The changes we are making in the way we do things address squarely the twin challenges of restraint and serving Canadians in the best way possible. We must balance clients' demands for services with taxpayers' ability to pay.

We are not simply cutting. We are restructuring to make our services more accessible to Canadians. We recognize that due to the expenditure cuts announced this week, reductions in the level of some services may occur. We want to minimize these effects by shifting resources from internal administration to the points of service delivery.

In 1992–93 the government plans to spend $159.6 billion and that is $119.4 billion in programs with the remaining $40.2 billion going to servicing the public debt.

Out of every dollar spent, over 27 cents is transferred directly to individuals through such things as pensions and unemployment insurance benefits.

Transfers to the provinces and the territories made up principally of equalization programs payments to the less well–off provinces and payments to help fund provincial and territorial programs such as health care, post–secondary education and social assistance take up another 16 cents.

About 8 cents go to defence, another 10 cents to industrial and regional support transfers to aboriginal people and international assistance.

Subsidies to Crown corporations take up 3 cents. The cost of servicing the debt accounts for another 25 cents. The remaining 11 cents represent the cost of providing services directly to Canadians. This is made up mainly of employees' wages and salaries, accommodation, equipment, travel and related expenses.

In 1984 Canadians were paying $1 in taxes and getting $1.33 in program benefits. The difference was financed by borrowed money, so payment was put off to the future. The future is now.

Today, Canadians are still paying their tax dollar, but a growing share is being used to pay interest on the debt accumulated through past spending.

This is why we must continue to hold the fiscal course that this government has charted since 1984.

[Translation]

Restraint measures have forced managers and agencies to meet an increased demand for services with fewer resources. Nevertheless, they did not falter. Aware that restrictions are here to stay, they are determined to meet the challege head–on.

They remain steadfast in their determination to serve. Like their counterparts in the private sector, they take pride in ensuring that taxpayers get their money's worth.

Dedicated federal public servants are responsible for providing Canadians with the kind of efficient service they expect from their government. Canadians are demanding, and they have every right to be. The government's employees are doing a good job.

We are decentralizing decision-making. We are giving public servants the authority to make decisions and making them accountable for those decisions. They are also responsible for getting results.

Many of our recent initiatives were inspired by the wide-ranging renewal announced by the Prime Minister in December 1989—Public Service 2000. Creating special service agencies will make public servants better able to run their agency like a business. Operating budgets will give them a chance to determine the most effective distribution of funding and resources.

We will privatize services and functions if this option turns out to be less costly and more effective and improves service to the public. We will continue to charge user fees for activities that mostly benefit specific clients or users.

Our government is committed to providing the best possible service with the resources available, and to do so courteously and efficiently. It is committed to creating a Public Service whose employees have an abiding concern for the public, are sensitive to the public's needs, and are capable of solving problems and responding quickly to the needs of Canadians. We continue to restructure the public administration in order to streamline its services and facilitate their access.

The departments will co-operate in order to better answer the needs of their clients, and they will take all reasonable measures to logically group together government services in a single service area. They will consult with their clients, so that the latter can help them resolve important issues. They will have more flexible hours, so as to better meet the needs of their clients. They will reduce the number of forms and revise them to make them easier to fill. They will have a single registration number for businesses. They will use electronic devices for their procurements, and they will invest in training as well as in new technologies.

In order to make other savings and increase efficiency, the government will continue to give up activities that can be performed elsewhere at a reduced cost. It will continue to privatize services or to enter into partnerships with the private sector, when such measures are financially profitable. The government will also continue to divest itself of excess goods, to recover its costs and to insist on results whenever possible. It will continue to examine regulations in order to determine if they are still useful and, when they are, to ensure that they do not go against efficiency and competitiveness. It will also simplify those regulations where possible. We will examine the needs of small organizations and determine if they can share their office space in order to improve service and reduce costs. The government will continue to ensure a greater efficiency in markets and procurements, and to deregulate operations within the Public Service as operating budgets will come into effect.

[English]

In conclusion, the measures announced this week build on the actions we have taken over the last seven years. They demonstrate our commitment to sound fiscal management, to reducing the demand on the taxpayers dollars and to placing more resources where employees serve the public directly. That is where Canadians want us to place the focus, and that is where it should be. In this way we can keep costs down while making sure that we provide the best possible services.

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, in listening to the budget on Tuesday and listening to the President of Treasury Board today, one might have thought that at this point in time we would have heard something about what the government was going to do for the unemployed.

We may have thought we would have heard something about what was happening with the primary resource sector as a result of the over-valued Canadian dollar. We might even have had a better insight into how the Government of Canada intended to spend $160 billion for the benefit of Canadians who are most in need.

Canadians might have been looking forward to some answers on whether or not the government was prepared to become involved in renewing municipal infrastructure in this country. I think that the bottom line after the last couple of days is that Canadians are asking themselves what happened to the government and members of government who, not very long ago, talked about jobs, jobs, jobs and talked about the fact that they were the people who could best manage the affairs of the country.

All that has gone for naught, and now we are faced with having to deal with documents and estimates. Just to set the discussion in perspective, this is one budget document. This is the document that represents the 1992-93 estimates for employment and immigration in Canada.

In this document one would take a look and find that employment and immigration is going to spend substantially less this year than last year. It will be quite a reduction. If you look at it closely, there will be an increase in the number of people who will be working for employment and immigration. There will be some 1,200 more people than were involved last year. There will be less money and more people.

One wonders what the people are for. Are they to check up on people who are collecting unemployment insurance? Are they to deal with matters that are going to help the Canadians who need help, or are they there simply to create more problems? It is very difficult to tell. One of the things that we will never be able to determine as Canadians, as taxpayers or as parliamentarians is really what is in the estimates of the government.

This represents one of over 90 books that were tabled this morning figuratively by the minister. He did not bring them all into the Chamber, but they are around for anyone who wants to look at them. There are 90 publications—some of them thicker than this one; some of them are thinner— covering all kinds of government activity, on how it is going to spend $160 billion. No one truly has any hope of finding out exactly how that money is going to be spent.

What I thought I would do this morning in the few minutes that are allowed to me is to put myself in the shoes of Canadians who, after Monday afternoon, might want to have some notion of what is happening to them. I wonder what the unemployed in this country are thinking.

Where do they believe $160 billion is going to go and how is it going to affect them? What about the farmers of this country, many of whom were here in the last couple of weeks telling us how concerned they are about their future? What about the woods workers where the forestry industry which is totally depressed across the country because of the over-valued Canadian dollar?

What about the thousands of men and women in the fisheries, most of whom are in the fishery directly on the seas and in the fish plants? I wonder what they thought was in the budget document and now in the estimates that is going to help them out. Where are the adjustment programs that we heard so much about? Reams of documents were produced on the free trade agreement and people were going across the country. There were blue ribbon commissions put in place to determine programs that would assist workers who were being displaced.

One and a half million people in this country have to be very concerned about the fact that for them, $160 billion will bring them nothing. It is nearly inconceivable because for most people in this country it is an amazing exercise that the government comes forward and politicians from all political parties talk about $1 billion casually.

There has been a great deal of talk recently about testing in our school system. I wonder if anyone at the high school, cégep, community college or university level would like to ask some of the people in the economics classes what a billion dollars is put another way. How many $10 bills is it? How many $100 bills would there be in a billion dollars? How many thousand dollar bills would there be in a billion dollars? If there were such a thing, how many million dollar bills would there be in a billion dollars?

We sit around and we talk about these huge amounts of money as if we really understood. We produce 80 documents and we have a situation where I as a member of public accounts—and I am sure it is an experience shared by many of my colleagues— have been told that senior bureaucrats say that parliamentarians do not use the very voluminous documents that the President of Treasury Board made available to us today. That is the truth. We do not use those documents because we really cannot get to the bottom of them. It is a morass, it is a maze.

We have even been told that people who come to work in departments with a financial vocation are told not to worry too much for a couple of years when they first get there. No matter how well trained they are, with masters in economics and masters in business administration, or even doctorates, do not get frustrated; it will take a couple of years to catch on. They are in a niche, where they are dealing with some very restricted kinds of information.

We are asking small business entrepreneurs in this country to take a look at the estimates and take a look at the budget and try to figure out what is in it for them. We are asking the people, the men and women and the small business operators who have gone bankrupt by the thousands in the last few years, to look at $160 billion and see if there is anything in it for them.

I think all there is in it really is more frustration for the people who cannot get a clue as to what is in these kinds of numbers for ordinary Canadians. We do not know whether there is improper or unauthorized spending. We do not know where the waste is unless we stumble on it. The duplication is sometimes obvious but it is protected in turf wars. There is poor productivity. The Auditor General is very concerned about productivity. He keeps referring to it.

There is a lack of accountability. There may even be some corruption. There are certainly questionable accounting and reporting systems. There is bad management. There are so many things that we could question. When we are talking about an organization that spends $160 billion a year and has well over 200,000 employees, we recognize that it cannot be simple to account for the expenditures of government.

What I am asking and what I hope the President of Treasury Board understands is that as we move toward Public Service 2000, we understand that very few people can cope with the kind of information that is made available to us. We are told by the senior managers that Parliament and the Canadian public are provided with all the information they can use. But that is not true. We are provided with more information than we can use. Is that a purpose that is set out as an objective to make sure that we are overwhelmed, both as parliamentarians and as Canadians, to a point where we really cannot in any way, shape or form deal with the kinds of questions that should be fairly easy for people to get answers to? I want to make sure that we understand how complex the system is. I go back to this example. We have situations, if I can digress for just a moment. I could not help myself.

This morning I picked up The Globe and Mail. Liberals still read The Globe and Mail. You sometimes have to wonder why. The hon. Minister of Communications asks if we read. Yes, we do, unlike some of his colleagues who are not very fussy about Canadian literature.

This week, as a matter of fact in the March edition of The Globe and Mail report on business, there is a very glowing account of what appeared to be a success story. We are talking about a very sophisticated organization that is Canadian-wide in terms of its input and its ability to assess the economy, and so forth, but also one that has people who are first-rate—researchers, economists—who work for The Globe and Mail and who prepare their business reports, their inserts that we see month to month. Here is March 1992. This is a little bit of a futuristic look as far as The Globe and Mail is concerned. Here is the headline: "The Dean of Discount: With a push from master merchant Dean Muncaster, Bargain Harold's is cashing in as discount retailing goes mainstream."

This is what Canadians are reading this week that came out of The Globe and Mail on the weekend in its report on business.

This morning, in the very same week, this is the headline in the report on business in The Globe and Mail: "Bargain Harold's seeking protection from creditors".

The point I am trying to make here is certainly not that Mr. Muncaster did not have a great success and worked very hard for Canadian Tire. I know many Canadian Tire retailers in this country. I know what a great organization that is. The point I make is that economic analysts and people who are responsible for much of the business information that is disseminated in this country are unable to look at a company like Bargain Harold's and get a grasp of what this economy is doing to a company like that that is Canada-wide.

How can it be expected that ordinary Canadians understand what is happening with their government when we are spending $160 billion a year? It is so complicated that in the documents released by the Treasury Board president today, we cannot find out how many people work for the government. It is incredible. I have asked in public accounts to take a snapshot on any given day, a day ago or two years ago, and tell us how many human beings worked for the Government of Canada on that day. We know that most people who work expect to get a cheque. The system works well enough in that respect. People who work for the government get a cheque. Because of jargon and all kinds of systems, we are unable to determine exactly how many people are on the payroll of the Government of Canada, in other words being paid by the taxpayers of Canada.

It is interesting. If you look at the new approach that will be used by the government, this year 28,000 were removed from Treasury Board control. They went into a special program, a pilot project system that is being used to implement PS 2000 in the next couple of years.

What happens is that the PS 2000 approach and this de-control means that you look at some departments and there is nobody there in terms of person-years. Person-years is an approach that has been used for many, many years.

The ordinary Canadian who would look at the estimates that came out today and who would focus, for example, on the Prime Minister's Office, would find that no one works in the Prime Minister's Office. Nobody works there at all. Zero. This is the kind of thing that goes on. The point I am trying to make is how do you expect Canadians to have confidence that their tax dollars are being well spent and, as important, that their tax dollars are being accounted for when we are going through these exercises where some people are controlled, some people are de-controlled and you do not know how many people are working for you on any given day. Now, in a place like the Prime Minister's Office, nobody works at all.

I want to make one last point on this because somebody might think that we are playing politics with this. The Auditor General of Canada and the Comptroller General of Canada are the two most senior accounting segments in our system of government and this is the situation we are faced with. I quote the Auditor General: "I have unfortunately concluded that the 1991 financial statements do not report certain important elements of information reliably". He could not accept the accounting procedures of the Government of Canada.

We sat in public accounts and tried to get to the bottom of this. Last year, the government fudged the books to a point that it was able to deal with a $2 billion deficit on the basis of the zero and three freeze. It was able to get $1.3 billion out of that. It should have charged it out over a 13-year period forward because there will be savings in the pay-out of pension plans over the next 13 years.

Petro-Canada, because of an evaluation mistake made in the early 1980s, there is a loss there. Instead of writing it off in the year in which the loss was discovered, it took that back to 1984. It is very creative accounting.

The Auditor General does not agree with that. What do we have? We have the Comptroller General saying that it is perfectly all right. The very sad part of all of this is that both of these individuals rely on accepted accounting practices that have been set out by people who have an interest in public sector accounting.

We had J. J. Kelly come in, a recognized expert on pension plans. We had Joseph Weinstock come in and talk to us. Imagine what chance Canadians have of getting any kind of information from the estimates when the two senior accountants in government, the Auditor General and the Comptroller General, cannot agree on $2 billion as to whether or not it should have been used last year to reduce the deficit. That is the kind of problem faced by Canadians.

We need clarity in our accounting system. We need sense being applied to how we are going to deal with these issues because Canadians want to know what is happening to their $160 billion.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, what we have received today, as the previous speaker suggested, is a great deal of detail which fills out the budget package which was presented on Tuesday by the Minister of Finance.

I think some of the comments which the previous speaker has made are important comments, but I think it is crucial in this brief preview of a debate which will take place on estimates throughout the year, to put very clearly the differences in substance which we have with the approach which the government has taken in the way it has decided to spend its money.

In the days when life was easy for the Liberals in government and they could simply feel they could borrow money and spend it as they wished, perhaps one did not have to look so carefully at where money was spent, but in these days, in these days where, I think, across the country all responsible governments are recognizing that you have to look very carefully at how you spend your money, where you make your allocations to see to it that you get fairness for people to see to it that you get results for the economy, it is crucial there be a careful examination of where money is being spent, how it is being reallocated.

We received this great mass of material one hour and a half before the minister stood up to speak this morning. This is not going to be a definitive detailed judgment on these points, but there are certainly some major problems with the reallocations and the expenditures which this government has put before the House this morning.

As we look at this set of estimates, they seem to us to show a government which is still, in the way it allocates its money, very heartless to many people in the country, a government which is still not being as honest as it should in telling Canadians what is happening to their money and a government which is being unfair in the way in which money is being reallocated within the structure of expenditures.

Let me just go through a number of points which I think illustrate why we come to this conclusion that the estimates tabled today demonstrate heartlessness, lack of honesty and unfairness. We take, first, I think the most important reallocation which is in these estimates, the area of expenditure to get people back to work. I do not think there is anyone in this House who does not believe that the fundamental function of us as the Parliament of Canada should be to see to it that we get as close as we possibly can to getting everybody who wants a job back to work. It requires training expenditure. It requires help to companies to train people. It requires help to provinces to be able to develop their training programs.

Yet what has been cut most dramatically in this particular set of estimates? There is no question that it is the estimates of the employment department of this country.

Take, for instance, grants for employment purposes. These are not grants for make-work jobs. I quote from the estimates: "to assist individuals to improve their employability and to promote employment opportunities by assisting local entrepreneurial development". Everybody believes in that. Yet what has this government done? It has reduced those grants from $127 million last year to under $90 million this year.

If we take contributions they are not meant for make-work jobs either. These are contributions for the provision of training. I am quoting again from the estimates: "for the provision of training, work experience, for mobilizing community resources, for establishing adjustment measures necessary for the efficient functioning of the Canadian labour market". These are all crucial to a good economy in this country. Yet what has happened? These contributions were $1,319,000,000 last year. These have been reduced this year by almost one-quarter of a billion dollars to $1,064,000,000. In total, if we take both grants and contributions, we see a decrease from $1.33 billion to $1.07 billion.

This is unforgivable when there are so many people out of work across this country. We find the money to give tax breaks that benefit manufacturing companies and to give new tax loopholes which the large corporations in this country will be able to take advantage of. Yet we do not find it possible to keep even the same level of funding for employment and training programs as there was in last year's budget. It is unforgivable.

Then there is the question of defence. The Minister of Finance suggested, when he made his speech the other day, that Canada was going to enjoy a peace dividend. When one gets into the estimates one finds there is no reduction in defence expenditure. Looking at the estimates for last year and comparing them with the estimates for this year, one finds that there has been an increase of $230 million in expenditure on defence. So much for the honesty of this government. We have not seen defence cuts. We have seen defence increases.

The government will come back and say: "Yes, but we have spent more money than that in last year's estimates because of the gulf war". But how much more was spent? We were told by officials this morning that the extra expenditure for the gulf war was $147 million. That means that the increase in defence expenditure, even taking the gulf war into account, is almost $100 million from last year to this year. We could not possibly have a clearer case of smoke and mirrors from a government trying to persuade Canadians that they were cutting defence when they were increasing expenditures on defence in this country. This is despite the fact that the cold war is over and we do not need to be putting the tremendous sums of money into defence which were required when it looked like a potential for world war might still exist.

In addition to those two key areas I want to talk a little bit about regional development because it is another area that is important to economic growth in this country. Yet what has happened to the regional development budget in Atlantic Canada for instance? It has been cut. If we look at the budget for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency grants and contributions, they have decreased from $288 million last year to $274 million this year.

If we look for loans to Cape Breton which is one of the hardest hit parts of this country we see a reduction in loans as well. The over-all contribution to regional development in Atlantic Canada has been cut from $357 million to $334 million. This is despite the fact that an economic catastrophe has just hit Atlantic Canada in the fisheries. Again, it is unforgivable, heartless and unfair.

There are some other small points that I want to note that seem to indicate to me that the government has been unfair and heartless in making its cuts in this budget. It has taken one of the very best agencies that we have to help poor people in the less-developed countries, the International Development Research Centre, and it has cut its budget by $8 million. What possible sense can there be in that? It has taken the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, which under the new Bank Act has been given more responsibilities, and has reduced its operating budget.

Everybody in this House had heard horror stories about the Immigration and Refugee Board because it cannot do its job fast enough. Has the government given any extra resources to that board? Not a bit.

At the same time this government continues to waste money. It has increased the budget of the Canada 125 exercise by 50 per cent. This is an exercise which is caught up in extreme difficulties and which has no accountability to this House. It is a wasteful way to spend money.

At the same time it is spending extra money, $18 million, to establish a GST centre in the country. This is another expenditure for this bad tax which should be done away with.

I will finish with this point. Perhaps the biggest problem with these estimates is that there is nothing to explain to Canadians the money which is being given to corporations and to wealthy Canadians in tax expenditures and tax reductions which go to help those large corporations. We have mentioned some of them in the House: the fact that a large company can deduct escort services for its business executives, the fact that the capital gains tax of $100,000 which goes strongly to rich individuals is not even costed out in these estimates.

If we want a true picture of where the government is giving its benefits, we need these tax expenditures put clearly before this House.

I want to say however that there is one good thing in this set of estimates that has come before us, one excellent allocation of funding. This excellent allocation of funding is a very significant increase in the budget for the office of the Chief Electoral Officer. The Chief Electoral Officer has been given an increase of $15 million for this year to run an election. I hope that it turns out that election is held and we get rid of this heartless, dishonest and unfair government.

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION

REPORT OF CONFERENCE OF SPEAKERS AND PRESIDING OFFICERS OF COMMONWEALTH PARLIAMENTS

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 34, I have the honour to present to the House a report on the meeting of the Conference of Speakers and Presiding Officers of Commonwealth Parliaments held in Jamaica on January 6-10, 1992 in both official languages.

REPORT OF CANADIAN NATO PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

Mr. Bob Hicks (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34, I have the honour to present to the House, in both official languages, the ninth report of the great Canadian NATO Parliamentary Association.

CUSTOMS

PRESENTATION OF REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Clément Couture (Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of the Special Committee on the Act respecting Customs. I would like to express my appreciation of the excellent work done by the members of this committee, thanks to whom it was possible to table this report which contains a series of recommendations on application of the legislation.

Furthermore, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 109, your committee asks the government to table a comprehensive response to this report.

SCRUTINY OF REGULATIONS

FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the fourth report of the Standing Joint Committee for Scrutiny of Regulations.

Your committee wishes to draw to the attention of the House the inappropriateness of the fee structure contained in the central registry of divorce proceedings regulation. The revenues from these fees are materially in excess of the costs incurred amounting to some $1.5 million over the last five years.

It is the position of the committee that circumstances here raise an issue relative to the distinction between a fee and a tax. In the unanimous view of the committee, this statutory order number 86-547 represents in terms of scrutiny criteria an unusual and unexpected use of the authority conferred on the minister by this Parliament.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-62, an act respecting telecommunications.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, after about 15 years and one hour of waiting, I am delighted today to be able to introduce comprehensive new telecommunications legislation for this country. The bill has been designed to enhance the capacity of the Canadian telecommunications industry to meet the demands of all Canadians.

[Translation]

I am firmly convinced this legislation will be highly beneficial for the industry and for consumers across the country.

[English]

I wish to thank the members of this House for their co-operation in passing this crucial piece of legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Mr. Beatty moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

CHRISTINE LAMONT AND DAVID SPENCER

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the pleasure of presenting petitions from people in British Columbia concerning two Canadians, Christine Lamont and David Spencer, who are languishing in a Brazilian jail and sentenced to 28 years in prison.

The petitioners are calling upon Parliament to urge the Secretary of State for External Affairs to request the Government of Brazil to expel Christine Lamont and David Spencer and return them to Canada.

There are numerous other petitions on their way.

CRIMES OF VIOLENCE

Hon. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present a petition on behalf of residents of Scarborough and the surrounding area who are concerned about the criminal justice system.

The petitioners request that Parliament recognize that crimes of violence against a person are serious and abhorrent to society and want to amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act, 1972, and the Parole Act accordingly.

POST OFFICE

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise today pursuant to Standing Order 36 and present petitions with names of 225 signatories.

These people are all from the Penticton and surrounding areas. I add these to the petitions of over 7,000 names that I have already presented to this House.

The people are upset about the closure of the Penticton post office and they petition Parliament. Canada Post is closing and privatizing post offices and will be closing the Penticton post office February 10, 1992 and converting it to a commercial service centre only for commercial use.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to stop this closure and privatization of postal services to ensure that citizens and taxpayers of Penticton, British Columbia, have a full service post office which is directly run by Canada Post Corporation.

VICTIMS OF SEXUAL ASSAULT

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present in the House today a petition signed by residents of Sudbury, concerning the rights and dignity of victims of sexual assault. Your petitioners call upon Parliament to table legislation to protect those victims.

CRIMES OF VIOLENCE

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a second petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 and concerns the problem of the murder of Nina de Villiers on August 9.

This petition has been signed by a number of residents of Sudbury. They ask that Parliament recognize that crimes of violence against the person are serious and abhorrent to society and amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act, 1972, and the Parole Act accordingly.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present to the House a petition which has been signed by 200 residents of Stormont—Dundas.

As Canada is currently involved in negotiating at the GATT, these petitioners are calling upon the government to preserve and strengthen article XI of GATT and defend the continuance of the supply management system for Canadian agriculture.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Wednesday, February 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government; and the amendment of Mr. Gray (Windsor West) (p.7631); and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Langdon (p.7633).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood has 13 minutes remaining for debate.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity speak in this budget debate.

I want to start my remarks by going back to last night. It was funny because I became a little bit uptight with the direction of this debate and I momentarily lost control with respect to my colleague from Carleton—Charlotte. I want to take that back. I hope he will accept my apology.

I have watched this Minister of Finance, not just in the last three years, I watched him when I worked on the Hill from 1980 to 1984. Quite frankly I think he is one of the hardest working members of Parliament we have in this House.

Sometimes when I am in my riding people will ask: "What is the Minister of Finance like?" I tell them that I think this is a man who is quasi-monastic in his commitment to public life. I have watched this man day in and day out work long hours. I know he is totally committed to his job and is doing the best he can with the resources he has.

I asked myself last night why I felt so uncomfortable with this budget. Why do I feel that it really is not addressing some of the fundamental issues, not for the advantaged people in our community but for the disadvantaged. The government will say that the fundamentals are in place and it continues to go back to the inflation number which is the lowest in 20 years. I acknowledge that.

As I said last night and I want to repeat today, there is a tremendous cost to the ratchet it has put on inflation in this country. The cost to the nation is the large number of people who are unemployed and the large number of people who are on welfare. They face a budget which really does not have a lot of hope in it.

When the member for Essex—Windsor talked earlier today about estimates relating to training and retraining, he mentioned the fact that when we discuss productivity, competitiveness and education, we have cut the retraining and grants to re-employment by almost $300 million. Those are not hopeful signals we are sending out to this country when we are going through such difficult times.

I ask myself again why I have such a different feeling toward this budget and this Minister of Finance. The bottom line is that I have a different vision of what the national government is all about. I have watched this government for the last few years. It has used the words "streamline" and "restructure". I prefer to use the words "the retreat from national government" or "the diminished federal presence". This government continues to pursue a diminished federal presence in nearly everything it touches.

I want to suggest to the government that it is really putting itself into a position where there is going to be very little to govern here in the direction it is heading.

I want to be very specific and relate this diminished federal presence, not just to the province of Quebec, because we all talk about the diminished federal presence in the province of Quebec and how harmful that will be in galvanizing us as a nation, but I would like to make the point in relation to my own province, the province of Ontario.

As this government reduces its federal presence in those programs which it has had traditional responsibility for, not only is this national government's ability to cope weakened by the serious problems we are facing today, but a situation is created where a premier, such as we have in the province of Ontario, an NDP premier who, by his actions, is filling that void and is developing policies which are exacerbating the unemployment in this country. He is exacerbating our ability to be competitive.

Here we have the premier of Ontario who, within two or three years, will actually have more economic power than the national government. The province of Ontario will have more spending power than the national government. Is that really what we want?

By diminishing that federal presence then the person who is operating that program, such as the premier of Ontario, will fill the void that the national government runs away from and, in the process of doing that, we will lose our ability to give direction or have say because he who pays the piper calls the tune.

Right now, when this government talks about reducing the deficit, trying to tell Canadians it is trying to control the debt, most of that reduction is coming to them because of the reduced federal presence.

Do you know what is going to happen, Mr. Speaker? We are going to have a situation, as we diminish this federal presence, where those regions of our country who do not have the ability to provide the economic thrust to maintain national standards, whether it be in education or in any other phase of our economy, are going to be at a disadvantage.

When I was elected in my community I was asked to come here to speak for a strong national government, a national government that would look out for the disadvantaged regions of this country, a government that would make sure that those standards were national. This budget is really working against that principle. It is a retreat from the national government and it is pushing more and more responsibilities to the provinces.

Mr. Speaker, you signalled me that my time has lapsed. I hope that more members of Parliament, who are from the disadvantaged regions of this country, see through this budget and understand that is where it is taking us.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, as the member alluded, last evening we were engaged in debate in the House. We were the last two speakers to be on last night, and I am glad that I have the opportunity to respond to the member this morning.

I go back to a comment that the member made this morning. I think there is some commonality of thought here, although I am sure it is not complete. He talks about the tremendous cost of getting the fundamentals correct in this country. By that of course we are taking a look at interest rates at the lowest they have been in 20 years, inflation the lowest it has been in 20 years and so on. We do not have the time to go through all of those obviously. We know that we have paid a cost for that. I think we all acknowledge that. At the same time we acknowledge that it is important to get those fundamentals correct for investment to take place in this country to get us on the course of recovery which I believe that we are on this point.

What is the cost in the long term of not getting the fundamentals correct? We acknowledge the fact that we paid a price for that on one side, but in the long term, what is the real cost of not getting those correct? When we have runaway inflation, interest rates that are over 20 per cent as they were 10 years ago, could the member please comment on that aspect of it?

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question. It is a good question. I think it is a question of balance. If you are almost six months ahead of your inflation targets, your interest rates are the lowest that they have been in almost 20 years, and you are still getting signals that this is not sparking confidence in the economy, that this is not getting a reaction from the 1.7 million entrepreneurs in this country who are our greatest hope for job creation, and I am not talking about make work projects here, when you are getting the feeling from these people that their confidence is so fragile that they are not striking out, that they are not investing, that they are not hiring, I suggest that the government has to loosen that ratchet a little bit. It has room. It has room in the interest rates. It has room with respect to inflation.

I am not saying we should have a spending binge here, but to have a $300 million cutback on retraining when we are all talking about retraining and global competitiveness, there is enough slack in the inflation numbers here that we could have handled that.

I want to suggest one other thing regarding the Small Business Loans Act which in the minister's budget doubled from $100,000 to $200,000. I think that is good. My problem with it is that if you want to get confidence and you want to get that 1.7 million entrepreneurs sparked and going, if each one of them will hire one person, unemployment is gone and we are back in business and then we can really attack that deficit. That, to me, is one area of the minister's budget that he should be buying full-page ads with. He should be taking taxpayers' money and he should be communicating to the 1.7 million entrepreneurs that this facet of the budget exists.

I say to all hon. members here that 99 out of 100 small businessmen do not know what that Small Businesses Loans Act is all about. I challenge the government to communicate it to all Canadian businessmen.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, in his remarks the member covered an awful lot of ground. He also alluded in his closing remarks to the fact that the government was transferring to the provinces and to the individuals an awful lot of hot potatoes in terms of training and development, for example.

I want to refer to the estimates that were tabled this morning and ask the member this: In the Main Estimates for Employment and Immigration we find that there is a net decrease of $177 million in employment. I was wondering if job training, job creation, is not something that we should address more thoroughly.

I notice also that in the transfer payments to the provinces and to the agencies, the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, for example, is cut by $13.4 million. There is a whole series of cuts to programs which, indeed, could be used or could have been used to create employment. I want to ask the member if he could elaborate on his views as to how we could use these moneys to put people to work.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his question. The training cuts are a mystery to me and, quite frankly, I wonder if the reason why the government seems to be retreating from this training section is linked to the constitutional talks where we are talking about putting more training into the hands of the provinces. If that is the case, I am very nervous because I think that is something the national government should maintain a direct linkage with and the ability to give direction to.

The businessmen of downtown Toronto came out with the statement yesterday that a lot of them supported this minister's budget. Quite frankly, I am mystified, I am at a loss as to why they are supporting it. If they are just supporting it on the fact that the number crunching side of it is good, fine, I have acknowledged that. But combined in a budget there should be some innovation, there should be some creative ideas, especially in the area of training and retraining, a topic which all the businessmen are talking about. In that particular area I am absolutely convinced that if you asked those businessmen if they want support for training and retraining—which is in a sense a capital investment—I am sure once they are aware that this government has cut back on training, they are going to reverse their position.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I know the time for questions is just about over. I certainly listened with interest to the thoughtful remarks, as they usually are, by the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood.

There are many things to say. I certainly share how he started his remarks this morning in terms of trying to distinguish and separate the feeling and respect that one has for a fellow colleague, especially the Minister of Finance, in his monastic drive to be a real public servant, helping the public good and the land, and being a little critical or adding questions, or introducing questions, on the budget that that minister presented. I certainly share those views because of a long relationship with the Minister of Finance.

I, too, have serious questions about aspects of the budget and I would like to ask the member specifically this: I think really the thought of a businessman downtown may be partly what I call sort of a Stockholm syndrome to the budget. First you have the personality of the minister, who is very warm, engaging and human. Then you have a lot of bad news that has permeated the economic scene and/or the land for so long that a budget that has some glimmer of creativity makes us all feel a little good. I think we are all in that sort of mood.

In terms of something that I really find difficult that happened—and there is an argument about how much show it was and how much reality it was—is the elimination of some of these agencies that do have a national focus, that have helped the land, especially in these difficult times. I am thinking specifically of the Science Council of Canada and the Economic Council of Canada.

I would like to ask this member a question. The time for questions is short. I have many questions I could put to him but I am going to try to get questions to some of the government ministers if they stand some time during this debate in view of some of the history around here at the creation of the Economic Council of Canada.

In terms of the $22 million that I guess has been saved with the elimination of these 14 agencies and the merger of these other agencies and commissions, how does the member, with his experience in politics and in the outside world, balance that specific reduction of $22 million with all those agencies and all the difficulties that is going to create in eliminating the Science Council of Canada and the Economic Council of Canada when in effect the government, up until now, on just five different areas, has spent over $125 million. Be it the Spicer commission, the commission on reproductive technology, the royal commission on transportation, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce competitive strategy, all of these are $20 million plus. I just wonder if he feels—and it may be a leading question—this is going to instil confidence in Canada and Canadians in the way we are going.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for Annapolis Valley—Hants for the question.

First of all, a lot of those agencies were set up by Liberal governments. The purpose of those agencies was to provide policy ideas, policy suggestions. It is impossible when you are a politician to come up with the ideas yourself. You go to an independent organization. Quite often those organizations, even when we were in power, did not always agree with us. They criticized us. They were there to probe and spark debate and to inspire. From that point of view, I think the government is being shortsighted, but I do want to give the government a little bit of credit for something here.

The Economic Council of Canada, and I was reading one of their documents last night, "A Joint Venture: The Economics of Constitutional Options", produced a lot of good stuff. I think that when the Economic Council of Canada produced that paper saying that it was not such a bad thing for Quebec to be a sovereign nation, quite frankly, had I been the Prime Minister, that day I would have called the directorship of that operation in and I would have said: "Listen, we have got enough problems with unity in this country as it is. You are not politicians and it is not your job to promote the fact that it is an easier way to live in this country as a divided nation than a united nation". On that specific point, I think the Economic Council of Canada was way off base.

I think we are absolutely crazy to abolish the Science Council of Canada and a lot of those other agencies. I do not know all of them, but I know a lot of them have good, honest, hard-working people and I think that the government was penny wise and pound foolish.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I spent all day yesterday in the House, listening to the comments of my colleagues on this side, but mostly to the comments of the opposition.

This is my eighth budget and my seventh budget as Parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance. In all those eight years I never heard a single constructive comment or suggestion from the opposition when it was discussing the budget. I think this shows something very important is lacking in this House. Criticism should be constructive and we should also consider the budget for what it is.

I am getting rather tired of hearing the opposition complain there is no education policy in the budget, no social policy or cultural policy or health policy. A budget is a budget. In the private sector, a budget shows columns of figures, with the bottom line indicating whether the year's results were positive or negative. That is a budget. As far as policies are concerned, we have ministers who announce policies as appropriate to their individual budgets. The same applies to the private sector. When I look at a private company's budget, there is an operations sector. There is someone in charge of operations and someone in charge of sales. The person in charge of sales has a budget to spend and defines policy in terms of what is best for the company. We have to stop expecting the budget to contain all the government's policies in every sector. That is not what a budget is for.

I think it is time this was understood. The Minister of Finance gives us his budget forecast, explains what the monetary situation is and where we are headed. He defines a few broad principles. The purpose of the budget is to give Canadians a financial statement they can trust, not 48 policies.

An hon. member: What about hope?

Mr. Vincent: The hon. member mentioned hope. In fact this budget is a budget of hope. I would like to get back to the tax changes announced in the budget, because when we talk about revenue and expenditures, we have to talk about the Income Tax Act. That is where the money comes from, and that is where less money will be coming from when we amend this act.

What the budget tells us, is how the money comes in and how much it will cost to run the country. That is what the budget is about.

The budget deals strictly with the fiscal aspect and how it will affect taxpayers. People should stop saying that there is nothing in the budget for this or that program. We had a good example only 10 minutes ago, when the Minister of Communications tabled a new bill. This bill was not part of the budget because it is the responsibility of the Department of Communications. It is about communications policy, and it was tabled by the Minister of Communications.

I hope the opposition will take these comments to heart and will start offering some constructive criticism, without trying to make the budget into something it is not.

I would like to give a short history of Canada's financial situation since 1984 when we were elected. You will recall that in 1984, the government spent $39 billion more than it was getting in revenue. This year the deficit will be $31 billion and next year it will be $27 billion. We have managed to reduce the current deficit every year, but this does not deal with the problem of the national debt. In 1984 the national debt was $206 billion. The opposition will say that today it is nearly $400 billion and that it is all our fault.

When we talk about the national debt, we must remember to include the interest charges this government has to pay on the debt it inherited from the Liberal government. The interest charges since 1984 total $239 billion—

An hon. member: Highway robbery.

Mr. Vincent: —which corresponds exactly to the debt we inherited in 1984.

An hon. member: Outrageous.

Mr. Vincent: However we managed to have an operating surplus which means that this year, if we exclude the interest charges payable, the government is spending less money than it raises. We are now operating like the average family. We are not borrowing with MasterCard to pay chargex, as was the case under the former Liberal government.

