that it is also there within this government, to bring in useful changes to modernize the Public Service. I remember that we emphasized one thing, namely the issue of accountability. The term used in French was "imputabilité".

This is a very important element, not only for the public, which expects services from its public servants, but also for members of this House and others, mayors of municipalities, et cetera, who must deal with the federal government. Those people will occasionally meet with a deputy minister, an assistant deputy minister or even a minister but, more often than not, they contact members of Parliament. It is important for people that when they contact a department, be it National Revenue, Transport or Agriculture, they have someone who will be able to answer their questions, provide them with the information they need, even if their request is by mail, or make decisions. Too often, complaints are made because requests are transferred to others, and too often nobody is held accountable. It is impossible to say who is responsible, whether it is a case of making a decision or providing information to the public. So, the issue of accountability is important and I would have liked to see it dealt with more seriously. We should, along with civil servants, see how things could be simplified for people who want to get information, or when decisions have to be made.

I remember that we set up a system whereby if someone phoned, whether a contractor or some other business person, that person was in contact with a specific person who was in authority, and who could deal with that person until the issue was settled, which is very important, and at the same time very easy for that person. In the end, someone has responsibility either to make a decision or to pass the file on to a higher authority. In this manner, the process can come to a conclusion. People do not have to wait for months before a decision is made.

Another issue before this House, which has often been raised by the Public Service Alliance, is subcontracting. That procedure affects the morale of our civil servants, and I would have hoped that the minister would have taken that issue into consideration. As long as this issue of subcontracting remains unsettled, this conflict will persist with our civil servants and will affect their morale.

Mr. Loiselle: That was settled.

Mr. Assad: The minister says it is settled, but he should tell that to the Public Service Alliance of Canada (PSAC).

No one knows how much is spent on contracting out. However, studies carried out by PSAC even question the quality of the work the public sector does for the Government of Canada.

This matter of contracting out should be considered, and I think it would be a most worth–while investment on the part of government, especially with a partner like PSAC and all the government employees it represents, to ensure mutual trust exists on this issue. We are not talking about a million here and there. We are talking about hundreds of millions of dollars spent on contract work. Naturally, the credibility of the various departments is often called into question. The possibility of patronage was mentioned, among other things.

This it to say that the matter of contracting out is extremely important. Keep in mind that government, as the largest single employer in the country, sets an example. So, let us be an example for all provincial as well as municipal governments. That is why I hope this issue will be considered thoroughly and that PSAC and all the other organizations representing federal civil servants will be satisfied that, if there is to be contracting out, it can be justified as well as quantified.

Another point I would like to make deals with an issue that has been dragging on for years and that is whether there is employment equity within the Public Service, especially for women. We look at the statistics and we see that not much progress is made from year to year. The status of women in the Public Service leaves much to be desired. Many reports were written on this issue, and many assurances were given by governments, not only by this one. For years, we have sought to improve the condition of women in the workplace and to come up with programs as well as to ensure that they would have promotion opportunities within the Public Service. However, year after year, statistics show deficiencies in that area.

Once again, it is extremely important for the Government of Canada, which is the largest employer, to realize that one cannot leave part of our population feeling mistreated or unfairly treated. The role not only of the government but of everyone in this House is to make sure that is considered. We must not just make statements of good intentions and then say we did what we could. We must be vigilant on that issue. I believe that the issue of equity for women should be dealt with fairly, once and for all. I know that it would be a tremendous benefit for the whole Public Service, because of the large number of women who work in it.

In conclusion, I looked at the Public Service Alliance's report, especially the chapter on the subject I spoke on before, contracting out. It seems to me to be a major point. If I go by the report from the Public Service Alliance, as I should, I recommend that you look at that aspect if you want to improve morale in the Public Service. I suggest that you study this question of contracting out because it will be raised in the House many times until it is settled.

[English]

Mr. Kempling: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to advise the opposition parties that should they have any amendments they wish to put to this bill we would be pleased to receive them at committee.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, I would like to address my remarks on this legislation today from two perspectives.

The first perspective is as someone who has worked in the Public Service in Ottawa, who has been on both sides of the competition process, who has competed successfully and sometimes unsuccessfully for positions in the Public Service, who has actually run competitions himself, and who has worked with public servants in the government in Ottawa where the vast majority are extremely competent, dedicated and able public servants at whatever level they happen to assume.

I know as someone who worked in the Public Service that the public servants want to make a difference. They are there to serve Canadians in various capacities. Whether it is as a mail clerk, an assistant deputy minister, an economist or a program manager, they are all there to serve Canadians and they really will not have an opportunity to contribute. That is their primary motive.

They are also in many places very demoralized because what separates them from being able to make a difference is a great deal of regulation and directives that require them to have their activities pigeon-holed into corners. They are essentially obliged to do things which they cannot see as actually contributing to the well-being of Canadians.

Public Service reform is necessary. It is necessary to have a Public Service which is not only dedicated but is actually spirited. They should have an opportunity to do what they for the most part want to do, which is to contribute to Canada.

Second, I would like to speak from the perspective that we all share to a greater or lesser degree in this Chamber, that is that of an elected member of Parliament who interacts with public servants on a daily basis on behalf of constituents and who is in very much a direct way a client of the Public Service of Canada.

We are all in our ombudsman roles here as members of Parliament. We are clients of the Public Service on behalf of our constituents. As members of Parliament we are therefore very much affected by the legislation, the Public Service changes that will result from this legislation and the whole array of administrative, policy and regulatory changes that are being proposed in the initiatives and the report known as Public Service 2000.

That is why the amendment proposed by my colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa West, is appropriate. This legislation and the other initiatives encompassed in PS 2000 should not be proceeded with in a legislative committee but should be referred to a special committee for pre-study.

I think that recommendation is most appropriate. It reflects the recommendation that has been submitted by the Standing Committee on Public Accounts that this legislation and the initiatives under PS 2000 be given careful scrutiny. It is also because as members of Parliament we are clients of the Public Service of Canada and all on line and front line government employees who effect programs and services which we deal with on behalf of our constituents. We are directly affected. We must be involved much more so than just scrutinizing the legislation. We must be involved in what is behind the legislation and the changes proposed by this government.

I would also like to speak from the perspective of a member, like many other members in this House, who has public servants in his or her riding. The public servants in my riding of Cape Breton Highlands—Canso are far fewer than those in the national capital region and there are not many highly paid executive public servants. Nevertheless the people who are there on the front-lines of delivering the programs of the Government of Canada to the public have an important role. They ought to have a say through their elected representatives in this legislation.

Bill C–26 is the legislative framework for PS 2000, as I have already mentioned. The goals of PS 2000 are clear as they are stated in the government's white paper: "These goals are to foster and encourage a Public Service that is professional, highly qualified, non–partisan and imbued with a mission of service to the public". I wholeheartedly agree with that goal.

Whether Bill C–26 is an adequate vehicle through which to achieve that goal can be questioned. Several of my colleagues in the Liberal Party have raised valid concerns that Bill C–26 does not promote this goal. They have also advanced other valid concerns about this legislation.

I share these concerns. I have solicited the views of regular public servants in my riding and they are worried. Not only do several elements of Bill C–26 cause them concern. So too does the larger political and economic climate in which the Public Service exists.

Bill C–26 delegates much authority to the managerial level. Clause 22, for example, spells out that deputy heads will be able to deploy employees without competition to new jobs within their jurisdiction. Public servants in my riding fear not only that this proposal severely undermines the merit principle and the larger principle of decentralization which embodies it. It may well mean very different things in different communities and in different regions of Canada.

The reclassification system of PS 2000 raises some questions as well. Public servants in my riding see some positive elements of reclassification such as fewer units and simplified bargaining processes. These broader categories, however, could create as many problems as they try to solve and some of the problems could be very difficult to resolve.

How will classification affect employment equity when various job categories are combined and jobs which are female and male dominated will be mixed? This may cloud the numbers and potentially stall the implementation of pay equity laws to which we are all committed in this House.

Pay equity does not only apply in the Public Service to men, women and visible minorities. It applies as well to regions such as the national capital region. Have the goals and the rights of regional public servants been adequately addressed in this Public Service reform package? Will they be dealt with equitably in terms of pay, opportunity and benefits through Bill C–26?

Public Service reform is long overdue. Canadians hold them unfortunately in somewhat low esteem, and public servants have never been so frustrated and demoralized. I am not at all convinced, however, that PS 2000 and Bill C–26 will establish the sense of co–operation and common purpose that is vital within this most important national institution.

I fear that PS 2000 will further destabilize the Public Service by pitting worker against worker, manager versus staff, men versus women, regions versus Ottawa and so on. I am also concerned with the government's failure to ensure that professional, qualified, non–partisan and imbued public servants will actually have the resources and facilities necessary to deliver their talents and to provide the best service to Canadians. If I had more time I could provide a local example which would bear very precisely on this point. I will just summarize and complete my example.

It has to do with the income security program or ISP of Health and Welfare, which is in the process of being redesigned by this government. The redesign will, very conceivably, limit the access of the public to this very vital program to the public servants who administer it and result in, I believe, a great increase in the workload of members in this House and confusion and frustration on behalf of the public. Certainly that is not what this government is trying to achieve with this Public Service reform.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The question is on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen

Madam Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

WORLD ICE FISHING CHAMPIONSHIPS

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, this past weekend Lake Simcoe was the site of the 1992 World Ice Fishing Championships hosted by the town of Georgina.

This is the first time that this championship event has been held in North America and it is very appropriate that Georgina, the ice fishing capital of Canada, hosted this great event.

Over seven countries were involved in these championships taking place on Lake Simcoe at Jacksons Point and at Beaverton. The organizers worked very hard for over a year to make this event very successful. A new attendance record was set. Thousands of spectators were out on the ice this past weekend.

Families, residents and visitors created a winter carnival atmosphere that added to the festivities. The organizers and residents extended a hardy winter welcome to all visitors, demonstrating the warmth and hospitality so prevalent in this country.

Congratulations are in order for the town of Georgina for a job well done.

Mr. Speaker: I have to ask the hon. member for York–Simcoe: Who was on the side of the fish?

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian forest industry is once again threatened by U.S. retaliation against our softwood lumber exports.

The second decision by the Americans on whether we unfairly subsidize our lumber or have caused injury to U.S. markets is now scheduled to be made on March 5. Canada has filed over one million pages of evidence in order to make our case.

The federal government says not to worry, the free trade agreement will save us. Given the failure of the trade deal, Canadians and forest communities across the country should be concerned. Free trade has failed Canada and we must keep pressure on our own government so that it does not sell out our forests and our forest communities again.

OLYMPIC GAMES

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec–Est): Mr. Speaker, dear colleagues, many Canadians follow with interest the performance of our athletes at the Olympic Games in Albertville. I believe that it is appropriate to take a few moments to pay tribute to some of our most deserving athletes.

Tuesday evening, we watched with great emotion the performance of our figure skating couple, Isabelle Brasseur and Lloyd Eisler, both from Boucherville, Quebec. They won the bronze medal. They kind of "broke the ice", since it was the first medal for Canada in skating since the Olympic Games in 1964.

Beyond medals, it is appropriate to mention the performances of two of our athletes who have obtained the best results ever by Canadian athletes in the history of the Winter Olympic Games. I am talking about biathlete Steve Cyr of Val–Bélair, Quebec, who finished eighth in the 10–kilometre event, and Rob Crossan of Barrie, Ontario, who finished 12th in the alpine combined event.

Before I conclude, Mr. Speaker, let me tell you how pleased I am that our hockey team continues to do very well. Indeed, the Canadian team won its first three games and remains undefeated.

I therefore ask you, Mr. Speaker, as well as my colleagues in the House, to give a big hand to our athletes for their results so far at these games.

SALMAN RUSHDIE

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow is the third anniversary of the FATWA, the death sentence put on Salman Rushdie and all those associated with the publication of his novel Satanic Verses.

Last March the 15 Khordad Foundation doubled the bounty to $2 million U.S. for the killing of Salman Rushdie. This foundation is a non–governmental organization authorized by law to operate in Iran.

The Iranian government has not condemned the bounty nor has it suspended authorization for the 15 Khordad Foundation to operate. Implicitly, the Iranian government condones the bounty for the assassination of a British citizen.

In spite of this, not only has our government not suspended trade, but it has increased trade with Iran and is actually normalizing diplomatic relations. The government is in a profoundly hypocritical position. Beyond the Rushdie affair our government continues to trade with and do business with a country whose human rights abuses are widespread.

Canadians want to know: Has the minister for external affairs called in the Iranian ambassador to condemn the FATWA, the bounty on the head of Salman Rushdie or insisted on its removal conditional to furthering Canadian relations with Iran? Or are we just waiting for Salman Rushdie to die?

FOETAL ALCOHOL SYNDROME

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, last September I stood in this House and spoke on the issue of foetal alcohol syndrome.

This terrible condition attacks the infant children of women who have consumed alcohol during pregnancy. It can leave the infant physically and mentally retarded.

Having talked with many parents and care givers of these children, I am struck by the lifelong devastation on the victims as well as their families. The permanent brain damage that results from FAS produces severe anti-social behaviour.

Those involved are left with the despair of knowing that there is no effective therapy that can help socialize the victims of this condition.

It is tragic that these infants are born with the effects of FAS, but what is even more tragic is that this can be prevented through simple awareness. Widespread education including mandatory labelling of all Canadian alcohol products would be a significant step in the right direction.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, this past September, the government cancelled the memorandum of understanding on exports of our softwood lumber to the U.S. and told us it was on solid footing in doing so.

As we all know, the MOU which was signed in 1986 called for a 15 per cent surtax on our lumber entering the American market. Yet within one month of the decision, the Americans lost the countervailing duty investigation and imposed measures which reinstated the 15 per cent tax for the provinces of Ontario, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

In other words, it took the U.S. one month to negate what it took us five years to do. This tax has devastated many communities in northern Ontario that rely on lumber for their survival.

While the government is spouting its glowing praise for free trade, it is allowing the Americans to dictate to us what our policy should be. Thousands of people find themselves in unemployment lines because of it.

Whatever happened to the secure access we were supposed to get with the free trade agreement? Indeed, if the government felt that it was on a solid footing in cancelling the MOU, why has it not responded in a more forceful manner to yet another attempt of harassment by the United States?

It is time that we started living up to the free trade agreement, the same way the Americans are.

DEGRASSI TALKS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I am shocked by the statistics published recently on alcohol and drug use among teenagers. At the same time, it is comforting to watch a program such as Degrassi Talks. Seventy-four per cent of Canadian teenagers drink alcohol. Year after year, the primary cause of death among teenagers is drunk driving. Some 1,200 Canadians die each year because of drug abuse. In the program Degrassi Talks, you can see a 17-year-old former alcoholic relate her struggle, as well as a 20-year-old paraplegic tell how he was hit by a drunk driver. By discussing topics such as those in an open and frank manner, the actors and production team directly help young Canadians and their parents.

Mr. Speaker, I congratulate them on their good work, and I congratulate Health and Welfare Canada and Minister Benoît Bouchard on sponsoring this useful project.

VELLUPPILLAI JEYARAHAH

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, a Sri Lankan Tamil, Mr. Velluppillai Jeyarahah, is scheduled for deportation today. I am appealing to the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Secretary of State for External Affairs for clemency in this case. If Mr. Jeyarahah is returned to Sri Lanka, he is destined to die.

Mr. Jeyarahah came to Canada in 1989 and made a claim to be a convention refugee. At the initial inquiry, he was found to have both the eligibility criteria and the credible basis for his claim.

Ultimately, his request was denied and the leave to appeal to the Federal Court of Canada was dismissed. Mr. Jeyarahah has not made claim to the Minister of Employment and Immigration, apparently because he was ignorant of this final avenue for clemency.

Easily attainable human rights information on Sri Lanka states that this man, who is a Tamil male between the ages of 15 and 35, and who professes Hinduism will be considered a potential militant.

Having just returned from a human rights fact-finding mission to Sri Lanka, I can say that Mr. Jeyarahah faces certain death if he is returned.

I ask the minister: Please, on humanitarian grounds, give Mr. Jeyarahah a chance at life. This deportation must be stopped today.

ASSEMBLY OF FIRST NATIONS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, for several years this government has tried to undermine, circumvent and even dismantle the Assembly of First Nations.

During the 1985 constitutional round, the Nielsen report questioned whether the AFN spoke for its members and proposed cutting its funding.

Five years later the Mulroney government cut AFN core funding by 100 per cent.

In my three years in Parliament, I have watched the government refuse to meet with AFN on the budget, on specific claims issues, on post-secondary education, and on land claims issues.

• (1410)

If you recognize an aboriginal right of self-government, you have to deal with aboriginal representatives on a government-to-government basis. This means accepting the legitimacy of duly elected aboriginal leaders. It means not concluding agreements affecting First Nations without their consent.

Rather than questioning the legitimacy of the AFN leadership or threatening to exclude them from the constitutional process, perhaps the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs should request an election to see whether he speaks for more than 12 per cent of Canadians.

COMMENTS BY OVIDE MERCREDI

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, recent comments by Ovide Mercredi are deeply offensive to Quebec. He misrepresented the facts, both in Ottawa and Quebec City, which is unacceptable on the part of a political leader in the present context. Quebeckers exist as a people and, as such, are not a threat to any other nation or people.

In 1985, under the government of René Lévesque, the Quebec National Assembly passed a resolution recognizing the existence of aboriginal nations. Experts in international law have all recognized Quebec's territory. The Quebec nation includes everyone living in Quebec, and the rights of aboriginal nations will be recognized under the constitution of a sovereign Quebec.

The ignorance, bad faith and contempt shown by Mr. Mercredi have no place in the current debate.

TAXATION

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, a number of constituents in my riding sent me a letter in which they deplored the federal Income Tax Act.

S. O. 31

According to a study published in 1989 by Statistics Canada, 69 per cent of married couples with children under 18 had an average disposable income that was $1,670 lower than if they had not been married to their spouse.

A committee on the family has been created by the Canadian government. The hon. member for Calgary North has proposed that the Minister of Finance introduce a new federal fiscal strategy for families, a proposal that is highly commendable. In fact, I was involved in the work done by the Conservative caucus on this matter.

Many family and religious organizations have criticized the present tax system as unfair, complex and inconsistent, especially in the way it taxes families.

I hope that in the next federal budget, the Minister of Finance will introduce a new federal fiscal strategy for families.

TOBACCO

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, tobacco is a killer. Each year it takes the lives of 38,000 of our sons, daughters, wives, husbands, and parents. What shameful waste.

This carnage is helped along by the tobacco smugglers who deal in a cut-rate murderous product. For the sake of health, hurrah for yesterday's proposed new $1 per package export tax on Canadian cigarettes. Hurrah, as well, for high fines for smugglers. But as usual, this cash-starved government has dealt with the symptoms and not the cure.

I urge the government to take some of the billions of dollars collected in cigarette taxes and return them to the people who are addicted.

Fund workshops, counselling, toll-free help lines for those trying to break free. Fund nation-wide public education campaigns. Help smokers to quit. I tell this government: Do not just take their money and then turn your back.

HALTON—PEEL SURVEY

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I recently conducted a survey in my constituency and received thousands of comments from citizens.

Alexander Burke of Burlington writes: "Like the Japanese and Swedes and Swiss, we need to build a social contract between government, labour and business to form an us-against-the-world team. We are too confrontational and while we all defend our rights and fight among ourselves, there are other nations and groups taking over the economic world".

This is a theme shared by Ian Graham, a business owner in Inglewood, Ontario. His advice is this: "Hang tough on the budget, get your financial house in order and tell the straight goods. Like the Japanese foreign minister said, our workers are lazy and 30 per cent illiterate. Let's not avoid the issue. Canadians have grown soft from decades of living off our natural resources".

My constituents have a great deal of wisdom to impart and it is my honour to bring their words to this House.

TOBACCO

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, it is not often that an opposition member can rise in this place and say that this government has done something that is appropriate and essential. But I am doing so today because the government has announced it will impose an export tax of $8 a carton to stop cigarettes from being smuggled back into Canada.

The smuggling of Canadian cigarettes from the United States has become an international racket which has promoted organized crime, undercut small Canadian retailers and undermined government revenues and anti-smoking campaigns.

A coalition of eight health groups and I have repeatedly called for an export tax of $10 a carton. In November, the minister of privatization said export taxes were not being considered. However, by February 3 the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance said our proposal was being reviewed.

The government has now imposed an $8 export tax despite strong pressure from the tobacco lobby. It is not the full amount we wanted, but eight out of ten is not bad.

I congratulate the Minister of National Revenue and the government.

INCO

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, a one cent increase in the value of the Canadian dollar results in a $14 million sales decrease for our giant nickel producer Inco and puts the jobs of its 9,800 employees in jeopardy.

Inco, like all Canadian exporters, can to some extent at least to control its productivity and its labour costs, but it has no control whatsoever over the value of the Canadian dollar.

When the free trade agreement was signed, the Canadian dollar was worth 76 cents U.S. Today it is worth 85 cents U.S. When the free trade agreement was signed the spread between the Canadian and U.S. interest rates was less than 2 percentage points. Today it is almost 3 percentage points.

Sure we have problems with labour costs and productivity, but we cannot solve those in the short run. We can, however, lower the value of our dollar by reducing the spread between Canadian and U.S. interest rates.

Canadians can adjust to the free trade agreement. Canadians can compete. But we must have a level playing field as far as the value of the Canadian dollar is concerned. We appear to be our own worst enemy.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

TRADE

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Everyone knows that Canadian farmers are the sacrificial lambs in an insane trade war between the United States and Europe. Now Canada has become the whipping boy in an absurd trade war between Japan and the United States.

The United States has decided to hit back at Japan by slapping a duty on Honda cars built in Canada. This is crazy. The government acts as if it was dealing with a technical problem when what we are watching is hardball politics in which Canada is being made the victim.

Does the Deputy Prime Minister even understand what is going on? If he does, can he do a little bit better than yesterday's mealy-mouthed statement that the trade minister was ascertaining the facts?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, we agree with the hon. member that this is indeed a serious situation. We believe the audit that has been done on Honda was not done according to the rules of the FTA. We have made representations to the United States and will continue to do so.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question was directed to the Deputy Prime Minister because this is a matter that affects Canada's ability to export its cars to the United States. I am waiting for his answer.

On June 18, in this House, the Leader of the Opposition asked what the government intended to do to prevent Americans from imposing tariffs on Honda cars built in Canada. At the time, the government claimed it had the situation under control and even accused the Leader of the Opposition of scare tactics. Yesterday, eight months later, the Minister of Finance said that he was trying to evaluate the situation. Why didn't the Minister of Finance do his job eight months ago?

[English]

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member, we made our objections to the United States as recently as February 12. We had a special note delivered to the United States on this particular issue.

As the member knows, we have already launched one panel on mortgage interest and we are considering launching others.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, once again the great powers of Canada are falling on deaf ears.

I direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister because this is an issue that touches the livelihood of every auto worker in Canada.

The American presidential primaries start next week and candidates are falling all over themselves to see who can be the toughest on Japan, but Japan has strong leadership and instead Canada is being caught in the squeeze. While the government tries to get its act together, will the Deputy Prime Minister ensure that similar action is not taken against Canadian made Toyota, Suzuki, Hyundai or even GM products. Will he give us that assurance?

• (1420)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. colleague has just indicated to the hon. member, we disagree with the interpretation of the U.S. customs audit. We have served notice to that effect. We have done so in the form of a diplomatic note.

The most fortunate part of this is the fact that we do have a dispute resolving mechanism under the free trade agreement. The hon. member's leader wants to tear that agreement up. At least we have a fair and balanced method by which we can sort this out in an objective fashion.

As the minister pointed out, we have already launched an action under the disputes resolving mechanism under the free trade agreement and we will launch others if necessary.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Canadian workers should not have to wait for up to three years for a panel to tell Americans that they should not be doing this sort of thing to Canadian exports.

The government said the reason we needed a free trade deal with the Americans in the first place was so that we would not have this kind of harassment.

Now that the Americans have set a precedent with Honda of Canada, what is to stop them from having this same kind of investigation and slapping the same kind of duties on cars made in Canada by the North American big three? For that matter, what is to stop them from doing this to any product of any kind made in Canada and destined for export to the United States?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, there has never been any way that any country could be stopped from launching these kinds of investigations. The only thing that is different and which hon. members on the other side do not want to acknowledge is that now we have chapter 18 under the free trade agreement where we can launch a legitimate appeal.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, chapter 18 is cold comfort to the 1,500 workers at Honda in Alliston. Yesterday the Minister for International Trade assured us he would be approaching the Americans on this Honda issue "once he had ascertained the facts". The facts are clear. One is that the minister should have approached the Americans on this Honda issue eight months ago.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister this. Has the Minister for International Trade spoken personally to U.S. trade representative Carla Hills about this Honda matter and has he pressed Canada's case vigorously? Why can the Deputy Prime Minister not tell us that the case has been resolved and we have nothing more to be concerned about, instead of the empty words of the Minister of State.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of that question is yes, the minister has spoken to the minister from the United States.

In answer to the second part of his question, we continue to press the United States on the issue. We believe it is not of concern because rules of origin should be settled under the free trade agreement.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. There are new signs today of just how grim things are in the Canadian economy.

For the fourth time in four months manufacturing output has dropped sharply. In fact, employment in manufacturing has not been this low since October 1972 and the government's action today in pushing the bank rate up a further 13 basis points is just going to make things worse.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance this. Is the government prepared to let Canada become an industrial wasteland or will it stop the ruinous increase in interest rates which keeps our dollar high and puts our people out of work?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not know where the hon. member has been over the last number of months. He knows that interest rates have fallen by about 7 percentage points since the high of May 1990. There has been considerable easing in monetary conditions, both on the interest rate side and the exchange rate side.

While there is some volatility in the markets at the present time, I think the hon. member would recognize that interest rates have come down, are staying down, and monetary conditions have moderated substantially.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure where the Minister of Finance has been. I have been here in this country where there are 1.5 million people out of work, where the interest rate has gone up for the past three weeks consistently, week after week.

We have seen the Bank of Canada raise that interest rate. Yesterday the Economic Council of Canada said that this manufacturing decline will continue unless the government stresses training people, yet government documents show that big cuts are planned for many job training programs.

Will the government take the advice of its own former minister and ambassador for disarmament, Doug Roche, cut the defence budget by 10 per cent and reallocate this money to training programs that will put people back to work and rebuild our manufacturing sector.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should be reminded of the fact that Canada has the third lowest interest rates of all the G–7 countries.

The only two countries that have lower interest rates than Canada among the G–7 countries are the United States and Japan. Our intention is to get at the root causes of high interest rates by bringing inflation and inflationary pressures down. We have been somewhat successful, thanks to the efforts of the Canadian people and the workers of Canada. We now have a situation where there has been considerable monetary easing which should provide the basic groundwork for recovery.

The hon. member also knows very well that the Conference Board of Canada reported that of all the G–7 countries, Canada will have the best growth rate and the best recovery in 1992. It also pointed out the very serious difficulties that face the economies of all the industrialized world, particularly those of the G–7. It is a world-wide situation but Canada is well positioned.

I might also indicate further to an earlier question that automobile sales in the month of January have shown a 14 per cent increase over the month of December. That should be encouraging.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, the minister suggests that we have the third lowest interest rates and then points out that those countries that have lower interest rates are the very countries, the United States and Japan, with which we compete. Those are the countries that are important in this calculation.

[Translation]

I have a supplementary for the minister. The manufacturing sector has been hurting ever since this government came to power. The number of jobs in manufacturing is at its lowest ebb since 1972. When will the minister do something to get us out of the present economic recession that is affecting the entire country?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member indicates that two of the countries that we compete very vigorously against are the United States and Japan. That is quite true.

The Conference Board of Canada is convinced that we are going to compete quite well. The board points out in the growth projections for 1992 that Canada will have a 3.2 per cent real rate of growth, the United States 2.1 per cent, Japan 3 per cent, France 2.3 per cent, Germany 1.5 per cent, Italy 2 per cent and the United Kingdom 1.5 per cent. That is not a real satisfactory rate of growth, but it certainly is much better than the countries with which we compete. I indicate to the hon. member that while we share the concern that he has raised in the House of Commons, this is a world-wide situation. Canada is not alone in this situation. We are looking at a number of initiatives. As I have indicated on previous occasions, we have addressed the problems in the transportation sector.

• (1430)

Mr. Speaker: I think we should move on.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Revenue.

Yesterday the minister announced measures to reduce cross-border shopping. These measures only address the symptoms, not the disease. The major reason why Canadians are flooding to the United States is excessive taxation at home. The GST, the "go south tax", is forcing Canadians across the border while jobs and businesses are being lost here.

The minister should abandon his strong arm tactics in trying to get the provinces to harmonize their taxes with the GST. Why will the minister not at least lower the GST immediately with no strings attached?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I do not know where the hon. member has been but the package that we announced yesterday, if he has read this morning's clippings, will show that shoppers get a tax break from Ottawa. "Duties ditched to fill shops", "Stores hail tariff cuts on imports", "Ottawa cuts import duties", "Look for bargains", "Duties slashed $60 million", "Tax cuts will keep shoppers at home". That is what we are doing for the consumers, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont-Dundas): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the same minister. Yesterday, when the minister announced his program to crack down on cross-border shopping, he said that he would not introduce any additional taxes. Cross-border shopping is a symptom, a reaction—I would even say a Canadian revolt—against the tax burden imposed by this government. To stop this exodus, will the minister lower the disastrous goods and services tax?

[English]

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the point I made yesterday, which I confirmed today, is that there are no new or additional taxes for Canadian consumers shopping in Canada. In fact, we have reduced taxes by the elimination of tariffs on some 25 popular products, from VCRs to cameras and sporting goods. In fact, we have moved in a direction which has levelled the playing field and which has prompted business people from coast to coast, such as Steve Kahler, General Manager of Bleeker Stereo & TV Ltd. who said yesterday as a result of the announcement:

> This means we could end up selling goods cheaper than in the United States. This is really good news. Maybe the tables will turn and we will have Americans coming to Canada to shop in Canada.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, today the bank rate went up 13 basis points. This is taking place at the same time as our unemployment is increasing to 10.4 per cent. It is taking place at the same time that we are losing thousands upon thousands of manufacturing jobs. As a matter of fact, over the past three years Canada has lost 325,000, or 15 per cent, of all its manufacturing jobs.

Will the Minister of Finance tell us this: Why is he deliberately increasing the interest rates to keep the dollar up, to keep it artificially high, because it is driving jobs south?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated earlier, the exchange markets have been volatile over the last week or so. It has put upward pressure on the domestic money market rates. The hon. member knows very well that there has been considerable monetary easing, both on the interest rate side and on the exchange rate side. The hon. member knows very well that the Bank of Canada intervenes only to smooth out any erratic fluctuations.

What we are seeing here are the forces of the market at play. The hon. member is quite familiar with that.

MAIL ORDER INDUSTRY

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the Minister of National Revenue.

The U.S. charges Canadian companies $10 on mail order sales to U.S. customers. Under its new measures announced yesterday, this government charges American companies only $5 for mail order sales to Canadians. Why is this government giving a 100 per cent cost advantage to American companies?

The minister may have a family firm in Buffalo but he has no right to drive more and more Canadian jobs—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): My hon. friend never ceases to surprise me. He is talking about the service fee imposed by the post office on a cost recovery basis. Because of the business plan that has been imposed by this government and the post office in this country, the post office in Canada is far more efficient than in the United States. Therefore we can charge a lower fee for Canadians.

TRADE

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address this question through the Speaker who will be receiving a much deserved honour in Vancouver on Friday night.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member, but the question had better be in order.

Mr. Barrett: Last week and earlier this week I had several occasions to rise in this House to ask specific questions of the minister of trade relative to information access for members of this House and for the media to the draft bracketed treaty of the U.S.–Mexico free trade agreement pending.

Is the Acting Prime Minister willing to give this House and the press in Canada exactly the same access that the U.S. Congress has had to these documents? The Mexican Senate and the Mexican press have had two briefings and access to the documents. Is the government prepared to give exactly the same information briefings and access that both the senators in Mexico and the Congress members in the United States have had?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, the Minister for International Trade has stated in this House on many occasions that he is quite prepared to give a confidential briefing to members of the committee any time they ask for it.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, that is not the question that I asked. I am aware of the minister's offer.

The Mexican Senate and the Mexican press have access to this information. I have a letter from a Mexican senator detailing exactly what the Mexican Senate was briefed on and what the Mexican press was briefed on. We also have a note from a U.S. committee determining that there is no absolute confidentiality on the briefings in the United States.

I repeat: Is this government prepared to give exactly the same access to these documents that was given to the Mexican senators, the Mexican press and the U.S. Congress as the documents I have show?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, I would think that the reasonable thing for the hon. member to do is to first accept the minister's offer of the briefing and then take it from there. So far that offer has not been accepted.

Mr. Barrett: Yes or no?

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Last Friday the Minister for International Trade told the House that he had not received any request from farm organizations for an impact study on the Dunkel proposals in the GATT negotiations.

Can the Deputy Prime explain why the minister told the House that when he knows full well that the president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, Ralph Jespersen, wrote to the minister on January 10 to ask on an urgent basis for an impact analysis on the Dunkel proposals, and what impact that would have on Canadian agriculture.

Why did the minister tell the House that he had not received a request when he full well had?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that the question that was answered by the Minister for International Trade was a question relating to the supply management agencies.

The agencies, as the hon. member knows, are not the Canadian Federation of Agriculture.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture is a massive umbrella organization.

In his letter, Mr. Jespersen said: "We are urgently requesting that your department make available to us its analysis of the potential impacts of the proposal on Canadian agricultural industry".

Thousands and thousands of farmers are fearful today that they are going to lose their farms, their livelihood, everything. I wonder why the minister and why the government are hamming around. Why is the government not making available immediately this impact analysis that the Canadian Federation of Agriculture has asked for.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has to understand, and I know he does, that agencies which represent the supply managed industries have had a great deal of difficulty in coming to grips with efforts to stay united in presenting their front and their common cause. As you know, Mr. Speaker, as I am sure the hon. member does, agencies which have asked the government if it could provide information and we have agreed, provided they would work with us co-operatively, have said that they will only be able to make a decision after February 18.

Those agencies are having a difficult time arriving at a conclusion among themselves.

HIBERNIA

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for my good friend, the Deputy Prime Minister, about the Hibernia project.

He will probably know that one of the remaining Hibernia partners, Chevron, indicated yesterday that pulling out of the development altogether is an option for Chevron.

His colleague, the minister of energy, will be in Newfoundland tomorrow to deal with this Hibernia issue. I want to ask the minister what the government hopes to achieve by tomorrow's meetings in St. John's. Is it to keep the project intact? Is it to delay the project, or is it to back away from the project altogether?

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the minister of energy is in the province of Newfoundland today meeting with the premier of the province and the minister of energy. All companies involved in the project will be meeting tomorrow and at that time, discussions will be held.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I thank the parliamentary secretary for repeating essentially what I said in the question. I want to put a supplementary to the Deputy Prime Minister.

He will know that his colleague, the minister of energy, said he foresees some delay in the project. He will also know that his other colleague from Newfoundland, the minister of fisheries, has said: "No. Business as usual. The minister of energy does not know what he is talking about". Now his colleague in the back benches there adds further to the confusion.

Does the Deputy Prime Minister not feel some obligation, given the great concern in Newfoundland over this issue, to send a clear signal on this issue? I will give him the opportunity to send this signal. More to the point, is the government still firmly committed to this project? What is it prepared to do to see it through to its completion?

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, this government has been committed from day one in this project. The involvement of the companies and their meetings tomorrow are critical to the future of this project.

TAXATION

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The present tax system is unfair, complex and inconsistent, especially in the way it taxes families. A number of constituents in my riding sent me a letter in which they indicated that 69 per cent of married couples with children under 18 had an average disposable income that was $1,670 lower than if they had not been married to their spouse. Is the minister prepared to say whether his officials are examining a new federal strategy for family taxation and whether we can expect the details in the next federal budget?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member and other hon. members who have been working on this committee headed by the hon. member for Calgary North looking into the taxation of families for the very good work that they have done.

We have had the opportunity of meeting with the committee and officials have been examining a number of their recommendations.

I can assure the hon. member that we are taking their recommendations seriously, as we have taken other recommendations seriously in the context of the pre-budget consultation. The answer to the hon. member is yes.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

Mexico's bad record on human rights has not improved in the past year according to this week's report of the Inter-Church Committee on Human Rights in Latin America. They point to fraud and violence in elections and against democratic union movements and institutional torture by the police of Mexico.

Will the Acting Prime Minister assure this House that Canada will not sign a North American free trade agreement until such time as there is international verified progress in respect for human rights in Mexico, including free and fair elections, in keeping with the headlines that the Prime Minister won for supporting democracy and human rights in Paris?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, we are aware of the hon. member's concern in this area. Other members are concerned about environment and other such things.

As he probably knows, discussions are going on among the three countries about all of these issues.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

In order to encourage better practice of human rights, I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister if this government will invite Mexican and U.S. governments to send electoral and human rights observers to Canada before and during our elections in return for a matching invitation to the Canadian government to send electoral observers to their elections?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I am certain the Secretary of State for External Affairs would be pleased to take the member's suggestion under advisement. I will be sure that she is informed of his views in this matter.

PENSIONS

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

A few moments ago the Speaker of the Senate ruled that a private member's bill which had been passed unanimously by this House on a recorded vote and which—

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. I am having some difficulty with the question. It refers to matters in the other place. Perhaps the hon. member can put the question on a substantive basis and leave out the references to which he has been alluding.

Mr. Redway: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

A short time ago this House passed unanimously a private member's bill which provided that late applicants be allowed to receive Canada Pension Plan disability pensions.

That matter is now in question as a result of developments in other places. I would like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare if the government would immediately move to introduce a government bill similar to the private member's bill so that some 4,000 disabled Canadians can receive the disability pensions that they have already paid for?

Mr. Speaker: Before the minister answers, I just want to observe that, with the co-operation of the Chair, genius will out.

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): You will allow me, Mr. Speaker, to pay tribute to my colleague on the right for his great compassion and tireless dedication to protecting those in need. That being said, I was with the Minister of National Health and Welfare at the latest federal-provincial meeting and at that time he received the authorization and approval of the provinces. He will correct that anomaly and to this end an important amendment should be introduced as early as the beginning of next week.

ELECTORAL REFORM AND PARTY FINANCING

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the government House leader. What does he propose to do with the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing that were tabled this morning in the House?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): As the hon. member I am sure is aware, on matters like this which affect all of us equally as elected representatives, we would want to have the views of members from all sides of the House. Therefore, we will be referring the royal commission report to a committee of this House as soon as we get the committee established. We anxiously look forward to their recommendations.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the same minister.

Will the minister advise the House what schedule he is planning to ensure that the committee reports in time for the next election? Will he undertake to provide support for the bill should the committee propose a unanimous report to this House?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the one thing that students of this institution know very well is that delays in proceeding with legislation seldom occur from this side of the House.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Andre: I am appreciative of what I hope is a commitment from the other side that on this piece of legislation that at least they will be interested in assisting the government.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Communications. Citing selected figures which he called staggering and devastating, John Crispo, a member of the CBC board of directors, implied that official bilingualism is working against unilingual English Canadians in their hope and wish of getting high level federal jobs.

An hon. member: Nonsense.

Mr. Gauthier: That is not true. We know that. Will the government explain how it can tolerate having an outspoken critic on important government policy affecting national unity as a member of a board of directors of a Canadian corporation as important as the CBC.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the government's position with regard to bilingualism is abundantly clear. We support bilingualism. We support equity within the Public Service to ensure that all peoples have a fair opportunity of having employment in the Public Service.

Mr. Crispo's comments were made not as a representative of the CBC, but as a private individual on a private broadcasting outlet.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. This matter has been raised before in the House. As a consequence, with the co-operation of all hon. members, there was some indication that if properly pursued, the question could be put. The hon. minister is trying to answer the question. I think that after all we have put into this, hon. members owe it to the minister to listen to the answer.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I would underscore the fact that in this instance, Mr. Crispo was speaking as a private individual on a private broadcasting outlet. It would be a remarkable change from the traditions of this Parliament and of government if we were required to censor the personal views of appointees to Crown corporations, government boards and commissions.

One of the things that makes Canada such a wonderful place to live in is that we have freedom of speech, including the freedom of speech of individual citizens to disagree with the position of the Government of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, since the minister says that the government does not endorse John Crispo's divisive statements on official languages, an important government policy, will he ask John Crispo to resign from his position as a director of the CBC?

[English]

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the implications of doing what the hon. member would suggest would be of interrogating members of all boards, commissions and Crown corporations with regard to their points of view. If they disagreed with the position of the Government of Canada, they would be rendered ineligible to serve as members of boards of Crown corporations. That obviously would be a form of censorship which would not be acceptable to Canadians.

The government's position is clear. We have consistently supported bilingualism in Canada. We have consistently taken the position that all Canadians must be treated with equity and we have consistently taken a position in favour of freedom of speech in Canada.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Agriculture. Some time ago, Canadian farmers and milk producers received a message from the government, signed by the minister and some of his colleagues, which said that Canada's supply management system was not for sale and would not be bartered. The government would not abandon a system that was recognized and respected by all its trading partners abroad, because it was an essential part of its long-term agricultural policy.

Are the signatures of the minister and his colleagues still worth something? Are their signatures worth more than the paper they are written on?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, we spent most of the time yesterday discussing this matter, and I believe that last night, parliamentarians on all sides of the House decided to firmly support the government's position at the GATT talks. I believe I am not being partisan if I say that for the past two years the federal government has fielded a position that was developed jointly with Canadian farmers. We supported that position, we defended it, and we continue to do so. I think that deserves to be said, and I am convinced that even people who have a different vision of Canada should fully support what we are doing at GATT.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, farmers don't want to hear about the position that has been discussed for the past two years. They all know it by heart. What they want to know about is the results and whether you stand by your commitment. Do you intend to abide by that commitment, and when the time comes to sign the final agreement, will you refuse to sign any agreement at GATT that threatens supply management? Yes or no?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I don't need any lessons from the associate of a former minister who, when he was minister in 1984, was unable to come up with a long-term dairy policy for Canadian farmers. We put that policy in place as soon as we were elected, and we maintained the supply management system. Furthermore, I think our position is quite clear, and Canadian farmers know our position. We will continue to defend it, bearing in mind, and this is important, that because of the present wording of article XI, our yogurt and ice cream are threatened as a result of a GATT ruling. That is why the status quo is unacceptable and why we must seek a new version of article XI. So that is what we are doing, Mr. Speaker, and I would urge the hon. member to support us in that endeavour.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. As the minister knows, a review is taking place within his department at the moment of immigration rules and, indeed, beyond that. The minister will know the medical and scientific community opposes mandatory testing of potential immigrants for AIDS and HIV and that the Department of National Health and Welfare opposes mandatory testing as well.

There is some concern that the review might lead to a recommendation that mandatory testing should be introduced. Will the minister confirm today that no matter what the review process says, he will not permit mandatory testing for HIV and AIDS of potential new immigrants to Canada.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is referring to a purely hypothetical question. If there ever becomes a need to consider that question, the government will do it in consultation with all concerned.

ELECTORAL REFORM

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question relating to the question from the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands on the report today on electoral reform. I understand from the minister's answer it is going to be referred to committee. I have not read the report, therefore I want to hold my rights about a point of privilege. I understand in a general way that the report confirms my position, about which I wrote to the minister. I have had the courtesy of replies from several ministers that there is a very fundamental discrimination against independents collecting money because they cannot give receipts until the writ is issued.

• (1500)

I really hope that the House leader can confer with the other House leaders to remedy that problem before we get involved in the other issues so that we will not have to try to prevent the raising of all money for all parties.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): The hon. member has written to me on this issue and I generally agree with him. He should not be embarrassed about not having read the report. It was just tabled at ten o'clock and is a thousand pages. There is a lot of material there.

I hear the hon. member's representation. I certainly will pass it on to the committee.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. A few moments ago the minister said in reply to a question by the member for Algoma in regard to the impact study of the Dunkel proposal that none had been requested by the five agencies in question.

How then can the minister explain the letter that I have in hand, written to him or to the minister of international trade, asking the very thing, signed by Louis Balcaen, president of the Dairy Farmers of Canada? The letter states:

> I am writing to you on behalf of Dairy Farmers of Canada, the Canadian Broiler Hatching Egg Marketing Agency, the Canadian Chicken Marketing Agency, the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency—

Is this not slightly at odds with what the minister said, to put it kindly?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): It may be, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member will not believe this, but occasionally people change their position.

A meeting was held on January 22 with representatives of the Canadian Chicken Marketing Agency, the Canadian Turkey Marketing Agency, Canadian Egg Marketing Agency, Canadian Broiler Hatching Marketing Agency, at which time they were provided with the revised tariff equivalents.

These were discussed on a preliminary basis with the intention of a meeting to follow on January 28 or 29. The dairy farmers of Canada were also to be present at that time. However, the agencies decided not to discuss this issue any further with government officials until after February 18.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. Yesterday the minister unveiled a number of weapons in his war against cross-border shopping. One of them was the potential harmonization of the GST with provincial sales taxes. The federal government now wants to collect both at the border.

Can the minister tell us what possible benefit there would be to Canadian consumers and how does he address charges that this is a tax increase in disguise?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I repeat and emphasize that there is no tax increase for Canadian consumers in the package that was announced yesterday. As far as the specific question is concerned regarding harmonization, obviously harmonization makes common sense. It will eliminate duplication of services, duplication and overlap of programs. One tax, one system is the way to go. The Ontario fiscal outlook tabled a couple of weeks ago by the Ontario NDP government confirms it. It says: "A key difference is the taxation of business. The GST by providing business input tax credits has basically exempted businesses from federal sales tax while Ontario taxes businesses. Broadening the sales tax base or harmonizing could improve economic efficiency for Ontario".

I urge the province of Ontario and other provinces to harmonize as quickly as possible for the benefit of all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: I draw the attention of hon. members to the presence in the gallery of the Hon. Harold Gilleshammer, Minister of Family Services of the Manitoba Legislative Assembly.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the government House leader pertaining to the business of the House for tomorrow, Monday, Tuesday, and the remaining part of next week.

Perhaps, Madam Speaker, while the hon. member is on his feet he might indicate to the House in reference to a question that was put to him by the hon. member for Don Valley East concerning the bill in the other place as to when we might see a tabling of complementary legislation in this House for adjudication by members here.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, in terms of business, I trust we will complete second reading of Bill C-26 this afternoon. After that we will be able to commence and hopefully complete second reading of Bill C-41, the energy efficiency act.

I would like to at this point designate tomorrow an allotted day for supply. It is my intention, but I would like to confirm tomorrow, to designate Monday an allotted day as well.

On Tuesday we will begin second reading on an act respecting spending control of government expenditures which will be given first reading tomorrow. In terms of the bill on the amendments to the Canada Pension Plan affecting the disabled, I will put down a notice for that this afternoon.

I believe the bill would be in a position to be brought forward tomorrow but in view of the notice provisions of our Standing Orders, I would require unanimous consent to have it introduced tomorrow. If that were the disposition of the House, I believe we would be in a position to do that. I will have to confirm that with the ministry of health.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, with regard to the tabling of the bill concerning the disabled, I would like to indicate that he can expect and anticipate full co-operation from the Official Opposition to have this particular matter moved expeditiously within this Chamber after it is tabled in the House.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, to my hon. colleague, the government House leader. I wonder if he is able today to indicate when the budget will be introduced.

Mr. Andre: Soon, Madam Speaker. The precise date I am not able to give now, but hopefully the Minister of Finance will be in a position to give the precise time very soon.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

PUBLIC SERVICE REFORM ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Loiselle that Bill C-26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee H.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, when speaking to the bill, the minister responsible for this bill, the President of the Treasury Board, said and I quote from page 6777 of Hansard for February 11, 1992:

> Seldom in our history has a program of organizational change been undertaken of the scope and magnitude of PS 2000.

Further in his speech he said, as reported at page 6778:

> I would urge that the committee report back to the House by the end of March. There will be ample opportunity to consider improvements to the bill and I am confident that members will put aside differences and take full advantage of this window of opportunity.

Again this morning we had the parliamentary secretary to the minister stand up in the House and say that he was hoping that in committee the Official Opposition would bring amendments to this bill for discussion. We intend to do that. I just hope the government is in a good mood, a positive mood, an understanding mood because there are amendments needed to this bill and we intend to bring them forward.

We would have preferred that the government do the right thing in looking at this white paper dealing with PS 2000. It was our preferred choice that to avoid partisanship, to avoid misunderstanding, to avoid conflict, that the white paper be referred a special committee of the House or to a standing committee of the House of the government's own choosing for an all-party review of the white paper.

We could have a discussion on the principle as well as the substance of the bill. We could have come forth with an agreement in committee and brought to this House a piece of legislation that would have been more comprehensive, possibly better organized, and possibly better accepted than the present legislation before us, Bill C-26.

This bill, as the minister himself admitted in the House, is a very important undertaking. When we restructured the Public Service of Canada 25 or 35 years ago, the job was not taken up by the government itself. It invited all the opposition members to participate in the committee and a consensus was built up. Ever since then, whenever there were amendments to either the Public Service Employment Act or the Public Service Staff Relations Act, at least in my 19 years in the House, a committee of the House was struck before the legislation was put to the House. We examined the white paper and reported to the House with legislation to follow.

The last time there were amendments to the Public Service Staff Relations Act, the Finkelman report was referred to a special committee. I served on this committee. The Speaker and a lot of members also served. We had long and arduous meetings with Treasury Board, other interested people and the unions to try to bring about better employee-employer relations in the Public Service.

[Translation]

Here is a quote from page 90 in the white paper that we have before us regarding accountability: "Mechanical accountability based on simplistic, quantified objectives is not what is needed. Fundamental to effective accountability is the exercise of judgment".

Madam Speaker, I ask you: We, from the Opposition have not been involved in the development of the proposal before us, the preparation of the document. We are told that civil servants were involved, as well as unions. In the last two years, civil servants from departments such as Treasury Board and, I imagine, the Privy Council and even the Public Service Commission, have been involved in an important examination of the changes required.

And now the minister tells us: We are in a hurry; it has taken us, the government, two years to come up with a document that we consider useful but you, the Official Opposition, barely have two months to go through the stages of first reading, second reading, committee review of each section, and third reading. Those are the very words of the minister, who said at pages 6–7 and 7–8:

[English]

I would urge the committee to report back to the House by the end of March. It is my earnest desire that the bill receive third reading as soon as possible ".

[Translation]

We cannot accept the fact that the Opposition and the civil servants in general are faced with more or less a blunt refusal as regards the important issues that we wish to raise.

As we know, civil servants are worried right now. Their morale is rather low. Is this the right time to bulldoze this legislation through the House of Commons in two months, to go through committee and the whole parliamentary process in two months? Madam Speaker, I tell you that this is not possible; it is not right. We want to be heard, we want to hear the unions, we want to hear those who are affected, namely the civil servants.

The amendments included in Bill C–26 affect important institutions of the Parliament of Canada. How, for instance, can the Public Service Commission, which is an agent of this Parliament and which regularly reports to Parliament on its activities, remain impartial—I ask you that question—and free from any government interfering when its hands are tied with the principal adviser to the minister who, as we know, becomes the head of the Public Service?

We think that this appointment violates the autonomy of the Public Service Commission, which is to report only to Parliament, and thus casts doubt on its ability to defend the merit principle.

The public accounts committee, which I chair, has already taken a position on it. It has seriously proposed that a special all–party committee study the issue and not rush it by using the government majority to force its way. The public accounts committee, as I said, recommended a serious study before legislation is tabled.

I support some clauses of the bill which are meant to strengthen the Public Service; I support the ability of the Public Service to serve the general public and I support improved labour relations in it. We agree with that. However, I oppose the clauses of the bill that affect the merit principle. I think that they are not well explained and it is extremely difficult for us to accept them without clear and precise explanations. Madam Speaker, it will destabilize the public service, I tell you. It will probably cause us serious problems of public perception if the commission makes appointments that are not based solely on merit but on some other criterion.

I am disappointed with regard to certain barriers, including the political rights of public servants. God knows, we have talked about it in this House, and before every election, someone here sees some political advantages and raises the question. Why did the government not amend this bill so as to clearly indicate its policy on public servants' political rights? Nothing in the bill deals with that issue and I for one am disappointed.

The Auditor General of Canada said on page 25 of his annual report: "The reform and renewal of the federal Public Service in a time of global competitiveness, a time of change, is essential to enable it to meet the challenges that lie ahead". I agree with that. I see you indicating to me that my time is almost up.

I cannot support the bill in question. Therefore I move the following motion, seconded by the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester:

> That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "That" and substituting the following therefor:
> Bill C-26 be not now read a second time but that the Order be discharged, the Bill withdrawn and the subject matter referred to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

• (1520)

[English]

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Madam Speaker, I want to thank my colleague for moving his amendment. It is a good idea.

This is something that really should be looked at by a committee of the House and reported back. Then the government will have a better idea what should and should not be in legislation that so drastically affects the Public Service.

Maybe it is naive, but I have a wish, some experience and some knowledge that the most desirable kind of Public Service that can serve any government of any political stripe, no matter how often governments change, will conscientiously, diligently work in accordance with the policies of the government of the day.

I attended my first national convention of my party in Winnipeg in 1956 when we passed the Winnipeg declaration. I will remind my colleague from the Fraser Valley that the opening sentence in the declaration was that any society motivated only by a desire for profit is basically immoral. I hope he will keep that in mind in the future.

The guest speaker at that convention was the Hon. Richard Crossman of some fame and note in the Atlee government from 1945 to 1952. He was in government again the next time the Labour Party was elected.

I presume he has passed away now, but I recall him telling us that when they took office most of the cabinet ministers and MPs were first-timers. There were a few holdovers from the days of the Ramsay MacDonald government in the late 1920s and early 1930s. All the rest were relative newcomers.

He was appointed to cabinet and said he hardly knew where the washrooms were. He was frantically trying to set up a staff for his office and figure out the make-up of his department.

After he had been in cabinet four or five days, his senior deputy minister phoned and asked for an appointment for himself and two other senior officials of the department. They agreed on a time and day for them to meet. Of course the first thing that went through his mind was that they were going to resign.

When they met a day or two later the deputy minister laid two sets of documents on the minister's desk. He said that the first one contained the policy resolutions and statements of his party that affected his department. The other set of documents contained several options that he suggested be considered in implementing his policy on each of the issues. That is what I think anyone would call a responsible, disciplined, conscientious Public Service. Within a matter of 10 days of taking office, the new cabinet minister had senior people in his department outlining what the policy of his party was, because they kept track of those things in senior levels in their Public Service, and outlining one or more options for each of the policy matters which affected his department.

If only we could have that now and not this governing by the seat of your pants. Any political party that does not have policies which may or may not work—only experience will tell—or does not have a platform that it runs on and if it wins is expected to implement it, is not worthy of being in office.

Similarly, any senior levels of the Public Service that cannot conduct themselves in that manner are not worthy of being in the senior civil service. That is why I do not get excited when there is a change of government. I think it would be stupid if the new government fired all the deputy ministers and assistant deputies. You would be losing a wealth of experience and dedicated public servants for many years in most instances.

I have no problem with the firing of the people who are brought in on a contract to work on a minister's personal staff. I would not want anybody working for me who was not going to be helpful. If he cannot support the policies of my party and my government or if he cannot be helpful in implementing those policies then I would expect him to resign.

In the case of those on contract, serving on a minister's staff or appointed to a board or something or a commission, I can understand them being canned. You would not want anyone working for you who is going to work against you. I do not blame any new government for getting rid of those kinds of people, but to go around with a meat axe picking on the permanent, dedicated, competent Public Service is not only stupid but it is terribly unfair and unnecessary.

I would like to mention one of the things that we are proud of in Saskatchewan. Back in the 1950s it was felt necessary to establish a new university campus in our province, the University of Regina. The university at Saskatoon was getting too full, we needed more space and we obviously needed another campus. To begin with it was one campus under the University of Saskatoon and later it was divided into two separate campuses.

We are most proud of this university, thanks to a man who was minister of education for better than 16 years in our province. He was the architect of establishing, on the University of Regina campus, a faculty of public administration. It recruited former public servants not just from Saskatchewan, but found some public servants who were willing to leave the Public Service to teach at the Regina campus. The person responsible for that was Woodrow S. Lloyd. We started the beginnings of what was a truly professional Public Service and we were proud of it. When we were defeated in 1964, the new Liberal premier, Mr. Ross Thatcher said in the initial days of his government that they were going to go after the CCF appointees with a meat axe. However, wiser and saner heads prevailed because mainly he left the Public Service alone. He put some new ones in of his choice, which he had the right to do, but mainly he left the Public Service alone.

That is the sort of thing that should be in legislation regarding the federal Public Service. We do not need the Treasury Board deciding what a bargaining unit should or should not be. That is something to be decided between the Public Service unions and each department and then collectively report to the Treasury Board with a total package of what bargaining units there should be.

The bill can do nothing but harm to our present Public Service. It could be changed to bring about an even stronger, better and more professional Public Service rather than the government, through the back door, trying to accomplish things it would not dare do through the front door.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to speak on this bill, particularly when one considers the number of public servants who work in the riding of Moncton. A very large component of our economy is made up of public servants. For that reason it is important that I speak against the bill because it will have very serious consequences for all those who work for the government and ultimately for all Canadians who deal with the government in the future.

We on this side are of the House are of the opinion that it is necessary to go back to square one and start over again, that we cannot deal with this matter on the basis of Bill C–26. Obviously a special committee of Parliament should go back and take another firm look at the suggestions that have flowed from both the private sector and from the public sector. We could work out a better arrangement which would create a better Public Service in which those who are working within the system could feel that they are making a contribution rather than being cogs in a giant wheel.

I am sure my concerns are shared by this House. The government is dismantling the fabric of this country. We see the attack against things like VIA Rail, the CBC, the postal service and now we see an attack against the Public Service. We wonder what is going to be left when this government is finished with this vicious attack against the institutions which have held us together. My concern is that there may be nothing left if we allow this to continue.

The Public Service linkages between all parts of this country are absolutely essential. They go further than just providing essential services. It is essential that there is an efficient, hard working, dedicated Public Service that provides service equally to all Canadians in all parts of Canada. This bill will contribute nothing toward establishing that goal or that mission for the Public Service.

That is not to suggest that we are not interested in seeing change. There is no question that, as we embark on this new global economy and as we embark on the future, we on this side are not opposed to embracing change that is necessary. We must look at the fundamental shifts that are taking place in our economy, some of them not all that great as far as the shifts are concerned and are caused in large measure by government policy. At the same time we still must be responsive to a new, revitalized Public Service.

That is why we would like to take a new approach and to see a parliamentary committee really respond to the issues of the day.

There is no question in my mind that the present system in the Public Service does not work. The hierarchical system with everybody feeding into the top is an old system. It goes back to the smokestack–type industries.

For that reason, the Public Service does have to change and we do have to look at new ways of managing the Public Service. We have to make the Public Service responsive and also adaptive. There is going to be rapid change over the next 10 or 15 years and we cannot have a stiff, unresponsive type of system in place or else we will develop a system in which the Public Service will be an impediment to change and an impediment to development. In fact, in the long term it will create a very poor situation for our country.

How do you achieve that type of system? You do not do it through Bill C–26. You do it by working out a new partnership. It is really two partnerships and they overlap.

It is a partnership between the Public Service and the private sector. There are areas in which the private sector can do the job better. Then there are other areas in which the Public Service can do the task better. So we have to work out that partnership.

The second partnership we have to take a look at and work out is in the area of government and the employees, the actual individuals who are working for the Public Service.

I know in talking to a number of public servants that this government and its policies, the strike and all of those things have left a very demoralized Public Service. The Public Service is wondering what its role is and whether it is independent and not subject to the whims and fancies of different governments that happen to be in power at the time.

We have to go back and reforge that alliance between government and the Public Service so that confidence is built up, so those employees see that there is an opportunity to make a contribution to Canada and to provide the essential services that government must provide in an atmosphere in which the government, Canadians, and the employees benefit. That is not the situation now.

We saw the anger and we saw the frustration during the strike. No matter which side of the fence one sits on, one knows after a strike has occurred there is a lot of rebuilding that has to be done.

We on this side feel that a special committee that could take a look at this situation could reforge that new alliance between government and the Public Service and make for a better Public Service and a better relationship.

We look at the future and note that as industry is trying to adapt and change its philosophies and its directions, so must government.

We in this place talk of reform and the things that are necessary in order to make us more responsive and to make us more efficient.

By like measure, so must the people who actually deliver the things we create here. Like it or not, they must deliver what Parliament orders and in those circumstances we have to create the type of Public Service that can adapt to that very rapid change.

I am sure that there are those among the Public Service who are worried and reluctant to change and reluctant to look at the new measures and new methodologies as far as management is concerned in providing services. Deep down, I think that most in the Public Service are looking for the challenge and the opportunity which can be afforded them by a new revitalized partnership between the private sector, government and the Public Service.

In conclusion I should say that we cannot support this bill. There are some good aspects to it. There are some aspects that maybe would do the job.

But we feel, as a general statement and as a general point of view, that we have to go back to square one and take what is good in this legislation and work with the new arrangements and with a new understanding.

What would really do the trick, and I am sure all would agree with me, is if we had a new government which had credibility and could provide leadership, then I think you would see the Public Service respond in the proper fashion.

M. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Thank you, Madam Speaker, for allowing me to speak a second time on Bill C-26, An act to amend the Public Service Employment Act and the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

Government has released this wonderful white paper on the Public Service entitled: The Renewal of the Public Service of Canada. Allow me to read the first few words of the very first page, and I quote:

[English]

"The Public Service of Canada is fundamental to the successful functioning of our democratic institution and our country. It serves Canada ably and has contributed immeasurably to our stable economic and social environment, to our achievements of a modern industrial nation and to our values and indemnity as a people." Je saute quelques paragraphes et j'arrive à "Public Service 2000 is the government's initiative to ensure that these expectations are satisfied. We believe that the policy for renewal set out in the white paper will equip the Public Service to serve Canada and Canadians into the 21st century."

[Translation]

And it is signed by Brian Mulroney, the Prime Minister of Canada.

This is a fine white paper, fine words indeed. It should certainly be scrutinized by all interested parties, i.e. civil servants, unions, members of Parliament, government services' users in general. Everyone should have a chance to comment on the advisability of improving the legislation governing the Public Service.

The government has introduced a bill.

[English]

The law does not reflect the good mission that we see in the white paper. Compare both and all of this in the wake of what has been happening to the Public Service.

[Translation]

The fact is that the legislation governing the public service is almost 25 years old. It dates back to 1964 or 1967, and it is time we update it. I agree, but I think that the climate is not right, given the negative sentiment towards the Public Service at the present time. Picture this, an employer who prides himself on having reduced its workforce by 15,000 since 1985, an employer who contracts out instead of giving the work to his own employees, in a place—some government members refer to the headquarters of the Public Service as fat cat city—where all you hear about is deployment, an employer who gave zero per cent increase to his employees this year, a unique year that has seen the biggest strike in the history of the Public Service. There is a lot of uncertainty among the civil servants right now.

[English]

Managers have prepared the white paper for Public Service 2000 and obviously the government prepared Bill C-26 to change the law.

It did not seem to care to have the input in a non-partisan fashion by all members of Parliament in a committee that would make recommendations prior to having the second reading of this bill.

Concerning the mission of the Public Service, according to the white paper Public Service 2000 this bill goes against some of these very admirable principles. For example, it says in the mission: "—through members who are appointed and promoted on the basis of merit".

In Bill C-26 the merit principle is effectively gone. As seen in section 10(2), no longer will there be competition in the Public Service. Managers will now write job descriptions to suit the candidate of their choice. There are no safeguards against political and administrative patronage.

Again from the mission statement: "Representatives of the public and the regions of Canada". If the government was really interested in fully representing the Canadian public, as employees of the Public Service it would have made stronger its article on employment equity.

In Bill C-26 clause 5 states that Treasury Board may, I repeat, may provide for the administration of programs for the employment and career opportunities of the disadvantaged and groups that are disadvantaged by reason of race, sex, colour and so on. Why only may? Why do we use may provide?

A government that is serious about rectifying the situation which women, who by the way as every one knows represent well over 50 per cent of the population, the handicapped and our minorities find themselves today when it comes to obtaining employment and advancement in the Public Service would have put some teeth into this part of the bill.

From the mission statement: "—professionally manage and develop in accordance with the highest ethical standards". Does deployment, which means transfers—transfers by command, you are ordered transferred, you do not have a choice—and the constant threat of a position being transferred at the whim of a manager lend itself to a professionally managed Public Service?

This is not what employees are telling me in my riding of Carleton—Gloucester. They are worried and their morale is at an all-time low. They look forward to a totally management-driven Public Service.

None of these facts will help in attaining the very lofty goal of Public Service 2000, that of providing the best possible service to the Canadian people, while at the same time attracting Canada's best individuals to offer themselves for service to the public.

My constituents are very nervous. Most of my constituents are public servants or rely on the services of public servants. They feel extremely insecure. They feel annoyed by the way they are being treated by their employer. They feel afraid of their managers. They are becoming desperate. They are unsure of any future.

They used to be absolutely dedicated, happy in participating in the delivery of government programs, happy to assist the communities. They were happy to do inspection work, for example making sure that people fly airplanes safely, that medical products are safe and the list goes on and on.

While many of the initiatives in Public Service 2000 are worth while, the proposed Bill C-26 does not reflect the views of Public Service 2000.

I will definitely be voting against Bill C-26 because of the many inclusions and exclusions which I and my fellow caucus members have highlighted during these debates.

• (1550)

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Madam Speaker, I had a first impulse when I read the description of Bill C-26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada.

It catches the imagination. One would think that we are progressing. It is a wonderful thing that the government has decided to address the problems of the Public Service. We certainly have known for a long time that there are problems.

I have talked to representatives of the Public Service unions. I have known many of them for a long while. I dealt with many of these people before I was even elected to Parliament. They certainly do have problems.

The first impulse was one of gratitude and looking forward to something positive. One does not have to go very far into the legislation, though, to realize that certainly is not the case. I should not have been surprised, because if this government were anything it certainly was consistent. If it has been anything in relation to its employees over the last number of years, not to mention the people of Canada, it has certainly demonstrated disdain and contempt for both its employees and the Canadian public. It has been consistent in that sense.

This piece of legislation popularly known as PS 2000 is no exception. When we look at almost any particular reference in it, as far as the major classifications are concerned we see under certification that it intends to have a very dominant role in deciding who shall be in a bargaining unit and who shall constitute a group within any particular part of the Public Service. This is without consultation with the unions involved and without consultation with any employees involved.

That really flies in the face of long established employer-employee regulatory bodies in so far as labour relations are concerned over many years in Canada and in all jurisdictions.

For the employer to take a unilateral stand on what shall constitute part of a bargaining unit or not is really a very arrogant stand for the government to take. It is pre-emptory and does not go any distance at all toward solving the problem we have within the Public Service.

The major problem is that over the years there have been changes. There is a need within the Public Service for what in many cases could most commonly be described as reclassification. At least there should be a study of the classifications that are there. That is certainly needed.

The government has described it as classification simplification. On the other hand it has really spent an awful lot of time in making it more complicated. It is certainly not simplifying anything at all.

I do not mean to suggest a reclassification of jobs or a study of jobs for any number of reasons but to make sure that the people within the classifications are properly paid for what they do. That certainly includes the matter of pay equity. There is a whole body of evidence, including cases which have been taken to court by the union representing the Public Service and before the Human Rights Commission.

Invariably the courts and the commission have found that the government has not been treating its employees fairly in so far as many of these matters are concerned. In spite of that the government seems to be hell-bent on a course of unilaterally making these changes in the face of decisions brought against them. The philosophy seems to be if one has not been able to succeed in accomplishing what one wants and has been told that one should change one's ways then the thing to do is to change the law in order to make the situation conform to one's biases.

I mentioned this was predicated on a disdain and a contempt for government employees. I cannot understand why this would be the case. In a fairly short period of time we have had many examples. Since I have been in the House we have had the case where the government has been perpetrating strikes by hospital employees in which the major issue was pay equity. Most of those employees were women. In spite of the fact that the government had received judgments saying it should be paying these people differently, it did not do so.

The same thing happened to the Coast Guard. These strikes happened almost concurrently. Just last summer we had the general strike where one of the major causes was the discontent among the employees caused by the government's disdainful attitude toward them. One of the previous speakers mentioned that in the province of Saskatchewan we had developed an exemplary Public Service. I do not wish to indicate that our present Public Service is not exemplary either. Since becoming a member of Parliament and having dealt with public servants, I must say that we have received nothing but the greatest of co-operation in a most professional way in spite of the fact that they have had such hard working conditions under their present employer, the present government of our country.

The major problem is that there has been a need for a reclassification for a long time. I do not mean to imply that rectifying the problems in the Public Service is going to be simple. In so far as reclassification is concerned, nothing that is worth while is simple. Certainly one of the major issues in the country today and one of the major tasks of the government to make sure that our public servants are well trained. It should make sure they are well qualified and that the Canadian public gets the best service possible from them.

In some cases that may not be the case now, the problem being the structure more than the classifications themselves. There have to be some classifications. This government is proposing to bring in a classification system based on what we have now. Instead of bringing in a thorough, follow-through program based on fairness, it is going to bring in one based on animosity, denigration or antiquity.

PS 2000 is a catch phrase for something sounding good. In the long run it will not be a benefit to the Canadian public and will not address the negative responses of the Human Rights Commission toward the government in relation to its employees.

• (1600)

I urge this government to rethink. I certainly hope it will listen to the committee and its representatives.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Madam Speaker, my friend, the distinguished member for Ottawa—Vanier, has moved an amendment to this motion which would allow the Chamber to do what needs to be done, that is to have a committee of this House look long and hard at this restructuring of the Public Service.

Speakers on all sides of this Chamber have admitted that what is proposed in this bill is fairly sweeping. I certainly will not stand here and say that everything in the bill is bad. None of our speakers have said that. There are certain things about it that are very good because some of the elements would contribute to the strengthening of the Public Service in its ability to serve the public, and that is a good objective. I am very much in favour of that.

At the same time there are aspects of Bill C–26 which would undermine very drastically the merit principle that says one gets hired by what one is and not who one knows. One gets hired on one's qualifications, not on whether one is prepared to kowtow to some of the senior mandarins in a particular department of government.

That is a sound principle but that principle is being undermined here. That is one of the reasons we in the Official Opposition are saying that this legislation should be sent to committee before rushing to judgment on this one. We should do what the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, a committee of all parties of this House, said last May needs to be done. This legislation and these ideas for reform need to be adjudicated and gone over with a fine tooth comb by members of all parties. Members should be sitting down, not in the partisan atmosphere of the Chamber but rather in a committee where so much good work gets done and can be done in this particular instance as well.

What is so earth shattering about that kind of a suggestion? Why is the government balking on that particular one? It would improve the legislation. If the government means what it says, that it wants to improve the Public Service, let it put its money where its mouth is. The minister of multiculturalism is in the Chamber. Maybe he would want to indicate that the government is prepared to do that. If so, we are prepared to stop talking now and let this bill go forward. That would be the desirable solution. That would allow the committee to come up with some improvements to make the bill not only palatable to all sides of the House but, more to the point, make it better serve the interests it is supposed to serve.

We have in this country from coast to coast what must be one of the best, most professional public services in the world. There are 250,000 men and women who serve this country very well. When I say 250,000, I have in mind direct employees of the government itself. If one includes the Crown corporations, I suppose one would add just about that number again and it would be close to 500,000 people. Whatever category we are talking about, in total we are talking about many hundreds of thousands of people who are on the front line daily in terms of the programs of our government. This is the case for whatever administration happens to be in power.

This is not a reflection on the people who are in the Public Service but their immediate political taskmasters. Unfortunately there has been a real over–effort to politicize the senior levels of the Public Service, and we have seen some unfortunate results of that. We have seen senior mandarins on the TV channels mouthing the government's political line and being apologists and lap–dogs for the government.

Mr. Belsher: You are talking through your hat.

Mr. Simmons: If my friend from Fraser Valley East, B.C., wants some specific examples, I can give him very specific examples. If he wants me to name names on this one, I can name names. Mr. Paul Tellier holds an office that is the most senior in this country in terms of the Public Service. It is an office that has been occupied by many people over the years who have always remained above the fray. To his credit, Mr. Tellier for the most part has remained above the fray. I say for the most part.

I regret to say that on occasion I have seen him being an apologist for our government, and that is shameful. I hope he has learned his lesson because he does neither himself nor the Public Service credit when he does that.

Mr. Belsher: Roger, you have a poor memory. You have a very selective memory.

Mr. Simmons: Perhaps the gentleman from Fraser Valley East wants to help my memory. He suggests my memory is selective. He asked me for examples and I gave him one. Now it is his turn. Does he want to give me one? If he suggests that my memory is selective, I now give him the opportunity. I am listening.

Mr. Belsher: You have the floor.

Mr. Simmons: As he says, I have the floor. Decoded, the member means that his bluff has been called.

This government has very badly managed the Public Service by downgrading, contracting out, replacing permanent employees and so on. It has badly mismanaged the Public Service.

Before I go on to that, let me not leave the previous item I was mentioning as a loose end. I was terribly distracted by my good friend from Fraser Valley East who is too much an apologist for a government that he does not support very enthusiastically any more, but a congenial fellow nevertheless.

I was making a point when he asked for examples, and of course I gave an example. I could give him several more, but this is not intended to be an opportunity to parade out people's names. The one I did parade out had already, by his very act, paraded his own name out in the public anyway. I did not exactly tell any state secrets when I referred to the actions of Mr. Tellier.

I used that example in response to the invitation from the gentleman for Fraser Valley East to make an appeal to those who are under the thumb of this administration not to yield to the pressure to become apologists or lap-dogs for an administration. That will only tear away at the quality of what I have said is one of the best public services in the world. Almost everyone in that Public Service understands the line of demarcation between the bureaucracy and the political taskmasters. Once in a while somebody gets sucked across that line, but that should not be a reflection on the great army of men and women who always understand where the line is and stay on the right side of it. They not only stay there in the passive sense but do their jobs extremely well. Whether they are in Port au Basques, one of the communities in my riding or in the fisheries or manpower office, the fisheries office in Grand Bank or the employment office in Marystown, or anywhere else in this country, they are people who are serving this country very well.

• (1610)

That is all the more reason why we ought to take our time on this fairly sweeping bit of legislation. I recommend the solution of my friend from Ottawa—Vanier. It is very simple. Just vote for his amendment. Send it to a committee and let members from all sides of this House scrutinize this fairly sweeping legislation so we can come back with better, much improved legislation.

What does the member for Fraser Valley East have against that eminently good idea? Is it because it is a good idea? Why does he not embrace a good idea for a change? I invite him to do so.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, I want to compliment my hon. friend and colleague, the member for Burin—St. George's, on the remarks he just completed. He was unduly harassed by the hon. member for Fraser Valley East somewhat earlier in his remarks, when he suggested that the hon. member for Burin—St. George's was talking through his hat. I can only say that it is a wonder, after the things this government has done to Atlantic Canada, that anyone from Burin—St. George's or anywhere in Atlantic Canada can afford a hat.

At any rate, it gives me great pleasure to rise again in this debate and speak as the member of Parliament for Halifax, the city which has the third largest Public Service contingent in the country.

When I spoke at another stage in this debate some days ago I spent my time talking mainly about the problems relating to regional rates of pay. I also mentioned pay equity. Both of these problems are singularly unaddressed by this legislation. I do not wish for a moment to suggest, when I go on to different matters in my remarks today, that I think the two areas of pay equity and most particularly regional rates are any less important, but there are other problems with this legislation.

I would like to say at this point as well that I too support most strongly the amendment of my learned colleague from Ottawa—Vanier. I think this would be a most excellent way to deal with this legislation.

The Government of Canada is the largest single employer in the country and should be in the vanguard of progressive employment practices. It should be a model of fair practice and implement equal pay for work of equal value. It should eliminate regional rates of pay and resolve employee-employer disputes in a manner that shows the private sector and the provincial, municipal and territorial governments of this country how it should be done.

In the long and excellent history of the Public Service in this country that has been the way things were done. But things have changed and unfortunately they have not changed in any way for the better.

For example, rather than resolving long-standing pay equity disputes, this government tries to strip the Canadian Human Rights Commission's tribunal of its powers to arbitrate pay equity disputes by taking it to court. Rather than allow for the right to strike and bargain collectively, the government engaged in a fruitless, lengthy and acrimonious strike with the Public Service, further demoralizing and leaving it with a very low level of morale.

The infamous zero-three-three, read my lips, was the pronouncement of a government unwilling to bargain in good faith. It was unwilling to compromise, negotiate, discuss or even listen. Even before bargaining began the government had already decided it would legislate the workers back to work and impose the zero-three-three formula on the Public Service.

The possibility of reaching a compromise via arbitration and conciliation was therefore thrown out. It was an exercise in futility because the government said it would override any settlement that did not conform to this formula.

That is terrific. What a tremendous example to set in the area of labour relations. What a tremendous way to inculcate in the people of Canada some feeling of trust in their government. Sadly the words trust and government have become mutually exclusive. Sadly for all of us who sit in legislatures across this country, it is going to be a long time before those words mean anything to Canadians again, at least in the political sense.

Given this government's track record it is not surprising that Bill C-26 is found wanting in several areas, most notably in the realm of merit and fair staffing practices. The following are just a few examples of the attempt to do away with the merit principle.

It evaluates candidates according to a set of standards rather than employing a ranking system in which one candidate is compared to another. This could translate into the best candidate not necessarily being chosen for the job.

The principle of hiring the most qualified person is replaced by the principle of hiring a qualified person. It gives deputy heads the exclusive right to deploy staff permanently, i.e. to hire and move staff around within the deputy head's jurisdiction without competition. Theoretically deployment is voluntary but acceptance of deployment may be included in terms of employment any time an employee is hired or moved to a new position or level. In such cases an employee would have no choice and would either take it or leave it. These changes are referred to as appointment to level as opposed to appointment to a position through competition.

What is wrong with competition? Why is the government eliminating this aspect of fairness in its Public Service?

Another example is that a 90-day casual employee clause creates a new sub-class of employee with no rights or benefits. Casuals may be hired without regard to qualifications. The 90 days can be extended to 125 days, but there are no safeguards against them becoming full-time continuing casuals if they are working for more than one department. And guess who are likely to be the major victims of this kind of legislation? Can anyone guess? I bet the minister can. Who does the minister think I am referring to?

What class of people do we think? I bet my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier knows which class of people are most likely to be injured by this. We all know. The minister is nodding; he knows. It is women, that is who. That is the group of casuals with no benefits or job security. Terrific. This is from a government allegedly committed to pay equity. Well, we shall see.

Another example is increased contracting out. Contracting out is probably the single most devastating morale breaker in the Public Service of Canada. People see their jobs disappearing. They see themselves being replaced, and they see a government that wants to downsize to the point where the standards they have worked hard—many of them for many years—to establish in government departments no longer mean anything. Again who are the most likely people to lose, as jobs are contracted out? The lower levels. Who are in the lower levels, in numbers that far exceed their percentage of the Canadian population? Women. But this government is committed to equity and justice and fair play and all of those wonderful buzzwords. A little action rather than buzzwords would be a major relief, particularly for public servants.

What do we have with contracting out? What comes with it? Do the words patronage, favouritism and punitive measures, as well as based upon a manager's personal likes and dislikes or the whim of the government of the day, come with it? But of course this government does not have whims. We can all remember years ago when a Prime Minister, who came to office supposedly on a rising tide against patronage, mentioned the fact that he certainly would appoint non-political people to positions as soon as the very last living member of his party had been taken care of. I guess, although there have been some changes in that manner, one cannot teach too many old dogs too many new tricks.

This legislation undermines the merit principle, leaving all but the original hiring and limited promotions to a discretionary group, with no backup in policy in the Public Service at large. It is very sad. It deals a terrible blow to a superb Public Service that deserves better, but has received nothing but hard knocks and disillusionment at the hands of its own government.

The much recognized need for increased flexibility for management is not adequately offset by the arbitrary exercise of staffing authority and the loss of the merit principle. This appears to be something that the government does not understand.

I only have a moment or two left and I would like to conclude briefly by going back to the issue that is of primary concern in Atlantic Canada, the issue of regional rates of pay.

At present Atlantic Canadians have the lowest rates of pay for designated occupational categories such as the general labour and trades group and the general service group. These differences in pay reinforce the already glaring disparities between the standard of living in Atlantic Canada and that in the rest of the country. These differences in pay contribute to the unequal development of Atlantic Canada as compared to the development of the rest of Canada. These regional rates of pay cannot be justified on the basis of a lower cost of living.

It is simply an illusion to think that the cost of living is lower in our part of the country than in central Canada. Equal work must enjoy equal rates of pay. This is a hallmark of an equal society. The government should listen for once.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Madam Speaker, I too wish to enter into the debate on Bill C-26. I will not be long. My friend, the former chairman of the finance committee, wants to enter into this discussion as well. We are all anxious to hear what little gems of wisdom our colleague and friend can contribute to this debate.

I want to join with all of the speakers I have heard this afternoon in condemning aspects of Bill C-26. That is not to say that we entirely condemn everything that is in the bill. Common sense would tell us that there are things in this bill that require a parliamentary process of going through committee, preferably in a non-partisan way, to work on this bill and to bring out some changes in it. In many ways Bill C-26 reflects a government that is driven more by ideology than by experience or common sense.

It is an ideology that attempts to portray the Public Service as lazy, bloated, inefficient. It tries to score political points from the Public Service. We can all find examples of ineffective public servants just as we can find examples of ineffective clerks in stores or ineffective executives in the high-rise office towers. We have human beings throughout, whether it is in the Public Service or the private sector, who are good and who are not good.

Unfortunately this government has tried to gain quite a bit of political mileage by sort of stomping on the Public Service.

The unfortunate part is that the government seems to believe its own rhetoric. We have in Bill C-26 a reflection of that. It is a reflection of a government that is at war with its own workers. That is unfortunate. It is not just unfortunate for the government, but it is unfortunate for the country.

In a more enlightened day and age, enlightened people recognize that workers and management have to work together. Management cannot do it on its own. Workers cannot do it on their own. We need a co-operative environment in which people are working together, sharing a common goal, and then attempting to deliver the services in such a way that they are the most efficient, most cost effective, et cetera.

If a government were serious about saving money, the best people who could save money are its own employees. They know when too much paper is being used or whether a trip is really necessary. If you are at war with your own employees then you are going to have those employees fighting back and sabotaging you. It means waste, inefficiencies, and increased costs, and it is the Canadian people who suffer.

What are some of the main aspects that we find unacceptable in Bill C-26? First, it gives the Treasury Board the authority to determine bargaining units unilaterally. An important point to workers is who determines what bargaining units they are in.

Bill C-26 gives that power unilaterally and totally to the employer. This goes against what is included in all other labour legislation, including the Canada Labour Code which gives this power to a labour relations board.

The government in many ways is exempting itself from the Canada Labour Code, from its own legislation. If the Government of Canada can claim to be able to do that, why should many of the other private companies not try to claim the same type of right? It underlines existing labour legislation in the Canada Labour Code.

The second thing we find objectionable is that the bill gives managers the right to deploy or to transfer at their discretion within the levels. To give this power to the Treasury Board rather than to the Public Service Commission where it should belong goes against rulings of the Federal Court of Appeal which said that removing the right to compete for or to appeal a transfer within a level seriously undermined the merit principle.

We have the Federal Court of Appeal making a decision. This government, rather than complying with the decision of the court, goes around and changes the legislation. So much for the sense of the rule of justice.

The third aspect that we find objectionable about Bill C-26 is that it gives the government the power to eliminate jobs in the public sector through contracting out. The government now, we understand, spends some $5 billion a year in contracting out, but there is no accounting for this expenditure.

The Auditor General, in the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, has asked for some accountability of the cost effectiveness of this practice. The government refuses to supply that information. Again, I go back to my original comment that Bill C-26 is more politically driven, ideologically driven, than by a sense of good legislation and what is good for the country and the people of Canada.

Take the case of contracting out. The government wants to be able to claim politically how many jobs it has eliminated, that it has cut the fat out of the bureaucracy in Ottawa.

• (1630)

The people back home know that the people who are being laid off by this government are the people who supply the services, the people who do the actual work. The top echelons generally remain untouched. The government then lays workers off and it contracts out. It claims to be saving money, because it does not have to make any pension contributions, et cetera, to workers who come in under contract.

The government is incapable of showing to the Auditor General and the public accounts committee how effective this practice is. Is it really saving us money? I suspect it is not, but what it has done is alienate many of the employees of the government.

In this day and age, if we are to survive economically as a country, I believe we have to move very strongly to where there is almost a social contract between the various productive elements of our society.

There must be mutual understandings and agreements between the private and the public sector and between employers and employees. Look at some of the examples and models. Look at many of the European countries and we find models that allow for increased efficiency and effectiveness through a co-operative process in which the employees and the employers are working together toward common goals.

What we have, especially with this government, is the opposite. We have an adversarial system in which the employers and employees are at war with each other, and it is the public that suffers. This government is to be blamed for that. It has deliberately created this war, very often for political purposes. Quite often it thought it would win political points by pouncing on public servants. It thought it would be great for its standing in the polls.

An hon. member: Not really.

Mr. de Jong: Exactly, not really. It has not worked that way. It is the opposite that has worked that way. As with so many things of this government, it thought one thing would happen when exactly the opposite has happened. It thought it would win political points by stomping over the public servants, but the opposite has happened.

In closing, I would like to mention that for a while I worked in the Public Service in Saskatchewan and there were two ways of describing ourselves. We could either look at ourselves as government employees or we could look at ourselves as public servants. I always liked the notion of a public servant. Part of the reason I entered into the Public Service in Saskatchewan was my sense of public service.

Many of the government employees are saying: "We are not being treated as public servants. We are being treated just as employees with management trying to get the most out of us, and therefore we would rather see ourselves being called and termed as government employees". I am afraid that is what has happened. The sense of service is being destroyed, not because people do not want to serve but because they are being treated badly by their employers and they have to do everything they can just to protect their dignity and their rights.

The legislation is poor legislation. This government is not going to be here two years from now. I suggest it should quietly sit on it, not introduce and proceed with Bill C-26 if it cannot come up with something better. At least the new government that will replace it will come up with proper legislation and the proper reform needed.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I was distracted by the member for Ottawa South. I was actually sitting here in anticipation of his participating in the debate because he is a member who has had a lot of experience in motivating people in the private sector. This bill is fundamentally about how to motivate and mobilize the largest work force in Canada to work for the people of Canada.

What we have right now is a situation in which the morale of the Public Service is so low that, as the hon. member for the New Democratic Party said earlier, the real loser in this friction between the political culture, namely the government and the bureaucratic culture, is the population of Canada.

The biggest crisis we are facing is unemployment. I have been saying that repeatedly for the last two weeks. One area in our country that could really do a lot to put people back to work is the sector in our economy under the umbrella of entrepreneurship. There are close to one million entrepreneurs in this country and if each one of those entrepreneurs were to take the chance and hire someone, put someone back to work, then the spirit and the morale of this country would be a lot better off.

One of the reasons the entrepreneurs of this country right now are taking such a conservative approach, an approach which is basically hesitant, is that they are getting signals from all parts of the economy, all members of the government and even public servants. They are getting signals that the institutions of this country are not working correctly.

Right now our business people are coming into contact almost constantly with public servants. I hear repeatedly from businessmen their feelings on the attitude of public servants toward their particular frustration. Whether it be the GST situation and forms that have to be filled out, whether it is assistance from the Federal Business Development Bank and how to get their eligibility for a loan processed, whether they are eligible in various regions of this country for small business loans or grants or whatever, whether it is people who are looking for retraining programs and companies that are trying to keep people employed, they go into employment offices and get a sense that the will of the Public Service, the will of the bureaucrats, is not really there to serve the people of Canada.

I do not want to make a blanket statement on all public servants because I spoke on this bill earlier and I happen to think that one of the great treasures of this country is the Public Service. I have been working around this city since 1978 and some of the finest people I have ever met in my life are employed with the Government of Canada. I say that with all sincerity.

We can take an institution that employs close to 300,000 people and see the number of people it touches day in and day out in a 10-hour to 12-hour day. If the morale of that organization is not strong, there is no debating the fact that it can affect the attitude of all the people it touches. In Canada we have a Public Service which touches every aspect of our daily lives.

The specific area that I am concerned about is the Public Service and how it interacts with the business community in this country. This includes small, medium and large businesses.

I want to give a positive example. About five months ago there was a company named Amertek that manufactured fire trucks in Canada. It was going through a particularly tough period in terms of its cash flow, and the Canadian Commercial Corporation was managing its contract. The officials at Amertek were appealing to the government agency for financial assistance because they needed help in order to meet the demands their bankers were putting on them.

The officials at the Canadian Commercial Corporation came in and did an audit on the company. They saw that it was eligible for the bill it submitted which was due and owing. They literally went to the bank in Ottawa and wired the money to the account of this small business. It is an example of where a public servant went beyond the call of duty and served not only the employer of that company but indirectly served everyone working in that factory. It gave that company added cash flow and a burst of security. It has kept the company going. Now it has rebounded and is doing better than ever. It is that kind of attitude of going the extra mile that is so critical when times are tough.

There are also many examples where we are not getting the quality service that has always been part and parcel of this great institution, namely the Public Service of Canada, because its morale is so bad.

I support the approach of my colleague, the member for Ottawa—Vanier, that this bill be given a much more thorough analysis. I have said repeatedly that public servants are used as scapegoats or battering rams if all of a sudden things are not going well in government. We always say: "Look at those public servants. They just are not doing their jobs".

What we have to realize is that we are as politicians inextricably intertwined with the Public Service. If the Public Service is not serving well then it is a mirror of those of us in this room. So often we forget that. If people are complaining about the Public Service, ultimately they are complaining about us. We are the people responsible for the caring, approachable, action oriented Public Service that must be a part of the community service in this country.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Madam Speaker, as chairman of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts back in 1989, 1990 and 1991 let me say that our committee held several hearings on the PS 2000 document that the government tabled.