That is where we were in 1984 and we must continue in that direction. To do so, again, we must take difficult measures and make cuts. I heard my opposition colleagues talk about the 46 agencies that were cut. When a family, a business or an individual cannot afford to do something, what do they do? They do not do it. Here we had the habit of borrowing when we could not afford something. That is over. If we cannot afford something we do not borrow, we cut.

That is exactly what Canadians want. They understand, because they pay enough tax to understand that the government cannot borrow any more. Every day, we hear members opposite get up—and we should count how many times they do, it would be hilarious—and ask questions in order to obtain more money. They do not understand what Canadians want. For example, take an open-line show in my riding of Trois-Rivières yesterday at noon, from 11.30 to 1.30, when the question was: Are you for or against the Hon. Don Mazankowski's budget? Seventy per cent of the callers said they were in favour of this budget. Seventy per cent supported it on an open-line show in Trois-Rivières.

People want us to run the country as they handle their family budget. The fiscal measures announced in the budget also reflect what Canadians want. This budget was prepared by the Minister of Finance after consulting the national caucus, the Quebec caucus and MPs. Members come back from their ridings on Monday morning and know, after spending the weekend with their constituents, just what Canadians want. People in Ottawa don't understand the problems of Abitibi—the member for Abitibi does. The same goes for Trois-Rivières and every riding.

You will hear people say that the announcement about RRSPs is a smoke screen, I was not greatly in favour of the original request to let people use their RRSPs to buy their first home, because I thought that it would not have the intended effect. People who do not have a house surely do not have much money in their RRSPs and are just starting out in their life and career. This is for the purchase of a principal residence, so someone can take $20,000 out of his or her RRSP and use the money to pay for an existing home or one that they want to build and so on. For a married couple, each partner can take $20,000, which makes a $40,000 down payment. That is excellent, and it will make a valuable contribution to real estate and the buying and selling of homes. It must be seen in that light and the program must be used in that way.

Some will tell you that it does not pay, because the $20,000 in your RRSP was not subject to income tax and you will lose that advantage. That is a good point. On the other hand, if I borrow $20,000 from a financial institution, I will have to pay interest every year on this loan, say $2,000 at 10 per cent, but I will have to earn $2,500 or $3,000 before tax to pay my income tax and also the interest on the loan and even more to gradually pay off the principal.

I submit that this plan can be very profitable for those who use it wisely. It will enable them to buy either a first home or one that better suits their needs in 1992, and that, again, at a very interesting price.

This echoes the wishes expressed by Canadians. In my riding, many real estate agents and others have written to me. They said: "Let us use them." Provincial premiers had also mentioned something along that line.

Another issue I have received a lot of correspondence about is that of the treatment of common law couples. That too can be found as a new tax measure in the budget. From now on, common law couples will be treated the same as married couples under the Income Tax Act and for the purposes of the GST and other credits, transfers and so on. That is what happens when a caucus sets its shoulder to the wheel and incorporates suggestions in preparing a budget.

This particular measure had been long-awaited in my riding of Trois-Rivières, as in the rest of the province of Quebec and Canada. Not only is this part of an improved tax legislation but it also reflects the social and economic reality of 1992. It should be pointed out that this is not a family oriented policy or anything like that, but an amendment to tax laws and, as such, it was included in the budget.

Another new feature in this budget is the $100,000 capital gains exemption. We know that every Canadian man and woman was already entitled to a $100,000 capital gains exemption. The budget does not take it away. We figured that, in order to assist and stimulate the Canadian economy, that exemption should apply specifically to gains on active revenue-producing assets. This does not mean—just this morning, I was reading a piece about investment property in La Presse—that the real estate market will shrink. It means that you can, as individuals, decide to invest say in a rental property, realize gains on it every year and, when you sell it, you will be taxed less because it will be considered as a capital gain.

Now if you decide not to invest in real estate but rather in an company operating in the Trois-Rivières riding, which I hope is what you would chose, when you sell your shares your active participation in that business creates jobs and generates employment. The $100,000 exemption on capital gains will still be valid. Compare this to real estate which does not create jobs. If you buy a four-unit apartment building you will not employ somebody full time for its maintenance.

Therefore nobody is penalized. Each Canadian can chose where he or she will invest. Evidently we all know that there is a higher risk involved in a small business than in a four or eight-unit apartment building.

I feel that this is one way our government is looking at the economic reality of Canada. It is an incentive for all small business owners who often must seek are out investors, who often need small sums like $50,000 or $100,000 to carry on more securely, to buy new equipment, to get the technology they want and so reach the national level.

Incidentally, talking about small businesses, another measure which will be helpful for our businesses is the raising of the maximum from $100,000 to $200,000 for small business loans. I think that doubling the amount a small business is entitled to borrow. Mr. Speaker, you are signalling me that I have only two minutes left, but I feel I have just begun. I will speed up a bit. I was saying that allowing small businesses to borrow $200,000, guaranteed by the government, is another positive step taken by this government to assist our businesses and help the economy. Another measure designed to help our businesses is the program allowing a small or medium-sized company to borrow money, while the loan and revenues made on that loan by the lender will be considered a dividend rather than an interest. As we all know, if these companies expand, they will create employment. If they create employment, it will benefit the Canadian economy.

In conclusion, I would like to congratulate the Minister of Finance who suggested the merging of three programs for children into just the one. People will receive only one cheque per month, not taxable and bigger than what they used to get. There will less paper burden and everybody will therefore be happier. Instead of having three programs, there will only be one: one cheque per month, and bigger than what people now get. This must not go unnoticed because unfortunately I do not often hear the opposition mention the positive measures that are in the budget. The deficit is reduced and people have tax policies that meet their needs. These things must be said. We must be positive. That is how the regional economy of Trois-Rivières, of Quebec and of Canada will improve.

In concluding, I would also like to emphasize the fact that, for the first time in a very long time, the Minister of Finance has reduced taxes for all Canadians. Yet the opposition will automatically say: "Not by much, not by much". That is not the point. The point is that thanks to the cuts made in the last eight years, thanks to the work of the member for Etobicoke Centre and now the member for Vegreville and thanks to the fact that for the last eight years Canadians throughout the country have tightened their belt in terms of federal expenses, this government has been able to reduce taxes.

Everyone in this House would love it if there were no taxes, if there was no GST. We all agree on that. It is perhaps the only thing on which we all agree, but we agree on that. However, because of our structures and programs, we must have and we must pay taxes. From that point on, this government has demonstrated that you can increase taxes, but it has also shown that you can reduce them. Again I want to congratulate the Minister of Finance in that regard.

My time is up but I would just like to ask all members to be positive and to make sure that this budget is passed as quickly as possible.

[English]

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to the hon. member.

One of the comments he made was that the budget was to put trust and confidence in the people. I agree that that is what a budget should do but certainly we have not seen any initiatives in this budget that would put any trust or confidence back in the people.

He went on to say that it is a budget of hope. The same thing applies. I cannot see anything in this budget that offers any hope whatsoever for the 1.5 million people who are unemployed. I know in my province the unemployment rate is approximately 17 per cent.

This budget, as I said, does not offer any hope. There is no capital works program. There is very little investment in research and development. There is nothing new in training initiatives.

He went on and talked about small business and what a great thing that the ceiling of borrowing has been doubled. Does he not realize that small business today is trying to survive? It does not matter if the borrowing level is quadrupled. If they cannot take advantage of it, what good is it?

Look at the bankruptcy rates of small businesses across this country. This government should be doing something for small business. It was small business that helped lead us out of the last recession but the government fails to realize that.

This is the question that I want to ask. I want to come back to the statement the member made about it being a budget of hope. I would like to know what hope this budget offers to the 1.5 million people who are unemployed across this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, I must admit I am disappointed with the question because either the member did not listen to my presentation or they did not understand the message.

At the beginning of my speech, I explained the nature of a budget. A budget is made up of figures, it is not a series of announcements by 40 departments of what is to come during the following year. It presents revenues expenditures and credits for each department. That is what a budget is all about. It is not supposed to describe all government policies for the year to come. Again, the member said the budget did not contain an education policy, a business policy, this or that. That is right, the budget does not present any of those things. The sole purpose of a budget is to allocate funds so that departments may announce their policies and the Canadian economy may adjust to it. The taxation measures are in there.

Maybe my colleague did not read the budget because she says it contains nothing for small businesses while in fact there are five or six taxation measures aimed at small business in that budget. It might be a good idea for her to read it.

I was a tax lawyer in Trois-Rivières when Marc Lalonde established tax credits for scientific research in his budget.

Mr. Saint-Julien: The theft of the century.

Mr. Vincent: His budget said that the cost would be $200 million.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Vincent: Did you notice, Mr. Speaker, how shocked they are when we talk about real life?

Marc Lalonde had written in his beautiful budget that it was going to cost about $200 million. He was Minister of Finance so he just said "about $200 million". Do you know how much it actually costs Canadians? Four billion, including $1.9 billion in fraudulent claims, as the Auditor General pointed out. We spent $4 billion on a tax credit scheme which were to cost about $200 million. I did not say $4 million. I said $4 billion.

He knew it, but he did not do anything to put an end to it. We had to wait until the election of the Progressive Conservative Party and the appointment of the member for Etobicoke Centre as Minister of Finance to do away with that program. The meter was then at $4 billion, including $1.9 billion in fraudulent claims. Could my colleague across the floor imagine what we could do with $4 billion of taxpayer's money, $4 billion which simply disappeared?

Such was the Liberal policy. Unfortunately, they do not understand the budget. They do not understand its philosophy. They just do not understand what a budget is supposed to be.

• (1200)

I notice, that I am out of time.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There are about two minutes left for another question or comment.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is about facts. The hon. member for Trois-Rivières, who is also the Parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance, ought to know that statements should be based on fact. At the beginning of his speech, the hon. member said the government had reduced the deficit. I may remind him that, as reported in the Public Accounts of Canada, the Auditor General had three serious reservations about the government's accounting methods. In fact, the Auditor General said that the deficit should be $2 billion more than you estimated it would be. His reservations are right there in the public accounts. I think the hon. member knows what I am talking about. It was one of your accounting tricks.

My question is simply this: Does the hon. member know whether the accounting methods used last year are the same as the ones used this year or the ones that will be used next year? The problem is, Canadians cannot read your accounts because you keep changing the rules of the game every year. Did I make myself clear? Your accounting methods are no good. The Auditor General of Canada said so himself. Your accounting methods are lousy. What I have to say to the parliamentary secretary is this: Give us and give Canadians in general the assurance that the accounting methods you used this year are the same ones you used last year or will use next year, so we can compare.

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, I like the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, but he always has a knack of making a mountain out of a molehill. As you know, Mr. Speaker, accounting and generally recognized accounting principles are changing constantly. My hon. friend has been here long enough to realize that his own finance ministers changed their accounting methods, I would not say religiously but quite regularly, so I do not think he should take that line of attack. I think he should look at the situation as it is right now and at the figures as they are. As far as that goes, I have no problem with the accounting methods used by the Government of Canada to make our figures crystal clear. The hon. member knows perfectly well that our accounting methods are pretty good, because our figures are not only for domestic consumption. They are also scrutinized by international organisation, so they have to comply with generally recognized accounting principles, and the hon. member admits as much. I can tell from the expression on his face.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, since debate has resumed, I would remind my friend from Trois-Rivières who is the parliamentary secretary—I do not want to take all my time talking about it—that he need only refer to the public accounts for 1991. On Page 2.23, the Auditor General, Denis Desautels, not I, wrote: "These reservations deal with what I believe is improper accounting for: (1) the effect of short-term wage restraint on employee pensions; (2) a reduction in the value of the investment in Petro-Canada; and (3) income tax revenue collected on behalf of provinces". He may be new but he is an excellent accountant.

He had three serious reservations that together amount to $2 billion which the government said it had saved, when all the accountants who testified before the public accounts committee and the Canadian Association of Accountants told us that is not proper bookkeeping. The parliamentary secretary who is close to the minister and on top of the issues should know that a serious reservation has been expressed about the public accounts and it should be heeded. All I asked him is this: Will he comply, will he listen to what the experts told us Canadians and will they change their methods so that we can read those accounts with some understanding and satisfaction that we are being told the whole truth and that the dice are not loaded?

That being said, I go on to the budget. By the way, I must say that this morning the estimates for the coming year were tabled and they contain everything the government intends to do in terms of programs. If people are interested, they can read 80 booklets on what is happening in each department and agency. These clearly explain, I think, what the government intends to spend for the year that begins April 1, 1992 and ends March 31, 1993.

[English]

The Tories have presented a budget that is cosmetic. It attempts to paint a rosy picture without addressing the fundamentals. It gives a little bit to a lot of people. It is like giving a mouthful of food to someone who is very hungry or starving. It provides fleeting relief but it does nothing to address the agony that person is having. We are having a terrible time in this country with regard to the economy and with regard to the confidence of the Canadian people in the future.

I suppose we should be happy. At the very least the Tories have admitted current weaknesses in the economy. I think they are getting the message from Canadians now that indeed we are having some problems. For all their admissions, they have offered little hope for those who have no jobs. These are the 1.4 million Canadians who are currently unemployed. There is nothing to help those on welfare. These are Canadians who would love to escape the cycle of poverty. There is nothing to stimulate the economy which needs a kick-start and should have been included in this budget statement.

The day before yesterday the finance minister based his budget on shaky assumptions. For example, he said that 500,000 jobs will magically be created by the large and small companies of Canada. These are the same companies that had their confidence shaken to the core by the destructive policies of this same government. It is a government which has not even provided the tools to help them compete in an atmosphere of free trade and intense global competition.

Those in government clear their throats with globalization and competitiveness, yet they have done nothing in the budget tabled a couple of days ago or in the estimates tabled today to give Canadians confidence that there is light at the end of the tunnel.

Another assumption made by the Minister of Finance is that Canadians will take the money from the marginal tax break they will receive in seven months from the reduction of the surtax. We calculate that that is about an average of $20 per Canadian. This is supposed to inspire them to go on a spending spree and get the economy going again. That assumption is wrong and the Tories know it.

They ignore the every day reality of Canadians on welfare, on unemployment insurance, those whose job security is uncertain and those in my community who have been put on the unemployment list by the budget of this government. There are 500 people living in the Ottawa-Carleton area who will be losing their jobs because of the closing down of some agencies. These people will not be on a spending spree to ensure this government is pulled out of the economic mess it has created. I remind Canadians that the recession we are in was a made-in-Canada recession. It was announced the Prime Minister some time ago. I tell Canadians to remember that, if the Tories have the guts to call an election. They are the ones who put us into this position.

Confidence in the economy is low. The Ottawa Citizen, a newspaper in my community, reported on January 15 that a poll conducted by Angus Reid and Southam News in late December and early January found that one in three Canadians feared losing his job or feared even losing a job in the family. Further, Ontario residents were the most depressed about their personal finances and almost 40 per cent expressed concerns that a family could lose a job this year.

The finance minister says: "Oh, I have a short-term fix. Don't worry". We say to him that his short-term fixes will not work. We must focus on the medium and long term. We must set our sights on those medium and long term solutions. Since no significant measure was announced in this budget to stimulate the economy in the short term, at least let them have the guts to call an election and we will take over and make sure there are programs to look after the needs of Canadians in terms of job creation and in terms of getting the economy back on its feet.

Much of the disappointment of this budget lies in lost opportunities. They have lost the chance to do it. Some people even had the naivety to say this was a pre-election budget. I dare say that if it is a pre-election budget it does not speak very highly of this government's capacity. Of course when one speaks for 11 per cent of Canadians, I guess one's credibility is only so much. That is what government members do and they are at about 11, 12 or 13 per cent in the polls at best.

We suggested some things to get the economy going. The Tories listened to the request to get the down payment on a house purchase from 10 per cent to 5 per cent. They put that in, thank you very much. That is going to be helpful. They listened to the requirement of the real estate industry. For the last four years they have been coming around lobbying members of Parliament for at least four years on their approach to allowing RRSPs or a portion of them to be used to purchase a main residence. They have listened to that, except that I say it may produce from what I am told by the experts at best 10,000 to 12,000 new starts this year, possibly about 6,000. They did not listen to us on the infrastructure program that would have had in our opinion substantial spinoffs.

They followed the time honoured Tory tradition. They hit the national capital region very hard.

The Ottawa Citizen reported Wednesday: "This budget will cost this region an estimated $150 million in lost jobs and government spending". Up to 500 jobs will be lost as a result of the elimination or merging of 39 agencies and advisory boards. As I said, this budget will add to the unemployment rolls in this region. For the government to add to the 1.5 million Canadians on unemployment appears acceptable to them. I say that it is not acceptable. No Canadian in this country should go wanting. No Canadian who wants to work should be put in a situation where he or she cannot find appropriate remunerative employment.

It is indeed astounding, as my colleague from Toronto said a few minutes ago, that they would choose in a time of such great difficulties in the economy to cut agencies such as the Economic Council of Canada, the Science Council of Canada, the Law Reform Commission, the Canadian Environmental Advisory Council, and so on. We wonder. These were agencies giving government and the Parliament of Canada advice at arm's length. I admit that it was not always pleasing to the government, but at least it was objective, it was arm's length and it was constructive. Yet the government chopped it. Has the government lost sight of the value of independent evaluations of its policies and of its recommendations for future action?

I happen to chair the public accounts committee. When it comes to evaluating our programs to make sure that we are getting bang for the buck, that we are giving Canadians efficient services and that we are reaching the goals we have set, I am not so sure that disbanding the evaluation program in the Minister of Finance's department this year was such a good idea.

We criticized it; I think we were right. I understand the Parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance was saying that the scientific tax credit was a sham. Indeed it was. There were 10 evaluations made of certain programs going from the Cape Breton investment credit down to the disability tax credit. On every one of those evaluations by the Minister of Finance, his department said: "We are a bit embarrassed by the results of the evaluation". It was not just one program; there were ten. Yet they did away with it. They just said: "This is making us look like a bunch of fools here so we have to get rid of it".

Why is it that we are going to continue saying to Canadians: "We have a huge deficit, we have a heck of a big debt to repay"? The debt servicing charges per year are $40 billion, yet this government has done no evaluation of the debt management program. When we asked for that we heard: "Well, we will see". We would think on one of the most costly programs in this country, the debt repayment program, there would be a willingness on the part of the government to say: "Yes, we are going to manage this economy properly. We are going to be good managers and we are going to evaluate whether we should be borrowing short term, long term, medium term, whether we should go into Canada Savings Bonds, or whether we should go into other types of borrowing papers".

We are not getting there. It is sometimes very depressing to hear them tell Canadians that indeed we have a heavy debt. We do not know as Canadians whether that debt is being managed properly by this government .We should know. There should be a program of evaluating whether or not we are managing this debt. I put it to the government: "Do it and tell Canadians you will look at it at least and come up within the next few months with a program that will tell us whether or not we are getting bang for the buck".

I want to talk about the people in my riding. We are having a tough time in some parts of my riding. The social welfare programs are overloaded. If we listen to the regional government, it is going to cost an additional $60 million in the Ottawa-Carleton area to look after those people for whom you, Mr. Speaker, and all of us in this room care. We would like to see them be able to find a job and get some kind of relief from poverty.

I have soup kitchens in my riding. There has been a terrible increase in those relying on soup kitchens for one meal a day. It is depressing. Yet we hear this government, through the mouth of its own parliamentary secretary a few minutes ago, saying: "Canadians do not understand the difficulty we are in". They do, they do.

I want to read some statistics into the record about this so-called Ottawa fat city, the fat cat city as it is often referred to by some people in the press. In my riding of Ottawa—Vanier the signs of recession are everywhere: stores out of business and others struggling to survive. About 75,000 people in this region are receiving some form of social assistance, an increase of 34 per cent over last year. To put it another way, 11 per cent of the population in this region is receiving either welfare payments or family benefits. The number of welfare cases in Ottawa-Carleton jumped 41 per cent in 1991 and is expected to jump another 25 per cent this year.

In The Ottawa Citizen of January 3, 1992 the region's social services commissioner said that we had a crisis on our hands. This is not a political person speaking; this is an administrator. The cost this year alone will be in excess of $60 million. He expects the monthly average of welfare cases to jump to 32,000 individuals and families in 1992, up from 1991 with an average of 25,000.

Bankruptcies have been increasing. As reported in The Ottawa Citizen of November 28, 1991, in the Ottawa-Carleton area 167 individuals and businesses declared bankruptcy in October, an increase of 14 per cent from the year before. For the first 10 months of last year bankruptcies were up 35 per cent.

The chair of the social services committee at the time said in January of this year that she had never seen such an explosion of demand for social services, and I quote her: "The situation this time is different, particularly because of the type of people applying for assistance. You have white collar workers and even people in management whose savings have run out. People want to work but just cannot find any work". Yet the government cut 500 white collar jobs this week.

The food banks are now serving 18,000 people a month in the Ottawa area. At the Shepherds of Good Hope Centre, which is in my riding, some 200 people a day receive food.

I want to quote from a recent report called "Overdrawn at the Food Banks: The Hunger Crisis in Ottawa—Carleton". It drives the point home: "Many emergency food banks first opened their doors in the 1980s to act as temporary measures. Instead they have become permanent. This is unacceptable in a country like Canada. There are three main reasons why demand remains high at emergency food programs: high unemployment, lack of affordable housing and inadequate social assistance allowances".

The recession has had an impact on my community, a terrible impact on people, and I ask this House to do something to help, to assist and to care for Canadians who at this time have no jobs, who are asking us to look after this situation and correct it as soon as possible.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, in response to the member for Ottawa—Vanier I want a bit of clarification. I believe he mentioned in reference to the finance minister a short-term fix. I do not think the finance minister ever ascribed to the short-term fix. The party the member represents is the master of the short-term fix which has created the problems that have made it so difficult for this government to operate.

The accumulation of the mountain of debt which besieges us today is really the problem. I quote from the minister's speech of two days ago when he delivered his budget. In reference to Canadians he said: "They do not believe that governments can borrow us out of the trouble that governments have borrowed us into. They know that higher debt means higher taxes and they want an end to rising taxes".

I question the member on that because it obviously does not work. Over the years we have proven that the accumulation of more debt just aggravates the problems we already have as a nation.

It goes back to the question of who pays the bills. We know who pays the bills. The Canadian taxpayers pay and they are sick and tired of paying. They want out from underneath it. The only way we can get out from underneath it is to work our way out, to pay off the debt.

The member made reference to articles which he quoted from various papers. I want to quote an article and maybe he can respond to it. The Financial Post interviewed Maureen Farrow, an executive with Coopers & Lybrand, yesterday. The newspaper reported: "During a post-budget breakfast, Maureen Farrow, the firm's chief economist, commended Mazankowski for presenting a budget that encourages economic recovery, government efficiency and increased competitiveness in the manufacturing sector".

She went on to say: "The reduced surtax rate on personal income tax will put as much as $500 million in consumers' hands in 1992-93". She also said: "The budget's emphasis on thinning the government and cutting the deficit sets a whole new tone for provincial budgets over the coming months". Possibly the member could allude to that article and place it into perspective in the big budget picture.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, surely we could allude to the present government's budget.

The budget demonstrated to some of us and to the majority of Canadians that the government does not understand the fundamental problem that is facing Canada at this time. Instead of addressing the fundamental mismanagement that has been going on in this country the government throws a couple of crumbs out there and thinks that Canadians are going to say: "Thank you very much". They will not say: thank you very much. They will boot you out, I hope.

Look at the green plan, $75 million was cut from it. The Canadian Race Relations Foundation and the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute, the continued existence of which would underline the government's commitment to a multicultural Canada, are out. That is Reform Party policy again.

The government is indeed very concerned and very worried about the Reform Party, as is shown by most of the things it has done. It has cut social housing. The co-operative housing program, which was started in 1971 in my riding of Ottawa—Vanier when the first co-op was built in my riding, was zapped. It took it out. Social housing has gone by the door.

I could go on and on. I see the member is rising. I will wait for his question, it may be more intelligent. The co-operative housing program was a very important program to us and this budget zapped it.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I first of all want to compliment my colleague on his address.

I am sure we were all struck by the terrible statistics he presented to Canadians so they could realize just how badly this government has mismanaged the economy. He alluded to some of the issues which I would like him to comment on.

The National Drug Strategy was reduced by $32 million when we know about the serious drug problem facing Canadians and our youth. Then there is co-op housing. Poverty and housing are fundamental issues facing us as we try to raise our children and help them become productive members in society.

At the same time, we see the privatization of the Canada Student Loans Program and we know what privatization means. It means that it is going to be turned over to the banks who are not going to be giving out the student loans necessary for students to continue their post-secondary education.

What will happen is that our students, who are now facing higher costs because of the GST and other mismanagement, are now not going to be able to get the necessary loans to continue their education. Education is vital to our youth and vital to our nation.

The government considers the budget to be fair and caring. I thought that the member for Ottawa—Vanier might want to comment on the fair and caring aspects of those cuts.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, yes, I want to comment. There was the child tax credit. Remember that? It was supposed to be a sacred trust.

My colleagues and I believed that the government's commitment to universality was paper thin. The government has confirmed that now. We now know where the government stands because day care will not be a national program anymore. The minister of health said so yesterday.

The government has failed Canadians. How many times do I have to repeat it? It has betrayed the trust given to it by Canadians and it is time we voted the Conservatives out.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. The next two speakers will have 10 minutes and 5 minutes questions and comments. The first speaker is the hon. member for Halton—Peel. And next is Laval-Ouest.

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I would like to start off by congratulating the Minister of Finance on what he has been able to accomplish in this budget. It is an excellent, creative budget for disturbing times.

I would also like to congratulate the Minister of Finance for listening to the suggestions of many of my colleagues. Many members of Parliament in the Conservative caucus spent a long time offering suggestions to the Minister of Finance. Many of us were most happy and gratified to see that the minister did view a lot of those suggestions seriously.

This is a budget pretty well ideally suited for the times. When I say that I mean that the budget takes into account the fact that we are in a period of great economic uncertainty, that Canada has suffered a lot of unemployment, particularly over the past 18 to 24 months and that we are at the end, hopefully at the tail end, of what has been a long, tough recession for people. This budget sends out a message from the government, I hope it does, that none of us are suffering any illusions about the problems we now face as Canadians.

I am not going to stand up here today and say that the economy is getting better, that the budget is going to solve all the problems overnight and Canadians should have nothing but warm thoughts about the government. We have to be realistic. We have to make sure that we respond to people's very legitimate, real and human concerns these days. This is part of what this budget does.

Most of the criticism of the budget that I have seen has been that some of the critics of the government feel the budget did not contain enough stimulative measures to attack unemployment and that the government did not somehow come up with a lot of money instantly to create quick solutions. That seems to be the thrust of the criticism, that I have seen to date.

I would like to address that point directly and specifically because I think it is a criticism really lacking in validity. I do not think that those making those criticisms have really taken the time to understand what the budget is trying to do.

First, if we need to have any reassurance, it is impossible to spend one's way out of bad times and into good times. We only need to look at the recent experience of the Ontario government.

The last budget in Ontario of the government of NDP Premier Bob Rae was a classic textbook example of an attempt to spend your way from bad times to good times. What that budget tried to do was the following. First, it increased civil service salaries. In fact, the size of the bureaucracy in the province of Ontario has been expanded. Second, that budget had an over-all significant spending increase in it. The spending increase was more than twice the rate of inflation at the time the budget was brought down. It was a very expensive exercise.

There were major transfers of funds to municipalities and school boards and hospitals. Basically, a lot of extra money was borrowed in order that it could be spent. So much more money was borrowed by the Ontario government during that budget that the deficit exploded from under $3 billion a year to almost $10 billion. That was an unprecedented explosion in the deficit.

Deficits, as we all know in this House, are deferred taxes. A deficit is not just money borrowed somewhere that does not need to be paid back later. Deficits are deferred taxation. Ontario tried to increase the deficit to $10 billion and at the same time raise taxes by about $1 billion so all this money could go into government spending.

What was the result?

An hon. member: Just ask them.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): This was the kind of budget the critics are now criticizing the federal government for not having brought in. Therefore what were the results of the Ontario budget? The premier made a television address in January and told the whole province exactly what the results of his budget were. He admitted that it had not worked. The premier of Ontario said that in effect the economy of the province was going down instead of up as a direct result of his own economic policies, which he now quite rightly judges to have failed. Ontario now is facing a potential budget deficit not of $10 billion but of $14 billion in the coming fiscal year. The situation has gone from bad to much, much worse.

In the province of Ontario the government of the people has been forced into an austerity program. The premier has recognized that his stimulative budget did not work and now he needs to practise austerity. The premier has discovered what the federal government has already learned because the feds went through this process during the last recession of 1980, 1981 and 1982. At that time year over year spending was increased, the deficit was raised, and the debt was expanded in an attempt to spend our way out of bad times.

It did not work for Ontario in this recession. It did not work for Ottawa in the last recession. We learn from experience and example. The federal government now says that what we need to do today is to not repeat the mistakes of the past. We need to get people back to work. How do we do that? Not by repeating those other mistakes but by doing something fundamentally different. That is to create a promising economy that encourages investment. That is it.

We are trying to stimulate the economy through this budget and create jobs by creating confidence. That is the most important word today: confidence. That is what we are lacking.

I get distressed sitting in this Chamber listening to the critics of the government, such as the opposition member for Ottawa—Vanier who spoke a few minutes ago and focused most of his address on everything that is wrong. He focused on the existence of food banks, unemployment assistance and other examples of what is wrong in this economy which he was able to find, as were other critics.

I have a problem with those, opposition members and some media people, who have a stake in accentuating the negative about Canada right now. All that does is hurt the confidence necessary to restore investment to Canada.

I would like to talk specifically about this budget and the general theme of confidence. The budget does a lot not to solve any problems overnight but to move us a few steps along the path necessary to restore confidence to the economy.

For example, there are measures in this budget which will help encourage personal consumption by Canadians. They will encourage Canadians to get their money out of their bank accounts, spend it and help the economy. That is something the budget is trying to accomplish. We are doing that simply and primarily through a tax cut. Five hundred million dollars will be put into the hands of consumers this year as the personal surtax is cut. It is estimated that $1.2 billion will be returned to consumers next year through the tax cut. That is the first major thing this budget does to help restore confidence.

Second, we are trying to encourage people to get into the real estate market. This is pretty significant. I applaud everyone who for the last number of years has been trying to get a federal government to free up some of the pension funds invested in this country and get them put into the economy. The Canadian Real Estate Association, the premier of Ontario, the Leader of the Opposition, and a number of other Canadians have been trying to do that and they have finally succeeded. That is another confidence building measure.

Low interest rates and low inflation are two other points that help inspire some consumer confidence. On the business front this budget also specifically seeks to encourage investment by business people.

We will have a 2 per cent cut in the tax for manufacturers and processors. I think this is very important. Manufacturers and processors will also be able to write off the investment they have made in their equipment more quickly.

The Small Business Financing Program will enable people in business to borrow money at lower rates. Second, the ceiling on loans available to small businesses will be doubled.

I would like to say in conclusion that I almost consider this to be a dream budget. Many of the reasons why I came to Ottawa are contained in this budget: cut taxes, cut spending, cut the size of government, help the middle class through investments in their own homes, give them low mortgage rates so that their income is not sucked off in interest payments and help families. The child benefit helps families. There is tax fairness now. We will not have common law couples taxed at a lower rate than traditional families.

These are all goals that I had when I first stood for office. I am proud to support a budget that today encourages those goals, helps return some money to middle class Canadians and gives people a real sense that there is reason to be confident and that Canada now can really see a bright and powerful light at the end of the tunnel.

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to my colleague from across the way. He said that our party brings forward what is negative about the budget.

I wonder if he can enlighten me on what is positive about the budget. He does not talk about the food banks. We do. There are more McDonald's today than food banks. Even McDonald's has a commercial that says we are in tough times.

The budget does not do anything for the 1.5 million Canadians who are unemployed. The budget also shows that over the next two years we are going to be running at 10 per cent unemployment.

I have problems with that when I go and face people in my constituency. Parents come and tell me: "We have a few kids. We were both employed. We have our house. We were making our mortgage payments and our car payments and I was laid off. My unemployment is running out". I look at them and I do not have an answer. If this budget does not have answers for my constituents then I believe that the budget has failed.

We cannot help but see what this government has done over the past seven years. This budget is a repeat of the budgets of the past. In 1981 and 1982 I was a small businessman. I can assure members across the way that although we were in a recession we were able to survive. We fought our way out of it. Now businesses cannot fight their way out of it. They are saying enough is enough and they are folding. The bankruptcy rates have skyrocketed. In 1981 and 1982 they were not as high.

I know that the hon. member gave us some credit when we pushed for the RRSPs. I wonder if he agrees with me that we have to look at what is negative about the budget in order for us to bring the positive aspect out. Does he see one positive aspect in this budget when we have 1.5 million Canadians unemployed and when this budget clearly states that over the next two years our unemployment will be at 10 per cent? Does he agree with me that the Minister of Finance has failed us once again?

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I can be no more eloquent than my constituents.

Robert Beyette of Burlington wrote to me: "I suggest the Government of Canada run the business of the country and not the business of the people. All Canadians will win with less government. Bigger and more is not better". We have less government with this budget.

William Craig of Caledon East wrote: "I would like to see Canada get out of debt with tough measures. Re-educate and educate people to be in a position to compete globally". The budget does that.

Dave Stewart of Burlington wrote: "There will be a recovery. We are all part of the 90 per cent of Canadians surviving the recession". That is stressing the 90 per cent positive aspect not the 10 per cent negative. Mabel Mason is not a constituent. She is from Vancouver, B.C. She wrote: "To make things brighter and more secure the government should reduce taxes". The government has just reduced taxes in this budget.

Mr. Chris Creed of Burlington wrote: "I am concerned about the legacy we are leaving for generations to come". This budget is concerned about that legacy as well. It forecasts the deficit will fall to $27 billion next year, $22 billion the year after and $5.5 billion by 1995. That is reducing the legacy for generations to come.

John Beaumont of Bolton wrote: "You are suffering low polls due to taking strong measures to bring the deficit under control". He is right. The government is way down in the polls because the measures necessary to reduce the deficit and secure Canada's future have been tough. They have been brutally tough. No one on this side of the House is shying away from that. No one is less than proud of what we have done to address the problems that we inherited.

Mr. Guy Ricard (Laval-Ouest): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to thank my friend from Halton—Peel for sharing his time with me for this part of the debate.

When the Minister of Finance started to work on his budget, he looked at the facts this way: He looked at what we had in the past, the debts we had to pay, what we have now and what we should do for the future.

The debts that we had to pay are simply the national debt. As my colleague from Trois-Rivières explained briefly, the national debt now amounts to $420 billion. When we came to power in 1984, it was $206 billion. Compound interest is $239 billion over seven years and the government has a program operating surplus of $25 billion that can be taken from this expense item. We come up with a grand total of $420 billion. From there, the minister figured out how much he could collect in taxes and how much he should spend to meet the demand for programs. He tries to balance the budget. As you know, we have been unable to balance the budget for years, for the simple reason that we spend more than we receive. What is he trying to do? He is trying to cut spending as much as possible. Of course he will have to take the axe to something. Of course he will have to re-evaluate current programs, perhaps cancel some, try to do more with less, so that some day he can balance his budget.

When people tell us that we cut programs, or that we did not provide enough incentives for business, they should look at the key points in the budget. When we are told that people are hungry, that people want to work, that there are 1.5 million unemployed, I agree with that. Too many people are unemployed. To my mind, even one person without work is too many; everyone should work but sometimes unemployment is very high, which is an undesirable situation. Whether it is 1, 10, 15 or 25 per cent, I think that in some regions it is much too high, as we all know.

Now what are we doing to put all those people to work? Do we create federal government programs? Will the federal government hire 1.5 million people and pay them or will it try to give job creation incentives? Look at the highlights: action to bolster recovery, meaning economic recovery; reducing the personal income surtax; the home buyers' plan that allows using RRSPs to buy a first home. That will surely create jobs. More highlights: action for investment, initiative and jobs, manufacturing and processing. The manufacturing and processing tax rate will be reduced from 23 per cent to 22 per cent effective January 1, 1993, with a further reduction, to 21 per cent on January 1, 1994, that is 2 per cent in two years. If that is not an incentive I wonder what it is. The capital cost allowance rate will be increased for manufacturing and processing machinery from 25 to 30 per cent for machinery purchased after the budget date. This is another 5 per cent. Direct investment in all sectors will be encouraged by negotiating reciprocal agreements with Canada's trading partners, in order to reduce the withholding tax rate on direct dividends to 5 per cent.

Research and development: an additional $230 million over the next five years. Lifetime capital gains: eliminated. Small business: the government will provide a small business financing program until the end of 1992, to help small businesses in financial difficulty, including farmers, to obtain loans at lower interest rates and so on and so on. I will not bore you with an exhaustive list, because I am sure you are familiar with these details. However, the incentives are there. If companies can upgrade their equipment at low cost, train their work force and acquire new technology, this will create jobs, it will get people back to work, and we will not have the problems we have now. An unemployment rate of 10 per cent may be better than 25 per cent, but it would be a lot better if we had only 3 per cent unemployment. It would be even better if we had zero per cent, and that is our objective with this budget.

I hear people on the other side criticizing the budget. Yesterday I heard the hon. member for Essex—Windsor say, in referring to the NDP's policy in Ontario, that the Government of Ontario was concerned about people, not about industry. He neglected to say, however, that the Government of Ontario increased its deficit by $9 billion, which is what happened. Putting people first is all very well, and I certainly want to help people, but I will not help them by using band-aid solutions. I will help them if I create a climate that is conducive to creating jobs and taking care of their family.

As far as economic recovery and research and development factors are concerned, it has been a long time since businesses in this country did their fair share of research and development. They relied on what they could get from governments, and I am referring to the federal government and the provinces, to obtain technology transfers and to buy technology instead of making it. They even bought technology abroad. They even asked the federal government to set up an agency to prospect for technology outside the country, and facilitate the process of looking for technology outside Canada. We did not renew our equipment and we thought this would go on forever.

If you consider the problems facing the pulp and paper industry in this country, that is exactly what happened. How come the Americans can produce a ton of paper more cheaply than we can here in Canada? Because they went back to school. They did research and development.

In this budget we see that we have a surplus of $230 million for the next five years. Now you will say this is not enough, and I agree. We should have a billion. Can we afford to spend a billion dollars on research and development in 1992, with the kind of financial constraints we have? Are Canadian businesses able at this time to take the technological plunge and invest this billion dollars in research and development? I do not think so. I think we have to encourage them, give them incentives the way we are doing now for research and development, but we should not expect every business in this country to start doing research and development tomorrow morning. It just is not true, and that is not how things work.

There are two kinds of research: applied research and pure research. It all takes time and it takes a bit of logistics to get there, but it is a step in the right direction. I am glad to see this happening. I asked the Minister of Finance during one of our consultations whether it would be possible to increase budgets for research and development. He told me he would try, but there were a lot of constraints. I said it was just as important as a grant for buying machinery, for instance. In any case, he remembered what I said, and I am very glad he did, but the fact remains that we will have to put a lot of effort into this for later on.

We might not see the results, but our children and grand children who will follow in our footsteps, here is politics or in business, will see them. They will be building the future. We have to pave the way for them. We should all join hands. All members in this House should work toward the same end. We talked about positive and negative things this morning, but I wish, keeping in mind that it is the future of our children, that the criticisms would be positive I would accept them if they were constructive. They would tend to the same goals of progress, development and competitiveness in order to give our children the future they deserve.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member with interest. He indicated that we must have a positive outlook. It is very difficult for the 1.5 million people who are unemployed to have a positive outlook after this budget.

I particularly want to question the member about what this budget has done to students because he failed to mention that area.

As we all know, this government has been extremely hard on students. It brought in the GST and it even taxed books. It added an extra cost for a student going to university or any institution.

The government has cut the Established Program Funding to provinces. We all know how that affected the student. That cut made tuition costs go up.

There have been cuts to student employment programs, and the list goes on and on and on.

This budget, which you would think would introduce something positive for students, abolishes the six-month free interest period on student loans after graduation. Does the government not realize that 1.5 million people are unemployed, that jobs are very scarce for students? It is very hard for our young people to find a job or a position after graduation.

I want to ask whether the hon. member agrees with me that it is time for this government to stop attacking students?

[Translation]

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I would like to say very simply that in the budget—I do not have the full text here, only the main points—the education credit relief for tax is being increased from $60 to $80 per month of full-time study, starting in 1992. Second, the maximum tuition fee and education credits that may be claimed by another taxpayer will be increased from $600 to $680.

We are talking about the 1992 budget. You might recall that a few years ago we set up a program called Challenge, which allowed students to be employed in their field of study in order to make some money before going back to school. This is not a new policy. This is not something we copied from someone else. This is the continuation of a policy designed by this government in 1984. I do not see why some people are trying to scare students by telling them that everything will be cut.

[English]

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to compliment the finance minister. I happen to think that he has crafted a splendid budget meeting many needs of Canadians.

He listened and I can recall discussions with him in the early to late fall. Some of my objectives were to make sure that we got that deficit down. My goal was the $25 billion to $27 billion range. Canadians wanted to see more results after what they have gone through. He then came in with a $27.5 billion deficit.

I also asked the minister a question in the House about giving middle income earners a tax break. I specifically pointed to the surtax we introduced in 1985.

I am just delighted that he followed through on that issue by decreasing it from five per cent to three per cent.

Third, my constituents told me that this government must make another major reduction in expenses and the minister came through on that issue in a fine way.

I wanted to ask my colleague about the feedback he has received from his residents. I held my annual budget breakfast yesterday morning in Markham and the feedback from the 350 people in attendance was very positive. They were literally to a person, with a few exceptions, very strongly in favour and 200 out of the 350 people were high school students through corporate sponsorships.

Mr. Brewin: Anybody out of work?

Mr. Attewell: I hear my NDP friend talking. We are certainly at opposite angles to Bob Rae. He is building the biggest hole, the biggest deficit for people in Ontario we could imagine.

Will this budget stimulate the economy? Yes, it will. I would like to ask my colleague about what feedback he has heard. I am sure it is nothing like the rhetoric we have heard on the other side.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member has 30 seconds to answer that.

Mr. Ricard: It is pretty good feedback. I received 17 telephone calls and 15 of them were in favour of the budget. The two others said that they did not yet know if they would support it. That is 93 or 95 per cent support.

Mr. Attewell: That is pretty good.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate on the 1992 budget and to put on the record my views, those of my party and those of my constituents from Victoria.

I would like to first comment on the budget itself. There is some good news in the budget. It is not all bad. I applaud the modest efforts the government has made to improve the management of government and the savings that it expects to get from that. That is always in order and will have support on all sides of the House.

We cannot help but support the decrease in the personal surcharge, but only as far as it goes. The move will only produce $2 per year for a single parent with two children. It produces something in the order of $19 a year for the average Canadian family and $116 a year for those whose incomes are over $100,000. It is a typical Conservative approach to tax reduction and is simply not satisfactory. However, to the extent that there is any relief at all from personal taxes in the budget it has our support.

As for the RRSP provisions, I think that when people look at them very carefully they will find that it is not the assistance they thought it would be. The repayments to the scheme that are required will be from taxable income. Therefore, the effect is that a person is simply borrowing from one's own RRSP, if one has an RRSP. Generally banks and other financial institutions will make that credit available in any event. There will be a modest savings in interest payments, but that is all. However, as far as it goes, it has our support.

Let me turn to the fundamentals of the budget. The budget left in the hands of the corporate sector in this country over $1 billion in business exemptions, primarily for entertainment, lunches and so forth. The government abjectly failed to tackle the issue of corporate giveaways in our tax laws. There is nothing in this budget for those who have already lost their jobs or their businesses as a result of the government's economic policies and the economic transformation this country is undergoing. Right across the country, Canadians are hurting and hurting badly. Whatever else was in this budget, it should have provided fairness and help for those who are suffering as a result of economic dislocation in Canada. The budget was silent.

The budget provided virtually nothing for job creation, and to the extent that it provided anything at all in the way of a stimulus for the economy it was misfocused, misguided and misdirected.

Unemployment will be admittedly left at over 10 per cent of the work force in the coming fiscal year. That figure is probably optimistic if past record is any sign. The government is reducing by $100 million the funds available to Canadian Jobs Strategy, one of the most successful programs in my constituency in Victoria, and presumably in other constituencies across Canada.

This budget marks no change from the failed economic strategy of this government. In fact, the budget document itself is filled with self-congratulations. We just heard it again from the member who spoke a few minutes ago.

Since 1984 this government has been leading the country to the brink of economic, social and political disaster step by step. It has done so by in large measure following the policies of the predecessor government. Despite all the rhetoric, the fundamental policies of both the Liberals and the Conservatives over the last 15 to 20 years have been in the same direction. This has left nearly a million children in Canada in poverty. In one of the richest lands in the world children are in poverty.

There remain terrible conditions on some of our native reserves and in many other communities across Canada. For hundreds of thousands of individuals the country is already experiencing economic disaster. As hopes disappear, incomes disappear and with that comes a rise in social tensions, family tensions, marital breakdowns, alcoholism, and crime rates, as well as continuing pressure on the social structures and fabric of this country.

This government must be held accountable, as should its predecessors, for the squandering of the resources that we have been given in Canada. The budget specifically continues to erode federal government support for education and health programs. It eliminates, finally and officially, the family allowance program which has been an important part of our social structures in Canada and a statement of our community's understanding that children are important and that we as a community are prepared to support the children of this country.

This government has said in this budget and in the accompanying statements that its solemn commitment to the people of Canada to establish a national child care program is dead. It has killed that program with this budget, and with it one of the most critical elements in rebuilding a sense of society and community in Canada.

The budget has eliminated the Science Council of Canada, the Economic Council of Canada, the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security, and the Canada Race Relations Institute. That last one is a particularly grievous breach of commitment by this government to Japanese Canadians and others in this country. Just before the last election the government made much of its reconciliation with Japanese Canadians who were treated so abysmally during the Second World War. When it made that commitment it had the support of this party and all sides of the House. It was righting a long-standing wrong. Part of the commitment it gave the Japanese Canadian community was that it would put up money for race relations which would be matched by the Japanese Canadian community. The Japanese Canadian community has kept its part of the bargain but this government has in this budget reneged on its solemn agreement.

The budget implements the Conservative strategy and philosophy on the economy. Let me set out my understanding of that policy and that understanding.

The key element of the Conservative philosophy, which is again self-praised throughout the budget, is that of driving inflation down as close to zero as it can get. Economist after economist has said that is a disastrous strategy and we are now seeing the results of that strategy. It has driven up the Canadian dollar. It has put our export industries in jeopardy. It has actually increased the deficit.

Half of the federal government debt in Canada today is due to the interest rates the government pays on the deficit. Only 6 per cent, I should add, is the result of operating spending by government. This government, by driving up interest rates to pursue an ideological ivory tower approach to the economy in the interests of trying to get inflation down, is destroying the Canadian economy and with it putting unbearable pressures on Canadian society.

Dr. Clarence Barber of the University of Victoria gave a very interesting speech in October 1991 in which he outlined in detail the impact of a zero inflation policy imposed by the Governor of the Bank of Canada, John Crow, with the full and enthusiastic support of this government.

The second element of the government's policy is the trickle down theory, that somehow if you help the rich the economy is going to get better. This government has helped the rich and well to do. It has hammered individual families. The GST cost individual families $570 a year. Since this government took office, individual families are now paying an additional $1,530 a year in taxes. Yet, on the other side of the coin, the corporations have been relieved.

The effect of all of this, the third element of the government's policy, is the privatization of government, the reduction of government as a partner in the economic future of this country. It is increasingly turning power over to the private sector and to the large, rich and powerful in the private sector. With that has come the decreased standard of living of people in this country.

Over and over again, economists have made it clear that it is far better to maintain a moderate level of inflation and tackle the problems of employment and unemployment than it is to have an ideological commitment to drive inflation down.

We in this party say that there is a key and important role for government as a partner in the economic and social development of a country, a partner with business and with labour.

The government is fond of discussing Canada's position in the international economy, but look at what its policies have led to: higher unemployment, losses of investment to the United States and elsewhere, destroying communities right across Canada, the growth siphoned off to pay for borrowing from foreign sources, a failure to diversify trade by putting all our eggs in the U.S. basket, failing to back global enterprises which are competitive and to insist in retooling the manufacturing industries in this country.

The government has step by step dismantled the shipbuilding industry in Canada. It is destroying the forest industry in Canada. It has cut back further, despite all the pleas, on research and development and most grievous of all, it has consistently reduced the money available for education and training.

Health and education spending, for example, dropped in the last full budget year by 10 per cent and defence spending has gone up. The priorities of this government, particularly now that the cold war is over, are backward.

Part of the government strategy is to drive down wages in the name of productivity. We have just seen this very week that one of the most productive car plants in North America, the GM plant in St. Catharines, is being closed despite the fact of its productivity, as part of a corporate, political decision made by its American owners. This government was silent and ineffective in its response to that.

The strategy has failed even on the terms the government itself has set down from the beginning and that is that the deficit is all important. Under this government the federal deficit has increased from $234 billion in 1985 to $420 billion in 1991. The government peddles the myth of the deficit. Look what it has done. It built a new embassy in Tokyo on lands worth $5 billion to $6 billion. It has handed out capital gains exemptions worth $11 billion in the last seven years.

In the next five years the corporate giveaways in this budget alone are worth $2 billion to $3 billion, unproductive to the future of the economy and to the creation of jobs, but $2 billion or $3 billion to the corporate sector in this country.

In failure to collect taxes alone the government is losing billions and billions of dollars. The last figures that I have are for 1987 when there was $16 billion in uncollected corporate taxes. Tax holidays originally handed out by the Liberal government and continued by this government have cost the Canadian taxpayer over the last 10 to 15 years $40 billion.

The government has done nothing to address private debt in this country. It talks about public debt and the ideological interest of driving down the role of government in our society, but is silent on the fact that private business has a debt in this country equal virtually to that of the public sector, $406 billion. The reality is the federal deficit as a percentage of Gross Domestic Product has declined from 8.8 per cent in 1985 to 4.4 per cent in the most recent year. Government spending as a percentage of GDP has reduced from 23.9 per cent to 21.9 per cent.

Japan invariably runs a higher deficit than Canada, and its international record is overwhelming. Public sector wages held up by this government last year as the problem represent merely 9.2 per cent of the federal budget, and on and on it goes. What we now have to do is turn our attention to an alternative approach to building a fair, just and prosperous Canada so that we can play our part in the world.

The other night there was a CBC Town Hall on television. It was fascinating watching the responses there from across this country. Out of that I jotted down a few thoughts of my own that might make an approach, a beginning to building the kind of economic policies that I think can hold this country together. The first and foremost is honesty in government. We have to start there. The government's budget in a number of areas was simply dishonest. We must start with honesty in government and begin trusting the people and listening to the people.

Second, we must begin at the community base and support community based initiatives. Some of the most dramatic success stories in Canada have happened at the community and municipal level. We have some from Victoria where the local Greater Victoria Development Economic Commission has had a number of projects which have led to a very impressive record in our community.

Third, we must support the leading edge industries in Canada so that they can be competitive internationally.

Fourth, we must not give up on the manufacturing sector. Leo Girard of the steelworkers made that point very succinctly in the town hall meeting and I think it is an excellent one. We still have a future in manufacturing if our government is prepared to back it, a future in shipbuilding, a future in the forest industry, particularly through secondary manufacturing instead of shipping jobs offshore.

Fifth, we must begin to build and rebuild the safety net for those who are caught in the dislocation that is happening in our economy. We are undergoing a transition. Some of that is global. Some of it is brought about by the government's policies. In either case communities, individuals and families need the support of all of us as Canadians, as a Canadian family when they are undergoing the dislocations. If it means we, as members of Parliament, have to cut back on our salaries and expenses, we should be prepared to do so. It also must mean that those who are rich and wealthy in our society must be required to cut back on their privileges: presidents who are making over $1 million a year with double that in privileges, stock options and all the rest.

Sixth, we need an effective capital works program as proposed by the governments of B.C. and Ontario. It is a tragedy that this government has let that opportunity go by. In my community of Victoria, for example, we need a sewage treatment system. The federal government must contribute to that to make it a reality. We need fair working conditions. We need a new trade deal. We need a progressive tax system. We need an efficient Public Service, not beating up on the public servants in this country, but drawing the public servants into an effective management and an effective delivery of service to the people. An effective Public Service and an efficient Public Service is essential to the development of our economy and to our society.

Auditors, for example, for every dollar spent on auditors we can raise $17 billion from corporate tax evasion or avoidance.

Finally, we must put money into Official Development Assistance and in the environment. This government has cut $75 million out of the green plan and has eliminated the Canadian Environmental Advisory Committee. Official Development Assistance, improving the lot of people overseas, particularly in the Third World, is an important long-run investment in the Canadian economy. Not only will it develop support for Canada overseas, but by increasing the standard of living elsewhere then we will improve our own.

This is a budget which does not do the job. There are alternatives and the time has come for Canada to move in a new direction.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, in relation to what the member had to say, I would like to congratulate him in one sense. He does recognize that the debt position of the government, our deficit position in relation to Gross Domestic Product, has improved remarkably in the last number of years. He mentioned the figure now being at 4 per cent deficit in relation to Gross Domestic Product and just four or five years ago those figures were in the order of 8 per cent. I congratulate him for recognizing that.

In relation to what he has just mentioned in regard to town hall meetings and what he would like to see happen to the Canadian economy, I would tell the member that 90 per cent of what is on his list we are already doing or have already achieved. What he has to do is pick out those specifics that we have not addressed. If you go through that list, I think you will agree that we are working on about 90 per cent of that.

I wanted to mention the Canadian dollar because the member mentioned the value of the Canadian dollar, I guess suggesting that we would be better off with a lower Canadian dollar and suggesting that the Canadian dollar is artificially high. I want to refer the member to a study done by Swiss Bank Incorporated.

In that study, they measured the value of the Canadian dollar, what they call the PPP, the price purchasing parity of the Canadian dollar in relation to other currencies. Specifically in relation to the American currency, their conclusion is that the Canadian dollar is not over-valued. If you want to get down to the very fine-tuning of the Canadian dollar, they say there might be a difference of a cent or less, based on what the Canadian dollar was in the late fall of 1991 which then was in the 88 to 89 cent range. The dollar having dropped four cents or more, I think we can all argue quite conclusively that the dollar is where it should be.

I guess it would be up to the member to tell us or suggest what the level of the Canadian dollar should be. We cannot rely on a weak Canadian dollar to pull the Canadian economy around. The Canadian economy is on sound footing. The fundamentals are there. They are correct. That, in a sense, is what is giving us that strong Canadian dollar. I think it is a strong compliment to the Minister of Finance and the government of the day.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, the Canadian dollar in 1986 was around 72 cents and went up to 89 cents to the U.S. dollar in 1991. It has dropped a little bit as the member noted.

The fact remains in my community of Victoria which depends on tourism, on the forest industry, on exports and so forth, that the policy John Crow and this government has followed is a disaster. It is a disaster, and the proof is in the pudding. Right across this country communities are devastated by the economic policies of this government.

The member mentioned town hall meetings. During the break, I had an opportunity to meet with hundreds of people in Victoria and with many, many groups there. I began a process of discussing with them the development of federal economic policies that might enhance the economic long-term future of our community.

I would like to take the opportunity to put on the record some of the ideas that have developed.

The shipbuilding industry is one I have already mentioned. It does provide high quality jobs, but it needs government support. This government is one of the few in the western world that does not provide effective support for shipbuilding. It has allowed that support to vanish. We had the Polar 8 cancelled on us despite the firm commitment of the government. That was unfortunate.

We want to see fair funding for the Commonwealth Games instead of having the government renege on the commitments that it has made.

We want to see a new harbour management system in Victoria so that that great asset of Victoria can be used effectively for our future.

We need new customs facilities. The government has consistently ignored that. It is important that we get those in shape particularly in time for the Commonwealth Games.

We need sewage treatment as I mentioned earlier. It is very important for our environment and for our international image.

We need the government to restore its role in the funding of education and health programs, major employers in Victoria. They are making a major contribution to our community and our country: the University of Victoria, Camosun College, and the hospital, which is one of the best in the country.

Finally, cultural and social programs are very important in our community. We do not get our share and it is time we did.

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, we all have seen what happened in Ontario when the New Democratic Party came into power. It ballooned our deficit by about $14 billion.

I would like to ask a question of the member. Since 1984 when this government came into power, we had 33 tax increases, including the GST which devastated our country. We had free trade with the United States which created 350,000 job losses. The jobs were just sucked away in the United States.

Now this government is talking about free trade with Mexico which is going to devastate our country once again. The Americans are against it; Bush is trying to avoid it because of elections.

My concern is that although the NDP in this House is voicing a concern, its provincial governments are not standing up. The premier of B.C. and the premier of my province of Ontario, who we know is doing a disastrous job, are not standing up to the federal government and saying: "Look, enough is enough. Thirty-three tax increases. So many people unemployed, so many jobs lost. This budget is clearly not looking after the 1.5 million Canadians who are unemployed".

It is forecasting 10 per cent unemployment over the next two years. In the city of Toronto, in greater metropolitan Toronto, we need new infrastructure programs. It has been killing our city and this government has been totally ignoring it.

I know that the member comes from the western province of British Columbia which is a terrific province. In that province there is a New Democratic government.

My question is: Will he go back to that province and speak to his colleagues in the other provinces where they have elected New Democratic governments so that they will stand up to this Prime Minister? Or is he just going to pay lip service like Bob Rae is doing in Ontario? Are they going to do the same thing, a ballooning of the deficit? Are their programs once again going to balloon the deficit.

Clearly the $14 billion that we have in Ontario does not wash. Is the NDP paying lip service, or does it really care about the Canadian people?

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, it is interesting how the Liberals want to continue to play politics with these important issues and ignore the facts.

First of all, the economic problems in Ontario were visited upon that government by the programs put in place by the previous Liberal government and by the level of transfers from this federal government to all provincial governments, particularly Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia.

The Rae government in Ontario is making a major effort to ensure that the problems of dislocation are not borne simply by the least fortunate in our society, but are borne fairly by all in the community of Ontario.

The member refers to the previous policies of this government. Let me take the opportunity, in the minute or two I have left, to just put on record another area in which this budget is deficient.

That is in the area of defence, of which I am the spokesperson for our party. The defence budget now is 40 per cent higher in real terms than it was in the early 1980s. This budget, contrary to the impression the government intended to create, actually increases defence spending in the coming year by $150 million and a further $400 million in 1993–94.

The government is taking the correct step in withdrawing our forces from Europe as a result of the changes of the cold war, but it is taking most of that money and applying it to the defence budget without a serious review of roles for our defence forces in North America.

There is nothing mentioned here about NORAD and the $500 million we spend there. In fact, the budget actually provides for $140 million in modernization of NORAD despite the end of the cold war.

There is no review of our coastal patrol functions and how they should be changed. There is no review of our capital spending.

There is nothing concrete done about closing bases across Canada, where the government privately concedes hundreds of millions of taxpayers' dollars are being wasted in keeping bases open that have outlived their usefulness.

Those bases should be closed in full consultation with the communities involved and there should be support for the individuals and families who have to undergo transition. But the fact remains that the government has ducked its responsibilities in this area at huge costs to the Canadian taxpayer.

The government does not even make a commitment to sell the lands in Downsview, in the heart of Toronto, which have no more military function that is needed and can be used for social housing and for other needed community facilities.

So the government has neglected its responsibilities in the defence area. It is not taking a tough position in view of the end of the cold war.

The time has come for a peace dividend for this country. It is a shame the government did not proceed with it.

[Translation]

M. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I take part in this debate on the budget the hon. Minister of Finance has just tabled. Even more so since this budget reflects the good advice the minister has receved not only from his colleagues and fellow members of this House but also from people throughout Canada. Is there one member, who has not heard our fellow citizens express their opinion, their concern and even their anger at times about the way the Federal government manages its finances? The minister has attempted to gather all these comments, suggestions and criticism from various sources as I mentioned and to consolidate them in what, I am happy to say, turned out to be a truly remarkable budget.

I must say, that this budget is the end result of much preliminary work. Let me explain. The budget before us today is one for growth and recovery. This would have never been possible had we not managed to first bring inflation under control. We will remember that 20 years ago inflation had reached 15 and 18 per cent in Canada. In those days interest rates were between 17 and 20 per cent. There would have been no use, in my opinion, to come up with a budget such as this one four, five or six years ago because inflation had to be brought down before interest rates could come down. Just when we need it, here comes this new budget. A happy ending to all the problems created by galloping inflation and high interest rates which have now levelled off at such a low rate that it is the envy of a great many nations.

We have desirable interest rates and low inflation, which now enable us to restore the back of confidence in our economy. This is what this budget is all about: restoring a climate of confidence for the people, the consumers, the small investors who have gone through rough times and of course the foreign investors. That is what we should focus on. I would like to take the time I have left to emphasize the positive aspects of this budget. I see this budget as very reassuring in terms of economic recovery. I will go into specifics in a moment. I also see it as fair for Canadian taxpayers, as well as thrifty and inexpensive in strict budgetary terms. Those are the three angles from which I will evaluate this budget.

Let us talk about the budget as it is designed to stimulate economic recovery in Canada. Canadian taxpayers and consumers will first benefit from a reduction of 1 per cent of the surtax, which will put close to $500 million in the taxpayers' pockets, and that money will be used again to buy consumer goods. If that $500 million is put back into circulation this will of course generate new confidence. Also consumers will benefit from the program allowing them to use their RRSPs to gain access to property, which is a right. Canadians will be able to use the pension fund they have set up through their hard work. They will be able to make a dream come true and borrow up to $20,000 from their own fund which amount they will later put back in their plan over a period of 15 years. This will also increase economic momentum and generate confidence. When things go well in the building trade, the go well everywhere. Those are two examples at the consumer level and we will be able to mention others. In fact this budget is full of initiatives.

However, economic recovery cannot rely on consumers only. Investors also have to step in, and we are talking about investors that are capable of providing a financial push, but in a very sound economic climate. Here again, there will be a tax reduction of 1 per cent. There will also be, among other things, an increase of the capital cost allowance rate on their machinery. This will give an opportunity to increase production by replacing machinery that is now obsolete, fragile, old and that should be replaced for the sake of competitiveness and productivity. Again this will help Canadian consumption.

I believe the Minister of Finance showed that he was extremely receptive to our productive labour force by providing it with the means and the stimulants necessary to work and to make work, and that is the most important thing. There is no point in investing billions of dollars to increase services if a climate of confidence has not been generated. We had to demonstrate that inflation was under control. We had to demonstrate also that interest rates would go down, and we have achieved that. Now, this climate of confidence can be generated and it is with that objective in mind that one must look at the budget. There will be no overnight miracle. It is a long-term approach that is in fact totally different from the approach in budgets of seven, ten and fifteen years ago. I agree that those budgets provided for massive investments, but the objectives were always short-term and this unfortunately led us to stagnation and successive deficits that have contributed to the debt we now have.

Beyond this recovery and the climate of confidence that it generates, I also see in this budget a more equitable vision towards society, the family and the human being. The budget heralds positive social changes. Beyond the tax reduction that every taxpayer will enjoy, there is support to the family, thanks to this very audacious reform of family allowances which will now be paid in one cheque, in a single contribution.

We will help families who cannot make ends meet in these hard times. Poor, economically vulnerable families will find in that single monthly benefit of $143 per child, more than $1,700 a year, a boost to their well-being and to the improvement of their living standard.

That is another vital aspect of this budget we must remember. Of course, the home ownership measure will produce a sense of security, of economic progress and will also create for our families, our children, a better living environment, a new quality of life.

Thirdly, Mr. Speaker, this budget costs little. Of course we could have spent billions more, we could have added expenses to the deficit and transferred the whole thing to the debt. We could have done all that, but our concern, our priorities do not reside in this short-term view based on spending billions and billions; quite to the contrary, we wish to arouse a sense of effort, an enthusiasm for more competitive communities through dignity in our families.

The third aspect of this budget is that it is economical. We had to give it some thought and make internal transformations so that our population could strive at getting better living conditions and a better outlook on life. In this regard, we had decisions to make. For example, we had to eliminate a total of 46 government agencies in order to get the money we will be distributing to people. What I mean, is that the budget contains cuts but the amounts saved are given back to the people who need it, through other equitable and fair measures or programs. Of course, as some people said, the cuts could have been more severe.

But first, the government had to retarget those cuts to make them efficient and to give some dignity to Canadian families. Therefore, I see this budget as a responsible measure that really addresses the problems and, most of all, that does not compromise the future of our community.

As a matter of fact, the day after the budget, I saw some very interesting things, Mr. Speaker. We can always be accused of partisanship, but on February 25, I read in The Globe and Mail an editorial entitled "A Good Recipe For Tough Times". It is a good headline. It reflects the ingenuity that the minister demonstrated in his budget, and I quote:

[English]

"Finance Minister Mazankowski faced a number of challenges as he prepared his first budget. He has credibly addressed each of the challenges without succumbing to the ill-considered advice of provincial premiers and others who demanded that Ottawa try to spend its way out of the recession. Mr. Mazankowski has found ways to intelligently support a recovery".

That is a responsible government. There is another title on which I could elaborate with su.cessive quotes. Mr. Dubuc, of La Presse, entitled his editorial "Wilson's Iron Hand, Mazankowski's Velvet Glove". And there are many more. People are just expressing their satisfaction with regards to how, in a long-term strategy, despite all the difficulties, this government has been able to control inflation, lower interest rates and put itself in a position to restore confidence.

Another headline: "Budget Brings Confidence, Business Community Seems Encouraged." I used those quotes to show without any partisanship, that some people see this budget as a responsible and courageous measure.

In closing I want to say to all Canadians that to govern does not mean only to look after tomorrow's needs. It means to think about the Canadian family 10 years from now, to improve the quality of life, of the environment, of education and of work conditions. It is in that perspective that the government tabled this budget. Again I am proud to be part of this government because it was able to take its responsibilities.

EDUCATION

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, once again students are being hurt by this government's policies. The budget abolishes the six month interest free period on student loans after graduation. This will place students deeper in debt as they prepare to launch their careers.

The federal government seems to be oblivious to the fact that its economic policies have made jobs scarce for students. It seems intent on making it as difficult as possible for students to get started in their careers.

With the GST on books, the fact that $800 million will be cut in transfers for education and health this year and cuts to student employment programs, one would think this government has gouged students enough.

I call on this government to recognize that if our country is to be competitive, if our workforce is to succeed, if our economy is to prosper, the federal government will need to stop attacking students with its policies and start assisting them.

AIR–SEA RESCUE

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, during the 1988 election campaign the government promised that it would locate a fisheries patrol and air–sea rescue helicopter in southwestern Nova Scotia. Shortly after the election Tom Siddon delivered on that promise and the helicopter came to Yarmouth.

During the last three years the helicopter has had a profound impact in deterring fisheries violations in the Scotia–Fundy region. As well, there are a number of fishermen alive today who owe their lives to the existence of that helicopter.

Now the contract is up for renewal. One hears that there is a push from officials in Ottawa to discontinue the helicopter service. In the strongest terms possible I urge the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and the Minister of National Defence not to yield to these recommendations.

The helicopter service must remain in Yarmouth. The lives of Nova Scotia fishermen must not be put on the chopping block.

THE BUDGET

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, in the budget the government recognized on the one hand the end of the cold war by announcing the withdrawal of all Canadian forces stationed with NATO in Europe. Yet on the other hand the government failed to deliver on the peace dividend that the historic events in Europe required.

In this budget the government is actually increasing defence spending by $150 million in the upcoming year, by $400 million next year, while it cuts the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security, cuts Official Development Assistance, cuts $75 million from the green plan. The government is actually increasing spending on capital projects under the defence budget. This is simply bizarre.

The time has come for the government to take a new look at the role of Canadian forces in the post cold war period, to cancel the NORAD agreement, to come up with a new role on our coasts and to begin to produce a peace dividend to deal with global poverty, the global environmental crisis and a new approach to—

Mr. Speaker: The member's time has expired.

MINING EXPLORATION

Mr. Guy Saint–Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the Association des prospecteurs du Québec is very disappointed with this budget in which the government did not take into account any of the fiscal measures suggested by the association in order to restore funding for mining exploration in Quebec and in Canada. Since the elimination of the Canadian Exploration Incentive Program in February 1990 the federal government does not think that the mining exploration activity, and hence the mining industry is a key component in the economic development of our resource areas and of Canada.

If Canada wants to remain one of the world leaders in the mining industry, the government will have to realize that the mining industry knows no boundary and that it operates in the countries offering the best conditions for its development. Canada now has an effective and competitive mining industry, which needs further support from the government to keep playing a major role in the global economy.

Mr. Speaker, the federal government keeps the flow-through shares intact and must sign, as soon as possible, a Canada-Quebec subsidiary agreement for the mineral sector of Chapais-Chibougamau, and one for the other mineral sectors in the Abitibi-Témiscamingue area.

PORNOGRAPHY

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, the judgment this morning by the Supreme Court of Canada on pornography constitutes a victory for Canadian women and children. The highest court has recognized that there is a link between hard core pornography depicting women and children in violent, degrading and dehumanizing acts, and violence against women and children.

It has ruled that the undue exploitation of sex and the degradation of human sexuality is harmful toward those involved in such acts and to society in general. Consequently it violates the principles of equality and dignity.

The court has also acknowledged that the message of obscene materials is analogous to that of hate propaganda. Women can also claim victory because the court has recognized that a solution to the problem needs a multi-pronged approach. In the words of the judges, "education and legislation are not alternatives but complements in addressing such problems".

Today the government cancelled the Court Challenges Program, thereby shutting out many women and many minorities from the judicial process. Today, the news from the court was good, tomorrow the opportunities will be gone.

NATIONAIR

Mr. Gilbert Chartrand (Verdun—Saint-Paul): Mr. Speaker, for several months some people have been desperately trying in bad faith to ruin the reputation of Nationair, a Montreal firm which hires more than 1,800 workers. Lately the daily newspaper The Gazette has published an awful article, written by Mr. Mackintosh about the crash of a Nationair aircraft in Saudi Arabia. Everyone in the business and most of all the unions know very well that the company has nothing to be blamed for. Somehow Nationair fights a lonely battle against some vipers whose only goal is to destroy it.

I am wondering if this is not a conspiracy against a Quebec company. More than a thousand jobs are at risk in this whole thing, which is pretty sordid. What are the people concerned waiting for to make a public announcement that Nationair is as safe as any other air carrier in Canada?

As a member of Parliament from the Montreal region, it is my duty to protect those jobs. The Nationair employees need support. As far as I am concerned, I trust them and I travel with Nationair.

MACEDONIA

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, I am rising to bring forward concerns that have been raised across this country in light of the Prime Minister's meeting of January 27 with Mr. Gligorov who is representing one of the newly independent states created out of the remains of Yugoslavia.

This coming Saturday thousands of Canadians will be rallying on Parliament Hill to express their concerns over the situation in what is being called Macedonia.

I and many other Canadians have a problem with this new state, which is provoking unrest with its claims of Greek territory and giving aid to groups which advocate civil unrest.

I would like to ask the intentions of the Prime Minister in regard to official recognition of this country by Canada. I would also like to ask that this government today give assurances to this House and to the half million Canadians of Greek descent that prior to extending recognition to this area the government will get assurances from Mr. Gligorov that his government's intentions toward Greece and other neighbouring countries will not be the cause of future problems.

WITH GLOWING HEARTS

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, this coming Sunday evening, March 1 at 7 p.m. on the CTV television network across Canada, Canadians will view a program called With Glowing Hearts. This show celebrates our country's national anthem O Canada and the outstanding artists and recording stars who recently made possible this new and spectacular version of the anthem.

I urge everybody to watch this and reflect on how great a country we have in this our 125th year.

Let me take this opportunity to salute the proud Canadians who made all this possible. Ross Carlin, Bryan Lyon, Hayward Parrott and Eric Robertson began this journey of patriotism. Along the way we were joined by some corporate leaders of vision, namely Canada Post, Coca-Cola, Canadian National, Ford Motor Company, Prudential Insurance and Maclean Hunter. It has been my extreme pleasure to have been associated with all of these outstanding people and corporations.

THE BUDGET

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, we soon enter the 21st century. Would the government please leave the tar sands and join the rest of us.

I share the outrage of women all across Canada. For women, the Conservative budget means no to pay equity, no to equality, know your place. The arbitrary date this government has set for pay equity is costing 70,000 women $1 billion. This government just refuses to listen.

It eliminates advisory boards and councils. It dismisses the rulings of the Human Rights Commission. It threatens legislation to circumvent the courts.

Today Court Challenges, the very program which fights for equality, is to be phased out.

As we speak human rights groups are gathering here to protest.

This government would rather pay lip service than pay fairly. This government would rather pay for food, drinks and escort services than pay equality. This government is saying no to equality. This government is saying no to democracy. And this government is saying no to Canadian women.

NATIONAIR

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Laval-Est): Mr. Speaker, the 450 Nationair crew members who are locked out since November 19 are victims of a fool's deal stirred up in Toronto by the bigwigs of the Canadian Union of Public Employees, better known as CUPE.

I am wondering if CUPE's president, who is himself an Air Canada employee, is not simply trying to kill Nationair and Mirabel just to run for re-election claiming to be the one who put that Quebec national company in its place.

I think it is a conspiracy to discredit Quebec. All they want is to eliminate a genuine Quebec company that is taking an ever bigger part of the market and discredit it at the same time, for unknown reasons—Nationair and Mirabel.

I would hope that Nationair's locked out employees will wake up soon and regain control of their union. With their boycott, they are going to jeopardize not only their own jobs but also the future of 1,800 other people who have nothing to do with that labour conflict.

We really cannot afford to lose 200 jobs in Quebec.

CO-OPERATIVE HOUSING

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, once again, the Conservative government penalizes the middle class. This last budget proposes unjustified cuts in the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation spending on new housing co-ops.

According to Monique Blanchet, who heads the Fédération des coopératives d'habitation de l'île de Montréal the federal government's withdrawal from this sector will mean that 500 units will not be built in the Montreal area this year.