We did so because the Auditor General, with whom the committee works day after day, suggested that there were problems in the Public Service of Canada that needed to be ironed out for the sake of efficiency within government itself. The thing that came through loud and clear in our hearings as a committee was that Public Service 2000 was not being given enough attention. Employees were not being consulted. The consultation was from the top down, not with the regular front line employees who have to face the public day in and day out in their jobs.

A considerable amount of disagreement was pointed out by the people who appeared before the Standing Committee on Public Accounts at that time. It proved that a real open discussion on the government's Public Service 2000 document was absolutely essential.

After we had those hearings we brought in a report to this House of Commons with several very important recommendations in it on several meetings we had. At this time I would like to repeat, for the benefit of the House and for the record, recommendation 18(a). We recommended in our seventh report that the government table a discussion paper prior to proceeding with the introduction of legislative amendments and/or administrative changes and that this discussion paper set out the principal conclusions and recommendations arising from Public Service 2000.

Part (b) referred the aforementioned discussion paper to a special committee of the House of Commons.

The Standing Committee on Public Accounts, as you well know Madam Speaker, must have hearings on practically every government department and agency. The Auditor General's report is very thick. There is a lot of work in there. It means a very heavy job for members of this committee. We did not have time to carry out this total report on our own. We recommended that a special committee of the House of Commons on the Public Service conduct a consultation process involving employees, Public Service unions and other interested parties, and report back to the House within a reasonable period of time.

If I remember correctly I tabled this report in the House on November 8, 1990. We wanted a report back from the government by November 30. The Standing Committee on Public Accounts has the right to put a timeframe on its demands of the government and it is up to the government to meet those demands.

That special committee became the subject of several pieces of correspondence between me and the President of the Treasury Board. He committed himself to set up such a committee for hearings and then proceeded to fail to do so. He did not live up to his own commitments to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. This committee brings people before it from all levels of the Public Service of Canada including senior officials from the Treasury Board and senior officials from the Privy Council. How can a parliamentary system work if we get commitments from them and those commitments are not lived up to?

The bottom line is that the government did not bring in a paper we wanted for discussion, laying out its main objectives. The committee was never established. There were no such hearings. Therefore there was no open, broad discussion before a committee on the Public Service 2000 document of the government. As a result, what did the government do? It handled it in its usual high-handed manner. It ended up bringing the legislation into the House.

Let us make the comparison with what has happened in the past on these issues dealing with the Public Service of Canada. The Public Service is supposed to be non-political in its everyday operations. Therefore it is important that there be fairness and independence from politics in the way it works from day to day.

In the late 1960s we had the Finkelman report. There were many meetings on that paper. That is why the Standing Committee on Public Accounts recommended that a similar procedure take place this time. First there were many committee meetings on the paper itself, as well as many on the legislation. Then the legislation came into the House and was referred to a special committee. Something like 118 recommendations were brought in with that bill in the late 1960s. The bill had the most amendments of any bill returned to this House of Commons. I remember the chairperson of that committee was Mr. Jean-Thomas Richard, the long-time member for Ottawa East. Presently this is the territory held by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

He did an excellent job then. Members of all parties worked so effectively and so well together on that committee that when that bill was brought back before the House of Commons for final reading and passage there was very little debate on it. Instead members were thanking and congratulating each other on the co-operation that existed in committee. As a result the bill passed through the House very smoothly, simply because the proper groundwork had been done in advance.

For the reason that very little discussion has taken place with regard to the legislation brought forward right now on Public Service 2000, I totally agree with my hon. friend, the member for Ottawa—Vanier, that the motion of the government should be amended. All the words after the word "that" should be deleted and the following substituted therefor: "That Bill C-26 dealing with Public Service 2000 be not now read the second time but that the order for second reading be discharged, the bill withdrawn, and the subject matter thereof referred to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, and that the public accounts committee bring a report back to this House as to how the bill should be handled from thereon".

No doubt one of the recommendations would be a special committee to have those hearings.

I mentioned the commitment of the President of the Treasury Board to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. That commitment was not met. This is not surprising, because the government does not know how to deal with its own employees. It does not know how to go about reforming the framework of the Public Service. It does not know how to work with opposition parties in this House. It dictates to them also.

The reason is very simple. This government is anything but reform minded in the sense of reforming legislation and reforming everyday operations of government. It is a reactionary government. It is a dictatorial government. It is a government that directs the country's business from on high and has little or no relationship with everyday Canadians.

The departments of government are staffed by some excellent public servants.

I have had the privilege over the years of dealing with excellent public servants from many government departments, whether it be Energy, Mines and Resources, whether it be Public Works, whether it be Industry, Science and Technology, whether it be National Defence where we have a large number of very dedicated public servants, External Affairs and so on.

These people put themselves out to come to meetings that we have. They will come to our offices and discuss matters. I just want to pay them a tribute. They deserve better. If we are going to have a professional Public Service in this country they deserve better treatment than they are getting from this government now.

I ask the government to open up the discussions. Free up the discussions on this bill. Take it back, submit it to a special committee of this House and let the discussions go on. It will be an improved bill when it comes back to the House that will be acceptable, probably not only to the opposition but to all public servants. Do them that favour.

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, like my colleagues who spoke before me on Bill C-26, I also want to support the amendment of the hon. member for Ottawa West, which reads as follows: That Bill C-26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the public service of Canada, be not now read a second time but be read a second time this day six months hence.

I believe it is important to revise the Public Service Act so that all Canadians can benefit from quality services, wherever they may live. To provide these quality services, it is essential that the Public Service treat every one of its employees with respect, without favouritism and, above all, without intimidation.

The Liberal Party knows that partnership between the public and private sectors is the only way to build our country. Everyone must be aware that they are part of the Canadian economy, from non-governmental organizations to the public sector, and including unions as well as ordinary Canadians.

The Liberal Party does not want to pass a law that could in any way adversely affect the quality of services provided by the Public Service. We must all be able to study these changes thoroughly.

[English]

This bill is of fundamental importance to all Canadians because it deals with the very people who are there to deliver the services of the federal government to the citizens of this country. I am dismayed that the Conservative government has decided to pursue this particular course of action.

Members on this side of the House support clauses in this bill that contribute to strengthening the Public Service. We support any and all initiatives that will increase the accessibility of services to all Canadians. We agree with any move on the part of the federal government that will improve relationships with its employees.

Canadians are tired of confrontation. They do not want to see the government and its employees bickering. Whereas the Conservatives are more inclined toward confrontation and enforcement, we in the Liberal Party believe in dialogue and fairness. If members of—the Public Service are not treated with dignity, then the entire workings of the federal government are compromised.

The Liberal Party has urged the government to establish a special committee of Parliament to consider the principle of the bill as well as its substance in the total context of PS 2000 as recommended by the public accounts committee.

It is important for us as parliamentarians to take our time on the renewal of the Public Service. Mistakes that we make today could affect the performance of the federal government for many years to come.

It is particularly important to deal with this matter at this time because we are in a serious national unity debate.

I can only speculate on the effects that a demoralized bureaucracy has on services and how this might impact on Canada's unity debate. We must establish the special committee so that we can truly work together to find a formula that will give Canada a Public Service that it truly deserves.

This government simply cannot manage the affairs of this country. Because of this ineptitude, service to all Canadians is suffering. Its inability to deal fairly with public servants has had a devastating effect—

It being 5 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke) moved that Bill C-240, an act to amend the Canada Labour Code (unjust dismissal), be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee B.

He said: Madam Speaker, in addressing Bill C-240 for probably the second or third time in the last number of years there are just a few comments I want to make. Whether I will take the full 20 minutes I am not quite certain.

The substance of the bill, as stated within the bill itself, is:

> Subsection 94(3) of the Canada Labour Code be amended by striking out the word "or" at the end of paragraph (f) thereof, by adding the word "or" at the end of paragraph (g) thereof and by adding thereto the following paragraph: (h)—

To put it in context it would say that no employer may

> (h) suspend, discharge or impose any financial or other penalty on a person employed by him, or take any other disciplinary action against such a person, by reason of that person having refused to perform an act that he has reasonable cause to believe is prohibited by law.

It is a simple bill and the idea behind it is very straightforward. There is nothing hidden or very complex about it.

It ought to be in the public interest for this Parliament to pass an amendment to the Canada Labour Code that would help all employees under federal jurisdiction in assisting the government in enforcing the laws of Canada. That seems to be a reasonably noble objective to almost anyone.

This bill in itself probably would not do enough in some circumstances to cause employees to take the risk involved in losing their employment by refusing to carry out a direct order, which normally in industry is a cause for dismissal.

But this bill, together with other types of law enforcement mechanisms, together with the processes of grievances and arbitration and the courts, and with other types of amendments to other pieces of legislation, commonly called whistleblowing legislation, may assist many employees across Canada in having the gumption to take the risk involved. They might then refuse to carry out certain instructions from their employers that could place both their employers and themselves in contravention of the law if those instructions were carried out.

To give a couple of examples of areas in which this might happen, it may be a necessary tool or a worthwhile tool in terms of the protection of the environment.

It is not uncommon across Canada today to find many employees who are required on a regular basis to discharge toxic substances into waterways or into areas that the law forbids. This is even despite the limits of pollution control permits and other legislation and regulations that are designed to prevent a company from making those kinds of discharges.

In many industrial towns, in a number of industries—and these are not necessarily under federal jurisdiction, but some of them will be—it is a standing joke among employees in a particular industrial operation and among the citizens in the community that as soon as it gets dark, just shine a spotlight.

It would be very obvious that a lot of discharges are taking place into a river that ought not to take place, not only from a moral or ethical or environmental judgment, but also according to the laws of that province or the laws of this nation.

It has become such a common occurrence for that kind of practice to take place that it is necessary for this Parliament and other legislatures to send some kind of signal out to people in the working community that they do have the right to say no. They should have this right without putting their livelihoods and the livelihoods of their families at risk.

Surely, that is the least they should expect from Parliament whose job it is, presumably, to pass laws for the protection of the public and to create mechanisms to enforce those laws.

The appeal that I am making is to allow employees to assist in the enforcement of the laws of the land. I know in previous debates in this place and in many private discussions, there were many who objected saying: "There is obvious opportunity if someone refuses to carry out an order that would obviously be illegal. Surely, the grievance procedures and the arbitration procedures and the courts will come to their assistance".

That is not always the case. Even more so, a lot of working people do not believe that is the case. If they do not believe that is the case, they are not going to place their livelihoods at risk and sometimes 10, 15, 20 years of seniority in order to enforce a law or in order not to place themselves in the position of violating the law.

It is again a matter of making them feel comfortable in the role of helping us to enforce the laws that we pass.

Another example is we have had many, many media reports when it comes to the collection of fees and duties, et cetera, at border crossings. For many customs officers, there is a large amount of moneys that ought to be public revenues escaping across those borders when goods are shipped without proper manifests and proper bills of lading being filled out and supplied.

Goods are smuggled across and I suggest sometimes that it likely happens on the direction of someone other than the truck driver involved. It becomes a matter of practice over the years.

When that kind of activity is carried on, especially with the cutbacks there have been in the Public Service, an awful lot of revenue that ought to be collected is not being collected. One reason would be because employees do not feel that they can put a halt to it themselves and have any guarantee that their jobs and their livelihoods will be protected.

We all like to believe that people would say: "You are asking me to do something that is against the law. There is no way I am going to do it". In the real world when you have years and years of earning capacity at stake, people just do not take those chances.

There was another private members' bill just a week ago, I think it was on February 4. It was submitted by my colleague, the member for Mission—Coquitlam, and was legislation concerning whistleblowing. Again, part of the purpose of that bill coincides with the bill that is presently before us. It would approach it from a different angle. It encompassed amendments to several pieces of legislation in order to accomplish its task, but it stated it in a more positive way that employees would have the right to blow their whistle on an employer if they felt that they were doing something wrong. This goes the other step and attempts to protect their livelihood.

• (1710)

It is also somewhat similar to the provision within the Canada Labour Code. I believe it is section 128 of part II of the Canada Labour Code where an employee has the right to refuse work when that employee has reasonable grounds to believe that the performance of such a task would place his life in jeopardy or may cause injury to himself or to others. The same kind of principles are involved.

For years and years and years, until 1984, we had similar kinds of objections in this House to that kind of legislation, which was cast in the dying days of the Parliament that ended in 1984, as are made against this legislation and against the bill that was submitted by my colleague for Mission—Coquitlam just a week or so ago.

People at that time also believed that if the matter went to grievance through arbitration or through the courts that surely the laws of the land, the courts and the judicial system would serve to protect the right of someone to protect their own life by refusing direct orders, but that did not happen then until we had those kind of laws. It is still sometimes difficult to get employees to take the kind of risks that are necessary to protect themselves. If they are being asked to take risks of their own livelihood in order to help enforce the law, it is even farther fetched to think they are going to take that kind of gamble. People simply do not do that. Anyone who thinks they will, except on the odd occasion where somebody is really so conscientious that they think: "God, this is against the law and even if I am going to lose my job and my livelihood and my pension rights and everything else, I am going to help enforce that law because I am a good citizen", has got to be dreaming if they think that ordinary employees out in the labour force are going to behave like that. They simply do not.

There are, regardless of party, philosophy and ideology, a lot of members of Parliament and a lot of members of provincial legislatures whom I still think are very much liberal idealists. It does not matter if they are Liberals, Tories or socialists or what they are. There is a tendency for a lot of people to think, as they come out of the school system, that just because the law says something, it is so, or because we say that people have these rights and those rights that they have those rights. They do not in many cases.

Even with this kind of legislation, if it were passed, and I hope that at some stage it is, along with the kind of companion whistleblowing legislation I referred to and others, we are still going to have severe difficulties. It is hard to even enforce this kind of very clear legislation unless you have a unionized workplace with a very strong militant committee that will ensure that its members understand what their rights are and are willing to fight along with those members to ensure that their rights are protected and the rights that are protected under the law will in fact exist.

I have no illusions that even if we have all of these kinds of protections that everybody in society is still going to be protected if they want to be good citizens. It will help to give them at least a feeling of security that Parliament has said very clearly that they do have these rights. The law makers of the land will assist them if that employee chooses to assist Parliament and law enforcement agencies in the courts in upholding and enforcing the laws that we have deemed it suitable to pass.

I really do not want to say much more. It is a simple concept. I think it is a worth-while and an important concept, but again, I do not have any kind of illusions that this would wave any kind of magic wand to make it an ideal society.

Again, if it helps to give employees under the federal jurisdiction some sense of security, it is our intent to protect their livelihoods. If they assist us in enforcing the laws that we pass, we will have done something worth while. I hope other members agree. I know it needs additional improvements. There are probably companion pieces of legislation and amendments that may be worth while to make to the bill before us, hopefully within a committee, to give it teeth and provide safeguards against abuse or misuse by employees. That is also a possibility. I do not deny that.

I think the concept and the goal is worth while. I hope other members will agree and we will refer it to Legislative Committee B as stipulated and find it possible to proceed.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, I appreciate having the opportunity speak on Bill

C-240 introduced for the consideration of this House by the hon. member for Kootenay West—Revelstoke, one of my fellow B.C.ers.

In the brief remarks I will be making on the bill, I want to indicate to hon. members of this House that I shall take a short review of the Canada Labour Code which makes it readily apparent that the code contains already several measures in which the protection of workers under its jurisdiction is already provided for.

Consequently, I am doubtful that the bill's recommendations for change are necessary. Yet, I understand the feelings of the hon. member opposite and his deep concern, because he has come from a trade union background, as I recall in meeting with him in various committees.

In fact, the bill might have some undesirable consequences that we should be aware of when considering its clauses. One of my colleagues will be outlining these in a few minutes.

It may be useful to provide members with a general overview of what Bill C-240 proposes and what currently exists in federal labour legislation. The bill suggests an amendment to the Canada Labour Code which applies to employees in federal jurisdiction. The spectrum of industries under the jurisdiction of the code is very broad in scope and covers a wide range of economic and industrial activity.

The range of industries covered by the code's jurisdiction encompasses the different modes of interprovincial and international transport, including railways, airlines, trucking and bus transport. Encompassed as well are the telephone, telegraph and cable systems, shipping, longshoring, broadcasting, banking, pipelines, ferries, tunnels and bridges, primary fishing and most Crown corporations.

Also included are certain undertakings that have been declared by Parliament to be for the general advantage of Canada, including grain elevators, uranium mining and processing, flour and feed mills. These are the industries to which the code applies and which would be affected by the hon. member's proposals in Bill C-240.

To be clear on what is being suggested by this bill, the hon. member for Kootenay—Revelstoke recommends an addition to the unfair labour practices section of the code, section 94(3), a paragraph that would prohibit an employer from discriminating against an employee who refuses to do an act required by the employer but which in the employee's estimation is believed to be unlawful.

The words of the proposals are:

> No employer or person acting on behalf of the employer shall:
> (h) suspend, discharge or impose any financial or other penalty on a person employed by him or take any other disciplinary action against such a person by reason of that person having refused to perform an act that he has reasonable cause to believe is prohibited by law.

A brief reading of section 94 of part I of the code will indicate the numerous prohibitions against unfair practices by an employer against an employee that are related to industrial relations. For example, under section 94(3)(f) an employer cannot discriminate against an employee because the employee refuses to do something that would be prohibited by the labour code. In other words, if something is prohibited by the code and an employee refuses to do it, an employer cannot penalize him or her. There are protections in the code to support the employee in this regard.

Another example of the protection afforded to employees can be found in part II of the code which deals with the right to refuse to do dangerous work. If an employee has reasonable cause to believe that conditions exist that pose a danger, he or she may refuse to do the work. The employee may not exercise the right to refuse work if the refusal puts the life, health or safety of another person directly in danger or if the danger is inherent in the employee's work or is a normal condition of employment.

An example of such a situation might be where a flight attendant discovers threatening conditions of an aircraft and reports them to the flight captain for repair. The unsafe conditions constitute a legitimate grounds for a refusal to work. However, the flight attendant does not have the right to refuse to work once the deficiencies have been corrected.

The procedure under part II of the code requires that an employee must report a dangerous situation to his or her employer and to a member of a safety and health committee if one is established or to the appointed safety and health representative, if any. On receipt of the report the employer must investigate the report in the presence of the employee and one member of the safety and health committee where one exists. If this results in an employer's or committee's decision that no condition or danger exists but the employee continues to reasonably believe in the existence of a situation of danger, he or she may continue to refuse to work but both the employee and the employer must then seek an investigation by a Labour Canada safety officer. If the safety officer decides that a situation of danger does not exist, the employee can no longer refuse to work.

The employee may nevertheless require the safety officer to refer his or her decision to the Canada Labour Relations Board. A determination of the matter by the board is final.

These procedures establish safeguards that serve to protect the employees rights to refuse to do work that would endanger his or her person without fear of reprisal or retaliation by an employer, including dismissal. An employee dismissed or exercising this right under this section of the code has the right of appeal in this case to the Canada Labour Relations Board.

These provisions were reviewed and improved upon during the last round of major amendments to the Canada Labour Code in 1984. The hon. member for Kootenay West—Revelstoke undoubtedly feels that the amendments proposed in his bill would bring about a further improvement in the rights of a worker to refuse to do work he or she considers contrary to the law. No member of the House, I am sure, is likely to be against improving the rights of Canadians. However, I would suggest that Bill C-240 does not break any new ground. It does not add anything new to the Labour Code.

I have cited examples of protection to aggrieved employees under the Canada Labour Code to various forms of redress against wrongful dismissal resulting from an order by an employer to violate certain provisions of the code. The protection afforded to employees through the Canada Labour Code in this regard is comprehensive. Clearly an act in violation of the Canada Labour Code is subject to punitive provisions of the code itself, as it should be.

I would also suggest that in cases in which an employee is ordered to carry out an act which contravenes the law other than the code then recourse for the application of the appropriate penalties exist under the Criminal Code.

Therefore I respectfully submit that the existing provisions of the Canada Labour Code provide the necessary coverage that workers need in the matter of their right to protection against arbitrary retaliations by an employer. The proposed amendment while well intentioned, and I can understand the hon. member's concern, should at this time not be adopted. We should continue with the code as it now is.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Madam Speaker, I thank you once again for recognizing me. It was mentioned by the members who spoke earlier that the Canada Labour Code came about in 1984. I am happy to say that at the time I was involved in clearing up the wording of the labour code. I have very carefully read the amendment that is put forward by this Bill C-240. I would tend to agree that the thrust of the amendments to be made are surely made in good faith. For that, I commend my colleague from British Columbia.

On the other hand, I am inclined to believe that the labour code, as it is set out covering the federal jurisdiction, has given ample clout to the employee to refuse work he or she believes to be illegal or dangerous.

There is no question in my mind that if an employer asks an employee to do something illegal, this clearly contravenes not only the Canada Labour Code, but the criminal law. The hon. member for Kootenay West suggests that criminal law would not or might not cover an employee who refuses to work under these circumstances. I suggest the hon. member must lack confidence in the laws of our land.

I do not have a background as a labour union person. However, I have worked in situations where I did belong to a union. While the overwhelming majority of employees in unions are good, conscientious workers, I think under some circumstances employees might use this in a mischievous way.

I read the interview that the hon. member went through when he appeared on December 4, 1991, to more or less defend his bill to be brought into the House. The hon. member stated at that time it is not always credible to believe that a citizen is going to say that he will not do something illegal because he fears he will lose his job. I submit to you that many of our citizens do have the courage of their convictions. I would grant them the benefit of the doubt to say they would speaking up if they were asked to do something illegal.

One of the questioners at the time, the member for Kingston and The Islands, asked if this would include refusing work which would be hazardous to a person's health. Here I find myself squarely on the side of the member for Kootenay West. I believe that if an act is illegal, it is going to be covered by the Criminal Code and definitely by the Canada labour laws.

When you come into the area as to whether an act or a job will be dangerous to a person's health, it brings me back to situations which have occurred in our history before. The asbestos strike in Quebec was because of health hazards for the people who were working there. The people were right at that time to strike because of the general work conditions and conditions that were injurious to their health.

Today, we hear more and more about the environment. We hear for example about the dumping of chemicals into our rivers and lakes. This should definitely be stopped. Is the hon. member, in putting forth his private member's bill, suggesting that workers, unionized or not, across Canada do not have a stake in our environment? Is he suggesting they will not tell the authorities if something is being done that they believe to be injurious, not only to their health, but to the health of their fellow citizens? If that is so, I suggest to you with all respect, Madam Speaker, that these people are doing a disservice to our nation.

• (1730)

I would encourage anyone who is engaged in this type of activity to surely tell the authorities so we can act on it properly.

The environment is something that belongs to all of us. Unless we as Canadian citizens are prepared to defend it by whistleblowing if necessary, I think we are in jeopardy as a nation.

I read over the labour code this afternoon and have virtually immersed myself in it over the past two or three weeks since I became the labour portfolio critic. I am reasonably secure in my knowledge that the labour code will indeed cover just such a case as this amendment proposes to stop.

I believe that the labour code, federally, is perhaps much stronger than those of the provinces. With all respect to my hon. colleague, I believe that all provinces should have labour codes as strong as the federal code with regard to the matters of protection for the employee if he or she is doing something illegal or injurious to their health. Perhaps this should be addressed in the provincial legislatures.

My party believes it is always necessary to review whatever legislation we have, and I include here the Canada Labour Code, to see how we can strengthen it and make it better for our citizens.

Although Bill C–240 tends to bring our attention to the Canada code, I am not sure it will bring about the desired effect the hon. member believes it will.

At this point, I believe this legislation needs further modification to change the labour code to make it beneficial to all of our citizens. I think it needs a little more work, but I compliment the member for bringing it to the attention of this particular section in the House, so we can once again make sure the legislation serves our people.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Luc Joncas (Matapédia—Matane): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to take part in this debate on Bill C–240 introduced by the hon. member for Kootenay West—Revelstoke. Hon. members will appreciate the importance of ensuring that our labour laws are current and relevant in addressing the circumstances we find in federal industries under the jurisdiction of the Canada Labour Code.

This bill seems to have been introduced in response to the hon. member's assessment of an isolated event described by him when a similar proposal was debated in this House in 1983. The proposed amendment is being introduced in the Parliament of Canada to address the actions of a handful of employers.

When amendments to the Canada Labour Code have been made in the past, they have been introduced in response to changing circumstances in federally–regulated industries. Actually, legislative amendments should be contemplated in the context of a requirement for such inervention by Parliament. It is incumbent upon the sponsor of a bill to demonstrate that new or improved legislation is needed to protect and promote the rights of Canadian workers in the workplace.

The presentation of such evidence during the honourable member's introductory remarks might have persuaded us that the proposed amendments are required and should be adopted. We have already heard of the way in which an employee is protected against acts of discriminatory behaviour by an employer who might, for instance, counsel an employee to carry out an act which would breach the law under the unfair labour practices section of part I of the Canada Labour Code. We have also been apprised of the right of an employee to refuse to do dangerous work. The avenues of appeal available to employees and the safeguards in place to protect employees exercising such rights against discrimination by the employer have been explained. These latter procedures are contained under part II of the Canada Labour Code.

Part III of the code contains yet another separate section under labour standards dealing with unjust dismissal and I want to comment briefly on these provisions because they are yet another important example of the way in which the employee is protected against unjust treatment by an employer. The unjust dismissal provisions of part III of the code provide an employee with the right to make a complaint in writing within 90 days of his or her dismissal to a federal inspector if the employee considers the dismissal to be unjust. This part of the act applies to employees in federal jurisdiction who have completed 12 consecutive months of continuous employment with an employer and who are not members of a group of employees covered by a collective agreement.

Under this provision, the employee or the inspector may make a request to the employer for a written statement giving reasons for the dismissal. Any employer who receives such a request is obliged to provide the person who made the request with such information within 15 days. An inspector, on receipt of a complaint, shall endeavour to assist the parties to the complaint to settle the complaint or will appoint another inspector to do so. A complaint that is not settled at this stage can be referred to adjudication. In fact, where a complaint is not settled, the inspector, within a period of time that he or she considers reasonable, can refer a written request for further action on the complaint to the next stage, which is adjudication.

The Minister of Labour may then appoint an adjudicator to hear the complaint. The adjudicator is to give full opportunity to the parties to the complaint to present evidence and make submissions. The adjudicator shall consider whether the dismissal of the person who made the complaint was unjust and render a final decision thereon. Where an adjudicator decides that a person has been unjustly dismissed, he or she may order the employer who dismissed the person to pay compensation, reinstate the person in his employ, and do whatever is equitable to require the employer to counteract any consequence of the dismissal.

In reflecting upon these legislative clauses and the attention to detail contained therein, I am impressed by their comprehensiveness. These provisions, in conjunction with similar protections in parts I and II of the Canada Labour Code, comprise a thorough legal foundation, a foundation that has been constructed with the rights of workers in mind. In this case, this legal foundation serves to protect the right of the worker from dicriminatory actions by an employer.

In closing, my remarks have covered what I believe to be two important considerations relating to bill C–240. First, several legislative safeguards are currently in place to protect employees from discriminatory treatment at the hands of their employers. Indeed, I see no evidence to change my view that the present industrial relations climate does not warrant such legislation.

Second, if this bill were to be adopted, I believe it would be rendered redundant by the fact that the existing provisions of parts I, II, and III of the Canada Labour Code are comprehensive in the protection afforded to the rights of canadian workers.

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to participate in the debate today on this private member's bill.

What the private member is attempting to do is introduce legislation which would toughen up the Canada Labour Code. The effort is very laudable. He believes that there is a perception out there that workers feel that if they report or if they are asked to do an illegal activity and they report it, they would be punished for doing so.

I would argue that this protection already exists in the Canada Labour Code. It exists through grievance procedures, it exists through the unjust dismissal procedures, and so on. There is a fine in the Canada Labour Code which is the result of a lot of consultation and refinements over the years. There are a lot of fine checks and balances which do provide that protection, especially to those under federal jurisdiction.

From the intent of this bill people might believe that management asks its employees to break the law and do illegal or dangerous activities. I do not believe this to be the case so much any more. Management today is quite responsible about that sort of thing. We have provincial labour practices and the Canada Labour Code.

Employers and firms coming under the jurisdiction of the Canada Labour Code, such as companies operating in the transportation, communication and other major industries of national importance, play a key role in the Canadian economy.

The hon. member for Kootenay West—Revelstoke introduced this bill in response to a specific isolated incident which occurred in his riding many years ago. I believe it had to do with pulp mills. The proposed amendment does not accurately portray the current state of employer-employee relations in industries under federal jurisdiction.

There are many penalties which can be imposed on an employer by the Canada Labour Relations Board, and the board plays an important role in these aspects. When an employee has been disciplined for refusing to perform an act that he or she had reason to believe was prohibited by the law, the board may order specific action to be taken against that employer.

One example of such a penalty is that under section 99 of the Canada Labour Code, the Canada Labour Relations Board may order an employer to reinstate an employee who has been laid off or otherwise discriminated against. It may order the employer to pay to an employee compensation that he or she was forced to forgo as a result of this discrimination.

We have two examples. The employer can be required to reinstate the employee and pay that employee compensation. Also, the board may ask the employer to rescind any disciplinary action that may be taken against that employee. Those are strong regulations in the Canada Labour Code.

What this member is doing is introducing a bill which if passed would supplant the penalties in the Canada Labour Code and impose others. I do not believe this might be appropriate. Is it appropriate for the Canada Labour Relations Board to become involved in disciplinary matters resulting from attempts by employees to enforce legislation other than the Canada Labour Code? The Canada Environmental Protection Act, for example, sets out specific protection for persons who have attempted to enforce that act.

Section 58(4) of the Canada Environmental Protection Act states: "Notwithstanding any other act of Parliament no employee of a department, board or agency of the Government of Canada or of a corporation to which any regulation made under 54 applied shall be disciplined, dismissed or harassed for making a report".

Each law of Parliament has its own disciplinary provisions. The Canada Labour Code has its own, and each is applied to each jurisdiction.

I would like to emphasize that Parliament is in the best position to determine the seriousness of the obligations any given situation might impose and the remedies that are likely to be most appropriate to the circumstance.

In the case of labour relations, the prohibitions and penalties or method of redress established for labour relations purposes under the Canada Labour Code are not likely to be commensurate with the requirements of other pieces of legislation. The prohibitions and remedial measures in the code were established to give meanings to the rights granted to employees and employers under the code. They should not be expected to perform a function different than their original purpose.

Workers who have been subject to discriminatory treatment by employers, because they have attempted to enforce the provisions of legislation, already have recourse to numerous protections that have been described by other hon. members in this debate.

I would like to comment briefly on a course of action open to employees that has not yet been mentioned. We have already heard a number of examples of the protections that are available to employees directly in the provisions of parts I, II and III of the Canada Labour Code. I mentioned those before. The Labour Relations Board may be able to step in. It would rescind any disciplinary action. It would ask to reinstate the employee and the employer could be made to give a payment to an employee. There are others.

One that has not been mentioned is the grievance procedure. There is a grievance procedure because if you are in a period of collective bargaining, let us say there is an agreement for two years, during that period there are to be no strikes by the union or lock-outs by the company. During that two year period, for example, there has to be a method of solving disputes and that is the grievance procedure. We have a grievance procedure to which employees can avail themselves.

The grievance procedure provides an avenue of appeal for employees covered by collective agreements. For those not covered, there is the unjust dismissal provisions of part III of the code. These address the rights of the unorganized, non-union employees who are not covered by collective agreement. The grievance procedure provides an appeal procedure for other employees.

I would like to indicate that when our labour laws were constructed, they were constructed with enforcement penalties appropriate to the Labour Relations Act and consistent with the spirit of the intent of labour legislation. For this reason, and because of the numerous methods of appeal available to employees in support of their rights, I would respectively submit that Bill C-240 should not proceed any further.

I would very much like to compliment the member for Kootenay West—Revelstoke for bringing it to our attention. It is a laudable bill. The spirit of the bill can be admired, but I believe that employees have many recourses of action to which they may avail themselves. They have full protection under the law. This has worked out to be quite a strong protection and has worked well up until now. Therefore, I do not believe that we should proceed further with this bill.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the debate on private members' Bill C-240. Those who have taken part in the debate have presented for the consideration of hon. members the results of their reflections on the content of the bill introduced by the hon. member for Kootenay West—Revelstoke.

• (1750)

Over the course of the debate today on this bill, we have heard much about the intended purpose of the bill. We have also heard about some of the practical difficulties or legislative conflicts which might arise in implementing its provisions.

Hon. members who have spoken in the debate have made a number of useful and constructive observations, and some of these remarks stand out as particularly relevant. We should keep these in mind as we consider the acceptability of the proposed amendment.

One such line of debate has been to the effect that several legislative avenues currently exist to protect employees against unfair treatment by employers in situations in which they refuse to carry out an act that is contrary to the law. Because of these protections found in the existing legislation, Bill C-240's recommendations for change have been described by some as being redundant.

Part I of the Canada Labour Code, for example, protects the rights of workers to refuse to carry out an act that is prohibited under the code. These protections would prevent an employer from discriminating against or treating an employee unfairly by an alteration in pay, a suspension or dismissal where the employee refused to carry out an employer's directive that is specifically forbidden by the code.

Another example is found in the health and safety provisions of part II of the code. These procedures establish safeguards which serve to protect the employee's right to refuse to do work that would endanger his or her person without fear of reprisals or retaliation by an employer, including dismissal. An employee dismissed for exercising this right, under this section of the code, has the right for appeal and, in this case, to the Canada Labour Relations Board.

Part III of the code, under labour standards, contains a section dealing with unjust dismissal. It provides an employee who is not represented by a trade union with the right to make a complaint in writing to a federal inspector if the employee feels that he or she has been unjustly dismissed.

There are provisions for written statements by the employer outlining the reasons for the dismissal as well as for further stages of appeal, including involvement by the federal inspector and the appointment of an adjudicator by the Minister of Labour.

At the adjudication stage there is a full opportunity for the parties in the complaint to present evidence and make submissions prior to a final decision.

Reference has also been made to the fact that unionized workers under the code are covered by collective agreements which generally contain grievance procedure mechanisms. The grievance procedure provides an appeal procedure for employees covered by the contract who feel that their rights have been abridged along the way. The unjust dismissal provisions of part III of the code address the rights of the non-unionized employees who are not covered by a collective agreement. The grievance procedure provides an appeal procedure for organized employees covered by the collective bargaining regime.

In addition, it should be noted that provisions found within the Human Rights Act give prominence to the role of the citizen in society and mandate the Human Rights Commission to hear complaints by the individual.

If there is an alternative review procedure available to the complainant that ought to be exhausted, or if there is another act of Parliament with a more appropriate procedure for dealing with the complaint, the commission, that being the Human Rights Commission, will direct the complainant in the most effective course of action.

It was pointed out by a previous speaker that labour relations issues often border on subjects within the purview of the human rights legislation. Given this fact, the Human Rights Commission can clearly be a practical alternative avenue of appeal for employees who might be the victim of the discriminatory treatment contemplated by Bill C-240. It is a treatment and a concern that certainly the member who has proposed this bill has been concerned about.

I found it especially interesting to note the concept of progressive discipline and its importance before adjudicators in appeal proceedings in federal jurisdiction industries. It is clearly a process that encourages fairness in the treatment of employees in disciplinary matters.

The practice of issuing warning letters to employees in writing not only documents the disciplinary process but also provides an encouragement to employers to treat their workers with fairness.

In the context of Bill C-240, the process implied in this concept would also encourage employers to refrain from counselling workers to act in ways that would be contrary to the law.

An important comment was made earlier in the debate in the reference to the provisions of the Canada Environmental Protection Act. The act explicitly protects individuals from discriminatory measures or ultimate dismissal because the individual seeks to enforce the provisions of the act.

This protection is specific to the Environmental Protection Act just as the current provision, section 94(3) of the Canada Labour Code is specific to the code and not to some other act.

I agree with the earlier speaker in questioning the appropriateness of having the Canada Labour Relations Board, as provided in Bill C-240, involved in disciplinary matters related to attempts by employees to enforce legislation other than the Canada Labour Code.

This illustrates the point that each type of legislation should have its own enforcement mechanisms and penalties appropriate to the nature of the particular legislation and Parliament is best equipped to make such a determination.

In the case of labour relations, the prohibitions and penalties for a method of redress established under the Canada Labour Code were established to reinforce the rights granted to employees and employers under its jurisdiction.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe the hon. member's time has expired. The hon. member for Bramalea—Gore—Malton has another couple of minutes before six o'clock.

Mr. Harry Chadwick (Bramalea—Gore—Malton): Mr. Speaker, previous speakers have outlined a number of major objections to the bill under consideration today, Bill C–240.

They have argued that measures already exist to protect workers who might be forced by an employer to carry out an act that contravenes a particular law. As detailed in their remarks, there are several ways in which an individual worker is protected against the form of discrimination described in the bill.

In my opinion, the adoption of this bill would only serve to confuse the functioning of our current legal structure since it would subject certain matters that are dealt with in other legislation to labour law, as found in the Canada Labour Code.

• (1800)

In my remarks today, I would like to briefly comment on the Canadian Human Rights Act. When we consider the alternatives available to individuals, including workers who feel they are being discriminated against or treated unjustly by employers, the human rights act is particularly relevant. It spells out its purpose very clearly in the preamble to the act. The purpose of the act is:

> To extend the laws of Canada to give effect to the principle that every individual should have an equal opportunity with other individuals to make for himself or herself the life that he or she is able and wishes to have, consistent with his or her duties and obligations as a member of society.

While the Canadian Human Rights Act—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret to inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

The time for consideration of Private Members' Business now has expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, when I raised this question originally in the House in October, I was asking the minister what he would do about the government's high interest rate, high dollar, high tax policies that were driving thousands of Canadian shoppers south of the border and thousands of Canadian jobs to the United States. At that time, the unemployment rate in Canada was 10.2 per cent and the minister said his policies were working. He told us that: "The unemployment rate is going down, not going up".

Today we find ourselves with an unemployment rate of 10.4 per cent. Unemployment is going up. It is not just the unemployment rate but it is the thousands of people who have dropped out of the work force in addition to those who are not getting recorded. On top of that there are a record number of Canadian welfare cases. This government's high interest rate, high dollar, high tax policies still continue to plague Canadians.

The minister is unrelenting. We have had three interest rate increases in the last three weeks. The interest rate has gone up 47 basis points. This is an attempt by the government to keep the dollar up, but the high dollar is what is costing us jobs. Our interest rate in Canada is more than twice the U.S. rate. The U.S. rate is 3.50 per cent. In Canada, the rate is now up to 7.46 per cent. This is away beyond the historical spreads with the American rates.

Who is this helping? It is not helping Canadian producers or Canadian exporters; Canadian businesses that want to create jobs here. This is the difficulty with this policy. Today we saw one response. Rather than dealing with some of the fundamentals such as our tax structure, high interest rates, high dollar structure which is driving these jobs south and Canadian consumers south, the government brought in some band-aid measures to stop cross-border shopping from decimating communities along our entire frontier.

What did we see? There was no tax measure in respect of gasoline. They did not deal with the question of gasoline pricing in Canada vis-à-vis the United States, yet our Liberal Party task force on deindustrialization and economic renewal found in our hearings that this was the single biggest reason why Canadians went to the United States to shop, cheaper gas prices. We met truckers who had not bought fuel in Canada in six months; they bought it all in the States.

What else did this government do? It attempted to blackmail the provinces into harmonizing their provincial sales taxes with the GST. It said: "We will collect provincial sales taxes on cross-border shoppers who are returning to Canada but only if you harmonize your provincial sales taxes with our GST". In other words, you impose your provincial sales taxes on things you are not taxing already such as clothes, food, shoes, books and many other items. We say to the government tonight that the provinces will not be blackmailed into introducing the GST.

Finally, the government is decimating the mail order industry. What does it do? It does not give us a level playing field. The Americans put a $10 charge on Canadians doing business there. We put on a $5 charge. For whom is this government working? Let it get its act together.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to respond to my hon. colleague's remarks. I want to remind members of this House that we are working and considering the people of this country in the policies we have put in place and the policies we are continuing to bring forward.

We have to be prudent. We have to be careful where we spend our money and we have to make sure that when we do harmonize measures we are saving money. The government believes that the economy is on the road to recovery. To do this we had to bring inflation under control. Inflation pressures had to be reduced, there is no question about it. I am sure the hon. member would agree. As well, it is essential for sustainable lower interest rates if we follow that program.

We believe our policies are working. Inflation pressures are easing. Over the second half of 1991, CPI inflation was 1.7 per cent. Interest rates had declined in step and are almost 7 per cent lower than their peak in May 1990. The prime interest rate is 7.5 per cent, the lowest rate since May 1973.

The economic recovery began in the second quarter of 1991 and is continuing. UDP, a factor cost, grew at an annual rate of 3.3 per cent in the second and third quarters of 1991. The pace of the recovery weakened in the fourth quarter due in large part to a weak international economy, particularly the unexpected weakness in the United States. As growth picks up in the United States, Canadians will benefit from an expanding market for their exports and a stronger over-all economy.

EDUCATION

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak in more depth on a question which I previously asked the Minister of Employment and Immigration regarding the government's lack of commitment to students.

I would like to share with this House some of the feedback that has been received from students in Prince Edward Island. In today's Guardian, a report indicates that students are questioning the federal government's sincerity when it comes to student needs. A delegation of Island students report that skyrocketing tuition fees, federal funding cuts for post-secondary education, taxes on student loans and books make it difficult to believe that the federal government is serious about a prosperous future for Canadians.

According to Andrew Hughes, a representative of the P.E.I. branch of the Canadian Federation of Students: "The student delegation wants the Mulroney government to start living up to its word as stated in the prosperity agenda. It is hard right now to take the government at its word. Instead of providing a clear path for students to further their education, they are constantly creating barriers".

I have quoted Mr. Hughes to demonstrate that this is not a partisan argument, it is a legitimate argument. Certainly we have been trying to make the same argument on this side of the House for some time.

The consequences of this government's education policies become increasingly apparent in the Canadian labour market and the Productivity Centre quarterly report.

Despite the fact that the unemployment rate across the country is at 10.4 per cent, despite the fact that in my province the unemployment rate is at 16.9 per cent, the second highest in the country, there are approximately 300,000 jobs available in Canada that cannot be filled.

This is an unacceptable situation. There are almost 1.5 million Canadians out of work so there are enough jobs available to accommodate approximately 20 per cent of the unemployed Canadians. Many of these positions require skills that unemployed people do not have. This is also affecting our productivity as a nation. The same quarterly report, 1989, indicated that Canadian businesses were having production difficulties because they could not find enough skilled employees and they expected the problem to get worse unless education and training policies were changed.

While the recession may have lessened the current impact of this problem, the need to improve our labour force skills still exists. The need for greater skills and education requirements is obvious. Yet, there is not a decline in the number of graduates from post-secondary institutions. It is obvious that if the country is to prosper, if our work force is to be competitive, if we are to ensure that the current level of unemployment is reduced, we must make sure that our education system is accessible and affordable.

I repeat my question to the minister. Will this government remove the 3 per cent surtax on student loans? Will it remove the 7 per cent GST on textbooks? Will the government stop cutting back on funding to post-secondary education which is causing tuition fees to sky-rocket? Will this government finally recognize that students in our education system are the most important block upon which our future competitiveness must be built? Will this minister agree to take action today?

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the prosperity initiative is an opportunity for all Canadians to contribute to the development of a plan of action for our future economic and social well-being.

In launching this initiative, the Minister of Employment and Immigration tabled a discussion paper "Learning Well, Living Well". This paper identifies a number of the learning challenges facing Canadians and Canada in this decade.

To meet the challenges of the future, Canada will have to improve upon its learning system. High skills jobs, a competitive economy, economic prosperity and a good quality of life are interdependent. To maintain them all Canadians must build a learning system which boosts basic skills and encourages a much higher level of advanced skills.

The government acting alone cannot create a learning culture. On the contrary. There is little government, any government, can do on its own to develop a learning culture. It will require partnerships among all interested groups and for this reason the government invites all Canadians, parents, students, teachers, labour and management, to participate in the prosperity initiative.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, the other day in the House I stood to declare that across this country, Canada's 38,000 dairy, egg and poultry producers are preparing to storm Parliament Hill to protest this government's wavering position on the future of marketing boards and supply management. They are holding this government directly accountable for the future of supply management and for the future of the agricultural industry in Canada.

They want the Prime Minister to declare that his government will settle for nothing less than the clarification of article XI in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, nothing less than an unequivocal commitment to supply management.

The proposals that were tabled December 11, 1991, by GATT director Arthur Dunkel would effectively destroy article XI and with it destroy the economic underpinnings that Canada has developed for its dairy, egg and poultry industries. The Dunkel proposals I think are proof positive that the United States is about to get its way with supply management in Canada. It has been bullying its way toward the elimination of quotas as a means of penetrating the Canadian market.

Tariffication will not work. It is incompatible with the principle of supply management. It will knock out the pillars and once supply management is dead, it is simply a matter of reducing the tariffs and then they have got us. That will open the entire Canadian market to excess U.S. agricultural production and will kill the Canadian dairy, poultry and egg producing industries.

When I asked the Prime Minister on February 5 whether he would get tough with the Americans and declare his unequivocal support of supply management, he replied that this government had maintained a vigorous defence of Canada's marketing board structure and will continue to do so. Those kinds of statements are why nobody believes the Prime Minister anymore. While he was waxing philosophic about the virtues of supply management, we find that his Minister for International Trade has been providing all government MPs with briefing notes on how to get out of supply management and sell the concept of tariffication. If you do not believe me, Mr. Speaker, just ask the head of the B.C. Lower Mainland Dairymen's Association.

While the government talks a good line about how it is fighting hard for the principles of supply management, all the while it is quietly preparing to dump marketing boards and sacrifice the future of Canadian farmers.

The other day the Prime Minister chided me for suggesting that we play tough with the Americans. He trivialized the issue by suggesting that we also declare war on them. The Prime Minister knows full well that Canada has been a saint when it comes to the observance of the rules of GATT. He knows full well that we have always abided by its rulings while most other countries I might add, including the United States, have transgressed those recommendations and rulings at will.

I say to the Prime Minister that now is the time to stand up and be counted. Now is the time to get tough and to defend the future of our Canadian farming community, to defend our Canadian way of life because if we lose marketing boards we are going to lose the industry. We are going to jeopardize 38,000 poultry, egg, and dairy operations in all regions of Canada which provide over 60,000 jobs in the production sector and 36,000 jobs in processing.

Tariffication puts a $10 billion industry in grave danger. If the government rolls over on this one, we will dismantle the system which directly provides more than 97,000 Canadian jobs.

That is why Canadian farmers have taken their gloves off. They are not prepared to stand by and watch everything they have worked so darned hard for go down the tubes.

They are angry. They are worried. They want action. From B.C., Ontario, Quebec, and elsewhere across Canada our dairy, egg, and poultry producers are preparing to take a stand. They are preparing to storm Parliament Hill if this Prime Minister and this government fail to keep their promise to maintain our supply management systems and to preserve our Canadian way of life.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it would be very easy to get into a very intense debate on this issue, but we will leave that for another day.

To say that farmers are going to storm Parliament Hill I believe is exaggerating. The farmers I spoke to representing the farm communities, the farm leaders, said they want to come here to show their support for the government's position, their position, in respect to article XI and the furthering and clarifying of article XI, not to come here to create problems with great anger and great fight. To say they are going to storm the Hill is exaggerating a situation, especially with the farm leaders I have spoken with as recently as four o'clock this afternoon.

To say that MPs on the government side have a document indicating how to get rid of supply management is utterly ridiculous. That is not the case. I would love to see a copy of it if the member is so certain there is something like that. I do not believe any member of Parliament does have that.

Canada's position to support article XI has not changed. It is no wonder the producers are confused in this country from the statements that were made here tonight and during other times in Question Period because this government has never wavered in its support. It continues to support the position that was taken over a year ago that was developed by the farm leaders, the federal government, and the provincial government. We had strong supporters that balanced good position and we will maintain that.

I want to assure all members of the House that we are not about to abandon our supply management industries as the negotiations on programs progress. We believe it is a good program. It is a time to be solid, not divided. It is unfortunate that very often comments made in this House indicate that we are divided on the issue. That is not the case.

BREAST IMPLANTS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, each year over one million Canadian women are diagnosed with breast cancer. Over 150,000 of these women have resorted to implants to try to ease the trauma of a painful and humiliating surgery and disfigurement that results from this terrible disease. Their fears were eased because Health and Welfare Canada has assured women again and again that there is not sufficient evidence that these products are dangerous.

• (1820)

Today I had the opportunity to speak to a remarkably wonderful woman whom I have had the privilege of getting to know over the past few months. This woman had cancer and subsequent surgery, followed by silicone implants. That was only the beginning. She soon found out that these implants are not safe. Despite Health and Welfare Canada's approval, these products cause even greater pain and suffering. Thousands of women across Canada have suffered major complications from these devices. Dow Corning, a major American producer, has had doubts about their safety since 1971 but it has continued to sell these products anyway. That is 21 years ago, over two decades.

Health and Welfare Canada too has had reason to doubt the safety of the implants. In fact, in 1986, which is over five years ago, a senior scientist at Health and Welfare was fired for questioning the safety of these products, and yet they continue to be sold.

Earlier this week I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare what he was doing to ensure an effective and safe product review process. He responded that there already is a serious review process. He even had the gall to boast that silicone gel implants are no longer available on the market.

Manufacturers of these implants were requested to stop distributing these products only last month, yet we know that most of the doctors have them in their offices and will continue to use them as long as they are there.

Mr. Speaker, you will note that I did not mention the name of this woman, the reason being that she has received death threats, not one but several, on her answering machine. When she gets home at night from work, she takes her messages off her machine and the message is: "You will die for promoting what you are doing with regard to these implants". This woman has organized a group of women, probably 800 women, in her area. They meet regularly. In fact, they have a conference coming up very, very shortly.

Despite what the minister said here in the House yesterday, she has filed conclusive evidence with the minister that these implants are defective and that they are cancer causing. Yet the minister continues to deny, deny, deny.

I too would like to mention that I have also received a threat. My threat was by letter. My threat was by the distributor of this product, where he challenged me to dare to say the things that I say in the House of Commons on this product outside the House. I consider that a threat and a harassment of the worst kind.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Mrs. Gaffney: I suggest to the minister once again that it is becoming increasingly clear to me that there is a major cover-up. Who is hiding what at women's expense? I believe the issue is so serious that the RCMP should be called in to investigate. I ask the minister this: What will he do to ensure the product review process is improved so that an atrocity like this will never happen again, and that this one must cease immediately?

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the government would like to use the opportunity following several weeks of media claims and statements in the House to bring hon. members up to date on the department's actions concerning silicone gel-filled breast implants.

First, let me say that Health and Welfare is very concerned about the comments expressed over the fear of cancer following breast implant surgery. Let me put a stop to speculations right now. Dr. Hans Berkel and his colleagues in Alberta demonstrated clearly that women who have breast augmentation do not have an increased risk of breast cancer. He also found that breast implants do not decrease the survival of breast cancer patients.

This is a very powerful study. More than 11,000 breast implant patients were followed for an average of 10 years. Where 49 cases of breast cancer were expected in the normal population, 23 developed breast cancer after breast implants.

Rarely in the field of science can a better demonstration be made about the low risk of using a medical device. This work which was done in Canada by reputable epidemiologists is confirmed by a similar study done in the United States.

I wish then to reassure the women in Canada who have silicone breast implants that at this time there is no evidence to support the scare tactics used by media and others.

Let us go on now to the basis of this whole discussion. This basis centres on the fact that the Department of National Health and Welfare makes its decisions on safety and effectiveness based on science, not on media reports, not on innuendo and not on testimony of unusual events.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, on November 21, just after the announcement of a $700 million package of aid to grain and oilseed producers, I stood in my place and raised a question with the Minister of Agriculture about the methods being used in implementing that program. There had been an announcement that about $7 an acre would be paid for crop land, a quarter of that payment for lands that were seeded to summer fallow, and lands seeded to forage crops would also get one-quarter of that amount.

I wish to respond further to that answer tonight, because it seemed to me that the Minister of Agriculture in his response was pretending ignorance of his own government's policies and his own department's stated objectives.

Among the stated objectives of that department are to encourage diversification and market responsiveness.

Because of the market conditions, a great number of farmers, particularly in the northern prairies in western Canada, have seeded good two, three and four class farming land to forage crops, alfalfa and other grasses. Some of those crops are being processed into cubes and pellets for shipment to the Japanese and South Korean markets and elsewhere. These are export commodities. They depend on export prices. Their market was ruined just as thoroughly by the U.S.-European trade war as any other market.

In his response the minister seemed to ignore that hay prices respond to those same market influences and they are also low. He also seemed to think that his government was doing a good job of looking after forage crops because he talked about having paid something like $50 million in the prairie region to promote forage production and $22 million in the rest of Canada to promote forage production, making a total of $72 million to forage producers.

What he ignored was the sense of my question. I pointed out that I was talking about forage seeded on classes one to four farm land, the very best farm land in Canada. He should have known as the Minister of Agriculture that the program he was talking about only applies to classes five, six and lower classes of farm land. In other words, the program applies to lands that probably should not be growing grains and oilseeds to begin with.

He has totally missed the point and is not addressing the very real problem that the countryside is going to be faced with, now that we have GRIP and this program here. Both of those programs have ignored forage production as an integral part of agricultural production in the northern prairies. He is encouraging those lands to be worked up again and planted into cereals and oil seeds which the system does not need.

I think he has to recognize that forage production is a legitimate crop and pay it on the same basis as cereals and oilseeds.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would like to reinforce and say again that the government came through, as it always has before, and supported farmers with a program of $800 million assistance under the FSAM II. That was in November 1991.

The way the payments were delivered to producers grew out of extensive consultations between this government and members of the Third Line of Defence Committee. This committee is made up of industry, producers, academics and provincial representatives.

The payments were made on the recommendations of producers, academics and provincial representatives. That was how it was made up. It was not totally a minister's decision.

This committee recommended we deliver the assistance based on seeded acreage and pay 25 per cent on summer fallow and 25 per cent on forage.

This serves as another example of how the federal government continues to consult with those affected before making any decisions. It is a process the opposition parties should be supporting.

• (1830)

Hon. members should realize that of the three options delivered to the government by the Third Line of Defence Committee, the government selected the one that included the highest level of payments for forage and summer fallow.

The government, under the provisions of FSAM I, delivered $50 million to promote forage production in the prairie region and an additional $22 million to promote forage production in the rest of Canada.

That could hardly be interpreted as the government penalizing farmers with forage crops.

The $700 million is being delivered to compensate that sector for the level of hurt it has sustained as well. The low commodity prices, caused by the international trade war, have been why we have had to stand there and support a program in this country that has been caused by the devastating things that the U.S. and the EEC have been doing.

SPECIAL DEBATE

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to order made on Wednesday, February 5, 1992, the House will continue the debate on the adjournment motion for the sole purpose of allowing members to make presentations on the results of discussions they have had with their constituents on the constitutional issue.

The hon. member for Lévis.

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, during the past few days we have heard members report to the House on the results of their discussions with Canadians on the constitutional process. During 1991, I also consulted with Canadians, including my own constituents. My questions focused on the economy and a number of items that could be included in the Constitution. Together, these could be defined as an anti-deficit clause.

I think we should take advantage of the fact that Canadians generally disapprove of deficits. Perhaps this would be a good time to include in the Constitution a clause that would put elected representatives in a better position to administer the governments of this country.

The clause would contain certain parameters according to which our elected representatives would be obliged to bring their spending in time wiht the resources of the community, without mortgaging the lives of future generations.

It is time we stopped using deficits as a substitute for taxes. It is easy to say yes to the demands of taxpayers and voters during an election campaign. However, if the Constitution provided for maintaining a balance between what the community pays and earns and what governments can give that community, I think this would make for a fairer and franker political debate during election campaigns. It would mean that candidates, irrespective of their political stripe, would have to explain to voters that the program they are offering or the program voters want would cost a certain amount of money, and that this amount would be raised through the tax system. Today, party candidates are far less forthcoming and are inclined to advertise programs without mentioning the cost involved to the taxpayers because as politicians, they know they will always be able to borrow to fill their orders.

I think that if they face certain restrictions, this may be the best way to reduce the deficits incurred by federal, provincial and municipal governments. Granted, people will say this is technical, that it may create certain problems when definning expenditures. We are used to describing government expenditures in terms of envelopes for the various departments. I would say that if we included an anti-deficit clause, expenditures would also have to include what we call tax expenditures, such as tax rebates enjoyed by taxpayers in certain cases and also the constraints governments impose on certain companies, including environmental or social constraints.

Those are part of the expenses incurred by the community and they should be included in the context of an anti-deficit clause. Some will refer to the famous theory of Keynes, an economist who lived from 1883 until 1946, to oppose an anti-deficit clause in the Constitution. A lot of people refer to that theory these days, but I say that it is obsolete. For one thing, it applied at a time when there was no unemployment. According to that theory, it is in a period of economic difficulties that important public projects should be undertaken. Nowadays, unemployment is always high, it is a chronic problem. The conditions are not what they were in 1950 or 1960.

Also, if governments decide during a period of recession or economic crisis to announce important public projects, whether it is the building of roads, houses, et cetera, once the decision is made, these programs must go through the hands of many technocrats and it often takes from 18 to 24 months before they become reality. At that point, economic recovery is under way and the programs that were announced during the economic crisis become inflationary programs that create an artificial demand on money. That is the reason why Keynes theory must not be taken into consideration.

Some will also say that we must provide implementation mechanisms. We will not be able to achieve that in 365 days. But I believe that if there is a consensus to adopt such a clause, we could allow a period of a few years to absorb the accumulated deficit and then, inevitably, there will be no more deficit in the budget.

Some will also mention emergency situations, such as a war or an environmental disaster. In such instances we could for all intents and purposes have a form of agreement or a vote requiring the approval of 75 per cent of the members of the House, or some other mechanism that would have to be discussed and developed further.

After having tried to sell this anti-deficit clause, I received comments and I will end on that note. I received a letter from the Business Council on National Issues which says that this organization would approve the inclusion of an anti-deficit clause in the Constitution. The letter is dated January 8 1992 and it is addressed to me.

I also have a letter dated December 17, 1991 from the Conseil du patronat du Québec which says that it agrees in principle with including such a clause. Last fall, the Conseil du patronat appeared before the caucuses of members of the Quebec government, the Parti Québécois caucus and the Liberal Party caucus, to suggest that they include a no-deficit clause in their legislative process. Also, the Quebec Chamber of Commerce, when it appeared before the federal Committee on the Constitution, said that the Chamber—the Quebec Chamber of Commerce—reiterates its support for the idea of putting in the Constitution the principle that the federal and provincial governments must balance their budgets, as municipal governments are already legislated to do.

That is serious support. Also, I have very important support from a local source, the South Shore Chamber of Commerce, which for all practical purposes covers the federal riding of Lévis. They officially supported my plan for a no-deficit clause in the Constitution. I have two more major supporters, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and Timothy Rae, who said that the deficit problem should be included when the constitutional issue is settled. I refer to an article in the Financial Post of July 4, 1991.

I will conclude, Mr. Speaker. I also received 432 resolutions from municipal councils throughout Canada. I have excerpts from the resolutions of those councils, all 432 of which are in favour of having a no-deficit clause in the Constitution. These resolutions come from all the provinces of Canada.

• (1840)

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I ask those who are responsible for presenting the federal government's position and even all federal members of Parliament to take account of what many Canadians who pay and generate wealth want. They have a right to say how this wealth will be spent.

[English]

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not know a great deal about constitutional law, but I do know that I am living in a great country and that it has the potential to become even greater.

As Canadians we sometimes forget how good we have it. Canada is one of the most peaceful and prosperous nations on this earth. You just have to ask those outside of Canada. There are thousands of people lined up at embassies all over the world trying to emigrate to our country.

We cannot afford to let constitutional issues divide us and ruin our great land. We need to build a climate where consensus can be reached. It is time to focus.

We need to concentrate on what we want. We also need to concentrate on what we have. We must examine the things we have in common and build on our strengths by looking toward the future.

We must establish a Canadian vision, a blueprint for the next generation. We must address the things all Canadians would like to preserve and achieve, instead of the things that divide us.

Then we can begin to agree. Once we begin to agree, we can develop a climate favourable for negotiation. Then we can reach consensus.

It has been my pleasure during the last few months to help residents of Ottawa Centre participate in a constitutional discussion. Many of my constituents have strong opinions and interesting ideas on the Constitution.

In December I distributed a referendum form on the constitutional proposals throughout my riding. The referendum summarized the proposals and divided them into three broad sections, keeping with the government format. Constituents were asked to mark whether they agreed, disagreed or were undecided about each proposal. They were also asked to write down specific comments if they wished.

So far, my office has received in excess of 200 responses. It is obvious to me that Canadians, at least in my riding, like to be directly consulted. We have received a high number of replies in a short time and many forms with written comments. When asked to help, the people feel empowered to set the direction for the country.

Our methods were not scientific and our statistics are not necessarily accurate. However, we have noticed some strong general convictions. Ottawa Centre residents who responded are most concerned about parliamentary reform, economic union and a strong central government.

Respondents expressed overwhelming approval of the proposals that allow more free votes in the House of Commons and called for an elected Senate. In both cases the yes vote was about 80 per cent.

On the proposals dealing with Senate appointments more concentration on Private Members' Business, and the question of provinces and territories submitting names for appointments to the Supreme Court, the support was between 50 and 70 per cent. When asked to comment, respondents clearly demanded reform of the House of Commons and the Senate.

Respondents also approved of proposals dealing with the Canadian economic union. Almost 95 per cent supported the elimination of trade barriers within Canada.

Around 75 per cent supported the proposals dealing with federal power to make laws for the economic union and harmonization of the government budget process.

Fifty–five per cent of the people supported the distinct society clause for Quebec.

Constituents were less supportive of the devolution of power to the provinces. Only the proposals dealing with culture, immigration and broadcasting issues received more than 60 per cent support.

The level of support for other proposals was somewhere between 30 and 50 per cent. For example only 30 per cent supported the elimination of the declaratory power.

It is clear to me from these results that many Ottawa Centre residents want to make the country work. They also have a good idea of what they want Canada to look like.

The referendum is not the only constitutional initiative underway in Ottawa Centre. Something different is happening in my riding. I have been working closely with several Ottawa Centre residents who have set up a constituency assembly process.

They are trying to bring the constitutional discussion down to the grassroots level. The organizers are convinced that there is a need for a fresh approach to the constitutional debate in this country. They believe Canadians are ready to contribute fresh ideas and are looking for channels to do so.

The constituency assembly process is designed to provide such channels. It is a non–partisan citizens' initiative that, by definition, includes everyone in the constituency. The structure stimulates informed discussion and allows for a wide variety of input and perspectives. The intention is not to build a consensus, but to express ideas.

The assembly involves organizing and sharing the results of work study projects on the Constitution. So far, it consists of several workshops and an open house.

As far as I am aware, Ottawa Centre is the first constituency to organize a creative democratic process of this nature.

Of course, the assembly was not created in a vacuum. It follows an information session on the Constitution that I hosted last spring, a discussion meeting on the Constitution convened in June, and a workshop series offered through the summer on Parliament Hill. It was all at the initiative of the constituents.

The whole process has been assisted by the creation of an open register to record study projects. The register facilitates communication between Ottawa Centre constituents concerned about the Constitution. Currently over 30 projects have been registered. It is our hope that the register will eventually aid networking between constituencies.

The assembly organizers recognize that citizens are responsible for their Constitution and government. They are hoping the assembly process will deepen the democratic basis of constitutional discussion.

By encouraging Canadians to participate directly in the political process, they believe their approach will show that Canadians have more things in common than the differences that divide them.

They see the constitutional issue not as a crisis for Canada, but a remarkable opportunity to preserve and develop common sense assets such as goodwill, peace and mobility.

I feel tremendously privileged to have constituents who take the concept of self-government so seriously. There are so many of them. I wish to especially acknowledge Gail Stewart, Nancy Doubleday and Dianne Corke. They are actively involved in the political process and they are encouraging others to contribute as well. Such input can only benefit Canadian politicians and make the process of governing richer.

The constituency assembly will likely continue regardless of government deadlines. Ottawa Centre residents still have a lot to say about the Constitution. The process is also flexible enough to include issues of national interest other than the Constitution. I think it is a model that could be adopted in other ridings.

I am tabling some documentation related to the constituency assembly process. Some of this material has already been tabled with the special joint committee on a renewed Canada.

It is my hope that other members of Parliament will be encouraged to organize grassroots initiatives with members of their riding. My constituents have been talking about the need to identify and build on common Canadian interests.

A few days ago I received a letter signed "I am a Canadian". This person eloquently expressed what it means to be a Canadian. I would like to close by quoting him or her.

> For me, Canada is more than a country and more than a nation. Canada, for me, is tolerance, open channels of communication, and peaceful methods of solving differences of opinion and disagreements. Canada, for me, is a great open society, in which everyone is equal and at the same time can be unique and distinct. Canada for me is a humane society that cares for the well-being of its members: their health, education and living conditions. Canada, for me, is a society that is fair, just and positive. Canada, for me, is a society that cares about pollution, and seeks to reduce it within its boundaries and beyond. Canada, for me, is a society that understands the importance of preserving nature and all species, and knows the destruction of nature will eventually lead to the destruction of mankind. Canada, for me, is a society made up of individuals, nations and races that came from the old ways of the old countries to find and pursue better ways for all—to walk into the future with open eyes, and to improve it for all. For me, Canada is not only a land for British and French, it is land that we all came to share together with those who were here first. For me, Canadian culture is neither English nor French—it is the culture of peace, and I consider myself privileged to be part of it. For me, Canada is a ray of hope shining in the sky of humanity and the greatest country on Earth.

• (1850)

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to thank the Sarnia—Lambton Committee for Canada's Future for taking the constitutional proposals as presented by our government to my community for discussion.

This committee is a constituent assembly formed to collect views and write a report on the federal government's constitutional reform proposals. Citizens from our community volunteered or were approached from a variety of backgrounds and societal groups to form the constituent committee.

The committee met as a group and with the public on 13 occasions and an information booth was manned by the members at the Sarnia Eaton Centre on November 27 through 29, 1991.

Interaction with the public of our community took place at the information sessions as well as at four public meetings held at different locations throughout the federal constituency.

I met with the committee on January 24 and was presented with its report. I had already advised the special joint committee on a renewed Canada that a report from the Sarnia—Lambton Committee on Canada's Future would be reporting and I had requested that representatives of the committee personally meet and appear before the joint committee.

I am happy to report that their chairman, Mr. Mark Sutor, secretary Mrs. Shirley Latham and committee member, Mr. Peter Westfall travelled to Ottawa on this past Monday and presented their report.

Upon receipt by myself of Shaping Canada's Future Together proposals, I read and re-read them and then I decided that certainly the way for me to decide on how I should be supportive or question the proposals is that I should listen. So, I have listened either before or after to a lot of presentations.

I listened last summer to 250 high school students in Toronto at a student forum, who talked about keeping our country together. I read the Group of 22 report, I read what the Spicer commission reported on what they heard, I read about what the Group of 15 said, and the Sarnia—Lambton Constituent Assembly Committee told me what our community was saying. I have also watched and read about the constitutional conferences, four or five which have been held as of this date.

As far as the area of Senate reform, this is one of the very important aspects of the institutional reform within the constitutional proposals. The concept has sparked widespread discussions; clearly Canadians have expressed a desire for the old place of privilege to be replaced by a Senate which is more useful, more democratic and more effective.

The divergence of opinions has come as to what form of structure best meets these principles. The Sarnia—Lambton Constituent Assembly supported reform of the upper House, as with the Group of 15 and the Group of 22. They all called for an elected Senate.

Two further guiding conditions expressed where the powers of the Senate must be carefully delineated and not be broader than those of the House of Commons. The latter should retain their pre-eminent legislative role and that aboriginal people should be guaranteed representation in the Senate.

I myself would like an elected Senate, one based on the principle of proportional representation. In the spirit though of consultation and negotiation I doubt that this will happen. More equitable regional representation may be more likely the outcome.

As an Ontarian what we will lose in seats we will gain in institutional legitimacy and a forum for truer regional representation. In my mind, the Group of 22 may have put it best: "The country needs an institution that will express the national dimension of provincial responsibilities as well as an institution that will express the provincial dimension of national responsibilities."

In the area of distinct society, the Sarnia—Lambton Constituent Assembly Committee interpreted the clause as reasonable, provided that Quebec gains no additional powers which will either affect the other provinces or weaken the federation. It was sympathetic to Quebec's concern for the continuance of its society and its culture.

Distinct society has prompted much debate, as we all know. Clearly, many of the people appearing before the constituent assembly blurred the difference between recognizing Quebec as a distinct society and the federal official languages policy. We all must be careful that the two subjects are not confused.

It seems to me that the country is no longer stuck, as I would call it, on the distinct society proposal. English Canada, it seems to me, from what I have observed and have been told, wants a strong central government, while at the same time English Canada has no problems with the notion that Quebec might exercise powers which the other provinces choose not to exercise.

At the Toronto constitutional conference Montreal lawyer Eric Maldoff pleaded for Canadians to understand the linguistic and cultural fears of French speaking Quebecers. He said: "The question of a survival strategy is a dominant issue in my province. We must be prepared to open our arms to the survival of French speaking Quebecers".

Mr. Maldoff is an English speaking Quebecer and the founding president of the English language rights group called Alliance Quebec.

The students' commission last summer recognized that Quebec should enjoy jurisdiction over its culture, civil code and immigration.

Recently The Toronto Star reported: "As we approach the home stretch we accept the distinct society clause as something we could live with".

What I have observed in recent months is that the people of Ontario believe that the clearest translation of distinct is different, a different society in which one may choose to strike a different balance between the rights of individuals and cultural groups from that may exist in other provinces.

The Group of 15 acknowledged that Quebecers might choose to favour collective rights over individual rights in order to preserve their heritage. The forum members continued: "The distinctiveness of Quebec is an historical fact and a current reality that enriches the lives of all Canadians".

Again, in view of what I have heard and seen, I can endorse the constitutional proposal to recognize Quebec as a distinct society. This recognition is very much in the tradition of flexible constitutional arrangements that have been part of Canada for 124 years. The distinctiveness of Quebec is an historical fact and a cultural reality that enriches the lives of all Canadians.

It allows Quebecers to make their own decisions about the balance that they would like to have in their particular province.

Property rights are part of the proposal, and I would like to touch upon them very briefly.

The charter does not guarantee a right to property and therefore it is the view of the government of Canada that the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms should be amended to guarantee property rights. I recommend the reading of an evaluation done by Mr. David Stratas of the law firm of Osler, Hoskin and Harcourt in Toronto entitled Property Rights and the Canadian Constitution:

> Scenario I: After twenty years of effort and sacrifice in meeting mortgage payments, you unexpectedly receive a notice by registered mail. "Your house shall be expropriated for a new freeway next month," the notice reads. The finer print of the notice indicates that the notice is issued pursuant to the Freeway Act which was just enacted. After further investigation, you discover that owing to "the needs of the motorists of the province" no hearings are to be held in order to determine fair value of property being expropriated—

You find you are getting only 50 per cent of the current market value.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Maybe the hon. member could file the rest of his documents with the Clerk.

Mr. James: I would like to end up by saying that I endorse property rights and certainly I commend this evaluation for reading.

Later I will touch on native rights, the economic union, the barriers to trade, and many other areas that should be touched upon in this important debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The list of speakers is as follows: the hon. members for Ottawa—Vanier, Essex—Windsor, and Joliette.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in this special debate on the Constitution and to read into the record some of my own initiatives and those suggested by my constituents. The order was made for the sole purpose of allowing members to make presentations on the results of discussions that they have had with their constituents on the constitutional issue and to table all relevant documents. That is the clear and very specific purpose of this debate.

I started consulting constituents in Ottawa—Vanier last spring. I held a public meeting on June 26, which was set up as a forum on the Constitution, with Jean-Luc Pépin, Professor at the University of Ottawa, Dr. Robert Jackson, Professor at Carleton University, Ms. Caroline Chrétien, Liberal researcher for the Liberal caucus, and about 200 people with an interest in these issues.

• (1900)

The survey I conducted at that time concerned the nine recommendations or proposals presented by my leader, Jean Chrétien, to the Canadian public on April 21, 1991. His nine point plan was based on a statement on the nature of Canada, a commitment to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, strengthening the Canadian economic union, institutional reform, the division of powers, including spending power, immigration, the Supreme Court of Canada, aboriginal nations, the amending formula and, finally, a national referendum.

This provided a fairly broad range of items to discuss with our constituents, which I did all last summer. The constitutional forum I mentioned earlier, which was held on June 26, was televised throughout my riding and watched by thousands of constituents. I would like to thank Skyline Cablevision, which agreed to televise the proceedings.

Today the situation is no longer the same. Since last September we have been discussing the government's proposals. I distributed the document in my riding and I am glad to say it was given a rather favourable reception. It was widely discussed by various groups and was the subject of both oral and written comments at my office and in the community in general.

Last summer I went from door to door and I actually knocked on more than 5,000 doors, which is quite something when the temperature is in the nineties, or should I say the thirties. I noticed that people are concerned about the constitutional question. They are wondering whether we politicians will be able to find a solution to this particular problem, whether we will be able to reconcile Canada's duality with a common respect for Canada's regions which are the two pillars, as it were, of this country. What I remember particularly from my meetings with constituents is their concern for respecting the distinctiveness of our regions as well as Canada's duality in a country that has two official languages.

I was left with a great deal to think about after my consultations with the people in Ottawa—Vanier. If we get rid of Canada's duality or if we remove the concept of Canadian regionalism, we destroy this country. In discussions I had with a number of constituents, I tried to make them understand how important it is to respect differences—what we call tolerance—and the importance of respect for duality, for the other person's right to speak the language of his choice, and respect for regional differences, a Canadian concept.

I had a team of volunteers, consisting of public servants, students, unemployed workers, professionals, pensioners and people working in the home, who accompanied me on my walks last summer, and I found that very encouraging. I also sent out two householders. One was on the Constitution and constitutional amendments, a document I will table with the Clerk later on, and one is a questionnaire on how my constituents view the issues, how the division of powers should be changed, and how we could solve the Canadian question.

I would like to inform the House of the results of these surveys.

[English]

There were 1,778 respondents. These were voluntary responses given by people who did not have to return the questionnaire but did.

I want to take a few minutes to present a resumé or highlights of the results.

To the first question of a constitutional declaration on the future of Canada, 69 per cent of my constituents believe that the constitutional declaration will have to include our commitment to two official languages; 64 per cent want to include cultural diversity; 76 per cent want recognition of the aboriginal people; 43 per cent recognized Quebec as a distinct society, 36 per cent are against and 21 per cent expressed no opinion.

On lowering the barriers between the provinces, a strong majority of respondents, 91 per cent, favoured the free circulation of goods, people and capital in Canada.

On a reformed Senate, 79 per cent of respondents favoured an elected Senate, but one with a right to review rather than a right to veto. The review condition is supported by 65 per cent, with 33 per cent supporting the right to veto. The majority of the people also favoured giving the Senate the right to amend laws proposed by the House rather than a right to reject or to delay.

Concerning the power to the provinces for nominations to the Supreme Court of Canada, 71 per cent of respondents believed the provinces and territories should participate in the nomination of judges to the Supreme Court of Canada.

On the constitutional process, the majority of respondents favoured a referendum; 35 per cent favoured a direct participation in discussions rather than leaving decision-making exclusively to elected representatives.

As for the adoption of a constitutional amendment, the majority of respondents prefer a referendum in each province rather than a provincial legislative approval, or two-thirds of provinces representing 50 per cent of the population, which is the present amendment before us.

On the sharing of powers, in the two questionnaires the majority of respondents preferred to give provincial governments the responsibility for education, housing and training, while giving the federal government communications, immigration and unemployment insurance.

In the second questionnaire, the majority favoured federal-provincial co-operation in fields which have been contentious in the past, such as the environment, language and health care.

Those are the results of two questionnaires. Those are the messages I get from the constituents of Ottawa—Vanier. As for myself, I will get a chance to debate these questions whenever the government tables its proposals formally in the House in the months to come.

[Translation]

And now the proposals my constituents came up with. One was for a constitutional log book. One of my constituents suggested setting up a constitutional log book that would contain proposals by people in the riding and where various suggestions could be entered. I have here a copy of this log book, which I will table with the Clerk. It contains documents that reflect the aspirations of my constituents and may have some impact on the committee.

Mr. Speaker, you are signalling that my time is almost up. In concluding, I want to urge the people of Ottawa—Vanier and Canadians in general to continue their participation in this constitutional debate. It is extremely important for us to know where people stand. Personally, I appreciated the experience of meeting the many people in my riding and discussing these issues with them. I know they are interested, because after all, without a Constitution, we don't have a country.

[English]

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, throughout the country we have seen Canadians trying to come to terms with the very difficult constitutional challenges that face this country and our future. This is certainly true in Essex—Windsor, as it is in other parts of this country.

In the case of Essex—Windsor I have consulted my constituents through talk-back forms, which I have asked members of my constituency to send back, and also through community meetings which I hold regularly. They have focused in more recent months on some of the issues which the Constitution has brought before us.

I could go through a whole list of subjects, as various members have, but I want to focus on five which have been stressed in our meetings and in the responses that I have received. I want to say first that one new element which has emerged in this round of constitutional discussions, as compared with the past round, is the notion of a social charter and putting into the Constitution some commitment, hard or soft.

Suggestions vary, but there should be some commitment nevertheless to the social rights which Canadians believe they have, such as the right of access to medicare, the right of access to a good educational system, the right of access to social services and the right of access to employment or to unemployment insurance in the absence of such, and a right of access to environmental protection.

This is a notion which our party has particularly emphasized and which the premier of my province, Bob Rae, has particularly stressed. Also it is something about which constituents in Essex—Windsor have been especially enthusiastic. Constituents in Essex—Windsor have had to make use of the right to access to unemployment insurance because of the ups and downs in the auto industry.

They have had to make their past history of building access to medical care through community institutions, turning that into a national system. When the national medical care scheme came into effect in this country, they came to see it as something crucial to their lives, especially as they compare themselves to people across the river in Detroit who have to bankrupt themselves and their families in order to provide medical care.

The social charter and a commitment to a social charter is something for which my constituents have stressed their strong support.

I was very pleased today to see the premier of Ontario bring out in more detail the notion of a social charter, to outline the particular elements which the Ontario government would like to see included in section 36 of the Constitution as principles to which governments in Canada are committed.

They are principles such as comprehensive, universal and accessible health care, social services and welfare based on need, high quality public, primary and secondary education and the emphasis on preserving and improving the quality of the environment within a sustainable economy.

I am also pleased to see the commitment which has been suggested by the province of Ontario that agreements reached by governments in areas covered by these social charter rights in the future would be made constitutionally binding.

In other words, it would not be possible for a government to renounce an agreement which it had reached with provinces as, for instance, this government has done in the case of the Canada Assistance Plan in renouncing its commitment to provide support through the Canada Assistance Plan to the various provinces that have been affected by the 5 per cent cap in that plan.

The second area which my constituents have expressed themselves very strongly on is the question of the rights of aboriginal Canadians. People in Essex—Windsor feel strongly that aboriginal Canadians have been left out of the opportunities in our society. They have expressed, in community meetings, their agreement with aboriginal Canadians who emphasize their inherent rights to self-government. They have emphasized that these inherent rights to self-government, in order to become real to aboriginal people, must include significant assistance from the federal government for economic development for aboriginal communities.

The third area which my constituents have expressed their concerns about is the proposals in the federal constitutional package for economic union. There are some parts of this package which are unobjectionable, such as an emphasis on mobility of goods across the country. But there are other parts of that package which are extremely dangerous, such as removing from the mandate of the Bank of Canada the idea that it should take into account the impact of monetary policy on employment levels. I think that is important. It is also important to see to it that the Bank of Canada maintains a recognition of employment considerations in its policy decisions.

There has also been grave concern among my constituents with respect to the idea that companies might be able to take either provincial or federal governments to court and have laws declared unconstitutional because they run counter to some judicially established notion of economic union. I will have a chance to say more about this in future debates. I just want to report the views of the community meetings that have taken place on that subject.

The other subject I want to deal with which has come out in community meetings is the question of Quebec as a distinct society. I have to say that both in responses to questionnaires to my constituents and in community meetings there have been some serious concerns expressed about the notion of Quebec as a distinct society. This has reflected the fear that many of my constituents have expressed, that if you recognize Quebec as distinct that means giving Quebec special powers.

I think that we can recognize Quebec as distinct in the sense of different without recognizing special powers or special status, but my constituents are concerned that that distinction between a difference and a special status be maintained in the constitutional structure.

The final point which I want to make is something which has come to me in meeting after meeting across my constituency as I have spoken at banquets, as I have met with groups. It has come not just in community meetings or in pamphlet returns, it has come everywhere, and that is a commitment to this country as one Canada, a commitment to national unity, a commitment to the maintenance of a magnificent country. That is the most powerful sentiment which has been expressed by the people of Essex—Windsor. It is a sentiment which I would want to leave with this House as we face the challenge and the future of dealing with the constitutional concerns which the government will bring back to us in the form of its response to the special committee's report when it comes forward.

Mr. Gaby Larrivée (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have to tell you that I am delighted to avail myself of the little time granted to us by the House to express the feelings of my constituents, the people from the riding of Joliette.

We cannot say much about the future without looking back on the past. In the context of the constitutional debate, two major events have taken place these past few years, say 10 years, that have had a great impact on the people of Joliette. I am talking about the repatriation of the Constitution in 1982, from which Quebec was left out, and, more recently, the failure of the Meech Lake Accord in 1990. I think that these two events have dampened the enthusiasm of those who had believed in a strong and united Canada and have also motivated the proponents of separation.

Of course, our present economic situation must also be taken into account, with our huge debt leaving government with very little room to manoeuvre. I must point out that I was given a very clear mandate when I was elected in 1988. The Meech Lake Accord, by which Quebec could have reintegrated the Canadian family, was being negotiated at the time and I think that it was clear that the people of Joliette were contemplating the future of their riding, and their province of course, as part of a united Canada.

But they lost confidence first in 1982 and then in 1990. They lost confidence in our institutions for not making the Meech Lake Accord possible and having it ratified. They lost confidence also in the people, the elected people, who went back on their word. That is a fact. At any rate I have come to realize from my contacts with my constituents that they still have a faint ray of hope. They may lack confidence, but they still have some hope that, through its proposals, the federal Parliament will manage to develop a constitution that will come up to the expectations of the people in all the provinces concerned.

In order to keep the people of my riding informed, shortly before Christmas I distributed a survey questionnaire because people hear all kinds of things about the Constitution, but cannot always make sense of it all. I tried to lay it out in the simplest terms, as I feel the people want it, these people who want me to go on looking out for them and fighting to maintain Quebec within the federation, in a united Canada.

I was pleasantly surprised, but it only confirmed my perception. The surveys that MPs usually take of their constituents are to find out what the people expect. My survey told me that even though we have been talking about the Constitution for a very long time, interest is now very high in my riding. Most of the people who answered this survey, I would say about three quarters, expressed great interest in the discussion and the proposals and I would like to thank them for their interest.

Of course, as I said, the survey also showed some loss of confidence. They hope that Parliament will be able to propose a Constitution whereby Quebec can work well within Canada. But they have lost some confidence in their elected officials, and that is understandable, for the reasons I mentioned earlier.

My fellow citizens also showed me their interest in being well informed on everything that is going on and in receiving plenty of documentation. They also said that they would like their MP to be more available so that he can keep them informed. We know very well that it is a problem for a federal member of Parliament, especially a backbencher in Ottawa, who must always be in the House, which sits very often.

As for the options, because the survey gave people a chance to take a position on the Constitution, many respondents told me that they saw their future within the federal system. Many told me that they considered themselves nationalists, but always within a federal system and a united Canada. Some, not a majority, told me that they were for an independent Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, you are indicating to me that my time is up. I find that the time went by very quickly, but in conclusion, I would just assure my fellow citizens that I will continue to respect the mandate that they gave me to bring Quebec back into the Constitution, in line with Quebec's wishes. I think that it would be hard for Canada to exist without Quebec, but I think that Quebec can bring much to the rest of Canada. This whole process must be done with us parliamentarians here in a climate of respect, of course, and especially of tolerance and generosity, with a firm resolve to build a strong, prosperous country for future generations.

[English]

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, let me begin by thanking you for the opportunity to speak on this important issue in the House this evening.

I want to report on a series of four public meetings held in the riding of Guelph—Wellington on the constitutional proposals put forward by the right hon. Prime Minister on Tuesday, September 23, 1991.

• (1930)

The meetings were held in November and December. While the meeting were chaired by me, the critical part was the panel of three respected University of Guelph political scientists: Professor Bill Christian, Professor Patrick Kyba and Professor Fred Vaughan. I hope that they will agree with me tonight that my summary of the summary is adequate to the task.

The subject of the first of the four meetings was property rights and the Canada clause, followed by reform of Parliament and federal institutions. The third meeting dealt with economic union and distribution of power. The final meeting looked at the issues of a distinct society and native peoples.

The three professors opened each meeting by giving the historical perspective and some analysis of the issues, and that presentation usually took from 15 to 20 minutes. A simple show of hands was used to indicate the position of the meeting on the various issues. There was only one predetermined rule to the whole session. We were where we were and we were not going to ascribe blame to anyone or revisit the past.

The following is a very brief synopsis of the content of the four meetings with the general comments and the positions developed. I will have an opportunity to express my own views in this House in the days to come. The full report has been tabled with the constitutional committee.

On property rights there was at the meeting little enthusiasm for the inclusion of a constitutionally protected right to own property. The audience did not believe that the courts had used the existing charter of rights to threaten property. It was concerned that if the right to own property were constitutionalized it would unnecessarily hamper future governments in pursuing socially desirable policies.

On the Canada clause there was no consensus on all of the proposed elements. The audience believed that the Constitution was best kept simple, and that meant not constitutionalizing certain current concerns however worthy they were.

On the reform of the House of Commons there was considerable frustration with the way the House functions today. Members of Parliament, it was felt, no longer represented the constituents wishes. The power had been taken out of the hands of the people. Party leaders wielded too much power over their backbenchers and so on. The group wanted reform but noted that these reforms could be carried out by the House of Commons itself and did not need a change in the Constitution.

There was agreement that the Senate should be reformed. There was support voiced for the house of the provinces model which would do away with the concept of the proposed council of the federation and lessen the need for more federal-provincial ministers conferences. There was also support for an elected Senate, especially a true triple-E Senate with equal representation from all provinces, and for special provision to ensure the representation of minorities. In general there was little discussion about the powers of the Senate as proposed in the document.

On the Supreme Court and amending formula there was no general discussion of these items, although the panellists commented upon them. Those who did mention the amending formula cautioned against a formula that would make amending the Constitution more difficult than it is today.

On the economic union and the distribution of powers there was cautious support for a national free trade scheme. The elimination of preferential procurement practices was thought desirable. The view was expressed that a co-ordinated national economic strategy was desirable in view of the new global order. There was concern that the proposals attempted to do too much across too wide a spectre.

The proposed amendment to the Bank of Canada Act to restrict the bank's mandate to price stability was perceived as unduly narrow.

The transfer of responsibility for job retraining to provincial governments was thought likely to reduce the amount of capital spent on such programs and therefore did not receive endorsement.

A suggestion to include in the proposals a provision requiring a balanced budget received a lukewarm reception. A proposal to establish a council of the federation and an independent monitoring agency was challenged on the grounds that a renewed Senate might more properly exercise these functions. Canada did not need another level of government.

There was general agreement that federal spending power should be restricted, but it was noted that if such restrictions had been in place in the 1960s Canada might not have in place its much valued national health scheme.

Concerning immigration, it was noted that under section 95 of the Constitution Act of 1867, the Parliament of Canada had all the authority necessary to accommodate any provincial aspirations in this area.

On aboriginal rights there was consensus that constitutional recognition of aboriginal rights is long overdue. Given the complexity of the problem, the fact that the government is only offering a process, is perhaps all that can reasonably be expected at this time.

With respect to the distinct society, the panellists observed that Quebec had always enjoyed a special status with respect to its civil law and rights of religious observation. However, there was concern that the distinct society concept, unless carefully worded, might entail allowing Quebec privileges of special access to the federal treasury that would be unacceptable in the kind of Canada that we are trying to build.

With respect to the general question of Quebec separation, the most accurate summary would be simply to note that there was no consensus. Opinion toward Quebec ranged from actively hostile to a passionate and eloquent statement by a woman who said it would break her heart to see Quebec leave. There was widespread concern that separation would cause financial harm to both Quebec and the rest of Canada, and that in an age in which economic units are becoming larger it would certainly prove to be a retrograde step.

We had between 25 and 80 people at these meetings. I believe the results represent the kind of thing we would get in any cross-section of my riding. I express once again my thanks to all the people who turned out and my special thanks to my three friends, political studies professors at the University of Guelph, for agreeing to hold these conferences and to do that hard work. It was theirs and I am very grateful.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I must say to the minister that the hon. member for Nipissing gave up his spot for you to speak. Perhaps you could thank him also.

Mr. Winegard: I am very grateful to the member for Nipissing.

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for that recognition.

I appreciate very much the opportunity to participate in this discussion, one which perhaps will be one of the most important that this House is going to engage in for quite some time.

We are here today to talk about the Constitution, the document which defines who we are and how we relate to one another as citizens of this great country. We are here to exchange views and to listen, to tell this House what our constituents think and what they told us as their representatives. We are here today to try to reach an understanding and an empathy for people's views and concerns, and to do so in a sincere and honest way without any partisanship or any other antics that this House has been recently characterized by.

It truly is an honour for me to present the views of my constituents on an issue of such magnitude. My riding of Nipissing in many ways is a microcosm of the larger Canadian society. Demographically it consists of many different cultural groups with a significant native population. The proportion of anglophones to francophones is approximately 70:30. In economic terms the entire sphere of private and public employers can be found, ranging from military bases and government services to resource based agricultural, manufacturing and service industries.

Geographically the riding is comprised of both rural and urban communities, with our biggest centre of North Bay consisting of roughly 52,000 people. In Nipissing one can find a sample of most facets of Canadian life.

• (1940)

As we all know, this past September the government unveiled its list of 28 proposals for constitutional renewal. It was decided that to solicit people's opinions on them a joint Senate and House committee would be formed to travel the country and listen to what people had to say. When the work of this committee began to flounder, people's cynicism was fuelled. It was ironic that a committee trying to put Canada together could not get itself together.