The government thus hopes to save $622 million over the next five years at a time when the need for social housing keeps increasing. In fact, the Conservative policy will affect tens of thousands of units in Quebec only.

I ask the government to reconsider this irresponsible proposal and I plead it to stop penalizing the have nots for its mismanagement.

SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, one of the best federal government programs for small businesses is the business improvement loan under the Small Businesses Loans Act. Under this program the federal government will guarantee loans to purchase or improve land, buildings, and equipment for small business.

Until the recent budget the limit for qualifying loans was $100,000 for small businesses with sales of $2 million or less. The proposed changes in the budget increased these maximums to $200,000, to be paid over a 10-year period. The business improvement loans make it easier to borrow money while providing banks with much more security.

This program is not well known to the business community but applications should be available from any chartered bank, from the small business loans administration, an FBDB office, or me. In fact I am sending a brochure on the program to every business in my riding. But if I miss anyone please contact my office and I will forward the information right away.

CANADIAN RACE RELATIONS FOUNDATION

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, on September 22, 1988, the Prime Minister, on behalf of all Canadians, apologized for the racist treatment and internment of Japanese Canadians during the Second World War.

As part of the redress package he announced: "In commemoration of all who suffered these injustices, we will establish a Canadian Race Relations Foundation to foster racial harmony and cross-cultural understanding in Canada".

Bill C-63 to establish the foundation was passed in 1990. We learned in Tuesday's budget that this bill has not been proclaimed after two years.

This allows the government to renege on redress promises that were made by this House on behalf of all Canadians. Funding for the foundation and also for the important Heritage Language Institute will be withheld indefinitely.

We agree with the National Association of Japanese Canadians that this delay indicates the eradication of racism and discrimination "is not a high priority of this government".

THE LATE GEORGE RICHARD AGAR RICE

Mr. Jim Edwards (Edmonton Southwest): Mr. Speaker, the dean of Canadian broadcasters is dead.

George Richard Agar Rice died Tuesday in Edmonton at age 92, having spent 66 years of his life as an active Canadian broadcaster.

From his founding of CJCA for The Edmonton Journal in 1922, he went on to establish his own CFRN-AM in 1934, CFRN-FM in 1948 and CFRN television in 1954. He was a co-founder of the CTV network.

Dick Rice was a philanthropist who chose to endow Edmonton and Canada in the performing and visual arts, in post-secondary education and worthy community projects. He was a visionary who anticipated technological and social trends. He was a giver, not a taker, who knew service must precede success.

He organized Alberta's 1967 celebrations of the centennial and received an honorary doctor of laws degree for his service to and support of Alberta's three universities. He held the Order of Canada and the Alberta Order of Excellence.

Above all, he was a mentor to three generations of Canadian broadcasters of whom I had the good fortune to be one.

THE BUDGET

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, in 1990 when the Minister of the Environment launched the green plan he said: "Canadians want their green plan to be adequately funded. Cabinet has authorized a $3 billion budget over five years".

In 1991 the funds were stretched over a six-year period. In 1992, $150 million were deferred to a later date. Clearly with these actions the government is breaking faith with its commitment to the environment.

But that is not all. The government is now closing down the Science Council, the Canadian Environmental Advisory Council, the International Centre for Ocean Development.

These decisions are short-sighted and damaging to the well-being of Canadians. These useful bodies have served the public interest well. By suppressing these voices, the government continues its agenda to dismantle Canada.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

MAIN ESTIMATES

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister arising out of the spending estimates tabled today.

In Tuesday's budget the government said that it is committed to restraining its spending. In that budget the government had no money for the Science Council and the Economic Council. In today's estimates, the government said that it will be spending millions of dollars on a museum of humour.

Why is there no money for research, the unemployed, day care but millions of dollars for a museum of humour? Is this because the Prime Minister wants a showcase for all his broken election promises?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. member knows full well that this grant was given to a Montreal cultural agency exactly two years ago for a fixed period of time for the development in Montreal of a building representing millions of dollars in investments and hundreds of jobs. I would like to hear the hon. member from the opposition tell us that he is opposed to a cultural agency that could create jobs in Montreal.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the minister talked about priorities. He said that because of the new priorities it was possible for him to break his promise of putting in place a national child care program. I ask the minister once again why is a museum of humour more important than child care facilities for Canadian families in Montreal and everywhere in Canada?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I ask the hon. member of the opposition to tell us, contrary to what his colleague the hon. member from Montreal regularly tells us about job creation, that he is opposed, and I would like to hear it directly from the hon. member, to Montreal cultural agencies creating dozens of jobs for Montrealers in a city where 600,000 people are below the poverty level. That is what I ask the hon. member.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the minister does not have the courage to answer my question. Why is the government spending several million dollars for a museum of humour when, at the same time, it is cutting back its co-op housing program which means that 500 new units will not be built this year in the Montreal area?

There are 10,000 names on the waiting list for such units in the city of Montreal.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, once again the hon. member knows full well that this cultural organization, incorporated in Montreal, organizes a summer festival which generates millions of dollars for the people of Montreal.

I am asking the hon. member on behalf of my colleagues from the Montreal area whether he is against government subsidies to organizations which create hundreds of jobs in Montreal.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The minister is bragging about helping our job creating industries when, at the same time, his budget predicts real interest rates three full points above those in the United States, our main competitor. This is an unbearable anti-competitive gap.

How does the minister think he will create jobs while imposing such a costly burden on Canadians? By praying?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member will be pleased to know that the bank rate dropped by six basis points today. That is a clear example of the confidence in this budget.

There are also some other very encouraging signs. In spite of all the gloom and doom that the members opposite always raise, it is interesting to note that General Motors is calling back 2,700 workers in this coming year at the assembly plant in St. Thérése. It says: "This is because of the high quality levels of union co-operation and we were able to persuade the head office to make us the only Firebird and Camaro producer in the world. We are alive and well and ready to compete".

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, surely the hon. minister has been in the job long enough to understand the difference between real interest rates and nominal interest rates. Our real interest rates are crippling compared to the American's.

The assumptions that are set out in the budget are less than honest as, indeed, was that answer.

The minister says he is going to lower the unemployment rate, yet he also calls for economic restructuring without any adjustment measures and that means massive job loss.

He calls for real interest rates to continue at a level substantially higher than the American's. No retraining, little R and D.

Who does the minister really think is going to turn the Canadian economy around, John Crow or St. Jude the patron saint of hopeless causes?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian prime rate is 7.5 per cent. The U.S. prime rate is 6.5 per cent. What is the hon. member complaining about?

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

There has been great progress made in the talks of the joint parliamentary committee. All of us on that committee are working in the interests of unity of this country. I truly believe that all of us who have worked on the committee feel that commitment very strongly as federalists.

I want to say to the minister that, yes we are now down to the wire and negotiations go this way. We all understand that. Also, we want to make reasoned decisions and we want to make them in the light of day and not at 3 a.m. or 4 a.m.

In the interests of working toward unanimity which we would like to see, will the minister consider a delay of one week until the House resumes after its one week recess so that we can meet again to come up with the final report rather than having to do that tonight and tomorrow morning?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I agree entirely with the leader of the New Democratic Party that there has been extraordinary progress made on the great majority of substantive issues. None of us would have believed this progress to be possible two or three months ago.

I am as conscious as anyone in this House, perhaps more conscious than others, of how much progress we have made in public opinion since the low point in November when party differences made Canadians begin to wonder if this would all come apart.

It would be the worst possible signal for a Parliament that has achieved so much agreement on so many important issues to appear unable to keep its deadline tomorrow. That would be a very, very major problem to the cause of Canada and to the interests of federalism.

My strong inclination would be, knowing the strain everyone is under, to urge the parties to continue in the spirit that has marked most of our discussions so far.

They should continue to try to find agreement and to meet our deadline. If we do not meet tomorrow's deadline, we are forced back on other deadlines that the country faces.

Canadians want us to get on with this matter. They know there is remarkable agreement and they want us to continue on that path of agreement. I believe that if we have the will in this House we can do that and we can do it tomorrow.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the minister that I have been one of those people who has not advocated a delay of the report of this committee.

At the same time people want us to resolve the Constitution, do it expeditiously and deal with the very important matters of the economy as the minister has said as well as other issues.

Surely Canada is worth one week's time. I also want to be very clear that we are not talking about it because people are under stress. We are all under stress. We all agree with that. That is our job.

Does the minister not think, in the interests of trying to send a positive and, I hope, unanimous message to the country, that one week would not be worth considering?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): There is no question I made the decision back in April that this country was worth everything I could give to it. I have been trying to proceed in that spirit since that time.

I am extremely worried about the signal a delay would send. I know, as the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party knows and the Liberal Party knows, there has been progress on aboriginal issues, on issues of institutional reform, on issues of powers for Quebec, potentially on issues of 121, the economic union.

There has been extraordinary progress made in this committee and the country is taking heart from it. Federalists in Quebec are taking heart from it. This is a fragile thing, a very fragile thing.

We saw that three or four months ago when this Parliament looked as if it was going to let the country down. This Parliament cannot let the country down again. It would seem to me that the best thing for us to do would be to realize that this country has to be the preoccupation of all of us. It is better for us all.

It sends a better signal to Canada and to our future if we respect the deadlines we have all known for months that we have had so that we can go on to meet the other deadlines that we all know we have to meet.

If we do that, we can then get on to deal with the other issues that all of us believe this country should be free to deal with.

• (1430)

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the signal will be clear: the country comes before everything. It comes before the parties; it is Canada that counts and, in my opinion, Canada deserves an extra week. The minister does not seem to agree.

I have another question. Would the minister consider, with his caucus and with the Prime Minister, the fact that it is more important to take time to examine carefully everything that goes into the search for unanimity?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am always reasonable and flexible, but I believe there are certain realities here. There is right now, in Quebec and elsewhere, a momentum in favour of Canada that we do not want to jeopardize. It may be a difference of opinion, but I believe that the signal sent by Parliament if we cannot meet our own deadlines will be perceived as a bad signal that could discourage federalists in Quebec.

Moreover, I am convinced that if we do not meet our deadline this will be perceived or reported as an indication of deeper differences than the ones that actually exist. The reality is that there is a great consensus among the federalist parties here and we do not want to give Quebecers or others the impression that we do not agree on basic issues, because we do agree on the basic issues. I believe it is in our interest to indicate to the world, to Canada, and to Quebec that we agree.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

MAIN ESTIMATES

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, the Main Estimates for the Department of Employment and Immigration have been reduced by some $177 million.

Can the minister explain why the government has withdrawn over $100 million of the funds allocated to job creation and to training when the number of public servants within his department has increased by over 1,500?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I could provide details on the 1,546 person-years that were absorbed by my department, but the reason is that we wanted to have additional resources to serve Canadians who need the unemployment insurance program. We have also added 367 person-years, again to help the unemployed workers who need advice in the manpower centres. The party that the hon. member represents complained a few weeks ago in the House that people were not getting service because of a shortage of staff. Now we have the staff.

[English]

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the President of the Treasury Board.

The Auditor General in his last annual report said that the deficit for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1991, was understated by nearly $2 billion.

Can the President of the Treasury Board assure the House that there will be no more cooking of the books and that approved accounting standards will be respected when the government reports to Parliament and to the Canadian people?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. member that over a period of 15 years, I do not recall the auditor having given clearance to government except maybe last year.

There is an honest disagreement between the auditor and the comptroller. They both agree that the amounts are right. Where to put them in the books is where the disagreement is and I am not one to decide between them. I will let the auditor and the comptroller sort out their problem themselves.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister and it concerns today's estimates. Today's estimates officially end the Prime Minister's drug awareness program. Given that it was the Prime Minister himself who on September 14, 1986 called Canada's drug problem "an epidemic", when precisely was the epidemic cured and by whom?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the member that the drug strategy has well served Canadians for the past five years. We have had wonderful results which we will communicate to Canadians. At the same time I am aware that this strategy will be over at the end of March. We are working within the Department of Finance to see what we can possibly do.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): I do not think that answered the question.

I would like to direct my supplementary question to the Prime Minister. It is also on the estimates. Once again, today's estimates make no mention of the number of person-years in the Prime Minister's Office. Canadians would like to know why, and especially what does the government have to hide regarding the number of person-years in the Prime Minister's Office?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member takes the trouble to look at appendix II, he will find the number of person-years clearly indicated there. Indeed a Liberal member pointed out to me this morning that the number was 119 higher and he found it amazing that it could be higher when the budget was the same. I suggested that he read some more.

[English]

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In his budget speech earlier this week the minister talked about a substantial peace dividend for Canadians and said "defence spending will be cut".

Today the estimates show that rather than cut, the defence budget will increase next year. Can the minister explain why his budget speech tried to fool Canadians and will he make real defence cuts and use the money to get people back to work in this country?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): I think I have to explain to the hon. member how the estimates work. He will recall that we made projections for this year with a deficit number. This was based on a certain projection of growth in various departments. It is from that base that we are cutting the expenditure and not from some other base that the hon. member has in mind.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): In other words, a cut is not a cut in this case. It is an increase that is just a little bit slower. Such nonsense.

My supplementary question is for the minister. The case of the Meme breast implant clearly shows that we cannot count on companies to report a defective product. The estimates show a $36 million cut in the Health Protection Branch. How can the minister justify taking money from a branch or division which recent events have shown is so necessary for Canadians' health?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I will check the figure that the hon. member put forward. Again I believe that all the cuts or increases in the government's budget are explained in full in the supplementary budget. The hon. member has a perfect right to disagree. Everyone would want us to spend more on everything. Unfortunately it is not possible to do so. We must make adjustments within our available resources and that is what happened in this case.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

On Tuesday of this week 70 employees were permanently laid off at the GE plastics manufacturing plant in Cobourg. Yesterday, Nestlé foods announced the permanent lay–off of 130 employees at its Stouffers plant in Trenton. They join a growing list of thousands more in Northumberland.

I would like to ask the minister what specific programs are in the minister's budget to provide for these unemployed workers.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think if my hon. friend looks at the budget she will see that there is a package of elements there from a reduction in the manufacturing income tax, the increase in the capital cost allowance, the change in the withholding tax which is very helpful to companies like Nestlé which want to continue to employ a number of workers in her riding, as well as the changes to the large corporations tax that were announced last week and the changes to the research and development tax credit.

All of these proposals together are designed to make companies more competitive so that they can compete against other countries for business and in that way maintain and increase employment in their companies. There is a very clear objective in the budget to do exactly what she is looking for, and that is to create jobs and maintain the competitiveness of Canadian companies.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I challenge the reply that states that these programs are creating jobs. They just are not.

Two more years of anticipated unemployment at current levels is totally unacceptable. A caring society turns with special attention sacrificing the well–being of the rich and powerful to assist the disadvantaged. Family violence and child poverty are increasing with unemployment at enormous human and social costs to this country. The budget is seriously deficient.

What emergency measures will the government initiate to meet the needs of our own country's poor children and destitute families?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend again is ignoring some of the very key elements of the budget. She says that provisions that have been in place for two days simply are not working. I think that is a very unfair and totally unrealistic comment to make.

The proposals that my colleague from health and welfare and the Minister of Finance put together in this budget are specifically designed to deal with the problems of family violence. The proposals, as I said in my previous answer on corporate taxes, are designed to improve the capacity of those companies to increase jobs. All of these things together will provide a budget which is a very sound balance of both economic policy and social policy.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence.

The budget had a direct impact on my riding with the closure of the supply depot putting over 200 people out of work. Three successive Ministers of National Defence have committed this government to build a new supply depot, not close one. As recently as last October a letter to me from the minister confirmed that the project was on course. Why has the government broken its promise?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the Department of National Defence has cut its budget forecast by nearly $6 billion over the past four years. The strength of the Canadian Forces was cut by 11 per cent, thus proportionally reducing the need for supply depots.

[English]

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): It is nice to see that the minister talks about cutbacks, but they can build a museum of humour. This is no joke, Mr. Speaker.

The employees were told by this government not to worry, that a new supply depot would be built and they would have work. How does the minister explain to Allan Meredith, Bernard Bourque, Tina Agnew, their families and all the other workers at the Moncton depot who woke up yesterday morning and learned that they no longer had jobs that it has broken its commitment to them?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that given the reduction in personnel we had to streamline depots. Therefore there will be two major depots in Canada, the Edmonton depot and the Montreal depot. By cutting down the establishment we had to reconsider the decision regarding Moncton.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology.

In the throne speech and in the so-called prosperity papers this government talked about the knowledge economy. It promised to double the number of scientists, engineers and mathematicians. It promised to cut the illiteracy rate by half, to quadruple worker training, to achieve a 90 per cent graduation rate from high schools, and to enhance science and technology.

My question to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology is: Where in the budget is that prosperity agenda?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the prosperity agenda is very much in that budget. I mentioned in response to a previous question the various elements that are there to support the competitive position of Canadian companies. That will help Canadian companies provide jobs and opportunities for the younger people going through the education system.

The proposals that my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, has put forward on family violence and other problems of children in poverty are also designed to address this problem. A very high percentage of the dropout rate is because of family violence and drug and alcohol abuse. This will help those people who suffer from those problems to stay in the education system, get the education that is important for them, and be a prominent part of the work force when they graduate.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, there are 1.5 million Canadians who would call this government, in spite of what the minister says, heartless and cruel.

When we look at the cuts to the Canadian Jobs Strategy, the real dollar cuts in the Industrial Research Assistance Program and the granting councils, when we look at cuts in other knowledge based programs, was not the real reason the Science Council was killed that the Science Council was going to say, in addition to this government being cruel and heartless, that it was stupid? But the Canadian people are not.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think the Canadian people can see through the empty rhetoric in a question like that.

The Canadian people are looking for the substance that is in the budget of my colleague, the Minister of Finance. That addresses many of the questions which have been put forward in the community based program, the community based consultations on the prosperity initiative. People were looking for precisely the response that the Minister of Finance gave in this budget in order to create jobs and create a stronger economy for the present and the future.

COMMUNITY NEWSPAPERS

Mr. A. H. Harry Brightwell (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications.

As of March 1, small community weekly newspapers will be subject to commercial postal rates. In 1991 the minister postponed scheduled postal increases until March 1, 1992.

Given the importance of these weeklies to their local communities, and indeed I have eight weeklies serving my riding, does the minister have plans to provide any kind of further relief to these publications?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend mentions, last year we announced a one-year delay in the new increases in postal rates for community weeklies. During that time we have taken advantage of the opportunity presented to us to meet with the Canadian Community Newspaper Association to deal with issues related to rates and other problems that community newspapers are having in Canada.

I am pleased to be able to inform my hon. friend that the government today will be announcing a decrease of some 50 per cent for a one-year period for these rates for small community newspapers.

In addition to that, weeklies excluded from Canada Post rate code 2 by virtue of their being located within regional municipalities will also become eligible for these concessionary postal rates. Some 430 small community newspapers across Canada will benefit from this.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Close to one million Canadian families work hard to make ends meet on incomes between $30,000 and $50,000 each year. Like the poor, they are finding times very tough. Yet for these working couples the minister can only offer $4 a month more under the proposed child tax benefit.

How can the minister stand in this House and suggest that $4 a month will in any way help these families provide their children with proper food, clothing and medicine?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's question and I clearly understand the difficulties that families are facing.

A combination of the reduction in the surtax in this budget and the improvements in the child benefit package that my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare has announced means a family with two children earning $50,000 and a single earner will save $280 a year. A two-earner family earning $50,000 will save $240 a year. A single parent with two children earning $50,000 will save $394 a year.

I realize that may not sound like a large sum of money, but it is an important sum of money that will help parents clothe their children and maintain a household. At least it is going in the right direction. As the economy improves and as we can get better fiscal order in the management of the government's affairs, we will be able to do better.

What we have today is a very difficult challenge of balancing the needs of families and the needs of Canadians with the fiscal reality we must face. We are trying to do our best.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

In columns 4 and 5 of table 4.3 on page 137 of The Budget Papers it is clearly stated that for a family earning $50,000 a year with two children the difference between the new and the old programs is simply $44 a year or less than $4 per month.

In the budget the government has asked 600,000 Canadian women to give up their family allowances in order to "help children who are suffering in Canada for no good reason at all". There are now over 2.5 million Canadians dependent on social assistance who will not be covered by the child tax benefit. If the system is not designed to help the poorest of the poor, how can the minister defend the end to universal family allowances?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, based on the question the member raises I would like to correct what I consider to be two mistakes.

The first is that the poor people on social assistance will continue to get family allowance. It is there, $1,020 a child, and it will remain.

Second, the federal money we provide to the provinces through the CAP is $6.5 billion and it goes directly to those on social assistance. For example, they have transportation, prescriptions, and sometimes even housekeeping benefits, money which is not available to low income workers. That is exactly the reason we have put the emphasis on that category of people. Basically women with $15,000 a year receive fewer direct benefits than those who are on social assistance.

PRINTING INDUSTRY

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

The Canadian printing industry which employs some 78,000 people is being systematically undermined by the United States customs service's arbitrary use of country of origin rules to protect American printers and to impede Canadian exports to the United States.

As in the Honda and in the softwood lumber instances, this is another example of the Americans exploiting the free trade agreement to serve their own protectionist ends.

I ask the minister: What is the government doing to prevent these abuses of the free trade agreement and to ensure the survival of the Canadian printing industry?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, this might have been a question more appropriately put to my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue. Since my colleague raised it with me yesterday I am pleased to respond to it.

The Minister of National Revenue has written to the Canadian Printing Industry Association reviewing the administration of this particular matter and also discussing with it a basis for implementing this policy in a way that would provide a level playing field between companies in the United States and Canada.

My hon. friend should know that one of the objectives we have in the North American free trade negotiations is to deal with this particular problem. We tried to deal with it in the U.S.-Canada negotiations. We were not successful at that time but it remains an objective in the upcoming negotiations.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister.

We should not be writing to the Canadian industry. We should be taking it up with the Americans. This government is doing absolutely nothing about this trade harassment which costs the Canadian printing industry some 1,700 jobs and on average $160 million a year in lost opportunities.

While American printing products flow across our borders free of any impediments, why does the Canadian government continue to shamelessly accept harassment of Canadian goods entering the American market? When will it begin to Canadian defend the interests of Canadian and the thousands of jobs in our Canadian printing industry?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the rhetoric does not help the situation. My hon. friend should know that we have taken steps on an ongoing basis to help particular companies in Canada deal with the problems of getting into the United States.

There is a recent case involving the Eddy Match Company where Canadian officials went to bat for the company and got a very fast decision on this particular problem. The result was that the company's shipment was promptly released and sent to its destination in Canada.

We are working on it at the negotiating table as well as at the border.

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs has just said that he has felt an overall momentum in this country toward the renewal of the Constitution which leads us to believe that the Beaudoin-Dobbie report to be tabled tomorrow would recommend that special powers be delegated to Quebec. But we already have the real answer. We heard it today: 92 per cent of English Canada has said no to a special status for Quebec. I would like to ask the Prime Minister if the results of this survey would match those hidden away in the Privy Council safes?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I hope that the hon. member has better sources to quote his short term and long term fans than a headline.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, never mind the closed door conferences with pre-written scripts. Never mind the rhetoric and the smoke screens. What is important is what the real Canada thinks. How can the minister deny that this real Canada, outside Quebec, has rejected by a 92 per cent majority the idea of a special status for Quebec?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I for one have just taken an active part in a tour of the Saguenay home of the hon. member as well as in five national conferences. I know that the questions asked by the Gallup Institute can sometimes have shortcomings, but I also know that among the people who attended these five national conferences there was an open-mindedness about the future of Canada like never before. I sure hope that all the members of this House are prepared to encourage the people of Quebec to see Canada for what it is today, because what Canada is today is a country prepared to have a wide vision, a vision encompassing Quebec, as it is, within a modern Canada.

NATIONAL REVENUE

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue.

The deductibility of legitimate business expenses from taxes is a practice woven into the very fabric of Canadian society. I was shocked to learn, however, that some people including NDP members opposite actually believe escort services are legally tax deductible.

Can this be, Mr. Speaker? With all due respect to the world's oldest profession, have the escorts and their clients actually got off the hook? I ask the minister to clarify this and end the hysteria.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I obviously do not have the experience in this matter of the hon. member and members of the NDP. I know New Democrats are experts in this field.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Jelinek: I am happy to have the opportunity, if we are referring to escort services as the New Democrats and the hon. member have just done, to say it is of a personal nature.

• (1500)

These escort services are non-deductible to businesses and to anybody else. I have taken it a step further. I have instructed my officials to review existing directives and interpretation bulletins to make them clear enough for even the New Democrats to understand.

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, hidden in the speech of the President of the Treasury Board is the termination of the Court Challenges Program which funds equality rights test cases under the charter. This is one more blow to Canadians seeking equality and justice.

My question is for the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship. Will he tell Canadians whether the Court Challenges Program is no longer worth while or important in continuing clarification of the charter? Why is there this attack on human rights? Has he changed his mind since he supported funding last May?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, this was an effective program that was available and provide financial assistance for the preparation and defence of test cases involving equality and language rights under the Canadian Constitution.

The program has been with us for some time, parts of it since 1978 and other parts since 1985. There is now a solid base of jurisprudence for future years and the remaining finer points are now those of provincial jurisdiction. I guess that is why we acted as we did.

SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance and it refers to the budget papers where they refer to the Small Business Financing Program for businesses that are experiencing financial difficulty. It looks like a good program but I do not really understand it.

I wonder if the minister could explain, in terms that I might understand, what the program is, how the low interest loans are permitted, what businesses qualify, and when more information will be available.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for that question.

May I take this opportunity to congratulate him for his efforts in keeping Aerovox open as a result of his own personal initiative.

The provision to which the hon. member referred is available to both incorporated and unincorporated businesses. The rules that will be applied will be the same rules as those applied under the Small Business Development Bond program which was in existence a few years ago.

The effect will be that it will treat interest payments paid to the lender as dividends and the lender can thereby qualify for a dividend tax credit. This will mean substantial reductions in interest rates to the person who is making the loan.

I agree with the hon. member. It is a good program and it will be available in the very near future.

CO-OPERATIVE HOUSING

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

In his first budget on Tuesday evening the Minister of Finance cancelled the co-operative housing programs. In so doing the minister just cancelled 500 units that were to have been built this year.

What kind of housing will the Minister of Finance suggest for the 10,000 families in Montreal alone that are on the waiting list?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of the Social Housing Program, the federal government will be spending $2 billion a year or $10 billion over the next five years. That is a lot of money.

In terms of the social housing component, it will be increasing at the rate of 3 per cent per year which is greater than the rate of inflation.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I am totally outraged and offended that the Minister of National Revenue in this House of Commons would imply that those of us in the New Democratic caucus either use the services of an escort service or are somehow employed by—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member rises on a matter that was the subject of an exchange two minutes ago. It may well be that the consequences of the exchange have created some consternation or some annoyance but it is not a question of privilege.

COMMENT DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, during Question Period today the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in his supplementary suggested that I was providing inaccurate information to the House on a question that was posed. I would simply ask him to refer to table 4.4 on page 138 and he will see that the answer corresponds to that table.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may very well consult those pages. I would ask hon. members on both sides to do the best they can to restrain from carrying on debate by way of notices of privilege or order after the Question Period has ended. I would hear the usual Thursday afternoon question.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the government House leader. Perhaps he could indicate to the House the business for tomorrow and for Monday and Tuesday of the week we return after the March break.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Today the House will complete the second day of debate on the budget. On Friday, February 28, it is the government's intention to call Bill C–61, the borrowing authority bill for second reading.

On Monday, March 9, after being adjourned for a week—it sounds like a holiday but I am going to work in Calgary—we will complete second reading of Bill C–61. My intention now is to call the third and fourth days of the budget debate on Tuesday and Wednesday, March 10 and 11 respectively. I will engage in discussions with the members of the opposition in respect of other business for the remainder of that week.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government; and on the amendment of Mr. Gray (Windsor West) (p. 7631); and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Langdon (p.7633).

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, in participating in the debate on the budget I shall leave it to a number of my colleagues who have already and will no doubt draw attention to the deplorable record in this budget of support for stimulus that would bring immediate employment and benefit to the Canadian people. Quite obviously the government has not chosen to respond to the widespread desire on the part of Canadians to see measures to bring about that necessary stimulus.

In fact, the real message in the minister's recent budget speech, as distinct from the rhetoric in which it was dressed, is that Canada's current recession is simply part of a normal cyclical downturn, one which mirrors, he says, a world–wide economic slump. As a corollary of that belief, he offers the reassurance that the economy will soon rebound on the strength of renewed consumer spending and an export led growth principally to a resurgent U.S. market.

We have heard that forecast for several years now. This all too predictable analysis of Canada's current economic malaise ignores two fundamental points. First, the Canadian economy went into recession a full year earlier than that of its major trading partners, principally the United States, and its effects will prove far deeper.

The second fundamental point is that it is far from clear that the world economy as a whole—beyond Canada, the United States and Britain—is in recession as this government would have us believe.

Continental Europe, Japan and especially the newly industrializing countries of southeast Asia continue to post healthy and in some cases quite remarkable growth rates at the very time that we in Canada are mired in recession.

Moreover, to the extent that the rest of the world will experience growth and an economic slowdown in coming months, it will likely be the result of the deterioration of the North American economy over the past year. It is still a formidable power able to drag the world economy down with it.

This real picture of where Canada stands raises a central question. Is Canada experiencing a typical cyclical downturn from which we can expect to rebound shortly with renewed vigour or are Canada's economic problems more deep-rooted? Are we experiencing a crisis of productivity, not simply a recession, which reflects the decline in our relative economic position world-wide? If the latter is the case, if we are experiencing a decline in our relative economic position world-wide then there is a danger in using the language of recession too freely. It masks the underlying fact that Canada's productivity growth, the real measure of our international competitiveness, has been at a standstill for almost a decade, since long before we entered the current period of recession.

Talk about recession distorts the real problem which is that North America, especially Canada, is systematically losing its ability to sell its goods and services on world markets.

Much of the blame for this state of affairs can be laid at the feet of governments over the last decade. Mammoth public and private sector borrowing during the 1980s both at home and abroad fuelled a decade of over-consumption. This in turn has numerous implications for Canada today.

First, this policy of ongoing borrowing has tended to crowd out necessary investments in Canada in industrial capital, research and development, infrastructure and human resource development. Such investments are critical to Canada's ability to compete in Europe, Japan and throughout Asia.

Competitors who long ago recognized that the quality of investments, and by extension the ability to innovate and upgrade continuously, are the new touchstones of success in a post-industrialized global economy.

Our poor record in Canada on research and development, our decaying roads, airports and railways, and our growing education deficit are symptomatic not so much of domestic constraints, as this government would have us believe, but of a fundamental misallocation of our national resources over the last decade.

Second, a decade of Keynesianism run amok has accumulated massive deficits not only at home but abroad, deficits which by definition must be paid back. They must be paid back at some point in the future either through greater Canadian exports, declining imports or a combination of both.

Most dangerous of all, these policies have created the illusion among Canadians that all was well, that our competitive position was secure.

As long as we had money to import an increasing range of products from abroad, which we did with such alacrity during the 1980s, and as long as our living standards continued to rise we were satisfied that North America's economic position was as unassailable as ever.

What was overlooked was that this consumption was being financed largely by borrowing, not by exports. Indeed, to a large extent, this recession we have all encountered today reflects the fact that neither governments nor the average Canadian can continue to borrow at levels reached during the 1980s. We have only to examine our more than $400 billion federal debt, our growing foreign indebtedness, and our inflated bond rates to recognize that our credit is all but used up. The party is over.

This budget talks tough but it does very little. The fundamental assumption underlying this budget is that the Canadian economy will automatically correct itself. It assumes the consumers will return to spending and that Canadian exports will suddenly be in demand again on world markets. It assumes that the national debt will be paid down through a combination of high growth and low interest rates.

This would be news to most Canadians. Many are caught up in the same general credit crunch as the government. Many others are losing their jobs precisely because their companies and their products are no longer competitive in world markets. Most Canadians are concerned about their economic security and their future. They are decidedly less concerned with "reflating" the economy by opening their already beleaguered pocket-books.

Nor is it clear that we can expect miracles from export-led growth. The Americans are suffering from much the same problems as Canada while our exports overseas, where we face real trade imbalances, are steadily losing ground. Meanwhile our trading partners overseas do not seem to be any more disposed to buy our exports than they were a year or two ago.

It is even less clear that the government can continue to lower interest rates indefinitely when it is becoming increasingly difficult to attract foreign lenders in a world hungry for investment capital.

Even the government's claim that low inflation will hone Canada's competitive advantage rings false when we recognize that the statistics reflect not so much a fundamental restructuring of industry and labour as a profound withering away of our industrial base and growing unemployment. This hollowing out of our industrial base has been accelerated by the excessive reliance this government has placed on high interest rates, and consequently a high Canadian dollar, as the sole method of combating inflation.

There can be no magic, no easy return to high growth because, in a very real sense, our growth crisis existed long before this so-called recession. The fundamental economic problems which have led us into this quagmire—the national debt, declining productivity and our deteriorating competitive position world-wide—have not gone away despite the very real pain now being experienced by Canadians and the optimistic forecasts of this government's seventh budget.

Staying the course is simply not good enough. The real issue is how the Government of Canada can help Canadians to be more competitive in the world marketplace.

Only by building a more competitive industrial base can Canadians have the means and the confidence to restart our domestic engine. Only producing goods and services which the world wants will maintain our living standards and correct our growing trade imbalances.

In the end, this means foregoing consumption for investment in industrial capacity, infrastructure, training and so forth. The question is not so much what policies should be enacted but who has the political will to enact them.

It is now unfortunately all too clear that this government does not have that political will. All that we have in this budget are a few modest proposals. There are small adjustments to the taxes for manufacturing and processing. There is a small increase in capital cost allowances. There is a slight modification to small business loans.

These are not answers to the pressing competitive challenges which face Canada, challenges that will only increase in the immediate future. The government's answer is not in this budget. The answer is certainly not in the year-long consultations on international competitiveness which it launched a few months ago.

For reasons that pass all understanding the government has launched a task force to travel across the country asking questions to which all Canadians already know the answers. Canadians know already that our education system is in serious need of an overhaul if we are to compete effectively, if we are to achieve those standards of affluence to finance the social programs essential to Canadian well-being.

What is there in this budget to encourage Canadians to think that their government recognizes the need for a greatly strengthened government initiative in the fields of education, training, and retraining? What is there in this budget to encourage Canadians to think that the government has finally recognized the profound impact the continuing high levels of functional illiteracy have on our productivity? What is there in this budget to demonstrate that this government is prepared to lead the way in ensuring that Canadians receive the education, the life-long retraining that is essential for Canadians to prosper in a global economy? What is there in this budget to assure Canadians that their government recognizes the vital role research and development plays in making Canadians competitive in a global economy?

I touched for a moment on the small measure that the government has offered. That is not a response. There is an essential need for Canadians, business and labour, to recognize the role of research and development.

What is there in this budget to ensure better understanding between business and labour by offering tax incentives so that business can share the ownership of the productive capacity of our country with employees? What is there to ensure that we channel our savings into productive investment in this country?

There is nothing in this budget to encourage the provinces to lower, reduce, or eliminate those internal barriers which trammel our effective competition abroad. This budget fails to take a long-term view or a short-term view of what has to be done to make Canada competitive. On those grounds, this budget fails.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the member for Etobicoke North for whom I have a great deal of respect. I compliment him in part for his very reasoned critique of the budget.

I gather from what he has said there is more show than substance. He answered part of that in the rhetorical questions he said the budget did not cover.

But he did not seem to mention a word—and I am very interested in view of his experience in government and also in the financial community and the affairs of this country—in terms of broadening and maintaining or expanding our competitive advantage.

I totally agree with him in terms of this international task force on international competitiveness, which is a glorious waste of time and money. What part does he think the Economic Council of Canada plays in this? Is that what he would normally think is a healthy step to help build on our competitive advantage, or has the Economic Council of Canada outlived its usefulness?

Mr. MacLaren: Mr. Speaker, I am always happy to engage in however brief a discussion with my colleague from Annapolis Valley—Hants, for whom I have real respect.

He of course touches on a central issue and that is the ability of the government as a whole, including of course the Economic Council and the Science Council, to identify and address those issues which can render Canada competitive in the world marketplace.

My own view, and I suspect he would share this, is that the government should not proceed to the abolition of the Economic Council of Canada and of the Science Council. It should enhance their ability to perform the functions originally envisaged for them.

Now, it may be that there would be an advantage in rolling together those two institutions. After all, science policy and economic policy, and indeed to a degree social policy, have become virtually indistinguishable.

If Canada is to be competitive, as he and I would both seek, in the global economy then it would seem to me to be incumbent upon the government to address the future role of those two councils in an imaginative and constructive way; not to abolish them, but rather to consider whether by relocating them, by restructuring them, or indeed merging them, they could play that arms-length role of advice to the government which could indeed benefit all Canadians.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the member for Etobicoke North who, of course, is very concerned with the Canadian economy.

It seemed to me as I listened to the speech that the Minister of Finance was trying to sprinkle a little bit of benefit over the entire Canadian economy so that he would gather some headlines for the next day or that the government was actually doing something about the economy. Perhaps that is his objective and perhaps to some extent he has succeeded.