It became clear that the committee would not be visiting many communities it originally planned to. The prospect of not being included in those deliberations was disheartening for many, including myself. It was against this background that I decided to organize and host my own constitutional forums for the people in my riding.

On November 18, 19 and 20 I held three such forums in the communities of Sturgeon Falls, North Bay and Mattawa. These meetings were advertised in advance as non-partisan avenues for people to come and participate in and share their views on whatever issues or topics were of concern to them. There would be no huge committee or travelling entourage, no public relations people or any such advisers. It was just myself, listening and taking notes without rebutting any participant regardless of my own opinions.

These forums turned out to be an overwhelming success. They were well attended and constituents got a chance to speak frankly without feeling intimidated on issues important to them. I must say I was very surprised with the amount of media coverage we received. It struck me as odd that a member of Parliament, basically doing his job in gathering the views of the people he represents, would obtain publicity from coast to coast. I could not believe the good wishes and praise I received from all quarters, regardless of political affiliation, for doing what I thought was a fairly simple exercise in democracy.

I say this to the House not to seek praise but rather to illustrate how detached many people feel from the political process; to demonstrate that we as politicians, and perhaps even the political process we symbolize, are quite literally out of touch with the people we claim to represent; to show that cynicism and negative attitudes can be overcome if parliamentarians do their jobs and ensure that people are an integral part of the process. Moreover, in spite of what many people say, people are not so apathetic and indifferent as we are led to believe.

On the contrary, if given the opportunity, people are responsive and willing to take part in the process. I am left with the impression that to some degree it has been the almost paternalistic-like attitude in which politicians know best that has turned many off.

Now that I have stated my observations, I want to share with all members of the House the views of my constituents on the constitutional proposals. As I promised them, they would be presented in a non-partisan way and they would be forwarded to the joint committee for consideration, which I have done.

I want to begin with the issue of distinct society for Quebec. In the Meech Lake round this was the contentious issue. Now that the government has defined what it means, it appears to be less controversial and more acceptable. In Nipissing, a slim majority favours distinct society on the condition that it would not subordinate anyone else's rights. Perhaps the following statement from a constituent best summarizes this view: "The Charter of Rights and Freedoms should be interpreted in a manner consistent with the preservation and promotion of a vibrant French speaking society in Quebec that protects the quality and influence of French as the expression of its culture and as the primary but not sole language of work, instruction, communication, commerce and business".

There were two issues for which people were nearly unanimous in their support: Senate reform and parliamentary reform. On the question of Senate reform, the vast majority favoured the concept of a triple-E Senate, noting that some kind of counterbalance to representation by population was sorely needed. People were sensitive to and aware of the feeling of regional inequality on the part of the west and the maritimes.

However, there were some stipulations put on this support. A few felt that some seats should be reserved for women and natives. Others stated that an elected Senate should have a full range of powers and not just the limited scope the government is proposing.

Additionally the issue of the six-month suspensive veto came up several times. Everyone who commented felt that a three-month veto would be more appropriate and would not unduly interfere with the workings of the House.

On the matter of the Senate's role in appointments, people did not want to see a ratification process similar to that in the U.S. They stated that they did not want them to become a media show or vindictive character assassinations.

Parliamentary reform was another interesting area. Practically everyone was in favour of the concept. Constituents stated that they wanted to see more referenda on issues of national importance and more free votes in the House to reflect the wishes of the people and not of party discipline. This last point was reflective of most people's concerns. We must ensure that our elected officials represent us as was promised by them on election day. They must be accountable for their actions and represent our feelings and not what their leaders want, stated one constituent.

Another comment was: "There has to be a more equitable line drawn between party politics and what people want". Citizens are asking that their representatives speak for them and not for their party.

It is clear that we have to change the way this House operates if we are to have any credibility in the eyes of our constituents. The statement that best summarizes this sentiment came from one participant who said that politicians are asking people to be reasonable and yet politicians behave like children in the House.

The general feeling was that although people support a strong central role in economic affairs, the powers necessary to fulfil this objective must not be given away. We cannot claim to want labour mobility and yet have no national training and educational standards. We cannot hope to compete in a global economy with such an unorganized, inefficient and uneven approach.

On the question of native self-government there is not much that needs to be said. My riding of Nipissing has a thriving native community and people there have been living in relative harmony for quite some time. As a result most, if not all, participants agree that self-government must be recognized and entrenched.

I have presented the views of my constituents on the main issues but I want to share with the House a few other comments and observations of a myriad of others I received. I heard from young people who felt they had been neglected by the entire process. I heard from disabled persons who told me that disabled people should be recognized for their abilities. I heard about women's issues that were also very important and mentioned on several occasions.

In concluding, I want to thank the people of Nipissing for reaffirming my faith in this nation and the electorate. The constitutional forums proved to me that people care deeply about this country and are more than willing to keep it together.

I believe that a solution to our constitutional difficulties is within our grasp. All that is needed is for all politicians and decision-makers to park their egos at the door, stop the grandstanding, put the country first, and work out a compromise. We should not fear compromise for our country was built on it, not confrontation.

I would like to leave the House with one thought and one last statement from one of my constituents who said: "In the summer when I paddle down Trout Lake and the Mattawa River on the trade routes of our ancestors I am awed by our history and our culture. When I walk on a winter night and hear the frozen silence and see the moon break through the unpolluted skies I revel in the vastness and texture of our country. When I talk with Canadians from all cultures I am renewed by the opportunity to share their experience and yet strengthen their commonalities as Canadians".

This is Canada, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Pauline Browes (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to start by quoting the renowned astronaut, Roberta Bondar, when she said as she spoke to the Prime Minister just a few weeks ago: "I would like to walk across every mile of our country Canada". She said this as she looked down on Canada from space.

Indeed, this is an important time for Canada. We are at a critical watershed in our history. We have always maintained that the constitutional choices we must face in the coming weeks and months are not about phrases, wording, or jargon but rather they are about people.

Canada is a diverse mix of many different and unique people. Our particular brilliance is in our accommodation of these differences, everyone is enriched.

In Scarborough we were privileged last fall to have the right hon. Joe Clark, Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs visit and participate in the very first community meeting in Canada to launch the government's proposals concerning our constitutional renewal. Over 600 people turned up for this exciting event at the Armenian Cultural Centre in Scarborough. There were numerous Canadian flags in evidence. There were Girl Guides and Boy Scouts who handed out flags to everyone. The Sea Cadets assisted. The Agincourt Collegiate Institute band played. There was applause, there were speeches and most of all there was this heartfelt dialogue about the future of our magnificent country of Canada. The concerned citizens shared their views with Mr. Clark and myself.

During the discussion in that first meeting there was a question from a young student from the Woburn Collegiate, Gary Pirtam. He did not ask a question about legal jargon, about an asymmetry arrangement or distinctiveness, but he asked one simple question: "Will you come back, Mr. Clark, and speak to the students, the young people of Scarborough?"

On January 15 a Unity Festival was held at Woburn Collegiate in Scarborough, sponsored by the Scarborough Board of Education. It was organized largely by students and staff and under the direct leadership of John Volpe, the principal of the school. Special thanks need to go to Earl Campbell, the director of education for Scarborough and the chairman of the board of education, Dianne Williams, for their work.

No less than 25 schools were represented, with over 1,000 students jamming into Woburn Collegiate for that event. The festival began with a choir that sang "Bridge Over Troubled Waters". It was a moving experience. Students from different schools and different backgrounds described what Canada was to each of them.

If our current dialogue is about our future as a country, then I say who better to listen to than the young men and women who are our collective future? Let me share with you some of the excerpts from the students' comments:

Bogart Quinn, who is a student at Alternate Scarborough Education, spoke:

The Constitution

> One hundred and twenty years ago, a man named John A. Macdonald envisioned a society based on the precepts of tolerance, diversity and good will.
> Inevitably, our future must lie in the hands of each and every Canadian, or fate will take its course. I only hope that the children of my generation will have a country to call a home, a country called Canada, that weathered its darkest storm and came out all the stronger.

Barbara Warner of Stephen Leacock Collegiate Institute said:

> We must come to terms as to what Canada means to us, and what we see as Canada's future. For myself, I see a country whose economic troubles can only be overcome if unified. I see a country that treats all its citizens with respect. I see a country whose native peoples are self-governed, and whose traditions are preserved. I see a country that finds its strength in its diversity. I see Canada entering the twenty-first century united, and all Canadians looking forward together to a bright future.

Marcus Sharaput of Woburn Collegiate Institute added some prose:

> As I grew up, I was told by the media, by my teachers and by society that my country does not have an identity. I will not and I cannot agree with this statement. Canada does have an identity, we simply do not brag about it. Canada is a country without rhetoric. Our past is not based on wars or great speeches, but on compromise and on consensus. Canada has heroes, we simply do not glorify them. Canada is a mature country, far more so than many nations who consider themselves our political elders and as such we must make a mature decision regarding the upcoming crisis. There are radicals on both sides of the unity question. But moderates on both sides realize that if Quebec separates the loss to Canada's economy, culture and identity would be irreplaceable.
> There are people who wish to see the world in terms of black and white. Life is not that simple. We exist in a world of grey. No one side can be completely satisfied, we must reach a consensus, we must find a compromise.
> On the question of Canadian unity and the question of black and white, it is our duty as citizens of this country to become involved. We must do whatever we can to help our leaders find a suitable shade of grey.

These are good words and advice for all of us from the students of Scarborough.

It was a thrilling day, ending with a unity march for Canada to the Scarborough city hall by hundreds of Scarborough students. They were led by the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario Horse Guards. It was a demonstration of love for Canada, a reaching out to other citizens, other students across Canada. As a follow-up 25 members of the Principal's Association of Scarborough will be travelling to Quebec on March 5 and 6 to meet with their counterparts in Montreal.

I am proud of the enthusiasm and initiative the Scarborough students demonstrated. In fact, Scarborough hosts the largest Canada Day celebrations in metro Toronto. The planning is already under way for the festivities on July 1 toward a meaningful celebration to mark our 125th birthday.

Since being elected to the House of Commons, I have had the opportunity to serve on three parliamentary constitutional committees: the Committee of Equality Rights, Committee on the Companion Resolution to the Meech Lake Accord, as well as the Special Joint Committee on the Process of Amending the Constitution. Indeed, from these opportunities, I have learned a great deal about the country and about Canadians and I have heard of the love and respect that Canadians have for this country.

Let me turn to one of the specific proposals within the constitutional package. Someone said that our Constitution should be a mirror in which Canadians could see themselves reflected. Nowhere is this better exemplified than in the proposals of the Canada clause. It sets out the values and the ideals which unite us as Canadians, concepts like equality, fairness, openness, diversity, tolerance and, of course, freedom. The Canada clause makes us proud to be Canadians.

One section of the Canada clause is that part which sets out our commitment to sustainable development, our unique responsibility to preserve and protect the environment which we share for future generations.

We have heard much talk over the past few months about the economy on one hand and the Constitution on the other. Some have argued that the two are separate and unrelated issues. A strong economy and a healthy environment are two of the pillars upon which we have built this magnificent nation. These two concepts are not themselves separate: a healthy environment and a strong resource base are both fundamental elements of a strong economy. Further, economic growth and prosperity are required to support wise resource and environmental management.

We are aware of the linkages between the environment and the economy. It is the basis of our commitment in the Canada clause to sustainable development. The government has proposed that sustainable development be entrenched into the Constitution itself. This is not just symbolism. Canada's green plan makes it very clear that we are firmly on the path of sustainable development. It is a long-term and comprehensive plan of action that addresses Canadians three basic environmental desires: clean air, clean soil and clean water.

The constitutional proposals include additional measures for co-operation and co-ordination. They will allow governments to co-operate in establishing national objectives and standards and harmonizing policies and programs.

The young people of Scarborough, our young people of Canada, understand the importance of environmental protection and a united and strong Canada as the best way of making this happen.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to participate in this discussion tonight.

I would like to start by referring to a quotation by Sir Wilfrid Laurier that is contained in the booklet Shaping Canada's Future Together. The quotation reads as follows:

> Canada has been the inspiration of my life. I have had before me—a policy of true Canadianism, of moderation, of conciliation. I have followed it consistently since 1896, and I now appeal with confidence to the whole Canadian people to uphold me in this policy of sound Canadianism which makes for the greatness of our country—

I talk about the Constitution and try to reflect the views of my constituents with some degree of apprehension. I do so for a reason. I speak tonight very frankly and very honestly. I think that is the purpose of these special sittings of the House.

Very frankly, my constituents are tired of listening to talk about the Constitution. They are tired of seeing politicians and others, some elected politicians and many non-elected politicians, rolling up their sleeves and intervening in the nuts and bolts of how our country works because they have a great fear that we are going to mess it up.

• (2000)

My constituents believe that much of what we have in Canada is worth preserving, that it is very good, that it has worked well, that it has made us a safe and prosperous land, one of the most blessed nations on earth.

At all costs, what we do in changing it must be a change for the better rather than a change for the worse. I think that part of their frustration about hearing us continuously talk about the Constitution is the fear that somehow or other we are actually going to make matters much worse than they already are.

Part of it, as some of my colleagues have mentioned, is because they have reached the point where they mistrust political leaders at all levels. They start, of course, with the Prime Minister. All of us know that on both sides of the House of Commons, but it is not limited to him in particular. It extends to each member of Parliament as well as elected officials at the provincial and the municipal levels. There is a very great mistrust of the provincial premiers.

There are many other concerns that my constituents are more anxious to discuss with me than the Constitution. I suggest to you the first at the moment is the economy, and very close to that particularly in recent days with the news of the depletion of the ozone layer is the environment.

The message that I bring from my constituents is: For goodness sake, get this out of the way and get on to the issues that are really, truly important to us. That being said, I wish to override everything that follows with those comments. Indeed, what my constituents think are most important are not constitutional matters.

I have endeavoured to obtain their opinions on constitutional issues first of all by circulating a survey door-to-door within my constituency .This was done before the government's 28 proposals were made public. I gained, in response to that, about 1,400 individual answers from constituents to this series of questions.

In addition, I have held public discussions. We held a televised phone-in program on the Constitution to give people the opportunity to discuss it. On top of that, there were many calls, letters, and conversations with people throughout the constituency.

Ottawa South, Mr. Speaker, as you might not be surprised to hear is a constituency very in tune with federal politics. People in my constituency and in the national capital region have more at stake in this discussion than those in any other part of Canada. They follow it closely, they are well informed and they are very anxious to participate.

I have learned a number of things from my consultations. I would like to just summarize some of the messages. First of all, I think that there is a clear identification with a Canada that is bilingual and multicultural. That message was revealed in my question about what the nature of Canada statement in the Constitution should include.

Fifty-four per cent said yes to an attachment to two official languages and 37 per cent said no. Sixty-six per cent believed that the diversity of our cultural heritage should be noted. I think this is very important: 77 per cent wanted a recognition of the role of our aboriginal people. I think that that is a particularly strong sentiment in Ottawa South.

There is also a great desire to see some changes to the institutions of our government, particularly reform of the Senate. A very large percentage wish to see the Senate elected and on reflection rather than from the survey but by subsequent discussions, a very strong reform of the House of Commons is desired as well.

The people of Ottawa South exhibit a very great attachment to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. This has come out consistently in discussions that we have had. For that reason, people are very concerned about what goes into the charter and how it is given effect in our system of law.

It would be fair to say that many object to the use of the notwithstanding clause by any level of government. They would like to see it removed from the Constitution.

While we do not like to pre-judge the results of a referendum in Quebec, I would be failing to reflect the views of my constituents clearly if I did not say to those who wish to advocate an independent Quebec, particularly a sovereignist Quebec, that the people in my constituency do not consider sovereignty association to be an option available to the sovereignist movement in Quebec.

If they vote in that province to go apart from Canada, people will want to look very closely at the kind of negotiations that would occur. The option of saying they can have it both ways, that they can have a strong economic union with Canada and independence on the other hand, is simply not available in the views of the majority of my constituents. I must say to the members of the Bloc Quebecois that I share those views.

There is concern about the economic union. We are united on the need for strong social programs. Whether it is put in the context of a social charter or whether it is simply said, Canadians are united in their desire to share nationally the kind of programs we have become so attached to, particularly our health care system and our educational system.

There is also a recognition that in order to successfully maintain that social network, we are going to have to have a strong economic union. That includes the reduction and eventual elimination of trade barriers between and among our provinces.

About 500 of those trade barriers do a few things. First of all, they limit our prosperity because they limit our ability to trade freely with one another.

Second, they make us much more vulnerable than we would otherwise be to the pressures of internationalization that are occurring despite our best efforts.

Instead of being 10 little markets as we economically are at the moment, we should be one little market which is all that Canada can be. At least it would be much bigger than any of our provinces are on their own so that we can in preserving our national identity resist as much as possible those global pressures.

Finally, I would like to note the value that our people see in Canada. We offer to the world something that truly is unique. We offer a country which has a view of the world that says that bigger and stronger is not always better. We offer a view that says we need to look after our poor, our weak, our sick while rewarding talent, skill and enterprise. We need to continue to put forward on the world stage a view that says it is no shame to seek compromise where others see only conflict. This is what has made Canada great.

I conclude by one last comment on my own fears. Two days ago, two young Canadians, Lloyd Eisler and Isabelle Brasseur, distinguished Canada by winning the bronze medal in the Olympic Games.

As I watched our national newscast that night, what did I see? Not a celebration that these young Canadians were the third best in the world. I saw clips of Isabelle falling as she did perhaps once or twice in a long program.

Why is it that instead of focusing on the few things that maybe do not go perfectly in our country, why do we not focus on the things that make us so great.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I stand here tonight as a Canadian, someone of Scottish descent whose family landed on the shores of Canada some 160 years ago in Broad Cove in Cape Breton. This makes me a fifth generation Canadian of Scottish heritage. I had a great uncle who represented the riding of Inverness County in Cape Breton in the early 1920s. I am very pleased to now represent a riding in northern Ontario, the riding of Timiskaming.

• (2010)

Over the last number of weeks and months I have had the opportunity to travel in my riding. I have had constituents come into my office. I have had letters and phone calls, talking not only about the Constitution. Quite frankly, in my riding the number one concern within the hearts and livelihoods of my constituents is the economy. We are going through some very difficult times. We know that if we as a country are divided, we are never going to be able to ensure stability or a future for those of us who are living in parts of the regions today and our families of tomorrow.

When talking with my constituents, one concern came out very loud and very clear from veterans who have served in three wars and individuals who have immigrated from other parts of the world to Timiskaming, whether it was in the 1940s, 1950s, 1960s, 1970s, or into the 1980s, or our francophone community which makes up 27 per cent of my riding. Every one of them made it very clear to me that they are not a hyphenated Canadian, they are Canadian.

Those who fought in those wars fought for the security and the future of Canada from coast to coast and to ensure that our young people would have the opportunity for the freedom that everyone in this room here tonight has and what all Canadians have been able to enjoy.

I would just like to take one moment and quote a few lines out of just one of the many letters I have received from my constituents. "We Canadians should show more of what we believe in. We do not show that we are proud of our country and I am always surprised at the July 1 celebrations how few Canadian flags are flying in our town. Hardly any. We have to be more outgoing to tell others that we love our country and to tell our friends in Quebec that they are part of a lovely country and we love them very much. What is wrong with our country right now is that we listen only to minorities. We are a melting pot, but there should be standards which are Canadian. I came to Canada 25 years ago and 20 years later I became a Canadian citizen. When I decided to become a Canadian I also made a decision to be part of the community and fit in. I never thought of imposing some things as a minority to the rest of the country. The Lord's Prayer is no longer said in public schools because it hurts a minority. The Mounties can wear turbans and youths are allowed to wear daggers because of religious beliefs. We give in to all minority rights because of the Charter of Rights. This Charter of Rights clause can be misused and it is misused. It is impossible to please everyone".

That is just one of many comments I have received from my constituents.

Canadians have always been noted as being builders of a country. We go back to Sir John A. Macdonald and the rail system that tied this country together from coast to coast, John Diefenbaker and the Roads to Resources, visions of tying this country together. Today our present Prime Minister has a vision of what the future should be. Whether we are talking about the Constitution, the future of this country or looking at the free trade agreement, some will think today that we may be wrong, but history will certainly indicate that it was the right decision.

Consider how we have been able to build together in the past 30 years. Within the lifetime of most of us in this room tonight, since 1961, we have had the second highest rate of growth among the G–7 nations, the second highest rate of investment growth, the highest rate of job creation in the OECD countries. We never hear about that. We never hear about the positive response that is taking place in this country.

I think as Canadians that one of the biggest problems we face is that we have a tendency to live within our own little area and be ones to complain about, discouraged about but not looking at, the over-all approach of what this country is all about. The fact is that one of the greatest problems we face in this country is we really do not understand and know more about each other, about those of us in northern Ontario who may know more about those in B.C. or in the province of Quebec or in Newfoundland.

I think that is one of the reasons why this country is having difficulties, a combination within our educational system and a combination that maybe sometimes we should be looking at spending more time in our own country, talking with each other, understanding the differences between urban and rural Canada, between the north and the south and the east and the west.

Last year, in fact on this day, the Prime Minister was in Quebec City. He warned Canadians about the damaging effects the focus of disunity will have if we allow them to dominate the national unity debate. The Prime Minister told us at that point: "Watch out for the dream merchants, those who say it is no problem to destroy a great country and to rebuild it later, those who claim that they alone can change the course of history". Truer words have not been spoken.

No one can question the commitment of this government, the commitment of ensuring that this country remains together, grows together and becomes stronger with a more collective effort. In Toronto last February the Prime Minister made a clear heartfelt statement that all Canadians should be proud.

Let me make it clear, Canada is not up for grabs. Either we have a country or we do not. We cannot have it both ways. My country is Canada and I intend to strengthen it and I intend to keep it.

There are two last comments I would like to make. John Diefenbaker said in 1967: "Canada needs a renewed sense of national purpose. We need to maintain and to strengthen the basic foundations of the Constitution. We need to instil in every Canadian the spirit of Sir George Cartier. Before all, let's be Canadians".

I was born a Canadian and I plan to die a Canadian.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I have in my hands some 38 photocopies of posters, letters, some of the letters hand written, some printed, all of them with a common theme. They are from a group of grade 5 elementary students at Mountain View Elementary in Nanaimo. They are addressed to any group of grade 5 students in the province of Quebec which believes in the future of Canada, which wants to, as they put it, save Canada.

I could not help but think as I was reading these letters and waiting for my opportunity to speak that had Canada spent a great deal more money on student exchanges between English speaking communities anywhere in Canada and French speaking communities anywhere in Canada and a lot less money on commissions that travelled this country from one end to the other, perhaps we would not have the problem that we have today. I wish that that program were pushed and that we quit examining ourselves as much as we have done.

I sent the letters on. These are photocopies. I never heard whether they were answered. As I say, they were all written in English because those students on Vancouver Island could not write in our other language, the other official language of Canada.

Those letters were sent to me in May of last year. In June the Nanaimo NDP organization organized a public meeting and invited people to come to talk about the Constitution. It started at ten o'clock on a Saturday morning, adjourned for lunch but the discussion at lunch was all about the morning's agenda, carried on in the afternoon until 5 p.m. There were some 60 people present. There was an MP there. It was not myself. I was there to greet them in the morning, but I had other duties. One of the members of the joint committee, the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, was there. He told me afterward what a great meeting it was and how positive the feeling was in my community, at least as represented by the people who attended that meeting on a Saturday. I was encouraged by that.

In October, I believe it was, one of the local newspapers, the Nanaimo Bulletin, printed a ballot on the front page and the paper went to almost everybody in the community. The person who did the ballot, Merv Unger who worked for the paper then, told me how surprised and pleased he was with the volume of the response. I was not so pleased with the content. A lot of negative feelings were expressed.

By that time there were negative feelings being expressed. Whether it was because these people were associated with the Reform Party or not I do not know. They were expressing their concerns that one province in Canada was trying to lead us to destruction and their attitude was: "Why not let them go?". That feeling was prevalent but was not the majority. The majority of the people in that ballot, at least as quickly as I could determine from going through the ballots, wanted Canada to be saved, wanted us to stay together as one country.

In November my office sent out a householder. It was not a large effort. It took five sheets of 8.5 x 11 paper, including the cover. It talked briefly about the issues before us in considering the Constitution. In each case it raised a couple of questions about each one of these issues. It ended up inviting the people receiving it to write in and ask for a much more extensive paper on the subject of the Constitution and a ballot that they could fill in and mail back to me. Some 45,000 of these went out to the riding. It is a large riding; it took that many to cover all of the households. Some 1,205 wrote in asking for a copy of the background paper that was offered, a 38–page document. They also wanted the 29–page ballot that was offered along with it.

I was encouraged by the response. A high proportion of the people who got the householder did ask for the background paper because they were interested in the subject. They did ask for the ballot because they wanted to let me know how they felt about the issues. Some of them in their letters, expressed concerns wondering whether I would pay any attention to the answers.

It is not too hard because I agree with the majority vote from my constituency as represented by the people who have spoken to me, by the people who have written to me, and by the people who have submitted the ballots. I wish more ballots had come in, but I am pleased with the response as indicated by the ones who did submit the ballots so far, and they are still coming in.

I do not intend to go into any great detail on the content of this. It is one of the things that I will be submitting to the committee this evening. I could read from the conclusion of a six–page document that has been prepared reporting on the ballots that have been received. This will go along with the ballots to the committee. Part of the conclusion states: "The results indicate thoughtfulness and intelligence on the part of the constituents of Nanaimo—Cowichan, along with a very sincere desire to be informed on the issues and to offer a contribution. Perhaps the clearest observation from this survey is that we need not fear the knowledge and opinions of Canadian people".

I heartily endorse that report as well.

In July 1990 Canada Day was on a Sunday. I received a letter. The same letter went to the mayor of Nanaimo and to the MLA. All three of us were asked to come to church, the Evangelical Church, on Sunday and to tell the congregation how we felt about Canada. It is the only organization that I know of that has done something like that, the only church organization. I am sure they all feel that way, but nevertheless that church invited the three of us.

On Canada Day in 1991 the same three people were invited back once again to tell the same story. I was asked to speak first and I told the congregation how I felt about Canada. The member of the legislative assembly told the meeting how he felt and the mayor did as well. Mayor Frank Ney said something in his concluding remarks that I wish I had said. He said that looking at the group reminded him of elementary school students, for there was a preponderance of young people in that church congregation. He said that we have to save Canada, we have to keep Canada together for the sake of the young people in this congregation, in this community, and in this country. I wish I had said something like that.

I am speaking for the majority of my constituents, even the students, when I say that I want Canada to survive. I am prepared to sit down and talk with anyone who comes to me and says that yes, Canada is our home. We are sharing it with some 28 million inhabitants, some of whom are descendants of people who have been here for thousands of years, perhaps. Others have come from all parts of the world more recently. We are sharing it together, the best place in the world, the best home in the world for its 28 million inhabitants.

Those people say that we can make it better, that we should sit down and work together and discuss how we might make it a better place for all of us. With that person I will sit down and talk. I will listen. Together I hope we can work something out for the benefit of all of us.

If someone came to me and said that this home of ours might be good but it could be better if we split it asunder, divided it, and some of us might be better off than we are right now, I would not be prepared to discuss anything with that person.

There are others who will say that we have to break it apart to make it a better place, that after we have broken it apart perhaps everybody may be better off. I am not prepared to sit down and discuss anything with that person.

Canada is the best place in the world.

A letter was read much earlier this evening that probably went to everyone expressing better than most of us can just how we feel about Canada. It is my home. I was born here. No one has the right to destroy my home. They have the right to share it. They have the right with me to try to make it better, but they have no right to gamble on destroying it to make it better or to make it better for a few.

That is the voice from my community. We are not prepared to be threatened. We are not prepared to offer ourselves up to the possibility of blackmail, but we are prepared to sit down and talk with anyone who wants to work with us to make it a better place in which we can all live.

That is the kind of Canada I want.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to participate in the debate this evening because it is important that sovereignists from Quebec explain to the rest of Canada what is really going on in our province.

The members of Parliament from Quebec, most of which are Conservatives, have nothing to gain by explaining to Canadians what is going on in Quebec because it would harm their respective parties in the rest of Canada. Therefore, this evening I wish to inform Canada of the opinions of our constituents.

Some members have talked about surveys or have expressed their opinions following discussions in their ridings. I will talk about the best possible survey, which is an election.

I was elected under the Bloc Québécois banner, whose program is open, frankly and clearly geared toward sovereignty. The results left no doubt in anyone's mind. The Bloc Québécois got 68 per cent of the votes; the Liberal party 19 per cent; the NDP 8 per cent; and the Conservatives, who form the government, 3.9 per cent. In my opinion, this is very telling. Why did we get those results? I believe it is essentially because Quebec is not a distinct society but a distinct nation which, for decades now, has been defining, organizing and developing itself. The failure of Meech Lake was a turning point in this long process.

• (2030)

Following the failure of the Meech Lake Accord, the Government of Quebec set up the Bélanger–Campeau commission which, with utmost rigour, towed the province of Quebec and arrived at some conclusions: we must put an end to the political uncertainty because it affects the development of Quebec. The commission proposed the holding of a referendum on sovereignty in 1992, and that recommendation was included in Bill 150 by the Government of Quebec. In this bill, the Government of Quebec specifies that sovereignty simply means that Quebec will be the only jurisdiction to raise taxes, legislate on its territory and sign international treaties.

This project of a sovereign Quebec is both modern and democratic, and it is aimed at creating a society without racism, sexism and violence. A sovereign Quebec will recognize four groups: the francophone majority, of course, but also the anglophone minority, the aboriginal peoples and the ethnic and cultural minorities. The collective rights of each of these groups will be enshrined in the constitution of a sovereign Quebec.

This is a modern project which does not go against history, in spite of what some may say. If you look at the situation in the world right now, you will notice that there are two main trends: one is the birth of countries—that was the case in eastern Europe where nations finally created their countries—and the other is the creation of economic groups, such as the common market in Europe and the free trade agreement between the United States and Canada. Even if that agreement was badly drafted, the fact remains that it follows the current trend. There will be more and more of these economic concentrations.

Mr. François Mitterrand, who surely knows about these issues, was quite right when he said that to fully participate in an organization, you must first be yourself.

[English]

Mr. Lee: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of relevance. The hon. member, if I follow his remarks, seems to be discussing the history of the evolution of the common market in Europe. I understood the purpose of the debate was to report to the House on the views of each of our constituencies relative to the constitutional debate. Perhaps the member could take that into account.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Although he is a fairly new member, I know that he is going to get to the point. I appreciate the fact that the hon. member has drawn that to his attention.

[Translation]

Mr. Duceppe: There is no problem, Mr. Speaker. After all the detours I heard tonight, I suppose I am getting right to the point.

Given these two major trends, we must realize that Canada cannot develop as a country now, nor can Quebec, because each prevents the other from doing so. Canadians want a strong central government, national standards, a country in their image. And Quebecers too want a country in their image.

To take the example that Brian Mulroney and the Liberal leader Jean Chrétien often use when they talk to us about the European Economic Community, they should first of all realize that the strength of the common market is that it is made up of sovereign countries which all freely agree to cooperate with one another in the economic sphere. That is realistic.

We must be careful and beware of people who get away from realism. I am thinking of those who talk about violence, about partitioning the territory of Quebec; among them are some university professors. It is strange to see these people hail the birth of countries in eastern Europe and talk about violence here. Those countries were oppressed, their situation was very different from Quebec's, I admit, but is it logical to say that the democratic will of Quebecers could not be recognized unless there were violence beforehand? That seems dishonest and undemocratic to me.

We must also beware of the inconsistency of some arguments. Many people, including Ovide Mercredi, tell us that Quebec is not a people, not a nation. In English, "distinct" means "superior". And yet, I heard all of Canada applaud the agreement made between Premier Rae of Ontario and the First Nations. This agreement says at the beginning:

[English]

Whereas the First Nations represented by the Chiefs in Assembly, hereafter, the First Nations exist in Ontario as a distinct nation.

[Translation]

You see, aboriginal people can be nations and no one makes a fuss. They can be distinct nations, but for some reason, Quebec is different. I must say the logic escapes me.

Some more false premises. They say Quebec gets more from the federal government than it pays out. The Bélanger-Campeau commission proved that over a long period of time, we receive as much as we give, except that we receive it in the form of unemployment insurance. Ontario gets it in the form of research and development and industrial grants. This produces countries and economies that are totally different.

Let's assume, for the sake of argument, that Quebec gives more. Once Quebec is independent, I don't think its economy would be in any great danger, if we give more than we receive. And assuming that Quebec receives more than it gives, is Quebec so popular that Canadians would be prepared to pay us to stay in Canada? I doubt it Mr. Speaker. I doubt it very much.

Finally, I want to respond to a statement by a member of this House who said there would no more negotiations once Quebec was sovereign. Let's be realistic. I wish members who say that would go to Oshawa and explain to workers in the automobile industry that they will have to go on unemployment insurance out of patriotism, because Canada cannot sell any more cars to those poor Quebecers who will have to make them themselves or buy them in the United States. That doesn't make sense. I would like to see that same member tell western farmers they will have to eat all their beef or watch the carcasses rot, instead of selling them to Quebec. This does not make sense.

I submit there are mutual interests. There are 100,000 jobs in Ontario that depend on the Quebec market. In Ontario, when workers at de Havilland saw Bombardier would save their jobs, they didn't care whether the money came from Quebec, Taiwan, Japan or Ontario.

I hope we will end this uncertainty. I hope we will stop preventing each other from having the kind of country we want. Build the kind of country you want. Build a great country. We will build the Quebec that Quebecers want, and then we will have the kind of normal relationship that exists between two sovereign, modern and democratic countries that will probably get along better than we do today.

[English]

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, to preface my remarks, I just listened carefully to the remarks of the hon. member preceding me.

I cannot doubt, nor should Canadians doubt, the sincerity of his remarks and his pride in the history of French Canada, its heritage and its feeling of being a nation.

This time slot here has been allocated to permit us time, as MPs, to report to Parliament on the views of our constituents on the subject of constitutional reform.

The means in Scarborough—Rouge River have been the fairly routine; letters, phone calls and discussions held in various parts of the riding and one survey some months ago. That survey was not necessarily the most scientific of surveys but it was indeed a survey. Maybe it is not perfectly representative of everyone's view in the riding—no survey can be—but it was very real. It was very true, and the results will accurately reflect the views of the individuals who reported. The first thing I want to do is report very briefly on the results of that survey.

• (2040)

Relative to the issue of the constitutional statement on the nature of Canada, sometimes called the Canada clause, on attachment to the two official languages, there was substantial majority in favour of that.

On diversity of Canadian heritage, on the role of aboriginals, there were substantial majorities in favour of those two.

On the issue of the distinct character of Quebec's society, there was division.

On the elimination of provincial barriers to trade and commerce and the movement of capital, there was a substantial majority in favour.

In relation to the election of a Senate, there was a substantial majority in favour. On the actual role, function and powers of a Senate, there was less agreement; in fact, there was division, but there was clearly a tendency among the electors of Scarborough—Rouge River to have a Senate with more oversight powers, oversight over government, review powers and to ensure that the Senate had the effective power to deal with those types of initiatives.

On the role of the provinces or territories, in a decision as to whether or not there would be a new province in a particular territory, there was substantial support for the decision to be made jointly by the federal government and the territory, and there was little support for the role of other provinces in that decision.

On the role of the provinces and territories in the selection or appointment of Supreme Court judges, there was a substantial majority supporting a role for the provinces in that selection or appointment.

Last, on provincial or regional constitutional vetoes on constitutional matters outside of the existing section 41 veto, there was division. There was clear division and uncertainty as to which entity, which region, which provinces should have a veto.

That is a quick summary of the survey.

Scarborough—Rouge River is an urban southern Ontario riding. It contains a balance, and I use the word advisedly, a true balance between new Canadians and not-so-new Canadians. It is clear, with virtually no exceptions, that every single one of us is proud to be a Canadian. We are proud of our history, we are excited by our country's future prospects, even in the middle of this very cruel and damaging recession.

My constituents want a strong Canada with a national government that works. They definitely believe that they are over-governed. As citizens of the city of Scarborough, they feel they are over-governed. We have a city government, we have a metropolitan Toronto government, we have a provincial government and we have our federal government. We know that very well because every nickel that it takes to run and operate each of those governments is going to come out of our pockets as taxpayers.

There is frustration out there that the reform and the cost efficiencies which they would like to see happen may be eluding them as an electorate, and eluding us as elected. They are frustrated by that and they clearly wish to see more.

The constituents of Scarborough—Rouge River are demanding that all levels of government take up the challenge to limit the growth of government, reduce the cost of government and purge government of duplication and redundancy.

On the constitutional reform agenda, as proposed by the government, there is one school of thought that says: "Stop the nonsense, stop the exercise. We do not want to deal with the Constitution now. The big issue, the only issue is the economy". I suppose if you are out of a job that would be a very natural predisposition.

There is the other school of thought that says: "Legislators please, get right to the task of constitutional reform. Don't delay it. Deal with it quickly and then let us get on to all of the other important issues which we must deal with, including the economy, crime and violence, health care costs, education and training our youth and all of the very many other issues".

To close this perspective on the views of the constituents of Scarborough—Rouge River, to refer to the upcoming national government negotiations with the provincial governments on constitutional reform, including the Quebec government, the residents of Scarborough—Rouge River want a country that is whole. They want a country that has a modern viable constitution. They do not want a constitution at any cost.

We want one that all Canadians can join in confidence and continue to build our futures, a country that is home for our French speaking Canadians and the great French Canadian heritage that is there and a home for all others, each of us with a heritage of which we are proud.

The constituents of Scarborough—Rouge River are ready for the constitutional challenges of the next few months. They challenge all of their elected representatives on the related matters that I have spoken to earlier in my remarks.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I too am absolutely delighted to be able to rise in this House tonight and speak on the Constitution, and with all others in the House of Commons, to speak to the issues that the residents of my constituency, which is Nepean, have presented to me on issues of constitutional matters.

In April of last year, I sent a questionnaire to all of my constituents, asking them for their thoughts, ideas, suggestions and concerns regarding the constitutional debate and the future of Canada. The overwhelming response that I received was compiled into a report entitled "Canada: A Phoenix Rising" and a copy was sent to the Spicer commission and to all members of Parliament and senators.

Since then the residents of Nepean have continued to demonstrate a keen interest and a strong desire to play a role in the constitutional debate. Many have called my office to request copies of the government proposals and summaries of the recent constitutional conferences. They have expressed frustration at the inability of the government to give straight answers about the proposals and they have expressed anger at the seemingly endless string of committees, whether it is the Spicer, Beaudoin–Edwards, Dobbie–Castonguay and now the Beaudoin–Dobbie. They are most anxious to get to the real issues that are facing the country, such as the economy, jobs and unemployment.

Last month I again compiled the views of some constituents and submitted these views as a brief to the special joint committee. Half a year after they had first had an opportunity to air their views, the most marked change that I noticed was in the frustration that they felt. Did all of these committees and forums mean anything? Were their views really being listened to? Or was the special joint committee just another exercise in smoke and mirrors, another attempt by the government to fool the people of Canada into thinking that their opinions really mattered?

Today I once again put forward the opinions of the constituents in the hope that this government will listen to their hopes for this country and will heed their concerns when the final report of the special joint committee for a renewed Canada is submitted.

Perhaps the most frequent comment about the package of proposals as a whole was the vagueness and ambiguity of the wording. The Constitution as a document that will shape Canada into the 21st century must be clear and it must be precise.

• (2050)

A second point which many agreed on was the need for all Canadians to have the last word on whether the final document was acceptable, the need for a referendum where people could give or withhold their consent specifically to the constitutional document.

The economy was foremost in many minds, especially now in these difficult times.

A clear distinction between federal and provincial jurisdiction is needed to ensure that adequate responsibility is taken for matters such as education and health care.

Also, Canadians in all parts of the country should have equal opportunity for prosperity and advancement.

Many Nepean residents were worried that by designating Quebec as a distinct group other equally distinct groups will be neglected. Residents of Nepean for the most part are proud to live in a country that is both multicultural and bilingual.

However, they did feel that a review of how we are implementing both of those concepts should be undertaken and that the Government of Canada must ensure the rights of all Canadians within a multicultural and bilingual framework, the majority as well as the minority.

Although only a very small number of my constituents are aboriginal, many are concerned that the First Nations of this country, people who have contributed so much to making Canada what it is, have been neglected.

In September, my provincial colleagues and I held a forum entitled "Shaping Our Future—Canada's Aboriginals Speak Out".

Interesting questions about a variety of issues were raised including self-government and education. The many people who attended came away with a clear understanding of who the First Nations of Canada are and what it is that they want to gain from the constitutional debate.

The inclusion of a Canada clause was generally approved of and affirmation of the Canadian identity is crucial to growth and prosperity. Identification with Canada as one strong united country should be a priority for all Canadians. However, as with all parts of a package, the wording must be very carefully developed to ensure that the inherent nature of our country is protected.

Finally, the stronger leadership and more responsive and responsible government topped many agendas. Nepean residents want a House of Commons that is less partisan and a Senate that is elected and effective.

I would like to share with you some specific recommendations that were made by several residents of the city of Nepean.

One is a recommendation for Senate reform that was suggested by Mr. Tony Colven of Nepean. He recommends a Senate that would be elected from the entire national electorate with candidates standing for constituencies that represent concerns rather than places.

Any legitimate group able to assemble a specific minimum membership could put forward a slate of senatorial candidates arranged in order of popularity. All Canadians could then vote according to major concerns.

Although such a process would be unlikely to produce a dominant group, it would be capable of providing a broad base of opinion that would increase the effectiveness and the responsibility of the Senate.

Mr. Malcolm Smith says: "The Charter of Rights and Freedoms has not protected the English minority in Quebec from the repressive language laws, nor has the Parliament of Canada".

Mr. Jacques Roy says: "Canada must be a global economic power to secure and maintain a good standard of living. All Canadians must identify with Canada first. As long as we will endeavour to cultivate two or more different cultures without the vision of a united and strong Canada, and as long as we continue to ensure that they are different and separate, we will not develop a Canadian identity".

Mr. Jim Rennie says: "Let's try to analyse the reasons why some of the residents of Quebec support separation and let us come up with a strategy to undo all of the adverse rhetoric and get this country pulling together".

Mr. Paul Bender says: "We can and should learn from the native peoples of Canada who identify more with the environment than with possessions and monetary wealth".

I want to thank my constituents who responded. I had in the area of 700 responses. I do not wish to indicate that they are representative of all of the people of Nepean because they certainly are not.

I want to thank them for taking the time and making so many valuable contributions to this debate which is so crucial to Canada's future through "Canada—A Phoenix Rising" and through my more recent report to the special joint committee on a renewed Canada. I have tried to represent these views as accurately as possible here in the House of Commons.

Now I ask the government: Please listen to the voices of the people of Canada. Please consider carefully all viewpoints and perspectives including those of my constituents of Nepean. Please when the final report is tabled make sure that it will help a united Canada to grow and to prosper into the future.

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful for the opportunity afforded members in the House to speak on the Constitution and for these special sittings which afford us that opportunity.

Each of us has received letters from our constituents and indeed from people from across the country on their thoughts on the Constitution. I want to read just a couple of paragraphs from one letter that I received.

"For me, Canada is more than a country and more than a nation. Canada, for me, is the idea of the ideal society of the future and an example for the rest of the world to follow. Canada, for me, is tolerance, open channels of communication and peaceful means of solving differences of opinion and disagreements. Canada, for me, is a great open society in which everyone is equal and at the same time can be unique and distinct while an integral part of it. For me, Canada is a ray of hope, shining in the sky of humanity and the greatest country on earth."

I felt that I should include that in my speech tonight because those are words that I perhaps wish I had penned. I want to quote from Sir John A. Macdonald who said: "Let us be English or let us be French, but above all, let us be Canadians."

Being Canadian is infinitely more important than being Liberal, Conservative or NDP, whether we are from the right or from the left, labour or business, or whether we are from the east or the west or from the north.

An excellent speech came across my desk from Mr. Allan Taylor, chairman and chief executive officer of the Royal Bank of Canada. I want to read a part of his speech into the record tonight.

"What Canadians should be asking themselves first and very explicitly is whether disunity is the answer to the challenges we face.

Do we really need to blow Canada apart to meet Quebec's historic concerns? Quebec is a unique cultural island of six million French-speaking people in an ocean of 270 million people working and living in English. Quebec is a distinct society.

Do we really need to destroy Canada to recognize and protect that reality? I say no. Do we really need to blow Canada apart to understand and address the deep alienation in the west where many people believe that our national institutions are dominated by a deaf and unfeeling eastern majority? Do we really need to destroy Canada to recognize and correct that concern? I say no. Do we really need to blow Canada apart to meet the deep felt concerns of people in Atlantic Canada?

Do we have to destroy Canada to solve the very real structural economic problems? I say no.

Do we really need to blow Canada apart to give the First Nations the power to participate directly in determining their own destiny within Canada? Rights they have been denied for too long? Again I say no.

Do we really need to blow Canada apart to address the vital need for greater harmonization of federal and provincial policies and cutting the wasteful duplication of cost?

Do we really need to blow Canada apart to make us understand Canada is already part of a much larger international economic union and so must have a strong domestic economic union to survive? Again I say no.

That separation would be relatively easy and without cost is not just a dangerous delusion. It is a real world impossibility."

I want to take a look at our early history, the Quebec Act. This was an act which was legislated in 1774. It was an act for making more effective provision for the government of the province of Quebec in North America. It was a British statute which received Royal Assent on June 22, 1774 and became effective May 1, 1775.

• (2100)

Religious freedom was guaranteed for the colony's Roman Catholic majority and a simplified test oath which omitted references to religion enabled them to enter public office conscientiously.

The act established French civil law and British criminal law, and provided for continued use of the seigniorial system. It effectively guaranteed the survival of the ancien régime society in North America.

Territorial expansion was a recognition of Montreal's role in the continental economy and the act returned to the Quebec economy its traditional links with the fisheries and interior fur trade.

Then in the spring of 1791, over 200 years ago, the House of Commons at Westminster passed an act. After being consented to by the House of Lords that act received the assent of King George III on June 10. From that time on, it would be known as the Constitution Act, 1791.

What the act did was it created two provinces, Lower and Upper Canada. It set their boundaries and laid down their powers, privileges and prerogatives. It also authorized the establishment of electoral ridings and the holding of elections to Parliament.

Upper Canada, what we call today Ontario, which is my province, lived its first democratic experiences in 1791. The creation of that province's parliamentary institutions followed the same chronology as Quebec's. Geography then has made us neighbours. Reality on day to day business make us partners.

This may come as a surprise to many of my constituents and people throughout the country, but there have been exchanges between the members of Ontario's Legislative Assembly and those of the Quebec National Assembly.

During the summer of 1991, members of the National Assembly and members from Queen's Park recalled the days of the travelling Parliament and of the first sittings in 1792. They visited the sights of the first sessions in Quebec City, in Montreal, in Kingston, Niagara-on-the-Lake and Toronto.

This, I think, is an excellent example of getting to know our country. The year 1867 brought us the British North America Act and Confederation. But it was three years earlier when the proposition was put forward, that the maritime provinces should form a union.

Prince Edward Island, the smallest, fearful that it could be swallowed up in the union insisted the meetings be held in Charlottetown. The Canadians, that is those people from Ontario and Quebec, their leaders heard about it and asked to be invited.

Discussions were held over the divisions of powers, an upper chamber and the judiciary. Then in 1867, the union was formed and the rest is history.

I suggest that we do not know each other as Canadians.

Sadly, my own example may reflect the experience of others in this Chamber or certainly some of my readers. Before I was elected in 1979, I travelled overseas to 12 countries. I visited the United States many times and travelléd through to the south to Florida and had yet to go to the province of Quebec before I was elected in 1979 here in my own country.

People of my generation had travel patterns that were north and south rather than an east and west pattern, south into the United States, including the vacation land of Florida.

Perhaps that, too, has been the pattern of residents in some of our other provinces, for example the Atlantic provinces. Perhaps they have travelled into the New England states rather than visiting the rest of Canada.

People in Ontario and Quebec travelled to Florida. Western Canadians travelled down to the states of Washington and California into Oregon and the Dakotas.

Sadly, we do not know our fellow Canadians and do not have an appreciation for the beautiful country that we live in.

I hope that will change. I hope that will change because of the debates that we are having and the turmoil that we are in at the present time regarding our Constitution, and the fearful thought that Quebec might separate.

I hope that the teachers in our schools will spark the imagination of students with our wonderful Canadian history that we have.

In conclusion, Cartier said of Confederation in 1867: "We sealed our pact without bloodshed and without exploitation of the weak by the strong. All it took was fairness, justice, and some compromises on both sides. I hope that if it must be amended it will not be to the narrow principles of fairness on which it was founded but rather to enlarge them even more".

I am grateful for the opportunity tonight to speak to this issue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will recognize the hon. member for York South—Weston, followed by the hon. member for St. Catharines, the hon. member for Edmonton—Strathcona and the hon. member for Madapédia—Matane,.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I wish I could say how grateful or pleased I am to be able to have the opportunity to speak to this matter this evening, but I have to ask myself whether this Parliament has its priorities straight.

We just came back from a rather extended leave. Most MPs had the opportunity to spend a lot of time in their constituencies, to speak to their constituents, and to ask them what was concerning them, what the important issues are. It is abundantly clear and obvious that as far as the Constitution goes Canadians just are not that concerned about the Constitution in terms of it being a priority.

Here we are having a special sitting of the House and I am probably competing with Murphy Brown, Cheers or the Olympics. This is not the only evening; we have had other evenings set aside to talk about the Constitution.

Here we are talking about the Constitution when 1.5 million Canadians are unemployed, when over 2 million Canadians are on welfare. We have set aside parliamentary time to talk about the Constitution when the most important issues in this country are jobs and the economy. Do not think the unemployed in this country are panting, listening to parliamentarians talking about the Constitution, asymmetrical federalism and a distinct society.

Do you think they are concerned about distinct societies when they do not even know where the next rent cheque is going to come from, when they do not know where the next mortgage payment is going to come from? I think we should put this in perspective. This is not the burning issue in the streets of Toronto, Vancouver, Halifax, Edmonton, or Saskatoon. The burning issue is the economy. When is this Parliament going to get serious and relevant in terms of what is important to the people of Canada? We should be setting aside parliamentary time to talk about the ways and the ideas we have to put Canadians back to work, to put the country back to work, in order to ensure that we can continue to afford and support medicare, post-secondary education and to ensure a prosperous future for our children and grandchildren.

We should be debating the economy. We should be debating all weekend. This Chamber should be filled with MPs. The Senate should be sitting all weekend to find ways, to talk about ideas or methods to get people back to work. Here we are talking about asymmetric federalism, distinct societies, entrenchment of this, entrenchment of that. Yes, it is important, but Canadians are fed up to here. They are fed up listening to politicians, people in the media, intellectuals, law professors, the elite, the snobs.

When I speak, I speak of the views of my constituents as well. They want this Parliament to deal with the real issues that are of importance to Canadians. Last spring, like many other members of Parliament, I sent out a survey. There were 40 questions in the survey that I sent out in the riding of York South—Weston and question 36 was: Please rank in order of importance how you think the federal government's agenda should be prioritized. This was last spring, last May. I should point out that over 1,500 constituents took the time to respond to this particular survey. It is not a scientific survey—and hundreds of others wrote letters—but 1,500 people took the 15 or 20 or 30 minutes that it took to complete it.

What did they think were the issues of importance? I listed five issues: defence, Constitution, environment, economy and social programs. The number one issue, you are right, the economy. The second issue of concern was the environment; the third, social programs; the fourth, the Constitution and fifth, defence. That is what is of concern to the people of York South—Weston.

I asked them general questions. I asked people how they felt about the future. Remember, this is almost a year ago. A lot has happened in the year, the recession has deepened, more Canadians have become unemployed. The mood out there is not any better; if anything, it has become a little worse. I asked people: "How do you feel about your future?" Seven per cent felt very positive, 27 per cent felt positive, 48 per cent felt uncertain, 11 per cent felt negative and 7 per cent felt very negative. I asked: "How do you feel about the future of your children?" Thirty-three per cent either felt very positive or positive, 53 per cent felt uncertain or negative about the future of their children.

In this particular survey I asked 40 questions on the economy, defence and external affairs, the Constitution, the environment, immigration, police and security and several general questions. I would like to go over the questions on the Constitution because that is what we are supposed to be talking about here tonight, although I would rather talk about ways of employing people. I should point out before I go over the questions that on December 3, 1990, I had a citizens' forum in the riding of York South—Weston at the Nelson A. Boylen Collegiate Institute. It was the York South—Weston citizens' forum on the future of Canada.

Again, on Monday, April 29, 1991 I organized a town hall meeting at Archbishop Romero Secondary School, again to talk about the Constitution and other issues of concern to the people of York South—Weston.

Then, as I indicated, last spring I sent out the survey. Every constituent in the riding had the opportunity to express his or her point of view through this particular survey. I understand I just have a couple of minutes to go. I would like to quickly go over the questions and the results.

"Did you agree with the Meech Lake Accord?" Seventy per cent said no, 9 per cent yes. "Do you believe the Citizens' Forum on the Future of Canada chaired by Keith Spicer is an effective means of gauging public opinion?" Fifty-five per cent said no, 19 per cent said yes. "Do you support the entrenchment of aboriginal rights in the Constitution?" Sixty-seven per cent said yes, 18 per cent said no.

"In your opinion is the government taking sufficient steps to resolve the underlying causes of native discontent?" Ten per cent said yes, 75 per cent said no.

"Do you believe that the recognition of Canada as a multicultural nation should be entrenched in the Constitution?" Thirty-four per cent said yes, 56 per cent said no.

"Do you support the current policy of bilingualism in Canada?" Thirty-two per cent said yes, 61 per cent said no.

"Is Canada's policy of bilingualism an essential element in maintaining a Canadian identity that is distinct from that of the United States?" Thirty-two per cent said yes, 62 per cent said no.

"Do you believe a sovereign Quebec can survive and prosper economically, socially and politically if it were to separate from Canada?" Seventeen per cent said yes, 69 per cent said no.

Those were the results of the questions that were put in a survey that was sent to the residents of York South—Weston. That was last spring. If one were to resurvey I am sure the views would still be similar.

In closing, I urge the Parliament of Canada to set its priorities straight. Start talking about the economy and jobs and get relevant and come up with ideas, methods and ways of putting Canada back to work.

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to present my constituents' concerns with regard to the Constitution. Before that, I have to agree with the previous speaker, the hon. member for York South—Weston and also other people who have taken part in this debate.

In the city of St. Catharines the primary concern is the economic situation. When I asked people about the government's proposals, they would usually answer that they were more concerned about their jobs. The announcement by General Motors prior to Christmas that it was going to be closing 21 plants in North America, with a potential job loss to about 70,000 people, added another devastating impact to my community. Obviously, with General Motors being the major employer and this taking place, this is the matter that is most on peoples' minds.

But where my friend, the previous speaker, indicated that it is a concern and, obviously a primary concern, it cannot help but be linked with the constitutional problem. I think we all realize that without unity in our country and without a united and strong Canada there cannot be any great economic progress made.

We could not do without a quarter of our population if the province of Quebec left Confederation, and what would be left would have a great deal of difficulty as well. Therefore, we are faced with a constitutional problem along with our economic woes at the present time and we have to deal with both those matters.

The people of St. Catharines are interested in the constitutional debate. That was shown this past Monday evening when there was a debate at Brock University in St. Catharines between David Peterson, the former premier of the province of Ontario, and the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean of this particular body.

They managed to fill up the theatre at the university as well as an overflow into the gymnasium which watched the debate by closed circuit television. The questions that were asked indicated that people are concerned about the future of our country and they are concerned about the constitutional questions that are before us.

One of the points that Mr. Peterson made was interesting. He indicated that we have been almost cursed with this constitutional question for more than 125 years and that we may be cursed to continue on with this because of the diversity of our country. It is a point that has been made before and I think we have to realize that.

In talking to the people of St. Catharines, they wanted to get back to the basics. The Constitution comes from the people and the basic power rests with them. They are the ones who give us the opportunity to govern, to decide on taxation and the other matters that are in the realms of the federal, provincial and municipal governments. They are the ones who set the parameter of the Constitution. That is something that we have to remember and we have to pay attention to when the Constitution is formed. The people of St. Catharines want to see the country remain united. They are fiercely proud of our country.

It is interesting that there is this linkage between the economy and the constitutional question. In that regard, the people would like to see a true economic union across the country. The original intent of the British North America Act was to form a common market in British North America. Now, we have the proposal in front of us that indicates there will be a free flow of goods, services, people and capital across the country. This can only help our country. Artificial trade barriers have to be brought down. I know that the First Ministers have tried to do that and they must continue to do it.

The Senate is a matter that you will not get too much comment on. People realize that there are regional differences and that regional alienation must be dealt with. If the Senate is the correct way to deal with that regional alienation, that is what they would like to see happen.

I think they are concerned about the parliamentary system. Giving the Senate equal powers, an elected Senate, and possibly as was indicated an equal Senate, may cause some withering of our parliamentary system if we have another body that will compete with the House of Commons and possibly replicate it. That is something that we have to avoid.

It is interesting that one group of high school students in my riding, a combined class of Denis Morris High School and Holy Cross High School in St. Catharines, a grade nine enriched program, studied the 28 proposals and came up with a report that they presented to me before Christmas. It is called Shared Citizenship and Diversity: A Student Response. They dealt with three of the beginning proposals of their government. They looked at the Canadian identity and said: "We, the students of Lincoln County Catholic School Board in St. Catharines, believe that the most important qualities of a Canadian are equality and fair play. We believe that a Canadian is someone who is willing to include everyone, regardless of ethnic, cultural, religious or racial background, as friends and neighbours in the Canadian story".

They went on to look at the various proposals that have been made. Along with what people who have discussed this with me would say, they indicate that the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms is something that should be reaffirmed and strengthened. They felt that the proposal to increase the override provision or the notwithstanding clause to 60 per cent of the House of Commons was good. They also felt that in addition to including it for 60 per cent for this body and for the provincial legislatures in order to invoke the notwithstanding clause that an elected Senate should deal with it as well, that there should be approval by 50 per cent of that body, and that the override provision should only last for three years.

I thought that was an interesting concept, coming from a group of grade nine high school students.

They also went on to deal with aboriginal matters. They felt that aboriginal peoples should also be considered as a founding people along with the people from Quebec, that we should treat them in the same manner and that we should remember that they were the founding peoples along with the French and the English as well.

One other matter that I would like to speak to in the time remaining to me is the concept in the proposals that training has to be given exclusively to the provinces. I believe in training. I know that the training programs that go on in my community are most important at this time. With the restructuring that is going on in the Canadian economy and the world economy, we have to realize that this is a matter that is going to go on, that people are going to retrain and retrain maybe three and four and five times during their lifetimes.

The people I talked to indicated that they want federal funds to remain in these training programs. They want a federal presence. It may be that the provinces would take the lead. We have difficulty now in the province of Ontario. We have labour training boards that have been established for the entire country and we also have them for the provinces. There is an agreement that has been reached between the federal government and the Ontario government.

The Ontario government is currently pulling out its training and skills development from about 10 different departments. That is going to take them time and there are going to be inevitable turf wars that go along with that. In the meantime, the Canada Employment Centres seem to be standing by, not being allowed to participate in this process that is going on.

If this is what is going to happen, I see dire consequences. Individual communities need to priorize their various training programs and they need to do it in a manner where they all get together. It seems to take the province a great deal of time in order to get into the training. The federal government is already there. Why are we going to lose that particular aspect? That is something that I definitely want to see worked on.

It may mean that there is a shared jurisdiction between the provincial and the federal government with perhaps provincial paramountcy. Training, and this has been told to me by many of the people who are involved in the training area, many of the people are my constituents, that they do not want to see training exclusively go to the province. That is something that I hope will be looked at and taken into consideration in the report of the special joint committee.

One other matter was property rights. The indication of the students was that property rights should be included. They felt that it would be taken into account by section 1 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, clearly demonstrated in a free and democratic society.

Having said that, I think that we can look forward to the coming time to the report of the joint committee. I look forward to participating in what I am sure will be a debate in this Chamber.

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I rise this evening and present here in the House of Commons a report from the citizens of Edmonton—Strathcona.

Over the past months many people in my riding have expressed to me their views on Canada's Constitution. I have spent hours reading surveys, responding to letters, talking to people on the street and in my office. I have listened to people who have attended my town hall meetings. I hold one town hall meeting a month as I have done for three years and we have been talking at these town hall meetings about the Constitution for at least a year, if not more.

My constituents have told me that it is time for a change. They told me that regions must be better represented in our Constitution. They told me our House of Commons and our Senate must be reformed. They told me that it is time that governments consult more with Canadians. They told me our Constitution must also protect our environment. They have told me that our Constitution should be modified to allow Canada to remain prosperous into the next century.

From the people who have contacted me I have learned many things. What has impressed me the most was that the people in my riding are proud to live in Edmonton, Alberta. They have told me that they will always be Canadians first and Albertans second.

The people of Edmonton—Strathcona are proud of their citizenship. They feel they want to keep the country that they love united and strong. But they have told me it is time for change.

In the summer of 1991 I mailed a questionnaire to every household in my riding, to 40,000 homes representing 80,000 constituents in Edmonton—Strathcona. The response was impressive. I received over 1,000 replies. I want to thank those who responded to my questionnaire. I also want to thank the many people who have written and telephoned me on this very issue.

In many different ways my constituents told me that they want equality for all people, all provinces and all regions in Canada. My constituents do not feel equal to Ontario or Quebec in our present system of representation by population. Eighty-three per cent of my constituents told me that it is important to them that we reform our Constitution so that regional representation can be increased.

• (2130)

Seventy-six per cent of my constituents said that they would like regional representation to be increased through Senate reform. I must emphasize that the strong demand for Senate reform in Edmonton—Strathcona cannot and must not be ignored.

However, interestingly enough, only 32 per cent of my constituents demanded that all provinces be equally represented in the Senate. This means that while the people in my riding demand and expect Senate reform, they do not demand and expect a Triple-E Senate.

Sixty-one per cent of my constituents feel that to increase the regional representation in our Constitution, we must also reform the House of Commons. They want a House of Commons which is less partisan so that members will be free to speak on behalf of the regions that they represent. A little bit later on, I will touch more on House of Commons reform.

I have also asked my constituents how they feel about giving one province the right to a constitutional veto that is not shared by other provinces. Not surprisingly, 76 per cent of my constituents say no to this idea. Once again, my constituents have told me that they want all provinces to be equal partners in a strong and united Canada.

I have received a strong message that my constituents expect to play a more involved role in amending our Constitution than they have in the past. I have asked my constituents their opinion on constituent assemblies, national referenda and public hearings as methods to involve citizens in constitutional reform.

My constituents have made it clear to me that they would like to have the right to be involved in national referenda or constituent assemblies if the government decides to amend the Constitution. I very much support the idea of a national referendum.

However, I would like to note that the most popular response was that people wished to be involved in constitutional hearings on proposed constitutional amendments. There is 66 per cent of my riding that would like to have a constituent assembly to propose or to review constitutional amendments.

Sixty-three per cent of my riding would like a national referendum to approve constitutional amendments. Yet, 82 per cent feel that it is very important to have constitutional hearings on proposed constitutional amendments.

I applaud the government for consulting Canadians as extensively as it has through the Beaudoin-Edwards commission, the Spicer commission and the recent Dobbie commission.

Constitutional hearings will ensure that in future, Canadians will have the right to participate in amending our Constitution as they did with these other committees.

I have also asked my constituents how they feel about involving aboriginal people in the constitutional process. Seventy-two per cent felt it was very important for aboriginal people to be involved in the process. In fact, quite consistent with my constituents' demands for equality, I was reprimanded by one constituent who told me that this was indeed a silly question as everyone in Canada has the right and should be involved in the constitutional process.

On the issue of our Constitution reflecting Canada's multicultural and bilingual nature, 49 per cent of my constituents feel that this is important, that our Constitution reflect multiculturalism as a strong principle of Canadian society.

On the subject of giving the provinces control over language, only 22 per cent favoured giving the provinces more control and 46 per cent were strongly opposed to this idea.

My constituents also told me that they considered environmental protection to be a critical issue. Eighty-six per cent felt that each level of government should have the power it needs to protect the environment. Fifty-eight per cent of my constituents felt it was important that they had an environmental charter that would acknowledge the rights of Canadians to environmental protection and that this would allow them to go to court when these rights were not protected.

Edmonton—Strathcona is divided on the issue of our Constitution reflecting the unique cultural characteristics of Quebec. Forty-three per cent felt that it is important that the Constitution recognize Quebec as a distinct society and 39 per cent were opposed to this idea.

Many of my constituents have said that if the government does acknowledge Quebec as a distinct society, they would like to be informed on how this would be defined. My constituents would like to know what distinct society is, what it means and if it provides Quebec with extra rights.

My constituents told me that they want our Constitution to be able to enhance our ability to remain competitive in world markets and to direct national economic policies.

Seventy-five per cent feel it is very important that the federal government should provide the direction for our country on the major economic policies as opposed to this being a provincial responsibility. Seventy-seven per cent feel that it is important that the government set national standards so all Canadians can work together for excellence.

In conclusion, the people of Edmonton—Strathcona are asking for change. They want a new Constitution that will reflect the needs of Canadians in the 1990s. However, they did not tell me that our government should throw out the baby with the bath water. Most of my constituents want a Constitution that is basically like the one we have today, yet increasing the influence and powers of the regions.

The constituents of Edmonton—Strathcona believe in a strong, united and prosperous Canada. I am very grateful for having this opportunity to share with you the views expressed by my constituents and I hope that all members will carefully consider these views.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Luc Joncas (Matapédia—Matane): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege in this House to represent the wonderful riding of Matapédia—Matane, where people worked and still work very hard to build a heritage with which they can identify for themselves and their children.

I urge those who have never visited this region to go and see it. They will be surprised when they get there by its rich and diverse natural and man-made environment, with a 120-kilometre shoreline along the majestic St. Lawrence and extending 150 kilometres into the Matapedia Valley. Human activities have developed sometimes along opposite lines, sometimes along complementary ones.

What a fisherman needs for his living is not the same as what a farmer or a forester needs. Nevertheless, the feeling of belonging to their region arises from this diversity. What would seem at first glance to disunite them in fact brings them together, since they complement one another and raise their common standard of living. What is true for a region like mine is also true for a country like Canada.

We all agree, I believe, that the unity and prosperity of Canada are both essential for its survival. One does not go without the other. Our prosperity and our prestige throughout the world come from Canada's unity. In today's world, political stability is essential to a country's economic health; it is far too precious to be simply dismissed out of hand.

Yet this is what we are preparing to do if we let Canada disappear. For many, the last recession hurt a lot and continues to hurt. At home, in my own riding, we experienced closings that we are not about to forget, whether it was Donohue-Matane, Radio-Canada or VIA Rail. There were very few ridings, in Canada and in Quebec, that were able to escape the negative effects of that recession.

That being said, it is pretty easy to see that the scenarios on the break-up of our country, even the most reassuring ones, anticipate a serious deterioration of that economic context. Common sense tells us that the break-up of a country, combined with an already fragile economy, will result in a dramatic drop of our standard of living, which is presently the second highest in the world, just after Japan. Many obstacles looming up on the horizon threaten our quality of life, and it is not by dividing the country that we will overcome those.

One of the first such obstacles is our accumulated debt of more than $400 billion; that amount represents $15,000 for each man, woman and child in this country, and it does not include provincial, municipal and personal debts. In spite of that, thanks to our sound budget policies, we enjoy a top triple A credit rating. That rating guarantees the solvency of each province, as well as each public and commercial business in the country.

What happens when that credit rating goes down? The lenders simply demand higher interest rates. Given our present debt, an increase of 1 per cent translates into costs of over $2,500 million, which means less money for services, regional development and social programs.

Competition is another obstacle. We cannot escape the constraints of a world economy. We need to trade with other countries. Canada now exports 25 per cent of its production and, in the last five years, its share of the international trade has dropped from 5 to 4 per cent, which is one of the biggest drops among the Group of Seven members. In that context, we must, in my opinion, remain strong and united to make up the lost ground, rather than divide our country.

Despite all of this, we are told that once Canada has broken up, it would be easy for the two smaller and less viable countries that would result to negotiate the economic structures that made our prosperity in the past. Some people say that could be achieved in a spirit of generosity and serenity and that it would be easy to convince other provinces, the United States and other countries to kindly take our new needs into account. That is what they would have us believe. Quite frankly, would it be easier for an independent Quebec of six million to negotiate a new GATT agreement, for example? Would Quebec or a new fragmented Canada be in a better position to deal with giants like the United States or the European Community? The answer is quite obvious.

We should understand that those simplistic arguments and that reassuring nonsense are part of that senseless logic that often destroys nations. At the risk of not sounding too original, let me say that if we fail to learn from the past, we will always repeat the same mistakes. And what can we learn from history? We learn that the break-up of a country is both costly and painful, that it may have serious consequences in the short term and in the longer run and that it can leave deep economic and social scars.

We find evidence of that everywhere around us. You just have to brush up on your history and look at what is happening in the world. You will soon realize that in the hopeless number of countries falling apart, the people are on the verge of losing peace, stability and prosperity, if that is not already the case.

If our country breaks up, what will happen to our education system with less money? What will happen to our labour training program, our health program, and our currency? The uncertainty created by this whole debate is already hurting us a lot. The fact that we have to compete with other countries requires that we settle, as soon as possible, this issue which has been lingering for more than 30 years so that we can proceed with what all Canadians expect from us, that is to create jobs, to create wealth and to guarantee our social programs.

Mr. Taylor, chairman of the board at the Royal Bank, said on January 23, and I quote: "I have to travel all over the world to meet with business people who have billions of dollars to invest and, whether they are from London, Tokyo or Stockholm, they all ask me what is happening in Canada and if our country is safe enough for them to come and invest their clients' savings. I reassure them and I keep faith that we stay together as a country". Closer to home, our investors postpone their decision to invest, which delays the economic recovery, and that is nothing compared to the permanent costs that await us if our country were to break up.

Some people say that an independent Quebec could share the Canadian dollar without having any official influence on decisions made by the Bank of Canada.

It would mean then that Quebec, as a minor partner in this monetary union, would have much less of a say than it does now in the development of monetary policies. Many factors affect currency, and no self-respecting country can tolerate for any length of time that someone else be in charge of such major policies. No sovereign nation can and will tolerate this form of neocolonialism for very long. That is basic common sense. As for the European monetary union, I can assure you it will pull off this amazing feat when the necessary elements, which are already present in Canada, will exist in Europe, namely a single central bank as well as integrated tax systems and national financial policies.

Why then would we relinquish what the Europeans want so much to get and as soon as possible? Our Constitution is 125 years old. A constitution is a bit like a mirror. When you look at it, or read it, you must be able to recognize yourself in it and be proud of what you see. As our mirror, the Canadian Constitution needs to be updated so as to be a reflection of the Canadian people as they are today, for the future generations to see.

Granted, this is no small task, but none is too big for men and women who like to take up a challenge and who genuinely want to keep this nation united, a nation which is the envy of so many others around the world.

Some people will say that the separation of Quebecers from the rest of Canada is a response to the challenges we face, but is it really necessary to break up Canada in order to satisfy Quebec's historical aspirations, the aspirations of the west, the Atlantic provinces and aboriginal peoples? My answer is no. Do we really have to break-up Canada to further harmonize federal and provincial policies and avoid wasteful duplication? The answer is, again, no. To prevent this break up, we must be guided by reason and a sense of equity. As Cartier said in 1867, to seal the federal pact did not require bloodshed or domination by the strong over the weak. It took equity, justice and a few mutual concessions.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, from my office I listened to the words said in this House on this subject by the hon. member for York South—Weston. My constituents feel the same as his.

Really they cannot understand why we are spending this time in the House on the Constitution when the number one issue facing the country is the state and crisis of our economy.

I am sure if you canvassed most of the 295 members in this House, they are probably getting the same feedback from their ridings. Let us address the economy.

I also believe that as leaders in this country we have a duty to address the constitutional issues because if we do not preserve this country, Canada as we know it today, then debates on the economy will fall on deaf ears.

Like the other members who spoke over these three evenings, I too did an extensive survey sending through my householder a questionnaire to every household in the riding of Parkdale—High Park.

The results that came back were very revealing. They gave me a reading of how my constituents think on amendments to the Constitution.

To sum it all up, I can safely say that my constituents feel that we as Canadians want a united Canada with a strong central government. That is the bottom line.

I was very pleased that over 80 per cent of my constituents felt that the aboriginal people have an inherent right to self-government.

I was also pleased from the survey to see that there is a change in attitude from Meech Lake days to the present. During the Meech Lake debate, I would say the majority of my constituents were against any distinct society clause in the Constitution.

Now over 60 per cent are accepting the distinct society clause as long as it does not give Quebec additional powers over other provinces. The way it is being interpreted now, most of my constituents feel that Quebec should be designated as a distinct society. They have no problems with that.

• (2150)

I would like to take the remainder of the time to present in this House for historical record the submissions made to the Constitution committee by the Canadian Polish Congress. The Canadian Polish Congress represents 240 different organizations across Canada. They represent the Canadians of Polish origin residing coast to coast in this country. The congress represents the thoughts and aspirations of the majority of the Canadian Polish community. The well-being, the future and the unity of Canada are matters of foremost importance to the congress. The congress has always taken a stand on issues of importance to Canada including unity, constitutional reform, multiculturalism, tolerance, co-operation and understanding among all citizens of our country regardless of their background, race or religion.

I am quoting from the introduction to their brief. The Canadian Polish Congress—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member knows he can table the brief after along with his notes.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, thank you for that advice. I shall do that because these are two very important documents.

I was very impressed with the way the congress presented it in a non-partisan fashion. They came before Christmas to Ottawa. They met with the deputy leader of the Conservative Party. They presented the brief to the Conservative Party with explanations. Then they met with the Leader of the Official Opposition and they went to meet with the Leader of the New Democratic Party and made the same presentation there. It was presented in a truly Canadian fashion in a non-partisan way.

To go through all of it would take me about two hours. I will just quote a few things that might be of interest to the members of this House and to Canadians at large. I would like to share with you what they said under the section: Freedoms, Rights and Responsibilities of Canadians. "We must realize that we cannot emphasize our rights without addressing the corresponding responsibilities. Even a cursory look at our society reveals the fact that increasingly Canadians are asking not what they can do for their country, but rather what their country can do for them. The prevalent attitude seems to be 'to get more for less' and 'to look after No. 1'.

Trade unions demand more pay for fewer hours of work claiming that their members have the right to earn such inflated wages. In addition job security appears to be a well entrenched right. Artists create obscene art in the name of the right of self-expression and artistic freedom. Our insatiable propensity for instant gratification leads to rampant consumerism with its egotistical implications.

In the name of freedom of speech, untrue and falsified history is circulated with sad and unpleasant results.

In view of these, we the Canadian Polish Congress believe that the time has come to address the other side of the individual rights and freedom equation, namely the individual duties and responsibilities."

Mr. Speaker, you have heard me speak on that issue in this House many times. I am pleased that an organization the size of the Canadian Polish Congress is backing many members who believe that this should be entrenched in the Constitution.

The other section which I would like to share, and again it affects the members directly, is the section under: Response of Institutions for a Modern Canada. The brief says they "agree with the proposals that the government has made under part II, proposal 8, the House of Commons". They want to share this comment with us. "It appears that at the present time the deciding factor in the law making is the party vote and not the individual vote of the member who is representing the will and aspirations of his constituents. It is proper to give individual members as much of free votes as possible so that they could reflect the aspirations of their electors more closely". This is something we have been talking about, but we are not implementing.

Another proposal is: "We would also suggest that the decorum of the discussions in the House be improved, especially during the Question Period. Also the participation of members at other times in the House should be improved". I see, Mr. Speaker, you nodding with that proposal also.

The third proposal to make under that section is that representation in the House of Commons should reflect more closely the actual distribution of the population in the provinces. The present disparities between urban and rural ridings are too great, they say. The urban vote is consequently less valuable than that of the rural elector. Also some form of proportional representation should be considered and they suggest here the French model.

I was very pleased that they made these recommendations. On the title page of their presentation they quote from Thomas Carlyle who said: "Men's hearts ought not be set against one another, but set with one another".

I think we can maybe bring that up to date to 1992 and say that Canadians' hearts ought not to be set against one another, but set with one another. Canadian minds ought not be set against one another but set with one another. The hon. minister has been given this heavy responsibility to monitor the constitutional debates across this country. If everyone remembers that saying and helps that hon. minister, I am sure that we will come up with a document that all Canadians will be proud of.

I want to take this opportunity to say the government could not have chosen a better minister to try to put this constitutional package together.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member will file that with the Clerk. The hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed an honour to take part in this very special debate this evening.

I have just returned within the hour from my home province of New Brunswick. Time is very short and as you have told me, I only have about four minutes. Hopefully we will continue this special debate or this process next week and I will have time to finish my remarks. In the short time that I do have, I want to point out a number of things that have happened in my riding in the past number of months.

It really began on September 29, 1991 when the Prime Minister unveiled the government's proposals for a renewed Confederation. I took those 28 proposals, which were quite complicated, quite long and involved and boiled them down, if you will, to a citizen's guide to the proposals. It was a four pager, back to back. I mailed that to all of my constituents in the hope that they would read it and after reading it would respond with the mail-in on that citizen's guide. Many of my constituents did that.

Aside from doing that, we also set in process a series of meetings throughout my riding. As you know, my riding is a very large rural riding, in fact the largest riding in maritime Canada. We had a series of 20 constitutional meetings throughout my riding over the course of those few months. I also had 20 speaking engagements at service clubs, schools and other interested organizations.

It was a very healthy process. It was a learning process not only for my constituents but for myself. I had a chance to hear them and get a sense of what they wanted from this country of ours.

To sum up, I am going to have to quote the Mexican ambassador to Canada. He says it best: "Canada is a success looking for a problem". What he means by that is almost what my constituents were telling me. We have a great country here, the second largest country in the world in terms of geography, the seventh largest economy in the world, a country that has been recognized by the United Nations as having the second best standard of living across the social scale of any country in the world, only exceeded by Japan. Those are the types of things my constituents are telling me. They are also telling me: "Let's not throw it away". Indeed we have problems, but we are a sophisticated country. We are an educated country. We are a thoughtful country, a reflective country, and we have it within our grasp to make it better. That is what this process is all about.

I know you are signalling me, Mr. Speaker. I guess I have less than 60 seconds left. Hopefully we can continue at least my portion of the debate next week. I thank you for your courtesy, for allowing me to get on at this late date, and hopefully we will continue this next week.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being ten o'clock p.m., pursuant to the order made on Wednesday, February 5, 1992, this House stands adjourned until 10 a.m. tomorrow, pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 10.00 p.m.

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston) moved:

That this House condemn the government for its refusal to take action to alleviate the intolerably high levels of unemployment in Canada.

He said: Madam Speaker, this ought to be a happy day for Canadians. It is Valentine's Day. For millions of Canadians this day is like every other day has been over the last number of months and years.

Canada is facing its worst economic crisis since the thirties. There are 1.5 million Canadians unemployed and 2.2 million Canadians on welfare. While Canadians are suffering the anguish, the hardship, this government has taken a do-nothing, cross your fingers approach to dealing with the serious economic crisis that is facing Canadians.

At a time when Canadians are suffering this government has other priorities. Here we are on Valentine's Day, it is a Friday, debating the number one issue of concern to Canadians. This House has been back now for two weeks, and yet this House has not given priority to the issue of unemployment in the Canadian economy.

This House ought to be sitting today, tomorrow, Sunday, and every day and every evening to come up with ways to devise methods to put Canada back to work.

The Liberal Party put forward its plan for economic recovery, a modest plan. We recognize that there is a need to kick-start the economy, to put people back to work, to start creating jobs. So we presented a plan. Yet the government has refused to combat the high level of unemployment in Canada. The government has taken a do-nothing approach.

I am pleased to see the minister of employment in the House today. I look forward to hearing his remarks.

• (1010)

The biggest problem in Canada today is the Conservative government in Ottawa and the Bob White government at Queen's Park. Together these two governments—the NDP government at Queen's Park and the Conservative government in Ottawa—have destroyed the Canadian economy. They have shattered confidence. Time and time again Bob Rae and our Prime Minister say: "Well, it is a question of confidence; Canadians don't have confidence". Is it any wonder that Canadians do not have confidence when they have the likes of our Prime Minister and a labour led government at Queen's Park? The government at Queen's Park has totally turned off business and has created a climate or an atmosphere where business is afraid to expand, where business is afraid to invest in order to create the much needed jobs.

Is it any wonder that Canadians lack confidence in the future? That is a sad story.

The unemployment statistics were released last week. The rate was up again, 10.4 per cent. What does that mean in human terms? All too often we talk about percentages and we talk about rates. But let us try to think for a moment what that actually means to average people.

In the province of Ontario where I come from 504,000 people are unemployed; 504,000 people have to wait for their UI cheques in order to make their rental payments or make their mortgage payments. In the province of Quebec, 399,000 people. In the province of New Brunswick where the minister of employment comes from 42,000 are unemployed. These are those who are officially unemployed. On top of that, of course, we have thousands upon thousands of others who have simply given up because of the difficulty in seeking employment. Nearly 72,000 people in the province of New Brunswick are on welfare. That is a shame. It is a shame that the minister of employment has not done anything to help his own constituents in the province of New Brunswick.

A total of 1,429,000 Canadians are unemployed, out of work. Here we sat in the House of Commons with recession-proof jobs over the last number of years. Elected people, senators and public officials have not really had to worry about where the next paycheque was coming from.

I really wonder whether the minister of employment understands what it feels like not to know where the next cheque is coming from, whether he understands the uncertainty even in the minds of Canadians who are working in terms of whether there will be a job for them. Perhaps the minister can contemplate the thousands of Canadians today who instead of bringing flowers to their spouses, instead of bringing flowers home, will be bringing pink slips home, lay-off notices, termination notices. Can the minister of employment try to understand what it means to be unemployed and without work?

Canadians want to work. Those who are unemployed and those who are on welfare want the opportunity to be able to earn a living and to help other Canadians. Yet this minister and his government are doing absolutely nothing in order to kick-start the economy.

Perhaps the minister of employment and his government have yet to grasp the magnitude of the problem. They seem to be preoccupied with the Constitution. Yes, it is an important issue, but it is not the most important issue in the minds of Canadians. The most important issue in the economy is jobs.

I do not think that the minister of employment from New Brunswick understands the magnitude of the problem. I am sure his staff has briefed him on the violence that is erupting at employment centres across the country. It is that desperate.

Yesterday in Montreal violence erupted on the welfare lines. Yet this minister sits back and tells the House that he has a way of getting people back to work. He is going to train people. He is going to ensure there is long-term prosperity. Little comfort that is to the millions of people who are either unemployed or on welfare.

The minister has stated time and time again that his government is committed to retraining. He said so in this House on a great number of occasions. The Prime Minister has said that his government is committed to retraining. We know that it not quite accurate.

An internal memo was released a few days ago. It was sent from directors general directly responsible to the minister of employment to all area managers across the country in Employment Canada, asking them to prepare contingency plans for three scenarios. The first was a 20 per cent reduction of regular funds for training. The second was a 35 per cent reduction of regular funds. The third was a 50 per cent reduction of regular funds. In effect it was slashing community based training right across the country.

A number of organizations in the riding of York South—Weston rely on this type of funding and will not be able to survive with these cuts.

What is at issue is the credibility of the minister. I know he prides himself on having some integrity. He stands and says that the government is committed to training and retraining. He says that in public, yet when he gets back to his comfortable office with his big desk, his comfortable chairs and his comfortable couch, with his recession-proof job, he tells his managers and directors to send out the word: "We are going to cut because I am responding to directions from my boss, the Prime Minister".

Shame on the minister of unemployment. He is not the minister of employment. He is the minister of unemployment. That is his responsibility. He has to assume and his government has to assume the responsibility. Because of its economic policies this country is facing the worst economic crisis since the thirties. Its high interest rate-high dollar policy has destroyed the manufacturing base in Ontario. It has destroyed hundreds of thousand of permanent jobs.

The memo goes out; they are cutting $100 million. The area manager in Toronto where I come from, Mr. Ron Crockford, says in a memorandum of January 10, 1992: "We will be forced to terminate projects due to budgetary reductions as opposed to performance related reasons if we reduce further".

That is the situation. Who are the people who will suffer? Will it be his friends in high places, his buddies on Bay Street, the guys he sips cocktails with? No. These cuts will affect those people most in need of training: immigrants, women, youth, disabled people, older workers, linguistic and racial minorities. These are the very sectors which have been designated equity groups by the recently formed Canadian Labour Force Development Board. These are the people who need the government's help, and the government is turning its back. That minister is turning his back on the people most in need, and a lot of those people are in his own province. He is turning his back on his own people.

I look forward to the minister standing in this House to tell his constituents and other Canadians what he intends to do to alleviate the suffering. I would like to know what advice the minister gives. Presumably he finds time to revisit his riding on occasion, to listen to the unemployed fishermen, to listen to the unemployed people in his riding. What does he say to people when they come into his office and say: "Mr. Valcourt, I am unemployed. I am desperate. I need money. I need work. I have to pay the rent. I have to make the mortgage payment. I have to buy food for my children". What does the minister say to those people? What does he say? What advice does he give to those people who are desperate for help from this government?

What he says to them is: "Deficit reduction is important. We have to reduce the deficit. We have to control the debt". This government has had eight years to deal with the national debt, and what has it done? It has doubled the national debt. It has had eight years to deal with the deficit, and what has it done? It has increased the deficit. It has implemented the goods and services tax that has made the situation even worse.

There is one way to bring back confidence in Canada and that is for this government to resign. It has lost the moral authority to govern. It has no support. It has the legal right, yes. The Prime Minister will hang on by his fingernails; he will hang on to power to the last bitter moment. He has the legal authority to carry on, but he has absolutely no moral authority. There is no support for this government. It is at 12 per cent or 13 per cent in public opinion. Canadians want the opportunity.

If they want confidence in this country, call an election. If the minister of unemployment is so sure of his economic plan, if he is so sure that he has the answer, if he is so confident that he will put people back to work, let him have the guts. Let the Prime Minister have the guts to issue the writ and let us go to the people of Canada. Let us present our platform and let us see who the people of Canada will put their trust in.

They will put their trust in the Liberal Party, in Jean Chrétien and the Liberal Party, because they know our party has stood and will continually stand for the disadvantaged in our society. They know we will not allow the suffering that is taking place today. If the minister wants to instil a bit of confidence, let him have the courage to call an election.

Maybe that is what the Prime Minister is thinking. He is on his farewell tour. As a matter of fact, the T-shirts are at the printers. A number of communities will be listed on the back of these T-shirts. It is the Brian Mulroney farewell tour.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have listened to the hon. gentleman and I think I have been patient. I have not interrupted him when he referred to other members by name, but this is maybe one too many. I would appreciate the hon. member following the rules of this House.

Mr. Nunziata: There will be a T-shirt that reads the Prime Minister's farewell tour, his Alice in Wonderland tour. It started in Barrie. We saw the picture in the paper today. That young student had it right. He gave the Prime Minister a straight arm. The picture is in every newspaper in the country. That is what Canadians think of the Prime Minister of Canada and what he has done to this country. He can do everything he wants to do in terms of public relations, but the farewell tour is on, my friends. Whether it is next spring or next fall, your days are numbered.

If you have the courage and if you are so certain of what you are doing, then I say: "Go to the people".

The motion reads:

> That this House condemn the government for its refusal to take action to alleviate the intolerably high levels of unemployment in Canada.

Members on the government side are at this point seriously contemplating their future. With every passing day, we pick up the paper and read about another Tory

MP who has decided not to run again. We know why they are deciding not to run again because the writing is on the wall.

I encourage members on the government side to stand up for their constituents, to stand up for what they believe in instead of propping up a government that has absolutely no moral authority to govern this country, when there is so much suffering, when the unemployment rate is where it is at.

I call on the government to do the right and honourable thing. I call on the minister to do the right thing, and I ask him, in future, to tell it as it is because these leaked memos really tell it as it is. I would like to hear the minister's explanation.

In closing, let me say that the Liberal Party has as its policy a full employment strategy. As the Official Opposition, the government in waiting, we will not rest until every Canadian who wants to work has the opportunity to work.

Our strategy is full employment. The strategy of minister of unemployment is full unemployment. Throughout the day today, Liberal members will be criticizing the government and explaining the Liberal Party economic recovery program to put this country back to work.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I want to pick up on a constructive idea that my colleague put forward in the opening part of his remarks.

He put forward an idea which I think most Canadians would like to see implemented. His idea was a challenge to the government, as I understood it, to create a situation in this House where rather than have the short, six-hour debate on probably the most important issue concerning the country today, namely putting people back to work, we debate this issue right through the weekend.

I ask my colleague, he being an experienced member of this House being here for many years, how he would orchestrate that or how he could engineer it with the minister. Could he elaborate a little bit on that? I think it is a worth-while idea that Canadians would like to see implemented.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, I believe with all the certainty that I can command, the people of Canada want parliamentarians to show some leadership.

They want to see parliamentarians and government understand what is relevant out there, what is happening at the grass roots level, what is happening at the street level. This is not the real world in this Chamber. This is not the Ritz.

It is a nice building, and we are very comfortable in it but we are too far removed from reality, especially when the government has decided, for example, that we should have, over the course of a number of evenings, special sittings of the House to debate the constitutional question. It is a very important question, the future of Canada, but people across the country do not think it ought to be the priority. Yet the government decided to set aside special time.

We are mired in a recession, yet no special time has been set aside by this government to deal with the question of unemployment. It was left up to us, the Liberal opposition, to take the first opportunity. We were allotted this day as an Opposition Day and we set the agenda according to what we believed to be the most important issue facing Canadians.

• (1030)

If the minister is ready, my colleagues and I are prepared to sit here all weekend long to talk about ideas, to talk about a recovery plan. We are prepared to debate, for example, the elements of the Liberal Party one-year emergency plan, whether it is the use of RRSPs to finance first- time homes, whether it is to debate the infrastructure program to accelerate capital projects in municipalities right across the country not only to improve the infrastructure but in order to create jobs. We are prepared to talk about training. We are prepared to talk about why Canada is still one of the lowest per capita investors in training among OECD countries.