But the concern of many people is that we are facing practically an implosion of our manufacturing and processing industry in this country. A light sprinkling of reducing corporate taxes by one per cent or the surtax by one per cent is really meaningless.

I do not think anything has drawn this more to my attention than the food-processing industry. The food-processing industry is in a free fall in this country because of the free trade deal with the United States. In fact, some 18,000 jobs have been lost. Some 70 processing plants across the country have closed.

The government did a good thing a couple of years ago. They set up an agrifood competitive council which has been looking at the problems of that industry because it has been falling apart.

It is interesting that about two weeks before the budget came out it recommended that in order to try and give that industry a jolt, to try to stop industries and plants from moving to the United States and moving to Europe and moving to Mexico, and so on, that the capital cost allowance should be doubled for new productive plant operations incremental to what we have.

It was recommended that it be doubled from 25 per cent to 50 per cent, a straight line write-off year after year. When the budget came down it was increased by 5 per cent. Therefore, instead of having a 50 per cent capital cost write-off year after year after year, it was increased by 5 per cent which like so many things will have zero impact.

I do not think anything could demonstrate the problems of the budget and the problems with our country than this particular recommendation of an independent body appointed by the government.

I would like to ask the hon. member if he sees this kind of dribbling of small improvements as totally ineffective in resolving the implosion we are facing in the manufacturing and processing industries in this country.

Mr. MacLaren: The hon. member is right. We have seen a few measures in the budget. They are measures in their modest way moving in the right direction but they are essentially tinkering. They do not address the fundamental question which faces Canadian industry today and that is its ability to adjust to a global economy.

What we have in place of that necessary adjustment assistance is a little bit of tax adjustment here or a little tax expenditure there that does not address the need to render Canadian industry competitive.

The hon. member will know that in the case of the free trade agreement with the United States, for example, the government chose to follow one-half of the recommendations of the Macdonald commission.

That commission recommended that Canada negotiate free trade with the United States. The other half of the Macdonald commission, which the government somehow overlooked, was that in parallel it would be incumbent upon the Government of Canada to put in place those policies to render Canadians competitive.

Somehow a collective amnesia overtook the government at that stage. It forgot. It did not see that part of the Macdonald commission's recommendations.

One can have various opinions about the efficacy of the free trade agreement but I do not think that anyone could possibly argue that the primary failure of the free trade agreement is the primary failure of the Canadian government to put in place the programs which would have enabled Canadian labour and Canadian business to compete effectively in the U.S. market.

I would suggest that beyond the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement remain those same questions that confront Canadians, that challenge Canadian industry.

The government having moved toward freer trade has abdicated its other responsibility. It said: "We will lower barriers or eliminate barriers, but we will not offer the Canadian people the leadership in rendering themselves competitive".

What has this government done to improve the educational system, to improve the system of training and retraining? What has this government done to encourage substantial research and development in Canada? What has this government done to break down internal barriers in Canada which can render this country more effective, more competitive internationally?

The specific instance that the hon. member cites in the case of food processing is a classic example. Down came the barriers. "Sorry, we have no assistance for you making yourselves more competitive in the food processing industry. We will not provide you with any leadership. We will not provide you with any tax incentives. We will not provide you with any training or retraining. We will not provide the leadership which could make a reality of international competitiveness for Canada. What we have done", says the government, "is penalize Canadian workers and Canadian business by not matching our commitment to freer markets with effective adjustment assistance".

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, to the member opposite, I am glad to see him acknowledging that the government is moving in the right direction although he chides the government that it has not done enough.

However, in making his assumptions about what the government is doing or not doing in the amount of room that it has to manoeuvre, it is interesting to note that an article in this morning's Gazette entitled: "Economists Disagree Over Ottawa's Budget Forecast" states: "In contrast the C.D. Howe Institute said the budget is framed in a credible, economic forecast which leaves more room for pleasant than unpleasant surprises". Toward the end of the article it also talks about a survey of 20 analysts last week by MMS International that found that most are more optimistic than the Minister of Finance.

I want to ask the hon. member opposite: Would he not rather the government move in the right direction and not move too far so as to upset the apple cart, but to keep the things if we have a fragile recovery which is going on—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret but the time has expired for questions and comments. You will have to ask him behind the curtain.

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you for giving me an opportunity to contribute a few words to this debate.

I want to congratulate my colleague and good friend, the Minister of Finance, for an excellent budget. He promised a realistic budget and he delivered on that.

For our colleagues who have served as long as you and I have in this House this budget is no doubt a bit of a novelty in the sense that it has a tax cut. I would be hard pressed really to remember when there ever was a tax cut in any of the budgets that various Ministers of Finance have laid before the House which is always a big occasion here.

This budget is not just important for what it contains. It is more important for the message that it attempts and perhaps successfully conveys, the message to investors, the message to business, and the message to consumers.

The message is that the government intends to stay the course. It is going to continue to restrain government spending. It is going to continue to cut and reallocate expenditures. The budget also demonstrates that the government has listened not only to the voices that we hear every day, the shrill voices, but also the voices of ordinary Canadians.

I just dug into my own mailbag. I know all of us have our own files for people who make comments on certain aspects of our work. I will just remind you of a few things here.

I had an ongoing dialogue with Mr. Taylor, an accountant, all the way from Tumbler Ridge in my riding and Don Thompson from Fort Nelson. He constantly points out to me some of the inequities in our family law and how married couples, in particular, are treated with respect to income tax. There is obviously some satisfaction in that the budget has responded to that.

Ms. Birchall from Dawson Creek, B.C. writes to me and complains about public service wages and points out, as does Mr. Fuhr from Fort St. John, that perhaps members of Parliament and ministers should take a lead here. So there is some comfort in the budget.

Perhaps the only bad point in the budget is that my salary has been decreased by 5 per cent, but what a small sacrifice to make in an effort to restore the kind of confidence that is necessary among the public if we are to succeed.

Mr. Haagsman of Hudson's Hope, British Columbia places a high priority on the need for government to control spending. Mr. Don Clapper of Prince George talks about the high interest rates. It goes on and on and on. All of us have these files. It is important to send a signal, to tell people that they have helped to write the budget and the government has listened.

There are some very important themes in the budget: reducing the burden of borrowing, reducing the burden of taxation and regulations. Admittedly it is not, as we all know, the easy course. The easy course would have been to follow the advice that we are getting, particularly from our friends opposite. Anyone who has ever managed a business or anyone who has ever managed a department would know how difficult it is to reduce spending, to reduce staff, to forgo some opportunities out there that would make one look good from time to time.

From all indications the message has been received. The reaction from those to whom the message was directed is very positive at least in the early stage. The dollar has increased. The market shows positive signs. Frankly what this budget shows are the beneficial results of the tough measures and stern policies we have consistently followed since we came here in 1984. The confidence that we have earned, staying firm against all odds and political sensitivities, particularly during these recessionary times, will bode well in carrying through our mandate.

One of the criteria of assessing a budget has to be the quality and the accuracy of the assumptions that a finance minister makes in his forecasting. For the benefit of our friends opposite who are criticizing this budget and our approach, let me quote a few figures. I will go back to the 1991 budget. The Minister of Finance had to make certain assumptions. He said that in 1991–1992 the rate of inflation would be 5.6 per cent and in 1992–1993 it would be 3.2 per cent. Our memory is good enough to remember the opposition's critique of this particular forecast, that never would we be able to achieve that in such a short period of time. We all know what the inflation rate is today. It is less than 2 per cent. We exceeded our expectations in this area.

Let us look at interest rates: 9.5 per cent for 1991–92; 9 per cent, 1992–93; 7.5 per cent, 1993–94. All of us know that we are a year ahead of our forecasts. We have done very well. The rate of unemployment was estimated at 10 per cent in 1991–92 and 9.98 per cent in 1992–93. Admittedly we are out; we have erred by 1 per cent or 1.5 per cent and the unemployment rate, as we would all agree, is unacceptably high.

The forecast on the deficit is particularly telling because it is right on.

I want to make some comparisons with a similar budget at a similar time in an economic cycle 10 years ago, the so-called MacEachen budget of 1981—82. The deficit in 1980 was $12.1 billion. The Liberals were fighting deficit spending. They had been increasing, as we know, their operational spending by 15 per cent a year on an average over the preceding 10 years. The deficit was the big problem. The forecast in that November 1981 budget was that they were going to get the deficit down to $10 billion; there would be a $2 billion reduction in the deficit.

When all was said and done, he had to bring in another budget in June at which time it had grown to 19.5 per cent, just 100 per cent out. When it was actually finished, at the end of the fiscal year the deficit was $24.6 billion or a 139 per cent mistake.

These are the kinds of comparisons we have to make to put into context what we are doing.

Let us look at interest rates, Liberal interest rates at their highest. The chartered bank prime rate was 22.75 per cent. They are 8 per cent today. These are some of the figures one would have to put on the table when one compared the approach used by our predecessors to confront some very difficult situations such as the one we find ourselves in at the present time.

It is important to point out these things because opposition members are urging upon us the same policies, the same kind of advice that they were following at that time. We all know from the 1981 to 1983 experience what the consequences of following such advice would be. You cannot spend yourself rich; you cannot drink yourself sober. There is no limit to their idea of how gullible the public is in actually giving it any credibility when they make these suggestions. We know what the programs were that they foisted on the Canadian public at the time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I gave the minister the wrong signal. He has until 3.55 p.m. as far as his time is concerned. I do not want him to go any faster than he has to.

Mr. Oberle: The advice we are getting is to borrow money to stimulate the economy. They say that we should throw money at everything, whether it is education, research, or whatever it is. To throw money at it is their solution.

They also say that we should keep out foreign competition. In a situation in which we found ourselves being more dependent on foreign trade than any industrialized country in the world, they should realize how preposterous some of these suggestions are.

I leave it to my colleagues to speak more about the details and the positive aspects of the budget. Let me just look at a few examples of the approach used by our predecessors at a time like this and what it produced.

In my previous incarnation I was Minister for Science. When I assumed the portfolio in 1985 I was faced with the so-called SRTCs, the scientific research tax credits. In 18 months they cost us $2.5 billion because everybody agreed that the country would have to engage in research and stimulate scientific activities to break out of a cycle and to become internationally competitive. What did it cost? All we had to do was offer people 120 per cent tax credits for any investment in scientific activities and, if it happened to require building a building or whatever. That was okay too. The country, scientists and people responded.

When it was all said and done 18 months later very little science and very little research had been produced. There was a lot of frivolous spending and trading off of tax credits. The cost to the Treasury was $2.5 billion.

Mr. Nowlan: That is why they won the election.

Mr. Oberle: Yes, that is why they won the election, as my friend from Nova Scotia says.

Then there were the fast-track buildings. I inherited one of those too. It happened to be in Winnipeg. It was painted pink. It acquired the name of pink elephant in Winnipeg. It was a beautiful, world-class centre and the architects should have received a world-class prize. There was a stainless steel spiral staircase in the building, the cost of which would have produced for sure two cures for cancer if it had been spent on science. There was an elevator right beside it, but the spiral staircase was the attraction of the building, which was sitting right in downtown Winnipeg.

But there was no science conducted there. It was just a building. It was my job to coerce and coax some private sector people to get in there and make some use of it. Frankly today, with a bit of effort, we actually do make some use of it.

Then there were the MURBs. Do we all remember the MURBs. I know a doctor of 55 to 60 years of age who was in the declining years of his career. He invested all his savings in Liberal government MURBs. He is still paying off the bill. He is literally living on his measly old age pension, having wasted his lifetime savings. All of us know people who were sucked in by the MURBs. They were to stimulate housing, get the housing industry going, create jobs and make us competitive.

Then there was the accelerated home mortgage program which was going to help all poor people get into homes. Members know how that worked. The payments would be very low; people could get into a new house with $300 a month. Of course the difference between the $300 and $700 that the payment should have actually been was added on to the mortgage.

After five years you could walk down the street and people were throwing keys at you. People were running away from their homes in droves because they cost $10,000 more than they could have built new houses for five to ten years later. That was the accelerated home mortgage program.

These are some of the policies that these people are urging upon us now.

They want to fix the municipal infrastructure. We have all heard about that. I want to tell the tale of two cities in Canada. The only criterion of the optimum size of each of these cities is one wants to be bigger than the other. The names of the cities are Montreal and Toronto.

I represent Prince George and Chetwynd. I talk to people who represent cities like Chicoutimi and smaller ones throughout the country.

The other criterion was that one had to have a bigger Olympic stadium than the other city and the taxpayers of Canada helped out a bit here and there. Now these cities want my people in Prince George, Chetwynd, Hudson's Hope and Pouce Coupe to pay for their water and sewer. Having paid for their own already, the people of Chicoutimi and so on are saying: "No. If the people of Montreal have problems with their water and sewage they should do the same thing we did, build their own secondary treatment centres".

The Liberals and the municipalities are saying: "Let the federal government pay for it and everyone else can participate". People are not that enthusiastic about these kinds of things. This is something that the provinces and the municipalities ought to worry about a bit more.

We have and we will continue to work from the premise that without a strong economy and without a fiscally stable national account the government can really deliver nothing but a fool's paradise. There is no school of architecture for a castle in the sky.

The reality is and has been for some time, the reality that we inherited when we came here in 1984, that our economy has been operating on a sort of post-Christmas blues. It is time for us now to trade in the gifts that do not fit and pay the bills for those that do.

Canadians know what is important to them. Canadians know what they want. They want price stability once again. Yes, we do want to get back to the good old days. Mr. Speaker, you and I remember those days when we built our first homes. We could take out a mortgage for 6.5 per cent—mine was 6.75 per cent—for 25 years. We knew it would be 6.75 per cent. We knew what our payments would be for 25 years. I was lucky enough to be able to pay it off a little earlier. We could plan our family budgets around that.

That is really what is meant by price stability: to get back to a rate of inflation that is never more and perhaps a bit less than the growth in the economy, never more than what the country can afford in terms of the increase in the money supply so that we have stable, fixed interest rates. That is what price stability means. That is what we are trying to get back to. That is what people want. They want predictability, they want security, and you do not get that with 22 per cent mortgage rates. Ten years ago a $75,000 mortgage cost $300 a month more than it does today. Are there any benefits to homeowners, to poor people with children? Of course there are and frankly the people know it.

Let us just consider for a moment what we have deprived ourselves of by not following the kind of policies that our friend, our previous finance minister, and our present finance minister have charted for us. It costs us $40 billion a year to service the debt. Could you imagine what we could do with $40 billion? For one thing we could get rid of the GST because it produces roughly $20 billion to $22 billion. We could get rid of the GST. That is the first thing we could do.

Then we could bring in a universal child care program perhaps. The cost of that is estimated at $6 billion to $7 billion. Look at all the money we would have left. We could even transfer some money to the provinces to help their cities renew their municipal infrastructure and to start rebuilding their city cores. Can you imagine what we could do? We could double old age pensions. We could help the deprived and those who live on the margins of life.

Our friend and colleague, the Minister of Finance, has brightened the light at the end of the tunnel quite a bit because he is taking us a giant step closer to the day when we will have a balanced budget just three years from now. For some of our colleagues and practitioners of the art of politics, it seems to be a major preoccupation to resist progress at any cost. Perhaps in their spare time they decry the fact that there is not any progress. The people of Canada know a good budget when they see it and they see a good budget here.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I listened throughout the hon. minister's speech and I must ask how one individual can interpret what was said in the House the day before yesterday and another one interpret it in such an opposite direction.

To me it was a laissez faire budget. I come from an area that is dependent on natural resources. The minister certainly represents one of those resources here in the House, forestry, a renewable resource, an industry that is certainly suffering to an extent that we have never seen here in Canada before. This laissez faire budget increases the Canadian dollar today because business seems to be happy, takes away housing measures that are needed not only to stimulate building but to help thousands of Canadians to have shelter whether they are seniors, whether they are poor or whether they are working Canadians who wanted to get into a co-op. All that is a stimulation to the forest industry if you have housing or rural and native programs that would help repair or build houses for people.

I cannot believe that the people who used to be able to get a few dollars in the winter time or a cord of wood that would be sold away would like to hear this minister say: "Keep the Canadian dollar going high, it certainly helps our exports". I cannot believe that this was such a good budget. I cannot believe that he did not read one letter from an unemployed person in his riding. I have to say that I see people who are in the natural resource sector and who are unemployed and who have never been unemployed, people who are over 40 and have never been unemployed and who are over 50 and have never been unemployed. They are shocked at being unemployed in this great country. The Minister of Finance stands up here, good salesman that he is, as a former Minister of Transport who got the mess that we are in getting rid of VIA. Look at our air industry that does not know where it is going. Agriculture, follow us all the way to the GATT and we will protect you, not telling us what else we are going to get out of the GATT.

Follow us all the way, farmers, all the way to the GATT and we will protect you. We know the day after it is signed if there is no article XI where we will be.

This week we had a minister stand up here and I do not know if he mentioned unemployment once. I do not know if he mentioned the renewable resources that we have here in Canada and what the direction must be to get out of this made-in-Canada slump, this attitude of people toward this government that we are not moving. There is no vision for Canada except Bush or what the Americans tell us.

Will the Minister of Forestry tell me what he did to influence his cabinet colleagues to help the forestry industry to revive, to get people back to work, to give them some respect rather than staying home wondering where they are going to get a job in this country?

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, some of the advice I gave my colleagues is already paying handsome dividends in implementation. We have, perhaps my hon. friend does not know, experienced a heavy demand on our lumber products. The price for dimensioned lumber and spruce, pine, and fir shipments has increased by 30 per cent since the beginning of the year. Why do we not try and be a little positive. There are no more shutdowns. There are recalls in the mills.

My friend is right when she says that one of the pieces of advice we have been getting from the opposition and from people outside is that we should drive the dollar down, thus helping the research sector. Let me just give her an idea. If a low or a weak currency were a solution and a ticket to prosperity, why is it that all the countries with firm, stable, high currencies are the richest countries in the world: Germany, Japan, Switzerland. Why do they not lower their currency and get even more rich? Why are Mexico, Guatemala and countries that have a less stable currency not the rich countries? Is there some kind of a value or virtue in driving down your dollar and cheating the people you trade with in a short period of time by paying for their goods in a watered down currency?

Let me tell the story of the low dollar in the forest products industry. My friend would remember that in 1976 our dollar was actually above the U.S. dollar by 1 cent. Our dollar was worth $1.01 U.S. The return on investment and sales of the industry was 9.7 per cent that year with that high currency.

As well, I would remind my hon. friend of the "Diefenbuck" in 1963 when the dollar was down to 93 cents and they said it would be the doom of the Canadian economy because we had too low a dollar. I remind him of all these things. I take them ahead now when the great architects, the social engineers, were sitting in the treasury benches and had driven the dollar down to 73 cents; 73 cents was the worth of our dollar in 1985. The return on investments and sales of the industry, zero. The industry was broke. It did not help them a bit.

In 1989, the dollar was at 84 cents. The returns were up something like 12 or 13 per cent. Sure, the dollar is a determining factor of the industry's prosperity. The Swedes devalued their currency and pegged their krona a few years back. You ask them if they would ever do it again. Sure it gives you short term relief for three or four months, but do you know that for every dollar you sell you have to buy something back. When you buy it back, you pay in higher currency. It brings about inflation. It brings about higher interest rates. Do you see why you had 20 per cent interest rates and what the reason for that was? The reason was 12 and 13 per cent inflation and the low dollar. Do you understand that? Sure I could write a budget and an economic policy that would satisfy and work in the best interest of the forest industry. I could do that in the morning before breakfast and I could throw in all the other resource industries and write a budget before noon. But when you look at the total picture and the total economy and at the future of our children and grandchildren, then you have to sit down and think. That is what we did when we wrote this budget.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member spoke of a realistic budget, but how can he call it realistic when he has not addressed the realities of today. I submit that this budget is more like a shell game where the movement of the hand is quicker than the movement of the eyes.

I ask how this government can face the 1.5 million unemployed Canadians and the 2 million people forced to take welfare assistance and at the same time admit that the unemployment rate will remain at nearly 10 per cent for the next two years.

What answer does the member and his government have, if any, to a couple in my constituency, both pensioners, forced to support their unemployed son and daughter-in-law and not even get a tax break? What answer does this government have for constituents who feel aggrieved that capital gains exemptions would be allowed on other assets but not on their only second real estate asset? How would this government ensure our youth and children will have a future through education and training programs?

In the middle of his speech he said he would like to speak on "A Tale of Two Cities in Canada". Perhaps he should have spoken on the tale of two terms of the federal Tory government in Canada. In the first term we saw an increase in taxes 33 times. It doubled the national debt. It imposed the GST. It choked the provinces. It allowed poverty to increase.

During the second term taxes continued to increase, cuts continued to be imposed on provinces, the recession happened.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am sorry. The hon. member's time has expired. I am sorry I cannot get the minister to answer.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I will not say that I am happy to participate in the budget debate, but I am anxious to participate in the budget debate.

I have to say to the minister who has just spoken that I found his comments in one respect extremely offensive and, let me say, beneath a minister of the Crown. At one point during his debate, rather than relying upon substance, relying upon facts to deal with the municipal infrastructure program that has been proposed by members of this party, the Federation of Municipalities and by most of the provinces as a job creation measure, rather than relying upon a proper analysis of the program to show either its merit or lack of merit, what did the minister of the Crown say? He said: "Well, back in my riding my taxpayers are not going to want to support a municipal infrastructure program. Their tax dollar is going to help Montreal and Toronto. Therefore, they do not support this program".

I want all members present to think about what the minister said. The minister was practising the politics of division, a subtle form of tribalism. That is what he was doing. A federal minister of the Crown who should be speaking for all of Canada, all the time, tried to attack a job creation measure in the face of 1.5 million unemployed, not on the basis that the program did not make sense or was not worth while, but by trying to conjure up the image that the people who live in his riding—it is a great riding. I have been there. I have visited the minister's riding—might see some of their tax dollars going into Toronto or Montreal. To appeal to the tribal instinct, to be opposed for that reason and that reason only, is a shameful performance by a minister of the Crown.

In every region, every province of this country, there are major capital intensive projects that have benefited from the tax dollars of the rest of the country and they are not all in Montreal and Toronto. Some are in Atlantic Canada, some are on the prairies, some are in British Columbia. There is a major particle collider super-duper project now going ahead in British Columbia at the cost of hundreds of millions of taxpayers' dollars, not only from the taxpayers of British Columbia but from right across Canada. That is right and proper and is as it should be.

There are major federal facilities in the minister's own riding—I have been to his riding—that have been built with taxpayers' dollars from all across Canada. That is as it should be.

The notion of a municipal infrastructure program proposed by the leader of the Liberal Party, the Liberal Party, the Federation of Municipalities, and by almost all of the provinces is a major proposal to invest in the infrastructure of this nation and to put some of our people back to work. That is as it should be. It should be weighed on its merits and not attacked by the tribal politics of this minister who suggests that we do not want to have a project because it means that the money from taxpayers of one region might be spent for the benefit of taxpayers in another region.

We are a nation, or we are not. We believe in sharing the resources, sharing the wealth, sharing the opportunity, sharing the potential and sharing the problems of nationhood, or we do not. It is disappointing to see a minister of the Crown who ought to know better appeal to tribal instincts as a means of attacking a worth-while project.

Why is that project so important? It is important because it was not contained in the budget. This budget has to be measured against the reality of Canada today. The minister said he was going to bring in "a realistic budget". That is the standard he established. It would be a realistic budget. That is what he told us.

What is the reality of Canada today? The reality of Canada is that there are 1.5 million Canadian citizens who have taken the trouble to register at a Canada Manpower Centre and say that they are ready, willing, able and anxious to work, that they are available for work, want to work, need to work, want the dignity of a pay cheque. However, nobody is calling. A million and a half people.

There are another 2.5 million people who have given up. They have not even registered at the Canada Manpower Centres. They have not even made an application lately. They are on welfare. Four million people either registered, are anxious, able, and actively looking for work, or have given up. That is the reality of our country today. With four million either unemployed or on welfare there are millions more—and every member of Parliament knows it—who live in fear every day that when they go to work in the morning the boss is going to tell them that their job is disappearing soon, or that they are going to be laid off.

There is fear in this country today. There is fear felt by the average working man or woman such as has never been felt before in our history. People are afraid.

The very morning of the budget I was going upstairs to have breakfast in the cafeteria of this building. The lady who served breakfast looked around to make sure that nobody could overhear her and said: "Mr. Tobin, do you think there will be something to get the country working again in this budget? Because I am afraid, I am afraid for my job, I am afraid for my sons and daughters, I am afraid for my friends. I have never felt afraid before". There is fear in the land. Even an employee of the national government, supposedly the safest job in the world, even someone employed in the House of Commons feels fear.

How do we measure this budget? We were told it would be realistic. Does this budget put back to work the 1.5 million who want to work but cannot find work? Does it offer to retrain, to stimulate, to motivate the 2.5 million who have gone on welfare? Does it give a sense of security, a sense of being able to sleep at night, to the millions more who are working but who fear losing their jobs at any time, even for a moment?

Not at all. Against that standard, against that test, this budget has failed this country.

Not only does the budget say to those who are unemployed, those who are without work: "You are on your own", but it then goes on to predict right in the budget paper—and these are not my words. These are not the words of the opposition. This is not the analysis of those who want to score political points. It is right in the budget document. It then goes on to tell us that unemployment is going to stay at a level in excess of 10 per cent for the next two years, in the range of 10 per cent. It tells us that 1.5 million unemployed people and 2.5 million people on welfare, that 4 million Canadians are acceptable losses in the so-called war against inflation.

I find that absolutely callous. I find it cruel. Frankly, measured against the responsibility of any government with a heart, I find it cowardly that a government would stand and say that not only has it no plan of action to deal with cruel levels of unemployment but it projects that those levels of unemployment will exist for at least another two years. Then, far enough into the future when supposedly no one can argue with the government it says: "By the way, 24 months down the road unemployment will mysteriously and miraculously fall to seven per cent".

A government that could find absolutely no money for the farmers being driven off the land across this country—40,000 of whom were here in front of the Parliament Buildings only a few days ago—a government that can find no solace, no money, no support for the fishermen being driven from the seas in the face of the onslaught of foreign overfishing, a government that could offer no hope to those without skills who have even given up looking, a government that could offer no concrete program, no municipal infrastructure program, or any other program for the 1.5 million unemployed, that same government found some charity in its heart to include $7 million in this budget to build, what? A museum of humour in Montreal. It is here in black and white, $7 million to build a museum in Montreal.

The government says it is going to make hard, tough choices. That is what the minister who spoke before me told us. He said: "We will make the tough choices for Canada". Seven million dollars for a museum of humour. That has to be the most public and sickest joke this country has experienced for some time. Perhaps the first item that ought to reside in the museum of humour is this budget.

Mr. Blenkarn: I thought you were going.

Mr. Tobin: The member for Mississauga South who has announced that he is no longer chairman of the finance committee and is going to resign in advance of the onslaught of the polls in the next election, that courageous member, who having served as a Conservative member of Parliament for eight years will not even stay around to face his constituents in the next election, barks at me as he departs the Chamber. It is a single act of bravery on the way to being consigned to the dusty and forgotten shelves of the history of this place. The member ought to get on his feet and talk about this budget.

This government says that it wants to do more for the children of Canada. It says that one of the great accomplishments of this budget is that we are going to do more for children. It has killed off, to quote the minister of health—the killer—a national child care program and it has announced that it is going to spend $2.1 billion over the next five years for Canada's children. What it does not tell us, because it dare not, is that it has slashed and cut $3.2 billion in child benefits over the last five years.

The government actually expects to be applauded for spending $2.1 billion over the next five years when it has cut $3.2 billion over the last five years.

Perhaps the part of this budget that is hardest to swallow coming from an administration that since its inception in 1984 has introduced 33 tax increases equalling nearly $2000 in additional taxes for an average family of four, is the claim that it contains a tax cut.

The government got up, pounded itself on the chest and said: "We brought in a tax cut". It expects Canadians, like Pavlov's dog, to get up and applaud over this tax cut.

Mr. Speaker, being a man of great integrity I know that you are interested in knowing exactly what this tax cut amounts to. What has the government cut? Has it cut the personal income tax rate? No. Has it cut the GST, the tax on all goods and services? No. Has it narrowed the tax on goods and services in Canada and eliminated some items? No. Well what did it cut? It cut the rate of a surtax on personal income. It did not cut the personal income tax rate, ladies and gentlemen listening across the land. That is not going down one cent. It cut the surtax.

What is this great surtax? It was introduced in 1985 by this government as a temporary tax targeted at reducing the deficit. Now it is 1992 and it is going to cut the temporary tax marginally and it expects applause.

What do the budget papers say about this tax cut? Those who have the document should refer to page 135. What is this great tax cut? It is going to stimulate the economy, send consumers rushing to the nearest mall and create thousands and untold thousands of new jobs. Let us look at it.

These again are the budget papers. These are not my notes. These are not Liberal documents. These are not New Democratic Party documents. These are not press documents and these are not political documents. These are budget documents, the government's own numbers.

What will this mean for a one-earner couple earning $15,000 a year with two children, in other words, the poorest amongst us? Four people in one house, one unit, one apartment, one building with an income of $15,000 a year are going to have a great big tax cut. The government has outlined it for us. It works out to be $2. They are going to get a $2 tax cut this year. A family of four with an income of $20,000 is going to have a tax cut of—get ready, get a grip on yourself, turn up the pacemaker—$6. By the way that is $2 a year, $6 a year, not a day, not a month, not a week, but a year. A family of four with an income of $30,000, it gets more generous as we go on, is going to have a tax cut of $15. If you have a family income of $40,000 you will get a tax cut of $27, but if you get all the way up to $100,000 you get a tax cut of $111.

You would have to be the world's greatest used car salesman, and I say that with all respect to used car salesmen, to stand up and suggest that this so-called tax cut of $2 a year, $6 a year, $15 a year, or $27 a year is going to stimulate the economy?

If this budget was a used car it would have no wheels.

The Government of Canada cannot be serious when it suggests that it is trying to reach down to assist those greatest in need and to give an economic shot in the arm to the economy of this country. It cannot be serious when it says that it wants to demonstrate some compassion on the one hand and on the other hand get this economy going again.

Mr. Benjamin: No, they really believe that stuff.

Mr. Tobin: My friend from the New Democratic Party from the riding of Regina—Lumsden, a great member of Parliament who is leaving—it will be very hard to fill his shoes but we will find a good Liberal to do it—says that the government really believes this stuff. I am not as cruel as he. I do not believe that even the government believes its foolish claim to stimulate the economy with that stingy, miserly, miserable, ridiculous, insulting, cold, cruel, callous-hearted $2 tax break. Not even the government believes its own rhetoric when it tells us it is going to stimulate the economy with that. The government also claims that it is providing some minor tax cuts. Even my friend, the member for Mississauga South, would admit they are minor. The member would admit with his great expertise that they are minor, that they are going to really instil a new degree of confidence in the business community. The reality is that the collection of minor measures, designed to give some kind of break to business, to engender a degree of confidence in the business community, are dramatically offset every time the interest rate rises. When real interest rates in Canada are posted alongside U.S. rates they are dramatically higher in this country than is the case south of the border.

Those so-called minor concessions are more than wiped out when we see, as we did today, the value of the Canadian dollar going up. We are an exporting nation. Whether we are exporting fish, mineral products, forestry products or manufactured products, this is an exporting nation. It is one of the largest exporting nations in the world. It is one of the nations of the western world, the G-7 group, most dependent upon exports for its financial health. When our dollar goes up, our ability to compete as an exporting nation declines.

The government pursues blindly its policy of high real interest rates and a high dollar. Canadians are being led to believe that interest rates have dramatically fallen. We acknowledge that and we applaud that. The cost of doing business in Canada compared to the cost of doing business south of the border is still dramatically higher. My friend from Mississauga South would acknowledge that because we cannot argue with the numbers.

There is nothing here that is going to dramatically improve the confidence level in the Canadian business community. What do we have? We had a Minister of Finance who declined to wear new shoes the day he delivered the budget. The reason he did not wear new shoes is because he did not deliver a new budget. This budget is a retread of the last four or five budgets presented by the previous Minister of Finance. It is the same old policy from the same old government that got us into the mess we are in in the first place.

Canadians wanted change, constructive change. They wanted proactive government, a government determined to get this country working again. Against that test, this budget has failed this country. This budget has not contributed to a healthier economy. It has not contributed to a healthier political climate. It has not contributed to national unity. It has not contributed a single thing to those people who most need at this time in our history the chance to go back to work, the dignity of a pay cheque and some restored confidence in the fundamental health and strength of this country.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I always enjoy the humour of the hon. member and he undoubtedly will be the first guest if there ever are guests at the museum for humour. He will intrigue us all. The whole country will benefit from his humour. It is too bad, having made such a humorous speech, it did not have some reality in it. One of these days he will find out that unemployment rates are determined by Statistics Canada and not by the Unemployment Insurance Commission. After he is around here for a while he will learn that.

Let us get down to something else he talked about. He grabbed viciously at page 135, dealing with the savings people make on the surtax. He did not go over to page 138. If he would like to go over to page 138, let us talk about the savings of a single parent earning $20,000 a year. It is $639, not bad.

If we get down to a single parent with $100,000, it is $328, but get down further. These tables are there and they are substantially different. That is really what counts.

There is a program to reduce a surtax. A surtax is an extra tax. That surtax is coming down in year one by 1 per cent, from 5 per cent to 4 per cent, in year two from 4 per cent to 3 per cent and hopefully, as the minister comes forward next year with a budget, he will be able to go down from 3 per cent to 2 per cent or 3 per cent to 1 per cent, or maybe eliminate it completely as this country grows, as it is growing as business confidence is clearly demonstrated in this budget.

He talks about the dollar. Does he not realize the dollar in exchange markets with the United States is strong? Would he have a weak dollar? Would he have a chicken dollar? It is strong, but it is down 500 basis points since the first of the year.

What kind of an economy would he like? Would he like a strong economy like Germany, the largest trading country in the world, where its currency and relation to the dollar has done nothing but harden year after year after year? Or would he like a weak currency like the currency of Argentina?

It is clearly the Liberal policy to have the Argentina policy. Borrow more money because borrowing only got you in trouble. Build more public works with more borrowed money so the rate of interest can go up and up and up and put the country out of work.

If borrowing made the country strong and if borrowing made the country rich, this country with its debts would be the richest in the world by far.

If the hon. member's policy in his tribute to humour is to borrow more money for more projects, then we would not be in the mess we are in. I guess that is the humour of the Liberal Party.

Let me advise him too, while he is shivering in his boots, that should I get the nomination for the Progressive Conservative Party in Mississauga South I will be contesting the election as it comes up.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I hope that those who were paying attention to this debate will note that the member complained that I used the table on page 135 that showed that there was only a $2 reduction in the surtax on personal income.

Then he asked me why did I not refer to page 138. Please note that he started to quote from the page but when he got a look at the numbers he swallowed hard and shucked them aside and said what does it matter?

Let us quote from page 138. Page 138 is the combined effect of both the surtax reduction, the $2 cut, and the child tax benefit. The member wanted me to quote that page. Let me quote from it. If you are a single parent and you have an income of $10,000 a year, standing right here or a parent with $100,000 a year standing right here, what does the government do?

It gives the combined child tax benefit and surtax reduction for a single parent with a $10,000 income of $500. If you make $100,000, 10 times more income, you get a benefit reduction of $328. That is why the member swallowed hard and sat down. He realized that it is totally indefensible that the total tax benefit to a single parent with a $10,000 a year income is $500 and the same person with $100,000 a year income—10 times more—gets a break almost as big as that person starving to death with only a $10,000 income.

That is why the member was in shock when he picked up page 138 and attempted to use it as an arrow in his bow. He found out he shot himself in the head which is not unusual for the member for Mississauga South.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I was really dumbfounded when the member for Mississauga referred to the speech of my colleague, in this debate, as humour.

That is an insult to Canadians. My colleague most eloquently, more so perhaps than any member of this House, was able to reflect the needs of Canadians because he is sensitive and caring. That is what the Liberal Party is all about.

As I was listening to my colleague I learned a few more things. I learned that there is such a thing as Tory arithmetic. If you want to say that you are doing good, do bad things for six years and in the last two years pretend you are doing something good. In the equation, it will look like you are doing good. That cannot fool Canadians.

I also learned that Tory reality is fantasy. It is fantasy. It has forgotten about the unemployed, those forced to receive welfare assistance. I also learned that a Tory promise is one that is broken even before the last word is said or put on a piece of paper, as has been the case with the national child care program. I also learned that Tory honesty is when one plays a shell game.

I would like to ask the hon. member to comment further. I would like to listen to more of his eloquence so that Canadians can be truly represented in this House. I hope the hon. member from Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte would oblige.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, am I out of time?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): You have one and a half minutes.

Mr. Tobin: One and a half minutes.

An hon. member: You just got warmed up.

Mr. Tobin: No, I do not have to get warmed up. This government has warmed me up. It has put fire in my belly. It has redoubled my determination that I shall be there with the people of Canada when next this crowd has the courage to confront them at the polling booth.

I am delighted that the member for Mississauga South has again refired his interest and found his heart and is ready to go out and face his constituents. I find it passing strange that only a few months ago he had lost his heart, but obviously he thinks there is enough fantasy in this document to go out and face his constituents again.

In the part of the country where I come from, this document, this budget will never wash. You know the people of my province are proud to say when they see this kind of guff—and here comes the biggest guffer, the member from St. John's West—they are proud to say that we are from Newfoundland not Disneyland and this kind of fantasy will never fly where people put up with no guff from the likes of the member for St. John's West or, for that matter, the member for Mississauga South.

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, it has been quite entertaining sitting here listening to the blarney.

First of all, I would like to compliment the Minister of Finance on an excellent budget that I think makes progress in a number of important areas. I would like to concentrate my remarks on the changes in the social system in Canada that are presented in the proposal for child benefit changes.

Much of this came from the report of the child poverty committee that I chaired, as well as the family caucus committee that I also participated in. I think the earned income supplement is really something that is quite revolutionary for Canada and is something that we can be very proud of in introducing.

One of the things that our committee noticed was that people who escaped poverty in Canada were employed. They had jobs. In order to escape poverty you have to have a good job in Canada. One of our recommendations was that the minimum wage be set at a level equivalent to the low income cut-off for an individual. This is so in a few provinces in Canada, including Ontario and Quebec.

In Ontario, an individual can make, using the minimum wage, about $12,480 for full-time work. A family with two income earners under this program, with the added earned income supplement will be out of poverty. They will be able to earn an income if they both work of $27,500 in total with the child benefit, the low income cut-offs for Ontario for a large city. The highest one with the 1986 base is $26,803. That is going to be a major incentive for people to work. Similarly, a single parent in Ontario can make $12,480 at full-time employment. They will get $1,520 for their child benefit, an increase of $500. They will also get a full equivalent to married tax exemption and they are eligible for child care expenses. Admittedly, they would not get very much there but they will not pay any tax at all. Therefore, they are going to be getting $14,000 tax free, which is a very substantial improvement over where they are now.

The statistics in the book look at averages and they are sometimes misleading. What you really have to do is look at how it affects people individually. The biggest problem we have in Canada is trying to help people to work and to make it fairer for people to work. Our problem is not in keeping people happy and productive at the very upper end of the income level. Our problem is helping people at the lower end to become active and participating members of the community. If they can go out and work and earn an income that is above the poverty line, their children will be a lot better off and have better opportunities. They can earn the minimum wage, work hard and they can move up the ladder and can eventually attain quite a good income.

We had recommended a guaranteed earned income supplement and suggested a federal-provincial task force to design it. Very cleverly the finance department has been able to develop a system that makes use of the existing family allowance identification system and simply meshes information from the tax form to the family allowance so that cheques can be sent out on a monthly basis. The cheques will begin in January 1993, assessed on the basis of this year's financial situation.

Many people have been unemployed this year and their situation may be worse than it will be next year, but they will be getting those benefits in the first three months based on the income they received this year. Next year they will get it based on the income they have next year. Therefore, instead of people going through the tax system and being assessed through that means, it is giving it before on the basis of the last tax forms so there will not be the need for a mathematical change at the end of the year. They have already assessed the money. I think it is very cleverly done.

In Ontario we are looking fairly good right now as far as the poverty situation is concerned. We have welfare incomes at a basic needs level. It is about 65 per cent of the poverty level, substantially higher than most provinces in the country. Eight out of ten provinces do not have welfare at the basic needs level. This is a problem we have to address in order to give equal opportunity to children across this country. This was also a recommendation of our poverty report.

The concept was that welfare would cover basic needs. Quite clearly there are enormous gaps. New Brunswick has the worst situation. It is well under 40 per cent of the poverty line. Around 60 per cent is the basic needs level.

Our concept was that the federal child benefit would be on top so that there would in fact be an adequate income for families to look after their children, something that would allow for discretionary needs beyond basic food, shelter and clothing.

While nothing additional has been given to the welfare recipient in this budget, a structure has been put in that I think is appropriate. I would, of course, have liked to see something more at the bottom end for welfare recipients and the child benefit but given our financial situation, I think this is a good start.

I believe the minister will be meeting with ministers of the various provinces and, hopefully, working to get some kind of national standards for welfare. It is important to have the gap between welfare and the working person. People have to be better off when they are working in order to have the incentive to work. Therefore, I think you need to have that kind of gap. Of course the New Democratic Party has a very different concept. They still have the gap, but what they would like to have is the minimum wage that is 60 per cent of the average industrial wage, which would be about $8.10 per hour. I think that would create poverty in this country such as we have never seen. I think the entire retail sector would be wiped out. I do not think, to be realistic, that we could possibly conceive of an $8.10 minimum wage in this country. I think going up to a minimum wage in each province at the low income cut-off and to welfare at a basic needs level, as well as this program that helps the working poor, would go a long way toward rectifying the problems.

The other area that I am concerned about is day care and the Canada Assistance Plan program for day care. Our committee had recommended that the 5 per cent limit on the Canada Assistance Plan, which applies in the three provinces that currently do not receive equalization, be lifted for the subsidized day care program alone. This was not done by the minister and I am disappointed about that. He felt that he did not have sufficient money. I do not think it is a big ticket item at the present time. Currently, we spend $275 million on subsidized day care. If you lifted the limit I do not think that too many provinces would be able to dramatically increase that at the present time, although of course provinces like Ontario would get a recovery because of the fact that they are now picking up an awfully large amount under the Canada Assistance Plan.

I think in the long term the program would develop slowly to increase the number of subsidized day care spaces. Having worked on this issue since 1972 in Toronto, it takes time to get day care centres built, it takes time to train workers. So it would be a gradual increase.

That program is geared to income. It helps the very needy and it helps people to work. I think very strongly that we should be expanding that program and assisting the provinces, because it is a provincially initiated program, to develop it. We also recommended various measures which could encourage business, schools and churches to take an interest in the day care issue and to help provide space and lower operating costs so that the cost of day care could be affordable to a lot of people.

In my community every single school has a day care centre and the high schools have them as well. The people who can afford to attend are the people who do not need subsidy. We have very few subsidized spaces now in Toronto. I personally find it repugnant that people who need to work or would otherwise be in poverty cannot get the subsidy that would allow them to have their children properly looked after. When you are in an urban area such as ours, there are very few people at home who can look after children, so the system of getting the neighbour down the street does not really work very well. Of course, at the income levels we are talking about, many of these people would not be eligible for very much of a day care expense deduction. So I think that subsidized day care program is extremely important in helping people to work.

We had also recommended that the day care expense deduction be changed to a refundable child care tax credit. I understand that the numbers that the Department of Finance came up with were rather dramatic. Once again, I think as long as you are charging a fee not everybody is going to take advantage of this. People who want to stay home with their very young infants will juggle their timetables to have a parent there. They will take their holidays and so on. I do not think there are outrageous amounts of money involved. I hope our committee will be looking further at that. I certainly intend to pursue the matter.

I think we made a very major step here and I think those who are standing up and saying that—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to the hon. member. I, too, am very pleased to see the use of the income tax system to provide, even if it is only in terms of a child benefit, a uniform income, for a start anyway. By this time next year, without any future stimulation to the economy, you may have to provide it to all people on social assistance across Canada. That may be the start of the guaranteed income. This is just the start of a guaranteed child benefit.

• (1650)

However, my question is one of concern. I realize that a person receiving a disability pension under Canada Pension, receives increments each year, according to the indexation. If they are also on family benefits, perhaps not in Ontario, but certainly in Nova Scotia, the family benefit is decreased by the amount of the increase of the Canada Pension. It is directly related. The provincial social services will take it away immediately on the payment. I am wondering if there is anything that the member can do to impress upon the minister there should be guidance given to the province, as the member so well said here about it, that it should be over and above, it should be help for.

I realize that it should be help for, but I know many provinces will take away the exact amount the person receives unless the federal government says to the provinces that this cannot be done. It sort of negates the whole aspect. If a woman who receives $800 a month for two children has her child benefit increased next January and immediately in February it is taken away, all I can see benefiting is the Canada Assistance Plan because the province is not paying for it. The Canada Assistance Plan benefits as well because the federal government will not be paying for it. Where you take away the child tax deduction from every family in Canada and take away the family allowance from every eligible mother in Canada and substituted this, all in all on the ledger, you have just taken it away from one part to pay the other. Maybe the hon. member would like to comment on that.

Ms. Greene: I very much agree with the member. I do not think we should have this system that has gone on for so many years in which the provinces and the federal government play games. We need national standards that ensure the income people receive from welfare and the benefits they receive are adequate to meet their needs, that they cover the basic needs level.

Similarly, when the federal government gives someone an increase, there is no way that the provinces should be taking that money away. This is why we said very clearly in our report that the child benefit should be on top, and I think that is most important. It does require negotiations with the provinces. The minister will be meeting with the provinces. I hope that these are high priorities on his list as I think this game which has been going on has hurt poor people in Canada and has made no one really responsible. It should be stopped. We need a far more accountable system. If you have national standards and if the federal money is on top, we can say that all Canadians have an adequate level of income and that children have the discretionary income available to their families so they can participate as full members of Canadian society.

I for one want universal opportunities for—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There are still a couple of questioners here.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): I listened with care to the member. I know she is very sincere and has worked hard on the child poverty committee. I wonder about some of the implications and the kind of almost dream-like thinking that the focus of these benefits is really to try to help poor people to work. It is like saying people are on welfare because they do not want to work and certainly a small bribe of an extra child benefit is not going to do very much. I wonder how people are going to find a job. She talks about two parents working and how it might bring the family with the child benefit out of poverty. Where are the people going to get the job especially in her province of Ontario where unemployment is so high? She said it looks fairly good, 65 per cent of poverty level. For families, I am sure that does not feel very good at all.

So where are they going to get the work? Even if they find a job where are they going to get the child care programs?

This government has refused to do anything about child care and in her province of Ontario they are taking away the availability of CAP funds for child care. The dream she had that this would magically solve unemployment for people is just crazy. I ask her: Where are these people going to find jobs? How are they ever going to get child care in order to take a job, if they are lucky enough to find one?

Ms. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I welcome this question. Quite clearly in Ontario we do have a very serious problem. People cannot afford to work. If you have more than two children right now, you are better off on welfare than taking a minimum wage job.

What will happen under this program is there will be an additional incentive to work. What I would ask the provincial government in Ontario to do is to provide more subsidized day care spaces rather than higher welfare rates.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I was trying to get a couple of more questions in here. I will not be able to do it. Questions and comments are now terminated.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Luc Joncas (Matapédia—Matane): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to thank my colleague from Don Valley North for sharing her allotted time with me. The budget that we are defending now is, in my opinion, an excellent budget since it clearly follows up on what Canadians have told us. I want to thank the Minister of Finance who consulted us before tabling this budget.

We know that in 1984, when we came into power, the accumulated debt already stood at $200 million. Quite often people do not make the difference between the accumulated debt and the annual deficit. A quick calculation shows that the debt we had then stood at $206 billion. Now, thanks to the efforts of this government since 1984, we have operating surpluses when you exclude the debt that was already there.

Last year we already had an operating surplus of $12 billion with our programs. If you make a projection over the next year, we might have a surplus of $25 billion. What must be explained to people is the fact that to those $206 billion that we had in 1984 you have to add the $239 billion in accumulated interest. So, if you add up the debt of 1984 with the compounded interest and then subtract the surplus you arrive at a total debt of $420 billion.

It is not easy for a government that comes into power, to have to manage such an operating deficit from the start. It is like asking a family that spends $100 per week on groceries to pay the rent, the interests on debts, or to make monthly payments on the car or the house when it is already $16 short to pay the $100 grocery bill. So you have to work on reducing superfluous expenses to eventually be able to pay only the grocery, then the interest on the debt, then reimburse the capital on that debt, and so on.

That is what the Conservative government is in the process of doing. We already have operating surpluses and a deficit that gets lower every year so that by 1994–1995 we will be able to start paying off the debt.

I think that this is a positive sign and that the management and operation of a government are a long term business rather than a short term one. When asked what they think of the government's approach the business community and the small business owners say that they support it. Who creates jobs? Small businesses, promoters and people like them. That's why we must manage the government in a way that will reassure them.

In this budget we announced a 1 per cent cut in personal income taxes this year which should inject $500 million in the economy. With another 1 per cent cut next year $1.2 billion more will flow into the economy. They say that 1 per cent is not much but if we had not done it we could have saved close to $2 billion which would reduce our deficit or our debt by the same amount. So I think that measure make things a little better for people and it represents an injection in the economy of a total amount of $2 billion over the next two years.

We also know that business—I mentioned it earlier—is the motor of our economy. But for too long it has been overburdened with taxes. Tax measures were not an incentive but rather a hindrance. Then a reduction of 1 per cent in the business tax rate was announced in the present budget. One knows that business profits are taxed from the very first cent after one year. When the tax rate on these profits is cut by 1 per cent, this percentage point is important for the business person who can then sell its product at a lower cost, thus promoting exports, increasing sales, which inevitably fosters job creation. When products are sold, more workers have to be hired. That is how things should be done, working together with the business people to create jobs for the future.

Furthermore, we are enabling business people. I know from experience that when you buy machinery you can claim capital cost allowances. So, when we announce a 30 per cent capital cost allowance rate in this budget this actually represents a lot of money for a business. Let us say you have $100,000 worth of equipment. If you deduct 30 per cent this represents $30,000 in deductions from profits. That is an incentive and it shows businessmen that this government sides with them and gives them an opportunity to tap an increasingly competitive world market in the years to come. Once again, that will mean new jobs.

Small businesses will also be allowed to access more risk capital at slightly lower rates. The maximum amount has been raised from $100,000 to $200,000. That will give the small business or the entrepreneur who wants to start a business good credit terms. It was also announced that $230 million would go to research and development.

All those budgetary items will be incentives for business. I heard the president of the Association des manufacturiers du Québec say on budget night that this kind of budget is a boost to small businesses and that he is quite glad at those announcements.

I want to emphasize also that this government gives us sound management. Since 1984, if we exclude interest costs on the accumulated debt, we have surpluses in operational budgets.

Furthermore, we have just done away with 46 government agencies which did not amount to much in the eyes of the Canadian public. In so doing, we are saving $22 million a year.

We often hear people, constituents from my riding, say that the Senate is expensive. You know that $22 million is approximately half the cost of the Senate and over a five-year period, we can save $1 billion. These are savings again, not expenditures.

Naturally, we have decreased the salary of the prime minister and the other ministers and it is not the first time we do so. It might seem very little but if we had done the opposite we would surely have been blamed for it. We decreased salaries and it is commendable.

Of course some corporations will be privatized and my colleague from Don Valley-North mentioned child benefits. All in all, I think this budget is an extraordinary one and I am convinced it will have an impact for years to come and it will revitalize the Canadian economy.

[English]

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member started his speech this afternoon by saying that it is a remarkable budget in response to the needs of the population. He went on to talk about the tax cuts of 1 per cent on the surcharge.

We have to remember that it is this government that has raised taxes 33 times since it came to power, including the GST.

This 1 per cent that he talks about for a family of four with a $15,000 income amounts to $2 a year. I do not understand how the hon. member can call that remarkable.

On the second point, he said that the budget responds to the needs of the population. I have a very simple question to ask the hon. member. If he says that the budget responds to the needs of the population, how does it respond to the needs of the 1.5 million people who are unemployed?

[Translation]

Mr. Joncas: Mr. Speaker, in her question, my colleague says that this government imposed taxes including the GST; this tax system had already been planned for a long time. It had even been discussed when her party was in power.

When the GST was implemented it was clear in the government's mind that it would enable us in future years to lower the personal income tax rate.

Very often workers tell us that it is no use killing oneself working or earning a little more if the government takes more in taxes. They have no choice. If they earn more, the government taxes it away. With the GST, we can have lower income tax rates and decide ourselves whether to consume or not and indirectly to pay tax or not, which is not the case with income tax. I believe that the orientation of this kind of tax, the GST, is good for consumers and they understand it more and more.

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I heard the hon. member for Matapédia—Matane say in referring to the budget that it would reduce the deficit. I was born in his riding, Mr. Speaker, and the unemployment rate there is now between 30 and 35 per cent. There is nothing about fighting unemployment in this budget either in the regions or urban centres.

However, the most outrageous measure this budget contains is probably the cut affecting co-operative housing. Housing co-operatives are a proving ground for entrepreneurship where people with modest incomes develop a sense of solidarity so that together they can become homeowners. The budget does contain home ownership incentives for people who are well off but the co-operative housing program has been cut altogether. This reflects a total lack of concern while at the same time the government says: We are concerned about children, about poor families, and we have overhauled the family allowance system. We will give you a cheque, but don't try and do anything for yourselves. Don't try to develop any solidarity with the kind of groups I have in my own riding, Mr. Speaker, such as the Société populaire d'habitation de Rosemont and the Ateliers populaires du Plateau Mont-Royal, which help people to take control of their lives.

I see the hon. member for Laval. When he was mayor, he always refused to allow co-operative housing. No wonder!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The period for questions and comments has now expired.

[English]

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct some remarks not only to the government and the Official Opposition but to my own party as well.

I first want to get rid of this mythology that the NDP and the CCF before they were the big spenders. Mr. Speaker, name me a provincial, municipal or federal government where the NDP got us into this kind of mess.

An hon. member: Ontario.

Mr. Benjamin: The Ontario deficit was in excess of $8 billion when the NDP took power. It was increased by $1 billion putting people to work.

An hon. member: Now it is $14 billion.

Mr. Benjamin: In my own province we are not the big spenders. Tory and Liberal governments all across this country were the big spenders and they spent it on the wrong things. Let me tell the House why.

We have to rebuild our nation. If we want people in all parts of our country to have confidence in this country, we need policies of full employment. We did it before and we can do it again.

I am amused by the colleague who just spoke about the private sector, small, middle and big businesses. I find it strange, in nearly 24 years of being here, that whenever they are in trouble they are the first ones to come to Ottawa with their hands out—and I have been in dozens of committee meetings—asking for something from the government. At the same time the Chamber of Commerce and the Canadian Manufacturers' Association tells us: "Leave us alone, don't interfere".

I want to illustrate what we did before and what we can do again. I will start with my own province. It was totally bankrupt in 1944. We could not give Saskatchewan government bonds away. Our total highway system was run into the ground. Our farmers and our municipalities were faced with seed grain and relief debts. If those debts were translated into 1991 dollars, it would put the provincial deficit five times higher than it is now and, thanks to eight years of Tories, we have a $7.5 billion deficit in our province for one million people.

The experts, the economists, the press and even Liberals and Tories said what we did could not be done. We did not know any better; we just went and did it anyway. From 1944 to 1956 we rebuilt every mile of highway in that province, the largest number of miles per person of any province in the country because it is all flat and far.

We tripled our power generation capacity and in those 12 years took electricity to 40,000 farms. We were bankrupt and we borrowed money. In the short term we increased our deficit but we had full employment. We took sewer and water to hundreds of communities, towns and villages in our province. We still have too damn many communities in the country now that do not have that, especially in the north. We have no excuse. We did it before with policies of full employment.

The Liberal government of the late forties and early fifties, we scared the hell out of it as a result of the 1945 federal election. It did some marvellous things in those years. I want to remind my colleagues that we financed the entire Second World War without a nickel of foreign investment. This chronic appeal that we need to have foreign investment is baloney. We paid for all of that ourselves. Following the war we paid for what we had to do because the infrastructure of our economy and our nation was ground to a halt.

With 10 years of drought and depression and 6 years of war the whole place had to be rebuilt, and we did it. Even the business community was demanding that the government intervene, that the government provide incentive, motivation and challenge to the whole nation.

I wonder if the governments of this day—and I even worry about the NDP governments in B.C., Saskatchewan and Ontario—have the imagination and courage to do it. We are not in a recession. We have been and are now in a depression.

In relative terms, by comparison people are suffering today to the same degree or to a larger degree than they were in the dirty thirties. I say do not try to kid the troops about this being a recession that is going away. We have been trying to kid the people through this Parliament for the last two years that somehow or other the recession is going away. It will not go away without some national and provincial leadership.

Let us look at the debt of my province and the federal government in 1945. It is many times greater than the one we have now, translated into 1991 dollars. It is all relative. By 1956 my province which started out bankrupt had paid off the entire debt from the dirty thirties and the Second World War. The federal government repaid all its debts from the dirty thirties and the Second World War. That debt was all what we owed because we financed the whole war ourselves.

What we need is the courage, the political will, and the political risk to challenge this nation, to challenge the people and put before them a rebuilding of all our country.

When we look around to see how much there is to be done, the crying need, every city in this country has a waiting list as long as an arm for chronic care beds, co-op housing, senior citizens' housing, and low income housing. Most municipalities in this country need to rebuild or rejuvenate their sewer and water systems as well as their streets and sidewalks.

We need a national fund to which the federal government, the provincial governments and the municipalities contribute and borrow from. The federal government can say that they can have it at 4 per cent and that it will pay the difference on the interest. This will put people to work.

I recommend and urge my colleagues to read a book called The Unnecessary Evil by Professor Bellan from the University of Manitoba who is no NDPer. He refers to all the hysteria and hypnotism members of this place, including some from my party, have about deficits and debts. Most of it is money we owe ourselves. Some 80 per cent of our national debt is money we owe ourselves. I meticulously buy Canada Savings Bonds every year and the government pays it back to me with some nice interest, but I do it because I want to do it.

Surely a fundamental change in the direction, the nature and the purpose of our society, is overdue. It does not matter whether it is a Tory, a Liberal or an NDP government if we do not have the courage and the political will to do it, to make this fundamental change in the direction of government, in the direction of society. Of course it will mean increasing deficits in the short term, but the only way to pay off deficits and debts is with full employment: they are working and they are paying income tax. They do not want and would not need home care in most cases. They would not need benefits provided because they are unemployed and whatnot, if there was full employment.

We could do what we did during the war. We had a declaration of war and this country did a magnificent job. We put one million men and women in uniform. I remember working in the shipyards as a 17-year-old in 1942 and 1943. I got paid well and I paid my taxes and I bought War Savings Certificates and War Savings Bonds.

We can do the same thing again. There is no reason why we could not and why we should not. The economists I listen to on the TV and the radio and read in the newspaper never had to look for jobs. They do not know—if you do not mind me saying, Mr. Speaker—their ass from a hole in the ground.

This change that I am asking for is nothing radical. It is not terrible socialism. It is what the people in my province and in my country did before.

Does the government want to do something about national unity? Bring in full employment policies so that people in other parts of Canada including Quebec have some confidence in their future. Change these outrageous, conventional wisdom ideas from the 1890s and the 1930s that too many people who governed or advised us had. It just takes some imagination and some will and we can do it. The money is there; we can make sure it is there. We can do all the things that need to be done.

My goodness, I read in the budget that the co-op housing project was cancelled. It should not be cancelled. It should be doubled or tripled. When we have to tell people to use their own savings to buy a home and that they have to pay it back, all we are doing is making them use their own money to get themselves a home. I thought it was a good move by CMHC to cut the down payment from 10 per cent to 5 per cent. Good idea. I remember when I bought my first house. I had quit the railroad because it was going to hell in a hand-basket. I used the $1,900 I got back from my contributions, with no interest on it, for a down payment on my first house. I am not complaining. I worked hard and I did my best, and I think I have had modest success.

We cannot forget about our own history, our own individual experience of the times we went through, good and bad. I am an adherent of John Maynard Keynes and when times are good I am going to raise taxes and when they are bad I am going to lower them. I am going to increase the deficit when times are bad. If you are not prepared to do that you are not going to have full employment. You are not going to put this country to work. You are not going to rebuild it. Think about all the things that have to be done, and need to be done, in this country.

When I read about aboriginal people on reserves in the north who live in the utmost squalor I think that we have a lot of nerve crying about the human rights of people in China or anywhere else. There are about 5 million people in this country who are deprived of basic fundamental human rights, such as a decent home, a job, and the amenities that others have like sewer and water systems and electricity. We have no excuse for not doing it. I do not give a damn which party is in government.

I want to say to my colleagues in the three provincial NDP governments that if they go along with this hypnotism and hysteria about deficits and debts they are not going to be a hell of a lot different from the Tories and the Liberals. God knows they got us into enough trouble and are keeping us in that situation right now, unless there is a change by all our parties in what we do and how and when we do it.

I would urge the government to make a declaration of a national economic emergency and do the same damned thing we did when we had a declaration of war, do the same things we did when we had to rebuild our total economy after the war. That would challenge our people. It would give them some faith in this place and the people they elected.

I hope that my colleagues will appreciate that I am just trying to remind the House of what we have been able to do before and could do again. It will not be easy. All the experts will criticize us. What do they know? They never dug a ditch in their lives. They have not been there. Most of us have been there, one way or the other.

Unless we make this kind of a change in the direction and the purpose of our political parties we will not learn from history and will repeat the same mistakes.

I am not sure if this is the last budget I will speak on or not, but you have not heard the end of me yet.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to hear from the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden and to hear some of his suggestions. I am particularly interested in some of his analogies here today.

I would like to get his reaction on the fact that I noticed in the Main Estimates that the government has cut, for example, from the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, the Department of Employment and Immigration, and Canada Post.

• (1730)

If any group approaches me as a mainly rural MP, it is in reference to the service that Canada Post provides and that has been cut.

But then away down in there—and you have to find it—is $3.3 million for this museum of humour which is planned for somewhere in Canada next year.

I know you have to prioritize. I know there is a pecking order when dollars are scarce, but I just wondered whether the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden would have prioritized in that fashion to take away services from Canada Post, take away from some other agencies which we thought were doing a pretty good job for Canadians and plug in a bunch of money for something called a museum of humour? Would he react to that?

Mr. Benjamin: If I thought for one moment that the museum of humour would have some of my corny jokes in it, I might go along. No, that is not a priority. I do not put that at the top of the list. It is nice to have and when we can do it, we will do it.

I want to remind my hon. friend too, that all these different agencies in Atlantic Canada and the prairies are patchwork. We need a national effort, like the one for the declaration of war, directed to rebuilding our economy and full employment. If you did that you would not need all these little jerk-water operations that do good work but ain't going to solve anything.

We need more than that. We need a national will. My goodness, you cannot let this country go down the drain because we are worried about the deficit. "It's only money", as my mother used to say when she was financing her restaurant, borrowing everything she could find. It is only money. It is our money and it is our country and we can do it and we will do it again. I would not make the museum of humour a top priority. If we do not build it for another three or four years, tough cookie.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. gentleman in the House who talks of his last budget but not the last time we will hear from him. I could probably say it might be my last budget in this House too since I am not coming back.

Reading today's Globe and Mail, one of the business commentators said: "Infatuation with infrastructure, costly". And he compares it to a sky-deck or something like that in downtown Toronto.

Just for the record, and before the weekend comes and maybe just to enlighten some of the people opposite, infrastructure to me coming from the east might be roads, sewers, water systems, things that affect the environment. It might mean a war. It might mean an improved access for business to go into a community because those services are there. Where Toronto has become so costly it might help someone outside of Toronto to attract business. Would he like to comment on such a stupid statement out of downtown Toronto that would support this government?

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to hear that the hon. member is not going to run again because I think she has been a good member. I wish she would run again, but for a different party.

When I listen and read the commentaries of the business community I think we have to tell them as a nation and as a government and as a Parliament of Canada what must be done. You must co-operate and we want you to do it voluntarily. You are going to invest.

If you are not prepared to do that voluntarily, and it might mean you take a little smaller dividend and less in corporate executive salaries and expense allowances, we will give you two choices. It is either compulsory or you have to.

Because we did that during the war. The business community was told in no uncertain terms: "We are going to bust your ass". It was either compulsory or they had to. The War Measures Act covered the whole thing. They did and they did a marvellous job.

The self-serving comments and demands by the business community, most of whom I would not hire to run a chicken coop because they take turns going broke, con lenders into giving them money and they do not know what the hell they are doing. I suspect that half the bankruptcies we have had they brought on themselves. When banks are writing off loans——

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the member's time has expired.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the time of the House for this point of order.

I have spoken to all the parties in the House including the independents and I believe I have the unanimous consent of the House of the following motion.

> That notwithstanding any Standing Order and the usual practice of this House, motion M-22 be dropped to the bottom of the order of precedence and the ordinary hour of daily adjournment on Friday, February 28, 1992 be deemed to be 3 o'clock p.m.

The seconder is the member for Vancouver East.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it agreed?

Mr. Hicks: I would like to confirm that consultations have taken place. The government side is in agreement.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There has been agreement or are you withholding agreement?

Mr. Shields: It can be brought forward maybe after the vote tonight or before the vote tonight to confirm.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I was a little bit disappointed in my friend from the NDP who spoke earlier.

I was disappointed in some of the remarks he made because I think he was talking about businesses and how businesses do not contribute to the economy of the country. He was using this old rhetoric of robber barons and that kind of thing. He said that businesses should be forced to voluntarily cut back so that they do not make profits or take much less profits. Therefore it would help the country to get going.

The member might disagree that is what he said but certainly that is what comes across.

I would like to suggest that businesses in the community and in the country, particularly public companies, are financed primarily not just by the banks as my hon. friend would suggest, but by pension funds. Many of the shares of public companies or many of the companies which trade on the stock market, are held by pension funds.

Where do these pension funds come from? They come from the major unions in the country. Let us put something on the table which I think is very important, something that seems to go beyond the thinking of the New Democratic Party which really represents labour. I cannot understand this fallacy it keeps talking about of big business taking all these returns or the banks. They always talk about the banks making these profits that are absolutely obscene. This is the kind of thing we hear. Those same banks are owned by shareholders, who are union membership by way of their pension funds.

If you do not get a return on investment from a public company primarily owned by pension funds and individual investors then the return is not going to come to the pension funds like all those that are subscribed to the pension funds would want them to be. Think about that for a moment. It is all intertwined. You cannot say that one part of the economy is not pulling its load while another part is.

Another thing the member said which I would like to take issue with is that it is our money. It is not our money. We are so interwoven in the international monetary community that we totally depend on the international monetary community to loan us money on a short-term and a long-term basis to keep the economy going because we have a massive debt, a debt that has accumulated by compounding interest since 1984, when it was something like $190 billion to $200 billion, and now it is over double that.

It has not doubled because this government did not curtail spending. It has not doubled because we put up the printing presses and started pouring money into the economy. It has doubled because of compound interest. People will never forget that when we took office in 1984 the government of the day was borrowing $16 billion to live. We had to borrow it to pay old age pensions, to pay health care, to pay family allowances, and to operate government.

By raising taxes, which is one thing, and mainly through a 75 per cent cut in government expenditure we have turned that around from being $16 billion in the hole every year to the point where we now have approximately $10 billion more each year than we really need to operate the government. However, that $10 billion goes to pay the interest on the debt.

It means that we do not have to borrow $10 billion to pay the interest. Instead of borrowing $45 billion to pay the interest we are borrowing $35 billion. They fail to remember that.

They talk about the budget not being sensitive to people. Let me go back to the compound interest and show how it has pushed up the debt. The national debt in 1984–85 was $206 billion. Compound interest on the 1984–85 debt was $239 billion. We had an operating surplus for the year 1984–85 of $25 billion giving us a total national debt of $420 billion.

We keep hearing from the Liberals and the NDP: "Spend our way out of this. We have to really spend some money and start throwing it around". If we do that we increase the debt. If we do that we destroy the confidence of the international monetary community. When we try to bring investment into the country they say: "No, no. We don't want that". That is the Argentine solution, hyper-inflation. That is the kind of thing that happened.

I want to tell my hon. friends that I was there when this was attempted by the opposition party, the Liberal government, with the support of the NDP. In the early 1980s, when we had a recession, I saw interest rates go up to 25 per cent and I paid them in my business.

I know what happened in my business. As a result of that I lost everything I had worked for until that time, everything. I lost absolutely everything because interest rates went to 25 per cent, and we lost two western banks because of those rates. That is what happened.

It should never happen again. This government will never allow that to happen again. This government is going to stay the course, and this government has stayed the course. Sure, we are concerned that there is unemployment, but my hon. friend says we should demand full employment. What do we do? Do we do it by government decree? We saw that in the U.S.S.R. We saw what happened with a forced economy in the U.S.S.R. It no longer exists. I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that is not the position this government is going to take.

Mr. Benjamin: Stuff a sock in it.

Mr. Shields: Well, that is interesting. Let's see what happens when interest rates come down. Today the dollar went up. Today the dollar is stronger. Interest rates have come down. I understand they have come down by 30 basis points.

Just a few years ago we were paying 14 per cent or 15 per cent on one-year mortgages. We have now brought them down to just a little over 8 per cent, 8.5 per cent.

What is the impact of lower mortgage rates? I will tell you what they are. Based on a $75,000 mortgage, the payment at 14.5 to 15 per cent was $893.91. That has dropped to $584. That is the payment. That is putting money into the pockets of individual Canadians who can go out and spend it the way they want to. That will create jobs in small businesses. That will create jobs across the country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order. It being 5.45 p.m., it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings pursuant to Standing Order 84(4) and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the amendment to the amendment now before the House.

The question is on the amendment to the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment to the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the amendment to the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment to the amendment, which was negatived on the following division:

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1992–93

Hon. John McDermid (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C–61, an act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year commencing April 1, 1992, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee E.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity today to speak on the second reading of Bill C–61, the borrowing authority bill. This is the fourth time that I have had the pleasure of introducing the borrowing bill to the House of Commons.

Before speaking directly to the measures in the bill, I want to put this legislation in its proper context. That context is the budget presented earlier this week by the Minister of Finance, a budget that cuts government spending, cuts taxes, and cuts the deficit. It will help bolster economic recovery and strengthen the international competitiveness of our economy.

Any debate on borrowing authority has to address the deficit and public debt burdens carried by the federal government. The lessons governments everywhere have learned from the recent recession is that never again must governments allow themselves to be financially crippled by debt. Governments cannot stimulate economies with money they do not have. To try to do so by borrowing more would only lead to higher deficits, more debt, higher interest rates, slower growth, and of course increased inflation.

Reducing the deficit was one of the things that Canadians clearly told us that they expected from this budget. As we crossed the country with our pre-budget consultations, meeting people from all walks of life, that was something they told us in no uncertain terms. They also wanted realistic and, I guess more important, lasting solutions to our economic problems. The government has streamlined to meet the realities of the nineties and new opportunities for people to improve their skills and knowledge.

I believe that if people took the time to examine the budget in detail they would realize that the government has responded to these challenges in a budget that takes action to bolster recovery this year and strengthen growth and job creation in the years ahead.

The budget provides help where help is needed, but it pays for that help by reducing expenditures, not by increasing borrowing or taxes. It cuts spending to reduce taxes and bolster economic growth and competitiveness. The budget also ensures significant declines in the deficit for 1992–93 and the following years.

Reducing the deficit is essential for a return to sustained economic growth and new jobs. It is an essential foundation for a return of confidence at home and abroad. It will ensure a strong recovery.

We have made substantial progress since 1984 in cutting the deficit almost in half as a percentage of our economy's annual output of goods and services, from 8.7 per cent to 4.6 per cent. The majority of this progress has been achieved not through higher revenues but by restraining spending. Since 1984 the government has rigorously controlled growth in spending on programs and services, keeping it below the rate of inflation. As a matter of fact the government's own operating costs, the costs to run the government, have been held to an average increase of just 2.2 per cent a year since 1984.

The budget implements a wide range of spending cuts amounting to $1 billion this coming fiscal year, 1992–93, and $7 billion over the next five years. It broadens and deepens the expenditure control plan which we first introduced in the budget in February 1990 and extended last year. It does so in a way that does not affect major transfers to provinces.

Defence spending is being cut by $2.2 billion over the next five years. Departmental non-salary operating budgets are being reduced by 3 per cent. This will save $150 million next year and $800 million over the next five years. The government will restructure and streamline the operations of government to improve both efficiency and service to Canadians. Some 46 agencies, boards, commissions and advisory bodies will be eliminated, deferred or merged with other operations or privatized.

Government communications budgets will be reduced by $75 million per year. The number of government publications will be substantially reduced.

Growth in Canada Mortgage and Housing funds for social housing will be limited to an average of 3 per cent per year.

The Prime Minister and all ministers will have their ministerial salaries cut by 5 per cent beginning April 1. This follows the decision taken last year to impose a one-year freeze on ministerial, parliamentary and public service pay.

I listen to the opposition moan when we talk about the 5 per cent cut. I can remember when members of the Progressive Conservative government took a pay cut back in 1986 or 1987 I believe it was. All members on the government side took a pay cut as did ministers and as did the Prime Minister. It was offered to the opposition parties to do the same thing; they did not take it. They did not take the cut at that time. Now, when we take a cut in salary, they are over there moaning and groaning. They have not experienced it so I can understand why they are moaning and groaning over there.

Maybe it is because they cannot travel first class any more, maybe that is why they are moaning over there. First-class travel for MPs, senators and senior public servants already restricted will now be eliminated and international travel will be reduced as well.

I boarded a plane in Toronto to go to Montreal three weeks ago and the only passengers in first class were two NDP members. The Liberal member who was on the plane and yours truly were at the back.

An hon. member: I was at the back with you.