I would like to hear from the minister when he has the opportunity. If he is really concerned about unemployment in Canada, I ask him to take me up on my challenge to him, the Liberal Party challenge, to sit here all weekend long to debate unemployment and the economy.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, I just want to ask the hon. member for York South—Weston how he squares the fact that when he makes the statement that it is the Liberal Party that is in favour of full employment and the Progressive Conservatives who are in favour of unemployment with the reality that during those years leading up to 1984 the average job creation was short term, temporary and 80 per cent of all jobs created by the Liberals were short-term jobs and more than 80 per cent of all job creation under the present administration are permanent, full-time jobs. How does he square statistical fact with his assertion that the Liberals believe in full employment when all they created were part-time jobs?

Mr. Nunziata: This is the kind of nonsense that we hear from Conservative members. They reach back to 1984 or to 1948 or to 1867. We are talking about today's reality.

Yes, governments past have made mistakes. I was not part of that government. I was a member of the party, but I was not part of the government. I am not taking John Diefenbaker to task for things that he did 20 or 30 years ago. We have a problem today. People are unemployed. They want to work. They want to get off the unemployment rolls. They are tired of relying on pogey.

Does the member know what pogey means? Does he know what it means to be unemployed? He is one of the members from Alberta. I have not seen him stand up in this House and go to bat for the disadvantaged in Alberta. Is it any wonder that the Tories in Alberta will be wiped out? Perhaps the member does not care any more because he knows he will not be returned to this House.

We are talking about today. This government has had eight years to get the country in order. What it has done is totally destroy it. It has dismantled it. We had three, four or five years of good solid growth in this country. What did it do? It frittered the opportunity away and has decimated a lot of good, well paying jobs in the country.

It behoves the hon. member from Alberta to stand up and reach back to the past to talk about job creation. A job is a job. People want to work. That is what they want to do. They want to put Canada back to work and that member is doing absolutely nothing to further that strategy of full employment.

I have not seen the minister of employment stand up and say: "It is the goal of this government to put every Canadian back to work". I have never, ever seen that member stand up and say that that is the policy of the Government of Canada.

Mr. Malone: Madam Speaker, I just want the record to show that the hon. member, when he asserts that we reach back 20 or 30 years, he is wrong. We are talking about eight years ago. The hon. member for York South—Weston is not willing to stand on his party's record. His party's record was a dismal record. He is not willing to stand on the fact that the unemployment rate was 4 per cent higher then than it is today. He is not willing to stand on the fact that they created more part-time jobs by about 160 per cent differential between then and today, and he is not willing to stand on the fact that his party at that time put less money into retraining than we do today.

I think it is quite unfortunate that Canadians have to believe his promise about a new tomorrow when he will not even stand on a record of a government just eight years ago.

Mr. Nunziata: The member persists. Forty thousand Canadians lost their jobs in January; 40,000 full-time jobs were lost in January. The bankruptcy rate is the highest ever. I do not know whether the hon. member has his head in the sand or he is just totally naive. We are in the worst—read my lips—economic crisis since the thirties. That is how bad it is out there.

Stores are being shut down, businesses are cutting back. Every day that you turn on the television or read the newspapers, you see that people are losing their jobs. Sears Canada has closed down its shop in Halifax. Eighteen hundred people are losing their jobs. General Motors is cutting back. Everyone is cutting back right across the country.

We are mired in this terrible recession and this member wants to go back to 1984. They have had the opportunity for eight solid years to do something about it. When we had a government 8 years ago, 10 years ago, 15 years ago, if we were so bad then surely they could have remedied the situation in eight years. Are they trying to tell us now that eight years was not enough that they did not have enough time to put the economic house in order, if it was so bad? Come on, that simply does not wash. That is nonsense. That is not logical.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The period for questions and comments has now expired. Resuming debate, with the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Supply

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I would like to start by saying that I am very tempted to respond to the comments made by the hon. member for York South—Weston in his speech.

[English]

I thought we were here this morning to listen to the Liberal Party of Canada and its members in this House telling us how deplorable the employment situation is in Canada, and then they would tell us their solutions and offer us ways to solve the problem.

That member of the Liberal Party spoke for 20 minutes and, I say with all due respect to my learned friend, I listened attentively for 20 minutes. His colleague said the one good constructive idea he heard was that we should sit all weekend and talk about it. This government will not only talk about it, it will keep on acting on solving it.

I have listened to the doom and gloom scenario of the hon. member. I think we have to put our current economic woes in perspective. I know it is of little comfort to Pitou Dumont or Maurice Côté in my own riding who may be looking for better economic opportunities. It is of little comfort to any unemployed Canadian or social welfare recipient to know that economies around the world are in the midst of difficulties, but I think they have to know about it.

Economies around the world are in the midst of transition under the pressures of economic globalization, recession, inflation and political restructuring. A full one-third of the OECD countries are faced with unemployment rates of 10 per cent or more. We are reminded by the OECD that there are, among its member countries, 28 million jobless people.

• (1040)

Yes, our unemployment rate is 10.4 per cent and, yes, we have over one million Canadians out of work, but recovery, although sluggish, is under way both here at home and in the United States. The OECD knows better than the Liberal Party and it predicts that our employment growth rate will be 1.2 per cent in 1992.

What does that 1.2 per cent mean to the Canadians listening to this? It is 150,000 new jobs this year. That is a rate twice as high as the OECD average of 0.6 per cent. Even the United States is expecting only to see unemployment grow by 1 per cent.

Further, our growth in GDP is estimated to be the highest of all the OECD countries in both 1992 and 1993. Our economic situation is difficult, but our international standing as a country is a testament to the sound economic management of this government.

Why is it that for all these other industrialized countries in the world that have these problems Canada, though not to our liking and doing as well as we hoped we would, is to do better than all of these other countries in 1992 and 1993.

To the average, reasonable Canadian, not the partisan yappers and not the people who do not care, the people who are only interested in rising and stirring up the crowd, the kind of speech we heard here a few minutes ago does not even reasonably look at what the problem is.

They talk about their solutions. How can you stand up and ask the taxpayers all across Canada to pay more taxes? How can you ask Canadians from coast to coast to sustain more taxes? That is what they are calling for. If they are not calling for more taxes then they are calling on the government to increase the deficit. They are saying: "Government, go and mortgage further the future of the children, of your children. Do like the Liberals did, borrow and do not worry whether you can pay it back".

The hon. member was talking about my people back home in my riding of Madawaska.

[Translation]

He asked me whom I was trying to fool. I am not trying to fool anyone, but I think the hon. member should have considered the following problem. Out of every tax dollar our farm producers and potato growers send to Ottawa, 36 cents is spent on interest charges. I cannot use those 36 cents to provide certain services. I cannot use them to help people who need help. I have to pay the interest on a debt.

An hon. member: His debt.

Mr. Valcourt: The Liberal Party's legacy to Canadians, and it has the nerve to tell us that we doubled the national debt since 1984. I agree the debt has doubled. But the hon. member did not say, because he does not want Canadians to understand—fortunately Canadians are intelligent people and they do understand—that the debt doubled because of the interest charges compounding on that debt. That is why the debt doubled in eight years. That is what happened, and that is the truth, but it does not seem to interest the hon. member opposite. I wonder why.

[English]

The hon. member was talking about doing nothing. I want Canadians to know, those young Canadians, those men and women throughout Canada, that this government firmly believes that even in times of recession Canada cannot afford to further our already excessively high level of public debt as compared to other G–7 countries.

Rather, we must build upon the structural changes that we as a government have implemented in order to keep up with our competitors. It was nice in the old days when, without regard for the rest of the world, we could do it and go at it alone here. But Canadians know that the wealth of Canada is as a result of being able to trade on world markets, sell our goods and services around the world at competitive prices. We have to ensure that we are competitive in order to be successful.

The Liberals complain about the policies which are making Canadians competitive. I do not want to sound as if unemployment is unimportant but the fact remains, if you look at the picture that 90 per cent of the active labour force is at work in Canada and we have workers and companies doing very well on the world markets. Our companies are competitive as are the vast majority of people in this country.

We have a problem with the high rate of unemployment as do all OECD countries. What can we do about it? In the old Liberal days of throwing money at a problem, hoping it will go away, there would be short-term make-work projects. That is what they are calling for again.

For the unemployed Canadian, the man or woman who is unemployed right now, we could probably have a make-work project and stand them up, give them 10 more weeks and that person may go on unemployment. That was the solution of the Liberal government and it is still the solution of the Liberal Party. This has the result of being no further advanced.

Madam Speaker, you heard the member who spoke before me. He is offended that we have a rate of unemployment of 10.4 per cent in Canada. Is that not terrible? He does not like to refer to prior to 1984, but let us talk about 1984 when we came to office. In 1984 that hon. member and his party went across Canada asking Canadians to re-elect them to office when there was a rate of unemployment of 11.4 per cent or 11.6 per cent. But that was fine; it was the making of the Liberal Party of Canada.

You see we have a corner on everything, so it is all right.

[Translation]

It is all right for them. They can do that, but if you happen to belong to the Progressive Conservative Party, if you truly represent all Canada's regions and on top of that are committed to your principles and are not concerned about being a crowd pleaser but about the well-being of the people of this country, you take measures that may be Draconian but have to be taken all the same.

• (1050)

And that is the right approach.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Valcourt: Madam Speaker, they present a motion before the House. They want it to be debated and they do not even have enough respect for this institution to accept and respect the fact that you have given me the floor. The hon. member keeps interrupting. He won't stop. What is the point? Is this going to do something for the unemployed in this country? I am trying to explain what we want to do to protect our country's competitive position and ensure that Canadians will have a better future. To hear these people talk, you would think all we want to do is make life tough for Canadians. It is not like that at all. When we talk about solutions—

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: I know that heckling is something that is done in this House. The Speaker will not do anything unless the member who has the floor seems to be upset about it. The hon. member for York South—Weston was not interrupted during his presentation. I think he should allow the minister to keep on going.

Does the hon. member have a question?

Mr. Nunziata: I wanted to apologize, Madam Speaker, for breaking the minister's train of thought. I know it is rather easy to do that.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The apology is accepted, I am sure.

Mr. Valcourt: Madam Speaker, I wish that all Canadians could see the spectacle of the rat pack back at it.

I was talking about the requirements to ensure that Canadians can get jobs. One of the factors is to improve the efficiency of the labour market.

The first factor in improving our competitiveness is in improving the efficiency of our labour market through skills upgrading. On the other side of the House the other political parties recommend short-term, make-work solutions, but make-work projects are band-aid solutions.

As I said earlier, it may have been the favourite approach during the seventies to remedy what were cyclical labour market difficulties, but the evidence today to anyone who really cares about the problem and tries to explain why and understand why is overwhelming that in the face of major structural changes to the economy more than band-aid solutions are required to respond to the labour market needs of the 1990s.

The Canadian economy of today has increased skill requirements and the nature and type of work has changed. If we are to be internationally competitive, we must respond appropriately to these changes through training. Make work is not the solution. We have structural problems, not cyclical problems.

Yesterday Speaker, I was meeting with the council of automotive and repair people and one garage owner here in Ottawa was telling me that he had put ads in the paper trying to get a qualified mechanic for his garage here in Ottawa and he could not find anyone qualified.

There is a shortage in Canada of skilled workers. Unemployed people have to tap these opportunities of training and retraining in order to get better qualifications in order to get into the jobs. In the long run training has benefits for both individuals and the country. We should consider that by the year 2000, and that is not far away, almost two-thirds of all new jobs will require at least one year of educational training beyond high school.

Back in the 1970s it was easy to get a job with just a grade 9 education, but that is no longer the reality today. That is not the case any more. Training is also good from a macro-economic perspective, because a highly skilled work force attracts foreign investment in Canada.

Training raises productivity. Workers with higher skills are employed in higher productivity jobs, earning higher wages and making Canada more competitive. For that reason the government's priority has been the development of a skilled work force to accommodate economic and social change. For the unemployed there is no better time to train than during forced periods of unemployment.

When the economy recovers, human capital is improved and workers are prepared to take an active role in the labour force. However, more could be done with available resources to improve labour market efficiency by shifting priorities from passive income assistance and transfer to active measures, and from social treatment of unemployment to a more economic one.

In the OECD study of active versus passive program expenditures, Canada ranked 20th out of 23 member countries with only 24 per cent. Only 24 per cent of Canada's labour market program expenditures was spent on active measures. We began the transition toward more active policies with the labour force development strategy in 1989.

It became evident over the years that passive income generated significant disincentives to seeking employment. It certainly did nothing to develop the skills of the unemployed to make them more employable and more productive members of the labour force.

I see you indicating that I should conclude my remarks, Madam Speaker. The hon. member and his party vehemently opposed in this House and in the Senate the changes to the UI program we introduced two years ago. From 1990 to 1992 we have tripled the $600 million spent to train unemployed Canadians. This has gone up. In 1992 we will be spend $1.8 billion to train unemployed Canadians. I think that speaks louder than the yapping of the hon. member.

[Translation]

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the minister. On February 8, an economist demonstrated, based on unemployment statistics, that Canada would seem to be one of the worse among the OECD nations. I think that only in Spain, Italy and Australia is unemployment worse than here. On the retail sales tax, for instance, we are the worse among the OECD nations, second only to Australia and England I believe. In light of these figures about the OECD nations, can the minister honestly tell us that this government has a sound economic policy?

Mr. Valcourt: Madam Speaker, for the sake of comparing Canada's economic performance to that of the other OECD nations, the hon. member can of course look at some statistics, but I would encourage him to consider the OECD projections as well, to look at them and admit what they say. It is anticipated that out of 23 member nations—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to have to interrupt the minister. I will give him the floor as soon as we resume debate.

It being eleven o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

CANADIAN WINE INDUSTRY

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Madam Speaker, I would like to draw to the attention of the House a series of honours which have been bestowed on Canadian wines.

With a great deal of pride I point out that my constituency, Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold, is in the grape growing area of Ontario.

The president of Inniskillin Wines, Mr. Donald Ziraldo, who is also a former student of mine, has been named to the Royal Order of the Grape. This honour is awarded annually to an individual who has performed outstanding services for Ontario's grape and wine industry.

Bright's Wines took gold and silver medals at the 1991 International Monde Selection competition held recently in Spain.

In all, I know that all members will be very happy to know that Canadian wines took 18 of the 60 awards at The Cellars of the World wine competition.

YOUTH

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, I want to tell the House today about some alarming statistics concerning Canadian youth and about the unique and innovative project being funded by Health and Welfare Canada to address some of these problems.

Nearly 50 per cent of Canadian teens are sexually active by grade 12. Each year 35,000 teenagers become pregnant, and 79 per cent of teen mothers are single. Sexual abuse is also prevalent among youth in Canada today. One in two females and one in three males are exposed to unwanted sexual acts by the age of 18, and 28 per cent of sex offenders were abused at one time in their lives.

There is a great number of programs available to address these situations. I would like to commend Health and Welfare Canada and the cast and crew of the Degrassi High television series for addressing issues such as sex, sexuality and abuse in a realistic upfront youth based manner. These shows are targeted to youth between the ages of 12 and 17.

I encourage all Canadian youth and their parents to watch these programs.

OCEAN RANGER

Mr. A. H. Harry Brightwell (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo): Madam Speaker, I rise before the House in memory of the men and women who died on February 15, 1982 as the result of the sinking of the Ocean Ranger drilling unit during a severe Atlantic storm. We must not forget as well the families and friends of these men and women who have had to endure the memory of this tragedy.

After 10 years, the Government of Canada will close the last chapter of this tragedy when it tables shortly its final response to the recommendations of the royal commission on the Ocean Ranger marine disaster. This response is a result of extensive consultations with national and international oil and gas stakeholders and will ensure a consistent regulatory regime throughout the frontier lands.

In order to enhance the safety of offshore personnel who work in a very perilous area, namely the Atlantic Ocean, the strengthening of Canada's regulatory regime became of utmost importance to the government. Canada's safety requirements are now one of the most stringent in the world and have been of interest to other countries including the Soviet Union and China.

TAXATION

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, I would like to bring to your attention the case of a couple from my riding. Because they are both retired, they are not entitled to child care expense deductions under the Income Tax Act.

I think it would be important that exception provisions be included in this act to avoid penalizing seniors who, for personal reasons, have a young child.

I would appreciate it if the Minister of Revenue would consider including such an exception in the Income Tax Act as soon as possible.

HEART MONTH

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, February is Heart Month. Heart disease and strokes are responsible for more than 40 per cent of deaths in Canada and cost an estimated $17 billion annually.

The Heart and Stroke Foundation has taken a leading role in fighting the causes of heart disease. The foundation has joined other health agencies to campaign against tobacco which kills more than 38,000 Canadians annually and causes more than 30 per cent of heart disease deaths. We have accomplished much in this area, but much remains to be done with regard to cigarette package health warnings, helping smokers to quit and finding alternative crops for tobacco farmers.

Let us mark Heart Month with more progress toward making a smoke-free Canada. Let us mark Heart Month with support for the Heart and Stroke Foundation.

OLYMPIC GAMES

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Madam Speaker, I rise to express sentiments that I am sure all Canadians share with me today, our deepest pride in Canada's athletes competing at the Albertville Olympics, and my most sincere congratulations on their performances over the last few days.

Most of us are aware of the bronze medal won by Isabelle Brasseur and Lloyd Eisler from Boucherville, Quebec, in the figure skating pairs competition. This is not only Canada's first medal at these games, but also the first medal win for Canada in this event since 1964.

I would also like to draw the attention of the House to Canadian athletes who have achieved a best ever performance by a Canadian at the Olympics, Rob Crossan of Barrie, Ontario, who finished 12th in the men's alpine combined and Steve Cyr of Val-Belair, Quebec, who finished 8th in the men's 10-km biathlon.

Another source of great pleasure and admiration to Canadians everywhere is our hockey team which remains undefeated after three games.

I know you will join me in applauding the achievements of our athletes today, as well as wishing all the best to the many others who will be competing at these prestigious games in the next few days.

DOMESTIC WORKERS

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Madam Speaker, I want to condemn, in the strongest terms, recent changes to the foreign domestic program which the immigration minister has called "improvements designed to address the concerns of domestic workers and employers". What garbage. Both domestic workers and employers are opposed to these so-called improvements.

The minister is taking away the right of workers to be assessed as potential landed immigrants before coming to Canada on work permits and the right to apply for such status from within Canada after two years of service as live-in domestic workers.

This will subject workers to the pre-1981 scenario of exploitation by employers, discrimination and the denial of human rights.

Further, educational standards that the minister is now asking for will effectively close the door to women from many poorer countries. This is blatant discrimination.

This policy is another blow to Canadian families. The reality is that the two-parent working family has become the norm. When both parents work, they need help in the home.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, but your time is up.

THE DEFICIT

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, in an effort to pursue their own agenda of high government spending, the Public Service Alliance of Canada and the National Union of Provincial Government Employees have just published a comic book on the national deficit.

But this comic book does not contain any laughs. Instead, it is an attempt to con Canadians into believing that deficits are good and that Ottawa should spend more money, especially on its own employees.

I am amazed at the contradictions this booklet contains. On one page the unions complain about high taxes and on another page they say that there is nothing wrong with deficits.

The union brothers and sisters forget one economic fact. Deficits are deferred taxes. Yesterday's deficits are today's taxes.

Taxes are high today because governments spent more than they earned in previous years. For unions to suggest that we continue doing that will only further enslave Canadians.

I suggest that if anybody wants proof, they should go and talk to Ontario premier and deficit fighter, Bob Rae.

IMMIGRATION AND REFUGEE BOARD

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, on Monday, while an Iranian refugee claimant was telling how he was tortured, the two IRB refugee division commissioners judging his claim were sniggering and passing derisive notes to each other according to The Globe and Mail today.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration and the chairman of the IRB have said such conduct is unacceptable and that these excellent commissioners have flipped. They instructed assistant deputy chair Anna Ker to have these members apologize.

That is not enough. Do not just make scapegoats out of Mr. Snow and Ms. Goldie to hide the real scandal that could drive them to flip.

The commissioners are supposed to be independent decision makers, but a former commissioner has told me that they were being pressured to make more and more negative decisions, sending possible refugees back to persecution. The refusal rate has risen to 36 per cent.

I challenge this government to appoint an independent inquiry into the hidden pressures on commissioners directed by Ms. Anna Ker.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Madam Speaker, the Government of Canada proposes an amendment to the Constitution to entrench a general justiciable right to aboriginal self-government in order to recognize the autonomy of aboriginal peoples over their own affairs within the Canadian federation.

In my riding the Sarnia—Lambton Constituents Assembly Committee was sympathetic to the demands of our native people for the right to govern their own affairs. It is unacceptable that our native people who were the first people to live on this land are subjected at times to social and economic disadvantages.

Now is the time for our aboriginal people to be included in these discussions. The majority of Canadians feel this is the time to close the circle of Confederation and ensure that aboriginal people in Canada can creatively and positively pursue their economic, political, social and cultural objectives within Canada.

This is the Canada round. Canada's first people must not be left out in the cold.

SOMALIA

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, I want to bring to the attention of House the critical situation in Somalia.

According to a report issued last week by the Red Cross, people are starving as no major food distribution has been able to occur since mid-November. A further 250,000 displaced people in and around Mogadishu are estimated to be at risk and the weakest are already dying.

The conflict in Somalia has assumed the proportions of a devastating war and Somalia now lies in ruins. Mogadishu has been shelled and looted. Electricity and telephone lines are cut and armed gangs speed through the streets. Relatives of many Somalian families living in Canada have suffered rape and slaughter.

With food extremely scarce and no work, the population is in despair. As indiscriminate killing has resulted in widespread panic there has been the displacement of thousands of people, even whole towns.

Human suffering should evoke a human response wherever and whenever it occurs. Let us not overlook the intense suffering of our brothers and sisters in the land of Somalia merely because the international news—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

OCEAN RANGER

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, the Hickman Royal Commission was established by the federal and Newfoundland governments in February 1982 in response to the Ocean Ranger disaster. This tragedy occurred on February 15, 1982 off the coast of Newfoundland and resulted in the loss of 84 lives.

The commission was charged with the responsibility to investigate the loss of the Ocean Ranger and all the members of its crew and to examine the safety of offshore drilling operations. Numerous recommendations have been acted upon.

Commissioner Alexander Hickman wrote two reports, one in 1984 and a second one in 1985. A total of 136 recommendations were developed relating to safety, training and government regulation of activity.

It should be noted that the majority of the recommendations have been addressed. The Hickman reports were released and the recommendations were addressed between the years 1985 and 1991.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, Canadians do not need to accept the constitutional tradeoff being proposed in some quarters.

Some say we must support either Quebec's aspirations to be recognized as a distinct society, or the aspirations of aboriginal people to have their own distinctiveness acknowledged. I recognize both.

But aboriginal demands for this recognition are not new. A prominent Quebecer referred to them last summer when he said: "As a Quebecer calling myself different I have some kind of sympathy for those who express their differences. They are really distinct people and we have never said we would never accept the concept itself. Inuit and native people are not special interest groups; they are nations, they are societies, they are different and they will be treated as such".

That prominent Quebecer was the Minister of National Health and Welfare, speaking last August 15 as co-chair of the unity committee of cabinet.

I hope the constitutional conference in Vancouver this weekend will take heed of his other comment at that time: "We should not be afraid of words," he said. "Distinct and self-determination are not things that a country should break up over".

THE PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, this is Valentine's Day, a day of love and friendship. Let us take the opportunity to offer heartfelt congratulations to the Prime Minister for his lovely message to Canadians yesterday.

The boy wonder from Baie Comeau while on tour in southwestern Ontario passionately declared: "If you don't like me, don't vote for me". I love it, Madam Speaker. Such honesty, courage and piercing insight are applauded by the Liberal Party and all Canadians.

However, 84 per cent of us had thought of that already. Only 16 per cent had any intention of voting for him and his party. Now even die-hard Tories have been relieved of this tremendous burden. Thanks to the Prime Minister's remarks, all Canadians will now be able to do the right thing in the next election: defeat the Tories and elect a Liberal government which will have the interest of Canadians at heart.

What a heart-warming thought for Valentine's Day.

OCEAN RANGER

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming): Madam Speaker, tomorrow marks the 10th anniversary of the Ocean Ranger tragedy off the shores of Newfoundland. This day 10 years ago was a sad day for all Canadians, particularly for the people of Newfoundland.

A royal commission was established to inquire into the loss of the Ocean Ranger and to make recommendations to the federal government with respect to both the marine and drilling aspects of offshore drilling operations. To date, over 90 per cent of the recommendations from the Hickman royal commission have been addressed.

After extensive consultations with other federal departments, provincial and territorial governments, offshore petroleum boards, the National Energy Board, and the industry, I am pleased to inform that the government's response to the remaining recommendations is being finalized into legislation and that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources will be introducing it shortly into the House.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. U.S. tariffs imposed on Hondas made in Canada show how amateurishly the free trade agreement was negotiated.

Why did the government sign this agreement before it had even agreed on the definition of North American content for cars made in Canada? Why has the government sat on its hands, as it were, for three years before acting?

[English]

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows that the definition of content has been in place for many decades. It was there while the negotiation was held for the FTA. The auto pact was not part of the FTA. If anything the FTA, by putting in place a dispute settlement mechanism which was not there before, enhances the auto pact, helps protect harassment against our automotive exports, and helps to secure the FTA itself.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Madam Speaker, surely the minister knows that the auto pact dealt with the big three automotive companies and did not deal with new investments like the Japanese companies coming in. That is what the free trade agreement was supposed to protect.

The minister then went on to talk about the dispute settlement mechanism. The time delay, the uncertainty while we wait for a decision from that flawed mechanism, simply means the U.S. can use it to send a signal to divert new investment from Canada to the United States.

I will tell you what is happening here, Madam Speaker. We are being subjected to economic arson by the United States, and this government has supplied the kerosene and the match.

What is the government going to do to erase the tremendous obstacle to new investment that has been caused by the fact that the dispute settlement mechanism itself is being used as a stall to frustrate the creation of new jobs in this country?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, the only credible incendiary activity that I could vouch for is the suggestion by the leader of the Liberal Party that they will rip up the free trade agreement and therefore burn up the whole dispute settlement mechanism, which, as the Prime Minister made clear yesterday, is in fact an insurance policy that we have in place to deal with harassment from American companies.

By the way, my hon. friend imputes the current dispute to the American government. As he knows, these are private sector initiated efforts. We do not agree with those efforts. I am not too sure the American administration does. Therefore we are pursuing our influence in every way we can with the American administration. If that does not work to our satisfaction, we will pursue our rights under chapters 18 and 19 of the free trade agreement.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Madam Speaker, to the best of my knowledge U.S. Customs is part of the U.S. government.

The minister shakes his head. Boy, it shows what these guys know about government. Section 18, by the way, is non-binding. You ought to begin to learn that.

In terms of shredding the agreement, the U.S. is shredding the free trade agreement and this government is letting it happen.

• (1120)

It is doing so because this government talks big and it acts small. The only way to protect Canadian jobs is to tell the U.S. now what we will do if it does not stop harassing us immediately. We are its largest trading partner, and the only way we are going to stop an eventual trade war is if we show firm resolve at this very crucial moment.

We know what the U.S. is doing to us. The issue is: Does this government have the guts to respond? Will this government tell the House today what specific measures of retaliation it is prepared to take against the United States in the case of Honda?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I suppose the hon. member wants to send in the troops as well. The Liberal policy toward trade with the United States when there is any provocation is in fact to retaliate in some sort of absurd way.

What we have in place is a structure which allows us to deal with this in a way that we did not have before the free trade agreement. The hon. member knows that.

Let me just address his allegation that the U.S. Customs Service is part of the U.S. government's tariff and trade stance. It is not. Independent private sector operators ask for audits. Audits are conducted by U.S. Customs. What eventually happens will be decided by negotiation. Also it will be subject, for the first time ever since the free trade agreement, to the dispute settlement mechanism which we now have in place.

The dispute settlement mechanism gives us equality when we have a dispute, something that was never there before the free trade agreement. The hon. member is against the free trade. What would he put in place for settling disputes?

HIBERNIA

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, 10 days ago in the wake of Gulf Canada's announced pull-out from the Hibernia project, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources told the House, and through the House told Canadians, that it was business as usual, that the Hibernia project would proceed on schedule.

This morning, in a devastating blow to Newfoundland and Labrador, the pace of Hibernia development was cut in half and over 600 workers were given their lay-off notices.

What assurances, if any, can the Deputy Prime Minister on behalf of this government give to the remaining 1,000 workers whose livelihood depends on the continuance of the Hibernia oil and gas project?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the decision of Gulf to pull out of the Hibernia consortium was a commercial decision and that triggered a number of events.

It is important to ensure that the project does go forward. Obviously the withdrawal of one member of the consortium does have an impact upon the financial operations and the cash flow. It is encouraging that the consortium is regrouping and restructuring its efforts to see that the project does go ahead. Of course in that regard the Government of Canada will co-operate.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, the people of Newfoundland and Labrador find it frightening that only 10 days ago they were told: "Don't worry, this project is proceeding", and this morning 600 of their fellow Newfoundlanders and Labradorians are without work.

Can the Deputy Prime Minister tell the House, and through the House the people of Newfoundland and Labrador, what specifically the government is doing to assist the remaining members of the consortium to find a new investor or investors to ensure that the Hibernia project does not go the way of so many other projects and jobs in this Canadian economy during a time of recession?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, that is a fair and valid question.

The Government of Canada has been involved from the very outset in the promotion of this project and it is still involved today. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has been in Newfoundland, meeting with the members of the consortium. I think the most encouraging words were those words spoken by the Hibernia executive committee chairman, Norman McIntyre, when he said: "Our planned actions are being taken to ensure every effort is being made to maintain reasonable progress on the development of Hibernia". I think that is key, that is critical. The government is involved in that exercise with the members of the consortium and I can assure the hon. member of that.

ATLANTIC ECONOMY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, it is a very sombre day for Atlantic Canada, not just because of the 650 lay-offs which have been announced in the case of Hibernia but because we just heard word that Fishery Products International is laying off 1,000 workers in Newfoundland.

We have also had word today that 810 workers were having their jobs shifted from Halifax to Ontario by Sears Canada. That is a total loss of almost 2,500 jobs hitting Atlantic Canada in one day. That is not just tragic; that is devastating for this region.

I want to ask a question of the Deputy Prime Minister. In view of this series of catastrophic blows announced today, what assurances can the Deputy Prime Minister give to Atlantic Canadians that there is going to be action by this government to replace these jobs and give opportunities to Atlantic Canada to be part of future growth in this country?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as I indicated in response to an earlier question, the Government of Canada is very much involved and has been involved in the promotion of the Hibernia project. We are there today, as we have been in the past in the original development of this very important initiative.

I am sure the hon. member will be aware that the Government of Canada awarded to the Saint John Shipbuilding organization one of the largest defence contracts ever undertaken, ever issued in Canadian history. That work is taking place in Saint John, New Brunswick.

The hon. member will also be aware that Halifax-Dartmouth Industries received the contract for the building and development of the mine sweepers. He will also know that we are actively engaged in promotion of the Prince Edward Island fixed link, which would be a very important capital project. I am sure he is also aware of my recent announcement wherein we undertook to increase equalization payments to the have not provinces, and the Atlantic provinces particularly have been the major beneficiary of that action.

While I agree that there are some unfortunate developments, I think it is fair to say, in fairness, that the Government of Canada is responding.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

The minister has listed a series of past actions by this government. What I am talking about today is 2,500 jobs that have been lost in Atlantic Canada in one day.

I say to the Minister of Finance that it is not good enough to get up and recite the past to try to respond to this devastation of today.

What is the Deputy Prime Minister prepared to do to respond to the loss in one day of 650 jobs in the Hibernia case, 1,000 lay-offs from Fisheries Products International, and the loss of 810 jobs shifted to Ontario? What is he prepared to do today to give assurances to Atlantic Canada that there is going to be—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the question has been put.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, with regard to the problems in the fisheries, I am sure the hon. member is aware that the total allowable catch has been adjusted downward because of the lack of cod stocks.

My understanding is that still remains a very serious problem and it is deteriorating day by day. We have an Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program in place of something close to $600 million that provides for transition and assistance for those particular workers. The hon. member suggests that we have lost x number of jobs in one day. I remember when the government was promoting the Hibernia project. One of the reasons we had difficulty getting that bill through was because the New Democratic Party was opposed to it. Now he stands up and talks about how good it was. Where were you then when we needed you?

• (1130)

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Essex—Windsor has been presenting very long questions. It would be appreciated if we could have shorter questions and then we could have shorter answers.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): I would simply say that this is an extremely serious situation. It is not something for partisan point scoring. I say to the Minister of Finance that when 2,500 jobs are lost in a single day—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member have a question, please?

Mr. Langdon: When 2,500 jobs are lost in a day, it is something that requires immediate government assurances.

I ask this government and I ask this Minister of Finance: What is he prepared to do for Atlantic Canada to give the people some hope in the face of this devastating news? What is he prepared to do now?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as my hon. friends across the way in the Liberal Party reminded me, the New Democratic Party opposed the Hibernia project. I thank them for reminding me of that because we hear now a lot of wailing and gnashing of teeth, and tears falling from the eyes of the New Democratic Party. But I do not underestimate the seriousness of it.

My colleague, the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds, has just handed me a document from Statistics Canada which reveals that the food and beverage industry for the Atlantic region has increased its employment base by 5 per cent or 1,900 workers in the last few months.

That is the kind of encouragement, that is the kind of adjustment that needs to take place. It is reflective of the globalization and the fact that we have to change from a resource based society to a more processing, knowledge based and technology based society. The government has in place a number of programs that, indeed, encourages that.

He asks me what I am going to do today. We are continuing to work at promoting the Prince Edward Island fixed link. We hope that it will become a reality and will provide needed access to the province of Prince Edward Island, plus jobs.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Madam Speaker, it is not all bad; the NDP have found Atlantic Canada.

More seriously, the Hibernia bombshell today—and it has to be categorized as such—plus the lay-off at Fishery Products International, those 1,000 people in Catalina, together constitute a very big kick in the guts on what is now a very bleak Valentine's Day for those people.

I want to go to the fisheries issue and ask the Deputy Prime Minister: Does he not recognize the increasing importance of preserving the traditional jobs now that some of the more high-tech jobs are slipping through our fingers, it would seem?

In that context, could he tell us what the government has done fairly recently, because he knows his own minister of fisheries has said that traipsing around Europe trying to convince that crowd to stop overfishing is a wasted effort.

What, in particular, is the government going to do to address the problem that he himself identified a moment ago to reduce quotas, caused directly and principally by foreign overfishing?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I want to tell the hon. member that I discussed this issue with the minister of fisheries by telephone yesterday. He was in Newfoundland and reminded me of the urgency and the gravity of the situation and the need to step up our campaign with respect to foreign fishing outside the 200-mile limit. That still is a very serious problem and he has an action plan to deal with that more effectively.

The Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program is a program that is administered both by my colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. There are programs in place to ensure that adjustment and that transition can be looked after. We certainly will be examining that program to ensure that it is sufficient to deal with the problem at hand. I can assure the hon. member we recognize the seriousness of it and we will be dealing with it in a specific way as soon as the hon. member returns from Newfoundland.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Madam Speaker, I thank the Deputy Prime Minister. He is obviously focusing on this issue but there is another possibility. What if all the talk does not work with the Europeans, as it has not thus far?

Is he, or is the government, then prepared to go the next step and do what follows quite naturally from the 1977 Law of the Sea agreement? Is the government prepared, after due notice and after a fairly reasonable deadline, to extend the continental shelf to embrace the nose and tail of the Grand Bank and the Flemish Cap and by extension to protect those fish stocks and put them within Canadian control rather than the hands of a toothless wonder called NAPO?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member poses a hypothetical situation and I think it would be inappropriate for me to speculate except I can assure the hon. member that we recognize the seriousness of the problem.

We have in place the framework of programs that can be utilized. We will ensure that there are adequate resources provided to ensure that assistance is provided to the fishermen.

In terms of the broader question, the hon. minister of fisheries has some new approaches and ideas with respect to this and I would like to discuss those with him and other cabinet colleagues before speculating on the what-ifs that the hon. members has raised. Obviously he considers it to be a very serious problem. I can assure him that we do too and we will be doing our level best to deal with it.

INTEREST RATES

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Madam Speaker, this government keeps saying that the cure to our recessionary woes is a lower interest rate. Yet for the third week in a row the government has allowed the Bank of Canada rate to go up.

I ask the Minister of Finance, if this government is so interested in getting the economy moving again, why is this government allowing the cancellation of its own remedy?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as I indicated in the House yesterday, we have experienced a fair amount of volatility in the exchange markets over the last three weeks and what we are seeing are the market forces at work.

I think the hon. member realizes that these kinds of ups and downs have occurred in the past and will probably occur in the future. The fact of the matter is the trend line on lower interest rates has been real. The easing of monetary conditions, both at the interest rate level and the exchange rate level, has been real and that has, as I noted in the newspaper today, made home ownership at one of the lowest levels it has been for quite some time. All of these things, particularly those sectors that are interest rate sensitive, have been helped a great deal.

I can assure the hon. member that this is the market forces at play and it is the market that is causing this to occur.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Madam Speaker, is this minister imagining that the recession is over? Could he also be imagining that Canadians are all back at work after everything we have heard this morning?

Can the minister today tell Canadians that this three-week increase in the Bank of Canada rate is just an adjustment and not a long-term trend?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, there are no quick or magic fixes. The hon. member knows that.

There is no Minister of Finance who can—

Mr. Nunziata: You are going to allow interest rates to go up.

Mr. Mazankowski: The hon. member says I am going to let interest rates go up. The fact of the matter is that interest rates have come down by 7.5 percentage points since the high of 1990.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, more than 461,000 jobs in the manufacturing sector have disappeared.

I want to ask the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism about the 461,000 jobs that have disappeared. It is a 23 per cent drop compared to only a 6 per cent drop in the United States. It is the worst drop in manufacturing jobs in Canada since the depression of 1929-1930, the late lamented history. Does the minister not agree that this is low-level politics on the Honda issue along with these statistics by the United States administration?

• (1140)

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I have to agree with him. I think it is low-level politics and the Prime Minister of Canada made that clear in his interview yesterday.

The Americans are caught in a protectionist fever as a result of manufacturing job losses in the United States and they are lashing out, primarily against the Japanese, and we are being side-swiped.

Thank heavens we have processes to deal with this. We have a process in place that was not there before the free trade agreement which is the dispute settlement mechanism. Before that has to be invoked, and perhaps it will have to be invoked very soon, we are pursuing aggressively all of our avenues.

I want to speak about the hon. member's statistics. He mentioned 461,000 manufacturing jobs. The NDP does this all the time. It keeps mentioning that number. It is not accurate. There is a lot of double counting involved in it. Manufacturing job loss in Canada has been substantial and it has been real. It has been very similar in proportion to job loss in the United States.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, I want to confirm that the figures I used are from StatsCanada, January 1992 and also the U.S. department of labour. They are government agencies.

The minister seems to be confused about government agencies and the U.S. Customs. In an earlier reply to a member in this House, He said that the assault on Honda was not politics and had to be reminded that it was his own Prime Minister who said that it was low-level politics. The minister cannot have it both ways. He cannot deny that there are low-level politics in the United States.

Now that the minister has admitted there are low-level politics, when are we going to get some high-level politics, some leadership from this government and cancel the Canada-U.S. FTA and get out of talks with Mexico? If that is not a request, then what is he doing about the low-level politics?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is not shedding any light at all on this issue by taking the word politics and interchanging what it means. What he is alleging is that the American administration is pressing the U.S. Customs department to pursue these audits. In fact this is not happening; it is congressmen, independent of the administration, plus industrial groups doing it.

However, we look to the administration of the United States to correct this, to see the lack of wisdom in such actions. If it does not we will revert with confidence to the dispute settlement mechanism.

HOUSING

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for housing.

A 1990 evaluation conducted by the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation has shown co-op housing to be highly successful in creating healthy mixed income communities.

Since the index linked mortgage introduced in Canada by the co-op housing sector has substantially reduced the cost to the government of producing non-profit co-op housing, would the minister please tell the House the status of this program?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, the minister responsible for CMHC is away from the House on government business today.

I can quote from a press release of the minister's of December 17, 1991, when he said program funding for 1992 is $6.1 million and is based on last year's level adjusted for inflation.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of State for Agriculture. Since this House passed a resolution concerning GATT on Wednesday, February 12 and our party's amendment requires the Prime Minister to meet personally with the President of the United States and the President of the European Economic Community, at what point in the GATT negotiations will the Prime Minister hold these meetings in order to demand that article XI of GATT be strengthened?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Madam Speaker, as the Prime Minister said yesterday, I believe, he personally invited the agricultural leaders to meet with him next Tuesday, in a few days—the agenda still has to be finalized—as the Prime Minister has done many, many times before. Indeed, the Prime Minister has met Canadian farm leaders dozens of times since 1984 when we took power, and he will meet them again. I will remind my hon. colleague that he was not there then, but the previous Prime Minister, in the previous government never found the time in 16 years to meet the farm leaders. This shows the Prime Minister's interest and he has always respected farm leaders. I think that the Canadian people have shown their trust in us before.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Madam Speaker, you noticed that my question was very clear. This House passed a very clear resolution. Canadian farmers and members of this House would just like to know when the Prime Minister will personally meet the President of the United States and the President of the European Economic Community on this issue of article XI, which is extremely important for agriculture in Canada.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister will meet the farm leaders on Tuesday. Obviously we will discuss strategy at that meeting. As the Prime Minister said yesterday, there is a clear intention to meet with the countries that support us throughout the world, in Europe and elsewhere. Neither the Prime Minister nor we have ruled out any possible meeting with the leaders in the United States or Europe. I think that the Prime Minister will have an opportunity to discuss this strategy with the farm leaders, and when the time comes next Tuesday we will know more on this side. I think it is normal and shows respect for the farm leaders who will be here on Tuesday that we can discuss this strategy with them and do what is best to defend the producers' interests.

BOOK PUBLISHING INDUSTRY

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, before the free trade agreement, this government undertook to Canadianize our book publishing industry. Since free trade, there has not been any will and no concrete action to enforce this policy made by Canadians and for Canadians.

Is the government going to permit the foreign takeover of Canadian publishing subsidiaries like Harper-Collins, Collier-Macmillan and Grolier which are presently before Investment Canada? Is it going to sell off $150 million of our book publishing industry to foreigners?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, what the government is doing is announcing and enforcing a policy designed to help us Canadianize the book publishing industry in Canada.

That is why the Canadian book publishing industry is so enthusiastic about the new policy. Our determination is to ensure that more Canadian titles are published, that more Canadian authors have the opportunity to have their books sold and that more Canadians read more Canadian books.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, it is an excellent objective. It is too bad it cannot be reached by the kind of policy put forth by this government.

Now that the Minister of Communications has effectively lost control of the Canadian book publishing industry, when will this minister act to ensure that in accepting the foreign takeovers his government will, at the minimum, require the distribution of foreign titles through Canadian controlled book publishers?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is essentially elaborating on a column that was written by a left wing anti-American writer of fiction in today's newspaper. It is indeed an example of fiction.

Mrs. Finestone: Why don't you read The Globe and Mail?

Mr. Beatty: That is where I saw it.

The conspiracy theory which is being propounded here is that there is a grand conspiracy between Canada and the United States that in anticipation of the possibility—

Mrs. Finestone: There is.

Mr. Beatty: —in anticipation of the Americans being critical as part of the free trade negotiations that Canada, in advance, decided to hand the whole of the Canadian book publishing industry to the Americans.

The only problem with this particular conspiracy theory is that the very first people we heard from after the new policy was announced was the Americans complaining. If there is a conspiracy with the Americans, it must be such a secret conspiracy that even the Americans could not be allowed into it.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. As he knows, the cross-border shopping phenomenon is a multi-faceted problem. He should also know that the retailers and consumers in my area want to thank him for the recent initiatives he has announced. It is helping to level out the playing field, but we need a little more levelling because there are some other problems.

Today I would like to ask the minister whether he is supportive of the recently requested increased number of Customs officers required for the Blue Water Bridge so that they can do proper inspections and collect the appropriate duties and taxes at the border.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, the hon. member will know that in the last fiscal year we have increased personnel at Blue Water by some 10 person-years. We are in the process of negotiating an agreement which will increase the number of toll booths at Blue Water. Obviously, if we are going to increase toll booths, we are going to increase personnel to man those toll booths.

Let me point out to hon. members that it is my belief and my hope that as a result of the announcements made earlier and the initiatives announced earlier this week the reduction of cross-border shopping will continue to escalate as we move into 1992. Hopefully the provinces will move toward harmonization, and specifically the province of Ontario toward Sunday shopping which would help the situation even further.

COASTAL PATROL VESSELS

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is for whoever is answering on behalf of the Minister of National Defence or the Associate Minister of National Defence. In answering an earlier question, the Minister of Finance listed the coastal patrol vessel project as one of the government's accomplishments for Atlantic Canada. Yet, precisely because of the actions of this government, this project is now in jeopardy.

After announcing the contract, the government has now proposed a condition of a $100 million guarantee performance bond. That is higher than it has asked in any other similar project. Will the government assure this House that this belated move is not just a ploy to permit the government to get out of this project and blame the contractor and the provincial government for its demise.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that it is no ploy and it is not belated. In fact, standard procedure was part of it in the first instance and there has been nothing untoward, nothing out of the ordinary. It is common practice when committing to spend hundreds of millions of dollars of the taxpayers money that we have some assurance that the taxpayer gets value for it. That is all that is involved.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, in the case of the frigate program the requirement of Saint John Shipyard was a $60 million loan guarantee for a $6 billion project.

In Nova Scotia, the requirement of a $100 million performance guarantee was asked after the fact on a $450 million project, $250 million of which is for Halifax. The provincial government has now said that it is too high. I would assume this government talks to its provincial counterparts before it makes this kind of deal. Is the government simply incompetent or negligent? What is going on in this project? Will the government assure the House that this project is going ahead?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I guess the answer is none of the above. One thing this government is, in distinction to the members of the New Democratic Party, concerned about the taxpayers getting value for their money.

REFUGEES

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration concerning Peter Zujewsky, Marzena Tomala and their seven-month old Canadian born daughter, Agatha. This family faces a deportation hearing next week if they do not leave Canada this weekend, even though they have been models of good citizenship, working three jobs, putting down roots and learning both official languages on their own.

Will the minister personally intervene today and grant a minister's permit to allow this couple to stay in Canada with their Canadian born daughter?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I have had the chance to speak personally with the hon. member about this case. I indicated to her that I have reviewed this case personally and I am satisfied that our refugee determination process has been fair.

Again, we cannot and we should not forget that the primary role of the refugee determination process is to protect genuine refugees and not a fast track immigration process.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

Clearly a four-year delay has changed substantially the situation. I have here the minutes of the review board hearing the minister just referred to. The board took the highly unusual step in this case of requesting the minister to give full compassionate and humanitarian consideration to this couple and even gave the minister helpful comments on their character and commitment to Canada.

In light of this, I ask again: Will he please give his personal consideration to these favourable comments, use the discretion he clearly has and allow this couple and their daughter to stay?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, as I indicated yesterday to the hon. member, in order to protect the integrity of the refugee determination process, this cannot be a fast-track immigration process.

I have indicated to the hon. member that this family can apply for immigration from outside Canada like everyone else and will be given consideration.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, my question is for the same minister. It pertains to the unemployed in this country.

Canada Employment had a casual employment placement office in my riding where 30 to 40 people would line up every morning to at least get a casual, short-time job. With no notice, with unemployment at record levels in Toronto, with the permanent Canada Employment office telling these people they have no jobs for them, this government closed the office at 341 Keele Street.

I ask the minister: Where are these people supposed to go to find work? Where are they supposed to go when the casual placement offices are being closed by this government?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, my department has something like 1,200 points of delivery in Canada. I regret, but I am not aware of the details of the specific case he mentions. Had he given me notice I could have looked into it, which I will do, and get back to him.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, I will do the homework for the minister. I called Canada Employment yesterday and I was told that there had been acts of vandalism against the building and violence against the staff. These obvious acts of frustration as a result of the unemployment situation are just the tip of the iceberg.

When will this minister implement the Liberal five-point plan for economic recovery and solve the unemployment problem by getting Canadians back to constructive, productive and full-time jobs?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I did not see anything of full-time production in the suggestion of the Liberals to throw money at the employment problem.

The government has indicated that it is interested in having the fundamentals of the economy right and relying on the private sector to create long-term, permanent jobs which Canadians need.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. Where is all the GST money going?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, it is not in my pockets, I will tell you that.

I think the hon. member knows that this government has set up a debt servicing and reduction fund. The legislation has gone through second reading and is before the appropriate parliamentary committee. All of the GST funds, to the last penny, are going to go into that debt servicing and reduction fund. It will be audited independently by the Auditor General to allow Canadians to see for themselves exactly where the money is going.

• (1200)

May I add for the benefit of the hon. members that there is no windfall. In fact, we estimate the number of dollars will be exactly as projected in last year's budget.

IMMIGRATION AND REFUGEE BOARD

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration who has condemned the behaviour of the two refugee board members who joked about the testimony of an Iranian describing the torture he had endured.

The minister surely knows that there have been other cases of unacceptable behaviour by commissioners and that commissioners, former commissioners and former adjudicators, have complained of undue pressure on them to reject more and more refugee claims, although they are supposed to be independent decision makers.

As a result, in the period of about a year the rate of rejection has gone up to 36 per cent. Therefore, I ask the minister whether he will appoint an independent inquiry to investigate these pressures, especially within the jurisdiction of assistant deputy chair Anna Ker.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I share the member's concern about the conduct of the two IRB members who are alleged to have exhibited the kind of conduct that Randolph Gass complained of yesterday, if it is true.

Yesterday I spoke with the chairman of the Immigration and Refugee Board, Mr. Fairweather, and I expressed my serious concern. As of this morning, I am informed that Mr. Fairweather has removed those two members from the hearing schedule as he continues to investigate this matter.

If the hon. member says that he has knowledge of people putting pressure on IRB members to reject cases of genuine refugees, he should bring that information immediately to the attention of the chairman.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Harvie Andre (for the Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-57, an Act to amend the Canada Pension Plan.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I took for granted that there had been some discussion around the House about this matter.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, there have been discussions. What I am proposing now is to introduce for the consideration of members the bill respecting amendments to the Canada Pension Plan allowing the disabled, who have been unable to get the disability pensions to which they are entitled, to receive those pensions.

This bill was passed unanimously by this House but without a royal recommendation and as a result it was turned back by the other place. Therefore, it is simply a replacement of the bill the House has already passed unanimously. I am asking today for unanimous consent to waive the normal 48 hours of notice so that members could have the bill over the weekend. Perhaps we could deal with it on Monday.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, the government House leader is correct. There have been discussions among the party House leaders on this particular subject matter. On behalf of my colleague from Winnipeg North we wish to give unanimous consent for the minister to introduce this particular bill.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, on behalf of my colleague from Kamloops, our House leader, we would like to see this brought forward and passed as soon as possible. Therefore we agree with that consent.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Madam Speaker, as usual and it is a nasty habit, our party, the Bloc Quebecois, was not consulted. However, since we definitely want this motion to get through and this bill to be passed as soon as possible, we will give our consent.

> That, for the purposes of this special debate, the question before the House shall be "That this House do now adjourn";
> That no member be permitted to speak more than once under the provisions of this order and for a period not to exceed ten minutes; that members be permitted to table any document which supports their verbal presentation; and that all such presentations and documents be deemed referred to the Standing Joint Committee on the Government of Canada's Proposals for a Renewed Canada;

> That, under the provisions of this order, when no member rises to speak, at no later than 10 p.m., the Speaker shall adjourn the House until the next sitting day.

• (1210)

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, this is very similar to previous motions that we have passed. I wish to give my consent.

However, in so doing, I want to indicate to the parliamentary secretary that when reference is made to allowing members, that means allowing all members of Parliament regardless of their party or particular affiliation, including Independent members of this House, to participate as they have in the last several nights on which we were debating this particular motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Madam Speaker, I have to say that although we were not consulted, as usual, we did follow the debate. We took part in it and found it interesting. In fact we are hearing interesting things from our colleagues in this House and we are certainly going to give our consent to hear some more.

That the said special committee have all powers of a standing committee of the House of Commons pursuant to Standing Orders 108(1), 120 and 121.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

ARTICLE XI OF GATT

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour and privilege to table petitions signed by 250 citizens from the electoral district of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and other places. As could be expected, the petitioners call on this House to urge government to protect and improve article XI of the GATT. These 250 names are in addition to the 2,500 I have tabled in the House over the past few days, for a grand total of 2,750 names.

[English]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present four petitions on different subjects.

The first is a petition from a number of constituents from Victoria who ask that the goods and services tax on feminine sanitary products be removed.

PENSIONS

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): The next is a petition circulated by the Public Service Alliance of Canada.

This petition calls on the government, and Parliament in particular, to maintain full inflation protection for federal public employees as a demonstration of Parliament's commitment to fully indexed pensions for all Canadians.

This is signed by many residents of the Victoria area.

UKRAINE

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): The third petition is a little late. However, with respect for the constituents of mine and people from across Canada who signed it, I wish to present it in any event. It deals with recognition of the independence of Ukraine, which the government has now given.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is entering into debate. He should make a very succinct explanation of what the petition is about. The hon. member might sit down when the Speaker rises, please. It would be appreciated.

If there is another petition to be introduced, I am sure it will be presented very succinctly.

Mr. Brewin: Madam Speaker, I am by training a lawyer and it is difficult for those of us in that profession to be as succinct as you would like. However, I will try to improve in response to your request.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): The next and final petition I would like to present is signed by many hundreds of residents of the Victoria area and calls on the government to conduct a full public federal environmental assessment review respecting the continuing use of Esquimalt Harbour and Ogden Point in Victoria for the berthing of nuclear powered and nuclear armed ships.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I am presenting a petition today on behalf of a number of residents from the Toronto area. These individuals are very concerned about the application still before the CRTC regarding introduction of competition in the long distance telecommunications market.

The undersigned petitioners are urging the Minister of Communications to oppose Unitel's bid to compete with Canada's telephone companies in long distance service and are urging the minister to consult with all affected parties, specifically those—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The petition is sent to the Government of Canada. It is not sent to a minister. It would not be acceptable.

JUSTICE

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I present 75 signatures on a petition signed since the murder of Nina de Villiers on August 9, 1991, which has exposed serious deficiencies in the criminal justice system. They request this Parliament to recognize that crimes of violence against a person are serious and abhorrent and they are looking for some serious direction from this Parliament.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 126 and 187.

[Text]

Question No. 126—Mr. Duhamel:

For the fiscal years 1990–91 and 1991–92, has the government paid cash bonuses to (a) chief executive officers (b) senior civil servants (c) others and, if so, what were the (i) names (ii) positions (iii) amounts paid?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): The Privacy Act prohibits the release of personal information such as the names of public servants who received cash bonuses and the amounts paid to them.

The attached table provides information on the amounts awarded as performance bonuses to members of the management category levels for the fiscal year 1990–91. This report includes only employees from those departments and agencies for which the Treasury Board is the employer (Public Service Staff Relations Act, schedule 1, part 1). The data is based upon the information received from departments to date and represents approximately 82 per cent of the total management category population.

There will be no performance bonuses paid for performance rendered during the current 1991–92 fiscal year.

The Privy Council Office reports that no performance bonuses have yet been paid to heads of Crown corporations and Governor in Council appointees for performance during the fiscal year 1990–91. Similar to the management category, no performance bonuses will be paid for performance rendered during the current 1991–92 fiscal year.

EX–3	1,392,541	293
EX–5	431,554	60
TOTAL	$ 11,683,028	3086

Note: The data is based upon the information received from departments to date and represents approximately 82 per cent of the total figures for the management category.

Question No. 187—Mr. Karpoff:

1. With respect to measures being taken by the government to interdict cigarette smuggling (a) how many person-years are available to police the border against illegal smuggling (b) how many border crossing points between Canada and the continental United States are (i) manned by Canada Customs (ii) unmanned (c) what is the estimated value in the most recently compiled fiscal period of (i) illegally shipped tobacco products seized at border points (ii) illegally shipped tobacco products which enter Canada?

2. Is the government actively considering imposing an export tax on Canadian cigarettes shipped to the United States and, if not, for what reasons?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am informed by the Solicitor General of Canada and the Department of Finance as follows:

The answer by the Solicitor General of Canada based on information maintained by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, much of which was provided by Revenue Canada, Customs, is:

1. (a) The RCMP currently has 168 person-years dedicated to investigate Customs and Excise offenses within the country. In addition, all border detachments dedicate manpower to police the border in their areas and provide assistance to Revenue Canada, Customs as required.

(b) The number of border crossing points between Canada and the continental United States depends upon the definition of border crossing points. There are many roads, lakes, rivers and fields that span the border and offer access to illegal smuggling operations.

(i) According to information provided by Revenue Canada, Customs, they operate 118 ports of entry, of which 66 are manned less than 24 hours per day.

(ii) Information from Revenue Canada, Customs indicates that 313 border crossings are unmanned. These consist of actual roadways crossings the border.

(c) (i) As reported to the RCMP, Revnue Canada, Customs seized illegally smuggled tobacco at border points of value of $1,324,127.00 for the period 1 January, 1991 to 11 December, 1991.

(ii) The Departments of Finance, Revenue Canada, Customs and Excise and the RCMP agree that an estimated 10 to 15 million cartons of the projected 18 million cartons of Canadian cigarettes exported annually to the United States return illegally to Canada.

2. The government is aware of representations by certain groups that an export tax be imposed on cigarettes as a means of discouraging smuggling of these products. This is one of a range of possible approaches to address this problem.

The government is currently addressing this issue through several mechanisms. In 1989, a number of measures designed to deter the smuggling of tobacco products were introduced. These measures included improving the legislative provisions relating to the marking of tobacco packages to more clearly identify duty and tax paid products for exports. The penalties imposed under the Excise Act for selling tobacco products on which excise duty and tax have not been paid were also increased substantially at that time. More recently the Minister of National Revenue has been working with respective police authorities in an effort to develop better strategies to counter the problem of cigarette smuggling.

Finally, the government has initiated a review of the legislation which imposes excise duties and taxes on tobacco products. One of the key aspects of this review will be to examine whether there are further steps that could be taken to reduce cigarette smuggling.

STARRED QUESTIONS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Starred Question No. 166.

I ask that it be printed in Hansard as if read.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Governement in the House of Commons): I am informed by the Department of Justice and the Ministry of the Solicitor General of Canada as follows:

The Department of Justice was not involved in the John Munro trial since it involved the provincial responsibilities on administration of justice. All questions concerning the costs of the trial would have to be directed to the provincial authorities in Ontario.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Berger: Point of order, Madam Speaker. I would like to draw a question to the attention of the parliamentary secretary.

I received a reply recently to three questions, Nos. 148, 149 and 150, put on October 31. The difficulty is that I received the same answer to two different questions. There were two different questions and I received, in essence, the same answers to these two different questions.

I am wondering if I received the replies that were intended. Did the person replying to the question perhaps misunderstand the questions? Was it a clerical error?

I wonder if the parliamentary secretary could check into this and let me know.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, my notes indicate that the hon. member has not yet received an answer. Obviously there is some confusion here. What I will do is try to check out what his concerns are to see if we can get it corrected for him.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, I would like to formally designate this coming Monday as an allotted day for supply.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—UNEMPLOYMENT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Nunziata (p. 7033).

Madam Deputy Speaker: When we started on members' declarations the hon. minister had the floor. He was answering a question. There are nine minutes left in the question and comment period.

[Translation]

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, you may recall that the hon. member's question was based on certain statistics. He wanted to compare Canada's performance with that of other OECD members.

• (1220)

The hon. member was right when he said that some OECD countries had unemployment rates that were either higher or lower than Canada's, but the important thing is that, according to this organization, in 1992 the employment growth rate in Canada is expected to be 1.2 per cent which, as I said earlier, means 150,000 new jobs this year. And I think we should emphasize, that this is twice as high as the average rate for OECD countries, which happens to be around 0.6 per cent. Even in the United States employment growth is not expected to exceed 1 per cent. Furthermore, in 1992 and 1993 Canada is expected to outrank all other OECD countries on increases in the GNP. I realize this is cold comfort for someone who is unemployed in this country, but we must put the Canadian situation into its international perspective. Although we admit our economic situation is a difficult one, our position on the international scene reflects the sound economic management of the government I represent.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the minister.

During the latter part of his remarks he put a tremendous emphasis on the government's program, the government's plan for retraining in this country. Quite frankly I agree with the latter part of his remarks and with everything he said in terms of the government's approach to retraining.

My problem is that as he was speaking one of the largest community centres in my riding, the Woodgreen community centre, sent me a fax.

I should say this community centre has been serving the community of downtown Toronto for many years. It has always managed its finances well, operating without a deficit. It has served the community. Over many years it has helped thousands of people in the community and it has a reputation for doing a very good job. Your own officials have recognized the centre publicly as being one of the better social support services in the city of Toronto.

I have been informed that your officials have met with officials at the centre and that all areas relating to retraining that are a part of the Woodgreen community centre are being cut back by 10 per cent. I am not saying that the budget is frozen at zero per cent; I am saying that they have been informed by your officials that the retraining budgets are being cut back.

My question to the minister is: Is this some kind of a mistake in the department? He stands up here today and puts all this emphasis on retraining and programs. Yet the actions in the marketplace seem to be different. I wonder if he could clarify that and give me some reassurance that his officials are not following his directives.

Mr. Valcourt: Madam Speaker, the hon. member raises an important question. This is the issue of what happens to some of the those initiatives that took place when the resources devoted to that kind of activity were more plentiful.

It is just impossible. I do not think there is any contradiction in saying that we have increased the amount of dollars that are going to go to training and retraining because of the Bill C-21 amendment to the UI Act.

We also have to live within the fiscal framework that this government has put in place. We cannot reduce the deficit by taking more dollars from the pockets of taxpayers in the form of taxes nor by increasing the borrowing of money to operate as a government.

There is no way that you can do that without having cutbacks. I am not talking here about cutbacks in training. I am talking about the department adjusting the resources it has to the activities that are more productive.

In the case that the hon. member mentioned, I am not aware of it, but I surely want to look at it. We have to let our fellow Canadians know that it is just impossible. There is no magic solution. You cannot reduce the deficit and keep on spending more.

I agree that there is a way to spend smarter, to spend more efficiently and this is what we are trying to do.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There were almost three minutes gone and I said nine. There were almost three minutes before Question Period, so we have gone through our normal 10 minutes of question and comments.

Mr. Mills: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. We are lucky to have the Minister of Employment and Immigration here today.

We do not know what his schedule is, if he plans on being around or not. We understand he has a busy schedule. Do you think that we can get unanimous consent of the House to allow time for the other questions that people may want to ask of the minister while he is here?

Madam Deputy Speaker: We may have the unanimous consent on one side, but it also depends on whether the hon. minister can or is able to stay, whether his schedule does allow him to spend a little more time in the House.

I do have to have unanimous consent. That depends on this side as well.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate.

Mr. Nunziata: Let the record show that the minister is a coward.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member for York South—Weston will want to withdraw that comment.

Mr. Nunziata: Yes, I do, but I find it rather strange, Madam Speaker, that the minister is not prepared to stay in the House and debate the issue of unemployment.

After all, he is the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Surely, given the devastating effect of unemployment on millions of Canadians—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. A withdrawal must be a withdrawal. I think the hon. member has been in this House long enough. He should know that a minister has many different things to do. If he cannot stay in the House after having been here since ten o'clock this morning, I think the hon. member could allow this to be, without making some comments that really are unacceptable.

I would like the hon. member to please just withdraw.

Mr. Nunziata: I will do that in deference to the Chair, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. member. We will resume debate.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, it is an unfortunate day for many people in this country.

It is particularly unfortunate for those in Atlantic Canada. We have seen today news of three major economic blows to Atlantic Canada.

• (1230)

We have seen first that the Hibernia project in Newfoundland, which was a project that certainly many people in Newfoundland thought was going to generate significant employment for themselves for the future, is frankly teetering on the very edge of collapse. There has been an announcement that lay-offs of 650 workers in Newfoundland, plus another 50 workers in Montreal will take place. That is out of a total work force of about 1,100. We are talking about a massive proportion of the work force seeing their jobs disappear.

We have also seen that 1,100 people are being affected at Fisheries Products International. The lay-offs which have been announced there are supposedly temporary, for three months. There have been temporary lay-offs announced previously by FPI which have extended well beyond the original period that was set out.

In addition to that, we see that 810 jobs are being transferred by Sears Canada from Halifax to Ontario. You might think that as an Ontario member I would feel pleased about that transfer of 810 jobs to Ontario.

But I have to say I am a member of Parliament who believes in national unity in this country and in fairness to the economic development opportunities of our country. To see a transfer from a place like Atlantic Canada where there are very serious economic problems and where levels of unemployment are far higher than in the province of Ontario, to the province of Ontario does not make economic sense. It does not make social sense. It does not make sense in terms of building unity in Canada.

We have a very serious problem in Atlantic Canada which has come out today. We have a very serious problem in other parts of the economy. Today as well, MacMillan Bloedel in British Columbia announced 400 lay-offs in that province.

We see reports today in the press which indicate that the level of welfare recipients in the city of Montreal has reached a level where one person in seven in the city of Montreal is on social assistance and one-third of them are children.

We see in the province of Ontario and in the manufacturing sector generally across this country, figures that came out yesterday which demonstrate that whatever the minister has chosen to get up and say this morning, the manufacturing sector in this country is facing continuing inexorable decline in the face of the policies that this government has put into effect.

Last year there was a 6 per cent drop in manufacturing jobs in the manufacturing sector throughout this country concentrated in central Canada, but also in British Columbia, Manitoba and in parts of Atlantic Canada.

What we see across this country is a series of devastating declines.

The government gets up and says, as the minister said this morning, that the recovery is under way. This morning the minister talked about predictions from the OECD and how Canada next year is going to grow so much better. We would have more faith in those kinds of predictions if we had not heard exactly the same thing from exactly the same ministers a year ago. They told us that recovery was under way, that we would be growing faster than any other part of the world.

What we have seen the past year is that the so-called recovery has meant an increase in unemployment, a decrease in output, a decline in the manufacturing sector and assaults on our resource sectors from Atlantic Canada to British Columbia.

There is no recovery here, no recovery whatsoever.

[Translation]

It is very sad to see what is happening in Montreal today. In one of Canada's major cities, one person out of seven is on welfare and one-third are children. We also heard today that people are fighting in Montreal's welfare offices. How can the government remain unmoved by scenes of such utter despair? When will this government finally do something to stimulate the economy, create jobs and revive the hopes of people in Montreal and across Canada, people in small towns in Quebec and Ontario, people in western Canada and the Atlantic provinces?

[English]

The minister spoke this morning. What did he say? I have talked already concerning his comments about the recovery being under way and his suggestion that the people on this side of the House are just raising these questions for some kind of rhetorical effect.

New Democrats have had two significant cross-country tours in the past year to try to get directly from the people of this country how they are hurting. If some of us speak with heat, if some of us speak with passion, about what is taking place in the economy it is not because we want to play to TV cameras or to play to the House of Commons. It is because we have heard these people, met these people throughout Canada, and they have told us how tough things are. We have heard them tell us how hope has been disappearing for their families. We heard people in Montreal, in Kitchener, in Guelph, in Windsor, in Saskatoon, in Vancouver, in Halifax, tell us about the increases in social welfare taking place, about what unemployment is doing to the fabric of their family life, to the fabric of community life within their societies.

Let me tell you, Madam Speaker, it hurts. We have to somehow get across to this government that people across the country are hurting. It is not a myth. It is not just something that shows up in the statistics. It is real live Canadians for whom the government has the responsibility of governing.

I am sorry it has the responsibility of governing them. I am sorry that it sits on the government's shoulders. Would that it sat on somebody else's shoulders, because it has not shown a sense of compassion and a sense of understanding the realities which so many people across this country are feeling.

We get up on our side of the House, and perhaps with some frustration, to speak about what we hear, what we see, what we know people are feeling across this country. The minister says: "You do not really care because you are being emotional". I am sorry, it is not possible for us to talk about the depth of the problem in this country without being emotional. It is not possible to talk about 1.5 million people being out of work, about one million on social welfare assistance across Canada without a deep sense of emotional hurt that this is happening in our country and a deep sense of anger that this government, which has been elected to take decisions, is not prepared to give the leadership that will show us some hope and direction for the future in this country.

The minister talked in his speech about: "The suggestion that you are making for recovery in this country, all that means is more taxes". If we get people back to work, if we stop having to pay for people on social assistance, if we stop having to pay the $30 billion that is now being spent on unemployment insurance, that saves money. That saves resources that are being spent, not on make-work projects but on completely wasteful allocations so far as building things for the future in this country.

It is keeping people alive. It is providing people with some kind of stop-gap measure in the face of deep economic problems. It is not giving us any kind of even medium term solution.

I have to say it is remarkable to hear this government talk about how terrible it is to raise taxes when this very government and the very minister who was speaking to the House brought into effect an increase in unemployment insurance premiums just six weeks ago here in Canada. It was a very significant increase of 7 per cent in unemployment insurance, brought in by this very minister who says: "It is the opposition which wants to increase taxes". It is not the opposition which wants to increase taxes; it is this government that has increased taxes.

The minister talks about the causes of our great national debt. I wish that he would talk about the unanimous report of the finance committee of this House of Commons. It is a committee which has a Conservative majority. Liberal and New Democrat members are on the committee as well. That committee came up with a unanimous report saying that yes, the deficit is a problem and the government should tighten up in ways to see to it that we do not increase that deficit.

What was the government's response to that unanimous report? It rejected the three or four specific ways in which the finance committee unanimously suggested tightening things up. So much for the reality of this government's commitment to doing something about the deficit. It is a not a reality which really exists.

One of the recommendations, for instance, was that there should be no more possibility for tax giveaways without them being compensated for by reallocations in the rest of the budget. Did the government say: "Yes, that makes sense. If we give money away through taxes, we have to make sure the deficit does not go up by reallocating money from other parts of the budget"? Did it say yes to that sensible suggestion? No, it said no. It tells us that what it really cares about is scoring partisan points rather than trying to deal with the serious difficulties of unemployment, of debt and of deficit in this country.

There are four New Democrat governments in this country provincially and those four governments are trying to deal seriously, with a sense of reality, with the problems of unemployment and of deficit. They have recognized that you cannot increase your deficit, that you cannot create a situation in which in a world economy, the world money market decides that you are a basket case. Therefore, the deficit must be dealt with in a responsible way.

It is tough, very tough. Hard choices have to be made but they are being made by New Democrat governments: tough choices to reallocate expenditure rather than increase deficits so as to see to it that we get jobs in this country so that we expand employment in this country, so that we give hope to people in this country. That is what we ask for from this government, a serious non-partisan sense of caring for the hundreds of thousands of Canadians who are without work.

I am just sorry that the minister this morning has not demonstrated that sense of non-partisan compassion and sensible economic policy making which is so essential to solving our economic problems in the future.

• (1250)

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I listened attentively to the member from the New Democratic Party. I take him at his word when he talks about New Democratic governments trying to take seriously the sense of reality out there and the sense of reality vis-à-vis the unemployment problems we have and the reality of the deficit.

I have a very simple request of this member. For two weeks in a row I have been presenting to members of the New Democratic Party a project in the province of Ontario north of Toronto that will employ close to 12,000 people in permanent jobs, a project that will create close to 5,000 affordable homes. It is the first ever green town development in north America using recycled materials, all being organized and reviewed by some of the most sophisticated environmental organizations. It is a project that meets all the various requirements of the farming community, agriculture, et cetera. It is not asking the province of Ontario for one nickel.

The delays in processing at Queen's Park are not only costing the investors millions of dollars, but it is also missed opportunity to deal with the problem of putting people back to work.

My simple question to the member is this: Will he take this proposal which has been delivered by many others, including myself, to the premier of Ontario, the Hon. Bob Rae, and will he use his forces as a member of the New Democratic Party to see if he can get some movement on this project? I as a member of the opposition have tried through fax, through phone, through letter, and have not been able to get a response for months. Will he do that for me?

Mr. Langdon: Madam Speaker, I first have to say, of course, that I am not a member of cabinet of the provincial Government of Ontario. I certainly can give my assurance to my colleague that I would be very interested in looking at the proposal he talks about. Certainly, as he describes it, it sounds like something that deserves careful scrutiny and review.

Once I have had a chance to look at it and to talk with the member for Broadview—Greenwood about the proposal, I would be quite prepared to talk with the cabinet ministers responsible at Queen's Park and try to determine the issue.

I do want to make a brief comment, if I could. The member referred to the delays in the decision-making process in the Ontario government. For the Ontario New Democrat government which has been in power for about 18 months now, this has been a continuing and serious source of frustration.

On taking power as a party, we found ourselves faced with a mammoth bureaucracy which had been created over a long period of power. Frankly some people have blamed it on the Liberals. The Conservatives continually blame what took place in Ontario in the 1980s on the Liberal government of Premier David Peterson. In fact one should look much more carefully at the Conservative governments which were in power provincially for a much longer period of time and allowed this set of bureaucratic agencies and ministries to develop which have made it very difficult to get rapid approvals for projects to take place. However, what is taking place in Ontario is an attempt to try to sort these things out.

For instance, in the case of the ministry of municipal affairs, there is a very strong effort being put into place to try to see that different levels of government have clear levels of responsibility. It is called disentanglement. It is very important in terms of seeing that projects do go forward quickly.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Madam Speaker, I have been listening to these comments all morning, and I must say that in this kind of debate I am always surprised to hear the kind of comments I just heard from the hon. member, especially when he says that today Canada has four NDP governments. I would refer him to what is happening today under those NDP governments, now that the latest NDP arrival in British Columbia has said that a relatively conservative—the word is well chosen—approach was needed to deal with the economy.

This means that thinking you can spend your way out and raise a projected deficit of $8 or $9 billion to $14 or $15 billion, as estimated in Ontario, does nothing to solve the problem. We have said many times that this means mortgaging the future of our children and our grandchildren.

Spending is the easiest thing in the world. We had a sample of that for many years. What we are trying to do is take measures that are more responsible,—perhaps less popular, but more responsible. I find it difficult to accept that a representative of a party that was opposed to the Hibernia project should blame us, and that has been a constant refrain since this morning, for problems that are actually due to the fact that certain companies have withdrawn from the project. It makes it harder for us to continue the project, but we are being blamed, while they voted against the project.

We are accused of not doing enough for the unemployed, but when we tabled Bill C-21 that would maximize the use of the unemployment insurance fund to help train our labour force and create permanent jobs, they voted against the bill.

Earlier they said this should not be a partisan debate. However, when we manage to corner them on specific aspects of their policy, they say: "Don't make this a political football".

There should not a double standard in the House. I hope the hon. member will realize that any political agenda must be based above all on the confidence of citizens in an economic policy that is stable and does not mortgage the future of our children and our grandchildren.

I listened carefully to what was said by the hon. member for York South—Weston and previous speakers. I think we must be careful. At a time when it is difficult for people who are out looking for jobs, we must make a concerted effort to find stable jobs in an economy that is going toward globalization. We should not try to convince people it depends on which political party is in power and try—I will use the hon. member's own words—to make political points with this issue.

[English]

Mr. Langdon: Madam Speaker, first let me make it clear with respect to Hibernia that our opposition was not to the project, Hibernia. It was to the massive expenditures which this government was prepared to make.

As the minister said, it is very easy to spend. That is what this government was doing with respect to Hibernia. The proper course which should have been taken, which would have led to a much more sensible project that would not have collapsed today, would have been to take Petro-Canada, the national oil company which all Canadians had invested in, and see to it that it used the resources it had generated from the people of Canada to ensure that this oil resource was developed.

With respect to Bill C-21, again our objection was not to training. It was paying for training out of the pockets of the unemployed. That is what the minister has to realize. If we are going to take training seriously in this country and get a work force that can really take us into the 21st century, we have to do it in a way that is fair and just.

Finally—

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but the period for questions and comments has expired.

[English]

Mr. Langdon: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. It seems to me if the minister is going to raise a number of points that I should at least have a chance to deal quickly with each of the three points he has put forward.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Speaker is in the hands of the House. There was a first question and a very long comment. The hon. minister made a short comment. We are now into 12 minutes of questions and comments.

I am quite prepared to listen to the hon. member for another minute or two, or ten or sixty. Does the House agree? If there is unanimous consent to have the hon. member continue his comment, I am quite prepared to do so.

Mr. Blais: On the same point of order, Madam Speaker. I think after a speech like the hon. minister has given, we should have maybe 20 or 30 minutes to answer all the points he raised in his question so that it is fair for everybody. I had just a minute or two to answer and make some comments on that. I think it has to be fair for everybody.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I take for granted that there is not unanimous consent to continue over and above.

Mr. Langdon: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. The usual procedure is to actually ask the House: Is there unanimous consent? I certainly did not hear anybody say "No".

Madam Deputy Speaker: I did ask. In his intervention, which I listened to carefully, I thought I heard a reluctance, if not a total "no" from the hon. minister which is why I am calling, on debate. I think the hon. minister will agree that this is what he said.

Mr. Langdon: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Do I understand that the minister does not want an answer to the questions that he posed?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I first of all want to compliment my colleague from York South—Weston for choosing this topic today.

Quite frankly most of us would agree in this House that the people in our ridings believe this is the number one issue facing this country today, namely getting people back to work.

I am going to try to take a little different tact in my remarks today.

I listened to the Minister of Employment and Immigration earlier today and I agree with his remarks that we are dealing with a restructuring of all the economies of the different countries in the world. He is absolutely correct. I do not debate that point with him.

I debate with him when he speaks of his commitment to retraining. I do not see it happening. I gave as a specific example the Woodgreen community centre in my riding. It is one of the most productive community centres in the whole city. Its track record in serving training needs throughout the community has been noted by many agencies as being superior. Yet, it is not only being frozen in terms of its resources to allow it to continue its service to the community but it is being cut back by 10 per cent.

There is a question of trust here. He even said in his answer: "Oh, well, I have to sort of look at these resource allocations again". I hope he will follow through and review the Woodgreen community centre because it is a very important contributor to the community.

So often we forget that when times are tough governance is supposed to be there for those who are most in need. Governance is not for those who do not need help. It is for those who are most disadvantaged and most in need.

It seems to me that the minister must review the Woodgreen request in that light.

The minister also made the point that we on this side of the House were not challenging him with new ideas or ways to advance this debate on putting people back to work. I really take exception to that point. I take exception because my colleague, the member for York—South Weston who initiated this debate on behalf of the Liberal Party of Canada, and our leader issued a challenge to the government. It is not a partisan challenge, let's face it. No party has a lock on how to put people back to work. All of us working together will get this job done, especially in light of the point the minister made that this is not a problem unique to Canada. This is a problem the whole world is facing.

Quite frankly I did not think that it was a good response to the idea of encouraging even further debate and exploring ideas.

There are lots of ideas out there and in here on how to put Canadians back to work. To begin with, I want to refer specifically to a document entitled Work For Tomorrow—Employment Opportunities for the 1980s. This was the result of a parliamentary task force in place during the early 1980s. This was a task force composed of all members of the House of Commons. This was a task force that worked for close to two years during the last major recession we had in this country. After listening to successful people from all over the country who were weathering that terrible recession which we as a government were involved with, we as Liberals—we do not run away from that—after listening to people from all over the world and after listening to ways to put people back to work, the task force came forward with this document with 186 different ideas.

I recommend this document not only to all parliamentarians in this House but to all parliamentarians in every legislature throughout this nation. It includes 186 ideas put together by members of Parliament from all sides of the House, ideas that came to them from people from coast to coast, in every sector of the economy and every region of the country. So often we try to reinvent the wheel in this place. It is not necessary. This document has some ideas that are as good today as they were then. So often we push paper and create work when some of the basic answers are right before us.

I challenge the minister of employment to review and reissue this document to all parliamentarians. This is what Canadians are bugged about. They do not get the sense that we are doing anything to address the problems in an immediate way. It is delay, delay, wait and see. In terms of dealing in hope it is just the exact opposite. My colleague from York South—Weston said to the government today: "Let us continue to debate this issue of how we put people back to work". We are not talking about fuelling the deficit or adding to the debt. We are talking about specific ideas that we can discuss. If we initiate discussions right away, with the government's will, then all of a sudden hope and confidence are back in the marketplace.

The government is always focused on the deficit and the debt of this nation. It should not try to create the illusion that government members are the only people in this country who care about deficit and debt. It is how you manage that deficit, how you manage that debt which is the key point. Quite frankly the government is overestimating the debt of this country by $50 billion because it never takes into account the reserves the Governor of the Bank of Canada has. The Bank of Canada is part of the Government of Canada.

It has used that scare tactic to the point that everybody is afraid to take a chance. In terms of creativity, this is what the government seems to be lacking. Let us take the 900,000 entrepreneurs that exist in this country. Would it not be much better to give an incentive to the entrepreneurs of this country to put people on apprenticeship programs, train them, and educate them in whatever sector the entrepreneur is in rather than pay them to do unproductive things like stay at home?

There is no cost to the Treasury because of that. I support the Leader of the New Democratic Party, who has been trying to put forward this idea for the last two weeks. There has never been a response to it. We are giving someone who is young—it does not matter what age—$10,000 to $12,000 from unemployment insurance. Would it not be better to give that $10,000 to $12,000 to someone who is an entrepreneur, to shift that person from an unproductive capacity to a productive capacity? It seems pretty basic to me.

There are all kinds of other opportunities which do not cause an assault on the deficit or debt. I mentioned earlier to the NDP a project just north of Toronto that would create almost immediately seven or eight thousand jobs within eight months, close to double that, without any draw on the treasury of Ontario or the Treasury of Canada.

The process is slowing it down. Canadians are fed up about the layers of government and the process in this country which slow down the decisions that need to be taken for projects that do not even cost the Treasury any money. It is so amazing. The government can sit here and say: "Deficit, deficit, deficit, deficit, debt". Yet, it never thinks of the debt the private sector or industry has and the added deficit and debt the private sector takes on because of the bureaucratic delays and the crazy decision-making process that happens at the various levels of government.

I mentioned yesterday, and this is a challenge to all public servants, that we have to review our process of putting things through the system because that will put people back to work and will create more confidence in the country.

There is another thing. I have been saying for the last two years that we must become a nation that measures its strength by the mouths we feed and the environment we protect.

I was in the Middle East two weeks ago. I was in Amman, Jordan and met with officials from the Embassy of Iraq. We had several hours of meetings concerning Canada sending humanitarian aid, food assistance and medical supplies to Iraq under the auspices of the United Nations.

The warmth of the feelings that the people in the Middle East have toward Canada is incredible. I have in my hands an order from the Government of Iraq for close to 140,000 tonnes of food. This is food that it is willing to pay for, that will lead to a renewal of a relationship under the auspices of the United Nations. This will lead from food to medical supplies to environmental technology. It will lead to a situation in which Canada can create all kinds of new jobs for its factories by taking advantage of the billions of dollars of trade opportunities in the Middle East.

Simply put, we should be developing ways to assist our entrepreneurs to go to the Middle East right now to take advantage of that good will. When I say billions of dollars I mean that literally. One cannot believe the good will that exists in the Middle East toward Canada. However, are we over there? Very few Canadian businessmen are over there. A few of the larger ones are, but a lot of our smaller and medium sized operators have a very difficult time in getting there.

Why can we not use the Department of National Defence plane which goes every Thursday and every Tuesday to Lahr, Germany, load it up with Canadian entrepreneurs and their order pads, and send them throughout Europe and into the Middle East and give them a boost? That does not cost the Treasury of Canada anything.

When they come home with those orders that will get our factories working again. These are the things that put people to work. This is not saying to the minister of employment or the Minister of Finance that we should spend money, blow up the deficit, or add more to the debt. These are basic ideas. The Americans are over there doing it.

Somehow we always let the Americans out-hustle us. Hustle in this country seems to be almost a pejorative term. We must get over that feeling. As legislators and people who are here to assist, support and give leadership to the fight to put people back to work we must use government resources to inject some confidence into our business people so they can take advantage of that opportunity.

I know of a particular group of businessmen who went over to Amman, Jordan three weeks ago and on their second trip were short-listed on a $40 million potash deal. That is unbelievable. We have the best technology in Canada in the province of Saskatchewan and they were short-listed on their second visit.

These are the kinds of things we must do.

The shopping list of business opportunities abroad is so long but we just do not seem to be taking advantage of it.

Look at the realm of tourism. That is where government advertising should be right now. All government budgets vis-à-vis communication and advertising should be shifted to support a welcome mat "Come to Canada". In terms of foreign exchange and spin-off effect, we will not get a better sector than tourism.

• (1320)

What has this government been doing in that area? I know it has been doing something, but quite frankly I am sure that it realizes and accepts the fact that it could do a lot better. That is where I am coming from. This is not trying to take a partisan shot at the government. It is just trying to get it to put a tight focus on the urgency that as the nation's boardroom we have to make this project of putting people back to work the number one priority.

Maybe my colleague from York South-Weston challenges the wrong way in trying to suggest that maybe we should take a page from the legislatures in the United States and go through a weekend or a couple of nights putting a litany of ideas forward that people can take advantage of. I think the government is missing an opportunity by not taking advantage of it.

I suggest to the officials in the department of employment that they have to go back over some of the programs that the department has used in the past which have been successful. When my colleague, the member for Winnipeg South Centre, was minister responsible for employment during the very tough recession of 1981-82, he had a fabulous program called NEED. On evaluation, it turned out to be one of the most successful programs that the Government of Canada ever implemented.

I say to officials in the department of employment: "Do not be bashful in reissuing an idea like that to your political fathers right now. The country is desperate for ideas that will put people back to work".

I also challenge the officials in the department of employment to review the proposal that I put to the minister a month ago, Careers 91, the project of Peter Angelou from my riding. Young university students went out and found by knocking on doors trying to find jobs that there were actually more jobs out there than actually listed. They put a book together of all the human resource vice-presidents of close to 200 corporations in Ontario and what their requirements are in terms of filing for jobs, asking for jobs or whatever. This project which actually helps people find work without any expense to the taxpayer. That book produced by a couple of young entrepreneurs in the private sector should be supported by the department. Quite frankly I hope my words are not falling on deaf ears.

I repeat that we have lots of opportunity in this country to serve the world through food production, through environmental technology and lots of opportunity because of the phenomenal good will that we as a nation have throughout the world.

In closing, I hope we can prick the conscience of the minister of employment to revisit the idea of my colleague from York South—Weston that we have a major debating period in this House on ideas on how we can put people back to work for everyone's sake.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Madam Speaker, I thank my friend and colleague for his submissions. I could not help but think as I was listening to the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood what an absolute treat it would be if he and the minister of employment were to switch places.

If you compare the two speeches by my hon. friend and the minister of employment, you see in those two speeches the difference between what a Liberal government would do and what the Conservative government is doing. That is, the Conservative government is content to do nothing. A Liberal government would be prepared to develop ideas and to call upon all members of the House regardless of their political stripe to come up with ideas, to come up with an action plan to put people back to work.

The minister of employment—the minister of unemployment because all he is presiding over is unemployment—says that he refuses to take into consideration the Liberal economic recovery plan because it is going to cost money and add to the deficit and the debt. That is the position of the Government of Canada.

My friend from Broadview—Greenwood has pointed out ways in which jobs can be created without adding to the deficit or the debt. My question to my friend is this: Would he agree that there was a cost to unemployment in the first 11 months of 1991 of $16.3 billion? It was paid to Canadians to do nothing. That is the cost. It was $16.3 billion in the first 11 months. Over all, over $20 billion was paid to people to do nothing.

Would my friend agree that the minister really does not know what he is talking about when he says that there is no cost to unemployment when in fact there is a direct cost in terms of dollars and cents. There is also a tremendous indirect cost in terms of the idle production capacity that exists.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague from York South—Weston for that insightful question.

Quite frankly it is not just the $20 billion that he mentions that comes from the unemployment insurance fund. There is a further $10 billion from the welfare fund. That is $30 billion and no productivity, not to mention the wear and tear on family life, health care, the lack of activity in the marketplace.

There is only one way to attack the deficit and debt of this nation, and that is through full employment. Through full employment, we get a return. Can you imagine $30 billion and no productivity? Imagine converting that, whether it be into training, a youth corps for Canada, subsidizing with the private sector, or joint venture training programs in terms of training.

I cannot imagine a Conservative on that side of the House who would not rather have that money going into productive output than the current situation. For the love of me, I say to my colleague for York South—Weston, I cannot understand why the lack of political will exists when it seemed to me that was traditionally a quality of the Conservative Party.

The New Democratic Party in the province of Ontario has a philosophy whereby it does not mind the welfare scheme of things. I am a little bit amazed that the government is not going back to its roots.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind hon. members of the Liberal emergency plan that was announced by our leader several weeks ago. It is a plan that is meant to deal with an emergency situation: 1.5 million Canadians unemployed, 2.2 million Canadians on welfare. We believe that emergency measures are necessary. We need long-term measures, but we also need some short-term measures to kick-start the economy.

• (1330)

There were five points in the program. I would like my friend from Broadview—Greenwood to comment briefly on the over-all plan and state his views on the effect the plan would have on the Canadian economy. One point was to reduce the minimum down payment for first-time home buyers from 10 per cent to 5 per cent. Another was to allow the use of RRSP funds for the purchase of a new home. The third was a shared infrastructure program to rebuild our roads, sewers and sidewalks. The fourth was an intensified training program, and the fifth was some emergency federal funding to food banks across the country.

Can the hon. member indicate what impact the Liberal Party emergency plan would have on the Canadian economy in the short run?

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, in reply to my colleague from York South—Weston, first of all every one of those points has merit. I support every one of them as I know most members of this House do.

Let us focus on just one, job retraining, where there is a residual effect. Imagine if the one million entrepreneurs that exist each hired one person. In other words, let us not create a lot of work projects just for the sake of work. We are not suggesting that. Let us use that resource of entrepreneurship in this country to train and employ at the same time. If you spread the load, with a million businesses each hiring one person, which could be done overnight, that program could be implemented literally within a week if the government had the will and wanted to do it. That would not cost the taxpayer one red nickel. You are taking people who otherwise would be receiving a UI cheque or a welfare cheque and putting them into the work force. You have them doing something productive. You are retraining them. There is a long-term asset there for this country.