Mr. McDermid: That is right, exactly, but who was riding up there? The socialists were riding up in first class. They cannot do that any more. None of the members of the House of Commons can do that any more.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As one of those two members who were riding up front, I want to make it very clear that we were upgraded for free by the carrier because we had to fly to Montreal instead of Ottawa, which was our planned destination.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is not a point of order; that is a point of debate.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, certainly I did not mention any names, but if he wants to admit that he was up in first class I might point out that there was lots of room in business class and in economy on that same plane. Now that was a benefit provided the hon. member by a private company, Air Canada. I wonder if he reported that to the desk up here. Listen, these socialists, I have to tell you; great fun.

Let me get back to my comments if I might. In addition, the government will strengthen the cost recovery and act more aggressively to collect outstanding tax liabilities. We have outstanding tax liabilities of some $8 billion of which $4 billion are uncontested. This is money owing, not to the government but to the taxpayers of this country.

Crown corporations no longer required for public policy objectives will continue to be privatized. We have privatized over 24 corporations so far, returning about 50,000 to 60,000 employees back to the private sector. I think this is very important, and we will dispose of surplus assets as well.

As a result of these and other streamlining actions, the government will reduce overlap and duplication both within the government and within the private sector. A number of measures will also be taken to improve service to the public. The government will continue to make the tough choices necessary to manage our program expenditures within the limits of the proposed spending control act which was announced in last year's budget.

Over the next five years total program spending will grow on an average by only 3 per cent a year. These budget measures are being implemented with a responsible and a prudent fiscal plan. It is important to understand that reallocating resources to meet new priorities will not compromise deficit reduction.

The deficit will be substantially reduced. It will be held to $31.4 billion in the 1991–92 fiscal year which ends in another month. It will be reduced by almost $4 billion, to $27.5 billion next year and another $5 billion in 1993–94, to $22.5 billion.

The net public debt will begin to shrink as a proportion of the economy in 1993–94, and that is the first time that has happened since 1973–74, 20 years ago.

Mr. Peterson: Promises.

Mr. McDermid: Look, I listened to the hon. member for Willowdale whose brother when he was premier increased spending by government at 10 per cent a year over the four years he was in there. If anybody knows about government spending, it is my hon. friend from Willowdale. It probably runs in the family.

Continued spending restraint will help bring about a major reduction in government borrowing.

Mr. Peterson: Get out of the dirt; elevate the level of this discussion.

Mr. McDermid: Listen to him bleat, listen to him.

The government's financial requirements will be reduced to zero in 1995–96. The government will then begin to reduce its outstanding debt in the financial markets for the first time since 1969–70.

Let me now turn to Bill C–61. Like borrowing bills in recent years, this bill contains three basic elements: financing authority to cover the financial requirements for 1992–93, exchange fund account profits, and a contingency reserve.

In total, the government is requesting authority to borrow $24.7 billion for the 1992–93 fiscal year. In addition, there is a provision for an additional borrowing authority of $3.9 billion to provide for the borrowings conducted in this fiscal year under section 47 of the Financial Administration Act.

There are also a number of technical changes to tie the bill more closely to the fiscal year. Let me touch briefly on the main provisions.

First, there is the provision for authority to cover our anticipated requirement for borrowing to meet the net financial requirements set out in the budget.

Second, there is a provision in the bill to cover exchange fund account earnings which gives rise to additional Canadian dollar borrowing requirements. This is because these earnings are retained in the exchange fund account to provide the government with the capacity to intervene in foreign exchange markets.

Third, there is a $3 billion reserve, the same amount requested in borrowing authority bills of the last five years. This reserve provides for unseen contingencies such as foreign exchange transactions, seasonal swings in borrowing requirements, and delays in passing the future year borrowing authority act.

As I indicated, there is an additional provision this year to cover the refunding of bills issued in 1991–92 under section 47 of the Financial Administration Act up to a cap of $3.9 billion. The 1989 act had a similar provision without the cap. Members should note the bill provides that were we to issue less than the $3.9 billion requested the residual would be deducted from the 1992–93 authority.

As reported in the budget, financial requirements for 1991–92 increased by $5.9 billion. With the $3 billion contingency reserve already provided, we are requesting $3.9 billion of additional authority. This includes a $1 billion reserve against uncertainties associated with factors such as foreign exchange transactions. Within this clause, refundings of bills issued under section 47 authority would be charged against regular 1992–93 borrowing authority even though the money was raised in 1991–92.

The bill also contains some minor technical changes that more clearly link fiscal year borrowing authority with the fiscal year borrowing requirements. One provision provides that 1992 borrowing authority may only be used after the 1992–93 fiscal year begins. Another provision stipulates that the borrowing authority cover the full fiscal year beginning April 1, thereby ensuring refunding authority for the securities maturing in the fiscal year 1992–93 but before the bill receives royal assent.

This bill has another set of standard provisions. They provide that on March 31, 1993 any unused borrowing authority under this bill over $3 billion will be cancelled. This preserves the government's non-lapsing reserve into the next year in case new borrowing authority is not provided before the start of the next fiscal year.

Of course, it contains the similar $3 billion reserve granted in last year's borrowing authority on either March 31 of this year or the date the bill comes into force, whichever comes later.

As background I would like for a moment to review the government's debt operations in the current fiscal year up to the end of January. At this point, in the domestic debt program, about $26.8 billion in net new market debt has been issued. Of this total, $14 billion was in the form of marketable bonds. Of these, 78 per cent were sold at auction which we have found to be a cost effective method of distributing the bonds. By the end of January, $10.25 billion new funds had been raised by treasury bills.

I would also like to report to the House on last fall's Canada savings bond campaign. That campaign, with bonds bearing interest at 7.5 per cent generated total sales of $9.6 billion, an increase of $2.9 billion from last year. After taking into account Canada savings bonds that matured or were redeemed in the period, the campaign yielded a net amount of about $3.5 billion. Taking into account all redemptions so far in the fiscal year, the stock of Canada savings bonds outstanding has increased by about $2 billion. Canada savings bonds represent about 10 per cent of the federal market debt outstanding.

In closing, I would like to remind the House once again that the government has been operating under section 47 of the Financial Administration Act since January 28 of this year, for about one month now. Various factors contributed to this, particularly the increase in financial requirements, as reported in the budget. It is therefore important that Bill C-61 be considered in a timely manner.

I wish to remind members that until the new borrowing authority is in place, only short-term debt instruments can be sold and the government cannot maintain the desired balance of short and long-term debt in its debt program. This balance is carefully designed to achieve the objectives of cost minimization and reduced exposure to increases in debt service changes.

The amount of borrowing authority requested in the bill is directly connected to the budget and the financial requirements stated therein. The information required to deal with the financial aspects of the bill is set out in the budget documents.

I therefore urge the House to proceed with this legislation as quickly as possible so that new borrowing authority will be in place at the beginning of the new fiscal year and the government's regular borrowing program can proceed as the fiscal year begins.

The government's record spending restraint and deficit reduction offers sound testimony that the government's finances are being handled prudently and responsibly. I urge all members to support this bill.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to address the House on the matter of Bill C-61, whereby the government seeks the authority of the House to borrow $24.7 billion to finance the massive deficit proposed again this year by the Conservative government.

Well the government is at it. It is seeking to pick-up an extra $3.9 billion which was the amount that came up short last year so poor was its forecast. This bill can only be considered in light of the 1992 budget presented on Tuesday by the Minister of Finance, the first budget of this new minister.

It seems a shame that this minister who, by all accounts from his colleagues on the government side of the House, confirmed by some who know him on this side, is a much nicer, more empathetic person than his predecessor. It seems a shame that his first budget must be delivered at a time of very weak economic performance, not to mention startling, indeed, wrenching change.

No one could envy the budget-making task that confronted this Minister of Finance in the face of the legacy he inherited from his predecessor. What a legacy it was. The annual deficit has not been reduced since 1986-87. The accumulated debt of the federal government had more than doubled from about $186 billion in September 1984, when his predecessor took office, to about $400 billion when this minister took charge.

The economy, though technically having come out of the recession in the second quarter of 1991, continues to be very weak as unemployment remains high, bankruptcies are occurring in record numbers, consumer confidence remains low, particularly in the industrial heartland of Ontario where the provincial NDP, trapped by their own discredited socialist dogma, compounds the ineptitude of a federal government with pigheaded stupidities such as soaring deficits and an anti-business legislative program which will clearly drive new investment and existing business out of the province.

So on to this battlefield, littered with the casualties of the Wilsonian era, strides our new minister relying, as he said in his speech: "on the counsel and support of the Prime Minister". This reliance makes it very difficult to share the minister's down to earth optimism, and I quote: "which he urges later in his speech".

As I look at last year's budget speech I was dismayed to be reminded that the former minister took us into this past year of dismal economic performance, plant closings and bankruptcies with these words: "We must not lose sight of the fact that a strong foundation exists for optimism." That the former minister was optimistic cannot be denied. This is what he promised: "We will hold the deficit to $30.5 billion this year and next despite the pressures of the recession. In 1992–93 with recovery and lower interest rates, the deficit will fall below $25 billion for the first time in a decade."

Instead of $30.5 billion this year's deficit is now expected to come in at $31.4 billion. For the coming year, instead of the $24 billion predicted last year the deficit is expected to be $27.5 billion.

What makes the former minister's predictions even more ridiculous is the fact that the government has been assisted in its deficit battle by lower than expected interest rates. Interest payments on the public debt are $1.7 billion lower in 1991 and are expected to be $3.8 billion lower than previously predicted in 1992–93.

In other words, the former Minister of Finance, the wizard of Etobicoke, Bay Street's answer to Jean Dixon, over-estimated his operating balance by $2.6 billion for 1991–92 and $7.25 billion for 1992–93.

I hope that the new minister's down to earth optimism is better founded in reality than that of his predecessor. The record of his government in making such projections is dismal at best. I go back to his predecessor's statements in 1984 when he said that if the current policies, the ones that he inherited from the previous government, continued that the debt by the end of the decade of the 1980s would be approaching $400 billion. In fact, by 1990 he said it could approach $410 billion. Here we are in 1992 and by the end of this current fiscal year, March 31, the debt should be at about $419 billion. Again and again, over the course of his years as Minister of Finance, the previous minister talked about deficit reduction and controlling the debt. He talked about it in his November statement in 1984, just after the first election. He talked about it in the 1985 budget, his first budget presented as Minister of Finance.

At that time, in that budget, he talked about and I quote: "a clear and realistic medium-term plan". In that 1985 budget with its clear and realistic medium-term plan he said that the budgetary deficit which had been anticipated for 1984–85 to be at $36 billion would be reduced by 1990–91 by $20 billion. In other words, he was projecting back then his clear and realistic plan of a budgetary deficit for the year ended last March of about $16 billion. What did he accomplish? He accomplished a deficit in reality of $30.5 billion.

In his 1986 budget the minister had adjusted his projections into the future that he had made previously in his realistic and medium-term plan. By 1986 he thought that by 1990–91 we would have a deficit of $22 billion. Therefore, he was about $6 billion closer as it turned out a year later. And on it goes.

By 1989, after the election, he was no longer offering clear and realistic plans. He was offering, and I quote: "an ambitious five-year fiscal plan". Perhaps, because his projections had been so bad in his realistic plan, he thought by calling it ambitious it would give him a little bit of an escape hatch if he missed on his projections that time around.

What he projected then was a budgetary deficit in 1990–91 of $28.5 billion. He was off by $2 billion as it turned out. He thought by 1993–94 it would be $14 billion and by 1994–95 he thought it would be $10 billion. Well, what happened under the ambitious five-year plan?

In 1988–89 we had a deficit of $28.7 billion. In 1989–90 we had a deficit of $29 billion. In 1990–91 we had a deficit of $30.5 billion. In 1991–92 we are expecting a deficit of $31.4 billion. Under the five-year plan for reducing the deficit, it rose from $28.7 billion to $31.4 billion. I guess that is what that minister might call progress. With that legacy it troubles me when I get out the 1991 budget and this year's budget and see the five-year projections. There is no adjective for the projections, neither clear and realistic nor ambitious.

Here is what they said last year was going to happen and what they are saying this year is going to happen. Last year they said that between 1991–92 and 1992–93 the deficit would drop by $6.5 billion to $24 billion. This year they are saying that it will drop to $27.5 billion. Last year they said it would drop to $16.6 billion in 1993–94, now they are saying it will drop to $22.5 billion in 1993–94. Last year they said it would drop to $10 billion in 1994–95, now they are saying $14.5 billion in 1994–95. Last year they said it would be down to $6.5 billion in 1995–96, now they are saying $8.5 billion. If the former minister had achieved what he set out to achieve in 1984, we would not be looking at these large numbers today.

What is the history behind this? We had in the 1980s a period of exceptional economic growth, continuing and prolonged. I am sure the current minister would agree that the idea is to reduce the deficit in good times so that you have the resources to fight recessions in bad times. What happened in the good times of the 1980s? This government talked about deficit reduction and managing, while increasing taxes many times to increase the deficit virtually every year, year after year. At the same time it managed to reach the targeted debt which the bad old Liberals would have produced if their policies had not been changed in 1984. In other words, the government failed totally in what it claimed to be able to do and what it set out to accomplish.

There are some other fundamental concerns about the economic policies that have been pursued by this government and its ability to achieve economic projections based on what it has done in the past. Let me start by going back again to that 1984 statement by the former minister.

I am sure you have heard, Mr. Speaker, that the government has alleged that when it came into office, the deficit was $38 billion. It has been said many times on the other side of the House that was the deficit at the end of the fiscal year 1984–85. This government was elected half way through that year. When the Minister of Finance came into the House in November, having looked at the books, he proposed a number of serious policy changes. He said that had he not proposed those changes, and I quote: "With no policy changes the deficit for this fiscal year would be $34.5 billion". That was in November 1984.

By the end of March 1985 he had managed to run it up to $38 billion. Then he spent the last seven years going around Canada claiming that the Liberals had left a deficit of $38 billion.

Let us look at what has been happening throughout the mandate of this government. We have experienced a recession over the last year and a half that was clearly induced by the need claimed by this government to pursue a monetary policy that would control inflation. We have to ask ourselves how we got into inflationary times five years into the mandate of this government.

I suggest that the answer lies in the decisions made in 1987–88. It was a very rapidly expanding economy in those years, with growth in 1988 of almost 5 per cent. What policies did the government pursue at that time? It pursued policies of tax cuts with the first phase of tax reform in 1987, coming into effect in 1988.

You will recall that interest rates began to rise sharply at the end of November 1988. I find it more than a little strange that when the economy was growing that quickly that prudent managers of the economy would bring in both tax cuts and a relaxed monetary policy. Is it mere coincidence that we had a general election on November 21, 1988? I do not think so.

I suggest that more prudent policies pursued in the mid-1980s by the present government might have been less popular at election time but would have preserved the growth in the economy on a more sustained basis throughout 1990 and 1991.

I have gone on at some length about the numbers in past budgets and projections. We can do a number of things with numbers. What I believe these drastic miscalculations demonstrate is the incompetence of this government, not just in predicting—I think that is documented—but also in managing the economy. In fact, it now seems clear that the previous minister, together with the Governor of the Bank of Canada, committed some grave errors in the past year. In last year's budget the Minister of Finance promised that strong economic growth would be secured. He said:

> Real output will expand by 3.5 per cent in 1992 and average 4 per cent in the medium term. Real personal disposable income will grow steadily throughout the period. Employment growth will begin in the second half of this year and will strengthen in the years ahead.

We now know that the economy shrank in 1991 and that the government is projecting growth of 2.7 per cent in 1992. Real personal disposable income declined in 1991 and is now projected to grow at a rate of less than 1 per cent in 1992. I believe that the economic difficulties of the past year have been in large measure due to the fiscal and monetary policies pursued recently by this government. Last year's budget has proven to be, as the Toronto-Dominion Bank said at the time: "probably the most inept and destructive budget since the 1930s".

The combined spending cuts and tax increases of the 1991 budget both prolonged the recession and caused the deficit projections to be so far off the mark as to be laughable. In addition, the 1991 budget contained the joint statement of the Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada setting inflation targets. At the time, the inflation targets appeared very ambitious, particularly in light of the minister's promise of "a strong rebound in growth in the second half of 1991".

As we now know, the government actually exceeded the inflation targets, causing severe and potentially lasting harm to the economy in the process. The fact that the government overshot its own inflation targets explains a good deal about why the recovery, if you can call it that, has been so pitiful and why the Canadian dollar has remained so high.

The finance committee recently completed the study of the mandate of the Bank of Canada. In the course of that study, we heard a great deal of expert opinion on monetary policy. While our committee recommended against a narrowing of the Bank of Canada's mandate to limit it to the pursuit of price stability, we definitely agreed that inflation should be kept low. To question the monetary policy of the government over the past year is not, I wish to stress, to favour inflation. The issue is how quickly can you reasonably move from high to low inflation.

In January 1991 the year over year consumer price index inflation rate stood at 6.8 per cent. The budget, on the strength of the joint statement of the governor and the minister, foresaw an annual inflation rate of 5.6 per cent in 1991 and 3.2 per cent in 1992. The actual rate for 1991 was 4.1 per cent and for 1992 it is now projected at 2.7 per cent.

The inability of the government to moderate monetary policy soon enough to avoid causing such rapid disinflation, indeed in some sectoral prices deflation, has I believe caused the recession to be worse than what otherwise would have been the case, aggravated the deficit and has cost the jobs of tens of thousands of Canadians.

Our new minister inherited a mess. Last year's budgetary stance proved to be based on wrong assumptions, thus making the recession longer and deeper than it might otherwise have been. Any relaxation of monetary policy was demonstrably too little, too late. That brings us to this year's budget.

Any budget is a chance for a fresh start, but a first budget from a new minister is a chance for a real new beginning. What a disappointment. There is nothing here to suggest that the government has in any way repented of its past and embarked on a new road with renewed vigour. This is the tired budget of a tired government, perplexed by the problems that confront it, though many are of its own making, showing no vision, no imagination, not even comprehension of the difficulties Canada must tackle before the end of a century.

Why should we be surprised? After all, this is the government that hired a Harvard professor at great expense to tell us that Canadian competitiveness is lagging, that has set up an expensive consultative process to ask Canadians what to do about it, headed by the same

Bay Street minister who as finance minister contributed so much to making us uncompetitive.

One commentator said about this budget: "Nothing broken, nothing fixed". If this budget is judged a political success by government members it is because no one was left beaten up by yet another tax assault on his or her wallet.

What should worry us all is that this new minister did not reveal any strategy for attacking the big and serious problems confronting the Canadian economy. The essential problem is the failure to create wealth at the same rate as we are consuming it.

Until recently in Canada, standards of living were improving and people were feeling good about the possibility of realizing their expectations for themselves and their families. Recently, however, people became aware that something was going wrong. The evidence of the distemper that arose from this sense of disquiet is easy to find. It can be seen in the revulsion against paying taxes, in anger at politicians, in polls that, for the first time, show that Canadians do not expect their children to be better off than they are.

The combination of our enormous natural resource wealth and the post-war industrial boom contributed to our false sense of assurance that things would just keep on getting better. Standards of living increased rapidly during the decades of the 1950s, 1960s and 1970s, both in terms of the level of personal consumption and the level of state supplied services. Our ability to produce wealth in North America was such that in the 1950s and 1960s wealth doubled every 22 to 23 years.

By the 1980s the rate of growth had slowed to the extent that it would double in about 90 years. Statistics Canada has told us that in the 1980s real family incomes in Canada remained stagnant. Meanwhile, the government's financial predicament has continued to degenerate to the point that almost 35 cents of every tax dollar paid to the federal government goes to just pay interest on the federal debt. No wonder Canadians feel they are not getting their money's worth for their taxes. The reality is that they are only getting 65 cents worth of services for every dollar they pay.

For Canadians, I believe the issue is very simply whether Canada will be able to martial its human and financial resources, not just its natural resources, over the next decade to ensure that we are capable of providing goods and services that other nations of the world are not only willing to buy from us but for which they will pay us a lot of money? In other words, will Canada be able to compete in those key industries in which technology, skills and innovation are important and well rewarded? Will the jobs created in Canada over the next generation be high wage or low wage jobs?

This has never been a worry for Canadians before so it is truly a new generation of problems in search of new public policy solutions. The rapid intensification of competition for jobs among Canadians stems from trade liberalization and technological change, but also from the fact that a whole new set of players in this competition is emerging, some in the Far East and some in the emerging nations of eastern Europe. The speed with which we are being confronted by change in many ways is more than vaguely disquieting. In politics and in business, change is rapid and consequential.

One does not need to look beyond our own borders to recognize that significant political change is likely to occur and that its consequences for our economy may be quite wrenching. While people may sometimes claim to like change and even to desire change, in reality people tend to resist change.

The modern age is thrusting change upon us. In the last federal election the Prime Minister campaigned on the theme of managing change. He may have even won the election because he was able to identify the fact that Canadians both feared change and recognized its inevitability and so wanted to be reassured that the man in charge would not let change simply sweep away all they considered important and comforting but that he would manage it. That is, he would slow it where possible and mitigate its consequences.

The pillars of Tory economic policy—deficit reduction, a free trade agreement with the United States and the GST—are not methods of managing change. The Tory strategy, as I believe even the government would describe it, has been to try to get the fundamentals right and then stand back and let market forces hold sway.

This laissez-faire approach has its advocates, but that is not what was promised. It is not managing change, it is letting change manage us. This idea that you can get the fundamentals right and then go out and win in the open market suggests to me the analogy of a hockey team owner with lots of money who goes out and recruits the best players for his team. On paper it looks great—high scoring forwards, tough defence, and great goal tending—but if he sends his team out on the ice without having the players practice together and without a strategy to defeat the opposition the result will probably be disappointing.

In a sense, that is what is happening to Canada at the present time. Eliminating barriers to trade was one of the fundamentals of the Tory economic strategy. So what did the government do? It made a deal. It signed Wayne Gretzky, or at least it thought it did, by getting a free trade deal with the United States. The government said: "This guy will score goals for us. Just watch".

Gretzky sat around all summer and got fat. He did not bother with the physiotherapy on his back. The coach wanted to pamper him a bit so he let him report late to training camp. Did he score any goals? A good junior A team would have checked him out of the game.

The free trade agreement was signed when the Canadian dollar traded at 76 cents U.S. No one had even thought about what might happen if it reached 88 cents. There was a promise that there would be massive adjustment programs to retrain workers whose jobs were displaced by the FTA, but these were never delivered. Three years after the FTA came into effect we are still arguing about the reduction of trade barriers between Canadian provinces. In other words, we threw ourselves into a highly competitive game without even having played a house league game under the new rules in our own rink.

While the fundamentals are important, there also must be a broad strategy for fitting the fundamentals into the over-all social and economic agenda.

Think about what Canadians were asked to deal with. They had to deal with a U.S. free trade deal without an adjustment strategy, at the same time as other global competition with our manufacturing sector was intensifying; high real interest rates in comparison with U.S. rates being maintained in an effort to achieve zero inflation, after years of expecting a certain amount of inflation; and a new visible sales tax at the consumer level while the Canadian dollar was soaring in value relative to the U.S. dollar. Canadians had to deal with all of this in the midst of a recession and a constitutional crisis.

This is not my idea of managing anything, let alone managing change.

We all need to acknowledge that Canada faces some very difficult adjustments if it is going to maintain its standard of living. Of all the powers that governments may have at their disposal one is not the power to turn back the clock. The task of government, as Liberals were told at our Aylmer conference awhile back, is to represent the future to the present. It is not to strive to bring back the past. We must prepare ourselves for the task of moving forward.

Mr. Speaker, I will not bore you with statistics pointing out how precarious our position is becoming as a competitive nation in this global economy. Let us instead remind ourselves that we continue to enjoy one of the highest standards of living in the world, the second best quality of life in the world according to the UN, and one of the highest labour productivity rates in the world.

The fact that other countries are catching up is the inevitable consequence of the globalization of technology. The anxieties I mentioned earlier are in part the consequence of change and in part the result of the failure of Canadians to produce enough wealth to pay for our current consumption.

Although we have the seventh largest economy in the world, Canada is the world's second largest debtor in absolute terms after the United States. Our domestic savings are unable to meet the needs of our economy for new investment, feeding the insatiable appetite of governments at all levels to borrow.

I believe that this collective living beyond our means is at the core of some of our discontent. If we are to avoid continual wrenching adjustments to the standards of living we have all come to expect, beginning with the level of government services, we need to make a number of very fundamental changes to the way we look at things. These changes will require two things that have been lacking for too long at the federal and provincial levels: moral leadership and a clear sense of direction.

By moral leadership I mean simply that political leaders have to start telling the truth. It is very doubtful that people can be bought with old-style election promises anymore. Politicians are becoming more clever and cynical.

In this pressure filled, complex world we all want to offer hope. However, this often comes in the form of over-simplified solutions to the problems of the day.

It has been said that for every complex problem there is a simple, plausible solution that is wrong. As long as we keep offering up simplistic solutions people will continue to be cynical. Frankly, all political parties engage in this from time to time.

I believe that people want to be treated like adults and told the truth. More important, if we are going to summon the will as a nation to meet the challenges of the coming decades our people must understand the nature of those challenges.

What about a clear sense of direction in the context of looking at things differently? Obviously, if you do not know where you want to go you will never figure out how to get there. Sooner or later in this country we must agree on a vision of our economic future, if we can fit it in while we argue over our conflicting linguistic and cultural visions.

First, we should commit ourselves to striving to be the best, if not the best in the world at least the best in North America. We have had enough of being a bronze medal country.

As a nation, we should adopt qualitative excellence as our standard of performance. The challenge of overcoming mediocrity is a difficult one to meet. The need to do so was never more crucial however. The failure of this government to set its sights on higher objectives, to get beyond the mumbo-jumbo of deficit reduction targets that are never met is the failure to inspire Canadians. This failure has cost us greatly as a nation.

Second, Canada's commitment to education should be unequivocal. This is one of the areas in which we are getting ourselves into trouble. While we seem to spend a great deal on education our product, especially in the areas of math and natural sciences, is showing clear signs of being woefully inadequate. We must train our people in the skills they will need to perform the good jobs of tomorrow. It is not good enough to let them elect their way into menial jobs because that will make all of us poor.

Further, we must demonstrate that we understand that education does not end at the work place door. Canadian business is simply not spending enough on worker skill upgrading in comparison with the U.S., Germany and Japan.

Third, Canadian governments must invest in infrastructure. Our transportation and communication infrastructure must be continually maintained and upgraded for the sake of our future prosperity.

Fourth, we must be prepared to make the tough decisions to focus our resources strategically. Government spending on infrastructure and research and development should be highly disciplined and as free as possible from the political pork barrel.

We should play to our strengths, not as a matter of picking winners and losers, but let us make sure that our winners keep on winning and let us stop prolonging the death throes of the losers. This will get us nowhere if the people of Canada do not buy into it. For that to happen it is of fundamental importance that this hard-edged economic strategy include within its reach the need to restore the social contract between Canadians and their governments, and at the same time restore the natural environment whose endowments provided our initial base of wealth.

These three elements, the economy, the social contract and the environment, should be understood as one web of material. Progressive social reforms begin with good economic policy. However a strong and competitive economy requires a healthy and well-educated society. It is no less certain that a strong economy tomorrow requires that we respect the environmental imperative of sustainability today.

Sadly I can find nothing in this year's budget to suggest that the government is trying to come to grips with the bigger, longer term problems that are looming. Think back over the economic news of the past year and ask how the budget reveals a strategy for the problems that have been emerging.

These range from the problems in the resource sector, a fishery crisis, problems in the petroleum industry, agriculture, forestry, mining, through to what my colleague from Willowdale has called the deindustrialization of Ontario, as our central Canadian industrial heartland is reeling from shutdown after shutdown of industries, all these shutdowns being of a permanent nature. Finally, we have our retail sector staggering from the GST, cross-border shopping and the fears consumers have about their futures.

This budget offers no strategy for the future with respect to these difficult and major challenges. Instead, it is full of the same tired old rhetoric that rings so hollow.

In essence, it is not the borrowing bill that deserves to be defeated, nor really is it the budget which, standing alone, is a bland and forgettable one, it is, in fact, the government that deserves to be defeated, cast aside on to the scrap heap with much of Canada's economy laid waste by previous budgetary follies.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 11 o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 35, the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

REPORTER IAIN HUNTER

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, after 20 years on Parliament Hill, Iain Hunter, a veteran reporter who is well-known in this country, leaves his busy life as a journalist on the Hill, apparently without regrets.

Mr. Speaker, the man who struck fear into the hearts of politicians and public servants at all levels and who in his own way shaped Canadian political life during an entire generation, will put down pen and notebook at the close of proceedings today.

As a Canadian reporter, Iain Hunter has an international reputation for his portraits of politicians. I am convinced that if Hitler had had an Iain Hunter in his press gallery, concentration camps would never have existed because he would have condemned them outright in his tireless quest for social justice.

I want to ask members on all sides of the House to join me in paying tribute to a man who is appreciated and respected by all Canadians, and in offering our sincere thanks. We wish him every success in his new job as assistant editor for national news at the Ottawa Citizen. Congratulations, Mr. Hunter, and good luck!

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, the concluding phase of the Uruguay round of negotiations at GATT is upon us and the future of 40,000 Canadian family farm businesses is at stake.

Canada's supply management system is the envy of the world, providing producers with a reasonable level of profit. Those producers go on to supply Canadian consumers with a supply of the safest, most nutritious food in the world while carrying on environmentally sound farm management practices for the benefit of all Canadians.

Canadian dairy, egg and poultry farmers are not part of the problem of international surplus, however, many people want to force these people into being part of the solution.

A successful round of GATT for Canada can only be reached if article XI is strengthened and clarified. I remind the government to fulfil its obligations to all Canadians, that is, to obtain a strengthened and clarified article XI.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, over the last few weeks, I have been asking many of my constituents for their guidance and advice.

John Panchyshyn from Burlington writes me: "We need to keep Canada together. I believe in a strong central government but I am willing to bend to keep Quebec in Confederation".

Barry Stewart from Bolton writes, and this is interesting: "Increase the GST. Decrease income tax. Make it a user pay system and you will see a decrease in waste and wasteful citizens."

Peter Egerton from Georgetown writes me: "I would like to see Canada hold together and get out of these ridiculous deficits".

James McMullen of Burlington writes: "The servicing of the huge debt of both federal and provincial governments will continue to turn Canada into a banana republic in a fairly short period. You must curtail and reduce the size of government and social programs, and apply the money to debt reduction".

Mabel Richardson of Burlington writes: "Unless Canada pulls together and stops wasting money, I don't see much of a future for my grandchildren. The taxes we pay should be able to reduce the deficit".

James Fisher of Burlington writes: "If you do nothing else before the next election—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Vancouver East.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, at a time when the economic policies of this government have resulted in an escalation of racism in Canada, this Conservative government refuses to protect equality rights.

Why has the government withdrawn committed funding for the Race Relations Foundation and the Heritage Language Institute, both of which were passed by legislation of this House?

Why has the government withdrawn funds for the Court Challenges Program, a program that is essential to fund test cases to determine equality rights for women, disabled persons and racial minorities under our charter?

Why has the government disbanded citizen advisory boards, groups and councils that advocate changes? Is this a way to stifle criticism?

Why has the government shown no political will to make changes to protect minority rights in our Constitution when so many groups have demanded tougher protection?

This budget proves that the government has no real commitment to human rights. When times are tough for Tories, human rights are the first to go.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, the unemployed workers in southwestern Ontario, the economic engine of Canada, are given no hope whatsoever by the recent budget. Plant closings of Motor Wheel Corporation, National Hardware, Standard Tube and Elan, to name only a few in Kent, have hit hard during the recession.

The budget offers nothing to these permanently laid-off workers and their families. Now the Tories have cut training programs that could have helped in this time of despair. A $100 million cut last year to the Canadian Jobs Strategy and a further $117 million slash to training programs mean more people falling between the cracks. The few programs left are only for those getting unemployment insurance. What about those workers who are off UI, who want to work, who are qualified but cannot apply?

The Tories have forgotten about them. Let us have a government that cares about people.

TAXATION

Mr. Gaby Larrivée (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, in recent weeks I received a number of letters from my constituents about the Canadian government's family policy. My constituents wrote to stress tax inequities between married couples and common law couples, and their concerns were entirely legitimate.

I would now like to inform the people of Joliette that the federal government has acted in response to their wishes in its latest budget. The federal budget will apply the same tax treatment to married couples and common law couples and will also restructure and improve family benefits by creating a single benefit for children. The new plan will increase child benefits by $400 million annually.

Mr. Speaker, the latest budget clearly shows how sensitive the government is to the needs of Canadian families.

REFORM PARTY

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, the cat is out of the bag. Today The Sun newspaper reports that racist group members have joined the Reform Party. According to their report, two founding members of an extremist racist group, namely the Heritage Front, have joined the Reform Party and at least one of them holds an executive position within that organization. This Reform Party office holder, we are told, hosted an Imperial Dragon Ku Klux Klan officer who visited Toronto last weekend.

Cliff Fryers of the Reform Party said that his party's "bright lights attract a lot of bugs". The Reform Party had better get its giant fly-swatter out this time.

This is Canada and there is no room here for racism and intolerance. A moment ago, I said that the cat is out of the bag. Maybe I should have said the "Klu" is out of the Klan.

PETROLEUM MONITORING AGENCY

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I want to use this one minute to make a statement to focus on a mistaken policy by the present government. It has decided to terminate the Petroleum Monitoring Agency.

The Petroleum Monitoring Agency has a function of collecting and publishing information on the strategic petroleum industry, reserves, costs of production, rates of return, degree of foreign ownership and investment patterns. Above all issues, the God given resources of this country should be monitored by the government for the people of this country. There is a major concern about the intrusion of the seven sisters in the oil industry becoming majority stakeholders in our oil industry in this country. We need to know what is going on, we need to know who owns what and how much money they are taking out of Canada.

Don't do this. Keep the Petroleum Monitoring Agency as it exists.

CANADIAN PRAYER ALERT

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, this is a crucial period of our nation's history. We face serious challenges, both nationally and internationally. The Canadian Prayer Alert has reminded us that we can find help if we return to the religious roots that sustained and nurtured this country in its formative years.

The Dominion of Canada was founded upon principles that recognized the sovereignty of God and the rule of law. An invitation has been issued to all Canadians through their church leaders to join together this Sunday, March 1 and recognize a national day of prayer.

I endorse this idea and encourage all members of this House and concerned Canadians of all denominations to accept the invitation and join together in prayer on March 1 to pray for the unity of our nation and God's healing upon our land.

IMMIGRATION

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, last night in the room right next door to this Chamber, friends and supporters of Peter Zujewski, Marzena Tomala and their Canadian-born daughter Agatha gathered to say farewell to a family who has deeply touched the hearts of the people of our community.

It is tragic that hundreds, perhaps thousands, of phone calls could not reach the hearts of this government and allow this family to stay in Canada. This community will not forget Peter, Marzena and Agatha and we will not forget the inflexible, unjust Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Prime Minister who are responsible for their plight. Even now as they prepare to leave voluntarily, a hearing to forcefully deport them will resume this afternoon.

Friends and supporters have established the Agatha Fund to continue their fight in her name against a system that produces such shameful results.

We want to change a system that is heartless, inhumane and unjust and unequal.

ABBY HOFFMAN

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow night in Toronto the Canadian Association for the Advancement of Women in Sport and Physical Activity (CAAWS) will give an historical award for 1992 to Abby Hoffman.

I am sure I speak for all members of the House in joining with CAAWS in acknowledging the tremendous contribution that Abby Hoffman has made to sport in Canada, to sport internationally and to women everywhere. A great athlete in her own right, an Officer of the Order of Canada, Abby served for 10 years as Director-General of Sport Canada.

It was disappointing that the minister of sport removed her from that position. In it she gave outstanding and sensitive leadership, focusing Canadian sport on the value of pursuing excellence, of supporting athletes and coaches, of equity and fair play in sport—the moral value of sport, as Bruce Kidd has called it.

Above all, throughout her life, Abby Hoffman has contributed inspiration and encouragement to countless girls and women. We wish Abby well on this happy occasion and look to her for continued leadership in the future.

EDUCATION

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, as the representative of thousands of students who attend the University of Alberta, I would like to commend the government for increasing the student tax deduction from $60 to $80 per month.

I also want to thank University of Alberta student union president, Marc Dumouchel, and vice-president Randy Boissoneault for their submission to the Edmonton caucus and to the Government of Canada. We listened. We will be eliminating the 3 per cent administration fee on student loans. These measures will help thousands of students across the country. An efficient, accessible and generous student loan program helps students achieve their goals.

A well-educated work force is crucial to the competitiveness of our country and the well-being of its population. I commend the finance minister for these moves.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, in the last few days we in the Niagara peninsula have been saddened by the news that 2,300 jobs will be lost because of the decision of General Motors to close down a plant in the city of St. Catharines.

We have been ravaged by that decision and savaged by the policies of this government. We in the Niagara peninsula hope that the families of the men and women who have been laid off will be getting some kind of assistance, either for retraining or for money to tide them over until they can see their way clear to getting new jobs.

We hope that this government will strongly consider putting those programs it now has in place in operation so that the workers of General Motors in St. Catharines can have a little bit more hope at this time of the year.