I say to my colleague from York South—Weston that all we can do is take days like today and continue to press the nerve. Maybe the people of Canada are going to get a big surprise next week or the following week. The Minister of Finance may all of a sudden on budget night implement all these things. Maybe Canadians will get a surprise in the next two weeks. God, I hope so.

Mr. Nunziata: I would like the member for Broadview—Greenwood to comment on the loss of manufacturing jobs, in Ontario in particular, and what the NDP government, the Bob White government at Queen's Park, is doing to business in the province of Ontario. What will happen if the proposed labour laws are adopted by the province of Ontario, the Bob White government at Queen's Park? What impact will that have on manufacturing jobs in Ontario?

Mr. Mills: I will be very short, Mr. Speaker, and I appreciate you giving us that extra minute.

The bottom line is that Bob Rae has made promise, after promise, after promise, after promise, but nothing happens in the province of Ontario. Nothing is going on there. It is the biggest wheel-spinning exercise that we have ever seen in the province. That is not a cheap shot. It is just simple fact.

Do you know what I think we should do with the crazy things that are going on with free trade, especially in the automotive industry? I think we should get behind some of our best auto parts people and we should get our own Canada car. We should buy out one of the factories in Windsor and start making a car for Canada so that we can develop the same kind of pride in manufacturing as the Germans and the Japanese. Let us have a Canadian car that we can export all over the world. With the good will that we have, we would probably do a lot better than what is currently happening.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise to participate in the resolution before the House today. I certainly respect the views of the member who has just spoken. He has given some eloquent ideas and I am sure some of them warrant some action.

On the other hand, I sit here, listening to the debate that goes on, on the other side. Members of the Liberal Party rise and say that what the member for Broadview—Greenwood is saying is really the view of the Liberal Party. Are they out to lunch? That is no more the view of the Liberal Party than the view of the NDP on some of these issues.

If that had been the view of the Liberals, when they had a chance to govern they would have done a much better job. We only need to look back in the recent past. Members opposite, for some reason, have wanted to drag the NDP government of the province of Ontario into this debate. I will share with them some very basic facts so they can understand that whether it is Liberal or NDP, it really does not matter.

Let us go back to 1982 in the province of Ontario. At that time, the over-all budget of the province was some $17 billion. We did not have a crisis in health care. We did not have a problem with the highways. We did not have a problem with all kinds of portable classrooms stuck out behind the schools. We did not have a problem within the public service. The fact of the matter is, generally speaking, the province of Ontario was running pretty well.

We take that $17-odd billion and inflate it 10 years later so that today we should be spending about $27 billion or $28 billion. If we add to that the fact that there has been some population growth in Ontario, which provides additional need by the people who have moved into the province one way or the other, that cost is there. In fact, inflate the number to about $32 billion.

Lo and behold, in the province of Ontario today, thanks to the efforts of the Liberal government of David Peterson and the NDP government of Bob Rae, we are now spending $53 billion, some $20 billion more than any reasonable inflationary number. What has Ontario to show for it?

We know what Ontario has to show for it. We have a declining infrastructure when it comes to highways and services. We have a desperate situation in health care and we have a desperate situation in the schools. By using their economic policies in a province that was very successful 10 years ago, the opposition parties have managed to run it down quite dramatically.

We even have them ask: "What do you think about this labour policy the NDP is putting in place?" Of course, it is not a very positive thing, but that is only in the future. We are talking about the present and the past when we talk about their policies. We do not need to look too far to see just what it is that would happen federally should the Liberal or NDP members have their way on this particular resolution before the House today.

There is no doubt that unemployment is high; higher than I think anybody in this House would like to see it. We are aware that it creates a hardship. Every member of the government, and I believe every member of the opposition as well, is committed to finding ways of getting Canadians back to work. We on the government side have an action plan and we are following it to try to help Canadians get back into the work force.

However, opposition members would like Canadians to believe that there are magic solutions; that they can create jobs instantly. They prefer to ignore the fact that there is only one way to create the sort of jobs that provide lasting opportunities for personal security and prosperity, and that is by creating the conditions for renewed private sector investment. The member from Broadview—Greenwood talked about some of those kinds of things. Certainly we all acknowledge it is the private sector that has to create the jobs, has to start to employ the people, and it needs the conditions to make that happen.

Of course opposition members have a slightly different view. They want the government to buy the jobs for Canadians, even if it means adding quite substantially to our national debt. They do not really care that by adding debt they ultimately are talking about a heavier tax burden for all Canadians, for the workers of our country throughout Canada.

The Canada of 1992 cannot afford those sorts of silly-putty solutions, if I can describe them as such. The last time the federal government tried to borrow and spend its way out of a recession was back in 1982 when our deficit jumped from some $15.5 billion to some $38 billion over four years and our national debt doubled.

To this day it has caused a problem for all levels of government, not just the federal government, although we have to deal with that debt and the interest on that debt that keeps accumulating. It influences interest rates throughout this country. It influences the ability of provincial governments to borrow. It influences the ability of private citizens to borrow, of corporations to borrow, and ultimately the profitability of all of those organizations.

It does not come as a surprise that they would like to forget the past because they will say that was prior to 1984. Of course that is why I started out with my brief example of the province of Ontario, because that was not 1984, that is today.

They obviously think Canadians should ignore the policy framework that our government has put in place and that we should just forget about it. Our policy is for substantial sustained non-inflationary growth later this year. We believe that is going to happen. We think we have put in place the proper fundamentals to make that happen and it is through that kind of sustained growth that in fact unemployment will come down.

We can say that is my partisan view of the subject and, yes, I am partisan. That is my view of the subject. But there are others who have similar thoughts and they are independent of government, both independent here in Canada and outside Canada. They expect Canada to report one of the strongest growth rates this year of any major or industrial country around the world. Just yesterday the Conference Board of Canada released its estimate that the economy will grow by some 3.2 per cent this year, which will be the highest among the G-7 group of nations.

The Organization of Economic Co-Operation and Development expects Canada to record the strongest growth rate this year of all of its 24 member countries.

These are positive forecasts and they are not just the result of a do-nothing government. On the contrary, they show that the policy framework that we have been putting in place with, all of the opposition that the folks on the other side can throw at us, is delivering results.

In last year's budget we said that we would lower interest rates over the long term and that those lower interest rates were key to sustainable economic recovery and job creation. To get those rates down and, more important, to keep them down, it is essential to reduce and ultimately eliminate inflation and inflationary expectations.

We took action to meet that goal. We established firm, realistic targets. We said that by the end of 1992 we would have inflation down to 3 per cent and that we would look for 2 per cent by the middle of the decade.

We seem to be achieving those targets. We still have another three years to go of course before we get to the middle of the decade, but the fact of the matter is that the Government of Canada and the Bank of Canada are committed to this price stability and we do in fact appear to be achieving those targets.

Second, we knew that the government had to take the lead in restraining government wages and salaries to assist the process of inflation reduction. I am sure all Canadians can remember this great debate, if I can describe it as such, that took place last summer and fall when in fact we were trying to bring through the House legislation to implement our wage policies, opposed by the opposition and of course opposed by the various public sector labour unions in this country.

Is it not interesting that here we are, having taken that very firm policy on labour demands, contrary to the one that was taken in the province of Ontario? It is now the province of Ontario that is telling its public sector employees they are going to have to live with 1 per cent. I should point out that they have encouraged spending controls. Across Canada the various premiers at the premiers' conference last week encouraged spending controls. The fact of the matter is here we are as a government in fact providing the very leadership for which the opposition has been asking. We have been providing that leadership because we know that the solution is a difficult one, but it is there in front of us.

We also knew that we had to maintain our commitments through concrete actions to keep federal government finances on track and a balanced budget by the middle of the 1990s. I do not know what is going to be in the budget, which undoubtedly will be coming forward in the next two or three weeks, but I hope that the government continues to commit itself to the track that we have been on for the last couple of years.

The fact is, if we are to keep inflation and interest rates under control and bring them down further, we cannot allow government deficits to fuel inflationary expectations. Nor can we allow inflation or the deficit to eat up scarce funds in the capital markets.

That is why we took the wide-ranging steps to control government spending that I have mentioned. Not only that, we promised that we would bring forward a bill that restricted government's ability to spend. I am happy to note that today in the House the finance minister in fact introduced that bill, after extensive study by the finance committee, which restricts the government's ability to spend money. That is also why, as the finance minister and the President of the Treasury Board announced two weeks ago, we were freezing all discretionary spending through the balance of this budget year and additional hiring of any personnel that may be associated with it.

Even in face of greater than expected economic weakness, we are not going to let the deficit soar the way it did just 10 years ago when we found ourselves in a different circumstance.

Let me remind the House of some other positive economic developments that should renew our confidence in Canada's economic prospects in coming months. Despite the recent blip in the Bank of Canada rate, interest rates are down dramatically from where they were in May 1990. The commercial bank prime rate is now 7.5 per cent and that is almost half of what it was in May 1990 and the lowest rate since 1973.

Mortgage rates have also fallen substantially. In one year the mortgage rate has fallen 6 per cent. What does it mean? It means that a family carrying a mortgage of $75,000 amortized over 25 years is saving $300 a month on its mortgage payments.

In my riding we have had over the last 10 years an extensive amount of new housing construction. It has been a very active riding. I know that $75,000 mortgages are very common. I have heard from numerous constituents that they have been able to refinance their mortgages and they are talking about the money they are saving, that they have never had mortgage rates as low as they have them today. Members have to appreciate that my riding has many young families. They were not here in the 1950s and 1960s when you could get a 25-year mortgage for 6 per cent or whatever the rate was. They were not old enough to be in the housing market, but they are in the housing market now. They have mortgages now and they know they are saving money now on their mortgage payments.

Underlying this progress is the substantial turnaround we have seen on inflation. The year over year increase in the Consumer Price Index for last year was 3.8 per cent, just half of what it was at the start of the year. When this January's number comes out, I would not be surprised if it was even lower and we will get it down to 2 per cent or maybe even a little less.

I would also point out that the Canadian dollar has fallen. I am aware that it has been a problem. It certainly is a problem for the Canadian industry when the dollar is in the 87-cent and 88-cent range. For a very brief period it hit 89 cents. That certainly is a problem for Canadian industry, but I am happy to see that it has in fact come down and hopefully through actions we will be able to establish a very stable price level on the Canadian dollar, certainly in the range where it is now and not escalating back to those higher levels. Once you have that lower dollar, there will be a stimulus because Canadian industry will be more competitive in two factors: in its exports, but also against imports. That is a double-edged sword and I believe that lower dollar will also help create jobs in this country.

Those are just some of the items that we have dealt with. There was mention of the five-point program and some of the recommendations that the Liberal Party brought forward such as the CMHC insured mortgage and being able to get into the housing market with a 5 per cent down payment. I know the Liberals say they recommended it. Yes, they did, but it was not necessarily their idea. This has been very publicly talked about for some four or five months. All people on all sides of the House thought that was a good idea, so we announced it. We have implemented that program. Housing is important as an engine of the Canadian economy. I hope that we will be successful in carrying it on.

• (1350)

One of the points the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood made was the fact that there are all kinds of regulations delaying housing starts. I can sympathize fully with some of the points he made. Similarly in my riding just east of Toronto there is a pent-up demand. The problem is that we need a water filtration plant built so that the new housing will have drinking water. What is the hold-up? It is the same hold-up he talked about.

Developers are sitting there. They have their $10 million. They are ready to build. It is engineered. It is designed. It has a location. Lo and behold, it is sitting on some minister's desk waiting for approval which should have been granted over a year ago.

An hon. member: Are those ministers at Queen's Park?

Mr. Soetens: Yes, those minister are at Queen's Park. I am glad you asked me to clarify that. I would hate for the people to think that it was ministers in Ottawa who were the problem. In fact, it is not.

An hon. member: They are NDP then.

Mr. Soetens: They are from the socialist ilk, NDP in nature. Yes.

There are other ideas. There are things that can be done that would help the economy get going if some other people would also make some important decisions.

Of course, we also expect consumer spending to respond to lower interest rates in the near future. In fact, in the Canadian scenario, certainly in comparison to the United States scenario, you will find that per capita Canadians have more money on deposit in banks. Their debt on their credit cards is lower per capita than in the United State. I am not encouraging people to think about debt. Sometimes when you want to buy something, if you cannot immediately afford it today but you can afford the payments, you ought to get on with the decision. Certainly with the inflationary expectations, the price structures that we have been working with, consumers will find as the year progresses that they will be in a much better position to spend their money much more freely.

We have taken a number of steps. I have talked about a number of views on how we are going to bring down unemployment. It is an action based on a basic fact of economic life. For a trade dependent nation like Canada, you maintain jobs and you create new ones only to the extent that you can compete successfully in the global marketplace. When 35 per cent of what we do in this country is exported, we cannot put out of our minds the difficult circumstances that exist in other parts of the world, whether it is the United States, Europe, Japan, the Far East or the Middle East. All of these things have an impact.

If we keep inflation under control, if we keep our economic arguments going in the correct direction and keep the fundamentals correct, Canadian exporters will be able to do a much better job.

I realize I am running out of time, but there is another aspect. It is really the over-all confidence that Canadians have in the process we are in. Canadians will find with the budget that is coming forward in the next few weeks that the government has a very clear plan. We are going to continue on that plan. Canadians will have confidence that we know what we are doing. When they have that confidence, they will carry on to fulfil their part in the over-all scheme of getting the Canadian economy going.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I listened as carefully as I could to the member's talk. I wonder if he would tell the House if it is true, as I believe it is, that between June 1989 and October 1991, 461,000 manufacturing jobs, about 12.1 per cent of our total manufacturing jobs, disappeared and fully 150,000 of those jobs were gone before the recession's official onset. Our manufacturing industry now employs about 15 per cent of Canadians and it seems to me thousands of those jobs probably come from his part of Ontario. What is he talking about? What good does it do to get up to cite some think-tanks saying that our growth is going to go up more than any other OECD country next year? I do not know if he was present before, but I read the figures that showed that Canada is performing economically among the worst of the OECD member countries and certainly among the worst of the G-7 countries.

At what level do these debates get conducted in this House? Are we conducting ourselves on the intellectual level that Canadians would expect us to be debating serious issues in this House?

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, I find it interesting that the member is talking about some of the economic policies of our government that he is obviously concerned about in his presentation. I believe in fact he voted for most, if not all of those.

Having said that, he asked me to defend a list of some 400,000 odd-jobs that have been lost in the Canadian economy, a list that has already been refuted by quite a number of people as having a tremendous amount of inaccuracies in it.

If the member is suggesting that the growth program that we are presently putting in place will not provide job opportunities, what does he think growth does? We are aware there is an unemployment problem in Canada. Through this growth that we are saying will happen because of our program, we will see unemployment in Canada fall. It will fall because people will have found themselves in very stable, consistent, ongoing, full-time, rewarding jobs.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to ask the hon. member. He just answered the member for Edmonton Southeast that it was wrong to have supported some of these policies in the past. If it was wrong to have supported some of these harmful policies in the past, is it not far worse to continue to support all of those wrong policies, which the hon. member is doing right now?

Mr. Soetens: In case the hon. member did not hear me correctly, and I suspect he did not, I said the policies that the member was criticizing were in fact policies he voted for. All I am saying is that those policies are and were correct. By the implementation and continuation of these policies, we are talking about things like deficit control. I have no doubt that during the last election campaign the member from Edmonton talked about deficit control. I note when he walked across the floor he threw that argument out the window. He has joined those who do not think deficits are a problem.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, the member talked about the inflation numbers, the interest rate being reduced, et cetera. He would have to concede that the government's inflation targets are way ahead of schedule. Interest rates are in respectable shape. Does he not feel that there is enough room within his fiscal plan, seeing he is so far ahead on his inflation program, to do something that will put some hope back into that part of our community that is unemployed?

He is focused on ratcheting down inflation. Quite frankly, I would challenge the model right now that says there is any inflation in this country. I cannot see it. I do not know of it anywhere. My point is the deep economic pain that is out there for those people who are most in need.

• (1400)

We do not seem to have a life raft for them. At what point in time does the government say: "Our fiscal framework is on track. We are ahead of schedule. Now, let's look after those who are most disadvantaged in our society". At what point do you make that change?

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, I am happy to respond to that. Let me come at it from two directions.

First, in Canada, 90 per cent of the population is working. What we are talking about with some of the policies is to get that 90 per cent feeling more confident to start to invest. That will help the unemployment side.

That is one side we are working on. On the other side, I think the member is absolutely correct. It appears that our inflation targets are going to be met and that we are somewhat ahead of ourselves. Interest rates are a little lower than we have targeted.

I do not know what will be in the budget. I have a lot of opportunity to input to the minister, but I do not know what will ultimately be in it. I have recommended to the minister that because of some of these things that the member has mentioned and because there is still a serious unemployment problem, we should look at easing some of the levers by some capital projects.

I must suggest that my view of capital projects is different from those that the provincial government has responsibility for. I believe that we have our jurisdiction where we can invest some money. I have made some recommendations to the minister not to support a huge increase in spending, but to look at some areas where we know we are going to have to make some capital investment because of the kind of things that the member has mentioned. I have encouraged that there be a look at some of these projects.

Of course, the biggest one, and I believe it was mentioned during Question Period, is the fixed link to Prince Edward Island. I recommended that and a number of others. Not every project needs to cost $1 billion. There can be some really worth-while projects, spending $50,000 here and $100,000 there, and maybe even $1 million in other locations.

Through a variety of programs, but fundamental at least to my outlook, we can in fact achieve those targets that we have set out.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member very closely. I spent some time with him in Saint-Jean trying to learn some French. I got to know him quite well and I know he speaks very sincerely.

He said that the government does have an action plan. I listened to him very carefully. What is it? Is it predicting that there will be a recovery? Is that the government's action plan?

He talked about the fundamentals that it has laid down. Is that the government's action plan? He does know that there are 300,000 skilled jobs required in this country right now. There are 1.5 million unemployed. What is the government's action plan to match these demand jobs right now and the 1.5 million people who are looking for jobs?

In Question Period I asked the minister of employment if he would implement at least part of the Liberal five-point plan for economic recovery. He definitely said: "No, because it would not provide permanent jobs. It would provide all short-term jobs". Yet, the member is agreeing with us now that there are some public works projects that might create jobs and help the unemployed.

What is the government's action plan for matching the 300,000 skilled workers required right now with this huge population looking for jobs?

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that the Liberal action plan has five points in it.

One of the five which is a very public and very highly demanded plan is the down payment reduction on housing. That has been implemented by the government. To suggest that we are not looking at anything, one of their own ideas that he supports has been implemented.

The relevant issue is that 300,000 jobs are going unfilled because they are for trained people. Certainly I have seen in my riding, and I am sure all members have seen that over the last year, the government has moved a considerable amount of money into the training budget. I am sorry I do not have the numbers in front of me exactly, but I believe it was increased over the last two years from just over $1 billion to just under $3 billion.

That is a substantial increase in funding in the training programs. I would suggest that hopefully all of those people involved in those training programs, or many of them, will look at those 300,000 jobs which are going unfilled and be qualified to fill them.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak in this debate today. Let me remind the House of the motion we are discussing:

> That this House condemn the government for its refusal to take action to alleviate the intolerably high levels of unemployment in Canada.

Many Canadians could have written this motion, perhaps not as eloquently as the hon. member for York South—Weston because very few people have such eloquence, but most of them think exactly what is in this motion.

First, let me take this opportunity to congratulate the member for York South—Weston on his recent appointment as the employment critic for the national Liberal Party. I am sure that I speak on behalf of all members of this House in congratulating the member. We know that he will really hold this minister and this government to account for the shortcomings of the Conservative government.

This government has so many shortcomings that it would probably take 85 critics to keep it honest in that regard, if that is possible. However, I know that the member for York South—Weston will do a tremendous job not only for the national Liberal caucus but indeed for all Canadians who want us to air that grievance with the government in order to obtain redress.

When I said that several million Canadians feel exactly as the member for York South—Weston does, I was not making a merely partisan remark. In addition to the feelings we have as parliamentarians there are very concrete statistics to support what we are saying.

I have before me an article written by Frances Russell, which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press on February 5, 1992, and presumably in other Canadian newspapers as well. She points out that between June 1989 and October 1991, under the Conservative government, 461,000 manufacturing jobs were lost.

The hon. member for Edmonton Southeast referred to those very depressing statistics only a few moments ago. Yet, we hear some members across the way who say they are on the right track. What would things be like if this government were on the wrong track? We are losing this many jobs while the government pretends to be going in the appropriate direction.

The people of my riding do not think that what is happening now is at all satisfactory. The government pretends that this situation is world-wide.

[Translation]

Although the recession is not unique to Canada, Mr. Speaker, you are non-partisan and with your great objectivity and neutrality, you will understand that Canada's present situation has been made much worse by the monetary policy of the government opposite and also by the policy of too high interest rates. Of course our overvalued currency has cost Canada jobs that went abroad. This brought on the recession in Canada even before it was felt in other parts of the world.

We see that this government has greatly contributed to the recession. I would even say that the Canadian government beat others to the recession.

• (1410)

Before the nation-wide recession, created by the government opposite, many parts of our country were already suffering from recession. Take eastern Ontario, for example. In my riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, in Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke, in Stormont—Dundas and in others, we started to feel the effects of this recession long ago. That is why some of my colleagues and I asked the Conservative government opposite in 1990 to establish an economic recovery program for eastern Ontario. We were so disadvantaged in our area that we needed such a program, even before the recession hit the rest of the country.

What we did not know then is that the worst was still to come.

[English]

I have before me a front page article from the Standard– Freeholder, a newspaper in Cornwall, Ontario, of Tuesday, August 28, 1991. It is entitled "Eastern Ontario Needs Job Help". It talks about the fact that an all–party committee of members of the Ontario legislature was on tour in eastern Ontario and it heard of the terrible economic conditions in eastern Ontario. It heard from the mayor of Cornwall, not from the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, that companies needed incentive to relocate in the region.

I would like to quote then Mayor Phil Poirier: "Ontario's competitiveness as an economic region is being weakened by its reluctance to match its competitors' actions, and the same applies for the federal government which has failed to provide economic assistance to eastern Ontario the way preceding governments have done".

[Translation]

Now hon. members opposite like to say: "Well, you know, you Liberals have no alternative". They say that or they say: "You have alternatives but they cost too much". That again is wrong.

[English]

For those across the way who ask what is the alternative, our leader, the member for Beauséjour, announced a few weeks ago a five–point program to improve the economy of this country.

Let me go through those points, and I will also discuss how we are going to pay for them. I invite the Conservative members to take note, to write it down or get someone else to write it for them so that they can adopt these policies.

(1) We ask for a 5 per cent minimum down payment for first–time home buyers. That is cost neutral and the government has done it already. We thank it for making this first step. There are four more yet to be taken.

(2) Permit the use of the registered retirement savings plans for first–time home buyers. This program has no cost to it. All you do is borrow from your own RRSP, put some sort of an attachment on the property, and if and when you ever sell the property you put it back into the RRSP. There is obviously no cost attached to that, not even the loss of potential income tax, nothing. There is no cost at all attached to this particular plan of our leader, the member for Beauséjour.

(3) A shared cost infrastructure program. Yes, we have called for this program. One billion dollars is the cost of it. How do we pay for that? First, in my own province of Ontario the provincial government has already agreed to contribute matching funds. It has already agreed to pay for half of it. In addition, we must remember that by not paying unemployment insurance much of that money would be coming back, some $350 million of it.

There are two more components. One is intensified basic skills training in Canada and the other is emergency funding for food banks which we would pay for by cancelling government polling and advertising.

We have offered alternatives.

[Translation]

I call on members opposite to listen to the grievances of the Canadian people, those in Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and elsewhere, who want an economic recovery program to get the economy going again and not platitudes from the government which likes to tell us that it is on the right track.

They are not on the right track. Eighty–four per cent of Canadians who have had it with the Prime Minister and his government know that they are not on the right track. The Prime Minister spoke the truth yesterday. He told Canadians who do not like his policies not to vote for him. That is exactly what they intend to do, and I hope that it will be soon.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Atkinson): The hon. member had indicated that he was splitting his time with his colleague so there will be a five–minute questions and comments period.

[Translation]

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member a question. He has just mentioned that his leader favours the use of registered retirement savings plans for the purchase of certain durables or houses which are even more durable consumer goods. Can he tell me what that will do? When your leader was a minister, as we were emerging from the 1980–81 recession, his government embarked upon a major capital projects policy and then interest rates soared, reaching 24 per cent and the inflation rate was as high as 14 per cent.

Today, under similar circumstances, that is to say just after a recession, here is your leader suggesting we do as he did then, that we make the same mistake and cause inflation and interest rates to flare up, while our party is advocating a stable monetary policy producing lower interest rates. They have been around 7 or 8 per cent for the past few months. That is a quite impressive drop. I would like the hon. member to explain to Canadians who have mortgages to pay how this would impact on their monthly payments on a $75,000 mortgage, for instance if, having adopted a major capital projects approach as advocated by his leader, we were to repeat the same mistakes he made in 1981 and let the interest rates rise to 20 to 24 per cent.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, the member opposite is a bit confused. For one thing, the first part of his question deals with registered retirement savings plans. The second part, which he mixes with the first part of his question, deals with the public works program advocated by the Liberal leader.

I believe that the member's question is about registered retirement savings plans. First, the member opposite knows, because the Canadian Home Builders' Association surely informed him like the rest of us, that thousands of home foundations are all ready to be built on. Therefore, the announcement of such a program would result in almost immediate construction. There would be no waiting for drawings or tenders, which could take months and even years. We are talking about something that could be implemented within a few weeks. The economic impact would be that fast.

Second, I believe that the member was referring to some deficit that would result in a higher cost of living, or something like that. The member forgets that there is no deficit of any kind, neither for the government nor for the taxpayer, if you borrow from your own registered retirement savings plan. It is simply a transfer of investments from one portfolio to another. That is all that is involved. It may be that the member did not understand that, but he should familiarize himself with this issue by contacting the Canadian Home Builders' Association. If he wishes, I can provide him with the telephone number.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): I have a short question for my colleague, the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

• (1420)

The member for York South—Weston, our critic responsible for employment, put forward an idea this morning that we in this House should issue a challenge to the Minister of Employment and Immigration that we debate right through the weekend ideas on how we can put people back to work. We need to stimulate this government to put a tighter focus on this issue.

I would like the hon. member to put forward some ways in which he feels we can get this government to respond to this request.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I am almost tempted to say that the quickest way to get things done is to call an election right now. But even that would take a few days of campaigning before we are rid of the people across the way.

Meanwhile, it is incumbent on the minister to listen very attentively to the debate. I am sure, looking at him right now, that is precisely what he is doing. I am sure he is taking copious notes of the remarks of all hon. members of this House and that he will be responding and acting on our measures.

It is my hope that he and the Minister of Finance will announce in the budget in no more than two weeks from now the other four points suggested by the hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Yes, we could have debated all weekend. I am ready to do so but I do not think that the minister—and I am looking at him attentively right now—is ready. I am looking at the Prime Minister as well in his seat there and I do not think he is ready to debate this weekend either. Nor is the Minister of Finance. I can tell by that look on his face that he is not ready to debate this weekend.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, my friend from York South—Weston has moved a resolution that ought to command the support of pretty well every member of this House.

Mr. Boudria: Every Canadian.

Mr. Simmons: Certainly, I say to my friend from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, if every Canadian could vote on this resolution there would be a thumping majority in favour, I will tell him that.

The unfortunate thing I say to him and to this House, is that this House no longer really represents the majority wishes of Canadians. It is true that at the time of the election in 1988 a majority of members of a particular party stripe were elected. But the sad commentary on that group is that they no longer reflect the wishes of the people who sent them here.

The best example of that is the goods and services tax, where fully 85 per cent of the people—and I have no reason to believe the proportions are any different in Tory ridings than in other ridings—have voiced their opinion very strongly against that tax. Yet these people sit here and allow the will of the people to be thwarted.

If the people of Canada could say today "we condemn the government for its refusal to take action to alleviate the intolerably high levels of unemployment", they would support almost unanimously that resolution. I say "almost unanimously". There would be exceptions to that. It would not be a unanimous vote.

There are some people out there who would disagree with this resolution in all fairness. And who are they? Well, they are the people who have jobs, thank you very much. They are the people who ran those big ads about free trade during the last federal election. They are the people who are benefiting from a massive tax break from this government. I am sure everyone knows the statistics.

Those who earn $100,000 or more a year in this country are now paying $1,600 less in federal taxes than when this government took office; $1,600 fewer dollars each year than was the case when this government took office in 1984. Those earning $30,000 or less a year are now paying $1,200 more a year in federal taxes than in 1984.

What is the net message? That this government is looking after its own rich friends. Those rich friends, if they were to vote on this resolution, would find nothing wrong with what this government has done because this government has looked after them very well in tax terms and in every other way possible.

I was particularly interested in what the hon. member for Ontario had to say. I thought perhaps his remarks were maybe the most informative from that side of the House in that he got into announcing aspects of what is going to be in the budget. He may be in some trouble with his colleagues for that, but that is quite another story.

At least his candour can be complimented. I found what he had to say to be very informative as to what will be in the budget. It contradicts what he was saying earlier about the need for more restraint and the big bugaboo was the deficit. He spent much of his time on that, but when he let his hair down he talked about how this government has some plans to do some spending when the time is politically ripe. I am interested in hearing more from him on that issue.

Yes, today is Valentine's Day, February 14, a day when we turn our thoughts to particular subjects but, irony of ironies, it is also the day that this country is being pummelled as never before.

I am sure you have heard about the lay-offs of hundreds of people in the forestry industry in the Alberni Valley on Vancouver Island by MacMillan Bloedel today. I am sure you have heard of the closing of a Sears catalogue office in Halifax today.

I particularly want to flag the two items that we have mentioned already today, one being the Hibernia situation with its drastic employment impact and the giving of notice to 1,000 workers, and the other being 850 plant workers and 155 trawlermen in relation to the Catalina, Newfoundland plant operated by Fisheries Products International.

Just those four locations that I mentioned: Port Alberni in British Columbia, Halifax in Nova Scotia, Catalina in Newfoundland, and of course Hibernia at Bull Arm and other sites in Newfoundland, bring into sharp focus once again the difficulties that are being faced by the people of this country. People cannot even assume from one day to the next they have a job.

Some of the misery of today, and I am thinking particularly about Hibernia, has been inflicted because of a commercial decision. At least that is the immediate reason, but a good part of the misery being inflicted today can be traced directly to government policy.

Why is the forestry industry whether in British Columbia or in Newfoundland or elsewhere in trouble? It is because of the high dollar. You heard the double-talk from the hon. member for Ontario in succeeding mouthfuls. He talks about how he is pleased the dollar is coming down and how at the same time he supports everything the government does.

Well which is it? What this government has done is kept the dollar artificially high at the expense of thousands of jobs in the forestry industry, the mining industry, the fishing industry, indeed any industry in which we export the product. That is certainly the case for the three industries I have just mentioned, three industries that Newfoundland depends very heavily on: forestry, mining and fishing.

Take as a second example the loss today in Catalina, Newfoundland of 1,000 jobs. Why does FPI, the company concerned, find it necessary to give these notices? The answer is clear and it is in its press release. I believe it relates to quota reductions. What causes quota reductions? The massive foreign overfishing which this government almost invited in 1985 and has allowed to go on year after year ever since.

Only today, during Question Period, I was asking the Deputy Prime Minister if the time was not indeed right for this government to give notice to the offending nations that enough is enough and that we intend to unilaterally extend jurisdiction, marine maritime jurisdiction, to embrace the nose and tail of the Grand Banks.

• (1430)

The motion is all about the failure, the refusal of this government to take action.

Whenever you have different parties represented in a forum such as this, you will have different views about monetary policy, about any number of policies which will have an impact on job generation. Irrespective of our differing ideologies, where there ought to be no difference is in the need to do some common sense things.

What could be more common sense than putting an end to this flagrant overfishing I have mentioned? What could be more common sense than allowing the dollar to come down a bit so that our exports are more competitive.

Yes, we condemn the failure of this government. Its failure has been so blatant, so stubborn and so arrogant. Does it not care at all? Doesn't anyone who sits on that side of the House care at all about the misery that has been inflicted, about the lives that are being destroyed, about the university education that will never go forward, about the families that are breaking up, about the increased crime?

These are all manifestations which flow directly from these very, very difficult economic times created in large measure by this administration.

Yes, we condemn that and that is why I am so delighted to support this resolution.

[Translation]

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask my colleague if he claims that the government should implement measures that would have the effect of raising interest rates significantly. That is my first question.

Second, does he claim that government policy should destabilize the value of the Canadian currency and fuel inflation? Would he be in favour of a return to an inflationary policy, a policy of high interest rates?

If so, what does he have to say about economic forecasts such as those of the Toronto-Dominion Bank, for instance? In its latest bulletin for winter 1992 that bank predicts increases compared to 1991 when investments in Canada decreased by 28 per cent. For 1992 and 1993 the Toronto-Dominion Bank expects investments to increase by 20.7 per cent and 29.6 per cent.

I dare say that this reflects a policy of controlling inflation and keeping interest rates low. How can these rates remain low and how could inflation be kept under control if we advocated, like the member's leader, a repeat of the mistakes of the Liberal Party in 1981, namely major public projects or the use of money in registered retirement savings plans?

His colleague said that these monies would simply be transferred. That colleague does not at all understand what is involved. If a person with money in a pension fund actually withdraws that money and uses it for another purpose, the fund has to take that money from somewhere. If the Liberals claim that we should print money, that will fuel inflation and we will again experience the problems of 1981.

How does the member reconcile all this, and what is his opinion on interest rates and the value of the Canadian dollar?

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I would like to start by thanking my colleague from Lévis for his questions. I hope to be able to properly answer his questions in French at some point in the future, but for now I choose to answer him in English.

[English]

I would like very much to be able to respond at more length to my colleague in French, but I am sure he would be more interested in the substance of my response than the semantics of it. I will stick to the language that I botch somewhat less completely than I do French.

The hon. member raises a number of interesting questions. On the question of inflation, of course dealing with inflation has been important and I think the government has done a good job of keeping that under control. The answer is no, nobody on this side wants to jeopardize that situation.

We have to keep in mind that one is well under control. It is not the only objective. Any government must have a balance, a smorgasbord of objectives. This is one of them and it has done a reasonably good job of dealing with that one. It cannot hang its hat on that one alone. It has to move on and address some of the misery that is out there.

The member for Lévis talks about destabilizing the dollar. No, the dollar is quite stable. Indeed the only tampering with it has been in the opposite direction to keep it artificially high. Our position is that if the government left the dollar alone it would become very stable, a bit lower and even more stable. The only tampering with it, as I say, has been in the opposite direction to keep it artificially high.

If he is going to quote economists from Toronto—why anybody from a sensible province like Quebec or Newfoundland would want to quote anybody from Toronto, I do not know—I will indulge him if he will indulge me. Somebody else from Toronto, a good economist, said the other day that the appreciation of the Canadian dollar over the last four years "is having a damaging effect on the economy".

No, we are not wanting to destabilize. We are wanting to make the dollar even more stable and we can do that by bringing it down.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Atkinson): The time for questions and comments is now terminated.

Mr. Nunziata: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the House might indulge the hon. member for Algoma. He has a quick question to ask of my colleague from Newfoundland.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Atkinson): I would like to express to the hon. member for York South—Weston that it was agreed that there would be two speakers from the Liberal side, 10-minute debate and a five-minute question and answer period. The five-minute question and answer period following this member's speech has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. André Plourde (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of International Trade): Mr. Speaker, this motion and this debate provide me with an opportunity as a former industrialist to think aloud, to share my views and even to speak my mind.

As legislators it is important that we take the time to meet and exchange ideas, to get to the heart of the major challenges facing the nation instead of merely skimming over them, to seek the cause of the problem instead of just focusing on the symptoms, to take a good hard look at some of the major forces which are now shaping our national and international agendas, forces that challenge each of us in our respective fields but which are necessary if we are to be efficient or even survive.

How much stronger our nation would be if such an opportunity for change came our way more regularly, in all regions of our country and in all walks of life. Yet, it seems that we have fewer opportunities for substantive dialogue. What is really paradoxical is that at the same time the vagaries of our times call for even more discussion and debate. This creates a stronger need for public consensus as a basis for achieving our goals.

You are all well aware of the financial, constitutional, environmental, international and social issues which we all are currently interested in. I would like to share with you, Madam Speaker, and with the members of this House my own feeling on one or two truly fundamental issues, issues that have received little or no attention in our daily lives or in the media but yet set the tone to all the others.

• (1440)

Two closely related forces are sweeping the planet: the emergence of a global economy and the coming of the information age.

Whatever labels one uses, the fact is that the age we are now in is very different from the one that the two generations before us knew. The industrial age is over; the knowledge age is here. National borders are blurred as global systems dominated by world-wide corporations and three huge trading alliances emerge. A new world order is taking shape. The market economy is winning the whole world.

Those who refuse to admit it and remain attached to old ways are left behind. In politics and the huge government bureaucracy, pressures for change are enormous but change is slow in coming.

Instant access to information and universal education have dramatically increased the power of individuals. Now individuals want to have a say in decision making. That in itself is a force for change.

Greater individual involvement tremendously enriches our society and our democracy, but the political process, which includes both the government and private institutions, must be thoroughly rethought to reflect the new autonomy of individuals and the new interest groups which are more powerful than ever, not only to involve them in decision making, Madam Speaker, but also because today it is time to recognize that individual behaviour, translated into daily action, is a greater determinant of what the nation is than are government decrees.

Individuals express themselves on all the markets of the land; they cause things to happen. We must therefore take another look if we want the political process to work well. In doing so, we must also reform institutions and think of new mechanisms. We must manage more efficiently, privatize, and deal with those who cannot deal with the changes.

As a government, we must be more concerned with developing co-operation and consensus on a wide scale. We must encourage attitudes and behaviours in that direction. A new fundamental reality has appeared with the information age and the global economy and it has a direct effect on our society. This perception of the new reality has been one of the key points of the government's agenda since 1984. This agenda has been consistently pursued, although there have been some mistakes along the way, I agree. We have pursued this agenda despite massive constraints of all kinds, not the least of which is certainly the ideological heritage of Liberalism that has continued to haunt us, a heritage that continues to mislead too many Canadians.

After decades of watching a titanic government spend massively, a government guided by a vision of society and the public service that belongs to a bygone era, the federal government's strategy for economic renewal is in striking contrast. It clearly shows the coherent vision of a national economy that does not have to suffer government interference and where individual initiative and entrepreneurship take on their full importance.

By reducing the public debt, by slashing wasteful spending and inefficient programs, by reforming the tax system and extending trade opportunities, and by consolidating international markets, the prosperity initiative which the Minister for International Trade and the Minister of Employment and Immigration launched last October is another major step in this series of coherent initiatives.

Canada, as you know, faces a serious competitive threat. We are lagging behind our main international competitors, especially in terms of productivity and knowledge acquisition. We are proposing a serious attempt to inform Canadians about a whole complex of issues. We have created consultation procedures to take the public debate further and to encourage consensus.

First, it is innovative and that is somewhat risky. Second, we have involved the private sector in it. Third, a solid base has been established for developing a national action plan this year. This plan will include not only all governments but also all interest groups in Canadian society, and here I include all members of this House. This initiative is a perfect example of a government that understands the new realities of our time.

This process is bound to succeed if you, together with other leaders in Canadian society, recognize that you must take part, if you encourage all the other partners in our society to commit themselves fully, and if everyone together determines the process. What will happen? In this day and age governments can no longer act alone. Your actions and your commitment will determine whether our nation succeeds or fails to meet this important challenge of competition.

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Madam Speaker, I listened to the speech made by my colleague who talked about the new world order in which we live. It must be said, to the credit of those who preceded us, that the eighties are very different from the sixties and the seventies. It is for that reason that some changes must be made in the economy and that we must avoid repeating the mistakes made in the sixties and seventies. I believe that the member explained very well why we must adapt to this new world order.

The member also talked about the privatization process implemented by our government. I would like to tell him about this privatization exercise, using the case de Havilland and Canadair, two former public companies that had run through almost $3 billion. Since it is a company from my colleague's constituency that took control of Canadair and de Havilland, I would like him to tell us exactly what he witnessed in his own riding in terms of achievements by this private company which acquired public corporations that were previously in deficit. It is important that the population knows what good private entrepreneurs can do, as opposed to bureaucrats.

Mr. Plourde: Madam Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague from Lévis who underlines the importance of Bombardier in Quebec. As member for Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, I have the privilege to have that company in my riding, namely in La Pocatière. I remember when I first came to this House in 1984 and when our Prime Minister talked about privatizing some Crown corporations, the first ones mentioned were Canadair in Montreal and de Havilland. Madam Speaker, you will recall that we had a very lively debate in this House because the opposition was absolutely opposed to the government's idea of selling Canadair and de Havilland to private interests.

However, we knew very well that if a successful Canadian and Quebec company of Bombardier's magnitude wanted to acquire Canadair, it would turn it into a profitable private venture, and we would no longer have to put up with the deficits that we had with Canadair and de Havilland. Indeed, in one year the federal government had to absorb a $1 billion deficit.

We are now in 1992, and who saved de Havilland in Toronto, Ontario? I admit that there are many lay-offs there right now. But it was Bombardier, a company from Quebec and Canada. Who saved UTDC in Toronto which belonged to the Government of Ontario and was later bought back by Lavalin? It was Bombardier, a company from Quebec and Canada. Who saved Canadair in Montreal? Again it was Bombardier, a company from Quebec and Canada.

Today we realize one thing: The three corporations that were privatized are now making profits and are creating jobs.

I thank the member for Lévis who brought this issue to my attention. I am very proud of Bombardier and its input in Canada's economy.

[English]

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, two points came to mind as the hon. member for Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup was speaking. He comes from a resource area and I likewise come from the resource area of northern Ontario. We have had massive lay-offs in both the uranium mining industry in Elliot Lake where we have lost some 2,500 of 4,000 jobs in the last couple of years and we will be losing another 1,000 this year when Denison Mines shuts down.

One of the problems we are running into in regard to training, and I have spoken to the minister about this, is the problem with the training allowance under Bill C–22. There is provision for up to three years of training, but unfortunately it is a highly segmented, regimented system.

What we really need is more flexibility so that a person starting, whether it is at the late high school level or early high school or even in literacy training, would be able to start at whatever level their proficiency was at and then move through for four years of training on to skills training and technical training. That is the one point that came to my mind and I think it is urgent.

The second point is that the government really needs to take some immediate action now to stimulate the economy. The leader of my party proposed that we have an infrastructure program where a billion dollars would be set aside by the federal government which would be matched equally by the provinces and municipalities. That way we would get things moving out of this recession. I think that is important.

The other matter that needs to be looked at is co–operation between the federal and provincial governments. Mr. Bob Rae was on the television a few weeks ago and outlined what a disastrous situation the Ontario economy was in, but he did not give much prescription. The one thing that he did propose was that his government would be willing to match dollar for dollar any initiatives by the federal government.

I have proposed to the premier that the federal government has offered to provide up to $30 million for Elliot Lake to build a francophone community college in that community. I am challenging him to come forward with the provincial share of that funding so that that project can go forward.

It is hard to believe but the premier seems to be trying to establish some board of governors to put the decision at arm's length. Whereas he is the premier and his cabinet is responsible for education, they should make a decision and establish a community college for francophones in Elliot Lake. It has broad support throughout northern Ontario. The federal government has provided its support. Even Ontario Hydro has offered through a special economic diversification fund to provide another $10 million.

What is required is for the province to take its responsibility, not try to fob it off as to location to a board of governors, and move on. This project would provide some 500 direct jobs, another 500 indirect jobs and some several thousand students for that community which is desperate for jobs and for diversification because of the massive lay–offs which we suffered during the last two or three years.

I am sure those three or four points are very much in line with those of my hon. colleague across the way. It is essential, as we work our way through this recession, to find tools and take action to overcome the tremendous economic downturn that we face, the loss of jobs and the unemployment that so many thousands of Canadians face today.

[Translation]

Mr. Plourde: Madam Speaker, first of all, I would like to thank the hon. member for Algoma. When he referred to Ontario Premier Bob Rae, this took me back to the First Ministers' Conference held last Monday. In fact I have nothing but praise for the Premier. He said at the conference that we should set politics aside and forget about being Conservatives, Liberals, New Democrats or whatever, and work together to develop Canada's economy.

That is what I as the member for Kamouraska—Rivière–du–Loup have been saying for the past eight years in my region and my riding. Politics does not do a thing for the economy. When opposition members in this House and in the provincial legislatures realize that politics is no way to help the economy, I guarantee we will create jobs. When we talk about programs, a government's program is like any other product. It has to be sold. I have been in the private sector for 28 years, and I know what I am talking about.

Earlier I referred to Bombardier in La Pocatière. I held a press conference in November 1991 to announce a subsidy for Bombardier, but only the regional press showed up. We announced that 800 new jobs would be created in La Pocatière over the next nine months. It was not mentioned in the national media or on CBC television because it was good news. They only want to announce bad news. When we realize that we have to start talking about the positive things that are happening, it will be a big relief to realize that the federal government iscreating new jobs.

[English]

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the member of the Liberal Party who moved this motion which calls on the House to condemn the government for its failure to take action to stop unemployment and to create additional employment in this country.

I was looking at an article recently in The Ottawa Citizen in which Judith Maxwell, a well-known Canadian economist, was trying to determine what were the reasons for the poor economic performance in Canada. She said: "Higher inflation and failure to invest in new technology are major reasons for the higher production costs in Canada, not social programs and wages".

It seems that the government has taken its focus at two issues, social programs and wages, so it is really missing the point of the problem, which is one of the reasons we are seeing such tremendous job loss in this country and why the government refuses to take effective action to increase employment in Canada.

In the same article Maxwell also blasted what she called the "very weak training effort by Canadian business compared with that by industry in the U.S., Japan, and Germany". I think that criticism can be directed not simply at business but also at governments in Canada, and in particular this government, because training is the key to a successful economy in the future and to successful participation in the future economy by those who need the training.

As you might know, Madam Speaker, one of the previous participants in this debate mentioned the announcement of a shutdown in Port Alberni within the last few days of two logging operations employing something like 340 men and 60 contractors. Over 400 people have lost their jobs in those two particular logging operations in my riding. As a person who comes from a community of 19,000 people that is largely dependent on the forest industry I can say that, in conjunction with a number of other lay-offs and permanent shutdowns that have taken place over the last several months and years, is causing tremendous economic problems.

I am not going to say that it is a dying community because Port Alberni where I come from has tremendous resilience. It has always been able to pull together and push back. It has been around for a long time. It has thrived for a long time. It has done well for a long time. Many times it showed the highest average income levels based on tax statistics of any community in the country, and it is going to do that again.

At this particular time things are looking pretty grim in Port Alberni. Between 1982 and 1984 we have seen 2,500 people lose their jobs in the logging industry at a time when there was no loss to the forest land base due to the environment or withdrawals from the working forest. It was simply an increase in speed of production, mechanization, changes in markets and that kind of thing. As a result those 2,500 people lost their jobs permanently in the forestry industry.

Just recently in that community we have seen a plywood mill shut down with the loss of roughly 300 and some jobs. We have seen a sawmill shut down, with another 150 to 200 jobs lost. We have seen processes within the pulp and paper mill in Port Alberni shut down. Again we are looking at something like 500 jobs possibly being removed from that plant and probably removed permanently. It is a community that is definitely suffering.

It is interesting, at the same time as the community is suffering, as those jobs have been lost and as MacMillan Bloedel, the major employer in the community, is declaring tremendous losses in its operations over the last year, that company has declared a 15 per cent dividend to its shareholders within the last week. Those shareholders are reaping the benefits that they do not deserve because that company is losing money. What is happening is that the shareholders are taking their dividends from the declining capital of that corporation. That is unfair to the community of Port Alberni. That is unfair to the workers in Port Alberni who are actually losing their jobs to pay those dividends to shareholders who have not done a lick of work, as far as I am concerned, in the forest industry.

In addition, MacMillan Bloedel has been investing in the United States. It recently invested in a $300 million oriented strand board plant down in Deerfield, Wisconsin. This was made more feasible as a result of the changes that were brought about by the free trade agreement.

Recently the parallam process, a process for developing laminated beams that almost have the strength of steel and can be used as a substitute for steel beams, was developed in Canada by Canadian scientists. It has now been sent for manufacture down to the United States with partners in the United States. Again another $300 million investment. I suspect, in the last two or three years since the free trade agreement has allowed it that leeway, the company has now invested about $1 billion in the United States while it is shutting down its investments in British Columbia and putting workers out the door who have committed their lives, their skills and their talents to that company in Canada.

It is unfortunate we do not have companies operating in this country that have a sense of duty, responsibility, nationalism and patriotism for this country and a sense of responsibility for the workers.

Judith Maxwell was talking about the investment in training. A study was recently done by the Council of Forest Industries in British Columbia and by the International Woodworkers of America (Canada), the major union operating in the forest industry in that area, of 227 sawmill workers in a number of sawmills in British Columbia. The results of the study were as follows.

They found that 56 per cent of the workers had difficulty understanding training manuals at the grade 4 level. I am talking about the grade 4 level. Only 26 per cent of those sawmill workers were able to understand technical material relating to the operation of their equipment and to safety processes. Only 26 per cent was able to understand technical documents at the grade 12 level.

The fact is that when those people lose their jobs and they are literate at only the grade 4 level, we are talking about people who are unable to get jobs in the future. They simply do not have the skills, the education and the ability to get jobs in the future. Many of them, because they were trained on the machines they operated over the years, understood those machines very well. They understood the technical problems, the safety problems and were able to operate on those machines.

In fact, they were some of the best skilled workers in the world with respect to those machines. Once the machines became obsolete, the worker became obsolete as well. As Judith Maxwell said: "This is a country where companies expend very little". In fact, we are the lowest in the world in terms of the amount we invest in on-the-job education for our workers. As a result, we end up de-skilling those workers to the point where they end up not being suitable for employment in the future.

I was looking at an article just a few seconds ago from the National Anti-Poverty Association which talks about what the future hopes of those workers are, should they become unemployed, since they are literate at a very low level.

Let me quote from that document: "The National Anti-Poverty Organization, for example, estimates that low literate adults are twice as likely to be unemployed and many times more likely to need social assistance than other Canadians. Even if employed, such low literate Canadians earn only two-thirds of the average income of others".

Illiteracy is a tremendous impediment for Canadians to get jobs. In fact, the federal government, through the Department of the Secretary of State, has been warning Canadians that something like 38 per cent of all Canadians have difficulty reading material that they find on a day-to-day basis, whether newspapers, bus schedules, airline schedules or Hansard. All of these kind of things they have difficulty reading and understanding. The government has estimated that costs the people of Canada, the economy of Canada, something like $10 billion a year.

When we think of $10 billion a year and compare that to the deficit that this country is facing, we are talking about one-third of the national deficit that could possibly be attributed to the problem of literacy in this country.

We always look at Canada as a developed country. It is one of the leading countries in the world in terms of education. Yet, under this government, the educational level in Canada is actually going down and the illiteracy rate is actually going up. There is a sign here that we should be reading as parliamentarians and as members of government that we are doing the wrong thing with respect to training our work force.

Those sawmill workers, because of their low literacy levels, are not going to have the opportunity to get a job in the future. If that is the problem with those workers, it is certainly a problem with Canada. We should be spending a lot more time looking at the problem of education and how we can deliver education to our workers.

It seems strange that other countries do not have this problem, at least to the same rate that Canada does. I am thinking in particular of the nation of Sweden. I was recently looking at an Australian magazine called The Bulletin in which they were talking about the education systems in the various countries around the world.

It talks about the Swedish system which concentrates heavily on adult education and also on making education available to supplement their labour market strategy. It talks about leaving work in order to get involved in an education program in Sweden. They give an example of a millworker who left his job and went into an adult education program at the age of 52.

In Canada, we consider a 52-year old worker who loses his job to be no longer trainable. Yet, here is an example of a Swede who left his job at the age of 52 and went into a training program. The Government of Sweden pays him $12,600 for 28 weeks of training and $400 a week as a wage supplement while he is on that training program.

It has been estimated in Sweden that of those people who take those kinds of training programs, 70 per cent of them who leave at the conclusion of the program have a job within the space of six months. We do not have anything like that here in Canada; nothing like that in the province where I come from and nothing like that is offered by Employment and Immigration Canada.

I received this document in the mail from Employment and Immigration Canada. It cost $1.5 million to mail this document to every household in the country. It does absolutely nothing to improve the educational quality of the work force in Canada. In fact, it is virtually a waste of government money, but I think it is the only thing that the Minister of Employment and Immigration can really say that he has done in the last little while. Tens of thousands of Canadians are losing their jobs. Whenever they go to him either through his unemployment insurance or through his training programs, there is almost nothing that can be done.

It is interesting that Sweden spends most of its unemployment money on the educational or training part of it and only a very, very small per cent on income supplement. In fact, to quote the article from the Australian magazine I was referring to, it says:

> The country stints on cash benefits for the unemployed, doling out just .84 per cent of GNP for that purpose, but what they do is they pay people to go to training programs so that when they come out of those training programs, they will have the intelligence and the skills and the understanding to get into a job.

As I pointed out, it is usually within the space of six months that people who have taken those training programs end up re-employed in a permanent job.

There are other things that this government seems to neglect to do that could assist getting people into employment again or getting people into employment. I want to quote a document that was brought by Dr. Harris Jane from McMaster University to the special committee of the House on employment equity about the cost of discrimination, how that cost affects industry in Canada and the United States and how that costs society as a whole. Dr. Jane quoted a study, an economic report of the president in the U.S. on discrimination against blacks, Puerto Ricans, Spanish Americans, Indians and others, which shows that it can cost the U.S. economy a loss of up to $20 billion per year.

He also pointed out another author who indicated discrimination in the work place has decreased national income in that country by as much as 1.41 per cent or $9 billion annually.

We are now in the process of revising the employment equity legislation. We know what the tremendous cost is to people in this country when you discriminate against people based on colour of skin, the fact that they are a member of a visible minority, are aboriginal, are women, or are disabled. Those people in many cases have skills that are far higher than those who are actually hired to do the job. If we brought those people into the work force, they would be contributing far more, be far more productive and make our industries far more competitive.

We were told by Dr. Jane at that meeting that when President Reagan for ideological reasons offered to get rid of employment equity in the United States, those companies that had adopted employment equity policies which knew the advantage to their company and knew the advantage to the economy, insisted that President Reagan leave the program intact because it was helping America to be competitive and it was helping their industries to be competitive.

There are many things that we should be looking at in this country, examining our management practices, examining the way our industries are structured, examining how we handle social programs to make sure that we are getting the maximum benefit that we can possibly get. It is only when we improve those management practices, improve our industry, make sure investment is taking place, both by the people who are involved in industries as well as in the machinery and equipment they use, that we are going to get the most competitive economy we can possibly have.

The one thing we cannot do is constantly attack those social programs that the government seems to want to focus on. Things like medicare and transfer payments to the provinces which are used in education and social services are actually going to decrease productivity of our industry and of our work force and decrease the competitiveness of this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Madam Speaker, I listened with interest to the hon. member's speech, and like the hon. member I am aware of the difficult situation in the forestry sector in this country, especially in his province.

As you know, the forestry sector ranks among the five largest exporters in Canada and is responsible for a significant share of the $175 billion that we export. I think these industries are having trouble maintaining, let alone increasing their sales, as a result of increasing production prices and also because of certain environmental constraints as a result of legislation in a country that is our main customer, the United States.

The hon. member also mentioned the fact that equipment in the various plants was outdated. I would like to ask a few technical questions. He referred to programs for retraining manpower and upgrading employee skills. I agree, and I think my government's departments have already provided special programs to help the employees of these various companies.

However, when he talks about updating facilities, does he think keeping interest rates low is relevant and is this a policy our government should maintain? I think that when companies decide to buy, the cost of borrowing is an important factor. That is why in recent years, investment has gone down significantly in manufacturing. Now that interest rates are low, experts predict there will be a lot of new investment in 1992 and 1993.

I would like the hon. member to qualify his low interest rate policy, considering the need for companies to reinvest and to increase their technical capacity.

I would also like to ask him, considering that buying new equipment will create pressure on interest rates, how he would reconcile this with simultaneous pressure created by major highway and sewer projects favoured by his colleagues in the Ontario government and possibly by other provincial governments, and also by opposition members here in the House today. If there is too much pressure on demand, I think interest rates will go up, and this would make it more difficult to update the plants that provide work in his region.

[English]

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I thank the member for his question. He talked a little about interest rates. I remind him that interest rates in Canada are really not much of a factor to multinational forest companies such as MacMillan Bloedel, the one I was referring to that operates in my constituency.

MacMillan Bloedel shows in its annual report that a great deal of its borrowings come from Japan where interest rates, especially over the past several years, have been far lower than they are here in Canada. They have also borrowed substantially in the United States. In Japan they were borrowing at rates that were 2 to 3 per cent. The United States rates were around 5 to 6 per cent at a time when rates in Canada were around 12 to 13 per cent. In the old days you could say that when the governments were borrowing money for infrastructure programs and borrowing money from a limited domestic market or a North American market, there was a chance they could drive up the cost of money by taking a substantial amount of what was available in capital markets. Now the world is a capital market. You told us that we must understand that we are dealing with a global world. Now you must understand that we are dealing with a global world in terms of capital markets as well. A company like MacMillan Bloedel can borrow in Japan at 2 and 3 per cent and it can borrow in the U.S. at 5 and 6 per cent at the same time as money can be borrowed at 7, 8 and 9 per cent in Canada. Those companies do not recognize international boundaries in terms of capital markets.

Therefore, I do not think the fact that Canada's interest rates have come down has really been of much assistance to those companies. They have access to capital markets at lower rates elsewhere.

The problem with investing in Canada is that when these companies examine where to invest it is possible for them to ship natural resources in an unprocessed state to areas in the southeastern United States, across the border into the United States, which are closer to the market. There are lower labour costs there because of anti-union legislation such as right-to-work legislation in those states. That is what is driving investment out of Canada and into the United States.

The free trade agreement the government has developed for Canada has given companies far more freedom to take their investment across the border and put Canadian people out of work. That is one of the primary problems we are dealing with.

I hope I have dealt with most of the member's questions.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, I was interested in the speech by the hon. member for Comox—Alberni because he is a member of the New Democratic Party. We in Ontario are faced with the problems created by the New Democratic government of Mr. Bob Rae.

We certainly were pleased to see his proposal in his fireside chat, that he was willing to contribute dollar for dollar to projects put forward by the federal government with the co-operation of both levels of government. As soon as I heard his speech I immediately wrote Mr. Rae a letter to point out that the federal government had proposed to provide some $30 million for a new community college in Elliot Lake, Ontario, a community which has suffered the most massive unemployment of any community in northern Ontario, over 50 per cent and perhaps as high as 60 per cent.

I suggested to Mr. Rae that it would be really great if he would support that project from his side. Indeed the arguments were made to his party leader a couple of weeks ago when she visited Elliot Lake. I would hope that the hon. member would be able to support her view that the Ontario government should not procrastinate any longer, should make a decision to go ahead with that community college and should provide its share of the funding.

It not only has the responsibility to provide half of the funding along with the federal government but the responsibility to choose the location. However, it seems that the Government of Ontario has decided to establish a board of governors for the francophone community colleges for the whole of Ontario with the idea of letting the board choose the site.

It seems to me that the Government of Ontario has the responsibility to choose that site itself, and clearly Elliot Lake is the choice. The federal government is on board. Ontario Hydro has provided some $10 million through its working group. I would hope that the NDP Government of Ontario would not procrastinate and would make a decision to go ahead. That project would provide a lot of jobs. It would provide a student population in the community of some 2,000. It would be a great project for that community which has over 50 per cent unemployment right now.

I hope the hon. member will convey that message to the provincial premier.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, of course I would not want to prevent the establishment of a worth-while project in Ontario. I am sure the member would not either.

The Government of Ontario has to operate through its legislation and procedures in the same way that every other government does. If he wants to change those procedures, I would suggest that perhaps the hon. member might run for office in the province of Ontario and hope he is more successful than his party was last time. If there is a proposal to improve the economy of Elliot Lake I will certainly get in touch with the Government of Ontario and lend my assistance to it.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Madam Speaker, I have read the motion tabled by my colleague from Toronto requesting that this House condemn the government for its refusal to take action to alleviate the intolerably high levels of unemployment in Canada. In October a 120-page report from a Harvard professor, Mr. Michael Porter, was published by request from the government and the Busines Council on National Issues. I received a translation of that report and read it. It was very interesting. I also received from the Montreal office of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association a report it had prepared. It was sent by the president of the Quebec chapter.

These two documents contain valuable information and are quite similar even though the one from The manufacturers' association was prepared at least a year before that of Professor Porter from the United States. I would like to present some of the main points.

It is evident that the current problems of Canadian manufacturers which resulted in job loss are due to the high cost of the Canadian dollar. Everybody knows that, it has been said often enough.

Also mentioned in the reports are the interest rates which are much too high as compared to those of the United States. Sometimes the margin in Canada is 5.5 per cent higher than that of the United States. You can easily imagine how difficult it is for our small businesses to borrow at such high interest rates. Consequently there was a decline in the manufacturing sector which resulted in lost jobs. But we must not forget that perhaps the most important factor was the so-called free trade agreement. That agreement with the United States certainly had an effect. I do not need to elaborate. The news were far from encouraging when week after week we saw a great number of Canadian and Quebecer manufacturers that could not compete with American companies, and we know why when we look at the Canadian system.

We the Canadian people decided over the years to protect ourselves collectively with programs such as health care and old age pensions. I would like to note I am always surprised when I ask people whether they know that old age pensions do not exist in the United States like in Canada. Most people seem surprised when I tell them that.

In Canada, we have put in place a pioneering system of social security for all the people. We are really a privileged people that the world envies. The free trade agreement cost us many jobs. We saw the results of that. To my great surprise, during 1988 until the end of the election, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association insisted that the deal was absolutely essential. It was its point of view just before the 1988 election and for some time after that. To my great surprise, in December 1991 the Canadian Manufacturers' Association decided to release a study. What did it say in its report? Simply that the free trade agreement was premature. Imagine, three years later it made up its mind. I told the Quebec president: "I am surprised to see that strong supporters of the deal as you were three years ago now realize that there were problems."

For three years they talked about a high dollar and high interest rates. Now they realize that the agreement was premature. He is saying today that we should have waited at least five years before signing that agreement. In other words, we should have stated our intention of entering into a free trade agreement, but we should have provided for a transition period which would have allowed us to adjust gradually, because a lot of adjustment was required. This was not done. We now see the results. This transition period of at least five years was necessary.

Second, what I find strange about the manufacturers association is when it says that the federal government should have known the Americans would be no less aggressive after the signing of the agreement. Imagine that. We kept repeating at the time of the signing of the agreement that the American government was not going to do anyone any favour. Why should it after the signing? We now see the kind of argument we get into with the Americans.

Finally, the manufacturers' association proposed a series of measures. Naturally it is still talking about an overvalued Canadian dollar and high interest rates. It says that our monetary and fiscal policies contribute to a reduction of personal savings, which leaves less money available for small and medium businesses. It also says that we need initiatives to improve training and development. This is obvious.

Needless to say, the Japanese and the Germans are admired for their remarkable levels of education, especially when it comes to trades training. It is all over the news; you have probably read the same pieces I have. I wonder, why not copy them to a point? In the United States, they are facing the same problems as we are, but if we look to the East we can see what Germany and Japan are doing. In Japan at the present time 96 per cent of all its students graduate from high school. They all have basic knowledge or skills in mathematics, not super university degrees but at least basic skills required to deal with modern technology as it exists in the world today, and it is evolving fast. But here in America—because Canada and in the United States are in the same boat, a fine mess I dare say—only 70 per cent of our young people complete high school.

What is worse is that barely one per cent has the basic mathematical skills required to keep a job in high technology manufacturing industries. I repeat I am not talking about scholarly degrees in calculus or anything like that. I am only talking about the basic mathematical skills required to work in high technology industries. That gives you an idea. It was our doing. We have something to learn, not only from the Japanese and the Germans, but also from the Swedes and the Finns. In Finland in particular, and it has always amazed me, 20 years ago, its government told the pulp and paper industry: "Gentlemen, we have a new policy. From now on there will be no tree cutting unless you are at the leading edge of the pulp and paper technology". As you know, the Finns innovate a lot; they have equipment plants for the pulp and paper industry. But here, in Canada, even when we were the world's biggest pulp and paper producer per capita, we had no secondary industry producing equipment for the pulp and paper companies.

Unfortunately I do not have enough time to address this whole issue.

In conclusion, since the schools do not provide the necessary advanced training, I think the time has come for some kind of national service. Yes, a national service that has nothing to do with the military service. For at least two years, the young would attend classes and learn a craft or get some technical training, which is a must today in the high technology industry in Canada.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Madam Speaker, I would like to start by thanking the hon. member for his speech. Could he perhaps explain his reference to a national service?

[English]

I am very much interested in his comments about a national service. Perhaps my friend and colleague can elaborate a little more on this concept.

[Translation]

Mr. Assad: Madam Speaker, this is not something I thought up, but I have been hearing more and more about this concept. People have been talking about it for years, and I remember I discussed it with colleagues in Quebec City, in the National Assembly, when we were astounded by the fact that at the present time 500,000 jobs are not filled because people do not have the technical skills, and I mean basic skills. I am not talking about university degrees.

There are 500,000 jobs that are not filled because we have not been able to train our young people through apprenticeship training and technical or trade schools. The national service concept is a very simple one. I do not know all the details, but I think we can skip those for the time being. The fact is young adults, as you know, have to go to school until they are 16. So starting at 16, 17, 18, 19 and up to 25 or 26, if they leave school and do not finish high school, of course they have no trade and so they are unemployed. Obviously they have no future.

My point is that we could do what they do in Germany, Sweden and Japan, and establish a national service, in co-operation with industry. Here in Canada, with the help of industry, we could train these young adults. They would have some discipline and a bit of order in their lives. It is not their fault but the important thing is they would have at least two years to learn a trade or some kind of technical skills in the industry. Industries know their own needs. There are 500,000 jobs waiting. They know their needs, and we could train these people. Training in those fields could be extraordinary.

Do you realize how helpful it would be for those young adults to to learn a trade or some basic technical knowledge for various industries? We could solve many problems in this way. Great challenges await Canada now. But if you want to face up great challenges, you must take big steps.

I say that a national service might be the answer for our young adults, because in the last few years we have almost had a lost generation in Canada. Our young people are not to blame. They did not get the required basic knowledge in school. We failed in that regard and we must recognize it.

But the time has come for important initiatives and I say that a national service, organized jointly with the industry, could be a giant step that would enable our young generation to fill existing jobs. It would also give them hope as well as a chance to contribute to Canada, to the welfare of all Canadians and, more important, to their own personal benefits, happiness and personal satisfaction.

[English]

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, the motion is that the House condemns the government for its refusal to take action to alleviate the intolerably high levels of unemployment in Canada.

This morning I asked the minister some questions about the level of unemployment in Canada and, as you heard, our rate is now among the highest in the OECD and G–7 countries. In looking at The Economist magazine for this week, the only countries with a worse unemployment rate than ours appear to be Australia, Italy and Spain.

• (1540)

It is a lot more than simple statistics which are not very meaningful to people. It is young people, students, older people, people 45 years of age who get lay–off notices. It is thousands of careers, families, children and grandparents and an awful lot of human beings. I am sure there are many people in your constituency as well, Madam Speaker, who are going around trying to find a job that does not seem to be there.

There are about 1.4 million Canadians looking for work today. If you consider the people who have stopped looking or who have stepped out of the work place, the number is considerably higher.

The Canadian Labour Market and Productivity Centre reported that Canada's unemployment rate would be almost 14 per cent if we included discouraged workers, those on temporary lay–offs, and took into account underemployment among those forced to work part time because of the shortage of full–time jobs.

Our employment rate is at one of the highest levels among the advanced industrial democracies. Among other things, the government has cut the Canadian Jobs Strategy by $100 million and raised the unemployment premiums for those with jobs and employers by 24 per cent. Reference was made this morning to a document from the employment and manpower department which mentioned how the government was going to make the $100 million in cuts in the budget and how the cuts would be allocated to particular regions.

A press released dated February 11 states: "Documents from CEIC reveal that the federal government is in the process of dismantling existing training programs across the country. At a time when the country is facing its worst economic crisis since the 1930s, the federal government proposes to respond to unemployment by slashing training dollars".

There is probably still more bad news to come. The government's own forecasts call for double digit unemployment late into 1992. A strong case can also be made that the government actually used prolonged high interest rates. I certainly concede that interest rates are very low now. In fact, our rates are among the lowest of the figures cited in The Economist this week. But they were too high for too long and it is a classic case of waiting until the horse is out of the barn before you close the door. Interest rates should have been lowered many months ago if we wanted to kick start the economy. Unfortunately it is going to take many months to have any positive results from our lower interest rates.

As I said, the case can be made that the government induced this recession in large measure with its high interest rates and high dollar to bring on a recession to lower the inflation rate in places like metropolitan Toronto. Of course, metropolitan Toronto and southern Ontario have been hit as hard as any region by the made-in-Canada recession.

The Bank of Canada has lowered interest rates so much now that savings are in danger of leaving Canada, possibly causing a collapse in our dollar and renewed inflation. Low income Canadians are feeling additional pain because $411 million was cut from federal social housing programs.

According to the Canadian Association of Food Banks, the number of people receiving food assistance has risen 40 per cent over the last year. Our leader, the member for Beauséjour, is thus quite correct in calling for the redirection of $25 million from Ottawa's advertising budget to Canada's 1,300 food banks. Imagine, 1,300 food banks in this country.

Our provincial economic growth was weakened last year by poor markets—I am talking about Alberta now, forgive me—for oil and gas and by high dollar and interest rates that together choked our natural resource sectors.

The entire petroleum industry has been shrinking and restructuring in an attempt to survive. Staff cuts are likely to continue. Petro-Canada, for example, plans to close about 1,200 service stations across the country and that is likely to be only the first wave of another wave of cuts.

There were six years of relative prosperity. I give the government credit for some of that. I think there is no doubt that for a period its policies were working. I would remind members opposite that during those six years we had 34 separate tax increases and the deficit is still not far off the figure of 1984 when the government took office.

The federal debt, as most people know, is virtually out of control. The government has squandered the opportunities available through the mid to late 1980s to bring spending under control.

Sustained economic success for Canada can only be achieved by tough-minded fiscal and monetary policies such as those pursued by countries like West Germany since 1948. How are we going to kick-start an economy which is now in a recession?

Low interest rates and a lower dollar will probably require at least six months to generate significant new economic activity. In the meantime, our party, the Official Opposition, has proposed among other things, first, allowing first time home buyers to make down payments of 5 per cent for the purchase price of a CMHC approved mortgage instead of the current minimum of 10 per cent. I salute the government for accepting that proposal. We think and hope that it might create as many as 50,000 jobs in the home building industry and cost the taxpayer nothing.

Second, our party has proposed that first-time home buyers be permitted the use of $7,500 tax-free from their RRSPs.

Third, we proposed an immediate federal infusion of $1 billion with equal investments by provincial and municipal levels of governments to fix roads, sewers, bridges and other parts of Canada's aging municipal infrastructure.

Finally, we propose using $150 million for basic training for the unemployed, even to the point of not lowering the deficit by as much as planned next year.

Madam Speaker, you have been sitting there listening to one person after another get up and fulminate against the government. You are probably quite tired of listening to it all day. However, as you know from your constituents, there are an awful lot of our fellow citizens who do not need to be out of work. If we had a little flexibility, a little willingness, a little determination by the Minister of Finance and those around him, we could turn this recession around.

In closing, I urge the government to do some of the things we have suggested and what other people have suggested as quickly as it can for the good of the 27 million people who live in this country.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There will be a five-minute question and comment period.

Before I give the floor to the hon. member for Welland, I would like to ask the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast not to presume the reason why I may or may not be tired.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold: Madam Speaker, you are probably tired for the same reason all of us are. It is the end of the week and that is the only explanation for it.

I thank my colleague from Edmonton Southeast. I was in his riding about six months ago and I had occasion to talk about the conditions there at the time.

He mentioned in his speech today the fact, for example, that in Edmonton, his city, and also in my city of Welland, we have food banks. There are 1,300 food banks across the country.

One would think that in a country as rich as we are and, yes, as caring as we are—Canadians are caring people—that we as members of the House of Commons could somehow urge this government to see that surely one of the rights that Canadians should have is the right to at least have food.

I will talk about the employment situation. In the last week or so I visited the Port Weller dry docks in my riding and they went from a peak of 1,100 people at one time building ships for our country. They are now down to 250 people and they have work, they tell me, to carry them through only until the end of April.

They are hoping they will get one of our defence ships, the Protecteur, in there. I hope they do too. The fact is that most of the 250 people remaining are going to be unemployed until that time.

The hon. member also mentioned the car industry. We have over 10,000 workers in the Niagara peninsula who work not only for General Motors but for the parts industries. I think that as these people are affected, they affect not only their immediate communities but also the province and the whole nation.

We have unemployment of about 16 per cent. Some of the things that the hon. member has mentioned to us are common sense things. Surely the government will have a look and see that its right wing, Attila the Hun tactics are not the answers for what we are going through right now.

As one of the members on the other side has said, if we are in a "severe recession", I would think that what they are trying to do is push us into a depression. I would hope that they would listen to the common sense of the member who has just spoken.

One of the questions that I would like to ask the member, and he touched on it very briefly, is about the oil patch. In Edmonton and Calgary and in Alberta generally, we have most of the people who work in the oil industry and now we see this morning the cutbacks at Hibernia.

What incentives or what encouragement could the government give to these people who in some ways generate a great many jobs to not only produce better but to produce more efficiently? Then we as Canadians could all benefit from their expertise and their contribution to the country. I am talking about the people in the oil patch and the oil industry, and I know he is very familiar with that.

Mr. Kilgour: Madam Speaker, I have a neighbour who lives in southeast Edmonton who recently told me that he works one month off and one month on in the oil patch, but not the oil patch in Canada. He works in North Yemen. He gets on a plane at the beginning of every second month and flies to wherever you get off the plane for North Yemen and works there for one month, and then comes home to see his family in southeast Edmonton.

Why does he and others who do a similar thing, have to go to the Middle East to look for oil when, as the member may not know, we still have lots of oil and gas left to find in Alberta? I understand we have in Alberta, for example in the tar sands, twice as much oil as they have in all of the Middle East. Why are we not developing that secure quantity of product for this country and for this continent, for that matter?

I do not have any answers for him on that. I think the answer is that our expertise is needed in Canada and I would like to see more of it used in Canada to find oil and gas in Canada so that people like my neighbour do not have to leave his young family every second month to go off and live in a tent somewhere in North Yemen.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure to take part in the debate today.

Although we do not have a lot of time left, I just want to remind the listening public what we are debating. The motion was put forward by the member for York South—Weston. It reads:

> That this House condemn the government for its refusal to take action to alleviate the intolerably high levels of unemployment in Canada.

We do not disagree with the urgency of the matter of high unemployment. The debate, in the last few moments especially, has been very reflective and I also use the words instructive and possibly constructive.

It makes no difference on what side of this House you sit, if you are a compassionate human being and a Canadian you have to be concerned that 1.5 million people are unemployed in this country. It is of great concern.

I would just like to pick up on some of the themes I have heard here today, in particular in the last speech. It is interesting to note, as the member from Edmonton pointed out, that statistics do not tell it all. I refer to the fact that it is predicted that Canada will lead the OECD countries in growth of the economy. That sounds good. That 3 per cent figure or 3.5 per cent or more, whatever it happens to be, is one which I think we can all lean on and take some satisfaction from.

However, the difficulty is that our society, our economy, is going through such stressful changes that despite the fact that we may lead the western world in economic growth next year there may not be any resulting change in the unemployment figure. Companies are finding new ways to do business and are becoming much more efficient at how they conduct that business. There are many examples even in my own riding in the last year of that happening.

The pulp and paper industry has been under siege in recent years in this country. In my own riding some of those companies have reduced their labour force dramatically while at the same time, in that same period, their productivity has grown. Although the output of the company has grown, the number of employees actually being employed has decreased. That is a recurring theme in the Canadian economy and in the world economy. We are finding better and more efficient ways of doing things. However, at the end of the day there is obviously a human cost to that efficiency. That is very disturbing.

I think that all of us on both sides of this House find no comfort at all in those numbers, in those figures.

One of the things that we have done in this country in the last number of years is allow our debt and deficit position to get out of hand. As a result of allowing that to happen this very day in this country of ours, 35 cents out of every tax dollar Canadians send to Ottawa is spent servicing the debt, paying interest or providing the interest payment on the debt we have incurred over the last number of years in this country. That means we only have 65 cents with which to do something because the other 35 cents that is paying interest on the debt is not productive money.

The difficulty is that it hamstrings the government's ability to get out of situations we now find ourselves in. If we are talking about an injection of more moneys into the economy to get the economy moving, none of us are opposed to that, none of us on either side of this House.

The difficulty the government finds itself in now is that if we do inject some more money into the Canadian economy it will be borrowed money. That figure of 35 per cent will grow higher and higher so we have to find new ways and possibly more imaginative ways to get the economy going.

One aspect we have overlooked in this country in recent years is the training of our workers. We have done a very poor job in this country, a very poor job. As a government we have to continue to put more moneys into education and the training and retraining of our workers.

For example, in Japan most corporations dedicate about four weeks out of the year to individual worker training. None of our major corporations in this country come even close to that number. Apparently in the banking community there are a number of banks in Canada that are starting to do that, but they are only doing it in terms of one week. Madam Speaker, you can imagine if you look at the auto sector, the pulp and paper industry, our computer industries, and the telecommunications industry in this country what we could achieve if we had the foresight a few years ago to designate training for our workers with the help of government.

That is what I think we have to do. Where we can be successful is to get that interchange between governments and business working the way it does in some other countries of the world. The country that I point to is Japan, that little economic miracle, if you wish. We have it within our ability to do it and we must do it.

That is one of the ways I think we can solve some of the problems that are staring us in the face today without just simply shoving money at them, pouring money into them. That is not going to solve anything at the end of the day, nothing at all.

I want to quote Michael Wilson. He sums up his interpretation of what has happened in this country in the last 100 years. Michael Wilson is a friend of the hon. member for York South—Weston.

Mr. Wilson said, and I think most of us would agree with this: "In this country of ours, Canada, for the first 100 years we lived off of our resources. In the last 25 years we lived off of our credit".

It does not work that way any more. We have to find a better way to do it. I believe that by working together we can achieve better and bigger things in this country.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure the hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte was referring to the hon. Minister for International Trade, which is the way he is referred to in this place.

It being four o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 81(17) proceedings on the motion have expired.

NATIONAL HERITAGE DAY

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Monday, December 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gardiner that Bill C–236, an act respecting National Heritage Day, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee G.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Victoria has nine minutes left.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, we had forgotten that I had already started my speech so I was listed for today as the second speaker. You are going to see an even more spontaneous speech than you might otherwise have expected.

I appreciate the enthusiasm of my colleagues who will be watching the clock to see if I can manage this feat. I think I can.

Bill C–236, to provide for the establishment of a national heritage day, is one which we will be voting on shortly and I hope will receive the support of all members of the House of Commons. The bill has already been debated fairly thoroughly. The effect of the motion on which we will be voting will be to send it to committee for further detailed study. I hope the House will agree to doing that.

The bill calls for the establishment on the third Monday of each February of a national holiday to celebrate the heritage of this great country. The bill will apply only within the federal jurisdiction but will provide leadership for all jurisdictions in Canada. Already many provinces are looking at similar legislation, but this House of Commons has a particular opportunity today to make a statement about the nature of this country. It is long overdue that we acknowledge our heritage, and that is the first reason for supporting this bill.

The second reason is that to have a national heritage day will bind this country together from coast to coast to coast. It will give us an opportunity that not even Canada Day provides to focus on what it is that makes up this country and to have us pause for one day to reflect on the greatness of Canada and the heritage of which we are stewards.

• (1110)

Third, it will provide for the only holiday at this particular time of year. Anyone outside those who live blessedly on the west coast of Canada knows if there is any month in which we deserve and need a holiday it is February, particularly by the time we reach the third week of February. This may not be entirely necessary in Victoria where the blossoms are already in bloom, but in the rest of Canada still encased in ice and snow we need a national holiday. The workers in this country need a national holiday.

Some may be concerned that this will undercut our national productivity. Let me make two quick observations on that. Since the 19th century we have discovered that in fact the shorter work week provides for greater productivity. Reasonable periods for rest and recreation provide that workers will produce more in the long run.

Some of us have had the opportunity to be in western Europe and in eastern Europe. I noted that in Germany there are more statutory holidays than in Canada. Germany is one of the economies that is surging ahead. I think there a logical connection and I leave it to the House to decide.

Let me finish my remarks by expanding on one of the major points I have made, that is the need to recognize our heritage. I would like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that I have in preparation a private member's bill which would call for the establishment of a national heritage policy in Canada. This government and its predecessors have taken some specific steps to deal and look at our heritage. In particular there is a program now in force within the federal government that will provide some measure of protection for federal heritage buildings, that is buildings owned by the federal government which are designated heritage.

In my view, and I know it is the view of Canadians from coast to coast to coast, there is a need to enshrine the internal policies of the government respecting federal buildings into legislation and into coherent national policy. Even more important, there is a need for the federal government and this Parliament to provide for the framework of a national heritage policy. There are programs at all levels of government in Canada, at the municipal level as well as the provincial level, but there is a need to provide some coherence and some focus because in many respects our heritage is fast disappearing.

Heritage consists of three elements. First there is our geophysical heritage. We in Canada live in one the most spectacular countries of the world. Yet as we fly over it we see area after area in which we as human beings are destroying the very heritage we have been given and with which we have been blessed. It is important that we begin to examine the issues of our environment from the perspective of heritage, from the perspective of our stewardship over it. There are spectacular mountains, and what we sometimes do to them. There is Vancouver Island and British Columbia where strip mining is destroying the heritage we have been given.

The fish are a heritage. The prairies are a heritage. The farm lands of Quebec and Ontario and the beauties of Atlantic Canada are a heritage for us. We have a special obligation to view this heritage to develop policies to ensure that we pass it on to the next generation.

Our peoples and their achievements are a heritage. The languages of our aboriginal people are fast disappearing because we neglect them and we neglect to provide opportunities to preserve that ancient culture which has been given to our generation to preserve, protect and pass on to future generations. We have the heritage of a multicultural country which needs to be understood, honoured and grasped. This bill will do it.

Finally we have a heritage in the buildings that we and our foreparents have built. Daily that heritage is being destroyed across Canada. Again those of us who have just had an opportunity to come back from Europe can see both the glory and the destruction that has happened in some of those very beautiful cities. Some buildings have been preserved, others destroyed.

What becomes very vivid when one looks around at the various buildings that have been developed in Ottawa, for example, in my home town of Victoria, and in other cities across Canada, is the need to ensure the protection of those buildings and for the federal government to provide leadership in that respect.

I commend to the House this bill that calls for the establishment of a heritage day so that across Canada all Canadians can join on the third Monday of each February to pay respect to our heritage, to consider our heritage, and to reinforce the efforts at all levels in Canada to preserve that heritage for future generations.

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join in this debate. I feel very strongly that part of what is wrong with this country—and there are many things right, but there are some things wrong—is that the Canadian people do not know their own nation.

I do not quite know why this came about. If we go to other countries in the world we see how much effort has gone into identifying who the people are, what are their roots, what is their origin, what is their heritage, what is the history of their country. I am constantly struck by the fact that has not happened here. The people in my own community are not aware of what is happening in Oshawa.

I know a number of people work very hard to explain their heritage. They work very hard to explain the history of the trade union movement in my own community, but part of the problem is that there has never been much in the way of an incentive or a push from those in leadership positions to do that.

I want to make the case that this bill is worth it. In much of the argument I have read and in the debate on the bill itself people have made some pretty mundane arguments: "We cannot do it because the provinces would all have to agree on a common day", "we cannot do it because somebody would have to shut down a business for a day", or we cannot do it for this reason or for that reason. What they are really saying to me is: "We do not want to be bothered".

I want to be bothered. I want the people of this country to have another opportunity to see what this great nation is about, and they do not know that. Several simple tests can be put to the people of Canada to establish that sad fact. Ask them about their own Constitution. They do not know it. Ask them about their own nation. They do not know it. Ask them if they have been to different parts of this country. They do not know it. Ask them where they want to go on their holidays. They want to go to Hawaii, they want to go to Florida, they want to go to Arizona, they want to go to Europe, but they have not seen Cape Breton yet. That is a shame.

If there is a Canadian who has not been through the Cabot Trail, who has not spent a little time in Cape Breton, he or she should go to see it, to see its magnificence. If there is a Canadian left who has not seen the Rocky Mountains, he or she should go there. If you have not had a chance to go through northern Ontario, go there. If you have never seen what life on the prairies is about, go there and see what it is like to get into your truck and drive for three hours to go to a football game. People in the prairies do it all the time because it is part of their life. Go to the great province of Quebec, walk around and see the great joy that is there, see the great people who are there, see the great heritage that is there, see the magnificence of another language flourishing in the middle of North America. It is a magnificent concept, but Canadians do not have time for that. They ought to have time for that.

I use my own family as an example because I think it is pretty typically Canadian. No one received much formal education until my generation. I happen to be the only one in my family who went to university, and I did it by correspondence, which is not exactly the greatest way to do it, but I did it.

No one in my family was in a position to take the time to write down the history of the family. Much of what my ancestors did, I heard from my grandmother, my father, my mother but there is no written record of it.

I looked around to find out. What did all those other people do who came here at the same time from places like Ireland, Ukraine and other parts of the world? To try to find a written record is difficult but it can be done.

I mentioned Cape Breton because one of the things that struck me each time I visited it was the rich cultural heritage that is there and the efforts that have been made to preserve it.

It is sad that in my own town of Oshawa, which prides itself on being a hotbed of trade unionism in Canada, you have to search out the history of the trade union movement. You have to go back to the newspaper files. You have to read some of the stories that were written about the early days in the trade union movement.

It is tough to remind people today who have a legal right to be part of a bargaining unit that in our community, a place which prides itself in being a centre of trade unionism, less than half a century ago the Government of Ontario was ready to shoot people for belonging to a trade union. That is not very long ago. Some of those people, very few of them, are still alive, and there is not much in the way of a written record.

Sometimes we think of heritage in Canada as being a nice old stone building. That is part of our heritage but a larger part of it is what happened in that old stone building. Who lived there? What did they do? Those questions still need to be answered but you must search for them.

Some of us are a little upset from time to time that other nations are very proud of their heritage. They seek out and exploit every possible opportunity to wave their flag, to sing their national anthem, to display their heritage proudly. Canadians for some reason have never done that.

I mentioned earlier that Canadians do tend to go to other jurisdictions for their holidays. You can learn a lot by that. You can learn a lot by going, as I did, to a women's basketball game at the University of Texas on a Tuesday night. Twenty-two thousand people came out to see a basketball game in Austin, Texas. You ought to hear them sing their national anthem. You could not leave that basketball arena without feeling that these people have something that we do not have.

Name for me the last time you went to a sporting event in Canada where 20,000 Canadians stood up and sang the national anthem. I have never been to one. At the very best, someone comes in and sings it for them. There will be a little goldfishing here and there but people are pretty tentative in this country. They are not sure whether they should sing the anthem in English, in French or in either one. The end result is that for most of the time, they do not sing it.

What a shame. What a shame that our little kids in school do not get an opportunity to learn much about their own heritage as Canadians. What a shame that our academics do not get much opportunity to write about our own country, to make that part of our fibre.

People often say: "Canadians are moderates. They are boring". The sad truth of it all is that Canadians are pretty exciting, pig-headed people. We did not survive in this kind of economic and geographic climate without having something going for us. The vast majority of the people who came to this nation were poor and had no skills.

I listen to people who say: "Wait a minute, you cannot allow people to immigrate to this country unless they have something to contribute. They need some skills". Thank God nobody thought like that when my ancestors came here. They had no money, they could not read, they could not write, they were in poor health and they were poor, dirt farmers from Ireland who came here to avoid starvation.

I am glad that people came from many nations with exactly the same motive, to survive. That is a pretty noble motive. When my ancestors came here, we met all kinds of opposition. People did not like us because of what we looked like, because of the religion we believed in, because we did not speak the language that they spoke, because we were not well dressed. Thank God we lived through that.

Some of us even learned that when somebody comes to this country and does not speak a language that we like, does not look like us and dresses a little differently, maybe we should remember that they are like our ancestors. It is our heritage as a Canadian and maybe we should just back off and let them have the same opportunities in this country as our ancestors had.

All of this is not going to come easily. It will require a major change in the persona of Canada, the public face. Part of what needs to be done is to take an opportunity like a heritage day and make it a focal point.

The Government of Canada says to all our provincial governments and all our municipal governments: "Wait a minute, here is something worth putting together. It is going to take a little work. It will take a little effort. It will not come easily. It may not always be as successful as we would like it to be, but it needs to be done and it is worth doing". That is why I support this bill.

I am happy to say that on the few occasions now that I see Canadians starting to think about their country and celebrate their country and their greatness, it works. It is not easy and it requires a little effort, a little motivation and a focus as we have on Canada Day.

Every once in awhile some athlete somewhere does something great. I saw a kid from the west coast, whom I had never heard of before, do some skiing on the weekend. I am ashamed that I have never heard of her before but I am proud that she is a Canadian. People all across this country who have never heard of her, got a chance to see this young woman display her ability. I do not care whether it is in athletics, in cultural events, in business, in a profession or whatever, we should be proud of being Canadians and there should not be a member in this House who does not support this bill.

Mr. Allan Koury (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, it is a real pleasure to take part in this debate on the bill to designate a national heritage day.

This proposal seems particularly relevant today, when Canadians across this country are attempting to redefine the future of their country and give new meaning to their national identity.

It also comes at a time when we are preparing for the 125th anniversary of Confederation, which should be a special time for all of us to emphasize the heritage we received from our ancestors and to reflect on the Canada of tomorrow.

The idea of designating a national heritage day, especially this year, the 125th year of Canada's Confederation, is gaining ground. And why not? It is an excellent idea. Especially since the heritage theme, in addition to being universal and speaking to the experience of all Canadians, is a very broad concept. It calls to mind the vast tracts of wilderness in this country, from Terra Nova Park in Newfoundland to Forillon in the Gaspe Peninsula, Pacific Rim in British Columbia and Ellesmere in the Northwest Territories. It refers to our historic sites such as Fort Louisbourg in Nova Scotia;

Bellevue House, the home of Sir John A. Macdonald in Kingston, Ontario; Fort Garry in Manitoba, and Dawson City in Yukon. It also refers to the linguistic and cultural diversity of the people who live in this country, and we think of Quebec, the Acadian presence, aboriginal people, the Ukrainian communities in western Canada and Vancouver's Chinatown, and the many festive events that reflect this diversity across the country.

• (1130)

It is all part of our national heritage, but there is much more. That is why this concept is so important to all Canadians. It is not only important to have festive events celebrating this rich legacy in communities across the country. We must also understand its impact on our national identity.

How can we define our national identity, if we as Canadians do not take the time to discover all its brilliant facets and appreciate them as they should be appreciated?

We could all learn more about our past heritage, about our country today and its prospects as a nation. We would all be richer if we had a better understanding and a better appreciation of our cultural diversity. Would we not make an effort to learn to know other Canadians of different origins if we had a better understanding of the significance of this joint legacy, if we realized that the linguistic and cultural diversity of our country is an asset, not a liability, and that it is not a cost but indeed a benefit?

While we have every right to question the approach suggested for the institution of a national heritage day, because of the costs involved or the implementation procedures to make it a truly national event not only for federal civil servants who constitute merely 8 per cent of the Canadian work force, but for all Canadian men and women, the fact remains that there is a need to promote our national heritage somehow.

This is even more crucial in view of the political situation, as all parts of the Canadian society are seeking, through the constitutional talks, to redefine the future of our nation. Our national identity is at stake here.

Therefore, I suggest it is important to encourage Canadians to reflect upon their common heritage, upon their past history and upon their outlook for the future. It is essential and incumbent on the federal government to foster the emergence of a distinctively Canadian culture and identity, to promote our national symbols, past accomplishments and plans for the future.

That is the role I feel this House should be playing. Instituting a national heritage day could certainly help us achieve our goals, but other approaches could also be considered which would promote just as well the pride we feel in being Canadian.

As the Prime Minister said: "Only Canadians can build together the Canada all of us want and we have inherited from our founders and pioneers the tools we need, that is determination, generosity and faith in the future".

We have the duty, to help the people of Canada rediscover these tools handed down to us by our forefathers who wanted our country to be built on solid foundations.

[English]

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity of entering into this debate to support my colleague from Prince George—Bulkley Valley on his private member's bill to have the third Monday in February declared national heritage day.

I come from Moose Jaw, a part of the country which as far as settlement is concerned really began only after 1882 when the railway went through. It is interesting that about 10 to 12 years ago—there was a heritage club already—an office was opened up by Heritage Canada. I remember at the time this office opened up that people were wandering on the streets asking: "Why are they there? Why do they have this little office down on Main Street? What is it doing there?"

It was at that time that I started to realize how little people actually understand about their heritage, how little thought they give to their own culture. We have examples right in the city of Moose Jaw.

I know that in Moose Jaw, the skyline, if you can call it that—there are not many high buildings—or the streetscape is very old for Saskatchewan. It is not really that people took any care in trying to preserve it. It is because development has not taken place and knocked it down. It is just now that people are starting to realize how important their streetscape is to the history of their city. It is too bad that this recognition did not start a few years ago.

I know that there was a school in Moose Jaw called Victoria School. It was the oldest brick building in the Northwest Territories. At one time of course most of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta were part of the Northwest Territories. Victoria School in the city of Moose Jaw was the oldest standing brick building in what was at one time the Northwest Territories which was well over one-half of Canada, probably three-quarters of Canada.

There was a debate in the early seventies over Victoria School. Some developers wanted to put up a high-rise and call it Victoria Place. There was a small group which was very boisterous and very active in trying to prevent that from happening.

I can remember in fact at one point there were permits for demolition and the bulldozer went right in front of Victoria School. People actually laid in front of the bulldozer and stopped the school from being torn down. These people were seen more as a curiosity than anything else. Unfortunately the developers were successful. Victoria School was destroyed. It no longer exists. That is very regrettable.

Victoria School in fact was the school that my grandmother went to when she first came from England in 1907 and it is gone. It is gone forever; it will never be replaced.

When we think of knocking down our brick buildings, buildings of any historical value at all, those buildings will be gone forever. In fact, I think the oldest building in the city of Moose Jaw is from the late 1890s. That is the oldest building we have. That is our heritage.

Heritage day is important to start Canadians focusing on our heritage, focusing on our past. We do not realize the past this country has. When asking most Canadians, certainly in western Canada, they think back to 1867 when Canada began. There is no appreciation of the culture that existed or of the communities that existed before that.

When we look across the border, the Americans have a different attitude. It is ironic that we grew up with Davey Crocket, Daniel Boone and other individuals who are in American folklore. They celebrate days such as Robert E. Lee Day, Martin Luther King Day and Flag Day. There is a better understanding of American culture and American history in that country.

Certainly if you go to places like Europe, this would not even be a debate in Europe. If you go to any part of Europe, whether it is France, Germany or Italy, they know who they are. An Italian knows that he is an Italian and that he is different from someone from France, who is different from someone from Germany. They appreciate the differences. It grows with them. We in Canada do not have that appreciation at all.

I remember studying history when I was an undergraduate student and I remember first coming across André Laurendeau who is famous for many things. One of the things I remember him most for is from reading some articles by him.

He came out to western Canada back in the sixties, and this is of course the ongoing debate between Quebec society and the rest of the country and English Canada. He made a comment that the people of English Canada do not know who they are. I remember also reading another of his comments that English Canada likes to hang on to Quebec because that is what is seen as its history. It is like the hand of a drowning man grabbing on to a shoulder.

There is a point there, because in western Canada where I am from we often associate ourselves and look fondly at the Americans. Instead of focusing on Canadian history and Canadian values and Canadian heritage, we are looking at the so-called American dream. We are inundated these days. People are wearing NFL T-shirts and looking fondly at American values.

We have a tremendous amount of heritage in this country. Certainly when I first became a member I had not travelled beyond east of Montreal. I had the opportunity to go to the maritimes. I was in Halifax, the Annapolis Valley, and over on Prince Edward Island. I only saw parts of the east but there is a culture there, there is a history there. It is local but it is there and it is something that other Canadians do not seem to be aware of.

Newfoundland is different again. It is a culture unto itself. As Canadians, we are richer for having these cultures. Quebec has its history and its heritage.

These are things that all Canadians should be proud of. Yet we do not seem to be aware of them. Most of us seem to go through our lives unaware of other Canadians. We are very parochial. On the prairies I am sure a lot of us think that all Canada is flat with no trees, not realizing that we are the exception instead of the rule.

The bill in front of this House to promote a heritage day is very significant. It is significant for us as a people. It is also significant for us as a nation to promote national unity, a national pride in ourselves and a feeling that, yes, we are unique.

As my father says: "You have to leave the country to find a Canadian". When he was down in the States he ran into somebody and asked where he was from. "I am a Canadian", he said. But if you were to ask him in Moose Jaw he would say: "Oh, I am Ukrainian" or some other ethnic group. Only when one leaves Canada does one become Canadian.

It is time that we started thinking of ourselves as Canadians, promoting those values as Canadians, and looking at our heritage and the diversity of culture that exists in this country, coming to appreciate it and to understand it.

A day such as heritage day can do an awful lot to help promote that, to help us as Canadians appreciate ourselves as Canadians, to understand ourselves as Canadians, to understand our history and to be better Canadians for it, and as a result to have a better country.

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, I was reluctant to get into this debate because I thought probably in arguing for this particular motion, or the concept of this particular motion, I would not be able to present myself in the manner that I thought I should.

After listening to some of the comments that I have heard from speakers prior to my rising, the attitude we are facing in looking for a heritage day seems to be a negative-type attitude.

It is being said that we do not appreciate ourselves as Canadians, we do not understand ourselves. I am very fortunate in the area I represent because we do know who we are and we do celebrate the fact that we are Canadians. We are very conscious of our heritage. The various community groups in my particular area go out of their way, first to say they are Canadian and, second, to respect their heritage.

In rising to speak about this, I have a little history that keeps going through my mind. In fact, many years ago, about the time that Heritage Canada discussed the possibility of creating a heritage day, a group that I worked along with, the Kinsmen and Kinettes of Canada, were very strong proponents of this heritage day and still are. In fact, right now across Canada there is a "Proud to be Canadian Tour". There are two Peace Tower flags, one moving from eastern Canada and one moving from western Canada, working with these various Kinsmen and Kinette clubs in each community, showing support for the heritage and the unity of our country.

I have some concern about the fact that we are looking for another holiday. Coming from a small business community, I know the effects of all of a sudden having a long weekend. Even in Manitoba where the weather is cold in the winter, we do an awful lot of work in that area in the construction industry. To disrupt a pretty good construction schedule, I know the cost analysis would be—

An hon. member: Just to recognize your country.

Mr. Bjornson: We should always recognize our country. We are getting off on a tangent here. I am very proud of my country, but does there have to be another holiday? Is there any possibility that we can designate one of the many existing holidays as heritage day? Let us take a long hard look at that. There is a real possibility there.

An hon. member: How much is involved here?

Mr. Bjornson: The cost remains the same, the cost to our economy and the cost to our competitiveness, but we have the opportunity to celebrate our heritage. Once again, I think we should be celebrating our heritage, not having a holiday supposedly to educate ourselves and our children. We should be out there celebrating.

There were a number of comments about the fact that we are not popular with ourselves. The hon. member who preceded me talked about NFL T-shirts being worn across Canada. I would like to remind the hon. member that one of the most valued items in international travel happens to be the little Canadian flag pins. We have a lot to be proud of. That is part of our heritage and it goes beyond the borders of our country.

If this motion goes beyond this reading and gets into committee, I hope that the committee will take a long hard look at how we can carry on the discussion on a heritage day in a manner that is far more convenient than the way it is today. We are discussing a motion that basically only deals with the federal government.

An hon. member: It is 8 per cent.

Mr. Bjornson: There is only 8 per cent, as the hon. member says, who will be affected by this.

I am very curious about why this has not worked the other way. Why have the various provinces not stepped forward? Are they prepared to buy into this package? Once given that package, the provinces do it with their employees and then we have to go to organized labour. Some of the organized labour groups have found themselves in the position where they supply to the membership a heritage day, usually in February. Some of the others use it as a floating holiday. Then there is the private sector. Is it prepared to buy into it? I think it is prepared to buy a national heritage day, but it wants to buy it by changing something that is already existing so that we can promote our national heritage.

I look forward to a very constructive vote in the very near future. As a result we may have a heritage day but it may be at some other time other than the third Monday in February.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted today to have an opportunity to participate in this debate on Bill C-236, an act respecting national heritage day.

I first of all want to congratulate the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley for sponsoring this legislation.

• (1150)

I have been very encouraged by the remarks I have heard from the last number of speakers who have addressed the principle of this bill. The forceful commentaries and support are very encouraging. If there is one thing all of us are sensitive to these days, it is the future of our country, whether we will have a future for Canada as we know it today. We are celebrating the 125th birthday of Canada. I cannot think of a more appropriate initiative for the House of Commons to take than to advance this legislation later today and eventually see it become a law of Canada. It would be a tremendous positive signal.

I also want to say that I believe in the principles on which we developed Canada as a bilingual country, a multicultural country, a country that has extended a warm welcome to people from around the world. We have prided ourselves on the fact that we are a mosaic as opposed to a melting pot. This has sometimes caused us an identity problem. To understand ourselves is critical. Just as we as individuals try to understand who we are today, we must understand our past. We must understand what has gone before and what this legislation is all about.

When we start looking at our past, we have to acknowledge that there are many dimensions. National heritage is something that is critical. In British Columbia we are concerned about preserving our ancient forests, the first growth forest, the virgin forests. Our magnificent cedar trees, perhaps 12 to 15 feet in dimension, and cathedral like forests are something we must preserve. This is an incredible piece of heritage that is now becoming unique world-wide.

We can talk about the natural heritage of Canada. Previous speakers have acknowledged the fact that we live in a Garden of Eden. We live in one of the most attractive parts of the globe. It is accessible, it is safe and it is unique in many ways. When it comes to our biosphere and the natural landscape, we have taken the initiative to set aside a wilderness area, a park area and other areas of uniqueness. That is something we will feel very proud of in years to come.

The critical one is our cultural heritage, the cultural landscape. I am reminded of a term that is normally used to describe a piece of old parchment. It is called papyrus. In the old days, when parchment was very critical, people would use the sheet of parchment, erase parts of it, draw or write on it, again erase parts of it and write on it again. When you saw the completed parchment, you could see the various layers of previous use. This is what we are talking about today when we describe our cultural landscape. In my community of Kamloops some fascinating cultural landscapes, landscapes of heritage, become very real and vivid when one simply notices them.

First of all I think of the aboriginal cultures that occupied so much of Canada for thousands of years. You see the cultural landscape today when the Keekwillie circles, reminiscent of the old subterranean villages, were built along the riverside as a winter home, the summer home being more of a portable structure.

Today when subdivisions are built, you see these circles representing the old homesteads of the aboriginal cultures that have unfolded on top of one another for centuries and centuries. Then you notice other aspects of the heritage landscape. The old churches remind us of the diverse ethnic communities that built the historic landscape of the country as we know it today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 11.54 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 93, the time reserved for debate has expired. Therefore the vote is on the motion moved by the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

• (1210)

Before the taking of the vote:

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, since this is a private member's bill, could you take the vote row by row, it being a free vote?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the House agree to take the vote row by row?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I would like to remind members of the procedure used in voting by row. Members who support the motion vote first. I will ask members on my right to stand one row at a time; then I will ask the members on my left to do the same. This procedure will be repeated for members who oppose the motion.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—THE ECONOMY

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale) moved:

That this House condemn the government for its economic mishandling and incompetence.

He said: Mr. Speaker, my office in Willowdale is in a plaza in the heart of my riding. My office is on the eighth floor. Every time I go to my office, there are many people, a lot of them young people, standing at the elevator with me. They get off at the fifth floor. If I leave my office building between nine and five, the elevator stops at the fifth floor, the welfare office, where people get on. I am reminded every day of the misery that is devastating so many Canadian families.

Let us look at what this government offered Canadians when it came to office in 1984. It offered Canadians jobs, jobs, jobs. Its methodology for achieving this was, first of all, to control the deficit and, second, to give us free trade.

We know what has happened to the deficit. The national debt has gone from $170 billion to well over $400 billion in that time. Today, 15 per cent of Canadians are living in poverty, 2 million Canadians use food banks, 700,000 of those are children, and this is up 40 per cent in the last year. Today, unemployment in Canada is at 10.4 per cent, 16 per cent of young Canadians are unemployed, 92,000 fewer young Canadians are working today than were working a year ago.

In addition, we have had dropouts, people who give up all hope of getting a job so they do not even bother registering. There were 33,000 dropouts last year. In addition, Canada has 1.2 million welfare cases, or an estimated 2 million individuals on welfare today.

The over-all record of this government over the last seven years it has been in office is one of decline. In 1984 Canada had a current account surplus with all nations in the world of $1.7 billion. Today Canada has a $26 billion deficit in its current account with other nations.

Our share of world trade over this period has fallen from 5 per cent to 4 per cent. We are falling behind other countries. In 1984 our trade surplus was $19.8 billion. Today it is $10.9 billion, 46 per cent of what it was when this government took office.

This government has continually told us: "Don't worry, the United States is coming out of its recession; it will take us out of the recession along with it. United States recovery will get Canada out of the worst recession it has experienced since the great depression of the 1930s".

This is not true. Let us look at what has happened over the past several years in Canada.

Since free trade came in, Canada has lost 325,000 or 15 per cent of all its manufacturing jobs. The government is going to say: "But the U.S. has lost manufacturing jobs too". Yes, but at only one-quarter of the rate that we have lost those jobs in Canada.

This time, in terms of plant closures, 65 per cent of the lost manufacturing jobs are due to actual plant closures. This is versus 22 per cent in the recession we had in the early 1980s. Those jobs are gone. They are not coming back.

We see the impact today. Quebec has lost 120,000 manufacturing jobs or 20 per cent of its manufacturing jobs. Ontario has lost 187,000 manufacturing jobs or 18 per cent.

Another factor which is going to make it difficult for us to recover, regardless of what happens in the United States, is interest rates. Yes, interest rates have come down from the high that the government drove them up to, the high of some 13 per cent to 14 per cent. Our bank rate is now down to 7.46 per cent, but the American rate is at 3.5 per cent. Their rate is less than half of ours. What is even more condemning is when you look at the real interest rate. When you take out from the interest rate the amount of inflation, the real rate in Canada is at 3.87 per cent, whereas in the United States it is .9 per cent. How are we going to compete when they have real interest rates that are so much lower than ours and when ours is way beyond our historical spread of one to two percentage points?

This, of course, is keeping our dollar high. The government will say the dollar has come down from the high of 89 cents to 90 cents that its policies drove it up to. Yes, it is coming down, but the government in the last three weeks has bolstered it. The bank rate has gone up three times in a row in order to keep the dollar up. A lower dollar means more jobs in Canada and more exports. Yes, there is a price you have to pay for a lower dollar. Nothing in this economic climate is free or win win. When the dollar goes down it costs more for our imports and it costs Canadians more to travel abroad, but surely it is more important to have the jobs here in Canada and to be exporting.

Another reason that the American recovery is not going to be the panacea to Canada is that cross-border shopping still continues to drain billions of dollars out of our economy and will continue in spite of the fact that this government brought in half-hearted measures last week in an endeavour to deal with it.

The government did not touch the issue of fuel taxes. Our task force on deindustrialization and economic renewal heard testimony from all across the province. The single biggest factor in driving people across the border was fuel taxes. The cost of fuel in the United States is cheaper. One Canadian trucker said: "Mr. Peterson, I have not fuelled up my truck in Canada in the last six months". The government did not deal with that issue.

Another area that the government did not touch on in any effective way was the mail order business, a huge business which has lost over 200,000 jobs in the past two years. Under existing rules the Government of the United States imposes an $8.40 U.S. charge on Canadians who sell mail order goods in the United States. That is about $10 Canadian. It makes it very difficult for Canadians to compete in the United States vis-à-vis the Americans competing in Canada because we do not charge this. What does this government do? It imposes a $5 charge on American mail order houses which want to sell into Canada.

Why did the government not go all the way to give our mail order houses a level playing field? Why did it not charge them $10? It is still giving the Americans a leg up in terms of the North American market. This is just not fair. It is outright stupidity that it would not have the courage and the guts to impose at least the same charges on Americans that the Americans are imposing on Canadians.

Then the government tried to harmonize the GST with provincial sales taxes. It said: "We will collect your PST from cross-border shoppers, Canadians going to the U.S.; we will make sure we collect it at the border if you harmonize the PST with the GST". It wants people in Canada to start paying more taxes on children's clothing, shoes, books, food and other items that are not now taxed. In the midst of a recession, it is saying: "Tax Canadians more". This is a bad fiscal policy. The provinces are not going to be blackmailed into harmonizing their taxes with the abortive GST.

There is another reason we are having and will continue to have problems. Let us look at what we were promised under the free trade agreement, secure access to the American market. "The window is closing. If we do not jump through the window right now, the Americans will become protectionist. We will not have an opportunity to sell in the United States". What nonsense. What have we got? Absolutely no secure access to the United States. We have seen this with the disputes that have arisen: softwood, natural gas, pork, magnesium and now Honda. Our transplant auto industries are being threatened.

I ask Canadians to reflect on this. Did we have better access to the American market before the free trade deal came in, or today? We have a few other problems in terms of trying to attract jobs back to Canada. Where are they going to locate? Let us look at labour figures.

Look at days lost due to industrial disputes, including strikes and lockouts. We are looking at Canada compared to the G-7. Working days lost per 1,000 inhabitants, Canada is at the bottom of the list. We had 209 days average over that period lost. This was 403 times worse than the record of Germany, 99 times worse than Japan, 16 times worse than France, 4 times worse than in the U.K., and 3.4 times worse than in the United States, our competitor. We are even 2.7 times worse than Italy.

If we are going to have a labour record like that, how can we compete in a global economy? How can we even compete in North America if we are tying our hands behind our backs because we cannot get our act together, business, labour and governments.

This government has set a precedent in terms of its inability to deal as an employer with its own employees, the public servants. Last summer, it tried to limit them to wage increases of 0 per cent, 0 per cent and 3 per cent over a three-year period at the same time as the upper echelon were getting very huge increases. The government was not fair. It forced PSAC into a strike. It knew what it was that it wanted because it was going to get tough with them and order them back to work. It was political opportunism of the worst order. What is even worse is that it sets that example of how business and labour are supposed to take the example from government of destroying a harmonious working relationship.

As a result, labour has not opted in to the government's prosperity agenda. Labour refuses to be part of this government's attempt to deal with the issues of long-term competitiveness in Canada. I must say it was a pretty meagre effort because this government has postponed all action while it studies this issue rather than getting on to the job dealing with the problems of our economy today. There are alternatives. I have painted a very dismal picture of what has happened to Canadians and where we are going. A number of reasons for this emanate from the government's lack of a coherent, long-term and short-term economic and industrial strategy.

Unemployment is high in Canada today at 10.4 per cent. The United States has only 7.1 per cent and a Republican conservative administration there says that 7.1 per cent is too high, that it has to get it going, that it has to create jobs, and that the best social policy is a job.

What did President Bush do? He brought in a $150 billion transport bill, federal money amounting to $150 billion to go into creating roads and jobs immediately. If we translate that to Canada, that would be a $15 billion federal expenditure.

Our party has called for a $1 billion federal expenditure on municipal infrastructure, not only to give us sewers, roads and bridges but to create jobs immediately. This government refuses to do even that.

We brought in a request to stimulate housing. I am pleased that the government has dropped the down payment from 10 per cent to 5 per cent to get a home, but it has not gone the extra step in a way that will create meaningful jobs and meaningful activity in the housing industry. It has not yet accepted our proposal that if Canadians could take $7,500 out of their registered retirement savings plans and use it for housing we would have a proper stimulus. Why does the government not go further? It will not cost us any tax revenue. It will give us housing and it will create jobs.

Over the long term there are many things this government can do and should do in order to get our economy working. It should not be obsessed with the dollar that is at 84 cents and is falling. Our dollar should be lower. It was much lower when the government promised all the good things that would happen because of free trade. It was down around 75 to 76 cents.

Instead of cutting expenditures on education we should be investing in our human capital, our human resources, the only real source of wealth creation in the global economy today. If you think the cost of educating Canadians is high, Mr. Speaker, I ask you to think what is the cost of not educating them. It is the same with training. People who are unemployed in my riding today are being told that they have to wait until September to go to a community college to learn computer skills. Why can they not get those jobs immediately? Why can they not get that training immediately?

Turning to research, development, science and technology, again this government has cut back in all of these areas. In the human element, the creative element, the dynamic element of our economy, the government is cutting back and we are falling. We are now among the lowest of all the research and development countries in the OECD. We are falling. Our competitors are more than twice our level and they are increasing. Does this bode well for young people and the jobs they are going to have?

Our task force suggested a buy Canadian program. We believe we are in such difficulty economically that all Canadians could help if they would look at the goods they are buying and make a conscious effort where price and quality are comparable to ensure that they are buying Canadian and giving us Canadian jobs. This is critical to get us going.

We need amendments to our trade deal so that we can have in Canada our own industrial strategy. We need amendments so that our energy can be used as part of our industrial base. We have to make sure that our key industries, particularly smaller ones that have developed technology and those with government support in many cases, can remain Canadian and reinvest in this country.

• (1240)

Many Canadians have lost faith in this government but they have not lost faith in themselves. They have not lost faith in Canada. Let us get Canadians working again. Let us equip Canadians to meet the challenges of a global economy.

I believe we can be the best educated, the best trained, the best equipped and the most advanced economy in the western hemisphere. This is our Liberal vision for Canada. It is time we started to work toward it.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to my hon. friend's speech this morning.

He pointed out a number of problems that Canada is facing today. It is; there is no question about that. But I tend to be a little more optimistic about this country than he does.

Let us go back and talk a bit about what he was saying. He was talking about the lower dollar back in the mid-1980s and so on when we had a lower dollar. I think he will admit to me, if he has a moment to listen, that Canadian businesses frittered away a lot of that lower dollar in jacking up salaries. There were very generous salary increases during that period of time. They did not in fact reinvest in infrastructure and restructuring at that period of time and are now forced into it, which we are seeing on a daily basis. I think he would admit that when he takes a look at the statistics during that period of time.

The Economic Council of Canada came out with a report covering that end of things. There was an editorial in The Gazette of Montreal of February 17 headlined: "The Economic Enemy is Us". I do not think there is any question that we have had some economic problems over the last two years. Nobody is minimizing that, but so have other countries in the world. We are all in this together and we are all trying to get out of it the same way, by getting our basics right.

He was today bragging about the United States and the position it is in. Its deficit this year is going to be far greater than the Canadian deficit. It will be almost double per capita what it is here in Canada. That deficit has been growing rather dramatically over the last few years under President Reagan and President Bush.

The United States is now getting into some problems of servicing that debt. As the president said the other day, "maybe some of us should start paying attention to this thing called deficit and debt that we have in the United States" because we are.

The reason that Canada is projected to come out of this world-wide recession as a leader is that we have been getting our basics right, because we have battled the deficit. As a matter of fact, the deficit is now one-half what it was in the economy when we took over. It was a little over 8 per cent of the Canadian economy and now it is a little over 4 per cent. We have battled it.

It has been a tough fight with the spending pressures that come to any government. We have faced them and we are continuing to face them. We have been battling the deficit. We have been battling interest rates to get them down. I find it rather amusing when he says: "The government forced the interest rates up to some 14 per cent". It is not at the dizzying height when he was in government at 22 or 23 per cent.

Mr. Peterson: I wasn't part of that.

Mr. McDermid: I know you were not proud of that; none of us were. You had to combat a problem at that time of high inflation. That was the way that you did it and we learned our lesson from the previous administration. When we saw inflationary pressures starting to be very significant in this country—we did not want it to get to 13 per cent like the previous administration did—we took some tough medicine. We put interest rates up to slow down that inflation rate. We have done that. We have done that. We have set inflation goals which are being met and in fact surpassed so the price stability which we need in this country is there. That is very important, and we are keeping interest rates down.

My hon. friend talked about the rise in the bank rate in the last three weeks. That is right. He knows exactly why that was done. To put another image on that, he should read the speeches of his leader when he was finance minister. He very readily admitted at that time, and still does, I believe, because he gets these things quoted back to him from time to time, that one of the problems of being in government and then opposition was that you got these quotes coming back to you from time to time.

He said that the only time the Bank of Canada intervenes is to level out the peaks and valleys but that the dollar is at market level. He is right. The Leader of the Liberal Party is absolutely right. That is what is being done now and the hon. member knows that. The prime is still at 7.5 per cent, the lowest level in a decade—I guess in 20 years, almost—and is holding there at the present time.

Mortgage rates are down. Do we want to compare prime with prime? The American prime is 4.5 and ours is 7.5 per cent, a 3 per cent spread. It was 6 per cent and now it is 3 per cent. The spread has narrowed rather dramatically. It is getting very close to the traditional spreads we have had all along. The hon. member knows that too.

Another thing happened during the mid-1980s. I believe our government was as much at fault as any, by the way. I want to make that clear. In the mid-1980s we had golden opportunities in this country to trim down the size of government and to watch our spending. The federal government did not do a bad job. We maintained our spending increases to 3.7 per cent. That is not what the public is saying to us. It does not want increases; it wants reductions. We were holding our increases to 3.7 per cent during that period while at the same time increasing our payments to provinces at an average of 6 per cent.

I know my hon. friend has some familiarity with the province of Ontario because his brother was the premier for a period of time. During that time there was a 10 per cent increase a year on average. Spending was increased by 40 per cent over four years in that province because the money was coming in and the province was doing extremely well. A tremendous number of jobs were created during that time. Both the premier of Ontario and the Prime Minister of Canada took credit for that, as politicians will.

We probably frittered away a lot of that time. We probably could have been a lot tougher federally. I know the provinces could have been. I think there was only one province that did not increase spending more rapidly than the federal government, and it was the province of Alberta. I think it maintained its spending at around 3.4 or 3.5 per cent a year and managed to hold it down.

What I saying here is that we are in a period of time where the basics are all coming together. Today the quarterly review in The Financial Post says that the recovery is now in sight. That is happening. We are seeing signs everywhere of that happening.

I am sure my hon. friend who has put this motion before us wants to see that recovery. I do not think he is one who takes great happiness in going through a recession. I hope not. If recovery did not come this year, he would probably politically like that because it would give him a better opportunity at the polls the next time.

Knowing the hon. member as I do, he would like to see a good recovery this year. We believe that we will have recovery this year. We have the basics in place which are extremely important because with high inflation and with high interest rates we cannot hope for recovery. We have those in position now and I feel very confident that in 1992 we will see increases in our growth here in Canada, to the betterment of all of Canada.

• (1250)

The hon. member talked about energy today. He touched on the energy situation. It seemed to me that he was ready to advocate another national energy program like the Liberals. I am not sure if I read that into what he said on energy.

If he looks at heating prices on natural gas and oil, the hon. member will see that the price of heating homes has gone down since the National Energy Program was wiped out, and has remained relatively constant or even lower now than it was. This has helped the economy. It has helped industry which is a great user of energy.

We cannot say the same for electricity because that has gone up. But when you see oil and natural gas prices, you will find that those prices are lower today than they were back in the days of the National Energy Program.

It all has to do with the cost of running businesses and competitiveness. I am sure my hon. friend understands that, coming from Edmonton.

The Libertal Party and the New Democratic Party rhyme off all these numbers about job losses, and it depends on whose speech you listen to. One will say that it is because of the free trade agreement that all these jobs have been lost. Another will say that it is because of the goods and services tax.

Yet business and industry are the ones that asked to do away with the manufacturers, sales tax and to bring in a consumption tax. They were the ones that recommended it over a very long period of time, as have royal commissions and so on.

They also were the ones that advocated a trade agreement. I debated the free trade agreement for a very long period of time across this country. Anybody who checks what I said or what my colleagues said on the free trade agreement will find that we said that the free trade agreement will not prevent trade disputes.

An hon. member: Secure access is what you promised.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I sat very patiently through their comments and I would expect the same—

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, if our hon. friend is correct, he said that if we had some things to say he would be prepared to sit down and relinquish the floor to members opposite.

I would like the floor because I would like to react very quickly to some of the points he has been making.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend will have an opportunity to debate later today. I would like to make my points and then I will listen patiently to what they have to say.

I sat very quietly and listened to my hon. friend from Willowdale and I expect no less from my hon. friend who stands up in the House, who is the House leader for the New Democratic Party and talks about the need for more civility in the place. Yet he is the one leading the heckling this morning. All I am saying is: Give me the opportunity to deliver my speech and I will listen to yours.

There is my hon. friend from Broadview—Greenwood. One of the things we have talked about recently in the House is trying to make it a more civil place.

People out there who are watching wonder about the heckling going on. To be fair, I can say that one of the biggest hecklers in this House has been me. I will tell you that I have not heckled once since the House resumed, not once. That was a commitment I made to try to make this place a little more civil. Now, why does the hon. member not do it? He is always the one saying that the House should be more civil.

Getting back to the subject of the debate today, when we discussed the free trade agreement we never said that there would not be disputes. We always said that there would be disputes, naturally. That is why we put in a dispute settlement mechanism. We have been very successful with the dispute settlement mechanism.

We believe we will be successful again with the Honda dispute because we think the figures that the Americans are using are flawed.

There is an election going on in the United States this year. Every congressman and one-third of the senators are up for re-election, as are the president and vice-president of the United States and things heat up at that time.

My friends in the New Democratic Party know about the labour unions and how they put the pressure on at election time for this, that, or the other thing. That is going on in the United States today.

As a matter of fact, I would say that with the split of the United Auto Workers in the United States and the Canadian Auto Workers in Canada, we may be seeing some of that coming back to haunt us a little bit now because the American unions have no allegiance to their brothers in Canada any more.

They are putting the pressure on their congressmen to pull all kinds of stunts, and this one with Honda, as far as I am concerned, is just that. It is political harassment of the auto industry. With the dispute settlement mechanism, if it gets that far without being solved, it will be solved and it will be solved in our favour. I have no doubt about that whatsoever.

I listened to my friend from Willowdale talk about his and the Liberal Party's solution to what is going on today. They say it is their idea for the RRSP money. It is not their idea at all. It came from the Canadian Real Estate Association.

The 5 per cent down payment came from the Canadian House Builders Association. It did not come from the Liberal government at all. It is not its idea at all.

The municipal infrastructure, which they are laying claim to now, did not come from them at all. The Association of Municipalities has been asking for that for four or five years. That is nothing new.

I get a big kick out of my friends across the way who take credit for these supposed solutions to our economic problems. I just think back to the old days when the Grits just threw money at things and that was the way we solved problems. We have proven that that is not the way to solve problems.

Better use of the resources available is the answer for governments today, to free up the private sector which creates the jobs. It is the private sector that makes things happen, not the Government of Canada or of Ontario or the municipalities.

We have to provide the proper basics for industry and small businesses to produce and to create the jobs and that is exactly what we are doing. We are getting their costs down with lower interest rates. We are getting inflation down so they do not have those pressures for higher salaries and higher prices and so on, so that they can continue to compete.

As a matter of fact, talking about competing, our inflation rates, which will be out very shortly for January, are going to show a dramatic improvement for Canada. That helps everybody. It helps the people on fixed incomes. It helps the people with small and large businesses. This is something that is very, very important. When people realize we are reaching our goals, they will be very, very pleased.

This government has lowered interest rates, got the inflation rate down, but we can sabotage the strides that we have made very easily. We cannot give in to the opposition's quick-fix solutions with its return to surging deficits and debt.

Their approach is no foundation for stable economic growth and real job opportunities. They talk about make-work projects, not long-term, real full-time jobs. Instead, it is like taking a pain killer to heal a broken leg. You may feel good for a while, but it does not do anything to cure the problem.

• (1300)

In closing, instead of the feeling of despair that the opposition gives today and instead of encouraging false solutions, the opposition should be working with us to bring Canada sustainable growth and prosperity. It should work with us to renew the confidence in Canadians to feel that we are on the right path to renewed recovery and job opportunities.

The United Nations said that we are the second most desirable country in the world in which to live. Let us all work together to get to number one.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to the Minister of State for Finance and Privatization.

Some of his remarks I agree with. The approach of putting basics in place is one that all members of this House would agree on. We are all focused on deficit and debt. I have heard the minister say before that the government's inflation targets are ahead of schedule.

We on this side of the House are listening to people. I am sure the minister is also listening to people who are in the ranks of the unemployed, people on welfare, people whose businesses are in perilous conditions.

They are hearing this government boast of inflation targets ahead of schedule and the lowest interest rates in 20 years. There is a new statistic here today that the actual deficit in relation to the Canadian economy from 1984 to today was reduced from 8 per cent to 4 per cent. That is a new number for me. I take it that is what the minister said in his remarks. It is a new number for me. It is another signal to me that things are heading in the right direction.

The question I would like to ask the minister on behalf of the three million people who are out of work—and currently the government is funding that sector of our nation to the tune of almost $30 billion between UI funds and welfare—when is the government going to let up and realize that we cannot leave those three million people hanging forever?

We must institute immediately some measures that will get these people back to work. You cannot attack the deficit and debt of this nation when you have three million people not working.

When will the government relent on ratcheting down inflation and start focusing on putting people back to work?

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has not come up with any suggestions. Is he saying that now that we have got inflation down and now that we have interest rates down—we have the basics there—then the economy is going to start working? We see all kinds of signs of that now. Talk to people in business. They are now getting orders. They are getting calls for proposals and so on that they have not seen in the last year and a half. It is starting to happen.

My hon. friend brings up a figure of three million people out of work. I am not sure where that number comes from. We will not debate that. But the policy that the Liberals want is to borrow money—

An hon. member: No.

Mr. McDermid: Oh, yes. You do not come up with a billion dollars just like that unless you increase taxes or borrow money.

Mr. Mills: You are spending $30 billion on unemployment and welfare now.

Mr. McDermid: Okay, now he wants us to raise taxes or borrow money. That is how government gets its income. Let us be frank about it. He says there are three million unemployed.

Admit that the proposals of the Liberal government would only create jobs for 70,000 people and only part-time, make-work projects that would run out in a short period of time.

An hon. member: Like Katimavik.

Mr. McDermid: Like Katimavik, yes, exactly. That is exactly what the Liberals are saying today. I have unemployed people in my constituency who I am extremely concerned about. I have businesses that are failing, but I have businesses that are being created as well.

I can tell the hon. member that we are poised to gain recovery. I am not saying this. The Economic Council is saying it. The OECD and individual think-tanks across this country that have the knowledge are saying it. It is not the government that is saying it. As a matter of fact we are more conservative in the projections we are making than some of the other organizations making projections. Every one of them says we are going to have a better recovery than any other country in the world going through this recession.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to my hon. colleague in his commentary. I heard a request for specific suggestions for steps that could be taken now to alleviate some of the suffering and pain people are experiencing as a result of the recession.

I want to ask my friend the following question. One of the programs we have found to be very successful in Kamloops comes under the umbrella of the Community Futures initiative whereby some individuals who are presently jobless and collecting unemployment insurance are able to get permission to start up a new small business. As a result, over 400 new enterprises have been initiated in the Kamloops area in the past number of months. Today they are small businesses and are thriving. They employ people who were previously on unemployment insurance, as well as a number of other people and of course that helps other businesses.

A second related initiative under the umbrella of Community Futures allows small businesses to borrow up to a maximum of about $70,000 to start a new venture, product line or some new initiative in the hope of expanding and diversifying the local economy. Again this has been very successful.

Considering the excellent track record and the long list of successes that have resulted from these two programs, and the fact that the government is continuing to fund these programs, would the minister not consider it to be the kind of initiative that ought to receive additional support? If we can start 400 small businesses in the Kamloops area alone over the last number of months with the existing limitations, why not open that up to allow more opportunities? Why not provide more funding? Again, these are not grants or gifts. These are loans that will all be repaid.

Why can we not expand that program significantly because of the tremendous success it has experienced, particularly in the local economies?

Mr. McDermid: First of all I want to thank the hon. member for his compliments. The Community Futures program was brought in by the Minister of Employment and Immigration of the Conservative government. I am pleased to hear of its success. It is meeting success across the country in various areas.

I guess my answer to my hon friend is that we have a certain amount of money. The pie is there and we divide the pie up. If I am going to give more to that program, I will have to take it away from another program. I am going to have to make those decisions within my budget allocations. That is something the minister responsible for that area does, because he is also responsible for training and retraining.

We have heard how badly Canada trains and retrains its work force. The government tends to put all the money into these things, while the private sector is not doing the training and retraining it should. We do half of what they do in the United States, one-quarter of what they do in Japan and a one-fifth, I think, of what they do in Germany.

We put money into training and retraining, we put money into Community Futures and myriad programs within that ministry. All have met with success, some maybe more than others, and I am pleased to hear that compliment. I want to thank my hon. friend. When you put more money into a program, you have to keep it within the fiscal framework. You have to decide where they go when you make up your budgets. I am pleased to hear they have been successful, and I will pass that on to the minister. I know he will be very pleased to hear about that, and hopefully he may be able to find more money within his fiscal framework to help that program even further.

Thank you for the compliment. We appreciate it.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, my hon. friend must have misunderstood. He knows there is no government money in the unemployment insurance program when he says he will try to find additional funding. I am suggesting that he simply unleash some of those restrictions or shackles the small entrepreneur has as a result of government policy to allow a more flexible use of the unemployment insurance program. I am not asking for any additional expenditures.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Just to begin, Mr. Speaker, I would like to advise you, and through you the House, that it is the intention of the New Democratic caucus, as its members come forward to speak, to split their speaking time in half. Instead of speaking for 20 minutes and following that with a 10 minute question and comment period, it is our intention to have two speakers per slot, with each speaker speaking for 10 minutes followed by a 5-minute question and comment period, with your kind indulgence.

I should start by regretting the fact that the good news, as the hon. minister took it from my esteemed colleague representing Kamloops, will unfortunately be the only good news he hears in the next little while. The fact of the matter is that the various economic and—I use the word advisedly—developmental policies pursued by this government for the last several years have proven to be little short of a complete and total disaster for the ordinary working people of this country.

It somewhat surprises me that the members of the government continue to evidence a complete lack of the most basic understanding of the horrifyingly clear trends.

It is odd, to say the least, that they seem unable to detect the correlation between the maintenance of the high Canadian dollar and the record number of business bankruptcies.

It seems odd to me that they fail to detect the correlation between the implementation of the free trade agreement and the disappearance of hundreds of thousands of jobs.

It strikes me at least as odd that they apparently continue to be unable to perceive the correlation between the continued high interest rate relative to the United States and the blossoming array of personal bankruptcies in the provinces and territories across this country.

What would be painfully obvious to a child in grade school continues, through some bizarre alchemy, to elude the members of the government. I think it is for this reason more than anything else, that the Canadian people have been subjected to the wanton fiscal and monetary madness that has gripped this country in the service of the government for the last several years.

I would briefly like to tell you, because I represent the riding of Edmonton East, some of the things that have been going on in Edmonton and Alberta. I will start with the unemployment rate. That is easy enough to comprehend.

The unemployment rate for Edmonton, the capital of the oil province of Canada, for January 1992 hit 10.9 per cent. There are only six other cities of the 25 surveyed by Statistics Canada that have an unemployment rate higher than Edmonton. Edmonton has the seventh highest surveyed unemployment rate in the country. That includes all of the cities in the maritimes and most of the cities in Ontario and Quebec.

From January of 1990 to January of 1992, Edmonton's population increased by 3.4 per cent.

The number of people unemployed in Edmonton in that same period increased by 39 per cent. This is not an accident. This is not something that has happened totally by the will of God. This is a consequence of government policy, and it hurts people. It hurts them very, very badly. It kills some of them.

1991 was a bad year. Evidence of this can be found in the newspapers and other news media of Edmonton. I would just quote briefly from a story that appeared in The Edmonton Sun on January 12 of this year, entitled "A Year of Hardship". It says: "Alberta merchants suffered a $5 million drop in sales, the bulk of that in department stores from June to July according to StatsCan. By August, it dropped $11 million. In December, StatsCan reported retailers took a whopping $87 million hit to their bottom line, the biggest plunge in the country".

The story goes on: "The oil patch is headed for an even bleaker year", says Hans Macie, vice-president of the Canadian Petroleum Association. The article quotes Macie as saying: "1992 is going to be the toughest year but hopefully that will be the bottom". Indeed we are deeply hopeful that will be the bottom.

The article goes on: "At the close of 1991, thanks to seven years of low commodity prices, Alberta farm bankruptcies had already hit a six-year high".

On February 5, just a couple of weeks ago, The Edmonton Sun published a story called: "Bankruptcy records busted". "These are the highest bankruptcy numbers we have ever seen", said Edmonton Consumer and Corporate Affairs spokesman John Proctor. "In Alberta, there were 6,814 bankruptcies recorded last year, up 39 per cent from 1990", Consumer and Corporate Affairs says.

"Edmonton suffered 2,575 consumer and business bankruptcies in 1991, also a record," the agency reported. "New Alberta records were set in both October and November. January is going to be the highest month ever in Alberta", said Mr. John Proctor.

The Edmonton Journal of February 6, from a story "Speaking of the oil patch" noted: "Total industry job loss over 10,000 people in three tough years". Roughly 90 per cent of the lost jobs were in Alberta.

As Gerry Protti, the executive director of the Independent Petroleum Association put it: "When drilling crews are not working, hotels, restaurants and truckers lose business along with every other service outfit involved with exploration".

Lastly, lest people be tempted to swallow the snake oil being vended in this Chamber this morning by people who insist that recovery is just around the corner, how long have we been hearing that? Six months? Nine months? A year? Sixteen months? How long has the recovery been just around the corner? That corner seems to have more sides than can be geometrically calculated.

The headline from The Edmonton Sun of February 14, last Friday, said: "Edmonton's Next Wave of lay-offs forecast". It notes that Murray Wade, a client services consultant with Right Associates, speaking to an overflow crowd at a Personnel Association of Edmonton luncheon said: "If the government lives up to its promises in financial cutbacks, you will see real jobs disappear. In our middle and large-scale industries here, I think there are punches that are coming there as well".

The happy talk is due to be blown away, as has all the other happy talk of the last year and a half. The government remains fixated on elusive monetary goals and in pursuing them has harmed real people.

According to the 1986 census, and I have no doubt it has become worse since, mine is the 14th poorest riding in the country. When I go back to my riding and walk and drive through the streets, I see the unemployed in my neighbourhood. I know the unemployed. I get an unending stream of the unemployed in my office.

They are the casualties in this blind war against punitive inflation. As we wrestle inflation down, we crush the unemployed into the mat. The policies that this government has been pursuing must end. They must be reversed if for no other reason than it must be crystal clear by now to anybody that an economy exists to serve people. When you have better than 10 per cent of your work force out of work, thrown on to the street, your economy is not doing that. It is not serving people; it is harming them. That is what must stop.

If the government in all its assembled wisdom cannot figure out a way to do it, then it should step aside and let those with ideas who can get in and do it.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I listened to 10 minutes of interesting statements, but I did not hear one solution come from the New Democratic Party, which is kind of interesting.

The hon. member talked about the high Canadian dollar. I want him to say to the House what level the dollar should be at, and is the New Democratic Party set to peg the dollar? Is that its policy?

The member talked about low commodity prices for products. I gather he was talking about grains and oilseeds. He was talking about natural gas, oil and so on. I want to ask the hon. member: Are these prices not set on a world basis? Do we in Canada not have to follow those world prices if we are going to sell our products? If we are going to get the drilling rigs back into the field they are going to need a market. As he knows, consumption has dropped rather dramatically. The hon. member's party has advocated less consumption. That is part of conservation. We all supported that. I think the hon. member would do that. That had an awful lot to do with commodity prices dropping.

Therefore, are commodity prices not set on international prices? It really cannot lay that one on the Canadian government.

The third thing he talked about was bankruptcies. Personal bankruptcies are up in this country. There is no question about that. Most of the experts, people outside government, say that Canada went on a credit binge for that period time and it is now catching up to us.

Business bankruptcies, fortunately, were down 3 per cent in 1991. That is slowing down, and I am pleased to see that. I am concerned about the personal bankruptcies. Again, would the hon. member not admit that an awful lot of that had to do with a credit binge in a period of high inflation, high growth, the period in the mid-1980s when people spent a tremendous amount of money?

I will just ask those three questions because he only has a couple of minutes left.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, in fact there were four questions. I must apologize to the hon. minister in advance if I do not get through them all in the time remaining. However, I will take them each in turn.

First, on positive proposals for new policies, I do not see how anyone could have sat in this House for the last year and failed to note the array of policy proposals put forward by the New Democratic Party, most of which were repeated time and time again, everything from the taxation proposals made by the hon. member for Winnipeg—Transcona to the economic development proposals made by the hon. the member for Essex—Windsor to a variety of others, including all those persistently advanced by the Leader of the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Yukon.

For the hon. minister to stand in his place and say that he has not been able to see any proposals coming across the way from the New Democratic Party really confirms my belief that they have a great deal of trouble seeing all sorts of things that are right in front of their noses. By the way, some of these suggestions will be repeated in a similar form prior to the introduction of the budget. We are going to give you another chance. We hope you see it this time. We hope you act on it this time.

Mr. Speaker, I must apologize for not using the third person there. We are resigned to the possibility, nay the probability, that once again these proposals will be ignored. But this will not last forever. There is an election coming and changes will be made.

As to the dollar, the simplest thing to do, of course, is to unpeg the dollar, not to use the Bank of Canada and its Thursday spending spree to keep the interest rate high. Once you let the interest rate drop and indeed encourage it to drop to a level of perhaps a 1 to 1.5 percentage point spread above the American interest rate, which would still be sufficient to keep our paper more or less attractive, your dollar will fall. You bet it will fall. To where will it fall? Who knows? The best guess is somewhere between 75 cents and 80 cents. Is that going to make imported goods more expensive? You bet. It is also going to spur Canadian industry like virtually nothing else that could be done by any government.

If it comes to a choice for the Canadian people between paying another $100 for a VCR and having a job, my guess is that they will take the job and to hell with the VCR.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to participate in debate on the motion of my colleague from Willowdale.

Members of the NDP were supposed to go again. They do not have a speaker, so I guess I should just continue. They are once again losing their sense of practicality.

This morning on my way to Ottawa, I got into a cab. The very first question I asked Joe Lally, the cab driver, was: "Joe, what is wrong with Canada?" He said: "Dennis, the problem is the politicians".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I want to ask the hon. member if he has split his time or—

Mr. Mills: No.

Some hon. members: Go ahead.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): For 20 minutes, the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I am speaking for the Liberal Party. I am not speaking for the New Democratic Party today.

Mr. McDermid: Something new and different.

Mr. Mills: The minister of state for finance has strong influence on my views.

As I was saying earlier, the cab driver this morning said: "The problem with this country is the politicians". He said: "They send out a signal that they do not care. They send out a signal that they are living up here in an ivory tower. They send out a signal that they are not listening to people and that they have no common sense". He also said: "And there is absolutely no sense of urgency".

This had an influence on me this morning because we are talking about a man who probably listens to 300 to 400 Canadians a week from all walks of life. A cab driver in a major urban centre like my city of Toronto will meet and service people around the clock from all walks of life. It could be senior citizens going to the grocery store. It could be rushing families to the hospital or a doctor's appointment. It could be businessmen rushing to a meeting or rushing to the airport. I have always had tremendous respect for the cab drivers of this country. I think they have a pretty good pulse as to what is going on in the nation.

As I reflected on Joe's words, I started to think about what has been going on here in this House since we came back after the Christmas recess where we were working in our ridings. Quite frankly, when you review the last two weeks, and this is the beginning of our third week, what have we done in this House of Commons to relieve the unemployment in this country? What action have we taken to show Canadians that we understand the sense of urgency, the sense of pain? If you have reflected on that over the last two weeks, you have had a tough time. What do we do in Question Period every day? What do we accomplish? This place is a mirror of the mood of this nation. It is not a very productive mood right now.

I listened to the Minister of State for Finance and Privatization. He gave some numbers which were sound numbers; inflation targets ahead of schedule, interest rates at the lowest in 20 years. I am not going to debate those numbers. I think those are hopeful numbers. At the same time, he did not add into his mix some specific initiatives that the government was going to take to get people going, to get people working again.

One thing he did say in his speech is: "We want to put the onus on the private sector to rekindle job creation in this country". The private sector right now is not really hiring. Its members do not have the confidence. They do not feel that the direction that we are heading in is one of sustained economic growth. They do not see this recovery that the minister talks about. They are hoping that it is there but they do not feel it. As a result, we have 1.7 million businesses in this country which are not taking that leap of faith.

I have said repeatedly in this House of Commons that the entrepreneurs of this country are our greatest hope for new job creation. The minister is nodding in agreement. The entrepreneurs are saying to me: "We need more of an incentive. We need more of a boost". They are not responding to this government's policy initiatives.

The minister said earlier that we on this side of the House are promoting more taxes. That is categorically false. We are not promoting more taxes. We are asking for refinement of the current tax system so that it is fairer and simpler. No one on that side of the House will debate that is something achievable if we work harder at it together.

We are not suggesting on this side of the House that we should add more debt or more deficit. There are ideas that exist and have been presented by members of this House of Commons to the government where there has been absolutely no reaction to them.

Last week, on Friday, the member for York South—Weston put forward ideas. I put forward ideas that the hon. Minister of State for Finance and Privatization worked on when he was in opposition when he was on that task force on new job opportunities for the eighties, "Work For Tomorrow", with 184 recommendations from retraining to municipal infrastructure, you name it. The member for Brampton was a part of that committee. He is well acquainted with those 184 ideas that when he was in opposition he presented to the government when we were the government.

When we were the government we acted on a lot of those recommendations. I will be specific on one. The member for Winnipeg South Centre was the minister of employment.

At that time, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre had a specific idea called the NEED program, where we used money that was already going into unemployment insurance and welfare. We told the millions of entrepreneurs out there that if they took someone off UI, put them on their payroll and retrained them, we would subsidize their payroll equal to the disbursement we were already paying from the UI fund.

That was one of the most successful job creation programs this country has ever seen and was implemented at a time when people were crying out to be put back to work. Now we have 1,7 million entrepreneurs. Just imagine if each one of those companies hired one person. Just imagine if we could switch the $30 billion we pay out on UI and welfare from one side of the ledger to the other by putting it into the private sector. When we subsidize it for a year, at least people are working. When they are working they have their dignity back. When they are working they are paying taxes. They are buying food and clothes and the whole will of the country changes.

If the member were serious when he asked for ideas earlier, why not review his own task force he worked on when he was in opposition, with the 184 ideas? Why not put them before this House and let us go through them, recommendation by recommendation. Let us get this country back to work.

An hon. member: Good point.

Mr. Mills: Why not review the NEED program which we know has a winning record because we tried it? I am not suggesting the government would not look at it because it was a Liberal plan. Who knows? Maybe it was not even a Liberal idea. Maybe it was the hon. member's. I do not know. I do not remember. The government has to understand that Canadians have the kind of feeling you have when you go into an emergency ward in deep pain. They do not want the doctor to tell them to come back in three months when the economy is recovering. They want service. They want attention. They want caring right now. We are begging this government to please listen to what Canadians are asking us to present to you. Please go back into your files, dust off some of those ideas and have the courage to implement them.

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I want to be sure whether the opposition party is splitting its time.

[Translation]

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, as my colleague mentioned, from now on, members of the Official Opposition will share their time, ten minutes and five minutes for questions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): We begin the five-minute period for questions and comments. The hon. Minister of State for Finance and Privatization.

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I do not want the hon. member to leave the impression that this government has done nothing to help individuals when it comes to the employment situation. Earlier we heard my hon. friend from Kamloops talk about the Community Futures program which gets people off unemployment and into businesses and encourages them to hire. There are programs available to do that.

The hon. member is entirely right. There were 184 recommendations. I am glad he could find one that the government acted on, because my colleague from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce was the chairman of that particular committee and was very concerned about the lack of action taken. I would agree with the hon. member. I think it is still a propos today. Our committee was faced with a high unemployment rate at that particular time, yet we did not have the skilled people to fill all the available 300,000 skilled job openings last year.

That is exactly why that committee was set up. A lot of the recommendations were for the private sector to train and retrain. Now this was back in 1980, 1981 and 1982 when we did this study, and it is still pertinent today. I thank the hon. member for bringing it forward as a suggestion. I think there are some good opportunities there for the government to act. I suggest he be a little patient until the budget, which is not that far away, to see exactly what the government plans to do.

• (1340)

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, the member just made a statement. He said to be patient until the budget. That is a tough thing to sell when people are really scraping. Let us just take the province of Newfoundland as an example, where things are in desperate shape. Colleagues in our caucus from Newfoundland told us recently that people are actually closing homes and moving in together to save on hydro and heating. They are sharing and trying to get through this crisis together. When my cab driver friend from downtown Toronto said that we live up here in an ivory tower, he was not just referring to situations in Toronto. He had heard from friends in disadvantaged regions of this country where the state of desperation is worse than any catastrophe that has ever happened in any emergency ward of any hospital. And they want us to act on it now.

Now, Now, Now, has to be the operative word. That is what we are humbly suggesting to the government. The minister says to wait for the budget. It better be good because he is hanging a lot on it.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Very briefly, the hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, I heard the minister say that more than 300,000 jobs were not filled because of a lack of technical or other skills, and in fact I am familiar with these figures. I would therefore ask the hon. member who just made a number of suggestions whether he would agree this is the right time to have a national service for young people who are 16 and over, have left school without finishing high school, have no trade, no jobs and as a result no future. Would the hon. member consider the concept of a national service, for two years at least, to give these young people a chance to acquire some kind of technical or other skills in order to fill the jobs to which the minister was referring?

[English]

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, in a brief answer to that, respecting all of the concerns of deficit and debt, we in the Liberal side of the House share the view of many in this House—my colleague from York North has mentioned this before, as you have mentioned—that we should return to the idea of a Company of Young Canadians.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mills: Now, listen here. You put an idea forward and look at the reaction.

An hon. member: It didn't work.

Mr. Mills: Of course it worked. It created some of the greatest leaders this country has ever produced. I would modify it and not have those projects, in terms of Company of Young Canadians, with a special environmental thrust. I would shoot those Canadians all over the world. We are missing opportunities all over the world in terms of trading advantage because this government has cut the PEMD funds and the training funds. We have to get back to basics.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate, the hon. member for Saint-Léonard for 10 minutes.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House today condemns the Conservative government for its economic incompetence. Its glaring incompetence is responsible for the current recession, and that is why I have no hesitation in supporting my colleague's motion. In fact, I would like to start by congratulating the hon. member for Willowdale, Ontario, for presenting this motion and leading off the debate this morning that will continue throughout the day. I realize that his province's economy has been seriously weakened by the Conservative government's unsound economic policies.

I understand why my colleague from Ontario is so frustrated, because Quebec is feeling the effects of this government's disastrous policies as well. In fact, the entire country is in the middle of one of the worst recessions in our history. The only difference between this recession and the depression in the thirties is that today we have social programs to help people in need, people who are unemployed and living in poverty.

In Canada tax increases, the GST, the free trade agreement with the United States, an absurd monetary policy and cuts in transfer payments to the provinces have depressed both supply and demand. The Tory Government is aiming for zero inflation. Inflation had to be brought down at any cost, and it is the fight against inflation and the means used to that end which are partly responsible for the present economic recession and for the many victims that have fallen along the wayside. The victims to which I refer are the 62,227 consumers and 13,496 companies that went bankrupt in 1991.

I also said there were 1.5 million unemployed in this country, and this is not counting those who have given up looking for a job and are no longer part of our unemployment insurance statistics.

The government's economic incompetence and the government's policies have managed to substantially reduce the purchasing power of the consumer. The government has eroded the incomes of Canadians to such an extent that they are spending far less. There are many reasons why Canadians are no longer spending. In the current situation, people who are unemployed do not have money to spend, and those who still have money are no longer spending because they are afraid of losing their jobs.

That is why today—I know we all are faced with the same problems—when we walk down the street in our ridings we see signs saying "store for rent", "store vacant", "closed", and our riding offices are crowded with people standing in line, waiting for us to help find them a job. Unfortunately there are no jobs, and the government is doing nothing about it.

It is a vicious circle. Why do we have so many lay-offs and factory closings? Earlier the minister of state for finance told my colleague from Toronto to be patient and wait for the Budget. Incidentally, not quite a year ago, on February 26, the former Minister of Finance said in his budget speech that this Budget was designed for economic recovery, a confident recovery that would lead us to prosperity. Well, this is one year later. Where is our prosperity? Where is the economic recovery the Minister of Finance announced in his budget? A few weeks or days from now, when a new budget is brought down, will the minister tell the House and Canadians again: Yes, we are on the way to recovery, we will have a terrific year, and we will have the highest growth rate in the world. How is that going to provide jobs for unemployed Canadians? What kind of answers does he have for all those Canadians and small businesses that went bankrupt and are still going bankrupt, because the government is doing nothing except causing more and more plant closing and bankruptcies?

Yes, Canadians are prepared to be patient for a few more days or weeks. But I hope the Minister of Finance and his cabinet colleagues will realize that action is necessary. It is easy to tell Canadians: "Wait, things are bad all over, we cannot do anything". If Canadians cannot go to the banks, which refuse to lend them money because they have no assets, where are they going to go? They cannot trust the leader of the government to give them hope, to intervene, so that people who do have jobs renew their confidence in the future and start spending. The unemployed would be confident that jobs would be created, the economy would gradually recover and we would finally have a country where everyone could find a job and would have hope.

• (1350)

[English]

About one month ago I received a letter from a young Canadian. I had sent out my householder reflecting on the current constitutional situation, asking my constituents to be patriotic, to continue to believe in Canada and to work together to keep this country together.

She wrote to me and said: "Yes, sir, I have been patriotic for so many years. I worked in the 1980 campaign for the referendum to keep this country together. It is two years since I graduated and I have been looking for a job. Yet I have not found a job". She asked me: "How do you expect me to be patriotic and to continue to believe in this country if after so many years of hard studies I cannot get a job?"

She told me of her experience going from one company to another and being asked whether she had any experience. After one year of searching she went back to the same company and was asked why after one year she could not get even six months of experience.

This is becoming kind of a vicious circle. We expect our young people when asking for a job to have experience. But if they do not start to work somewhere, how can they get experience? That is the issue we have to face today.

If we want to keep this country together, we have to give hope to Canadians, especially the young people.

In the next budget speech that the Minister of Finance will deliver in this House in a few days or a week or so, I hope that there will be that creation of hope, a real hope. Not like the hope his predecessor one year ago in this House on February 26 said the budget would create. He said it would stimulate the economy and would create prosperity the greatest prosperity we have ever had.

After one year we still have high unemployment, 1.5 million Canadians not working, a record number of bankruptcies, and every day we hear of closures of businesses and hundreds and hundreds of jobs lost. Canadians more and more are losing confidence.

Those who have no jobs, have no money to spend and those who have jobs, are afraid of losing their jobs. They are not spending and therefore stores and shops feel the effect. That is why in every commercial street that we go to, we see for rent and closed because of bankruptcy signs. That is very discouraging.

Mr. Speaker, you have signalled me that my time has expired. I want to say that I support the hon. member for Willowdale that now is the time, that the government has to act and to give hope to Canadians. I hope that the next budget which should be brought down as soon as possible gives hope to Canadians and, most of all, creates new jobs.

[Translation]

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the concern shown by the hon. member for Saint-Léonard for these important economic issues. In this connection I would be grateful for some clarification.

First of all, I may refer to the time when we were on our way out of a recession in 1981–82, when interest rates in this country as a result of major projects started at the time had risen to 23 per cent and inflation was around 13 per cent.

Today we are also at the end of a recessionary period. Interest rates are around 8 per cent or less and inflation is around 3.5 per cent. I notice that the members of his party, especially his leader, are promoting and defending a policy that favours major public works, including highway construction. They are also promoting the use of registered retirement savings plans to urge Canadians to spend more.

I have two specific questions about this policy of major works. First, some of his colleagues said that if Canadians could use their registered retirement savings plans, it would not create financial pressure because the funds would simply be transferred. But they forgot that these funds are already at the disposal of certain companies or trusts and are being used. If they withdraw them, these companies which are now using the funds will have to borrow elsewhere, so it will create financial pressure.

Second, concerning the major public works being advocated, I would like to know where the hon. member will get the money. Will it be from additional taxes? Or will it be by additional borrowing?

Mr. Gagliano: First of all, Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his question concerning interest rates and inflation and the period around 1983, I suppose. I think if we look at interest rates today, because he talked about a rate of 8.5 per cent and 3 per cent inflation, that is the average interest rate now, but the rate varies depending on how good the customer is and the kind of loan. The average rate for an ordinary Canadian is about 12.5 per cent. We still have the same problem of the difference between current interest rates and inflation being 10 per cent. I just wanted to make that clarification.

In his two specific questions on registered retirement savings plans he talks about financial pressure. The problem we have today is that all financial institutions have tightened the screws because of the recession and many Canadians and companies are unable to obtain credit from the banks. There is no shortage of money, but because of the economic crisis they take fewer risks than when the economy is good. Allowing withdrawals up to a certain amount from RRSPs would encourage Canadians who have money tied up in such savings to go and buy a house and thus revive the economy and the construction industry. We know very well that the construction industry is a major driving force of our economy. Once the construction industry has revived and is doing well, the other parts of the economy will follow: labour and materials, 90 per cent of which are made in Canada.

Regarding infrastructure, I think my leader was clear when he announced this idea a couple of weeks ago. No, we do not want new taxes. Canadians are already taxed enough, but we even figured out that the money which the government has to spend on welfare and unemployment insurance could instead finance such programs and revive the economy, thus putting people to work, creating demand for new materials and stimulating the building industry in Canada. In that way we could not only do work that must be done in any case since our roads and sewers are in bad shape and we have environmental problems, but we could revive the economy without the government having to spend more than it would have to spend on welfare and unemployment insurance.

[English]

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, obviously I only have a couple of minutes barely to get started here. I guess in the time honoured fashion I would like to tell the hon. members what I am going to tell them after Question Period is over later on this afternoon.

What I am going to tell them is that there are very good signs about the economic recovery in Canada. I am going to elaborate on some of those statistics and those facts. Then I am also going to deal with the real competitive world that is out there and the stark realities that we have to face as a nation as we prepare for them.

Mr. Speaker, if I may anticipate two o'clock without moving more fully into my remarks, I would—

An hon. member: Talk a little slower.

Mr. Bird: I will try. Would you like me to continue, Mr. Speaker, or would you like me to call it two o'clock at this time?

Mr. Speaker: I want to thank the hon. member. It being two o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to Statements by Members, pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

HERITAGE DAY

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, today is Heritage Day, a day on which we as Canadians have an opportunity to celebrate those elements of our past that remind us of our roots and reflect the bonds which we hold in common as a society.

Our rich and diverse heritage, a veritable myriad of traditions, ideas, values, objects, historic places and natural landscapes, provides us with the means to know and understand ourselves better.

In this time of crisis for Canada, a crisis which is as much cultural as it is political in its origins, we should take time to reflect upon the common denominators of our heritage and to give thanks for having the opportunity to live in a nation so blessed by history, by geography and by the traditions and values which we share as a people.

It is a contemporary reality speaking to us of shared experiences and values, whether these are rooted in the rich history and culture of our aboriginal peoples, the traditions of Canadians of English and French speaking origins, or the distinctive cultural contributions of the many citizens of other ethnic origins who have willingly chosen to make Canada their home.

It is this heritage which will be the source of knowledge and inspiration for the successful development and evolution of Canadian society.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, at a critical time at the GATT negotiations, the government must recall that supply management has provided Canadian consumers with plentiful supplies of high quality food at affordable prices and helped preserve the family farm as a way of life.

[Translation]

Furthermore, supply management has proven itself to be a rational method of matching domestic production to domestic requirements. It is also a much more humane and efficient system than the free market, since resources are not wasted on overproduction and surpluses do not rot in warehouses.

[English]

The future of our $10.2 billion dairy, poultry and egg producing sector and its 98,000 jobs is at stake. In Atlantic Canada the elimination of supply management would seriously jeopardize an industry which is worth some $642 million and which provides nearly 6,300 jobs in the region.

[Translation]

Finally, I urge the government to spare no effort in its GATT negotiations to ensure the preservation of viable and effective supply management programs.

CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, I stand today to commend the efforts of the architectural students of the University of Manitoba. These students created a large Valentine's card to be sent to all Canadians.

Along with the signatures of the university students, the card became highly visible at the Festival de Voyageur and in other parts of Winnipeg.

The efforts of Mr. Jim Laidlaw and his colleagues have brought out the silent majority of Canadians who love their country.

In the future I hope more of the silent majority step forward to show their love for Canada.

Mr. Speaker, keep your eyes open. The Kinsmen "Proud to be Canadian" tour is on its way to Ottawa.

DEBRIS CONTROL BOARD

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, in 1979 the Debris Control Board was formed due to widespread concern over debris in the Fraser and Harrison Rivers, the Gulf of Georgia and Howe Sound. This will be of particular interest to you, Mr. Speaker, as your constituency overlooks this particular waterway. Debris was choking the wildlife habitat in the Fraser delta and posed a hazard to fishermen and pleasure boaters. The board has received praise for its programs which remove over 80 per cent of waterway debris and have improved the habitat for juvenile salmon in the Fraser estuary.

For 12 years, the Government of British Columbia and the B.C. Council of Forest Industries have funded this important body, contingent on equal federal participation through the Departments of Forestry, Fisheries and Oceans and Transport. Fisheries and Oceans terminated its contribution in March 1991 and Forestry and Transport will follow suit this March.

The much touted green plan of the Government of Canada has earmarked $100 million for the clean-up of the Fraser River basin. As the Debris Control Board's work is directly tied to this goal, it is logical to continue funding the board from this source.

I urge the Government of Canada to reaffirm its support and reinstate funding, which is only $180,000, to permit this critical environmental control board to continue in the Fraser delta.

HERITAGE DAY

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, Heritage Day will be celebrated across the country today, February 17.

Canadians will participate in community activities including poster contests and heritage fairs. Schools will offer students special Heritage Day lessons in such varied subject areas as English, social studies and drama.

Community and classroom events are an excellent way to celebrate our rich and varied heritage. What better way to instil pride in our national heritage than to start each school day with the singing of our national anthem, O Canada, and I would like to add with feeling.

We have much for which we can be proud and grateful. Reminding ourselves of our good fortune on a daily basis could not hurt, and I think it will surely help. Let's celebrate our heritage.

HERITAGE DAY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, today is Heritage Day, a day when we celebrate our country's grass roots commitment to the elements that make up this great country.

Our culture, our environment, our architecture, our people are all part of Canada from coast to coast to coast. The third Monday in February is a day for all Canadians to reflect on what it means to be a Canadian.

It should also give all of us that necessary break during the long stretch from New Year's to Easter. Let us hope that we will have a country to celebrate on the next Heritage Day, February 15, 1993. Let's hope for Canada.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, through you, I have a short message for the Minister of Finance from my constituents. We know that he has a tough job and difficult decisions to make.

Everybody seems to have their own solution as to our economic problems. Unfortunately many of the solutions are in conflict with one another, and some are too simplistic to use.

There is a common message that they have, that there is a need to restore consumer confidence and control government spending.

We ask that he hold the line on taxes. There should be no new spending and every nickel from the GST should be applied to the deficit and debt. We do want to compliment him because interest rates are going in the right direction.

There are some people hurting and looking for a recovery, but we agree that the government should not buy us out of the recession. Everyone has what they think are the answers, but he is the one who has to make the decisions. We wish him good luck with the budget.

HERITAGE DAY

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, today is Heritage Day and Canadians from coast to coast to coast celebrate Canada's diverse cultural peoples, environment, history and traditions, but unfortunately federal heritage policy has not yet had the attention it duly deserves.

In the fall of 1990 the government raised expectations by convening a conference of over 200 heritage experts to identify and discuss issues and options for actions for the development of a comprehensive heritage strategy.

After much discussion and thousands of dollars spent, a team of government officials were brought together to produce a discussion paper on heritage policy. However, nearly two years have passed, the team has been disbanded and while a paper has been written, this government's, lack of political will is gathering dust on government shelves.

As well, today it narrowly defeated a bill to declare this third Monday a national heritage day holiday. In the midst of uncertainty of our national futures, Canadians need more symbols of our common heritage and national identity.

I ask the government to get on with the job and release its discussion paper on national heritage, a step of respect toward our people and our country.

CANADIAN OLYMPIC ASSOCIATION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, in his column on the Albertville Winter Games, journalist Réjean Tremblay writes in La Presse of February 13, 1992 that all the freeloaders from the Canadian Olympic Association travel at government expense and have made the association into a travel agency.

Mr. Tremblay, you say that you have already collected quite a file on the doings of the top people at the Canadian Olympic Association, so write another article on it and on behalf of Canadian taxpayers ask the Canadian Olympic Association to open its books on its detailed income and expenses, as I do as member of Parliament for Abitibi.

Mr. Tremblay, you were afraid to write what percentage the Canadian government contributes: It is less than 7 per cent of the total budget of the Canadian Olympic Association. Go ahead don't be afraid; tell the truth.

OLYMPIC GAMES

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of our members, I would like to join with all members in the House and congratulate Kerrin Lee-Gartner on her tremendous performance on Saturday.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Brewin: I note for the record that members on all sides are applauding that statement.

Kerrin showed skill, stamina and just great enthusiasm in her win. It was a great win for her, for her family and for Canadian athletes, especially women. It is noteworthy that all four Canadian gold medals in skiing over the years have been won by women: Nancy Greene, Ann Heggtveit, Kathy Kreiner and now Kerrin Lee-Gartner. It is a tremendous victory for her.

• (1410)

We should also congratulate Phillipe Laroche and Nicholas Fontaine for their show and say one final word to those who did not win medals. Kurt Browning, in particular, deserves the congratulations of this House for his showing over the years in all kinds of events. We were disappointed for him but not for ourselves in his performance.

We congratulate all young athletes who are performing so well for Canada in the Olympics.

FORESTRY

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, in the northwestern United States up to 14 per cent of all timber is being exported as round logs. This is mostly from private land owned by the large integrated forest companies. Large profits from the export of raw logs then allows these companies to bid up the price of timber at auction from the public lands. This forces the smaller, independent loggers and sawmills out of business.

The net effect is that the American consumer pays unnecessarily high prices. Many small American companies are forced out of business and Canadian companies are being asked to pay unfair tariffs.

Canadian sawmills and logging operations are also out of business or being shut down, and thousands of Canadian workers are out of work because of the ridiculous policies and strong lobbies in the U.S.

I would encourage the Canadian government to resist any attempts by the U.S. to impose countervail duties asked for by these greedy American companies due to mismanagement of their forest resources by the American government and industry.

PRAIRIE ECONOMY

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, this last weekend 150 people came together in Winnipeg to prepare a blueprint for the economic and social integration of the prairies.

There was a call to overcome the fragmentation and duplication which in the past held back economic growth and development. Many constructive recommendations emerged, notably the restructuring of post-secondary education, the pooling of capital for regional development, and the co-ordination of environmental and agricultural policies.

Many of these proposals to reinvigorate the prairie economy require strong federal leadership. The Western Economic Diversification Fund should be restructured and targeted to specific priorities for the region in conjunction with research institutes and the private sector.

There needs to be new regulatory systems in transportation and telecommunications so that they can be co-ordinated to ensure better service, lower cost joint research projects, and to meet regional priorities.

Immigration and manpower training programs should be tailored to meet the needs of the region. There was a call for the federal government to champion more actively the work for Canadian prairie entrepreneurs abroad.

I would like to urge the federal government to pursue the constructive proposals of the Prairie Integration Conference and show its commitment as the participants did to building a strong, united and prosperous prairie region as part of a renewed Canada.

TOBACCO

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, who speaks for health in the Liberal Party?

When the government announced an export tax on cigarettes health conscious Canadians applauded. So did the Liberal health critic who said in this House: "For the sake of health, hurrah for yesterday's proposed new one dollar per pack export tax on cigarettes".

But the Liberal revenue critic, the member for Toronto—Eglinton—Lawrence, said in Sunday's Ottawa Sun that the campaign against smoking in Canada amounts to "outrageous taxes" and government plunder.

Does the hon. member have any concern for the 38,000 Canadians who die each year from tobacco related causes?

This Liberal position is exactly what the tobacco lobby wants: abandon cigarette taxation, abandon enforcement and thereby abandon Canada's highly successful anti-smoking strategy.

Does the Liberal Party speak for health or does it speak for the tobacco lobby? Canadians deserve a clear answer to this question.

GASOLINE ADDITIVES

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency has again rejected the use of methylcyclopentadienyl manganese tricarbonyl in its gasolines. The U.S. application was for only half the level currently being used in Canada.

The Canadian government must act now to protect Canadian's health and our environment and ban MMT.

The EPA notes in its decision that five car manufacturers, as well as three manufacturing associations, all recommended denial of Ethyl Corporation's request and expressed major concern with regard to the addition of MMT to unleaded gasolines. They were concerned that MMT would increase the hydrocarbon emissions and plug catalytic converters in automobiles.

There is an environmentally friendly alternative to MMT. Ethanol blended fuels would reduce carbon monoxide by 25 per cent, carbon dioxide by 5.9 per cent, nitrous oxide by 5.7 per cent and ground level ozone by 5.3 per cent.

I call on the government to ban MMT, to remove the excise tax from the ethanol portion of that fuel, providing a much needed spark to move this industry off the shelf and into reality.

KERRIN LEE-GARTNER

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, Canadians and westerners in particular, are extraordinarily proud of Kerrin Lee-Gartner. Kerrin, who lives in Calgary, captured Olympic gold on Saturday in the women's downhill with a magnificent run down the world's most difficult course.

We celebrate with Kerrin her victory, her encouragement to the whole Canadian Olympic team and the honour that she and all her teammates have brought to Canada.

As this is family day in Alberta, I would like to make particular mention of the significant role played by Kerrin's family. The love, commitment and support expressed to Kerrin by her family were essential in making her a winner. The deep expression of love and mutual support between Kerrin and her husband, Max, as we saw on the CBC interview on Saturday night, is an example to all Canadians of family values. Good families are winners.

Kerrin and Max, thank you for your hard work, your example and your victory for Canada.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

TRADE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of questions for the Prime Minister regarding the ability of his government to speak for all Canadians.

Last week, U.S. Customs decided to put a tariff on Honda cars built in Canada. Everyone knows this decision by the Americans is aimed at attracting foreign investors away from Canada to the United States.

My question to the Prime Minister is this: What steps does his government intend to take in response to this unfair decision? We know that a reference to the special binational panel will take months or even years. What does the government intend to do now to counter a decision that is so patently unfair to Canada?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I met with Carla Hills on this a week ago today. The ambassador has met on a number of occasions with various members of the U.S. administration.

As I said in the House last week, we take this matter very seriously. We believe that there are some changes that must be made in the way the rules of origin are administered. We have made these views known to the Americans and, as I said in the House last week, we are prepared to take this to the dispute settlement mechanism, but our intent is to try to resolve this matter as quickly and as effectively as possible, for some of the very reasons to which my hon. friend refers.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Prime Minister.

When the Prime Minister was in Ontario last week he told workers who had lost their jobs because of the free trade deal that they were "crackpots".

Some hon. members: Shame, shame.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, unemployed Canadians are not crackpots. They are honest people who want jobs, who want to earn their living honestly in Canada. They do not deserve to be insulted by their Prime Minister.

William Merton, one of the U.S. free trade negotiators, was bragging last week that "the U.S. is doing quite nicely under the free trade agreement. That is a comment on how well we did". The United States is doing quite well under the free trade agreement but Canada is not doing well at all.

I would like to know from the Prime Minister: When will he learn that friendship is friendship and business is business and when will he stand up for the workers of Canada?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, under the free trade agreement our exports to the United States are now up by approximately $8 billion over the high prior to the coming into effect of the free trade agreement. August was a record month. As we come out of the recession, as the recovery continues to build, we hope the numbers will be even more impressive.

• (1420)

My hon. friend ought not to be surprised at the kind of criticisms he is indulging in because after the auto pact was signed by a previous Liberal government in 1965, criticisms of this kind were made. People were calling for the abrogation of the auto pact in 1966 and 1967. The auto pact went on to provide great benefits for Ontario and Canada, as will the free trade agreement.

My hon. friend says that I referred to unemployed workers in Ontario as crackpots. That statement is of course completely false. I made no such statement.

When I saw PSAC organizers and NDP organizers with abusive and offensive signs, I referred to them, but I very carefully segregated the workers whom I met with throughout my trip in very productive meetings; farmers, ordinary workers, regional media. We worked very closely with them trying to bring about solutions. I must say their response was very encouraging.

For that very tiny minority of people who want to abuse public leaders, thereby thinking they are going to make a point, when all they are interested in is a shot on the nightly news, I say to them, work constructively, set aside the tactics of malice, join the co-operative effort in Canada and we will all be better off.

FISHERIES

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to hear the Prime Minister referring to the auto pact because in that deal we made the necessary provision to have safeguards to maintain a level of jobs for Canadians, something that the government is afraid to do in the free trade agreement.

It is not only on trade with the United States that this country is having problems and the government is not standing by the Canadian workers. Overfishing by foreign countries has demolished completely the cod stocks of Atlantic Canada. There is a report that the minister of fisheries will announce today that the total allowable catch for next season will be diminished again and hundreds and thousands of fishermen and plant workers will lose their jobs.

What will the government do to defend the interests of the fishing industry in Atlantic Canada to make sure there is dignity for the fishermen and the fish plant workers in Atlantic Canada?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, the government has already done far more than has been done by any previous government. I note for the record that in an agreement entered into in 1981 with the European community, the hon. Leader of the Opposition gave away 77,500 metric tons of codfish and in 1972 his government gave away 300 metric tons of codfish to France.

When it comes to protecting Canadian fishermen they know where to look and it is not in the direction of the hon. gentleman or the government that he will never form.

With reference to what we are doing with respect to these questions, we have had a vigorous campaign under way with the European community and with non-NAFO countries that are fishing outside the Canadian 200-mile limit on the nose and tail of the banks, where unfortunately we have no authority at this time.

We look to other members of the House to help us to impress upon the European community that it is despoiling a common resource of humanity by its callous continuance of overfishing on the nose and tail of the banks and that it should cease immediately if it is at all interested in the future of fishermen in Canada or elsewhere in the world.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, this is a black Monday in the history of the Atlantic fishery, a black Monday in a black year.

During this year this government has given to foreign nations in fishing zone 2G and 2H, 11,000 tonnes of cod while Canada got 9,000 tonnes. Now we learn that imports of processed Atlantic codfish from those very same nations have doubled to $37 million a year. Does the minister not agree that it is sheer insanity to give foreign nations cod quotas inside our 200-mile zone, then buy the codfish back from them while our own Canadian fish plant workers and fishermen are suffering the consequences of drastic quota cuts?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. gentleman that it is sheer insanity for Canada to give any cod inside its 200-mile economic zone to foreign countries.

I wonder then why Canada in 1972 committed such insanity by signing a treaty with the French under which they took 300,000 tonnes of cod in the gulf. That is only the start. They are taking 4,000 tonnes more this year because of that treaty which has no termination date. I tell the hon. gentlemen it was sheer insanity in 1981 when the treaty was signed with the European community. The hon. gentleman was a member of the government that gave away 75,000 more tonnes of fish in 2G-H, the very 2G-H that he now brings up, Mr. Speaker, in 1981 together with 2J-3KL. For shame, yes, it was sheer insanity.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander-Grand Falls): I gather the minister is saying now that he is going to cancel those foreign licences after the fish is gone—our minister, "the hon. Johnny-come-too-lately".

We import fish from several nations, including South Korea, that illegally fish outside the 200-mile zone. How does an Atlantic cod get to Korea? They do not drive there in Hyundais.

Will this government ban the importation of processed Atlantic codfish from those nations that are illegally fishing outside the 200-mile zone? How can we convince them that it is illegal if we are paying top dollar for the contraband?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): It is always a pleasure to see an old actor return to the stage, Mr. Speaker. I may be a Johnny-come-lately, but the Lewisport Pilot of February 5 said this: "The people of George Baker's district have been wondering lately where their elected member of Parliament has been keeping himself". Could it be that it is Georgie-gone-lately or come-lately?

With reference to the question, in the year 1992, one boat from South Korea has been seen on the nose or the tail of the Banks. It could not have been seen on both, not at least at the same moment. In 1991, four South Korean vessels were seen to be on the nose or tail of the Grand Banks outside 200 miles. So if we are going to depend upon South Korean for our cod, we will be pretty codless.

With respect to 2-GH, in five years in 2-GH, the foreign catch of cod, not the total allowable catch, what they actually caught, was: 1991, zero metric tons; 1990, one metric ton; 1989, no metric tons; 1988, one metric ton; 1987, 162 metric tons; average over five years, 33 metric tons. The hon. gentleman should refurbish his encyclopaedic knowledge of fishing on the banks.

FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Official Opposition in this House visited the President of the United States to discuss a number of subjects, including the free trade agreement.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister if the Leader of the Opposition was accompanied by a Canadian ambassador and if the Prime Minister can tell us exactly what position the Liberal leader took vis-à-vis the free trade agreement.

Mr. Speaker: Part of that question may be in order, but there seems to be some objection to the latter part of it.

• (1430)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is a very, very tough question. We have been working on this all weekend. By Thursday or Friday I will have a complete answer for the hon. member.

An hon. member: If you are lucky.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, my second question is also for the Prime Minister.

At a time in Canada when there are very serious problems such as those people are having with their own livelihood, paying their mortgages, looking for jobs and desperately seeking answers to important political questions, does it serve any useful purpose to call demonstrators crackpots and to use political labels against those people?

Mr. Speaker: Probably the question is out of order. The hon. minister may want to deal with it, but I think it is out of order.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, on that point of order, the Prime Minister in his own answer earlier referred to those people as a narrow group. He said the NDP—

Mr. Speaker: I think it is out of order. The hon. member may want to put another question.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, my final question is for the Prime Minister.

Last week again we saw another industry in this country hit negatively by the free trade agreement and that, of course, was the magnesium producers in Quebec.

How many assaults on Canadian jobs, how many attacks on Canadian industries and how many losses of jobs and investment in this country does it take to get the Prime Minister to understand what Simon Reisman is finally beginning to say, that we are not being treated fairly by the free trade agreement? When is the government prepared to give notice to cancel that agreement because of the way the Americans are treating it?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, on that particular issue, on the magnesium countervail or anti-duping—anti-dumping—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Pass the marbles please, Mr. Speaker.

Let me start again. On those particular issues, we have indicated to the company that we fully support the position of the Canadian company and we fully support the position in challenging and fighting the particular action with the United States.

Let me just go to the heart of the question that my hon. friend is posing. He is suggesting that the Americans should not have the right to initiate anti-dumping actions.

I believe in the last year Canada initiated 16 of the 22 anti-dumping actions. If we went the route that my hon. friend is referring to, we would lose the opportunity to protect Canadian industry against actions taken by American industry that undermine the position of Canadian companies. That is why we still have the right, within the free trade agreement, to challenge actions taken by American companies.

FISHERIES

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

The destruction of the northern cod stock referred to by my friend from Gander—Grand Falls is not only cruel in its effect on the people of Atlantic Canada, but it is criminal. It is criminal because it could have been avoided. It was man, not nature, who was the author of this disaster and it occurred despite repeated warnings to this minister and to this government that the fish were being overfished in the northern cod zones.

I ask the minister of fisheries: What alternative are this minister and this government prepared to offer to the thousands of Atlantic Canadians, and in particular those in Newfoundland and Labrador whose livelihoods have been wiped out because of the mismanagement of the fish stock by this minister and by this government?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, as everyone in the House knows, there have been difficulties in the Atlantic fishery for several years. I do not agree, by the way, that these difficulties are all man-made. Certainly in part they may be due to errors by persons but, for example, last year it was due in large part to environmental conditions, ice, unusually cold water. We do not know exactly what all the reasons are.

It is also due, of course, to callous overfishing by Spain, Portugal and countries of the European community. Spain and Portugal have vessels registered in Panama under flags of convenience, et cetera, overfishing outside the nose and tail of the Grand Banks. The fishing inside is controlled absolutely and carefully by us.

We have attempted to do what we can to assist, and we are going to continue. We have had the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program which still goes forward with additional tens of millions being spent on scientific research.

We have the community programs to help the communities where fish plants have closed. We have Community Futures, ice compensation, Atlantic catch failure—

Ms. Copps: You better wave that yellow flag.

Mr. Crosbie: You do not want to hear what is being done to help people when they are in trouble. You only want to make an opera out of Question Period in the House of Commons.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, there are 10 provincial governments in Canada, two territorial governments and a national government. There are ministers of fisheries in most of the provinces, but only one government, the national government, and only one minister, this minister, has constitutional authority for the management of the cod stocks; only one government, this one. This government is responsible for the failure.

It is reasonable to ask on behalf of thousands of displaced Atlantic Canadians whose livelihood and whose traditional way of life have been squandered what compensation, if any, is available for those people and their families.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, this government will continue to bring forward programs and assistance to the people affected by closures.

Of course, the closure announced by Fisheries Products at the plant at Catalina was tragic enough in itself. Hopefully, it will only be temporary and the whole unemployment insurance program will apply.

This government has nothing to be ashamed of in its assistance to Newfoundlanders. Last year there was $6,142 worth of per capita annual federal expenditures in Newfoundland under various programs including programs to assist the fishery: $3.15 in expenditures for every $1 in revenue. Most of this has gone to help people get employment and/or keep employment through the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, the Fisheries Adjustment Program and all of the other programs we have introduced to help people in need.

We are going to continue, despite the raucous sounds that anyone might make or the feeble attempts to blame someone.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance.

Today, The Globe and Mail reported that its latest survey of major companies said that profits in this country collapsed by 87 per cent in the last three months of 1991 compared to the same period last year, a time when the minister was saying that his government's policies were bringing about a recovery.

Will the minister commit now to a new, effective, economic recovery program to restore corporate earnings and, above all, to restore wages and jobs for Canadian workers?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would like to advise the hon. member that The Globe and Mail survey is not indicative of the over-all corporate profits performance.

Statistics Canada reported a 52.3 per cent increase over the period of the second and third quarters. This would certainly draw into question the assessment made by The Globe and Mail. I think the hon. member should rely upon the figures of Statistics Canada rather than presumptions taken by The Globe and Mail article.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister delight in quoting The Globe and Mail when they think it suits their purpose.

They cannot ignore it today because this survey also says that "Canadian corporate pre-tax profits as a proportion of Gross Domestic Product fell to a level not seen since 1932".

• (1440)

Why will the Minister of Finance not commit now to a new meaningful economic recovery program in his next budget to prevent the current economic weakness, recession, from dragging on for another seven years, as happened during the depths of the Great Depression until the beginning of the Second World War? Why will he not commit to more jobs for Canadians today?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the fact of the matter is that this government is committing to more jobs and we are addressing specific sectors of the economy that are in trouble. I recognize that there have been serious difficulties in the manufacturing sector. Part of that is due to the recession. Part of it is due to the restructuring that has to take place.

I think the hon. member should be encouraged by the fact that the Conference Board of Canada in its recent survey indicated that businesses are much more optimistic about 1992 than they were in 1991 and that their investment plans are very positive. I think, in spite of the fact that the hon. member tries to paint the gloomiest picture, there are some positive signs on the horizon.

FISHERIES

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, there are thousands of people in hundreds of fishing communities on the east coast who do not have a future because of problems in the fishery. Today is not the time for Liberals and Conservatives to blame each other for the problems of the past. The people of the east coast want solutions and assurances from the Government of Canada that their concerns and future will be taken care of.

Given the dependence of these communities on the fisheries resource, can the minister offer a future for these communities? What future do they have?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I believe that these communities have a future and any difficulties in connection with fish stocks are difficulties that will be overcome over a period of time. During the time that these difficulties are being overcome, of course government has to support the people who are having difficulties during that period.

This is not the only area of the world that has had trouble with fish stocks. There is trouble with fish stocks everywhere where mankind is allowed to exercise its rapacious methods and desires upon a common property stock. This has happened in the Barents Sea. This happened in a number of areas around the world and is happening here in part because outside our 200-mile limit are countries, supposedly civilized, that will not pay any attention to just sensible rules to deal with conservation and sustainable development. I mean in particular Spain, Portugal and others that have been named before.

What can be done? Already the town of Gaultois has been assisted to get back into the fishery business. Already, as a result—I do not want to claim all the credit, but certainly some of it is my efforts—the town of Grand Bank has a fish plant that is starting up in a different aspect of the fishery and we are going to continue with those efforts.

We had a failure with the shrimp plant in St. John's recently, but we are not discouraged. We are going to keep going, going, going. That is our nature and we are going to keep at it.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, given the non-answer from the minister, maybe we do have to attribute some blame to this government.

The minister has called an emergency meeting of Atlantic fisheries ministers to deal with the massive lay-offs in Newfoundland. An internal government document dated June 1990 revealed that the government has known for some time that there were going to be long-term problems in the fishery resource and that several thousand workers were going to face permanent lay-off.

Given the problems with fishery communities dependent on that resource, what specific steps can the minister take to ensure that those communities do have a future and that he can take some specific action to stop the foreign overfishing of our fishery stock?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the hon. gentleman's interest in this issue. I am glad that he is representing his party's Atlantic caucus.

With respect to the question that he asked, I can enumerate the programs that we have in place to help. We have a community assistance fund to help towns where their fish plant has closed. We have a Community Futures program covering many of these same areas. We have the industrial adjustment service. We have an Atlantic fisheries adjustment program to help, if they want to diversify within the fishery or to diversify outside the fishery. We have helped hundreds of projects to start up as a result of those programs. We are going to continue. The meeting this afternoon is to discuss with the trade, the union and those involved, the stockholders in the Canadian east coast fishery, what should be done as a result of new information and advice in connection with fish stocks. After that we will decide.

EMPLOYMENT

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday Sears announced the closing of its catalogue warehouse in Halifax, throwing 800 people, mostly women, out of work. The reasons: the recession, the GST and cross-border shopping.

When will the Minister of Finance recognize that his policies have devastated Atlantic Canada, particularly in the retail sector, and when will he institute new economic measures that will help?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that this is a restructuring of the organization and that the jobs are being transferred to Belleville. This is not something unusual. I note that the Sears Corporation, since the fall of 1990, has laid off some 40,500 people in its effort to restructure and rearrange its activities.

Ms. Copps: You are bragging about that?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, no, I am not bragging about that. I am simply stating a matter of fact.

An hon. member: She has a great big smile on her face.

Mr. Mazankowski: That has occurred in the United States of America. We are confronted with the same kinds of adjustments and restructuring. While it is very unfortunate, I think the action taken by the Minister of National Revenue in terms of dealing with the cross-border shopping issue will, in fact, alleviate some of that problem. If the hon. member has any other positive suggestions I would certainly be glad to entertain them.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, the minister says it is not unusual but it is unfortunate. Well, it is very unfortunate for the 800 people, mostly women, who cannot take the opportunity to move to Belleville.

This government deliberately created the GST. This government deliberately exacerbated matters, particularly with regard to the Sears closing and cross-border shopping.

What will the Minister of Finance do, deliberately I hope, to help the 800 Sears workers in Halifax who are faced with a choice of moving or starving?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I certainly do not want to minimize the difficulty that has been inflicted upon the people who are being asked to move. I simply want to remind the hon. member that she blames all the difficulties on the free trade and the GST.

We all know that General Motors of America has announced lay-offs of some 75,000 people; Mercedes-Benz Corporation is announcing lay-offs of some 20,000 people; IBM has announced lay-offs of some 20,000 people. I am trying to point out to the hon. member that this is part of the restructuring and the globalization that is going on. It is not due to the GST and it is not due to the free trade agreement.

The Minister of National Revenue announced measures that will take effect immediately that will be helpful. We will continue to deal with the specific sectors that need help and the government will be announcing programs and policies in due course.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Following the efforts in Ontario last week to present the Prime Minister as a kinder, gentler person in his capacity as head of government, he quickly dismissed thousands of Canadians who came out to meet him in Peterborough, who are devastated by this economic recession, as crackpots.

Why does the Prime Minister call John Taylor, a 69-year old pensioner who is concerned about his future and 32-year old Rob Curry, an unemployed plastic employee who must rely on welfare for the very first time, crackpots, when these two Canadians came out to meet the Prime Minister in search of economic hope and economic solutions?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I had occasion to meet with unemployed workers, farmers, people of various kinds. I met with Mrs. Milgaard on the streets of Winnipeg. She presented a problem to me. I do this on a regular basis. Any time I have the occasion of a civil dialogue with people who have difficulties, I come back and try to respond to it immediately. The ministry can tell you that this is done on a very regular basis.

I have already said that the statement made by the Leader of the Opposition was false. The statement is also false, now that it is made by my hon. friend. I referred to the people, and I said it very specifically, who were organizing a demonstration. They did not want dialogue. They did not want assistance from me or from the Leader of the Opposition. What they wanted was to provoke a political spectacle, using abusive language that could only achieve the ultimate objective of getting their faces on television that night.

I tell my hon. friend that the member of Parliament and the mayor had indicated their availability to meet with some of the people. That was turned down. I indicated my intention to meet with some of the people. That was declined. We had indicated our availability. I had constant meetings ranging from families with cystic fibrosis all the way to the leaders of the Dairy Product Council of Ontario, just immediately preceding that.

We were available, but clearly they were not. The Government of Canada and I are ready at any time, on a regular basis, to meet with people who have problems, who want to sit down and look for a solution.

I think my hon. friend would agree it is pretty difficult to meet with somebody who is not seeking a solution. A small group of people organized this thing specifically for political purposes, using tactics and methods that should have gone out many years ago, that are counterproductive and unhelpful to the people they purport to serve.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, the simple truth is there were 1,000 Canadians in Peterborough and whether the Prime Minister likes it or not, he referred not only once, but twice, to Canadians as crackpots and he should apologize to whomever he was directing that adjective.

I return to the Prime Minister. When will the Prime Minister and the government recognize and respond to the deep economic anxieties among Canadians that simply push that pensioner and that 32 year old unemployed persons to ask of their national government for a better deal for themselves and a better deal for Canada? What is so wrong with that response, Mr. Leader, and what will you and your government be doing to reduce those economic hardships?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in regard to the very legitimate question that my hon. friend now asks, if he thinks that anybody in this country is subject to unlimited abuse and personal invective and is expected immediately after to sit down with these people in a constructive dialogue when they have clearly indicated they do not want to, then my hon. friend is obviously off base in regard to that.

With regard to the more important matter he raises.The Financial Post indicated on the weekend that its survey indicates there is widespread evidence of a stronger economy by mid–year. By year end, most of the current nightmares should be fading. The jobless rate will likely be below 10 per cent and corporate profits will show significant gains. Already there has been improvement. Earnings of non–resource companies in the post–fourth quarter early bird profit round–ups rose by an average of 19 per cent.

The Post is forecasting recovery is now in sight and two and one–half per cent growth this year. The IMF, the OECD are forecasting growth in the neighbourhood of 3.1 per cent. They indicate that we are going to lead the G–7 countries. My hon. friend should take some encouragement and some pleasure at these good signs that are starting to be forecast in respect of a strong economy.

INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Great Lakes pollution problems are getting worse, yet the International Joint Commission has just closed its expert library in Windsor as part of cutting back its regional office. Windsor IJC staff this morning bluntly said that they had been told money was not a factor in this shutdown.

I want to ask the minister why this key source of information for IJC staff and for environmental groups has been shut. Is this just the first step to shutting the whole regional office itself?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the work of the International Joint Commission has made a real contribution to the cleaning up of the Great Lakes.

There are, of course, other means by which we are approaching this issue. It is a very important one for Canada, as it is for the United States. We have been working closely with the governors of some of that region too.

I do not think the location or the size of the office is what makes the International Joint Commission effective, and we intend to continue its effectiveness as we go through further discussions with the U.S. on Great Lakes pollution.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I hope that the Secretary of State for External Affairs will note that the character of her answer quite confuses the impression earlier given that the IJC regional office in Windsor would be maintained. I would ask her to review the matter because in order to work effectively they need a regional office.

I want to ask a specific question about the library. The president of the University of Windsor has offered to accommodate the library at the university. I would ask the secretary of state if she would use her good offices to arrange that the library at the IJC office in Windsor be transferred to the University of Windsor so that it can be maintained in the district and remain an effective resource for environmental groups in that area to ensure that the IJC and this government do their job with respect to the environment.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is anything confusing about it, although the hon. member may find it so.

The source of information in the library is clearly an important part of what the IJC does. My own view would be that it is important that that material stay with the people who are working directly on environmental issues in this connection, and that would be with the IJC.

JUSTICE

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Justice my question is for the Solicitor General.

This morning in The Ottawa Citizen there was an article that said: "Many men who kill their wives are getting away with murder". That particular report stated that between 1982 and 1986, 44 men were charged with killing their wives. In those 44 cases none of the husbands were found guilty of first degree murder and most were convicted of lesser charges such as manslaughter, in spite of many of them being very brutal and mutilating murders.

My question for the minister is this. Does this study accurately depict the situation for all of Canada and is the Canadian legal system letting these murderers off too easily? If so, what does the government intend to do about it?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, my friend raises an issue which is of interest to all members of the House. I am not in a position to confirm or deny the results of the study, nor am I in a position to speculate as to whether or not this particular situation exists throughout Canada.

I would say to my hon. friend that the concerns of all of us were one of the reasons that the government commissioned the national panel on violence against women. One aspect of that panel's work will be to develop proposals for action which will improve the response of the justice system to the problems of male violence against women, including wife assault.

IMMIGRATION

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, given the urgency of the subject matter I have given notice of my question to the Deputy Prime Minister. It concerns the International Convention on the Rights of the Child and Canada's obligations under that convention to respect a child's right to both its nationality and its family. Yet within days a Canadian born seven-month old child will have to leave her country.

Presence in the Gallery

Will the Deputy Prime Minister immediately announce that we will respect the convention rights of Agatha Zujewski and will he announce that she and her parents will be allowed to stay in Canada?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, the minister is away from the House today but the member will know that we have put into place a very fair and generous refugee determination process.

• (1500)

There is a backlog that is now being processed. We have some very generous rules. It is not a fast-track immigration process and all I can tell her is that each individual case is reviewed on humanitarian and compassionate grounds. If it has been refused, it has been in that spirit. Certainly this family will have every opportunity to apply as immigrants, which many people would like to do in growing numbers.

[Translation]

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, because of its urgent nature, I too gave notice of my question to the Deputy Prime Minister's office. I think it is incredible that the government should acknowledge that Mr. and Mrs. Mirzad's five children, ranging from 19 months to 14 years old, have a bona fide claim to refugee status, and then turn around and deny that status to their parents, which creates an intolerable situation. Are we going to make orphans of these children?

I raised this matter in July 1991, and the minister did not even answer my question. What does the minister intend to do to remedy this serious injustice? When will he make the necessary changes to prevent similar occurrences?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am told that the minister gave an initial reply last Friday. I was not in the House, so I will check on this. I am not for familiar with the particular context of these two cases. I will ask the minister for further information as soon as possible, and we will report back to the two members concerned. Normally there is a procedure that is quite equitable, with right of appeal, which provides that claimants are treated fairly, in accordance with the usual criteria. However, there may be exceptions. We will look into this very carefully, and I will report back to you.

IMMIGRATION AND REFUGEE BOARD

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, as a result of a terrible incident last week, two quasi-judges of the refugee board were suspended with pay.

For the benefit of the House, I wonder whether the Deputy Prime Minister could provide us with information as to how these people are picked. Do they have a mandatory training period? Is there a trial period? Do they have training in multicultural issues? Do they know what the fundamentals are of natural justice? Do they understand what due process or doctrine of fairness means?

Could the Deputy Prime Minister explain what process is used to hire these judges?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, the minister spoke to the chairman of the Immigration and Refugee Board at the end of last week.

Mr. Fairweather acted very quickly. He is investigating the entire allegation. I can just tell you that Mr. Fairweather's reputation, which is world-wide, is one that certainly precedes him in the area of human rights. He has a complete and implicit knowledge of the diversity of this nation, how we have been enriched and how we celebrate that diversity.

Certainly I am very comfortable and confident that the independence and impartiality of that board is giving everyone the fairest and most generous hearing possible.

POINTS OF ORDER

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in view of the comments made earlier this day by the hon. Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, I wonder if we can anticipate from the minister, either this day or later this week, some form of ministerial statement with regard to the situation of the Atlantic fishery in view of the importance that all members have attached to this matter.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I just want to make the obvious point that Question Period is over.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, just before the government House leader leaves, last week he indicated that as soon as the date was known he would announce to the House of Commons when budget day would be. We are getting very close to the day we have been anticipating. Does he have any news for us today?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as the House leader of the New Democratic Party just said, we are getting very close to it.

CANADA HEALTH ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-333, an act to amend the Canada Health Act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to introduce this bill which amends several sections of the Canada Health Act and has, as its purpose, the safeguarding of the health and safety of emergency response personnel.

The bill adds to the list of hospital services contained in the act such as the requirement for hospitals to disclose to workers who have provided emergency care the name and nature of contagious disease that may have been passed on to them in the course of their duties. Workers involved in emergency response, including police, fire-fighters and paramedics as well as volunteers, routinely provide emergency medical treatment in unsanitary conditions on patients they know nothing about.

The result is that these workers and their families can be exposed to contagious or infectious diseases. These workers need to know what they may have been exposed to if they are to continue their jobs in the future.

It is not about involuntary testing. It simply requires that hospitals share information they have so that those who may have been exposed to a possible health threat are protected.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Ms. Langan moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

DANGEROUS GOODS IDENTIFICATION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-334, an act respecting the identification of dangerous goods and to amend the Transportation of Dangerous Goods Act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Ms. Langan: The purpose of this bill is to enable certain persons such as fire-fighters to obtain, instantaneously, accurate information at the scene of an incident involving dangerous materials that will allow them to deal appropriately with those materials.

The bill calls on the Minister of Transport to establish a computerized registry of dangerous goods, saying where they are manufactured and stored and describing the nature of the substance. This type of right to know legislation will greatly enhance the ability of emergency response teams to quickly assess the nature of any accident involving hazardous materials. Accurate and accessible information is crucial for saving lives and properties as well as for taking the appropriate measures in dealing with a hazardous substance. The development of such a system would enable emergency response personnel to learn the exact nature of hazardous materials present at any location and provide guidance on responding to the specific incident, particularly guidance for the safety of those responding.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Ms. Langan moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and a privilege once again to present a petition on behalf of a number of petitioners from central British Columbia who are concerned about the possibility of a major river diversion, namely the North Thompson River. They are asking that steps be taken to ensure our fresh waters would not be dammed in Canada in an effort to divert all or part of them into the United States of America.

JUSTICE

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of petitions containing several hundred names from my riding protesting a legal system which would allow an obviously sick and dangerous person to be at large who caused the death of Nina de Villiers last August in an area not too far from my riding where her body was found.

DON RIVER

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I also have the honour and privilege of presenting some petitions to the House pursuant to Standing Order 36. These petitions are signed by members of my riding of Broadview—Greenwood and they are humbly calling upon the government to begin its action plan for reclaiming the most polluted river in Canada, the Don River. They repeat their request on a daily basis.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 50 and 229.

[Text]

Question No. 50—Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River):

> With respect to registered and special delivery mail (a) what is the present service (b) although the public pays a premium price for these services, is this mail handled any differently than other mail, such as unsolicited third-class mail?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): (a) Registred mail and special delivery mail are both premium products/services provided by Canada Post. Modification to the processing and products have improved service to the customer while at the same time reducing costs to the corporation.

In the case of registered mail changes to the processing streams have resulted in faster delivery while holding product prices constant for two years. These new enhancements also enable customers to access an automatic inquiry system giving them delivery information on their mail piece.

Special delivery provides its customers with delivery standards which are faster than regular letter mail (1 day local; 2–3 days to major centres). Also, these standards are guaranteed with either a special letter/special occasion replacement or postage refunded. This product is handled and processed separately from letter mail.

(b) Special delivery and registered mail are delivered with regular letter carrier delivery.

In the case of registered the bar coded item is computer scanned at delivery time and recorded on the articles delivered bill. Also, a recipient signature is obtained upon delivery by the letter carrier. If a signature is not obtained, the mail piece is returned to the nearest postal outlet to await addressee pick-up.

Special delivery receives its priority handling prior to the letter carrier delivery.

Question No. 229—Mr. Thorkelson:

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURN

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, if Questions Nos. 123 and 133 could be made Orders for Return, these returns would be tabled immediately.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House that Questions Nos. 123 and 133 be deemed to have been made Orders for Return?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Question No. 123—Mrs. Stewart:

Since its opening, have any departments used the facilities at the Dome Stadium hotel, in Toronto, for training and operational functions, and, if so, (a) which departments (b) what was the (i) cost (ii) function (iii) total expenditure for each department (c) how many of the participants worked and/or resided in the Toronto area (d) which of the departments using the hotel did not have training rooms available to them through federal facilities?

Return tabled.

Question No. 133—Mr. MacAulay:

With respect to the Small Craft Harbours program and related programs of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, for each federal constituency, how much money has been spent during the last 5 fiscal years, including the present year, and, in each case, (a) which projects received funding (b) how much funding (c) what are the names and addresses of each contractor or department that performed the work?

Return tabled.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I direct a question or a representation to the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader.

I posed a question earlier this day with regard to ministerial statements. I am wondering if the parliamentary secretary, in view of the importance of the subject matter, namely the Atlantic fishery, could consult with the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to ascertain whether we can expect later this week some form of ministerial statement on the status of the Atlantic fishery and, in particular, the number of jobs which would be affected by what is taking place as a result of the meeting this afternoon in Ottawa.

Can the parliamentary secretary give us some assurances with regard to that particular representation?

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend has made his representation twice now. I am sure that the department and the minister are aware of it and will do all in their power to address the concerns of the fishery.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—THE ECONOMY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Peterson (p. 7108).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Fredericton—York—Sunbury has 18 minutes left.

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned in my few brief remarks before Question Period, there are some excellent signals pointing toward a moderate and slowly developing economic recovery in Canada. I would just like to make some of those points for the record before I begin the main substance of my remarks.

New motor vehicles have risen 9 per cent from December 1991 to January 1992. The sales of existing homes rebounded sharply in December. The real GDP at factor cost advanced 0.1 per cent in November. The Statistic Canada composite leading indicator continued to grow in November by 0.4 per cent. The prime lending rate at banks was lowered to 7.5 per cent in January and is down by one-half from its peak of 14.75 per cent in May 1990. It is the lowest rate we have seen since May 1973.

Significantly, the prime rate differential with the United States has fallen 229 basis points since May 1990, and now the differential is only 100 basis points, down from 475 in July 1990.

The Canadian dollar is trading at 84.3 U.S. cents, its lowest level since February 1990. Inflation is clearly coming very much under control. Wage settlements in the third quarter averaged 3.3 per cent, down from 3.4 per cent in the second quarter and down from 6.1 per cent in the first quarter of last year.

Over the past six months the seasonally adjusted CPI has increased only 0.5 per cent. At an annual rate, excluding food and energy, the increase would have been 1.9 per cent.

On top of those statistics we have predictions by some of the world's foremost economic forecasters. The OECD September 1991 survey of Canada notes that fiscal actions and planning in Canada will leave our country well placed to maintain its traditional role as one of the most prosperous and fastest growing economies in the OECD area.

The British magazine, The Economist, in January said that Canada could expect the second strongest growth and the second lowest inflation among G-7 countries in the coming year. In our own Conference Board's 1992 world outlook, it was stated that the Canadian economy is expected to expand by 3.2 per cent compared with 3 per cent for Japan, 2.3 per cent for France and 2.1 per cent for the United States. Those are good signals and signs.

There is a strong competitive world out there and we do have to realistically take stock of our future potential and the actions we have to take to realize it. I want to talk today about changes we must make in the 1990s so that our country will keep up with world competition. We must change and change soon and over the long term hold our position as one of the world's leading economies and maintain our high standard of living.

The brutal fact is that we are not keeping up with the changing global economy. Canada is a trading nation. Few industrialized countries export more than 25 per cent of everything they produce as we do, but we are losing ground. While world trade has doubled in the past eight years, our share has slipped to 4.2 per cent from 5.1 per cent. It is the steepest decline of any market share in the group of seven nations. We have put our economic faith in our natural resources for too long. Our share in the world's resource dependent trade almost doubled to 9.5 per cent in 1989 from 5 per cent in 1978.

At the same time, our share of the world trade in non-resources actually fell. In 1985, for example, nearly half of Canada's exports were not resources, and that gave us a 3.4 per cent share of the world's non-resources trade. By 1989, only one-third of our exports were non-resource commodities and they only had a 2.7 per cent share of the world's non-resource trade market.

We cannot continue to rely on our natural resources for prosperity. Our main road to future prosperity must clearly be with the non-resource trading area. Too few companies are exporters. Harvard professor Michael Porter's study of Canadian competitiveness, released in October, found that Canada's top 50 industries produced more than one-fifth of all Canada's exports. Of these 50 companies, 35 produce unprocessed or modestly processed natural resources.

Of the 40,000 Canadian manufacturers, only about one-third export at all, even though the Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement has secured the biggest two-way trading opportunity for us in world history.

For those who export and work at developing export markets, success follows. Many successful Canadian companies are finding that establishing strategic alliances, adapting new technologies and using partners to expand into foreign markets are all critical to keeping up with the competition. But are we keeping up with the competition? The World Economic Forum reports that Canada ranks fifth in competitiveness among the 24 OECD countries, up from 11th place in 1986. We have a well educated work force. We have plentiful natural resources. We have excellent telecommunications and transportation networks. We have a competitive tax regime. These pluses are not guarantees of future prosperity. While Canada's over-all ranking appears very good at first glance, our ranking in other areas, which are critical contributors to our future competitiveness, is troubling.

In the 1980s, while other nations made significant gains, Canada's productivity growth stalled, despite strong investments over the past six years. According to the World Economic Forum, Canada ranks 12th in productivity performance with the U.S., Japan and much of Europe ahead of us. Canada is a trading nation, yet we are slow in meeting the challenges of a global marketplace. We rank 16th in terms of international orientation. Few other countries in the industrialized world are as dependent on trade as Canada, so our products should be among the best in the world. Yet in product quality, design and packaging, which are all critical to expanding markets, we rank 13th.

The prosperity initiative launched by the government last fall is intended to give Canadians the opportunity to build a plan which will secure a prosperous future for us. To build a competitive economy, I believe we need a new spirit, new partnerships and new approaches to competitiveness. That is what people are saying in the prosperity initiatives community talks. People are looking for more co-operation among the stakeholders in our economy. They especially want more co-operation among all levels of government, and more partnerships between management and labour for the competitive advantage of everyone. They are saying we must change our attitudes toward work, organization, workers, learning, skills and competition if we are to capitalize on our strengths. Clearly we have to take a good hard look at ourselves.

The prosperity initiative is that good hard look. It takes a good hard look at the underpinnings of Canadian competitiveness: skills training, science and technology, capital and investment, the nature of the internal economic union and international business.

I would like to talk about learning, and science and technology for a few more moments this afternoon.

Just two weeks ago the second international assessment of educational progress was released. The results were not encouraging for Canada, particularly when we rank third in education spending. Canadian 13-year-olds placed ninth out of 20 countries in a comparison of math and science knowledge, and Canadian 9-year-olds placed eighth out of 14 countries in a comparison of math knowledge.

We have one of the world's highest drop-out rates. At least 30 of every 100 youngsters entering Grade 9 drops out before graduation. That means there will be more than one million drop-outs in the 1990s if we do nothing. Many of those one million Canadians will joint the nearly 38 per cent of adults in Canada today who lack the literacy skills needed to be part of a labour force for knowledge based industries.

This problem is already evident today. A recent survey found that even in the midst of this recession, there are 300,000 jobs going begging because Canadian employers cannot find people with the right skills today to fill those positions. If it is a problem today when only 23 per cent of new jobs require more than 16 years of education, just imagine what the situation will be like in the year 2000, when 40 out of every 100 new jobs will require 16 more years of schooling and 63 per cent of all new jobs will require at least 12 years of education, or high school graduation. Yet in 1986 fewer than 50 per cent of adults beyond school age had high school diplomas.

Where are we going to find the people for these new jobs? It will not be from youngsters in school today. Since the 1970s, young people have made up an ever smaller proportion of the population and there is no sign this will change in the nineties. The most obvious source of trainable people is from those who are already working. So how will we go about training those workers?

We are not doing very well. For every dollar American companies spend in training, Canadian companies spend 50 cents. For every dollar that Japanese companies spend in training, we spend 20 cents, and for every dollar German companies spend in training, we spend 12.5 cents.

The federal government's concern about learning is shared by all Canadians. People are telling us in the community talks that we should focus on developing brain power, not raw materials, by improving the quality of education and providing continuous training. Higher national standards are needed to improve educational performance.

Canadians are looking for more and better partnerships between the business community and educational institutions. More effort must be put into developing training skills that will be useful throughout life and ensuring that workers are retrainable.

These are some of the dimensions of our learning challenge. In science and technology, only three out of every 100 Canadian companies do any research. Nearly 30 per cent of private sector research and development training is done by just four companies in Canada. Canadian firms invest only half as much in research as their German, American and Japanese counterparts. The rate of application of new technology to industrial processes in Canada is alarmingly low. According to a 1989 survey, fewer than half of Canadian manufacturers had implemented even one of the 22 leading manufacturing technologies such as robotics or laser technologies which are keys to productivity growth in the nineties.

These are the bright spots. Canada's research and development spending runs ahead of OECD averages in high tech sectors such as electronics, aerospace and computers. Private sector R and D in Canada has grown by 6.5 per cent a year in spite of the recession.

Companies investing in research and development get good returns, but many of our small and medium sized businesses find it difficult to fund research and development, whether related to products or processes. The federal government has therefore developed two approaches to deal with this problem.

The first is the university based network of 15 centres of excellence which provide business access to research facilities that could not otherwise be afforded by small businesses in Canada. The Research and Productivity Council facility in Fredericton is one such centre of excellence that does provide great service to New Brunswick.

The second is through the Department of Industry, Science and Technology where businesses will have access to the 200 federal labs.

This should lead to the development of more extensive alliances between the private and public sectors in the fields of research and development. We are creating chairs rapidly at many of our Canadian universities in these very important areas of science and technology.

Our productivity growth has stalled since 1980 and our real wages have not increased in nearly 20 years. It is clear from the recent report of the Economic Council of Canada that the key to changing our standard of living is to become more competitive in higher value products. This sort of change will not be affected by short-term quick fixes like interest or exchange rate fluctuations. On the contrary, depending on those kinds of approaches has left us ill-prepared for the global marketplace of the 1990s. Our economic situation cries out for fundamental long-term change and not for the quick fix.

One of our biggest challenges is to begin to change the attitudes of all Canadians: employers, parents, students, employees and every other stakeholder, toward the changes we need to make to keep up with world competition. Attitudes will not change overnight. It is going to take hard work to break down the barriers of suspicion and distrust built up over many years.

I am not pretending that finding ways to cultivate partnerships between schools and the business community, for example, is going to be effortless. It is going to take a lot of effort. Nor do I expect the tradition of confrontation between unions and management to suddenly disappear. But we have to start securing our future to prosperity, and the starting point is finding out new ways of working together. The prosperity initiative is about winning the commitment of Canadians to making those changes, to ensure that we produce nothing but quality products and services. With a commitment to new competitiveness, grounded in the traditional Canadian values of co-operation and team work in tackling and solving problems together, Canadians can compete successfully.

In conclusion, I would like to say that the prosperity initiative is aimed at increasing our competitiveness on a world scale, but not in order to meet some arbitrary economic target. We must remain competitive because there is an ever-increasing and competitive world. Increasing our competitiveness means a higher standard of living. This, in turn, will provide us with the means to a caring society that can secure the social programs we see as being essential to our lives as Canadians; a society that can continue to support the arts and culture which help us to understand ourselves; a society with the means and the will to make our education and technology second to none in all the world.

The global challenges we face constitute a race without a finish line. Let us show that we do have the strength and quality to be a leader in that race and to stay in that race indefinitely. Mr. Speaker, we can do it in Canada.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to congratulate my colleague from New Brunswick on his speech here today. I noticed at the beginning of his text he mentioned there seemed to be signs of a turnaround.

I would like to apprise him of the situation as it now exists in my riding. Then maybe I could ask him for a commentary on some of the solutions as I see them, and see if he agrees with me.

First of all, he is quite aware that the Atholville mill has closed down. It was a producer of chlorine-free pulp and its closure has put about 300 people directly out of work, and roughly another 600 or 700 indirectly out of work. N.B. Forest Products in Dalhousie has just announced the closing down of 50 per cent of its operations, putting another 400 people directly out of work.

The federal government is also in the same process. There are rumours circulating right now that there is a possibility of job losses at the Chaleur airport. Canada Post is doing the same thing throughout the riding by reducing hours of work, closing post offices and not replacing postmasters or postmistresses.

After meeting with the farmers in my riding on Friday morning, I can say that they are concerned at the direction of the GATT negotiations. I am also led to believe that this summer there will be a reduction in funding for student employment programs. On top of all this there is roughly an 18 per cent unemployment rate in my riding and another 20 per cent on social assistance.

Having said all that, I would ask the hon. member whether he would agree with me that solutions are needed now, not tomorrow. We need them today. It is an urgent situation and we cannot afford to wait for the budget. We have waited for budgets before and quite often it has been negative news.

The hon. member, coming from New Brunswick, is quite aware that the provinces asked for the twinning of the Trans-Canada Highway. I would suggest that would be a viable project, but more specifically with reference to my riding and Atholville and Dalhousie mills, we need a specific agreement in place, a diversification agreement to help the economy in northern New Brunswick.

I ask the hon. member if he agrees with that diversification project. Quite often we hear about training and training and training, but what my people are telling me is: "Yes, training is fine but there are no jobs after the training". Where are the jobs? These people want to work.

Mr. Bird: Mr. Speaker, I would like to acknowledge the extremely difficult economic circumstances that exist in the hon. member's riding of Restigouche, an area that I know very well. In my former responsibilities as minister of natural resources in New Brunswick, I personally had a great deal to do with the Atholville mill and the Dalhousie mill and the assignment of forest resources in support of those mills.

For openers I would say that it is a very difficult and serious current circumstance for which there really is not a quick and easy solution. As I said in my text, there are no quick fixes. We are into a very intense world economic competitive situation. For example, in the case of the Atholville mill, the technology of that mill has not been able to keep up on an economic basis producing a product that the world requires at competitive prices.

There has been an immense effort made over the years by the company that owned that mill and by the employees who worked in that mill to master a technology that would make it competitive. In these extremely difficult days of 1992 it simply is not working.

There are some bright spots on the horizon in New Brunswick. I would say those bright spots pertain to the hon. member's riding, potentially at least. I would have to compliment the Government of New Brunswick for demonstrating the kind of innovation to which I referred. By taking advantage of New Brunswick's capabilities, as The Globe and Mail expressed in a long article today, New Brunswick has commenced to attract a diversity of industries such as Federal Express, a sound systems manufacturer in Edmonston—I have forgotten the name of the firm—Canadian Pacific Express and others based on its ability to serve Canadians in two official languages. Here is an application of the linguistic duality of Canada in an economic way that is making great sense for New Brunswick. I hope it will be an example to all of Canada. It is also an example of the kind of innovative approach that we can take to help to bolster our economic capabilities and our economic opportunities.

Through training, through skills development, through science and technology, and through research and development, in the long run I am confident that we can address the concerns of all areas of this country including the very difficult circumstances that presently exist in the hon. member's riding.

In closing, I would just like to say: Let us not forget that the forest resources of northern New Brunswick remain there. It is extremely important that we continue to manage them well to ensure that they continue to be available to produce the yields of the future that I believe will be the foundation for the rebirth of those industries which now find themselves in such difficult circumstances.

• (1540)

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to my hon. friend's comments. As usual, I found them to be informative and thoughtful. He mentioned forestry and the need not to forget an important natural resource which provides us with more financial support for the country than virtually almost all other exports combined. It is very critical in terms of jobs and economic development. One of the points he makes is that we have to generate more valued added from our natural resources, forestry being a good case in point.

My question is: Would he not agree that compared to most other countries the products that we derive from a cubic metre of wood from our forests is significantly less than we would find in virtually all other forest producing nations? Would he not agree that a good investment—and I emphasize the term investment—would be for the federal government in combination with provincial governments to invest more effort and resources in funding research and development, particularly in those areas pertaining to value added, for our forest industry?

Mr. Bird: Mr. Speaker, yes, I think that our resource areas and the opportunities to create value added products and value added economic activity in areas such as forestry agriculture, mining and so on are obvious areas of application.

As I said in my remarks, Canada has too long relied on its resource industries. Our resource industry activity doubled in the late seventies and eighties, whereas our productivity in non-resource commodities has deteriorated and diminished. We stand in a very poor state of progress with respect to our OECD colleagues and competitors.

We cannot rely only on the resource area. In fact, a great deal can be said for increasing our investment in areas of non-resource products. Fortunately we are doing that in such areas, for example, as telecommunications and electronics. I was struck the other day by a figure of $700 billion in new service materials that the GATT negotiations are going to open up if they are concluded successfully.

The short answer to that question is that yes, we have to continue to pay attention to our resource areas, but we have to quit relying on our resource areas to the degree that we have in the past and direct our investments in other non-resource areas as well.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to join in this debate on the economy. The motion put forward by the member for Willowdale is a very straightforward one which deserves the support of the House. He states:

> That this House condemn the government for its economic mishandling and incompetence.

This is the type of of straightforward thinking the House should convey to the Canadian public, that in fact the economy is in terrible shape and it is a direct result of mismanagement by this government.

Through the work of our critic on industrial development, through the member for Willowdale, this side of the House has spent many hours talking to Canadians from coast to coast and developing our own approach to it. I think the time has come in this country for a new approach on the economy.

I might start out by reflecting on my own constituency. I am sure we all have this experience. We heard the exchange between the members from New Brunswick. The reality is that there are high levels of unemployment and lack of opportunity now permeates the total provincial economies from coast to coast. It is now something that is on the front burners which we have to deal with.

When I went for a Monday morning ceremony at a school run by the aboriginal community in the inner city of Winnipeg in my constituency, I was struck by the seriousness of the students standing around and talking. I listened carefully during a pipe ceremony. I said to myself: "If I were leading this pipe ceremony and if I were their spiritual leader, how would I offer them hope in this economy?"

To have hope one has to have a vision. To have a vision one must be able to gather people together, to talk with the people and to instil in them a sense of confidence. In many respects, this quiet session among aboriginal youth represented the country in that nobody is there to give them hope, nobody is there willing to resource that hope, nobody is willing to push the country to the limit to rebuild the economy.

Instead of instilling hope, instead of making people understand there is a reason to have confidence, there is a reason to reinvest, there is a reason to build, this government has sold nothing but bad news for the last eight years. The result of this accumulation of bad news is a country which feels bad about itself and is without hope.

I was also struck by what was said in conversations with my nephew who was here visiting, a Trent University student. We were speaking about the economy. I asked myself, if I was in his situation would I have the confidence to keep going to university, to keep investing, to ask my family for money in order to build up the credentials to go into this job market? I think it is a testimony to hundreds of thousands of students across this country that they keep going despite the bleak news on the front pages of the newspapers. If you are a student in Winnipeg and read the headline on Saturday, February 8: "Unemployment takes leap. Even with shrunken Manitoba work force, unemployment up 2.1 per cent", would it give you any reason for hope to continue on in university or continue on at community college?

Listen to the report prepared by Employment and Immigration Canada, the government's own spokespeople, in a document entitled "Manitoba Labour Market Highlights for January 1992". In this document the writers state: "January's employment scene paints a chilly and foreboding picture. Figures released today from Statistics Canada in its monthly labour force survey show that on a seasonally adjusted basis, Manitoba's jobless rate jumped 1.7 percentage points to 9.9 per cent, while the labour force edged down only slightly by 1,000. Seasonally adjusted employment fell sharply by 10,000 to 484,000. Most of the job decline was felt by males whose employment dropped by 7,000. The Manitoba seasonally adjusted jobless rate ranks fourth lowest behind Saskatchewan, Alberta and Ontario. The labour force is down 1,000, employment is down 10,000, participation rate is down 1 per cent, unemployment rate up 1.7 per cent".

Given these statistics and given as evidence of the decline of the Manitoba economy, it is no longer sufficient to stand around and say: "Things will be better in the fall. The fourth quarter is looking great. Things will be better in the first quarter in 1993. The economy will be better for your family. It is just around the corner, just hang in there. Forget about the fact that you did not have any UI as of December. Forget about the fact that your city is going broke because of welfare. Forget all that. We promise you that some day in the future, even though we are planning to do absolutely nothing to help you, things are going to be better for you".

The economy needs a plan, a vision, and it needs assistance. As I noted at the beginning of my speech, the Liberal Party has spent several months preparing itself to present to the Canadian people a plan of action which makes sense and is fiscally responsible. We are not only doing this on a national level but we are also doing this on a regional and local level.

In January we announced what we called a five-point, one-year emergency plan. This was also an extension of what we said in our minority report for the subcommittee on poverty, where the Conservative majority refused to deal with the issue of the immediacy of the problem of child poverty. The government must act now and we give the following five suggestions as to how the economy can be kick-started.

(1) A 5 per cent minimum down payment for first-time home buyers. Ever since World War II housing has been the key to kick-starting the economy and to giving people a product they can use literally for generations after.

(2) Allow the use of RRSPs to finance first-time homes. Again, get that housing market started.

(3) A shared cost infrastructure program. This government fails to recognize that every municipality in this country, even the smallest of cities, needs infrastructure and improvements.

• (1550)

It is an investment that Canadians are willing to make. It creates jobs. It creates a product that everybody can use. It is something worth fighting for.

(4) Intensified training initiatives. The previous speaker from the government side noted the need for training. While we have all noted the need for training, those of us who have spent our life in education could have told the government that 20 years ago.

It has been told year after year since it became the government that training is important. What do we have? The end product is cutbacks on the UI program which costs thousands of young Canadians the opportunity to properly train. How can you stand up and talk about training without putting the resources in it so that those who need it understand that they also have some support?

(5) Emergency funding for the food banks. Prices are so expensive this year that we must offer cash assistance to prop them up during 1992.

We also need plans for different cities. In Winnipeg, after several consultations, we have come forward with an eight-point program for an economic plan to help new Canadians get the proper education, to help new Canadians get English as a second language so they can get better jobs, to improve the minimum wage so that new Canadians do not get stuck in jobs that pay $4.50 to $5 an hour because this government now has the lowest minimum wage jurisdiction in the country, to make sure that immigration policy does support family reunification because through families, new Canadians create wealth.

The government's policies are totally counterproductive to job creation.

We must find ways to get new Canadians involved in the planning of the economy. When we talk about Asian markets, why are we not dealing with new Canadians from the Asian countries and giving them opportunities to participate in government decision making and in developing trade programs by using their language skills?

There are many ways to get the economy going. The only way that does not work for sure is the way this government is approaching it. We on this side can only hope that the budget produces new ideas and new hopes in Canadians, a new focus for the budget process and an opportunity to get this economy going in 1992 for all of Canada and for Winnipeg where we definitely need the help of the federal government.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, I would like at the outset to congratulate the hon. member from Winnipeg for his speech.

Everywhere I go throughout Canada when speaking with young people, one of their major concerns is that there seems to be an absence in government policy. The youth issue is exactly what they are referring to.

In an era when the government speaks a great deal about global competitiveness, statistics and facts show that the youth element of this strategy is absent. If the government plans to indeed compete at the global level, it must realize that we must train young Canadians. We must give them opportunities.

We have approximately 400,000 young people in Canada who are presently unemployed. That does not include the number of young people who are on the welfare rolls.

I wonder if the member from Winnipeg can comment on the importance of having an all-embracing youth strategy in place for this nation to prosper and meet the challenges of the 21st century.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the member for York North for bringing this to the attention of all Canadians.

We do need a youth strategy. I would like to respond quickly by pointing out three areas of concern. First, with aboriginal youth, there are almost no support systems in urban Canada. When they talk in western Canada about having one in four entrants to the labour market being aboriginal youth, there could be a total destruction of the capacity of that economy to grow because we have not trained and provided for job readiness.

Second, changes in the UI legislation which I referred to in my speech make it almost impossible for people to re-enter or to enter training programs because they do not have a history in the job market. With employment rates among young people sometimes three times as high as the national average, how can you get started in the system to get properly trained if you cannot get that first job to get into it.

We have a vicious circle with people sitting at home saying: "I wish I could be trained for something". The first question they get asked is: "Are you unemployed?" "Yes". "Do you have UI?" "No, I have not worked enough". "Sorry, we cannot help you to get out of that". The frustration that is building up behind the scenes on this issue is something to be listened to.

When our critic goes from campus to campus and talks to students, he understands that they too are the third priority group that we have to deal with. Students need summer jobs. They need hundreds of thousands of summer jobs.

How can you get trained to prepare for the job market if you cannot get a job during the summer? How can we ask this generation to begin to form families, to even think about buying a house when they start their life with $20,000 to $30,000 of debt because we have been incompetent at the national level in financing universities, financing education and financing summer jobs?

I think this is the biggest tragedy about to face young Canadians. Again, we await the budget because if the government passes up this opportunity to help young people, it really is losing a golden opportunity to extend a welcome hand.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I too join my colleague, the member for York North in commending the comments made by our colleague, the member for Winnipeg North Centre.

The hon. member for York North talked quite rightly about one end of the spectrum, that is to say young Canadians, tomorrow's future. Certainly those individuals want to play a role and a part, not tomorrow but today.

I am wondering if the member could also address the other end of the spectrum where I think there is an equally big problem. I see it in my riding every day, that is to say the older workers, those who are not chronologically old but age 50 to 55.

They wish to continue to put perhaps another five years in the work place to pay off the mortgage or to put children through school. As soon as they are laid off I am also finding that these are the individuals who our firms and our business community are not willing to reinvest in, perhaps because of their age and perhaps because they can find cheaper labour with less experience.

I am just wondering how we also address the other end of the spectrum.

Mr. Walker: We will need another debate to bring to the attention of the government all the problems related to the older worker.

Nothing is more tragic than to be age 50 to 55 and to see a company pick up and move to the southern United States because of free trade, because of the dollar, for whatever reason it may want to give, to leave. You have no job, your UI runs out and there you are, after all these years in the labour force going for welfare.

This problem deserves a much longer debate. We must impress upon the government the need to help these people.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to start by saying that I find the motion put forth by my colleague, the member for Willowdale, quite timely.

I say timely and accurately because I cannot engage in any discussion in my riding—and I would assume it is the same in the other 294 ridings in the country—whether it is over dinner, whether it is in a cafe, whether it is in a library, whether it is addressing students in schools, or whether it is talking with parishioners after mass on a Sunday at the local church, without talking about the poor health, the frail health of our economy.

The face of that economy takes different strands which when quilted together offer an economic blanket that clearly is not providing neither comfort nor cover for Canadians across the country.

When we look at statistics in terms of an uncompetitive and overvalued dollar, when we look at manufacturing jobs lost, in the area of almost 100,000 for last year alone, when we look at unemployment rates of over 10 per cent across the country including metropolitan Toronto and my riding, when we consider that means some 2.2 million people on welfare with over 1 million kids living under the poverty line, when we talk about the question that taxation on all three levels, particularly the federal income tax slice, aggravated by the GST, it is impossible for many Canadians to make ends meet at the end of the month.

I was in my riding on Thursday evening conducting a public meeting, as I do every month. That was the greatest thread of evidence that came through, that we are killing Canadians through taxation. They get a sense that they are working more for different levels of government, particularly the national level, than they are for their own future and the future of their own families.

• (1600)

There were over 50,000 bankruptcies in 1991 alone which was almost a 50 per cent increase from 1990. Look at the number of people lining up at food banks, numbering two million nation-wide. Of them 700,000 are children.

It is one thing to quote statistics as I have. We also need to recognize those statistics first and then respond to them. This government has had a difficult time in recognizing them when our Prime Minister goes on tour in southern Ontario to show the kinder or gentler version of our Prime Minister.

He was met stop after stop after stop by Canadians who are not propelled into simply protesting the office of the Prime Minister for which all of us, including members on this side, need to have some regard and some respect.

Those people who come out, whether it is to my public meeting at St. Gerard Magella on a Thursday night, or whether it is to meet the Prime Minister in Peterborough on a Friday night, are largely propelled by the economic anxiety that they feel in their gut. That anxiety is defined by either not having a job or by having a job that has gone from full time to part time or defined by the fact that a wife or spouse has to look for a job because you cannot make a go of it any more.

That is what is fuelling Canadians to seek answers from a Prime Minister who responds by offensive platitudes like the word "crackpot" rather than recognizing the need for those people to have economic hope and economic certainty.

We have two opportunities to respond, two opportunities to propose a recovery package to this economic recession, this economic draught. It is either going to be consumer led or there will have to be some leadership, some stimulus from the national level.

Let us look at the first option. Do we believe that Canadians today are going to lead us out of a recession by consumer spending? Let us be honest about it. They will not. What are Canadians telling us? I know they are telling me that if they have a few dollars they will put them either under their mattresses or in their savings accounts for an even rainier day.

They are telling me that rather than buying that new car they are going to put up with the 1984 car for another couple of years. They will change some parts but they will keep it going. They are telling me that rather than buying the second television set they are going to force their kids and the family to watch the same program on the first one. What they are telling me is that they do not have the confidence nor the faith to invest and to spend. They are holding back.

We are not going to see great retail sales. We are not going to see great sales of cars, fridges and commodities because Canadians are not encouraged enough, not inspired enough, not confident enough to spend in our Canadian economy. Therefore there will be no spinner effect nor multiplier effect to get us out of this economic pit.

Whether we like it or not, we have to take a look at the second option which is a nationally stimulated, leadership driven recovery. The government has been telling members on this side: "We can't. We have a deficit. We have a large deficit. We can't spend".

I am trying to be responsible along with my colleagues. I recognize the vast and great debt load. What we also have to recognize is if there is no induced leadership or stimulus, the recovery will be very long. If the recovery is very long in coming, many people will get hurt and many more people will go under. That is something we are not prepared to accept or condone.

I say to the government on the other side that we have a large deficit, but for every unemployed Canadian, we are paying $14,000 for that person to stay at home and stay unemployed. When they are finished unemployment insurance, we tell Canadians: "Now that you are finished unemployment, go collect another $14,000 a year on welfare". The person stays at home again. Where is the dignity? Where is the productivity? Where are the revenues to come back to the government from those Canadians who actually are paid to stay at home? It is not training them, not putting them back to work, but paying them to stay at home.

On the one hand you have many unemployed Canadians robbed of their dignity and on the other you have a few other fortunate Canadians who are working, saying: "Most of my taxes are going to support people who do not work and cannot work". You have two sectors of society that are pitted against each other.

If we are spending $30 billion a year on unemployment and welfare payments alone, does it not make sense to take portions of that $30 billion and try to stimulate it responsibly wherever you can?

We have suggested a five-point program. It is not exhaustive; it does not have all the answers. There is room for other initiatives. We have offered in good faith, after some well thought out debate in our caucus and party, that these five points would to a certain degree ignite the economic engine again. The government can support some of them or say no to some. If it says no, hopefully it will replace it with its own.

This government simply cannot hide solely behind the deficit. I have a deficit. It is called a mortgage; the bank owns my house. I borrow that house from the bank because I did not have enough money to put down. I have a deficit that I am carrying. That deficit does not preclude me from having a car. It does not preclude me the odd time from going with my spouse to a movie or to dinner, but within my means.

All Canadians are carrying their own personal deficits, whether you define that as a mortgage or other debts. This country is as well but it should not preclude any action that would put people back to work. If we do put people back to work through stimulus, it would give dignity to those people. It would eliminate $14,000 per person from the public purse which we are supporting through unemployment insurance and welfare. The person working is creating revenues and, therefore, is creating taxes for the government. The person earning an income can maybe find the confidence within himself or herself then to spend in the economy again. Maybe, just maybe, we will get this economy humming again as many Canadians hope.

Those people who came out to Peterborough to meet the Prime Minister were not doing so out of any irresponsible act toward the government or the Prime Minister, notwithstanding the fact that many people might have some very strong opinions about the Prime Minister. The message there and the message at my public meeting on Thursday and to the kids I visited at St. Angela's on Friday morning was very clear: put people back to work.

There is a role for government to play. Not all government action is bad action. Some of it is called leadership, some of it is called responsibility. In today's debate our message to this government is to have a bit of a quiet awakening and to get Canadians and this country back to work again, which means you need to risk and spend something if you want something in return. Otherwise you get nothing.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to start by congratulating my colleague from York West on a very well done presentation. In his presentation he not only criticized the actions of the government but made some legitimate proposals reflecting a progressive proposal made by the Leader of the Opposition some time ago.

Surely my colleague would agree with me that the federal government is washing its hands of the whole question of getting the economy moving, whether through further reducing interest rates so that they would be in parity with the interest rates of the United States, or through easing the pressure on the dollar so it will fall to a reasonable level so our industry can compete internationally.

Surely my colleague can see a role for the provincial government to play. I would like him to share with me any concerns or any suggestions he might like to make to the Government of Ontario because, as a representative from an urban centre, surely he is faced with the same pressure as all of our colleagues from all of the urban centres in Ontario are faced with: the need for progressive actions. All we have been hearing from our leaders, both provincially and federally, are tough economic times. Frankly you do not need to elect a politician and pay him $80,000 or $60,000 or $40,000 a year to tell you there are tough times out there. Any one of my constituents can perform that job very eloquently.

I was pleased with my colleague's presentation. He came up with some sort of tangible proposal. Would my colleague from York West share with us his suggestions for or his comments on the performance of the provincial government when it comes to economic renewal?

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague from Ottawa Centre who raises a very important point concerning the role of the province.

My colleague quite rightly pointed to the lack of leadership to a certain degree being offered by the Premier of Ontario, who created expectations when he said, two or three weeks before his TV appearance that he was going to go on television to address Ontarians. Legitimately there were a number of expectations generated as to what he was going to tell Canadians living in the province of Ontario; perhaps announce some new proposals and new programs that will stimulate the economy. Instead, he was bankrupt of ideas. It was more an opportunity to tune in to Ontarians in their living rooms and almost play a bit of the Pontius Pilate role and suggest that it is the federal role.

No doubt the federal role is a very large one. I think each of us should look to our own constituencies and to ourselves for leadership as we have done. We have not only criticized as an opposition. We have advanced an agenda, if you will, that the government should adopt and run with. The only thing the premier advanced in that television commercial was the offer that if Ottawa were to give the Ontario government a dollar for public works it would match it. He did this knowing full well what Ottawa has said to him repeatedly about not providing any extra dollars. The rest was academic. He said: "We are in tough times. It is very rough. Good luck and good night".

What is Ontario doing for the small business sector? He suggests that Ed Phillip, the minister of industry, is the point man to have a dialogue with the small businesses. There is nothing there for the small businessman. What is he doing with the municipalities rather than talking to the federal government? Why does he not talk to the city of North York and the city of Toronto and ask, if the federal government does not want to participate, what we can do to put people back to work? What is Ontario government doing for summer jobs that my colleagues from York North and Winnipeg North Centre talked about earlier? What about people at Ontario universities and Ontario colleges and Ontario youth? What is the summer program for them?

I am saying that people in positions of authority and in governments, whether they be provincial or federal, should not pass the ball but take it and run with it.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I had prepared a very specific speech on small and medium sized businesses for today's debate and I must tell you that after hearing what has been said here in this House since this morning, I feel like giving some background information.

To be honest, some stupid things have been said here today, many by the people opposite. I am just thinking of all the comments we had on the value of the dollar and on interest rates. I am also thinking of what opposition members said about lowering the value of the dollar, that they could do it and that the government should do it and so on. Those listening to us know that the federal government has something to do with setting the value of the dollar. They also know that the Canadian dollar is traded around the world and fluctuates as a result of decisions made outside the country. I think that we must be realistic. The Bank of Canada is supposed to have some idea of what the dollar should be worth and to prevent it from rising or falling too quickly, but the fact remains that foreign investments in our dollar automatically influence its value and the government by itself cannot set the rate. It can help, but it cannot decide alone. I think that must be emphasized.

I did not hear the opposition thank or congratulate the government because interest rates are falling and the lowest in 15 years. I did not hear opposition members say that they meet their constituents every weekend to deal with these various problems. In the riding of Trois-Rivières, some people thank me because their rent or mortgage payments are less as a result of lower interest rates. People have pointed this out to me and I am sure that they have pointed it out to opposition members, who unfortunately forget to repeat it here. The cost of borrowing is important, especially when it has dropped drastically in the past few months; for example, car payments are lower. I think that must be mentioned because it is part of this government's overall economic policy and part of a country's economic foundation. If people have to pay less to borrow, they have more money to spend and that will help revive the economy, but that is not pointed out.

Neither have they mentioned that this government has managed to control inflation. You know as I do that in 1981 and 1982 inflation was 12 per cent. As you will remember, Mr. Speaker, even though you are very young, the government at that time, which is now on the opposition benches, had let interest rates rise to 24 per cent; that was its way of lowering inflation, because no one and no country can survive 12 per cent inflation. Do you think that brought inflation down? Of course, but it was pretty strong medicine. We saw what interest rates of 24 per cent did in 1981–82. When we talk about economics and read the opposition motion today, we must keep in mind what happened in 1981–82.

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to return to the subject of small and medium sized businesses in Canada and Quebec. It must be mentioned that they created 80 per cent of permanent jobs in recent years. That must be pointed out because businesses of this size are in the midst of restructuring in 1992. They must adjust to the world economy. There are no more barriers, no more frontiers for them now. They must compete not only in Quebec, not only in the St. Maurice region where I come from, but they must compete in Canada and abroad. If they are to compete, their costs must be low and their production of excellent quality. They must have modern technology and that is why our small and medium sized businesses are now undergoing changes. They must move from a regional or provincial economy to a world economy if they are to progress.

Our government has taken action to help our small and medium sized businesses such as technology initiatives, international marketing and education for small-business people. Free trade has removed barriers, thus enabling many companies to go abroad for new markets. Courses are given to the staff of small and medium sized businesses and these businesses are offered financial assistance. In addition, regional development programs in various regions of the country also help our small businesses.

Mr. Speaker, you know that Canadians are being consulted on the prosperity initiative. The report on this consultation will probably be presented in June and we will see what people throughout the country said and what they expect the Canadian government to do to help our companies, mainly our small and medium sized ones, not only survive but also grow in Canada, in North America and internationally. We must also think of the unified European common market, which is now a reality; our people must also go there. Indeed they must compete almost everywhere.

On that score I think that we all have ideas on what should be done, and our productivity in Quebec and in Canada must improve. If we want to be able to compete with countries whose technology is very advanced and whose productivity is very high, we here in Quebec and in Canada must do our homework. Here again, programs are available for companies, but Canadians in every region must really think that they are the best and that they will produce the best product, which will be sold and recognized as such. We have some work to do there.

Small and medium sized businesses include tourism. Canada now offers 4,000 different products and services to all those in Europe, Japan and many other places who wish to visit Canada. Tourism is an industry, maybe the one with the highest concentration of small and medium sized businesses. It is a very profitable industry and again must be able to provide outstanding service. Whenever outsiders come to our region, I tell them that they will be well received. Because of the quality of the region's facilities, it is a pleasure to invite people to visit us. It should be like this everywhere in Canada. We ought to be able to say that our tourist industry is the best in the world. To be the best, service is what counts. When you are on a vacation, you want good service. That is why we must put the emphasis on service and on the quality of our facilities. We have excellent facilities of all kinds across Canada that are attractive to visitors. We must stress that.

There is also the Federal Business Development Bank, a federal agency that plays a part in helping small businesses. Many courses are given annually by FBDB people to help entrepreneurs, both people who are starting a business and those who want to expand.

I was talking earlier about financing. The Small Businesses Loans Act guarantees 85 per cent of the amount borrowed by a company that is starting a business. Because of the risk involved, a company in this situation which asks a financial institution for a loan might be turned down, but under the small businesses loans system, the loan will normally be approved, because the potential liability for the financial institution is not more than 15 per cent. This excellent funding mechanism adds up to a total investment of $1.5 billion annually by the federal government to help small businesses.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, our exports represent 25 per cent of our total production. Twenty-five per cent of what we produce in Canada is exported, which means it is important, even where free trade is concerned, to ensure that we have a high quality product, because we have nothing to lose and everything to gain, and as a result, these companies will grow and expand. To be able to export more, we must prove we can produce quality. Our workers must concentrate on producing high quality products at the lowest possible cost.

In concluding perhaps I may say a few words, especially for the benefit of our colleagues opposite, about the free trade agreement. Between 1988 and 1990 our exports to the United States increased by $5 billion. Five billion dollars more in sales between 1988 and 1990, which means that free trade has been highly profitable for Canada and will continue to be profitable, despite the fact that our dollar is not as low as we might want it to be.

Perhaps I may say in concluding that the motion presented today by the hon. member for Willowdale does not represent current economic reality and is certainly not the kind of message that politicians should give Canadians. I think Canadians are sick and tired of hearing the opposition criticize without ever producing realistic and practical solutions or giving this government recognition for what it has achieved, which includes substantial savings in a number of sectors.

The motion before the House today does not reflect what is happening and what is expected to happen in the future, and therefore the hon. member for Willowdale should realize what has been done and start taking a positive attitude, in the best interest of Canada as a whole.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur—Education; the hon. member for Algoma—General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade; the hon. member for Dartmouth—Atlantic Economy; the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie— Algoma Steel; the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap—Nuclear Industry.

I have received written notice from the hon. member for Kitchener, that he will be unable to move his item under Private Members' Business on February 18, 1992. Since it has proven impossible to exchange positions in the order of precedence, pursuant to Standing Order 94(2)(a) I will ask the clerk to drop this item to the bottom of the order of precedence on the Order Paper.

Pursuant to Standing Order 94(2)(b), Private Member's Business will be suspended and the House will continue with the business before it at the time.

[English]

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to have an opportunity to say a few words in respect to this Liberal opposition motion:

> That this House condemn the government for its economic mishandling and incompetence.

I am sure it would reflect with a great deal of accuracy the feelings of many Canadians if I were to take the time available to me to criticize and only criticize the government for its policies which have hurt so many Canadians so badly. It seems to me it would be better for me to take an opportunity to look at what the government has called its competitiveness agenda and make the point that what we are really talking about if we are going to be a successful Canadian economy is that we are going to have to create an opportunity economy.

I would like to make a rather more positively oriented contribution this afternoon by saying the following. All sectors of our economy, whether they be services, manufacturing or resources, will increasingly depend upon our ability to use research, technology, skills and knowledge to increase the value of goods and services that we export internationally. In fact, if one looks at value added, what we are really saying is that we must invest more of human creativity in what we sell, and what we sell must be what people will want because they have that value.

The target of success therefore lies in the production of high value added tradable goods and services, and this will require the implementation of a number of policy initiatives, in particular in the building of a trained and educated work force that not only can cope in a high-tech environment but can bring creativity to the workplace in a way that enhances a company's ability to find and satisfy market demand.

This must be the motive of an opportunity economy. That Canada must switch from a resource based branch plant economy to one based on technology and knowledge is something that all have now recognized. There are so many things that have been done that impede our ability to make this reorientation.

The free trade agreement, for example, deprives Canada not only of our traditional economic advantages and natural resources and energy, but of the basic tools and protections that virtually every other industrial country has used to convert itself to a successful high-tech, high value added economy. Under the free trade agreement already toothless investment rules have been made worse, and it allows Canadian capital and taxpayer footed R and D to slip away from us just as some of our best R and D performers are swallowed up by foreign ownership; this in spite of the fact that we all recognize now that foreign ownership goes hand in hand with R and D underperformance and, too often, job losses.

The subsidy and procurement roles, for example, deprive Canada of the mechanisms that in the United States particularly have been so effectively used to create industrial growth. Far from running from past mistakes, the Conservatives are now going to negotiate a free trade deal that will involve Mexico. Jobs in the auto parts industry have already been lost to Mexico, yet does anyone think that $1.68 a day Mexican labour is going to buy a $15,000 car?

But the free trade agreement and the potential NAFTA are only a part of a battery of Tory economic policies or potential policies that have blasted the economy into a recession and have wrecked our resource and development potential. High interest rates and the high dollar are like two barrels in a shotgun. The auto parts industry, for example, is so heavily squeezed by declining profit margins caused by the high dollar that there is virtually no money left to do the research and development that they need to do to compete.

Last year Ontario alone lost 10 per cent of its manufacturing jobs, many of them to Mexico's cheap labour and low standards. Quebec lost 85,000 manufacturing jobs, while B.C.'s resource industries were savaged by declining commodity prices and an overvalued Canadian dollar, not to speak of American trade barriers.

The creation of a knowledge based economy depends not only on scientists and engineers, which all too often have been overemphasized in this House, but upon enlightened social policies that will enable Canadian workers to use their talents and their intelligence and creativity. We cannot succeed when 20 per cent of our population is functionally illiterate and innumerate. We cannot succeed without the industrial training and apprenticeship available in other countries but which have been so long neglected by both governments and industry.

As we make these significant economic changes, we must not forget that there will be an abundant need for adjustment programs for workers who have been shifted from one sector of the economy to the other.

So far the Tory vision of competitiveness has been represented to us as a kind of cut-throat metabolism that has so far wreaked havoc on the economy and too many people's lives. We should instead blend economic efficiency and compassion in an opportunity economy that aims for equal economic and social citizenship in this country.

An economy is only successful if it empowers all people to take full advantage of their economic potential, their talent and their creativity through education, training and the development of skills. We cannot expect any Canadians to contribute productively unless they are first adequately clothed, housed and fed.

Social justice, in short, therefore is a foundation upon which a strong economy is built. It is the path to wealth creation, highways, jobs and greater security, as well as the ability to sustain social programs themselves in a virtuous circle of ever greater equity and efficiency.

The alternative to a high-tech economy based on an educated, trained work force will be a destructive competition with Third World countries for the lowest wages, the worst social programs, and the most poorly protected environment. It would be a menu for failure.

The notion that economic growth must be traded off for greater fairness is a fallacy. Many policies which promote equity are also fundamental to an increase in economic growth. Countries that have moved toward greater economic equity in the 1980s—Japan, Sweden and Belgium, for example—have achieved a greater level of productivity than those countries that have paid little attention to the significance of equity such as the United States, Australia and tragically Canada as well.

Industrial policy is not simply moving factories around like marbles in a shell game or being number one in every industry. Environmentally sustainable knowledge based economies have to find technological niches that match local and regional strengths, for example, with respect to the location of national resources, geographic location and existing industrial infrastructure.

Government, business and labour must co-operate in order to respond to customers in terms of quality and cost, in order to develop products and processes that satisfy market demand. As such the federal government should help regions and municipalities accentuate their advantages and should encourage them to work with local businesses and labour groups in forging economic development strategies which will serve their municipalities and their regions. Substantial investment in infrastructure, for example, would not only produce jobs over the short run. They will represent the fundamental assets necessary in Canada to attract and maintain new industries where that has been made possible.

Instead of depending upon branch plants of the multinational foreign companies, we should push for indigenous industries that have local management, local production, marketing, and resource and development centred in our country. In particular, we should help the home grown small and medium sized firms. The SMEs create most of the jobs that are produced in this country. They do most of their research and development here and reflect the creativity of Canadians, a level of creativity that we must enhance.

However, the free trade agreement that we have and the potential free trade agreement being negotiated have and will jeopardize their markets. As well high interest rates would make it harder to get seed money. The high dollar makes their products more expensive abroad and makes investment in R and D and new technology almost impossible.

Thus, buffeted by so much that this government has imposed upon them, many of our small and medium sized enterprises are threatened by multinationals with deep pockets or which put a squeeze on profits that the small and medium sized enterprises cannot afford, such that they cannot afford the R and D that they need to stay competitive.

The small and medium sized enterprises, therefore, should be a target of whatever federal supports there should be, of strategic procurement, of technology networks, and of other support which will enhance our technology and resource and development.

The government should help train managers and encourage both basic research and research consortia. Instead of tax bonanzas for mergers and real estate speculation, the tax system should encourage industrial investment in research and development and in value added process in product technology.

In the longer term we need to be careful to re-evaluate our tax system in an attempt to reconcile tax fairness which we insist must be accomplished with a tax regime that will stimulate investment in our indigenous, small and medium sized enterprises.

There is nothing we have not heard before in the prosperity papers the government now has circulating across the country for discussion and workshops. Much of it has come from us on this side of the House, from groups of scientists, educators and academic industrialists familiar with what economic growth is all about.

This government already knows the route to prosperity. That route is, as I said, through the imagination and creativity of our people. Canadians recognize that, and that recognition we hope will ultimately be contained in the Constitution of our country because most Canadians now are aware of what happened in Montreal when we were discussing the economic union.

Tom Kierans stood before that group of people trying to consider Canada's future and said that we cannot have economic efficiency without equity. That was supported subsequently by Mr. Castonguay who said there must be for all Canadians a social charter that will guarantee that equity. He too recognized that the fundamental underpinning of economic success is the empowerment of Canadians.

We should not be talking about the competitive economy or any of those things as much as we should be talking about opportunity economy. Canada will thrive. Canada will prosper. Canada will be successful economically on that day when all Canadians have had the opportunity to use their native talents in terms of the skills and education provided to them. Whether they are the worker on the plant floor, the supervisor, the engineer or the research scientist in the laboratory, all of them represent a necessary interconnection with those who want to see the kinds of goods and services Canada can provide which are appropriate to the Canadian economy and which reflect those talents.

I plead not for the competition economy but for the opportunity economy. That kind of economic policy, I think most Canadians would support. Let the greatest strength of Canada, its commitment to social justice, be the basis for economic success and we will be true to ourselves and just as competitive as we need to be.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, I listened very attentively to the hon. member from Windsor who eloquently stated his vision for the nation and indeed his economic outlook for this country.

The underlying theme in today's debate above and beyond the numbers that we are dealing with is indeed the issue of a crisis in confidence. Canadian people are deeply concerned about the direction in which this country is going.

It should not be surprising, because Canadians feel cheated. In the 1988 election Canadians were offered a free trade deal which was going to give them jobs. That did not work out. Canadians were offered a tax reform package that was going to put more money back into their pockets. That did not work out. As a matter of fact since 1984 the tax changes have increased the tax burden on the average family by over $1,500.

These two elections were also matched by the election of the New Democratic Party in the province of Ontario. The hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair must know by now that if the unemployment situation continues to rise as it has in Canada and particularly in Ontario, some of the concerns that he has could have easily been adopted through that provincial legislature.

When we speak about training, for example, for young people, when we talk about workers readjustment programs, every single level of government has a stake.

I have a question for the hon. member. Is he going to relay or has he relayed some of his deep thoughts, some of his visionary economic outlook for this country, to his colleague, the premier of the province of Ontario, who has not done many of the things he promised he would do during the provincial election?

At the end of the day we must realize that the problems of the nation know no boundaries. It does not matter which legislature. It does not matter which level of government. We have a serious crisis on our hands. We are faced with a crisis in confidence. We are faced with a crisis in leadership in this country. I must say as a member of Parliament from the province of Ontario, as I speak to many people at my regularly held town hall meetings, that the election of the New Democratic government in the province of Ontario has not bestowed any confidence, particularly in the business sector and particularly among workers who thought they would have a government that was going to address the many inequities and injustices that have existed.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, one of the things that has always concerned me is the tendency for politicians to provide and too many to demand quick and easy answers.

What I said today I have said in one way or another since 1984 when I was first elected. I brought a different perspective to this House. I understood the importance before I came here of science and technology and research and development. I understood that when the Liberal Party held power before this government it had shown a notable lack of understanding of the importance of technology and research and development and consequently education in our future economic prospects.

This is not something about which to attach exclusive blame to the Liberal Party, because too many Canadians, too many politicians did not understand that. I thought that this government perhaps could be pushed, cajoled, urged, to understand that there would have to be some dramatic changes. I would have hoped that the Peterson government would have understood that it would have to make some dramatic changes. But the Peterson government did not in fact focus on those necessary structural changes of which his government should have been a part. At a time of great economic growth, however short that period might have been, there was the opportunity to make choices to provide narrowly directed stimuli in areas which would have helped the economy. But instead, in response to the same divergent and various political demands on the province, there was an expenditure of money in ways which were not focused on the long-term question of how one is going to accomplish economic structural change as was needed in Ontario and as was needed in the rest of the country.

Now, the consequences of the free trade agreement and federal policies with respect to the value of the dollar and the GST have created absolute economic chaos in this country and have caused the loss in Ontario of something like 350,000 jobs, 200,000 of them permanently through plant closures, when profit margins have gone to nothing, when people can hardly afford to pay their taxes, it makes it extremely difficult for any government to take on appropriate initiatives.

Mr. Rae has suggested this, and we agree, that the federal government and his government should, through matching funds, start an initiative on infrastructure and reconstruction in co-operation with the municipalities to inject into the economy immediately some money that will have a fivefold effect on the economy generally, to put some people back to work. We should begin immediately to do something about training and education.

I am as sorry as my colleague in the Liberal benches that the same kind of priority has not been given to training, either by governments, and maybe even to some degree the Ontario government, or industry, which has failed as well in what has needed to be done. I think it is tragic that there have not been sufficient resources provided to education generally and post-secondary education in particular. That is the result not only of governments but of Canadian attitudes as well, and those have to change.

I hope that in the coming months this government and the Ontario government and other governments in this country will agree on an approach to economic development and meeting the economic crisis in the short term that will be in the interests of Canadians. But I hope it will not be upon the recommendation of Mr. McKenna, to attack social programs such as medicare, which, as I said in my speech, are as necessary as anything else to ensure that our people will be able to take advantage of those training and educational opportunities that are necessary for economic growth.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, the motion of the hon. member for Willowdale asks this House to condemn the government for its economic policy. Instead, this House should be congratulating the government for responding with long-term policies to the economic challenges that this country faces. We must accept the challenge of helping the economy face the demands of a highly competitive global marketplace. Almost everyone who has talked in this House today has talked about a global competitive marketplace.

Hon. members opposite have many suggestions as to how we should spend money to help Canadians adjust to hard times. What they ignore are the reasons why we cannot spend money, why we cannot spend our way out of this current recession.

First of all, the country is in debt to the tune of over $400 billion. Hon. members opposite seem to think that it is all right to rack up these debts, although they will cripple the ability of future generations to manage this economy.

That brings me to the second reason why we should not take their advice and spend our way out of the recession. It has been tried before and it does not work. The Liberals tried to spend their way out of the recession in the early 1980s. The result was clear for all to see: we are left with an enormous debt that this government is trying to contain. At the same time, many Canadian companies failed to make the adjustments they needed in the early 1980s. They were propped up by government handouts, government bailouts, coddled by oil prices that were artificially low. We hid behind tariff barriers and did not need to improve our productivity to keep up with the rest of the world.

That seems to be the kind of economic policy that some hon. members in this House would like to implement again. It is a policy to spend the inheritance of our children and grandchildren, all in an effort to prevent Canadian industry from becoming world competitive.

I agree with many in this House who have said that in order to become competitive, we must improve in five areas. I particularly agree with the last speaker: learning, science and technology, investment, domestic markets, and trade. We have to do it in the right way. I would like to make some comments on how one department of this government is tackling those particular issues, both with resources and with the comments and the influence that we are able to bring to bear in the government as a whole. That department is of course my own: Industry, Science and Technology Canada.

In the area of learning, ISTC promotes the education of highly qualified scientists and engineers, management skills training, and raising the profile of science and technology as exciting career options. The Canada Scholarship Program—one instance—launched in 1988 with a five-year $80 million budget, recognizes and promotes the best students in science and technology right across this country and offers them scholarships to the tune of $2,000 a year for the four-year period. You will note that just last Friday in Peterborough the Prime Minister announced that this highly successful program would be extended through to 1996 and that start ing in 1993-94, the value of the scholarship would rise from $2,000 to $2,500 to ensure that it was maintained as a prestige scholarship. That means that over the four-year period, engineering students and others will receive $10,000 from the Government of Canada. That is a significant amount of money.

We also provide public awareness campaign funds to promote science and technology right across Canada. The initiative there has a particular focus on young people. We all know that we are not going to be able to work our way out of the recession we are in; we are not going to be able to compete in the world unless we have the scientists and the engineers to take us forward. What the Government of Canada can do, the Government of Canada is doing through the scholarship program, the public awareness programs and other things.

We have heard comments today about research and development. Some of the comments appear to indicate that people feel the Government of Canada is not spending enough money on research and development. If you look at the figures, and they are readily available, the Government of Canada spends as much and sometimes more than its competitors on research and development, as a government.

What is lacking in this country, and we know it, is that industry generally in Canada does not spend the money on R and D that our competitors do. Part of our whole policy must be to encourage that kind of R and D spending so industry can promote itself and become globally competitive. What we have done is to try to fill in some of the holes that exist. We know that we do not do well as a country on pre-competitive research. That is the research that is needed before you move into the product design area. That is why the $240 million networks of Centres of Excellence Program was initiated. That program is going very well indeed.

Interestingly enough, over the last two years we have had three major discoveries in the genetic area. Each of the three discoverers belongs to and is part of the genetic disease network funded by the networks of centres program. We have also launched the strategic technologies program, where we know there are horizontal technologies that this country must be aware of and must be active in: the biotechnologies, communication technologies, and the advanced industrial materials. We work with companies, with consortia to try to promote those concepts right across the country.

The Advanced Manufacturing Technology Applications Program is another instance where our department goes out to industry and says: "Do you know what technology you need? Can we help you find out what technology you need?" People go in and advise the company on what technologies are required. That, by the way, is a relatively modest cost program, but we have all kinds of people and all kinds of industry taking advantage of it.

My hon. friend across the way, who may not know much about the economy of the country from the motion that he has put forward here, certainly does understand IRAP, and that is a very good program. The Industrial Research Assistance Program of the National Research Council has been a leading light in this area. It is kind of an industry extension program and it works extraordinarily well. We are going to continue to support it in every way we possibly can. We particularly like the concept that the council has put forward of moving IRAP even more strongly into the regions of this country so everyone can share in the prosperity.

On trade of course we have External Affairs and International Trade. Those offices are often shared with a trade group in terms of ISTC, and that has worked out very well, because you have trade, you have the industry people and you have the science and technology people all working for one objective: the prosperity of Canadians.

The last example of ISTC I would like to give you is to look at the sector campaign initiatives that we have, the various industrial sectors ranging from automobiles to micro-electronics, forest products to the fashion apparel, advanced manufacturing technologies to emerging environmental industries. We help those industries begin to focus on their difficulties. Sometimes it is research and development that they need. Often it is technology inflow that is required. We are prepared to help in either way.

We also have some programs in the business centres that we run across the country. We try to provide one-stop shopping for our Canadian industry. If they come to our business centres, 11 of them across Canada, we then hook them up with the appropriate people in industry, in trade, in science and technology, and so on. As you know, we are working very actively in trying to promote trade across Canada that will help us be competitive in the rest of the world.

I know my time is running out. Let me conclude by saying that what we are trying to do is to design our programs to target and help industry as a whole. We are not trying to pick winners and losers. We are not throwing money at fading companies in a vain attempt to save jobs. That approach has been tried in this country over and over and it does not work. We cannot prop up individual companies. We can set long-term policies and we are: the free trade agreement, getting rid of the old manufacturers' sales tax. I know our colleagues on the other side do not like those policies, but they are the right policies for the long-term health of Canadian industry, and in their hearts they know that. They just do not want to admit it at the present time, but they will.

Our government has its eye on the long term. Is it not interesting that people always come up to you and say: "The trouble with you politicians is that you always think short term; you cannot think beyond four years?" This is a government that has never thought short term. It is a government that has always had its eye on the long-term competitive nature of Canada, and it is a government that will remain focused on the long term and the short term will be someone else's difficulty. We know where we want to go and it is the right way for this country.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, I paid attention to what the minister had to say, but there are certain problems with the logic of his argument.

Here in Canada, as we stand in this Chamber, there are almost 400,000 young people who remain unemployed. We are indeed creating a generation of chronically unemployed young Canadians. The minister correctly addresses the point of his prosperity agenda and global competitiveness. But any report that his government or any institution or organization that is deeply concerned about global competitiveness will tell you that you need a skilled work force. Above and beyond that, they also point out that a youth employment policy is absolutely necessary for future prosperity.

Given those essential truths, I would like to ask the minister how he can, on the one hand, tell us that education and training are vital to our prosperity agenda and, on the other hand, as we have seen time and time again, there are cuts in those particular areas. Obviously there is a contradiction in terms, and unfortunately the people who will pay the price for this unbelievable government policy will be Canada's youth.

I would like the minister to address this particular point because young people approach me on it everywhere I go throughout Canada.

Mr. Winegard: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to respond to that particular comment. I remind hon. members that it was this government which for the first time raised the whole issue of education and training to a level of discussion that this country had not seen before. It is this government that has placed significant funding and changed the focus of the unemployment insurance program to training, rather than simply paying people. It is this government that has focused on the high quality people that you need to work in the modern kind of industry that we are trying to build. It is this government that is bringing all of the players together for the first time to talk about what kind of long-term policy is needed in this country and whose responsibility it is to help keep young men and women in school so they do not drop out; whose responsibility it is to see that it is made easier for them to move into the community colleges, into the universities, to have training, trades training.

We have not had that kind of discussion in this country before. While I agree with the comments that conditions now are very difficult, at least give the government credit for moving this whole thing from almost a sort of subterranean talk up on to the front burner where we can all address the problem.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether I should laugh or cry, but probably I should do both at the same time. The minister must have read the report of the Natural Science and Engineering Research Council of Canada. At page 8 of that report it says clearly: "Canadian expenditures on research and development over the last 15 years show a decline, followed by a recovery to the 1971 level, and virtually no growth in real expenditure over the last five years".

Who is the minister kidding when he says that research and development has been a priority of the government?

If there has been a true commitment to education, why have we seen cut after cut on an annual basis in transfer payments for education to the provinces?

On top of that, if the minister is right in what he is saying, why did we not put in some sort of a requirement that money the federal government put toward education and gave to the provinces for education should be really going toward education and not toward roads or social services or other programs?

I cannot for the life of me sit back and watch the minister make those statements and the public at large hearing the minister make those statements and saying: "Well, look, we have all of the fundamentals in place". The reality is that we do not have the fundamentals in place. Interest rates are still high. The dollar is still extremely high and we cannot compete internationally with this kind of monetary policy. Our investment in research and development is not there and our investment in education is not there either. If the minister is telling me that the industry is not investing in research and development, what is he doing about it, in order to make sure our industry is investing in research and development?

Mr. Winegard: Mr. Speaker, I must say I am absolutely delighted to respond to the question on Established Programs Financing. It is very clear to anyone who studies this subject that Government of Canada funding has not been used for post-secondary education; it has been used by the provinces for other purposes.

The hon. member asks why we do not do something about it. Once the decision was made in 1977 to go the route we are now going, no government could intercede and no government can change the way EPF funding is transferred because control was lost entirely, absolutely, over that EPF funding. If you look at the figures provided by the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada or the Canadian Association of University Teachers, they will show you that the Government of Canada is still funding on average almost 70 per cent of the government costs of post-secondary education and there is no way, sir, that you can really avoid this.

Let me come to some of his other comments about the funding for research. The funding he is talking about does not include the funding for the network of centres of excellence. It does not include the funding for the environmental sciences. It does not include the funding for technology for solutions.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I have been listening attentively to the hon. minister opposite who has great experience and has distinguished himself as an educator prior to coming to this particular Parliament. He has made a major statement on the floor of the House indicating that money going to the provincial governments is not being used for post-secondary education.

I wonder if the minister would table in the House the figures substantiating his claim. How much money is each province spending for education in terms of the money they receive from the Government of Canada? It would be nice if the minister would provide that information to the House so we could fully understand what provincial governments, as he says, are doing with the money they receive under the block funding. It was a request made of the government of the day by the first ministers, led by none other than the premier of the province of Alberta, the Hon. Peter Lougheed.

Mr. Winegard: Mr. Speaker, I did not attempt to say it was not a good deal for the provinces. Of course it was a good deal for the provinces because they had the funding and could do whatever they wanted with it.

An hon. member: Are you going to table it?

Mr. Winegard: I would certainly be happy, sir, to get the hon. member opposite the figures for the amount of funding that is now provided by the Government of Canada in terms of the total government funding going to post-secondary education.

Mr. Dingwall: On a point of order. Mr. Speaker, I am not very articulate, but let it be said very clearly so that I can specify for the hon. minister opposite. What he said in the House is that provincial governments in receipt of federal dollars are not spending it on post-secondary education. Those are the figures that we on this side of the House would ask the hon. minister, a distinguished person in post-secondary education himself, to provide to the House forthwith.

Mr. Winegard: Mr. Speaker, we will be absolutely delighted to provide that kind of information. It is readily available.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment the Minister for Science on two things that he noted in his speech. First was the credit he paid to our critic of industry and trade, the member for Willowdale who has structured the Opposition Day today and the kind words that he said on behalf of our member for Willowdale. I want to thank the minister very much.

The other comment I would like to make follows up on the point of order that our House leader just raised with respect to the amount of money that is being spent—as I gather from what was said—outside the jurisdiction of what was originally intended to be spent within the provinces. That would be valuable information as we try to get through this terrible dilemma of finding ways to get out of this economic recession that all Canadians find themselves in.

I want to address this problem from the perspective of the area I represent, northern Ontario, an area that we at all times feel receives far too little attention from the government of the day. I appreciate this opportunity to make my comments.

The Ontario economy is probably the greatest challenge in Canada today. Ontario is often referred to as the engine that drives the national economy. The engine has ground to a halt and nowhere on the other side of the House do we see the leadership that we so desperately need if we are to get this economy back on its feet.

In my own riding of Thunder Bay—Nipigon, just this past week there was another blow to a vital industry with the announcement that the Domtar paper mill will be closing down in May and 400 additional people will be thrown out of work.

As we review the economy of northwestern Ontario, indeed the whole economy of Canada, almost weekly we see in local newspapers in the north descriptions of plant closures, descriptions of government assisted programs with respect to unemployment, the sawmill closures because of the export tax, the terrible bankruptcies of small businesses and the endless litany of despair and the waste of human resources that all of these unfortunate economic matters control in this country.

It is tremendously sad at this particular time in the heart of winter. It is a depressing commentary on the state of our region, our province and our country. We ask ourselves how we got into this mess. How did we get here and where do we go from here?

From this point on I want to take a little different tack. I want to talk about where we are and where this country can go. We have had enough talk about doom and gloom. We should assure all Canadians that we do have hope. We have hope because Canadians are a resilient people. Canadians are an industrious people and Canadians are extremely capable.

If it were not for the qualities that I have just mentioned in all Canadian workers, Canada would be in far worse shape today than we see it. The Canadian people themselves will bring us out of this recession. It will not be the government across the floor that will bring us out of the recession. It certainly will not be the government that represents the province of Ontario that in its short history, 18 months, has truly lost its way. We doubt on this side of the House whether the NDP government in Ontario can ever find its way to bring back the economy of Ontario and because Ontario is the spark plug of the economy of Canada, ever getting it back to where it once was.

The only people who can bring us out of the recession is the Liberal Party. We need a Liberal government in Canada to lead us out of this terrible economic recession that we find ourselves in.

For some reason we try to avoid the issue that Canada is truly a resource based country.

• (1720)

It is a little known fact that beyond the 25 square miles of Ottawa is the reality of the rest of Canada. The reality is that the forestry industry is the largest single industry in Canada.

It is larger than any other industry that we have. It is larger than the automobile industry, any of the petroleum sectors, mining and manufacturing.

Forestry in Canada today provides employment to 8 per cent of the Canadian labour force. It supported almost 900,000 forestry, manufacturing and service jobs until recently. One out of seven manufacturing dollars in Canada is related directly to the forestry industry. This industry contributes more than $17 billion to Canada's net trade balance and exceeds the net trade balance from agriculture, fisheries and mining combined.

Forestry accounts for close to $2.5 billion in trade within our country alone. The policy of this government does not reflect the importance of this industry to over 300 communities in Canada that are dependent upon forestry as their sole means of survival. Several of those communities are in my own riding.

It does not reflect this industry's contribution to the national economy in its treatment toward more than 30 single industry towns in northern Ontario alone which are reliant on the 17 pulp and paper mills and over 375 sawmills throughout our region.

Perhaps this government is ashamed of the fact that Canada has a resource based economy. Until that fact changes, which is not likely in this session, it better start focusing on the engines of our economy that are so vital to our future.

Let me just say that we on this side of the House are not going to get up here and chastize the government without giving alternatives as to how we think this economy in Canada should be started.

Let me quote from a release today by our leader: "This plan is not without cost, but the cost of an action of washing your hands of this suffering as the government is doing is far greater than what this government is performing. We are levelling with the Canadian people, telling them where the funding would come from, unlike the NDP and the Reform Party that offer simplistic and irresponsible quick fixes to our economy".

In the one-year emergency economic plan we have proposed is the 5 per cent down payment for first-time home buyers which was implemented last week after much urging from this side of the House and is now in place.

We also want to use the $7,500 RRSP contributions for first-time home buyers. That will also add to the quick start the housing industry throughout all of Canada needs. When the housing industry prospers, the softwood lumber industry also prospers. It is essential for the lumber industries of every region of this country.

We have a plan in place that is called shared cost infrastructure improvement. Every community in this country realizes that it has vital infrastructure responsibilities that most municipalities in this country cannot afford.

As a case in point, we have in our area—we heard about the Great Lakes clean-up system today—the need for a secondary treatment plant. This is a $60 million or $70 million project. This infrastructure plan would assist all communities in this country. It is an infrastructure plan that would be financed by the federal, provincial, and municipal governments and would go a long way not only in our community but in every community in this country.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for allowing me the opportunity to make those comments on the economy of Ontario.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest during my hon. friend's comments and I thought they were very instructive.

I just have two questions. During its term of office in Ontario the Liberal government did a great deal for employment of public servants by increasing the number of public servants in Ontario by some 9,000 employees from 1985 through to 1990.

I was wondering if it would be part of a policy of the federal Liberal Party, if it were ever to face the electorate, to increase the levels of the federal Public Service back to the levels they were in 1984, given that during our mandate we have reduced the rolls of the Public Service by some 12,000 people. I just wonder if that is one of my hon. friend's alternatives.

The other matter is that during the terrible recession of 1981–82, in which my hon. friend from Willowdale participated and who actually framed the motion here today, he was part of the government that dumped the infrastructure contribution that the federal government used to make. Now my hon. friend and the Liberal Party are revisiting policies of the 1980s which they abandoned.

We appreciate that most of the Liberal Party policy these days, with its leader, is back in the 1960s. This infrastructure suggestion that my hon. friend makes was dumped in the terrible recession of 1981–82 and my hon. friend from Willowdale assisted. Are we going to bring back the infrastructure contribution that was dumped by the Liberals in 1981–82? Is that my hon. friend's suggestion?

Mr. Comuzzi: Mr. Speaker, I thank my friend opposite for those very incisive questions. I hope he realizes that during the years to which he refers I was not in this House nor in the provincial Government of Ontario. But I will try to take the two questions that he has posed and relate them as we go into the 21st century, 1990 and 1991.

What we are experiencing today is something that this country has never experienced before. This is the first time that we do not have the wherewithal and the resources within our country to come out of the recession that we find ourselves in today.

We have a deficit today that we cannot seem to contain at less than $30 billion, $31 billion or $32 billion, as we are told this year. We have a debt that since 1984, when my hon. friend's government took office, has increased from approximately $160 billion a year to something now like $420 billion.

Mr. Foster: Billions?

Mr. Comuzzi: Billions. Yes, that is with a B and not an M. It is billion dollars.

What that means simply is that for the first time in our history we spend 36 cents to 37 cents of every dollar we bring in in tax dollars and it does not buy one hospital bed.

Thirty-seven cents does not buy one school classroom space for any child in this country. It does not buy one meal in our food lines in this country. It does not buy one road. It does not provide infrastructure for any of the small communities within this country. It buys absolutely nothing. That 37 cents of every tax dollar we collect buys absolutely nothing. It goes to pay interest.

Given that horrendous problem, there is very little that we can do in this House in order to get out of this recession other than to use the things that we already have and own within this country. Things that I mentioned last week, like using fine paper made only by Canadian mills. Use those facilities that Canadians have already bought and paid for, for example the St. Lawrence Seaway, and maybe suspend tolls for a year in order to get that viable waterway working again.

• (1730)

There are so many other areas and I can see time does not allow me, but I thank my friend for those questions and I hope that I have been able to answer them to his satisfaction.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to commend my colleague from Willowdale for coming forward with a resolution at this particular point in time.

It is a very constructive resolution. The people of Canada are focused on what this government is going to do, or more precisely what it is not doing, to try to assist Canadians who have been driven straight over the brink, many into bankruptcy, most into a period of uncertainty in their lives by this government's economic policies.

Most days I think people watch and they might think that not much of what we do in here has a great deal of relevancy. But today we have an opportunity because of this extremely well-worded motion to come in here and to talk about the Mulroney government record, the Tory record, and where it has got us to date.

Before I start, I want to tell you that this morning when I got on the plane in Halifax there were two members of the Newfoundland provincial legislature flying up here to Ottawa. They were not coming here because they thought the weather was going to be better. They knew they would get more hot air certainly than they were going to get down in Newfoundland, but the reason was because of the state of the fishery in Newfoundland.

As my colleague from Newfoundland at Question Period today clearly said the fisheries in Canada is a federal responsibility. It is not a municipal responsibility. It is not a provincial responsibility. It is a federal responsibility.

We have seen in the last few years, particularly since the last election, this government go in with the primary resource industry in Newfoundland which is the fisheries and the national resource, a renewable resource when it is properly managed, and because of the actions of this government cozying up to the Europeans, it gives away our fishstocks. It does not listen to the evidence of the scientists at the Bedford Institute of Oceanography and other places. It has completely mismanaged a resource industry that is responsible in Atlantic Canada for over 100,000 jobs. It is bigger than the auto industry in Ontario.

We are down in Atlantic Canada with an economy that at the best of times is just pulling its butt out of a recession. We are the first to go into a recession; we are the last to come out. Here we have a renewable resource industry in Atlantic Canada, the fisheries. It is like these guys have gone from the frying pan into the fire in the fisheries.

We have a Minister of Fisheries and Oceans from St. John's, Newfoundland. He took over and some even on this side said: "Well, you know he is a hometown boy; maybe he will be able to look after the interests of the Newfoundland fisheries, the Atlantic fishermen, and the fish plant workers a little better than the other guys from the other coast have been doing". Well, boy, were we ever fooled.

Friday in Newfoundland, a province that has an official unemployment rate of over 18 per cent, there were 1,000 fish plant workers laid off in a place called Catalina. At the best part of the fishing season 1,000 people were laid off. What is it going to be like in a few months down the road when they would normally be facing less fish to process through their plants?

I was also told on the plane today that because of this government's action and neglect in the fisheries industry, an industry that in good years would be worth over $750 million to that battered economy in Newfoundland, it has been reduced by more than 50 per cent in the net revenue impact on Newfoundland. This is because of this government's economic disaster plan that it has foisted upon the good souls in the province of Newfoundland and Labrador. That is what it has done.

I watched on television one of the Tory ministers getting up and saying: "Well, things are looking better. The rate of bankruptcies is slowing".

Tell the 60,000 men and women in Canada who in the last 12 months have been forced to declare personal bankruptcy or who have lost their small unincorporated business that things are going to get better. Tell that to the 17,000-plus businesses in Canada many of which were passed down from generation to generation. Tell them: "Don't worry". The members opposite say: "You know, it is going to get better". This is after they have lost a lifetime of earning and investment and asset building.

Last Monday, the devastating bankruptcy figures came out, and they are devastating, and the minister just talked about the 1981-82 recession. I should read the comments of the superintendent of bankruptcy. What he said, if you are listening, is that this recession is much worse than the 1981-82 recession and takes the form of a depression in some sectors of the economy.

What do the members opposite say? They tell you not to worry, that things are going to get better and that economic indicators are looking up. What about the thousands of people who have lost their jobs in the forestry industry? My colleague for Restigouche—Chaleur has lost well over 1,000 jobs in his riding.

An hon. member: Yes.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Yes, well over 1,000 direct jobs. Those guys opposite twiddle their thumbs, and the carnage that has been left from one end of this country to the other. I do not know what in the name of goodness they want to do with the economy.

The government is taking the livelihoods and the futures of Canadians and it is flushing them down the toilet. It has no concept about how to get out of the recession it pushed us into.

They talk about interest rates. They say: "Have a look at the interest rates". I remember, and this will haunt many of the Tory members opposite during the next election campaign, it was this very government that pushed the interest rates through the ceiling. It was trying to cool inflation. It was trying to keep inflation down in Ontario because growth was running rampant in Ontario. What it did is it overmedicated and killed the patient. The patient is the Canadian economy.

Now that it got the interest rates down to an acceptable level nobody has any confidence left in the economy. They certainly lost all confidence in the government opposite. Even with the lower interest rates that we finally have the carnage is so severe that the economy is not picking itself up.

Economically, the casualties are all over the place. Businesses are not borrowing. There is a report which came out last week. People in the manufacturing sector were asked: "How do you think things are going to go?" They said: "We do not have a great deal of faith that things are going to get better quickly". What this government has done is it has taken an economy that was expanding during the periods of 1986 to 1989, mismanaged it and drove it into recession and some of it into a depression.

This government talks about how things are going to get better. People out there watching right now who have lost their jobs in the manufacturing sector and who have seen the plant, machines and all, truck south of the border to Buffalo—shuffle off to Buffalo—do not think there will be any great future for them.

Because of this government's free trade deal, because of its high interest rate policy, because of its ridiculously high dollar policy, what it has done is that it has lost the jobs those people were trained for. Yes, this government has done a great deal to improve economic performance and create wealth. Unfortunately it is not in this country.

It has created a great deal of wealth with the Portuguese, the Spanish, and the French fleets for stealing our fish in Atlantic Canada. It will not lift its finger to stop it. It is throwing thousands of fish plant workers out of work.

This government has created all kinds of wealth in the border states. There has been a boom in the manufacturing business there because companies have left southwestern Ontario for good. It has done a great job. This is stimulating an economy, but it ain't ours and that's the problem.

We have to look at all of the things that are happening. Look at what the government does to healthy industries in Canada, like the oil and gas industry, and haven't we had some wonderful economic news out of that sector. That has just been peachy. Over 10,000 individuals some of whom are sole proprietorships in small gas stations across Canada will lose their jobs because there are over 2,500 stations closing.

In the shipbuilding industry it gives a contract to HTIL in my riding for the coastal patrol vessels. It is now floating the rumour that it is going to cancel it and jeopardize 1,200 jobs. Regarding the Dartmouth marine slips in my riding, part of that little cozy back room deal, it was going to rationalize it and throw 187 people out of work.

• (1740)

The Imperial Oil refinery in Dartmouth employs over $350 people. It probably will not be able to survive in this recession battered economy and it is looking to the workers to effect 30 per cent greater efficiency without any investment.

These people over here do not care about jobs at all. They have completely lost direction and that is why this motion that is put forward today is very appropriate. I join with my colleagues here and with over 20 million Canadians in condemning this government's economic policies.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend talked about interest rates going through the ceiling. Given that during the 1981–82 recession interest rates hit 22 per cent, I wonder if my hon. friend could compare that with where interest rates went in the last couple of years.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, these guys opposite like to play a numbers game.

We are dealing with a recession second only to the depression in Canada. The best that they can do to answer for their own policies is to try and dip back into the recession that was around in 1981–82 which was a world-wide recession.

We did not have free trade then, and I want to speak to this issue. These guys get away with this all too often. In 1981–82 we had a recession in this country. Because of Liberal policies and Liberal programs, we did not throw people out on the scrap heap. We did not do that, and the minister should know that.

It costs money and it is added to the deficit, but we in the Liberal Party believe in investing in people. When that recession was ravaging this land, we were not up on our hind legs, like some members opposite, baying at the moon and blaming it on somebody else. We recognized that we had a responsibility to put Canadians back to work.

My colleague from Broadview—Greenwood talked about the NEED program. We took $400,000 and we invested in people. We gave them their integrity back. We gave them some confidence that they had a government that cared about their future.

He talks about speaking in a normal tone of voice. My voice may be raised, but it is because there are thousands of workers in my riding who have become the victims of this government's kamikaze economic policies. It may be fine for us to be up here in our ivory tower, like the minister is most days, and talk about what it was like in 1936. I do not know what it was like.

What I know is that the casualties are real. They are out there in the community and this government is completely bankrupt of any ideas. If Canadians had their druthers, they would kick these guys out. They would kick them out today and they would put a party in that understands what it means to govern this country and understands what it means to have trust. It would be a Liberal government.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to my friend with great interest.

He does not think that the current recession is a world-wide recession even though conveniently the 1981–82 recession according to him was. I would agree with him on that point.

Does he not feel that the United States, Australia and other western countries are in a recession today? He says that in 1981–82 the Liberal government did not throw people on the scrap heap. Perhaps it did not. What it did was borrow money so that people are threatened with the scrap heap today.

Would the hon. member not acknowledge that the expenditures, the attention and the care given to training and retraining programs today are infinitely better than in 1981–82 when money was simply borrowed in order to postpone the inevitable restructuring of Canadian industry?

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting for this member to talk about what we are going to do.

I will give my personal opinion. My opinion is that an expenditure of $1 billion, as proposed by the leader of my party, to go and work at municipal infrastructure to put people back to work is a wise investment.

If momentarily or for a year or forever the deficit goes up by $1 billion, I am prepared to take any flack that will come for it.

It is fine for your friends on Bay Street in Toronto to talk about the deficit. They do not have to worry about putting bread and butter on their tables. They do not have to worry about whether they have enough money to feed their children nutritious food.

There are over 1 million Canadians currently going to food banks. There are over 1.5 million Canadians unemployed. The government asks: "Would you add to the deficit?" If it means putting this country back to work, we would invest in people. If it means reinstilling consumer confidence that things are going to get better, yes we would.

I would also say to the member that one of the things we would not do with very limited resources is what this government did. It spent hundreds of millions of dollars in the last three months when our economy was in recession trying to buy provincial elections in western Canada with projects that even in the scientific community, and he knows the one of which I speak, were questionable.

The government can find the money, $250 million here and $300 million there, when its Tory friends are in trouble. When Canadians need help it comes up with this straw dog called the deficit.

Would the Liberal Party be different? It would be a heck of a lot different. People would know that they had a future because we would invest in it.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I found that an interesting exchange. I would invite my hon. friend to some day visit Alberta and see whether even those in food lines and going to food banks are not concerned about the deficit. They know where today's debt came from and they will never forgive those who created it prior to 1984.

When the hon. member for Willowdale criticizes the government for its economic policy, I wonder if he has taken into account the government's efforts to improve Canada's competitiveness in the international marketplace. If he considered this government's success over the past eight years in encouraging business to trade more and trade smarter, he would not condemn its economic policy; he would congratulate it.

Canada is 31st in the world in terms of population, and yet we have the world's seventh largest economy. Over the past 30 years Canada has achieved the second highest rate of growth among the G–7 nations and the seventh fastest in the OECD nations. We have enjoyed the second highest rate of investment growth among the G–7 nations in the last 30 years and the highest rate of job creation within the OECD.

Much of that prosperity has been based on trade. We earn 25 per cent of our output from trade, and that is two and one–half times the comparable figure for the United States. It is one and one–half times the figure for Japan. Among the G–7 countries, only in Germany does trade account for a larger proportion of GDP than Canada's.

Since 1984 the government's agenda for economic renewal has guided the economic policy aimed at helping Canada maintain its position as one of the world's great trading nations. The agenda consists of a number of wide ranging strategies which, taken together, help create the environment in which business can grow and prosper.

Deficit control has been a major part of the agenda. Government operations now run well in the black. Only the interest on the national debt contributes to the deficit now. It can be truthfully said that this government of which I am proud to be a member has not contributed one nickel to the national debt since 1984.

The agenda for economic renewal has also included privatization of 20 Crown corporations and the down–sizing of the Public Service. There are some 90,000 fewer employees on the public payroll now than there were in 1984. The agenda includes regulatory reform, including major changes to the regulations governing the transportation, energy and communications industries. Since 1986 the government's regulatory reform strategy has ensured that business is a partner in creating the regulations that will affect it.

The agenda for economic renewal also includes modernizing and streamlining Canada's intellectual property laws, establishing Investment Canada, which encourages foreign investment that will be of net benefit to Canada, and reforming our tax system, including the elimination of the federal sales tax on manufacturing.

Perhaps one of the best known elements of the agenda for economic renewal has been the implementation of measures to open international markets for Canadian business. Canada's number one trade priority is a successful conclusion of the Uruguay round of multilateral trade negotiations, the largest and the most complex ever undertaken by the GATT.

• (1750)

The agenda also included the free trade agreement with the United States and is now expanding its horizons to include a possible North American free trade agreement. The combined North American market will consist of 360 million people, with an economic product of $7 trillion. That is bigger than Europe. As with the FTA, this market will allow us to achieve new economies of scale and specialization.

The free trade agreement has helped Canada's trade position. Since the FTA was implemented, Canada's trade surplus with the U.S. jumped from $11.4 billion to $17.3 billion, a rise of almost 50 per cent. In the last three years the value of all Canadian exports to the U.S. has increased by almost $8 billion.

The FTA has also had an impact on investment from abroad. In 1988, just before the implementation of the FTA, Canada had a direct investment outflow of $2.4 billion. In 1990 we recorded a net inflow of $5.1 billion. That was the first time in more than 16 years that Canada enjoyed an inflow of net direct investment.

Taken together, the measures of the government's agenda for economic renewal have provided for an environment in which the private sector can be the engine of growth in the Canadian economy.

Canadians must do more to take advantage of the opportunities for growth. In particular, Canadian business must capitalize on the growing importance of international trade. Earlier I mentioned how important trade was to the Canadian economy. Only about 100 companies account for half of our exports. Only 32 per cent of Canada's manufacturing firms export at all, in spite of the unsurpassed opportunities presented by the free trade agreement.

Only about 13 per cent of Canadian-owned manufacturers are exporters. Small and medium-sized firms account for less than 7 per cent of our exports. The challenge is to get more companies to trade. At the same time, we must recognize that international business is no longer merely the export of goods. More and more, international business is measured by the growing volume and variety of services. It is measured in investment, both inward and outward. It is also measured in the ability to attract, to develop and to employ new technology. Above all, international business today is characterized by the growth of strategic alliances and partnerships.

The government recognizes these new realities. One can see how this government has responded when one observes how the role of our trade commissioners abroad has changed to meet the new demands. Back when the party of the hon. member for Willowdale was in office, the trade commissioners were primarily concerned with developing markets for Canadian goods. Today that is only part of their job. They must deal with market access issues, they must provide market intelligence that is increasingly sophisticated. They promote investment in Canada and they play a key role in helping companies acquire technology and find partners for strategic alliances. They help companies enter strategic alliances, joint ventures and subsupplier agreements with foreign companies, to share a technology or to build a market share.

Outward investment through acquisition or the formation of joint venture companies, back-to-back deals offering exchanges of market expertise, and access to technology have become part of export strategy.

Canada's trade commissioners are important players in helping to build these collaborations, and their changing role demonstrates the changing realities of international trade. The government has been quick to respond to those realities. The government has created a number of programs to help build a trade culture in Canada, to help Canadians obtain the information they need to open markets for their goods and services, and to help business acquire the technology it needs to tap export markets.

In the area of building a trade culture, the government helps sponsor seven centres for international business studies at universities across Canada. In addition, there is a trade policy and law project jointly undertaken with Carleton University and the University of Ottawa. The government sponsors the annual Canada International Trade Month and the Canada Export Award Program. It publishes and distributes a wide range of trade publications.

The government has also introduced services to introduce new exporters or potential exporters to the American market and to markets in Europe.

One such service is called NEBS: New Exporters to Border States. Its objective is to provide assistance to Canadian companies hoping to export to the United States for the first time. NEBS specializes in helping to crack the northern states. A similar program called NEXOS has been custom designed for companies hoping to sell to the southern United States. Finally the NEXOS program encourages companies to pursue the dynamic markets of western Europe.

The most popular program of all has been the program for Export Market Development known as PEMD. This program helps Canadian business to develop, increase and sustain activities by sharing with them specific export marketing efforts. The program encourages businesses that have not exported previously to begin export marketing, and it encourages established exporters to expand their activities in the new markets.

PEMD provides assistance with some of the costs incurred by a company in its exploration of new markets. These contributions are repayable if sales are made to those markets.

There has been such a heavy demand for PEMD assistance that last November it became fully committed. The House will be well aware that funding for PEMD has now been increased, allowing market identification trips and participation in trade fairs to continue for the balance of this fiscal year.

The need to increase PEMD's funding for the remaining weeks of the fiscal year is a sign of its success. We can ask the business men and women who have used this program and others like this program to score export sales whether they agree with the motion of the hon. member for Willowdale.

The business community values these programs. It knows that the government has done an excellent job in helping Canadian business to respond to the challenge of the global marketplace.

As an indication of how these programs are appreciated by Canadian business, I would remind the House that the Conference Board of Canada found that 88 per cent of the businesses it surveyed had used some kind of government export assistance.

The Institute for Research in Public Policy confirmed that 85 per cent of the small businesses it had canvassed had been helped by the government's programs to develop our international trade.

That is a vote of confidence in the programs this government has introduced. It is a vote of confidence by the business community in this government's economic policy. I maintain that the House should demonstrate its confidence in that policy and vote down the motion by the member for Willowdale.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I was very interested in the comments by the hon. member from Alberta, but it seems to me that he has really glossed over the tremendous downturn that we have seen in almost every sector of Canadian manufacturing in the past three years.

Clearly the interest rates that the government has had have been very high. In many cases they have run as much as 7 per cent to 8 per cent above those of the United States. Certainly in the summer of 1990 that was the case. They have not only brought on a very violent recession in this country, the worst that most Canadians can remember certainly since the 1930s, but our exports have been devastated. It does not matter much whether we talk about softwood lumber where we had the export tax of 15 per cent on top of a dollar that had appreciated from 75 cents to 86 cents or 87 cents. The impact of all of those programs designed for exports the hon. member has talked about is totally negated by the incapacity of Canadian manufacturers to cope and compete with American industry, whether it is in the steel sector or in forestry products or in mining or whatever. We are paying 5 or 6 per cent higher interest rates and we are climbing up over that higher Canadian dollar. The softwood lumber industry saw the 15 per cent export tax as a major problem to overcome. Likewise with the higher dollar its competitive position was reduced not just by 15 per cent but probably closer to 30 per cent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being six o'clock p.m., it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 81(17) proceedings on the motion have expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

EDUCATION

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, on October 23, 1991, I asked the Minister of Finance why his government was shirking its obligations in the area of education. As you know, Mr. Speaker, 30 per cent of Canadian students, nationally, drop out of high school, and the percentage is as high as 70 per cent in some regions. The Prime Minister keeps telling us that getting a good education is so important, while his government is slashing mercilessly education and training budgets, which were cut by 7.6 per cent last year.

[English]

Although the federal government supports education in a number of ways, since 1986 it has continually reduced its contributions to post-secondary education.

By 1994 the federal government will have slashed $9.5 billion in transfer payments to the provinces. In last February's budget it cut spending on education by $485 million. Obviously the government's lack of commitment to education will have dire consequences for our country if no solutions are devised.

Foremost among problems related to education is that of illiteracy. Without a population having adequate reading and writing skills, Canada risks losing its competitive edge internationally in the long run. The costs of this problem are staggering. A 1988 report by the Canadian business task force estimated that the direct cost of illiteracy to business each year to be about $4 billion and the total cost to society to be about $10 billion. What has the government done to resolve this problem? Little, save to impose a 7 per cent tax on reading materials, a direct blow to the literacy movement.

Another point I would like to touch on is that of accessibility to education. Obviously this factor has been one of the lowest priorities of the federal government. In fact the maximum level for the Canadian Student Loans Program has not risen since 1984. Moreover, the inequality of opportunity for young Canadians will be exacerbated by three measures recently announced by the federal government.

The first is a 3 per cent administrative fee on student loans which effectively taxes those who can least afford it. Interesting. Those who do not have to borrow will not be taxed but the larger the loan, that is the greater the need, the greater the tax.

Second, the goods and services tax will apply to books and other learning resources, to clothes and to a number of other supplies required by students.

Third, recent cuts to the Summer Employment Experience Program have diminished students' ability to support themselves through their educational career.

Spending on education, research and development are investments in the future. In the long run a properly educated populace, a training system that operates with efficiency, sensitivity and responsiveness to labour market needs, and increased research and development will only increase the wealth of our country and opportunities for further social development.

Finally I must urge the Conservative government to put its money where its mouth is and to provide the resources needed by our educational system to help our country achieve its full potential.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, you will understand that I do not agree with what the hon. member said and I think that if you could speak on it, you would not agree either. He says that the government does not support education. This government did more for education in 1984 than the party which my colleague represents did when it governed in the years before that.

The government spends $11 billion a year on education. The only point on which I agree with the hon. member is that the results are not great. I agree with that. If you compare with other countries, he is right. In Canada, most young people who could go to university do not, and that is unfortunate.

That does not mean we should spend more money; it means that we should reallocate our resources so that young Canadians receive academic training. Even if we spent $2 billion more, if young people do not want to get an education money will not make them do so.

I would like to point out that in 1991–92 we are spending $5.7 billion on education not including unemployment insurance funds which amount to $1.8 billion in 1992, up from $1.4 billion in 1991. Nor does it include another program on which we spent $2.3 billion in 1990–91 and will spend $3.1 billion in 1991–92. You will understand, Mr. Speaker, that enough money is there for young Canadians to receive the education to which they are entitled. But it is necessary—

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, on February 5, I put a question to the Prime Minister about the very serious concern of Canadian farmers in the supply management sectors of dairy, poultry and egg production.

There are serious implications for Canadian producers with the proposals put forward by Arthur Dunkel, Secretary-General of the GATT negotiations, involving almost 95,000 jobs in that industry of not only the 38,000 farmers themselves but 22,000 people who work on farms, as well as the many thousands who work in the food processing industry relating to dairy, egg and poultry production.

I asked the Prime Minister if he was willing to meet with the heads of state of the five other countries which support Canada's position for a strengthened and clarified article IX in the GATT negotiations and to prepare a joint declaration, not just of the ambassadors but of the heads of government, saying that our bottom line is to maintain article XI, to strengthen it and to clarify it so that it applies not only to raw fresh farm products but to those commodities that include more than 50 per cent.

I suggested this because it seems to me that if it is a joint declaration by the heads of government of Japan, Israel, Norway, Switzerland, Korea and Canada then the rest of the countries in the GATT negotiations will know that this is the bottom line, that we are serious, and that we are determined to secure our position to maintain a strengthened and clarified article XI which is absolutely essential to the supply managed sectors in the Canadian agricultural industry.

In the second question I asked if the Prime Minister would meet with the President of the United States and President Delors of the European community in order to secure their support for our position.

Fortunately the House of Commons a day or two after that accepted a resolution on which I put forward a subamendment which read: "This House calls upon the Prime Minister to involve himself personally in the GATT negotiations in the interests of Canada's diary, egg, and poultry producers by meeting with the President of the United States and the President of the European community in order to secure their support and do so in co-operation with the other countries that agree with Canada's position for a strengthened and clarified GATT article XI".

• (1810)

It is not only a question that I put to the Prime Minister in the House of Commons, it is a resolution unanimously accepted by the House of Commons calling on the Prime Minister to become personally involved in these negotiations, take action, and get a joint resolution from the countries that support our position. This resolution should not be from the countries' individual ambassadors, but from the heads of government of those states. The Prime Minister should then meet with the two Presidents from the United States and the European community to secure their support.

It would be impossible to describe the economic carnage if the Government of Canada, and specifically the Prime Minister, does not put its shoulder to the wheel and ensure that we get that support in the final weeks of the negotiations of the Uruguay round of the GATT agreement.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to set the record straight on the government's long-standing commitment to support Canada's agrifood industry at the GATT negotiations. Canada like other countries has accepted the Dunkel tax as a basis for those negotiations, and I say has accepted them as a basis for those negotiations.

To our disappointment, the proposal does not call for the strengthening and clarification of article XI. That is the section of the GATT agreement that provides for the control of imports and for us to manage our products much better. As I said a minute ago, the Dunkel paper is the basis for negotiations and nothing more. It is not a final agreement. I want to make sure we all understand that.

Canada is continuing to fight for the clarification and strengthening of article XI as the negotiations progress. We remain committed to a stronger article XI and have been from the beginning of the trade talks. The Prime Minister has raised this issue at the highest levels with the heads of government of the major trading nations. I have explained Canada's position and the determination directly to United States Agriculture Secretary, Ed Madigan and EC Commissioner Ray McSharry. In the meantime Canada's negotiators in Geneva continue to press the case with countries that support our stand and those that do not. It is very important we make sure we have that consultative process with all of those people.

Our position today is the same as it has always been. It is one that was agreed to by all the stakeholders in the agricultural industry, and we will continue to defend that balanced Canadian position.

ATLANTIC ECONOMY

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): On October 23, I rose in the House to ask a question of the Minister of Finance. The question I asked dealt specifically with reduced payments under the equalization program to the Atlantic provinces. At that point those reduced payments amounted to over $170 million. Keep in mind this was a time of great recession when the Atlantic provinces, which are traditionally the least well off provinces of the country, were grappling with reduced revenues coming in and increasing expenditures. There were increasing expenditures because the government decided not to fund various cost shared programs at the same level with the provincial governments.

This came at the very time when more and more Canadians in Atlantic Canada were being driven out of the work place and into the unemployment lines. Because of this government's changes to Bill C-20, the Unemployment Insurance Act, last year those same Atlantic Canadians found themselves going very quickly from unemployment to welfare to food bank lines outside churches. They came to rely on food banks for the very necessities of life such as food for their children.

On that date I asked the Minister of Finance to indicate clearly that this government was still committed to a level of equalization to maintain the ability of the poorest provinces in Canada to deliver a national program at national standards.

We know this government is cash starved because it has mismanaged the days of plenty that it had in the mid-1980s. We know that it has mismanaged the debt and that it has grown. We also know that when it comes time to share the gain it is not equal across this country, but when it comes time to share the pain it seems that we in Atlantic Canada are more equal and we get a little more of the pain than we ever get when the gain plate comes along.

I simply asked the minister that day what assurances he could give me that the equalization payments would never fall to a level below which the provincial premiers in Atlantic Canada would be unable to provide programs of national service in health care and education and social programs.

Today I get a chance to sort of flesh that question out a bit and to ask the parliamentary secretary if perhaps he could give me a level of assurance that we in the Atlantic once again are not going to be derailed, that we in the Atlantic are not going to be asked to be second-class citizens, and that this government, even with its cash shortage position and even with the escalator clauses in the equalization formula, which is enshrined in the Constitution, by the way, will take whatever measures, however extraordinary, to ensure that the level of equalization payment will never drop below a level at which it will affect the standards of national programs delivered by the provinces.

Things are no better today. They are probably a little worse off than when I first rose. Those same concerns are still there. I know full well that there was a bit of a surprise last week when the Minister of Finance announced that some of the provinces would be getting up to $70 million in additional equalization payments because they have adjusted some of the inputs into the formula, but that still leaves us well over $100 million short. Hospital beds are closing. Tuitions are rising. Atlantic Canadians need more than a slight assurance. We need a commitment from this government that it has the best interest of Canadians at heart in ensuring that those in the have not provinces will be not driven further into despair.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, what really bothers me is when a member who is supposed to tell the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth —

An hon. member: And who is a Liberal.

Mr. Vincent: —manages to say not one word that makes sense. It bothers me because anyone who knows how the federal government's system of transfer payments to the provinces works—and the hon. member has been here long enough, so he ought to know—is aware that certain calculations have to be made before the federal government sends money to the provinces. These calculations are made on a per capita basis and on the basis of a lot of data that are not immediately available, and it can take up to 39 months and seven calculations before getting the final figure for the amount of money the federal government will transfer to the provinces.

On the very first day we cannot reach a final decision on what the amount will be because seven more calculations will have to be made. That was my first point, and it is too bad I do not have more time because I would have a lot more to say about this.

My second point is this: In 1984–85 the federal government gave the provinces $25.6 billion in transfer and equalization payments. In 1991–92 it will give $37 billion, which means an increase of nearly $12 billion in five or six years. The figures are self–explanatory. They demonstrate this government's interest in the well–being of Canadians in all provinces, whether they are poor, not so poor, or rich. The amounts have been raised annually and will continue to be raised.

When I hear members say that this was frozen and that was cut, it just is not true. There has been a substantial increase annually, and this substantial increase will continue. I see my time has expired.

ALGOMA STEEL

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to elaborate upon a question I asked the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology on October 23 about the restructuring of Algoma Steel.

I will quote directly what the minister said at that time:

> I think it would be premature for me to indicate with any precision because it is very difficult to do at this stage of the discussions when we do not have the final answers from all the players around the table.

• (1820)

I will say that the minister and the government have been very consistent in their answers. We have asked good questions and they have been consistent, but the answers are always nebulous, ambiguous, and really do not promise us anything.

To show the consistency, on May 27 I asked the same minister a question and he suggested that it was a very positive element; he liked this question of employee ownership, but I had better ask the Minister of Finance. I asked the Minister of Finance, and he said: "I think it is a great idea and we will attempt to co–operate and work in a co–operative fashion to see what we can do to facilitate the kind of objective that the hon. member has in mind".

I have a letter dated August 19 from the same minister, the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology: "I look forward to reviewing the new plan once it has been fully developed in order that we can give consideration to options for securing Algoma's longer term future within the existing framework of existing policies and programs".

To continue, November 21, I have a letter again from the same minister: "As of this moment, a definitive restructuring proposal has not been presented to Algoma stakeholders, nor has there been a definitive request made of the federal government to participate in the restructuring proposal. The federal government cannot make a definitive response until it knows what it is being asked to do".

We now know, and I am sure the parliamentary secretary knows on behalf of the minister, that on January 27, Justice James Farley accepted a plan from all stakeholders. Now all of the stakeholders will have an opportunity to respond to that plan. To this point, the only totally silent partner in this scenario has been the federal government. Now they have run out of excuses. It is time to put their cards on the table. The Ontario government, I would like to say, has been very, very forthcoming in this exercise.

The unions at Dofasco and Algoma Steel want the federal government to come forward at this point in time. The excuses have run out now that the restructuring proposal is on the table. Rumours have it—mind you, they are only rumours—that the federal government has made some sort of offer of concrete assistance. I hope that is correct. This is an opportunity to dispel those rumours and make them a reality.

My questions perhaps are a little bit more than what I asked on October 25, but I think now they are in order. Will the minister agree to meet with the stakeholders? Up to this point in time, he has been stonewalling the union. Probably all of the stakeholders have been stonewalled.

Is the federal government prepared to say yes to any of our specific requests, the bridge pensions, 50 on up, or 55, which is the present POWA program? Is there any flexibility in POWA? The Minister of Labour says no. He says it is up to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology.

Are there any tax credits to facilitate employee ownership? Are there any funds for the training institute? Are there more moneys for training and retraining of steelworkers and non-steelworkers? It is up to the government to say yes so that the rest of us can—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform the member for Sault Ste. Marie that the federal government remains committed to using its existing program in practice to alleviate the hardship for workers and the people of Sault Ste. Marie, which could result in a substantial reduction in Algoma's work force.

The older worker adjustment proposal put forward by Algoma in its plan of arrangement dated January 21, 1992 goes well beyond the bounds of existing federal programs and practice and would set a precedent, the cost and implications of which are simply untenable. This would certainly not be fair to companies and employees who have found themselves in similar positions in the past. It would also be an obligation that the Government of Canada could not assume into the future because of the financial cost.

For these reasons the proposal as presented cannot be accepted. In its place, the federal government is prepared to offer assistance to older workers in a form that is more consistent with existing legislation and practices. Assistance would take the form of a special program, the cost of which would be shared equally with the province of Ontario, which would offer an income supplement to employees who are 55 years of age or older at the time the restructuring plan was implemented.

With respect to employee training and adjustment measures, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission is currently negotiating a package with the Canadian Steel Trade and Employment Congress that would provide adjustment services responding to the needs of workers who may be laid off at Algoma and other places.

NUCLEAR INDUSTRY

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, last October I raised the issue of possible atmospheric radioactive releases into Canadian air space from the Hanford Nuclear Reservation in Washington State south of the B.C. border and the possibility of future contamination.

Just 300 kilometres, as the wind blows from the Canada-U.S. border lies one of the most lethally contaminated spots on the face of the earth. The 1,450 square kilometre Hanford Nuclear Reservation site near Richland, Washington is a child of the Manhattan project. In 1943 the U.S. military constructed three production reactors to process high-grade plutonium, and afterward Hanford became a keystone in the cold war race against the Soviet Union for nuclear superiority.

Hanford is home to 63 per cent of all the high-level nuclear waste produced in the United States, some of which can kill or maim for thousands of years. Below the desert lies a hidden nuclear graveyard, which contains a bizarre collection of irradiated nuclear junk. Bulldozers, dump trucks, freight trains, spent nuclear reactor housings, and other radioactive debris were buried there when they became too contaminated for use.

Some of the radioactive plutonium stored on the site has a half-life of some 24,000 years, the time it takes to decay to one-half of its original volume. Conceivably, Hanford could become one of the last artefacts of our civilization, a legacy to our nuclear age.

In addition to the billions of litres of high-level waste and radioactive sludge that are stored in underground tanks, buried in tank farms in Hanford, is a literal plethora of other radioactive nuclear waste. Swimming pools temporarily house some 2,100 tonnes of nuclear reactor fuel that was due to be processed into plutonium before the facilities were shut down.

But what is most startling about the Hanford story is what until recently has been left untold. Through recent access to previously classified military information, evidence is now emerging that portions of the Pacific northwest, possibly including areas of southeastern British Columbia and Alberta, may have been extensively contaminated by atmospheric releases, both accidental and deliberate, from the Hanford Reservation. In 1986 the U.S. Centre for Disease Control reviewed some 19,000 pages of previously classified documents and concluded that atmospheric releases of radioactive iodine 131 from Hanford were the largest documented in any U.S. nuclear facility to date.

Based on the preliminary findings, two U.S. studies are now being conducted: a thyroid cancer study of 20,000 children who were under the age of 19 between the years 1944 and 1953, as well as a radioactive dose reconstruction project.

But here in Canada, B.C. medical authorities and the Canadian Medical Association have urged the federal government to become involved in these studies in order to determine the levels of exposure. I am asking this government to involve itself in these studies. There is a group of members of Parliament from B.C. who will be touring the Hanford facility, and hopefully we will be able to bring back more information that will convince this government of the need to determine whether or not there has been accidental exposure of Canadian residents to these radioactive wastes.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I just want to inform the member that in 1988 the Department of External Affairs raised concerns about the impact of historic releases of radioactive material from nuclear facilities at Hanford, Washington and Fernald, Ohio. The investigation was made by the AECB to provide a factual account and assessment of the issue and to avoid unwarranted alarming of the public by any undue expression of and concern about emissions from nuclear facilities.

At the time this was of importance because there were news media reports about leaks occurring at the Hanford facility and its possible effect on Canadians.

The AECB study included reconstructing the radiation doses possibly received by Canadians from atmospheric releases from these and other American facilities. Also calculated were the doses that Americans could have received from border area Canadian facilities such as the uranium refinery at Port Hope, Ontario.

• (1830)

I would like to state very clearly that in assessing the history of atmospheric releases from nuclear facilities in both countries, the AECB determined that the maximum dose to an individual at the border between the U.S.A. and Canada would not have been higher than one-fifth of one per cent—0.2 per cent of the AECB dose limit for members of the public.

In other words, as you have been assured previously, the atmospheric releases of radioactive contaminants from the Hanford and Fernald nuclear facilities pose no negative impact to Canada.

The AECB report issued in 1989 also concluded that the radiological effect of the then current radioactive releases from selected American and Canadian nuclear facilities close to the border was very small on individuals of the other country—a small effect in this instance being between 100,000 to 400ths of one per cent.

I am very pleased to have the opportunity just to have given a bit of credit to the Atomic Energy Control Board for acting in a very responsible and professional manner.

SPECIAL DEBATE

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to order made on Friday, February 14, 1992, the House will continue to debate on the adjournment motion for the sole purpose of allowing members to make presentations on the results of discussions they have had with their constituents on the constitutional issue.

When we left the debate, the hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte had five minutes remaining in his speech.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, thank you very much for the opportunity to finish my portion of this debate.

As I mentioned last Thursday evening, February 13, the process that we used in my riding of Carleton—Charlotte was, to say the least, a lengthy process. We had 20 individual meetings—I called them round table constitutional discussions—within my riding and from all parts of my riding we conducted these meetings. I think we had some common themes throughout the course of those 20 meetings. But I think far and above the most common of all of those themes would be the sense that the status quo is no longer tenable and that indeed we need some fundamental changes to Canada's Constitution. I think that would be the theme that ran throughout these 20 meetings.

It was also the theme I heard when I had the opportunity to speak before some of our service clubs, schools and other interested organizations, that they indeed want this country to work, but certain things have to change.

If we can go through some of the 28 proposals and some of what my constituents were telling me, to start with the Canada clause, which is the beginning of the 28 proposals, I think the feeling in my riding is that most Canadians like the idea of the inclusion of a Canada clause so that we, for the first time, really explain what we are as Canadians.

The other one that was mentioned very, very frequently was Senate reform. We did not get too much into a Triple-E Senate or what form the Senate would take, other than saying that we in Carleton—Charlotte felt that senators should be elected. I think that was the common thread in the Senate discussions.

On aboriginal rights, the figure was thrown out in just about all 20 meetings that as a federal government we allocate something in the order of $4.4 billion per year to the Indian community and it is not working. So aboriginal reform, aboriginal right to self-government is something that we support in Carleton—Charlotte, knowing that what we have done up to this point in the history of our country has not worked.

Taking a look at Parliament itself, I have no hesitation at all in telling you that my constituents, again probably reflecting just about every constituency across this nation, feel that we need some reform here in the House of Commons itself, that indeed we can make it better so that members of Parliament have a little more latitude in how they represent their constituents and possibly not be so confined or restrained by party lines.

We also talked about the notwithstanding clause. Many constituents are upset with the fact that while we have a charter of rights, at the same time the notwithstanding clause can take away the rights within that charter. The suggestion there should be some changes or the complete elimination of the notwithstanding clause seemed to be a common theme throughout these talks.

Because the province of New Brunswick is the only officially bilingual province in the country, we had usually a lengthy discussion every night on distinct society with the understanding that in fact it was nothing new, but was something we have recognized in this country for the last 200 or more years, but always differing views on it. However, at the end of the evening, most of us accepted the fact that it is a reality that has to be dealt with, that has to be stated and that we can accept as Canadians.

Finally, because my time is running by very quickly, I want to table a brief that was submitted by Heartland Branch No. 24, Royal Canadian Legion. It was sent to me by Fred Hatfield and Percy Toft, chairmen of the unity committee of Heartland Branch 24, Royal Canadian Legion. I want to conclude on this, if I may. One of the things they suggest which is very interesting, very new and I suppose innovative, is that we balance off the guarantees made to us as citizens or groups of citizens in the charter of rights with a charter of responsibilities.

They go on to tell us that these would not be legally enforceable but would express our recognition that democratic governments work by us and through us and not just for us and upon us. Such a charter might include a number of features and they go on to tell us what they are. I do want to table that brief.

I think the underlying concern in my constituency is that we do have a great Canada. We want to continue to have a great Canada, a unified Canada, and we want to do everything possible to make it even better as years go on.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to participate in the debate tonight on the Constitution on behalf of the people of Cardigan, Prince Edward Island. Last fall the government tabled its proposals on the Constitution and the special joint committee started its hearings in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island. This was only appropriate because most people are aware that Charlottetown is the cradle of Confederation.

Islanders from all walks of life have followed the constitutional debate closely. At the public meetings in the small towns across P.E.I., Islanders expressed their desire to keep this country together. When you look at the small population of Prince Edward Island, a great number of people came out to the meetings. I certainly wish to congratulate the constituents of Cardigan for showing their great concern for the Constitution and also for showing their great concern for the people of Canada.

In Prince Edward Island we have our own way of doing things. Being an Islander has always fostered a strong sense of community and sharing. When Islanders do something, they do it together. They believe in working as a team in a spirit of co-operation and trust. Islanders proved last fall they were willing to co-operate. Now it is the government's opportunity to show that it is going to co-operate too and listen to the people from my constituency of Cardigan.

These are some of the concerns that Islanders have been telling me about over the last few months. Islanders do not want property rights in the Constitution. Some people have said the measure is only intended to protect home owners from government expropriation of their homes. Property rights entail much more than real estate.

In P.E.I. we have special legislation regarding the ownership of land, restriction on the development of beach front property and other measures. Such measures might not be possible if property rights are entrenched in the Constitution.

• (1840)

The federal government has proposed to transfer a number of responsibilities to the provincial government. Some of the responsibilities include job training, drug prosecution, ferry services, small craft harbours and inspection services.

Some provinces want to take over full responsibility for job training and some other provinces do not want the burden. Many of my constituents feel that for those provinces which want control over job training, they should have that control.

However, my constituents in P.E.I. would like the federal government to keep a presence and to continue receiving help from the Department of Employment and Immigration. In eastern P.E.I., a partnership was worked out between the provincial department of social services, Justice, RCMP and others.

We set up the discovery program. This program was a tremendous success, and it is an example of what can happen when all people work co-operatively. The discovery program was designed to meet the needs of the people. Too often, we design a program and people must meet the criteria of the program. This discovery program, because of the way it was designed, has become a great success.

In other areas, my constituents would prefer to see the federal government keep the responsibility simply because they think Ottawa is best able to deal with the issue.

Drug prosecution should remain the responsibility of the federal government. If it were put in the hands of the provinces, we would end up with a patchwork approach to a serious criminal activity. Stopping the drug trade requires a national effort, not measures that are different in P.E.I., New Brunswick, Alberta or British Columbia.

Ferry services must remain the responsibility of the federal government. As it stands right now, the federal government has the constitutional duty to maintain a link between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. We are well aware of the possibility of the fixed link, but beyond the fixed link responsibility, my constituency is very concerned about the ferry service in eastern P.E.I., the Wood Islands-Caribou ferry service. This must be maintained also.

Ottawa states that it wants to give to the provinces authority over small craft harbours. This is simply not acceptable. Unfortunately the infrastructure of small craft harbours is in a deplorable state and it would cost millions of dollars to put it back in shape.

Islanders feel that it is the constitutional duty of the federal government to do this and at the moment, it would be fiscally impossible for the provincial government in Prince Edward Island to put the infrastructure back in place because of the poor situation it is in.

Inspection programs would be another example. It is important for inspection programs to ensure that the standards for agricultural products remain the same across the country.

Issues like distinct society, Senate reform and aboriginal self-government receive most of the media attention during these constitutional talks. Islanders recognize that these are probably the most important constitutional issues facing the country and they must be dealt with.

However, things like small craft harbours, food inspections and ferry services are jurisdictional issues in the proposals that affect the daily lives of my constituents. These are the nuts and bolts of the Constitution and the thoughts of my constituents should be considered, not as a bottom line but as a recognition that they affect the lives of people.

Cardigan constituents want the federal government to remain strong, a government that is capable of overseeing Canada's needs in the international field. It is important that we have a federal government that is able to set national standards across the country.

We also need to draw on representation from the provinces. It is important to have people from all regions involved in the process. As I said, the people of Prince Edward Island have a strong interest in the Constitution.

I am very pleased to speak as the member of Parliament for Cardigan, Prince Edward Island. I am also pleased that the members of the House saw fit to allow us the opportunity to put forward the views of the people we have the honour to represent. It is here in the House of Commons that we should make those views known to all Canadians. On behalf of those we represent, I urge all hon. members to listen to the views not only of their constituents but also for the views of my constituents as well.

The issues affecting the people of Cardigan might not be major, but they are certainly very major for the people in Cardigan. It is very important that small craft harbours, when they get in the deplorable state they are in now, remain under the authority of the federal government.

As I stated before, it is very important that ferry services remain under the authority of the federal government. Also we must have inspection services across Canada that are the same for agricultural products so we can put a quality product on the market. Of course the major issues are a very great concern too.

Before I end, I would like to read from the lyrics of a sang called Sea to Sea written by two Islanders, Steve Sharratt and Rolie MacKinnon. The chorus of the song makes a statement about how many Canadians feel about this great country of ours and I think it is a good way to end. The chorus goes like this:

> Am I standing alone for this land and its pride
> Are there none who will stand here with me?
> Will I not hear a voice call for hearts joined in trust,
> Can we not be as one, sea to sea?

I would like to table the full lyrics of this song.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present the submission prepared by Mr. Jean-Pierre Brunet on February 8 1992. Mr. Brunet is an engineer and he is president of the engineering and business consulting firm Bioptic Vision Inc. in Val d'Or.

It is my pleasure to inform you of Mr. Brunet's thoughts concerning the most recent constitutional proposals made by the federal government. I might also mention that Mr. Brunet is president of the Order of Engineers of Quebec, which has a membership of 35 000 engineers. However, it is not in that capacity that Mr. Brunet shares his ideas with us, but rather as a young head of a small business in a remote area. Mr. Brunet lives in my riding, which is the largest one in all 10 provinces.

The economic union in Canada is viable; it is doing well but it could do better if we got rid of the policies that stifle it. Here is, in my opinion, the best alternative, the one I propose, as well as the spirit with which I examined the constitutional proposals of the Canadian government.

The Constitutional Act of 1867 no longer meets the new needs generated by the social, economic and political evolution. The time has come to make important changes to our Constitution, in particular as regards the following topics, which are of special concern to me, since I live in what is called a remote area, the Abitibi region, which also has several aboriginal communities.

It seems to me there are very few proposals which can be accepted or rejected in full as presented originally. That is why I make some suggestions which I hope will improve the Canadian government's proposals.

Let us first talk about property rights. The first federal proposal to amend the Constitution Act of 1982 in the document entitled Shaping Canada's Future Together, proposes to amend the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms to guarantee property rights. I believe that this a fundamental natural right. Indeed it is from nature than men and women received property rights so that everyone could support themselves and their family, and so that the goods are indeed used for their intended purpose.

Property rights also entail duties. For instance, in the case of property rights as regards production goods such as machines and businesses, there are moral duties with regard to social purposes. That is why this right must be subordinated to the common good. Therefore, the public acquisition of goods intended for public works such as highways or a hydro electric project, could be done in the interest of the public good, while at the same time respecting the owner's right who, if need be, would be reasonably compensated. The same applies to the ability of governments to make decisions on, for instance, the economy, industrial strategy and regional development in the interest of all citizens.

However, this right is not merely a social function, even if it does imply certain social obligations. This right is part of our human dignity. In fact, it would be useless to demand the right to personal, independent initiative in economic matters, unless that initiative is based on free access to the resources needed for its expression. History and experience have shown that under a political system that does not recognize the right to private ownership of production goods, basic freedoms are restricted or practically non-existent. In my opinion the charter must identify the duties that accompany property rights.

However, it is not enough to stress the natural aspect of property rights. We must also emphasize that property rights should be granted to everyone, as much as possible. Property rights include the right to use the fruits of the earth to survive. These rights must be followed by a political, economic and social right that encourages and facilitates broader access to private ownership of durable goods: a house, a piece of land, a craftsman's tools, the equipment necessary on a family farm, shares in medium size or large companies, and this would apply to all Canadians including aboriginal people.

I think that enshrining the right to private property should be done in such a way as to allow for these considerations.

On the right to work and the right to knowledge, the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms provides for the right to take up residence and pursue the gaining of a livelihood anywhere in Canada. However, I feel that the right to work and the right to knowledge should be more specifically identified in the charter.

I have skipped here and there, because his brief is fairly long and we only have 10 minutes. For the first time in our history we will have an economy based not only on renewable resources but on resources that can generate themselves and which may overwhelm us by their variety. Information is everywhere but is not available to all on the same terms. It seems to me it is important to ensure that all Canadians have access to this information, which will be a source of power in the years to come. Access to information could also have a very positive impact on relations between the people of this country.

That is why I suggest that the right to work and to knowledge also be enshrined in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Turning to the status of native peoples, this was ignored in the Constitution Act of 1867 and only touched on in the Constitution Act of 1982. This question can no longer be postponed. Native peoples' awareness of it requires us today to deal frankly with the issue in the discussions that must be held on the country's constitutional future. Throughout the land, there seems to be a lack of understanding of this issue and also a broad consensus on the need to deal with the recognition of native peoples' inherent rights. It may be because people want to be done with this thorny question once and for all, but they also want to feel that all the inhabitants of this country are treated fairly.

I think that this matter should be the subject of a major concentrated effort so that it can be dealt with in at most five years instead of ten. Native people are ready to negotiate the terms of a renewed agreement. It is important that they stop being subject to the paternalistic Indian Act, which in many cases prevents them from looking after their own economic affairs. That is the case with the Algonquins, the Inuit and the Crees who live in Abitibi. The constitutional process on native issues must be speeded up and made a priority for all the governments concerned.

I also believe that the proposal to guarantee representation for natives in the Senate and in Parliament is a good thing and it should be implemented soon, even if Senate reform is delayed for any reason.

On equal opportunities and regional development; the objective of ensuring equal opportunities in economic and social matters must be the first of our constitutional objectives. However, this objective must be reflected in programs that should often be less ambitious but more in line with reality. It is also important that those programs be designed through a greater joint effort of the central government and the provinces.

To this end, we must stop giving Canadians the impression that the federal government's objective is to ensure that some day everybody will enjoy the same wealth. We must not aim for equality but rather for equal opportunities.

It is the non-tangible investments such as information, training and retraining that will dictate the survival of the best industries. Therefore, it is at that level efforts must be made to ensure equal opportunities for everyone.

The federal proposals do not deal with the issue of regional development. Yet this is a very important issue which, for a long time, served to justify the very existence of the federation.

In the past the government made commitments regarding numerous regional economic development projects. Most of these projects did not produce the positive results that were expected, given the amount of public moneys invested. However, this exercise was not as negative as claimed by some. For instance, in Abitibi the impression is that the federal presence in regional development has stimulated the provincial government's interest in our region's development. In fact, in recent years the federal has fulfilled its commitments whereas the provincial government has needed a lot of persuading and has not yet contributed its full share under the Canada-Quebec agreement.

It is now obvious that the authority for regional development must be in the regions and that the tools and the required flexibility must also be within the reach of regional developers. Several federal projects are good examples of concrete efforts made to give responsibilities to local communities as regards their development. The creation by Employment and Immigration Canada of Community Futures committees is a good example of federal intervention in the regions. This initiative ensured a joint effort and the setting up of 62 centres to help businesses in Quebec. Through these centres assets totalling $100 million are being managed. Those assets are used to finance business projects that generated investments of $356 million, created 4,000 jobs and preserved 5,800 other jobs in 5,000 businesses.

In spite of that success, I feel that responsibility for regional development should be given to levels of government as close to the regions as possible, to local levels of government and especially to the regional communities.

The distance separating them from the training centres represents, for people in the regions, an obstacle to learning which must be abolished. Statistics show that someone who is trained locally tends to stay there. If I may, and I know my time is running out, I would like to give a similar example by saying that we should draw government closer to the population and closer to the regions.

Finally, for the most demanding, for those Canadians who are never satisfied with mediocrity, for those who want full accomplishment and who are not satisfied with an average result, Canada's performance to date according to Volaskakis must be considered as unsatisfactory, if not right out altogether unacceptable for a country so richly endowed by nature.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member, but his time is up. I recognize the hon. member for Kamloops.

[English]

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a privilege and an honour to present, on behalf of literally many thousands of constituents from Kamloops, British Columbia, the following report based on a number of constituent assemblies held throughout the constituency as well as a number of formal and informal meetings and sessions with constituents.

I want to say simply that the following constituent assemblies were held in Blue River, Clearwater, Barriere, Logan Lake, Savona, Pritchard, Chase, WestSyde, South Kamloops as well as three continuous nights on Cable 10 television so people could participate from the comforts of their own homes. There were also meetings with the councils of Logan Lake, Chase, and Kamloops. There were visits to Caribou College, Clearwater Secondary School, Barriere Secondary School, Logan Lake Secondary School, Chase Secondary School, a number of junior secondary schools and some elementary schools. There were also presentations to service clubs, ethnic organizations and community groups.

Having received a large number of briefs and letters I am able today to attempt to synthesize at this stage what the people of Kamloops are saying about the 28 proposals presently being studied by the parliamentary joint committee and will soon be making recommendations for the provincial governments and Canadians in general to see and respond to.

It became very clear that almost all of the constituents wanted more free votes in the House of Commons and a significant reduction in party discipline. When it comes to voting, not only do all the constituents feel strongly about it, but members of the House of Commons also feel strongly in terms of seeing an early introduction to this change.

There is certainly an interest in an elected Senate. A number of people indicated that perhaps we should just abolish the Senate, but recognizing that we are the largest federal country in the world, the second largest geographically, the feeling that there was a role for the regions of Canada in national decision making prompted most people to actually support a Triple-E Senate and, if that is not possible, certainly an elected Senate with significant powers.

The matter of property rights was supported by almost everyone, assuming that property rights meant the right to own your own home, farm or small business.

• (1900)

If it meant giving exclusive or longer term exclusive rights to multinational drug companies, if it meant disrupting the dispersal of assets in a marriage break-up and so on, this is not something that people want to see entrenched in the Constitution.

There was general agreement on a reduction of provincial trade barriers, but not an exclusive rejection of some barriers, particularly if it meant that we could implement the buying of British Columbia products or the use of British Columbia services, if it meant the utilization of pension funds to provide funding for economic development, or if it meant the use of government programs like auto insurance.

This is something that people did not want to see necessarily changed but they certainly wanted an opening up in a liberalization of provincial trade barriers as they presently stand.

There was major concern with the notwithstanding clause as it refers to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I would say that we were equally balanced. Half the constituents held that the notwithstanding clause should be dropped so that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms remains as is presented.

If we are going to have a notwithstanding clause, and many people saw the wisdom of that, people suggested that it should be increased to a 66 and two-thirds vote to enable the provincial legislatures to override the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The inherent right to aboriginal self-government was endorsed by all, with some trepidation reflected by those people asking what self-government actually meant. It is fair to say that there was a lot of doubt as to what the implications might mean, particularly when we recognize that the settlement of land claims had to go with aboriginal self-government. There was some uncertainty and some concern.

The recognition of Quebec as a distinct society was accepted by most people once the definition proposed was understood, and that definition is that a distinct society in relation to Quebec would include a French-speaking majority, a unique culture and a civil law tradition as we have known for many years.

If that is what it meant, there was general agreement that it could be supported. If it means a significant increase in powers and privileges, this is something that most people felt very uncomfortable with and would not be prepared to support.

The constituents wanted to retain strong but not exclusive federal jurisdiction over training, immigration, culture and broadcasting. They felt that some provincial involvement would be appropriate but by and large wanted to see a significant federal involvement.

They say that the federal government should be concerned with drug prosecution, wildlife conservation and protection, the transportation of dangerous goods, aspects of federal financial regulations and various inspection programs. These areas should remain under federal jurisdiction. Others should be considered for provincial jurisdiction, such as tourism, forestry, mining, recreation, soil and water conservation, dairy services, small craft harbour programs, and some aspects of unfair trade practice law. Those could be provincial jurisdiction almost exclusively.

When it came to programs like health care and post-secondary education, there was a feeling by almost all of the constituents participating that the federal government ought to continue to play a significant role in those two areas to ensure that all Canadians have access to proper health care and proper post-secondary education.

The inclusion of a social charter was supported by most, but not all. The guarantees of health care, education, a clean environment, jobs and housing are things that people would like to see in the Constitution as a general guideline and goal to which the country and citizens would aspire.

The matter of a council of federation was almost exclusively rejected. People thought that another layer of government was completely unnecessary and that any residual power in the future ought to reside under federal jurisdiction as it presently exists. People felt quite comfortable with that, and they liked the idea of more democratization when it came to Supreme Court appointments.

There were many other concerns raised, but these were of primary concern. When it came to encouraging the settlement of aboriginal self-government, there was almost exclusive support that this should be done as quickly as possible, and also to get on with the settlement of land claims to bring more stability to the country.

I want to emphasize the matter of the Senate. Most people felt very strongly that if we were going to have an elected Senate, it ought to have some significant powers. As I said earlier, the feeling was that it should be a Triple-E Senate with equal representation from the provinces.

They recognized however that if there is a hesitation on behalf of Ontario and Quebec to follow through, then certainly we should do our best to make it as equitable as possible so that the regions of Canada, and in our case particularly western Canada, would have significant and useful roles in national decision making in the future.

I want to say that all of the participants, and there were literally thousands of participants when you add up all of the different gatherings, assemblies and meetings, wanted the country to stay unified. They wanted Canada to be maintained as the dynamic country that it is.

There was some concern over the role of multiculturalism in the country until it was recognized that one of the things that distinguishes Canada from most countries is the multicultural nature of our country and the fact that some of our population is made up of folks who come from other areas of the world, with the exception of the First Nations. Even then, I suppose a case could be made that they too, thousands of years ago, came from another part of the world.

In closing, the gatherings were excellent. People were very positive and upbeat and very hopeful that once this matter was turned over to the politicians of the country we would find ways and means through hard work to ensure that Canada stays a unified nation.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, the time allocated for debate of constitutional issues does not permit a review of all the elements involved in the process of constitutional change or the consideration of all the proposals for reform and amendment discussed by constituents in Halifax West and others in Nova Scotia.

For this reason, I will confine my presentation to an overview of the need for constitutional revision. Then I intend to review some of the proposals for constitutional change that have particular interest and relevance to my constituents and to other Nova Scotians whose concerns I respect.

First, let me consider the recent history of constitutional evolution in Canada. In doing so, I am reminded of a wise sage of the past who said that those who do not examine the events of the past endanger the future because they are likely to repeat the errors and mistakes that have been made in the past.

We should ask ourselves why we have this current initiative for constitutional change. In reviewing that question I want to make a special reference to an article that appeared in The Toronto Globe and Mail on January 17, 1992 by Michael Bliss. That article is so bereft of intelligence and understanding of the situation that it almost borders on sedition. This man heads his article: "Let's shut up and keep the status quo".

He goes on to construct a situation where we had constitutional changes in 1982, promoted by the then Prime Minister of Canada, Mr. Pierre Trudeau, with the consent and concurrence of the Parliament of Canada and many of the premiers. That was only after a very difficult process in which the Prime Minister attempted to unilaterally change the Constitution.

The matter was reviewed by the Supreme Court, the process of change was objected to by many of the premiers, particularly the premier of Quebec. It was only after a great deal of difficulty that constitutional changes were made.

Mr. Bliss writes that there was a referendum in Quebec, that the people of Quebec were represented by members of Parliament, the Liberal Party held 74 of 75 seats at the time and it was speaking for the people of Quebec.

But what Mr. Bliss does not recognize is that in 1984 the same Liberal Party suffered the worst political defeat in the history of Canada. Most of those members who sat in this Chamber and refused to acknowledge the interests of the Government of Quebec, represented by the premier of Quebec, were defeated.

It was essential that the new government review the whole situation and take up the challenge of constitutional change and attempt to obtain the concurrence of all the provinces including the province of Quebec.

• (1910)

I would not have minded his article so much had it not been repeated almost verbatim in the Halifax Daily News on January 27, 1992. Are these people not expected to know history? Are these people not expected to examine events of the past so that they will not make the same mistakes in the future?

They have shown an irresponsibility in their editorials that goes beyond any understanding that I could give to the writers of those editorials. They echoed the view that there was no need for constitutional change.

Imagine a responsible editorial writer in 1992, in Canada, saying and writing and committing to the historic record that there is no need to pursue constitutional change in Canada, that we should "keep the status quo", as Mr. Bliss says and as the Halifax Daily News says.

I want to disagree with that because if we do not move to make constitutional changes we will indeed repeat the mistakes of the past and it will have disastrous effects on Canada and Canadians.

Let me deal with some of the specific matters involved in the proposals for constitutional change. First, I should remind everyone that the Government of Canada has documented 28 propositions and proposals for reforming and amending the Constitution in the document Shaping Canada's Future Together.

It is also worth noting that the government had many of those proposals vetted before a series of conferences which were completed in Vancouver this past weekend. I do not have an opportunity nor time to review all of those proposals but I will, as I said, review some that have particular relevance and concern in Nova Scotia.

I should mention a second procedural point, that is in the province of Nova Scotia the proposals for constitutional change were reviewed by the Nova Scotia Working Committee on the Constitution. That was a body which was established with the consent and concurrence of the leaders of the political parties in Nova Scotia and the members of the Legislative Assembly of Nova Scotia. It was chaired by Eric Kierans.

This working committee claimed to have travelled Nova Scotia. It sought the opinions of a wide segment of the Nova Scotia community and formed a consensus around a number of the propositions and recommendations they made to the government.

What is more important is that the premier of Nova Scotia along with the opposition leaders appeared before the special joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons on a renewed Canada and made presentations that were based on the findings of the working committee. I will talk about some of the findings at the review of the specific items I want to deal with in this short presentation.

First, let me deal with the matter of the distinct society. Fortunately for elected representatives from Nova Scotia the working committee found that there was support from the people of Nova Scotia for a distinct society in relation to the province of Quebec.

I was gratified to have that finding because I must say in all honesty it was not my impression that there was wide support for the concept of distinct society. The recommendation for such a change was endorsed by the working committee and by the political leaders in Nova Scotia.

The area of difficulty, because there was not wide support for this proposition at the time of the Meech Lake Accord, is that it was not limited to language, culture and the civil code. Suffice to say there are some words of limitation in the current proposals.

Personally I stand in support of the concept of the distinct society. I regard the province and people of Quebec as distinct and I do not want to confuse that with anybody else's distinctiveness. I think we all know what the province of Quebec and the leaders of the community desire in the constitutional framework.

I am pleased that Nova Scotians through the government and through the working committee have endorsed that concept.

There are those who would object. To them I simply say that it is in the interest of all Canada that we recognize the legitimate concerns and desires of the people of Quebec.

Second, I would like to talk about the division of power. I attended the constitutional conference that was held in Halifax. While there was strong support, particularly in Nova Scotia and throughout the maritimes, for a central government that has the full power and authority to govern in Canada and create a strong economy for the benefit of all Canadians, there is a recognition that you can have what has come to be called asymmetrical federalism; that is to say, it is not essential to a strong central government that each and every province has exactly the same power. So there is some possibility of concurrence.

I was going to speak on the matter of aboriginal rights. I hope that subject will not be used to delay, diminish or even demolish constitutional change. I can say the same about Senate reform. I had the opportunity to be on a committee that considered Senate reform, and in some sense it is really a constitutional impossibility. It goes to the root of our system. Again, I hope that failure to reach agreement on Senate reform will not wreck the constitutional initiative.

As I understand it, I have only a short time remaining. Let me say to all who might hear that I think history will show that the Prime Minister of Canada accomplished a great deal when he got all the provinces to agree on the propositions contained in the Meech Lake Accord. I trust all members join me in the expression of the hope that we can reach the same kind of accord, because what is essential in the process is not the specifics of constitutional change so much as the accomplishment of agreement and accord among all the constituent elements of Canada and with the support of all Canadians.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to participate in this discussion this evening. I do so not because I have had a particular meeting in my constituency to deal with the Constitution in recent past, but I did have one on February 12, 1991 at the City Hall in Kingston, Ontario.

A considerable number of interested citizens, several hundred in fact, showed up at City Hall to discuss the Constitution at that time, but that was prior to the government's tabling of its 28 proposals, which it has made public and which have received a great deal of attention across Canada in recent months.

The meeting was an interesting one. I had many what I could call ordinary interested citizens there. I had various constitutional experts who have since participated extensively in the public discussions on the Constitution, and I had representatives of various groups who appeared and expressed interest and concern.

Subsequent to those meetings, some of the groups contacted me and asked me to listen to the views they had to express. I met with various smaller groups and discussed ways they might approach the government to make known their views and feelings on the subject of the Constitution.

I decided that in presenting views tonight I would quote from a few of the briefs and documents that some of these groups have submitted and see if they do not give some indication of the views that are held in my constituency on this subject.

I must say that the constituents who have expressed opinions have done so forcefully, vigorously and well. I know that their remarks, comments and briefs have been directed to the government primarily, and, where appropriate, I have forwarded those to the government, but in most cases I have received copies.

I also canvassed the views of my constituents in a questionnaire in one of my recent householders, a householder of last autumn. Unfortunately the results have just become available because of the lengthy period required to compile the results; 738 questionnaires were returned. While I do not want to cite these figures as authoritative because I think there is a serious imbalance in them, and I will explain that in a moment, they nevertheless indicate the views of some of the people in Kingston and the Islands.

Of the 738 questionnaires that were returned, 64 per cent of the responses were identified as males, 26 per cent females, and 10 per cent gave no answer to the question on gender. Forty-four per cent of those returned were returned by persons aged 60 and over.

So again there is a significant imbalance because, of course, 44 per cent of the riding is not 60 years of age or over.

Nevertheless, in answers to a few of the questions, a constitutional statement on the nature of Canada should include four items. The four items that were listed were: our attachment to two official languages, 51 per cent said yes; the diversity of the cultural heritage, 64 per cent said yes; the distinct character of Quebec society, 31 per cent said yes; and the recognition of the role of the aboriginal people, 78 per cent said yes. The figures do not include the persons who did not answer each of those questions. They are taken out so that in calculating the noes, you have to take those into account. In other words, the no is not the exact inverse of the other figure. However, those are the kinds of questions that were put in this questionnaire and those are the answers I received.

Do you favour a reformed Senate in which senators would be elected? Eighty-one per cent said yes.

Do you favour the free circulation of people, goods and capital within Canada? Ninety-four per cent said yes.

On the elimination of interprovincial restrictions on trade, 86 per cent said yes.

When legislation is passed in the House of Commons, do you believe the Senate should have the right to amend legislation? Forty-five per cent said yes. The right to reject it? Twenty-nine per cent apparently said no to that.

Do you believe in the creation of new provinces? The answer there was mostly unsure.

Those were the kinds of questions that were asked and those were the kinds of answers I received.

However, there was another group called the Committee for a Rational Canada, which was formed in my riding. It was a group of concerned citizens, most of whom had lived and worked in the province of Quebec. They submitted an extensive brief to the special joint committee outlining their views on the government's proposal. I wanted to quote from the conclusions of the brief they submitted: "The Committee for a Rational Canada was agreeably surprised with the government's proposals for shaping Canada's future together. We recognize it is extremely difficult to produce a document which will please a majority of the governments and others with vested interests.

"We undertook this review of the current constitutional crisis before the government's document was produced because we believe strongly in Canada and believe it is individuals like us who must get involved. There are too many hidden agendas among those who make the most noise in the media, and unfortunately the average is not heard. No wonder the electorate are turned off by this process.

"The over-all feeling of the members of this committee is that we must try to keep Canada together, but not at any cost. A separated Canada will result in two parts which are each poorer than if together. However, the continual bickering and perceived blackmail by both sides we have endured over the past 20 years cannot continue.

The rest of Canada must be prepared to accept Quebec as it is, different. Quebec must be prepared to accept that the rest of Canada wants a strong, unifying government. We hope most sincerely that good sense will prevail".

I think it is an excellent indication of the support that exists and the goodwill that exists throughout the community in an effort to resolve this difficulty we are facing at the present time.

The other quotation I thought might be of interest to hon. members is one from The Whig Standard, the local newspaper, for those who are unfamiliar with it, on Tuesday, February 11 of this year. The article is written by John Whyte, Dean of the Faculty of Law at Queen's University and a recognized constitutional expert. He suggests that the government's proposals are simply more than we can manage and that they go beyond what are necessary to resolve the current constitutional crisis in that they propose too much and they put too much on the table.

He gives three reasons for this, and I would like to quote from the article. He says:

"First, the federal government's reform agenda is far too extensive. Some might believe that it is essential to focus on reform of the Senate, for instance, because the west must be satisfied about its needs before it will even think about Quebec. Still it is not necessary to deal with both the Senate and a host of other issues—economic integration, reform of Parliament, constitutional standards for social welfare, aboriginal self-government and so on, in an effort to resolve the current crisis".

He says: "Second, the proposals relating to economic integration are not only not responsive to Quebec's primary interests but are also hostile to them and hence counterproductive to the current objective of national accommodation".

Also he says: "Third, the present process is obscure. The federal proposals disguise the very significant concessions made to Quebec autonomy in two proposals. The distinct society portion of the Canada clause could well lead to judicial recognition of special legislative powers for Quebec. The federal government has chosen not to disclose the precise language of the Canada clause, although that would help us understand the clause's significance. Furthermore, it has downplayed any real impact of the clause. Although I do not think it is unacceptable to include a distinct society clause that will impact on legislative powers, it is foolhardy to cover up this possibility and thereby postpone a controversy that must be faced and debated. Likewise the federal proposal with respect to legislative interdelegation represents a singularly unfortunate form for creating special status for Quebec. The centrality of this proposal is not being disclosed and consequently the inevitable debate over its acceptability is not being held in a timely way".

Those views by Professor White are ones that I think the government might well consider. I think that in presenting its proposals it has tried to be all things to all people. It has tried to throw something to everybody to try to make Canadians feel that the debate is either more important for everybody or that everybody is going to get something out of it.

The federal government does not have something that it can give away to everybody. As we near the closing time on this debate, when the committee will be reporting and will be considering what recommendations to make to the government, it must bear in mind comments like these where 28 proposals must be whittled down to something that is manageable, something that will prove acceptable to the vast majority of the people of this country, and not try to provide something for everyone where there are other proposals that will be unacceptable to a large number.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Ricard (Laval–Ouest): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful for the opportunity given me to participate in this crucial debate in the House today.

Up to now we have heard all sorts of comments during this debate. For example, we heard "too much power to provinces" and "not enough power to provinces". I also had an opportunity to talk with the people, with persons involved in each of the ridings and, at least in my riding it is the case, what we hear generally is: "We do not want to hear about this any more; we have had enough."

Mr. Speaker, I think these people are right. You will recall that we were first elected in 1984 under the banner of national unity and that from 1984 to 1987 we tried to realize national unity. It is certainly not the Prime Minister who is at fault; you know all that he did to bring Quebec back into the Canadian fold. Neither is it the fault of ministers of this government. But, some people, in order maybe to get more votes, decided to change the fundamentals of the discussion and to kill the Meech Lake Accord.

If we really go to the people and ask them the following question: "Do you wish, yes or no, to belong to a country", the answer will be clear. It will be yes. Then you can ask: "To which country do you want to belong?" People will answer: "I want to belong to a rich country, where life is easy and where there is peace and harmony". How can we get such a country? By using one word only: tolerance. I believe Canadians would be unanimous on the matter. If everybody from Halifax to Vancouver uses that word and lives through its meaning, we will get somewhere. In spite of all the possible and imaginable studies, reports, committees, discussions and consultations, if we refuse to show tolerance in our requests and in our offers, we will never attain unity in this beautiful country of ours.

We now live in Canada as we would in a large family, where tensions emerge. You know as well as I do, Mr. Speaker, that one can hardly raise a family of four or five children and give them a decent standard of living, without having to make decisions. Sometimes one child might disagree with his father's or his mother's decision, but as hard as it is we must make decisions.

One must also recall that time is against us. We talk about economy, and I personally think that we cannot give a boosting to the economy until we settle our family dispute. Right now we are like a dog chasing its tail. On the one hand, we say we need investments but investors do not come here because they are scared to invest in Canada. The country is not stable enough. On the other hand, we say if we had a stable country people could make investments here. It is a vicious circle. Why do we not try to do both at the same time?

It is easy to discuss while on a full stomach. But it is a lot more difficult while hungry. And now, with unemployment, with an economic turnaround that is late, I think that everyone must do his share; everyone must take into account the fact that we must all work to boost the economy. I would really like that if the Europeans, the Japanese or the Americans invested billions of dollars in Canada. You will tell me: "Yes, but they are caught in the same problem as we are: they are in a recession". Yes, but is the recession not artificially created, using pure demagogy to make us believe that in this country like others all is not well. Have the media not a positive role to play in the economic renewal? We will be told that the media report the facts, but I think they have a tendency to dwell more on negative facts than on positive ones. If you read the morning papers, you do not find many of the good things our government did. However, you will find the scandal on the next street corner.

Are politicians doing their jobs when they try to make the best decisions for the country? Or, are they trying to play politics? I met people from the Bloc Quebecois in my riding. It is impossible to talk with those people. It is absolutely impossible. Nobody else but them is right. We have to erase everything and start again from scratch. But we already have a country. We have a foundation. We have all that. Why not sit down together and try to talk? Why all that demagogy? Even here, in the House, I heard some pretty spicy things. I even received phone calls in my office from people asking me: "Why don't you stand up and give so-and-so what he deserves?" But that is not the way to have a discussion. I mentioned the word "tolerance" earlier. We have to listen to what the others want. We have to negotiate with them. We have to be sensitive to their needs. That way we will all be in the same boat and work toward the same cause.

I know my time is running out. To conclude, I hope that in the next few days and weeks the final proposals Canada and this government will make to the provinces will be well received, with no show of intolerance and bad taste, and that everyone will take into account what has been said since 1984. I hope we will be able to weigh the pros and cons and reach a consensus for our children's and our grandchildren's sake. Time is running short for both of us, but our children and grandchildren are the future of this country and by working together we can give them a bright future.

[English]

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the leadership in the House and all parties for providing members with the opportunity to participate in this debate. It is a very important time in the country. It has to be reiterated that all members of Parliament are committed to seeing that the constitutional process is not hindered by past positions and prejudices but in fact takes a giant step forward in the coming weeks.

It is not generally known, but before I began this life as a member of Parliament I was a university professor and I taught political science. Many people ask why I left the pleasant sanctity of the university ivory tower to take on a job as a politician. I say somewhat drily: "Because I was tired of talking about the Constitution all the time". I became a member of Parliament, and what are we doing in the House and across the country day in and day out? We are talking about the Constitution. I think it has caught Canadians somewhat by surprise, certainly people in my own constituency, just how dramatically the crisis in the Constitution has sneaked up on us.

Perhaps we had all been lulled to sleep by the fact that for years—and I think it is not unfair to say generations—we have heard of the threat on the Constitution. We have seen first ministers meet. We have seen private meetings over the years. We have seen public meetings. We have had royal commissions. All of them have talked about the crisis in Confederation. The fact is that there is a well-known book in the political science field by that name. At the same time everything seemed to settle down.

At this time we are facing the wall. We realize that if we do not make some breakthrough, if we do not change some things in this country, the crisis will become a reality. I say that not to add any hyperbole to the already highly fractious environment but to state with some sadness that in fact we have to make some adjustments and we have to make some changes.

This does not come easy for us. There are those of us, for example, who grew up in relatively easy times, being able to get a university degree, to enjoy Canada, to travel throughout the country and throughout the world and to hear about Canada. We are just a little shell-shocked to think that this in fact is a crisis and there may be in fact a real difficulty in our land.

It is time for us who have lived so well in this country to put in the hours to see that in fact it remains and can be passed on to future generations.

Because of poverty and because of the way people have to work very hard every day to make ends meet, my constituents are not ones who articulate in long speeches or letters to their member of Parliament how they feel. I would be exaggerating to the House to say that I have had many representations on the Constitution. Particularly among new Canadians I think the House should be aware of the mood of people who come to this country knowing what it means to be in a real civil battle, knowing what it means to have things fall apart. They have a sense of total disbelief that this country with so many resources and so much space has come to this.

I congratulate those on the national scene who have tried to design new ways for us to tackle the Constitution, whether it be in the five constitutional meetings that we have just seen from coast to coast or whether it be in the plans for a national referendum. There are several ways that we have all tried to be innovative and tried to attract the interest of Canadians who do not normally have access to the constitutional process.

People who spend eight, ten or twelve hours a day at $5 to $7 an hour do not have the luxury of participating in this debate. They turn to members of Parliament, not for any final solutions that are going to last forever and ever but for some semblance of order in the discussion and some semblance of goodwill toward the creation of solutions.

Some of the areas on which the people of Winnipeg North Centre have reached a consensus and would like to see people move forward are the following areas. This is the framework for reform that I personally work within in talking about the Constitution. First, an inspiring declaration on the nature of Canada. I think we need a Canada clause. I think we need to state explicitly what we believe in and what we would like to see in this country. Several people have come forward. Professor Earl Mendes has produced a very inspiring document on what a Canada clause would look like. I would encourage all members of Parliament to take a minute out and see the ideas that he presented to the constitutional committee for some insight into a Canada clause.

I think a Canada clause could also be part of a statement dealing with our social obligations as a nation. There are two engines that drive and keep us together. One engine drives us economically and the other one drives us socially. We need both of them, going at full tilt. We need the full commitment of people to make sure that we have an economic agenda. We need to create wealth. We need to put aside some barriers, but we also need to have a social purpose to look after each other, to care for each other. That has to be part of our package. It can be stated in part in the Canada clause.

• (1940)

We need to renew our commitment to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. No matter what rights are obtained by one province or by all the provinces, the heart of the country rests on the protection of the individual. We have developed a number of democratic institutions to protect the individual.

Canadians and people in my constituency do not want to see that charter in any way, shape or form, weakened by a set of negotiations taking place in 1992.

Third, as I said, we have to strengthen our capacity on the economic side and whether the present proposals have to be put aside for more realistic ones, those who have specific interests have to put their interests aside and acknowledge the fact that we need a more effective economy. Although that language is seen by many to be code words for a different agenda, let us also put on the table that we have been very unsuccessful in the last 20 years in producing the sort of wealth traditionally associated with Canada.

All three parties have tried their hands at governing the country in their own way, or a province in their own way, and I say to each and every one of us that it has not been that successful. Perhaps the rules of the game have to be changed.

We have to deal with institutional reform. I have spoken in the House before about the need for all of us to try to reform Parliament. There is now a royal commission on the electoral process and that has to be reformed. On a number of fronts there is every reason to expect constitutionally and by legislation that we can clean up the way politics is organized in this country and attract new people into the political process.

The division of powers has to be re-established and a number of provinces have different ideas and we heard ideas at the constitutional conference. I think the division of powers has to be settled.

There are issues dealing with the spending power on immigration, on the Supreme Court and on the amending formula. We are heading toward a consensus in these areas.

Let me spend a minute talking about some of the areas which my constituents find difficult and would need to be put forward to the Parliament of Canada so they understand that their words have been listened to and have been presented fairly. There is still a great deal of reservation in western Canada in dealing with a distinct society. There has been an enormous shift in support toward a distinct society for Quebec, but people have reservations because they do not want, by inference, their lives to be considered the opposite of distinct, i.e. ordinary.

We as parliamentarians have an obligation to tell people what is distinct about their lives and what is distinct about Quebec life and why there needs to be a constitutional arrangement to protect those features of Quebec. It is quite possible to do this and I look forward to the resolution of this.

Finally, particularly in Winnipeg North Centre, there is a tremendous concern with the role of aboriginal peoples in the future of this country. The time has come to recognize and support the inherent right to self-government. This is not only dealing with those who have signed treaties with Canada, that is relatively straightforward, but also the more perplexing and difficult questions of how to reorganize urban governments to accommodate aboriginal groups from all backgrounds and from all status which need the support of Canadians elsewhere to develop the institutional support system in order to enhance their lives and to make sure their children have a better life than they had.

The constitutional issue is linked to economic success and economic success is related to social justice. We will bring a better life for all Canadians when we manage to settle the constitutional problems and begin to work on the economic and social agendas which are so dear in the hearts of all parliamentarians.

The Constitution

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in this special debate because I believe we are addressing the fundamental reason why most of us are here as members of Parliament.

The stated topics for this debate are the constitutional issues and the views of our respective constituents on how they should be resolved. However, it goes much deeper than that. Unless the constitutional questions are settled in a way that is acceptable to most Canadians, there will be some very real doubt about the continuing future of Canada as we know it.

While it may sound unduly sentimental or even mawkish to some, I am not ashamed to state that I wanted to be a member of this Parliament because I love this country, every part of it. I believe in its future and in its enormous potential. In saying that, I believe I am expressing the basic feelings of the great majority of my constituents in Durham and of most Canadians.

Over the past several weeks I have been holding a number of informal discussions with groups of constituents. The Constitution certainly was a topic they raised with me, but by no means the only one. The main concern in Durham is the economy, most particularly jobs. People are worried about employment generally, and about their own job security in particular.

That is not to say that people are not concerned about the Constitution. They are, but they want those who are more knowledgeable about these matters to get the job done so that we can concentrate on bread and butter issues such as the economy, jobs and working toward a society in which we all can enjoy fruitful and prosperous lives.

Like other concerned Canadians, I was encouraged by the Angus-Reid Southam News poll just last weekend. It showed Canadians are moderating their positions on constitutional issues so that national compromise or even a consensus may well be within reach. That poll indicates that die-hard opposition to Quebec's being a distinct society has dwindled to 17 per cent.

That is substantially in line with what I have heard in my own area. Most people accept that Quebec is and always has been different because of the province's language and culture. However, there are some who, while recognizing and wanting to accommodate the difference, are strongly opposed to the phrase distinct society and wish it could be expressed in some other way or in different words.

To constitutional authorities that may seem like a minor difference. However, I must stress that it is an important concern of these people and something I trust the authorities will try to address. The great majority of my constituents in Durham are proud to be Canadians.

It is a constituency with a multi-racial mix, not unlike many other parts of Canada. Some of us have family roots going back prior to Confederation, while others have just become citizens. All generally work together in harmony. I have been greatly impressed by several of the letters sent to me which reflect the considerable thought that these average Canadians have devoted to the Constitution.

I would like to quote a few, not because I necessarily agree with the comments, but because we as parliamentarians should be prepared to convey the wide range of views existing on some issues within our constituencies.

One letter stated: "We must abolish the entire political machinery which at present is destroying the structure of our society". On this same theme, another correspondent argued: "The time of one party winning the election and another party being the opposition belongs in the past".

In his view, we could have six or seven national parties working together for the common good. More than one writer questioned the need for a Senate and asked why it could not be abolished.

On the topic of special status for Quebec, I received this refreshing comment: "What is the big deal? For that matter, give other provinces a wish list too. The most important thing is to stay united as a Canada with 10 provinces and two territories".

It should not surprise you that I also got more than one critical comment about the way that this House conducts its business. One writer put it quite bluntly: "I also believe that the majority of MPs should grow up and behave like adults. If parents were interpreted at home by their children in the same manner as some MPs act in Ottawa, they would be stomped on".

• (1950)

To that quotation I can only add "Amen".

Speaking personally, one aspect of the constitutional discussions I find especially distressing is the me, me, me attitude of many of the groups and organizations that are demanding special deals to serve their own particular interests. While these interests may be legitimate and stem from long-standing grievances, Canadians would be more impressed if their spokespersons displayed a greater desire to serve the common good in preserving our country as a national entity.

On the other hand, it is encouraging that the number appears to be dwindling of those who would welcome Quebec's departure from Confederation, despite the open and covert encouragement this idea receives from certain political groups. Some of these groups are active in my own part of Ontario. These elements suddenly imply that without Quebec the rest of Canada would be one big happy family.

This ignores the fact of Canadian history. Western political protest movements usually stem from a resentment of central domination, and central in such cases translates into Ontario, not Quebec. Without Quebec as part of Canada that resentment would only worsen. We would then have a country in which one province, Ontario, possessed half the population and a major share of the economic power and political clout. How long do you suppose other provinces would tolerate a situation like that?

The people who espouse these arguments offer a dangerously, if not sinisterly, simplistic view of Canada; one that could only lead to further fragmentation and the eventual total elimination of this country that we love.

The people I represent in Durham constituency are proud Canadians. Quebec has always been a part of their country and they want it to remain so. They want the issues before us to be resolved in a way that will make the continuing presence of Quebec possible for now and for all time.

We need a firmly united Canada with a strong central government capable of maintaining the national standards and programs that we cherish, a government which speaks with one voice internationally for the people from all regions and vast territories of this country, and one which will do so for at least another 125 years.

The Constitution

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, over the past couple of weeks I have had the opportunity to attend a number of community meetings which I held in my riding of Okanagan—Shuswap on the issue of the constitutional debate and the future of Canada.

I found these meetings to be particularly inspiring. It was really encouraging to see the turn out, even on a meeting held in Sicamous on a Friday night. Many people came to listen to the issues, debate the various aspects of the proposals and to lend their opinions to the discussions.

I held four meetings over the past little while: one in Falkland, one in Celista, one in Blind Bay and, as I said, one in the town of Sicamous. I am hoping to follow these up with meetings in other communities throughout the riding, as time permits, in Enderby, Armstrong and Cherryville, and hopefully two summary meetings later on in March in Vernon and Salmon Arm.

I want to say that the feeling I have from the meetings and from the discussions that took place was certainly a feeling that seems to have demonstrated or manifested itself in the national polls. There is no question that people throughout the Okanagan—Shuswap, as have all Canadians, have shown an increasing restlessness about the constitutional debate. They have grown weary with what they perceive as being Ottawa's constitutional obsession. They want to move on with their lives, they want to get on with the job at hand, and they want this dilemma, this crisis that we seem to be forever facing, to be resolved one way or the other.

They also want the government to turn its attention to what they see as the most pressing issue nationally, and that is the worsening economy. They want the government to involve ordinary people in the process of governing. In essence, people are seeking a process of empowerment, of change, in this parliamentary and democratic process. There has been a call—certainly it was registered in the meetings I was at—for a more effective Parliament, a more responsible and effective Senate, a more direct voice in the affairs of this nation.

I guess, in short, you could summarize it by saying that people in the Okanagan—Shuswap, and I would suggest most Canadians, have lost faith in the status quo, have lost faith not only in this government but perhaps even in the process of government itself.

I want to add that the problem, as I perceive it, has not been so much the failure of Parliament—Parliament trundles along doing its best in the democratic framework that it has been built from—but rather it has been the failure of this very government to rebuild the trust of the Canadian people. I see time and time again evidence that trust was shattered in the midst of the Meech Lake fiasco. The Prime Minister's admission that he had chosen to roll the dice with the future of this nation was in fact for many Canadians, and I would suggest many people in my riding, the last straw. It caused a real shattering in their belief not only in this Prime Minister and this government but in the system itself.

Meech Lake failed not because of any dislike for Quebec whatsoever—I would suggest that would be the last of any reasons—but rather it failed because of a repudiation of a process that excluded the fundamental involvement of the Canadian people. People rejected this kind of executive federalism. They wanted to become involved in a very fundamental way in the process of resolving the issues that the Meech Lake Accord was attempting to address.

Largely as a result of the Prime Minister's handling of Meech Lake, there has been a loss of faith in this government and there has been a loss of faith in the very political foundations of Canada.

I think there is a widespread opinion that the Prime Minister opened a constitutional can of worms with his belief, his dream if you like, that he could finish the work that former Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau could not accomplish, and that was to get Quebec's signature as a full partner of our Canadian family. The current Prime Minister's failure at achieving that process has in essence left this nation paralysed while he attempts to undo the very damage that he has done. Through this endless flurry of commissions, of studies, of parliamentary committees, of more debate, he attempts to correct that damage.

Some of these, like the Spicer commission, I think people have recognized have done some very good work. The recent national forums have also proven to be successful. But the result has been that this concentration, this focusing on the singular issue facing Canadians has essentially paralysed the parliamentary process and has left an utter failure of the government to recognize other serious problems, such as our failing economy.

I think that probably summarizes some of the real concerns. I see my time is very limited and I had a lot more to say on it. It summarizes some of the concerns that people have with regard to the national unity debate.

The 28 proposals are very wide-ranging indeed, and I think that is one of the real difficulties with the proposals. The fact is that there is simply too much on our constitutional plate.

What we are dealing with here when you look at the whole ball of wax is a massive revamping of our socioeconomic structure, the consequences of which are anything but clear. Perhaps the Prime Minister wants Canadians once again to take another leap of faith, as he called it, as we did with free trade. But there are simply too many unknowns.

Speaking on behalf of my constituents, the 28-point proposal is too unwieldy to be resolved within the timeframe we have left. In the final analysis the package is too complex. There are simply too many proposals on the table. The timeframe is too short to resolve all the issues. Forcing Canada to abide by this timeframe, which is dictated by Quebec's call for a referendum on sovereignty, will be to ensure failure.

I think it was the general consensus in the meetings that I held that the government should try to condense the proposals into something that is workable, something that is doable. After all, what is the use in fighting to save the future of Canada? If we do not resolve our economic dilemma, we may not have a Canada left.

Certainly a pared down version of a core set of proposals would stand a much greater chance, I suggest, of acceptance by both English and French Canada. The discussion of the distinct society has to be included as one of those pillars in a pared down proposal; addressing the concerns of our aboriginal people and certainly the question of Senate reform. I think a pared down version of these three pillars would make a lot of sense, something we might actually be able to handle.

In the final analysis, if Quebec really wants to be independent, to establish its own nationhood, in the end that really is for it to decide. Sooner or later Quebec must have its rendezvous with independence. I think it is simply a mark of respect for that choice to permit Quebec to make that decision without English Canada essentially wringing its hands over the fact.

In concluding, if Quebecers want to stand at the brink to get a good look at the economic consequences of independence, I suggest they may well decide to re-examine that possibility. The protection of their language and culture is better assured within Canada than without.

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, this is one of the most important opportunities for me to speak in this House. It is not only because I am speaking on a critical issue, the Constitution, but because it is an opportunity for me to convey to this House directly the recommendations, the concerns, and the aspirations of my constituents regarding this country and its Constitution.

Over the past couple of months I have held three town hall meetings. I have held small home-style group discussions with constituents. I have spoken to constituents individually, and I have done a survey to which more than 1,500 of my constituents responded on issues related to constitutional renewal.

My constituents have often expressed their frustration and anger, but they have been frank, determined and hopeful as they have contributed to the national discussion. I might add that a constituent of mine, Mr. Wilfrid Posehn, attended all of my three town hall meetings and I am pleased that he has made his own, unbiased report to the special joint committee on a renewed Canada. Mr. Posehn is to be congratulated, and I also thank him for the interest that he has shown in this subject and in our country.

I should begin by saying that for most of my constituents the priority issue at this time is that of the economy. They want economic security and jobs that will allow them to be full participants in Canadian society. The Constitution is for most of them a secondary issue. However, there is a grudging understanding of the connection between the stability of this nation and its economic well-being. Consequently, they acknowledge the Constitution must be at the top of our list of priorities.

There is a strong feeling in my constituency that Canadian identity is a real issue in the present constitutional discussions. A sense of identity is crucial if we are to be a fulfilled and prosperous nation. For people in Calgary North, Quebec is very much a part of this national identity. Frustration, however, exists over the concept of distinct society. There is general acceptance that Quebec is distinct and should be considered so on the condition that it does not mean that Quebec is given special privileges that are not granted to others. The general sense is that Quebec has its distinctiveness but Alberta has its distinctiveness too. My constituents believe that Quebec should be given the opportunity to live according to its culture but—and this is the key—this should not mean additional powers. All provinces are distinct and obviously Quebec is most distinct. My constituents are frustrated at the thought that granting Quebec its distinctiveness might mean that it has greater powers at the expense of other provinces. My constituents believe that the principles of fairness and equality should be our guide in renewing our Constitution.