CO-OPERATIVE HOUSING

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, the decision to abolish the federal co-operative housing program is harsh and unjustifiable for low income families. After a thorough review, this program was deemed to be appropriate and effective in 1991 and the government announced that it would be permanent instead of experimental. Therefore no replacement measure has been planned by the provinces, municipalities and groups concerned, which have mobilized their members to present concrete projects.

In Montreal, families who live in co-operative housing have an average income of $24,000 and half of them pay the going market rate. This collective form of home ownership enables poor families to live in a socially mixed environment, which is highly desirable. The efforts made by these groups further to the government's commitments must not be betrayed. The Minister of Finance must reverse his absurd decision and announce that the program will continue as soon as possible.

IMMIGRATION

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, pursuing a little further what our colleague from Ottawa said a little earlier about children and the preoccupation of this government, there could be a deportation order in my case as well. Five children have been accepted; the parents have not.

The minister of immigration has not even seen fit to respond to me. I think this government had better make a decision to get rid of these immigration boards if it cannot do a better job and have more humanitarianism.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Finance.

Today, Statistics Canada reported that the gross domestic product, a measure of the over-all size of the economy, dropped .4 per cent this past December. This means the economy started shrinking again. How could the Minister of Finance say in his budget speech that there were "good reasons to look forward to an early resumption of solid economic growth"? Do these measures not show that the budget will not do enough to get the economy moving and create jobs and opportunities for Canadians?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, first of all I must point out to the hon. member that the Minister of Finance in his budget acknowledged the possibility of a decline in output in the fourth quarter. This is consistent with the forecast the minister made.

The budget measures which came out just this week are designed to bolster the economy. We are seeing some very, very positive signs. As a matter of fact, just this morning I note that residential construction increased by 96 per cent in January over January 1991. That is a very strong signal that we are on the road to recovery.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, only a Conservative could say that the shrinking of the economy is a positive sign. The government's budget papers also confirm that real interest rates will be much higher than usual through 1997, meaning that full recovery could be as much as five years away.

I ask the Minister of State, do the government's own budget papers not confirm that the government's policies will not do enough to get the economy moving again and will not create enough jobs and economic opportunity for the hundreds of thousands of people who have been the hapless victims of this government's misguided economic policies?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, let us compare this particular recession with the last one when the hon. member was on the treasury benches. The GDP fell by 5.5 per cent over that period of time. In the recession that we have come through, it has fallen 3.1 percent. The hon. member should not be up in the House lecturing the government on financial matters because his record is suspect.

I want to remind the hon. member that during the last recession in 1981-82, we had a one-quarter dip in growth again after recovery had started.

This is not unusual during a recovery period. Now we are into 1992 and we are looking forward, not back, like the hon. member would want to do.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member wants to look back, let him look back in the government's budget papers tabled this week which say that "annual growth this year and next will still remain well below the 4.7 per cent average of growth in the 1983 and 1984 recovery period". Why does he hide that statistic?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the minister responsible for housing, who said in this House that despite the budget, everything would be done to create social housing and not less. CMHC has said that 10,000 fewer such housing units will be built next year because of this budget.

I ask the minister how he will do more for social housing when the number of units next year will be 10,000 less than this year.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. member that next year the government will spend over $2 billion for 650,000 federally supported social housing units that will provide homes for 1.5 million people.

Of course, we also announced in the budget a 3 per cent increase in the amount we spent last year to build social housing.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The government presented its budget as the greatest invention of the century for putting our unemployed back to work. The reality is quite different. The estimates show a $100 million cut in labour force training, in addition to the $126 million cut last year.

Why does the government want to take hope from our unemployed by letting other countries get ahead of us?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, first I want to remind the hon. member opposite that this government respects its commitments and that the first commitment we made to Canadian workers is to provide training and skills acquisition.

Our program has been increased by $300 million and unemployment insurance is now a positive, active program instead of a negative, passive one. We definitely intend to continue to develop a work plan suitable for all workers seeking employment and to do so in co–operation with business, the private sector and our commission, which is to set national priorities for us.

[English]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, we are going through one of the greatest periods of change in the world's trading relationships since the Middle Ages.

Despite this, almost every government responsibility that is forward looking has been cut; the Science Council, the Economic Council, the green plan, $100 million cut from job retraining for those who are not eligible for unemployment insurance.

What is the government saying? That it is giving up. I would ask the minister not to give me a partisan answer, simply tell me how can we build the kind of country that we all want if the government is going to take away the very tools that will enable the country to get there?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, is it necessary to repeat that we must work to deal with the globalization of markets? That is what we are working on in the Department of Employment and Immigration.

It is absolutely impossible to make progress without thinking about this globalization of markets. Recommendations from chambers of commerce and from all the consultants with whom we have worked confirm, as he says very well, the need to be prepared to face the globalization of markets. That is what we are working on through our jobs strategy programs.

JUSTICE

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. The human rights tribunal has been told that the government will use legislation to nullify decisions on pay equity that it does not agree with. The Law Reform Commission has been quashed just weeks after delivering a report on aboriginal justice that is counter to the view held by the Minister of Justice. Yesterday the government announced that it was killing the Court Challenges Program midway through its contract, a program which gives some tools to disadvantaged people to go to the highest courts of this country.

I want to ask the minister why she is doing this. What is the rationale behind this mean-spirited program? Is it a question of spite, a question of money or is it just simply a paranoid reaction to the Reform Party challenge?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the provisions taken in the budget were designed to try and deal with the very severe fiscal situation that the Government of Canada is in.

One of the axioms one learns in public life is that there is no limit to the amount of good you can do, but there may be a limit to the amount of good you can afford.

I would like to point out in the Court Challenges, for example, that the Government of Canada is the only government in Canada, and it was our government in 1985 that brought forward a program after the initial audit of the charterability of our legislation, to enable Canadians to take those cases to court. No other government in Canada, including governments led by that hon. member's party, have given those kinds of tools to their people to challenge their kind of legislation.

For the past eight years, Canadians have had the opportunity to pursue, beyond what the government's original response was, the charterability of Canadian legislation. I think the provinces should perhaps contribute to that body of jurisprudence by providing support to people within their jurisdiction to challenge their legislation.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, let us not dump it on the provinces. This is a national matter and we are talking about the charter of rights.

The minister says there is a severe financial situation that the government is in. I have her estimates here. In the estimates she is asking for an increase in money for litigation services for the Department of Justice from $73 million to $89 million. In my experience as a lawyer, I have never seen the Department of Justice ever come in a court and take one case for an aboriginal person or one case for a poor person. It has never done that. This is money for rich lawyers in Vancouver.

I want to ask the minister, if she has extra millions for these lawyers to litigate, why does she not have a few bucks for the poor and disadvantaged people of this country?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member's question is unworthy of him.

The litigation expenses of the Department of Justice arise from the fact that Department of Justice lawyers represent the Government of Canada. Many Canadians seek to sue the Government of Canada. There are disagreements that the Government of Canada has with people over a variety of issues and so the workload of the litigation sector of the Department of Justice is not set by the department of the Government of Canada's lawyers.

On key issues relating to matters of principle or the application of the charter, the Government of Canada frequently goes to court. As the Attorney General I go to court not simply to uphold the views of the Government of Canada, but to uphold the prerogatives of Parliament, to resolve certain key issues of fundamental public importance. Those issues must in fact be argued before the courts and the courts will determine what the balance is between them. To suggest that the litigation budget of the Department of Justice is in some way policy driven I think is just ridiculous.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I prefer that she pay for the Court Challenges Program so that some of the poor people could go.

I want to come back to this matter of severe financial restraints and I will put my final question to the Prime Minister. As has been said in the House this morning, Statistics Canada has reported that the economy shrunk 1.5 per cent last year. That is worse than the budget predictions. The only businesses that did well in the last three months are insurance companies with profits up 23 per cent and banks with profits up a staggering 65 per cent. Yet every other sector is down, contrary to the budget prediction.

My question for the Prime Minister is this: How can he justify economic policies which reward banks and insurance companies when he brings in a budget which refuses to help the economy and does absolutely nothing for the unemployed and cuts legal and social services for the disadvantaged people of this country?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is somewhat off base in the statistics that he brings forward. I might point out to my hon. friend that every economic group both in Canada and throughout the world which is taking a look at the position that Canada is in today says that this country will have the best recovery of any country in the G-7. We are positioned the best. We will have the best employment growth. We will have the best economic growth in this year and in next year, the lowest inflation and low interest rates. We are in a position to recover. Some of the signs have already started. I just mentioned, for example, the housing statistics.

The hon. member should take that into his understanding as he poses questions like that. He said there was nothing in the budget to create employment. The RRSP for home building, which has been praised widely and which the hon. member's party asked for, was in the budget. That alone is going to create employment.

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has told us time and time again that he sets a priority on the rights of the individual. He said repeatedly that he believed all Canadians were equal under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. If he still believes in these principles, why did he abolish the Court Challenges Program?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, I have made it clear that this was a very effective and very beneficial program. For 10 years we have provided very substantial funding to help minority official language groups and groups seeking equality. However, I think we can say that, over the past seven years, we have built up a certain amount of jurisprudence and that this program, which is important to everyone, should now be funded by others, perhaps at the provincial level, or by non-governmental organizations.

[English]

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Here we go, passing the ball back to the provinces.

Mr. Speaker, the Court Challenges Program gives people a chance to claim their equality rights under the charter. How will people who really need protection be able to demand their rights when the requisite funding is no longer available?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I can inform the House that this morning I met a number of human rights groups. We discussed this particular issue and other issues as well. I told these groups that it was my duty, as Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, to ensure that our legislation and policies comply with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. So I will continue to keep an eye on—

Perhaps I should speak English; I am getting out of my depth here.

As I indicated to these groups this morning, as Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada it is my obligation and my duty to ensure that the laws and the policy of the Government of Canada are in conformity with the charter. I will continue to do that.

As my colleague has indicated, we are in fact the only level of government that has been willing to fund these kinds of cases. They have been administered, not by my department but the department of my colleague, the minister of multiculturalism, simply because there would otherwise be a conflict of interest since the Department of Justice defends the Government of Canada and the prerogatives of Parliament.

I will continue to observe this. In discussing this issue with the human rights groups this morning, I was also very interested in their proposal to perhaps create a task force of mutual consultation where we could in a co-operative and collegial way review legislation and look at areas that might be changed.

It is in our interest to resolve those problems. It may be that from time to time it will be appropriate to take the litigation response and at that time we would look at the appropriate nature of funding.

I believe there are other ways of assuring that there is input from people and from groups, that feel politically disadvantaged in expressing their concerns about our laws and policies as they relate to the charter.

I repeat again my concern that the provinces have not participated in this. Their laws and policies are also subject to the charter and there is no jurisprudence that they have supported to help clarify those principles which would be to the benefit of all of us.

LINGUISTIC MINORITIES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, the government is not going to win any prizes for popularity if it keeps arguing its case the way the Minister of Justice is doing now. Federal assistance and the courts are the only recourse we have in Canada to help linguistic minorities defend themselves: Anglophones in Quebec and Francophones outside Quebec. This is the only level of government that has the generosity and the will to support us. So don't tell us you are going to transfer this to the provinces. Why did you take a leaf from Preston Manning's reform program, which aims to abolish bilingualism and multiculturalism? Why did you do that?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, I thought the hon. member might have wanted to rise in the House to congratulate us on creating the new Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship for the purpose of defending the interests of all Canadians and promoting Canadian citizenship. We have a program that works very effectively for official languages and for all groups across this country. Our colleague, the Secretary of State, administers this program very well. If we continue to work with these groups, we will do everything we can to help those that are in a minority situation.

[English]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, there are still three provinces where it is difficult to obtain a trial in French. There are still six provinces where it is next to impossible to convince the authorities to give the minority groups control of their schools.

I ask the minister, in all honesty, how can the government in times of crisis in terms of constitutional matters abandon the rights of minorities guaranteed in the Constitution of this country?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, we have never abandoned the rights of the minorities. Our citizenship means equality for all, and I am going to continue to defend vigorously the minority communities from coast to coast as I do all the people in our diversity.

This particular program which was for the preparation and defence of these test cases under the language and equality rights of the charter was intended to provide a solid base of jurisprudence. After hundreds of cases one would imagine that we now have that base of jurisprudence.

ATOMIC ENERGY

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister of energy and the parliamentary secretary to the minister of energy, I have a question for either the acting minister of energy or, in the alternative, the Minister of State for the Environment.

This coming year another $177 million will be added to the $2 billion in artificial life support that has kept Atomic Energy of Canada Limited wheezing along for the last 10 years.

My question is either to the acting energy minister or the Minister of State for the Environment. Given the fact that AECL has made only one new sale in that entire $2 billion decade, why does this government continue to insist on force-feeding even more taxpayers dollars into this dead horse?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should have known from his House leader about the absence of the minister of energy, because I provide lists of ministers who are not here to each party. He could have chosen another day.

Let me say, in regard to his desire that Atomic Energy of Canada be wound up, perhaps we should discuss that with Ontario Hydro to see how that fits into its plans.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I am certain Ontario Hydro and more particularly the Government of Ontario would be delighted to discuss that.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): The chain has been rattled, Mr. Speaker. Everywhere else on this planet the growth energy industries are solar, wind, biomass and hydrogen, options on which the government intends to spend, in total less than a third of what it intends to spend on the crumbling nuclear option.

Will the President of the Treasury Board take this opportunity to declare that there has been a terrible mistake and a terrible series of typographical errors in the energy department's estimates, that the numbers have been reversed, and that the government will spend $177 million on energy efficiencies and alternatives and only $55 million on nukes?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, not at all. I have full confidence in the magnificent work of my colleague, the minister of energy.

CANADIAN JOBS STRATEGY

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration or his alternate.

The real jobless rate in Newfoundland these days is close to 40 per cent. Indeed it is over 50 per cent in places like the Port au Port peninsula, St. George's area and Bay D'Espoir.

• (1140)

These people have been brought to their knees by the particular policies of this government. For example, the high dollar makes it difficult to sell forest exports, so the loggers are losing their jobs right and left.

I want to ask the minister: Why is the government in effect laughing at the misery of those people by choosing now to cut $100 million from the Canadian Jobs Strategy program?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, I repeated earlier how important it was to train our workers, and I also recalled the very substantial amounts we added to the system in order to upgrade skills and training. We are convinced that in the long run, this is the right strategy to ensure that someone who is looking for a job will be able to adjust to new markets and to industry's new needs. That is why we are working very closely with the commission that makes recommendations on priorities to our department. I also come from a region where the unemployment rate is still far too high, to my liking, but I believe we will be able to find the right solutions to our economic and social problems.

[English]

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, that has to be the nicest, loveliest answer I have had in a long time, but it had very little to do with the question.

I have said to the minister, and I will say one more time, that there is a decrease. I ask her to look at the estimates. She is talking increase; I am talking decrease. The estimates clearly say that the program has been cut by $100 million.

How can she stand there with a straight face and say that is an increase? Does she not realize that also last year the same program was cut by $100 million?

When is she going to come to the real world with the rest of us and respond to the question? Why the decrease? Why now? Are you laughing at those people?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): No, Mr. Speaker, we are not laughing at workers who are looking for jobs. Yes, we are trying to find the right approaches, as a government, and yes, we did have the courage to act responsibly and make the unemployment insurance system an active system that will at last give workers a chance to acquire the skills they need to be able to cope with this new economic structure. We are putting the appropriate measures in place through the other departments. Yes, we will succeed, but we must give it everything we've got.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint–Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Quebec now has 405,000 unemployed workers, and this does not include those who have stopped looking for employment. We have had more than 23,500 bankruptcies in the province, and there was a net loss of 68,000 jobs in 1991 alone. More than half the unemployed in Quebec are in the Montreal region. Could the Prime Minister perhaps explain to Montreal's jobless why his budget does not provide any opportunities for finding a job? When can the people of Montreal expect to go back to work in this country?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, unless he has become a complete stranger to the Montreal scene, the hon. member for Saint–Léonard must be aware that the government has invested a lot of effort and a substantial number of programs in the Montreal region in order to get workers the jobs that are now becoming available as a result of our investment in advance technology and industries like the pharmaceutical industry, aerospace and so forth, which generate jobs that pay well. Thanks to our training programs, unemployed workers will have a chance to train for these jobs.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint–Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the minister responsible for the Montreal area answered my question. The jobs he assumes were created in the pharmaceutical industry will be lost because of the cuts in social housing and the loss of the co–operative housing program announced in the budget.

When will the minister responsible for the Montreal area stand up to his colleague, the Minister of Finance, to protect the interests of Montreal workers?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I repeat that the many jobs being created at this time in the aerospace and pharmaceutical industries are the jobs of the future, and those are the jobs we are targeting to restore Montreal's economy. Furthermore, we have created the right economic climate by reducing interest rates and keeping inflation at a level that is conducive to the kind of new investment that will be beneficial to the Montreal area.

LABOUR

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for the Status of Women.

Would she be prepared to meet with the 22 women in Powell River whose jobs have been taken by strike breakers hired by the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce?

Specifically, would the minister meet with these 22 women in Powell River with a view to helping them break the deadlock with the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce which is bent on breaking their union and throwing them into the street?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I do not plan to be in Powell River in the near future. Quite honestly, I do not think that would be an appropriate kind of meeting for me to undertake.

Obviously there is a labour dispute and the appropriate way of resolving that is between the union and the employer.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, the women of Powell River knew that as well as everyone else in the House.

Would she urge the government to conduct a public inquiry into the exploitation of women by the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce and the other chartered banks in Canada?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, in fact quite recently we received reports from the bankers and the Canadian Banking Association which showed some very significant progress is being made in the employment and the promotion of women.

In fact, one of the major banks has now a very increased percentage of women in senior management.

Obviously there is always room for improvement but I have full confidence that there are mechanisms between the banks and the employees and unions to work out these situations.

THE CONSTITUTION

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

Recently the Montreal Gazette reported that in a letter to Southam News relaying the government's position, Information Commissioner John Grace said that the government is keeping public opinion polls on the Constitution locked away because of an "extremely volatile public environment".

These polls have cost hundreds of thousands of dollars, obviously paid for with public funds. It would only make sense to me that the public should have access to this information.

Will the minister now release these polls to allow Canadians to make up their own minds on the constitutional question? What perhaps would this government have to hide?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I am sure the hon. member knows, this is a matter that is still in negotiation between The Ottawa Citizen and the commissioner and she would not want me to interfere with that process.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, I realize that the government is not used to allowing the public to take part in matters of state. We have seen that all too painfully in the last few hours. I think this time we need to make exceptions.

I ask this minister again: Will he not release the said public opinion polls on the Constitution? If he refuses to do so today, then when can the Canadian people expect to see the results that they have paid for in this and also the constitutional proposals that have been left up to a committee of only 30 people to determine with directives from the PMO?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I answered the first question the first time. With regard to public participation, let me make two points.

One has to do with the practice of some political parties in this country. When there is dissent in their ranks they act immediately to throw out the dissenters. This is despite clear undertakings that were given by her leader when he first became the leader of her party that never would he, as a leader, support the right of a party leader to deny the use of the party label to a candidate who disagreed with the leader. The Reform Party says one thing on the hustings and does another thing in practice.

With regard to the question of public participation, we have just come through a quite extraordinary process of public participation on the Constitution to which representatives of the Reform Party were invited.

I have heard two political parties that whined and complained about that process: one was the Bloc Quebecois, the other was the Reform Party of Canada which did not want to hear Canadians who said things that it did not agree with.

TAXATION

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Finance.

The Reform Party would like to eliminate tax credits and tax deductions which the government uses to achieve desirable social and economic goals. It wants to do this by instituting a regressive flat tax.

Would the minister inform the House how the Reform Party's flat tax would affect families and working people?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the flat tax proposal as I understand it from the Reform Party would allow no deductions at all. Therefore their system would help the upper-middle income and wealthy people of this country and penalize the lower-middle income and the poor working families.

It would damage the volunteer sector. I do not think there is any question about that. The charitable donations would be decimated and they have let us know that in no uncertain terms.

In short, the flat tax would penalize those people we are trying to help the most with the budget that was just released on Tuesday.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

This budget means very little to a great many Canadians in Toronto, especially the 206,000 unemployed individuals who need immediate jobs to put their families back on track, the 400,000 people on welfare who need immediate hope and 124,000 people who use food banks and want this undignified dependence to come to an end.

Why did the government ignore the plight of these Canadians in its budget by failing to introduce job creation measures that would have addressed the economic malaise confronting these Canadians and metropolitan Toronto?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, we learned our lessons from the 1981–82 recession when the government of the day threw money at the problems and it did not solve the problem. It was borrowed money and we are trying to pay back that debt today. We are suffering under that debt load in this country.

The best thing we can do for those people is get the economy going again, to create meaningful, full-time employment, not just make-work projects for a month or two.

The amount of money that was suggested by the Liberal Party would only have provided about 30,000 short-term jobs across the entire country. That is not the way to solve the problem. The way to solve the problem is to get our fundamentals in place and come out of this recovery full speed ahead.

That is exactly what all the think tanks across this country and around the world are saying, that we are in the best position of any country in the G-7 for recovery this year.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): That response is full of bunk and the minister knows that.

The municipal government of metropolitan Toronto proposed specific joint projects to be shared among the three levels of government that would have provided the very job stimulus that is required by Toronto.

For instance, one initiative was the construction of a new trade centre that would have created 7,000 immediate construction jobs and 3,000 permanent jobs.

Why did the government say no to this and other sensible projects, not make-work projects but sensible projects, that would have put Canadians back to work and would have had some meaning to this government's feeling that the economy is indeed back on track?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, we did not do that because the taxpayers of this country have told us in no uncertain terms not to bring forward make-work projects but get the economy back on track. Once the economy is back working again then some of these projects may be able to take place.

Right now the taxpayer—there is only one taxpayer—cannot afford to borrow more money. All it will do is force up interest rates. It will increase inflation and we will be back in that same old cycle that the Liberals had us on for years. We are trying to get out of that and we believe the policies that we have are going to work.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of employment.

A recent Statistics Canada report reveals that most Canadians who claim unemployment insurance are likely to find themselves out of work repeatedly in the course of their working lives.

The report states that repeat unemployment insurance use is very high. Repeat users represent as many as 80 per cent of all claimants.

I ask the minister, why did the budget not include a national training strategy that would help these people get off the UI treadmill?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, we already have this strategy in place. Its purpose, as my colleague from finance said so well, is to upgrade our economy and to help workers, through the jobs strategy and the various programs that we offer them, to pursue their training and be competitive in a world of globalized markets.

We did not need to add to this budget because for the past three years we have had an employment strategy that was designed with employers, workers and the private sector and that meets the needs of today and tomorrow very well.

[English]

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, obviously the strategy this government has implemented is not working because these people still exist.

The Statistics Canada study is supported by the Economic Council's most recent, and last annual report. That report states: "There is a group of people who are caught in regular cycles of unemployment. They may gradually become lengthier and more frequent thus forming a trap from which it is difficult to escape".

Why did this government not address this fundamental problem in the budget? When is it going to abandon its haphazard hit-or-miss approach to job training and throw a lifeline to these individuals who are trapped in the whirlpool of UI dependency?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, I remember very well the working sessions we had and the big discussions here in this House when we tried to have Bill C-21 passed unanimously. The main purpose of this bill was to break this vicious circle of unemployment and employment. That is why we implemented this reform. The hon. member will never agree that we are making progress, but we are, little by little.

[English]

CANADA POST

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for Canada Post.

Every day communities are complaining about the fact that their post offices are being closed and not just post offices in the public sector. Post offices that have been in drugstores for twenty, thirty, forty years are being closed without any proper notice and without consulting the people and the communities affected.

Will the minister instruct Canada Post to set up a real process where the communities and people affected are being listened to and can participate in the decision-making process?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, in 1981 this House passed an act making Canada Post a Crown corporation. There was unanimity on both sides of the House that it was for the purposes of keeping out political interference so that we would not have these requests that ministers direct the post office to do this and that.

However, the question of the post office being responsive to its customers is an important question. I will communicate the member's concerns to the post office by way of a communication. I suggest that he might do the same thing.

We should let the post office do what we asked it to do unanimously in 1981 and that is to operate at arm's length, free from political interference.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I am not asking the minister to get involved in each and every closure.

What I would like the minister to do as a matter of public policy is to ask the post office to set up a mechanism where the public is really involved. I think that is a proper role of government. It is a proper role for the minister responsible for the post office.

I would ask him to make that request, which I am sure is shared by members of all political parties, to make sure there is a proper process for individual and community involvement in the decision-making process.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I understand that such a process does exist. I understand that the post office has on a number of occasions offered to brief members of this House on the process and on all that is involved. I am told that the New Democratic Party has turned down at least one of those briefings.

If in fact the hon. member is not aware of the process, I will ask the post office to invite the hon. member and his colleagues to a briefing, so that they may be acquainted with the processes involved and make any suggestions they have for improvement.

TRADE

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the minister for trade would agree that the harassment of Honda by the U.S. customs authority threatens future investment in Canada very severely.

Now look at what is happening. The U.S. authorities have said that the Honda Civic has less than 50 per cent North American content. Our authorities say it has 66 per cent North American content. Does not this great disparity indicate to the minister that we have to amend the free trade agreement to have precise content rules?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, let me just correct one point that my hon. friend made.

Revenue Canada has advised Honda that the North American content is greater than 50 per cent. It has not advised Honda of a specific figure such as my hon. friend has mentioned.

I fully agree with the substance of the member's question. It is one of the very clear objectives we have in the NAFTA negotiations, the North American free trade negotiations. If we are not successful in getting a North American free trade agreement, then under the free trade agreement with the United States we need to get clear rules of origin so we do not have this same problem repeating itself.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

If this U.S. custom's decision goes against Honda, which it very well might, Canada's only remedy is under chapter 18 arbitration of the FTA. As the minister knows, one of the big problems with chapter 18 arbitration is that it is not binding unless the U.S. agrees that it will be.

Has the minister asked the U.S. to ensure that an arbitration decision under that provision will be binding and, if so, what was the response of the United States?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, we have, under the terms of the free trade agreement, initiated two consultations with the United States; one with regard to the Honda decision and the other with regard to the problem that we have with Camry also on rules of origin.

Let us follow through that process. We have presented our case very strongly to the United States government on both of these issues and we will continue to do that, working with both companies involved. The clear objective is to avoid these problems in the future by getting an agreement now or as soon as possible on how rules of origin should be interpreted by both governments.

COMMUNITY WEEKLIES

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications and concerns his announcement yesterday about the subsidy for newspapers.

The minister surely knows that Le Journal de Cornwall, Le Soleil de la Colombie and many other weeklies serving Francophone communities outside Quebec are disappearing because of an arbitrary decision by Canada Post which considers these newspapers as weeklies rather than magazines.

I would like to ask the minister whether he is prepared to intercede with his colleague, the minister responsible for Canada Post, who refused to answer letters from the association of the French language press outside Quebec, so that these newspapers can survive.

[English]

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the Department of Communications is working very closely with the newspaper publishing industry across the country to try to meet their concerns while, at the same time, recognizing the fact that Canada Post does have costs involved in the distribution of newspapers.

The announcement we made yesterday will benefit some 430 community newspapers across Canada. It is something which is very beneficial for community newspapers. It was worked on in conjunction with the Canadian Community Newspaper Association and we will continue to work very closely with them.

ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTMENTS

TABLING AND REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEES

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table, in both official languages, a number of Order in Council appointments which were made by the government pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 110(1). These are deemed to be referred to the appropriate standing committees, a list of which is attached.

UNITED NATIONS

TABLING OF ORDERS IN COUNCIL

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege today in the House to table, in accordance with Standing Order 32(2), three Orders in Council, in both official languages, relating to Canadian participation in United Nations peacekeeping missions. They are PC 1991–2115 for the United Nations mission for the referendum in western Sahara, PC 1992–354 for the United Nations protection force in Yugoslavia, and PC 1992–355 for the United Nations advanced mission in Cambodia.

NATIONAL DEFENCE AND VETERANS AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour, on behalf of the Minister of Veterans Affairs, to table in the House the government's response to the first report of the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs. This is the report that deals with Canada's wartime merchant mariners.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to three petitions.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON ABORIGINAL AFFAIRS

AUTHORIZATION TO TRAVEL

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, there have been consultations and I believe there will be unanimous consent for the following motion. The motion reads:

> That as part of its study on aboriginal housing, five members and three staff of the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs be authorized to travel to Vancouver to participate in the conference on housing, organized by the Assembly of First Nations from March 8 to March 12, 1992.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

REFUGEES

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from several Canadians who, because of the suffering of our refugees, their personal and economic hardships and their undecided futures because of our slow refugee processing, are calling upon Parliament to urge the government to step up action on refugee cases and especially to exercise compassion.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I too have a petition signed by many residents in the Ottawa region. The petitioners are asking for relief for refugees who are suffering from personal and economic hardship and fear for their future and are calling on the government to exercise compassion.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to rise in the House, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition which contains over 5,000 names of people from my riding which states:

> The undersigned, your petitions, humbly call upon Parliament to revise the laws of Canada, to replace the Young Offenders Act with an updated Juvenile Delinquent Act with a lower maximum age of 13.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, scrap the Young Offenders Act.

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition that is in order according to Standing Order 36.

The petition states that gasoline prices are significantly higher in the Ottawa area than those in southern Ontario and that such a price disparity discriminates against Ottawa area consumers.

The Government of Ontario has eliminated legal licence fees for northern residents to compensate for a similar gas price disparity between southern and northern Ontario. Therefore the petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the government to correct this injustice to Ottawa area motorists.

CRIMINAL INJURIES COMPENSATION PROTECTION

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present two petitions to the House. The first deals with the issue of the absence of criminal injuries compensation protection at the federal level and particularly for Canadians who are travelling and working abroad and supports Bill C-310, which is a private members' bill I have introduced in this House and which will be debated on March 9.

This petition is signed by hundreds of people from the Victoria area, including from my own constituency and I have the honour to present it to the House.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): The second petition is also signed by people from my area and calls on the government to exempt from the goods and services tax women's sanitary products.

DRUGS

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of tabling a number of petitions signed by over 500 Canadians from my riding who are concerned that the drug trade in Toronto is getting out of hand.

• (1210)

Essentially they are asking this government that when there are proceeds from drug busts in metropolitan Toronto and elsewhere, rather than having all these revenues flow into the general accounts of the federal government, that those moneys be shared with the police authorities in Toronto and other local organizations who are on the leading front of trying to combat and overcome the illicit drug trade problem that is causing havoc among families and our youth.

I hope the government listens to this appeal.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, questions No. 4, 176 and 277 will be answered today.

[Text]

Question No. 4—Mrs. Maheu:

Does the government intend to table the report of the Race Relations Task Force, headed by Mr. Linton Garner?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): There is no intent to table.

Question No. 176—Mr. Young (Acadie—Bathurst):

With respect to the Public Service, as of March 31 of (a) 1985 (b) 1990 (c) 1991, what was the number of (i) senior management (SM) (ii) executive (EX) (iii) deputy ministers (DM) (or equivalent)?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am informed by the Privy Council Office and the Treasury Board of Canada as follows:

As of March 31 of each year:

	YEAR	SM	EX	DM/EQUIVALENT
(a)	1985	2,096	2,198	115
(b)	1990	1,984	2,624	129
(c)	1991*	2,041	2,715	136

Following the February 26, 1991 budget, the number of public service senior managers as of January 31, 1991, is being reduced by 10 per cent (from 4750 to 4275), with the bulk of the reduction to be achieved within one year and the remainder by March 31, 1993. In the period January 31 to November 30, 1991, the management category population decreased by 231, or 48 per cent of the reduction target of 475.

Question No. 227—Mr. Milliken:

What is the anticipated cost of the National Transportation Act review panel appointed by the Minister of Transport to review federal transportation economic regulatory legislation?

Mr. Leonard Gustafson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Members of the National Transportation Act review panel, who were appointed by the Governor in Council on January 31, 1992, will develop a proposed budget once they have had an opportunity to determine a plan for carrying out their mandate. The proposed budget will then be submitted to Treasury Board in accordance with the established budget approval process.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, if questions No. 113 and 152 could be made orders for returns those return would be tabled immediately.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House that questions mentioned by the hon. parliamentary secretary be deemed to have been made orders for returns?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Text]

Question No. 113—Mr. Boudria:

Since 1984, how many grants have been given by the government and its agencies to privately owned golf clubs and in each instance what is (a) the amount (b) the purpose of the grant?

Return tabled.

Question No. 152—Mrs. Stewart:

For each fiscal year since 1989 to date, have any departments rented facilities other than those of the government for staff training, and, if so, (a) what were the costs for renting the facilities (b) for what reasons were these facilities used?

Return tabled.

[Translation]

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, I would ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We will revert back to petitions because one of our members was on the other side of the House. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

PETITIONS

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present a petition today signed by numerous residents of the Ottawa area.

The petitioners are concerned about the excessively high gas prices that are prevalent in this area, higher than other parts of southern Ontario. They call on Parliament to urge the government to correct this injustice to Ottawa area motorists, and I may say that many Kingston area motorists share their concern.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, when you asked for consent for the questions to be allowed to stand, I had risen on a point of order on that issue, hoping that the government, perhaps through the chief Whip, would respond.

I have four questions on the Order Paper. Three have been there for periods much longer than 45 days, some of them up to about five months. We are not entitled to have more than four questions on the Order Paper. I cannot get any answers any more because I cannot put new questions on the Order Paper. So I am effectively paralyzed in my ability to do my work in terms of asking written questions.

I want to ask the government when it intends to follow the Standing Orders of the House and provide answers to those questions. I recognize that the Whip probably cannot give a full answer right now. I would be satisfied with a commitment on his part that he will do his best to ensure that the Standing Orders are followed by those responsible.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, we take a lot of credit for changing the Standing Orders so this particular submission could be made. I would like to point out to the House that our record in answering questions is infinitely better than any system which existed prior to the present one.

He is correct that I am not familiar with his particular four questions. I do know from the time I was parliamentary secretary to the Deputy Prime Minister that frequently there is difficulty because questions are so complex. They involve more than one department and a very heavy expenditure of money to procure the kind of answers that members are after, and it is simply not possible if too many departments are involved to answer in 45 days.

I have suggested to members that if they would cut down on the size of their questions it would be very helpful in getting speedy answers. I do not know if that is the situation in this case, but I will undertake to ask the parliamentary secretary to look into the matter and to report back to the House at the earliest opportunity.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have the honour to inform the House that a communication has been received as follows:

Rideau Hall
Ottawa

February 28, 1992

Mr. Speaker,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Peter de C. Cory, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, the 28th day of February, 1992, at 1 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

Yours sincerely,
Judith A. LaRocque,
Secretary to the Governor General.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1992–93

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-61, an act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year commencing April 1, 1992, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee E.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will, of course, be addressed to the matter before us, that is the budget brought in by the present government for the next fiscal year.

The first thing I would like to do is deal with some anomalies in the budget, perhaps unintentioned by the government, but nonetheless I think we should pay attention to them.

For some time now, the leader of my party has been calling for a review of the loopholes for business expenses such as lunches and other allegedly important business dealings that have still not been sealed in the current budget that is before us. Did you know that it is still possible for businessmen to write off the services of escorts going to lunch?

An hon. member: No.

Mr. Barrett: My dear friend says "no" and shakes his head. The department's response to this is to say that it has no way of monitoring this. The fact is that some of those escort services are out and out hooker shops and this government is permitting people to clearly deduct the services of hookers as a business expense.

Mr. McDermid: That's not true and you know it.

Mr. Barrett: My dear friend may interfere all he wants across the floor, but the reality is that the department itself admits publicly that it has no way of monitoring this.

Mr. Fee: Why don't you listen to what the minister says?

Mr. Barrett: All right my dear friends, you are very quick at heckling but very slow on actually taking some action.

I want to tell you that as it stands today, and I know it clearly, the fact is that hookers can still be deducted as a business expense. That is hardly appropriate in this day and age and hardly appropriate at a time when this country is involved in attempting to cut back services right across the line. When it comes to certain services, they overlook it.

Mr. McDermid: Did you do it?

Mr. Barrett: My dear friend, did I?

Mr. McDermid: How do you know?

Mr. Barrett: I do not have business deductions.

An hon. member: Neither do they.

Mr. Barrett: Look, if you want to interrupt just stand up on a point of order and I will rule on it.

Mr. McDermid: On a point of order.

Mr. Barrett: I ruled you out of order.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. The Minister of National Revenue yesterday made it very clear that that was not a fact.

Mr. Barrett: That is not a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I cannot hear the point of order. How can I rule on it?

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, my point of order is that the hon. member is standing here and giving out information that is not true. In fact, the Minister of Finance yesterday—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is not a point of order. It is a point of debate.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, thank you for keeping the House in order and pointing out the member who is suggesting a member is not telling the truth is himself out of order.

Having said that, the reality is as I have said it.

To go on to other areas of cutbacks, I want to go from a particular to a universal. The fact is that this government has deliberately moved off of any responsibility right across this country of assisting provinces in their budgeting for the economic devastation that has been caused by this government.

We have 1.5 million unemployed people in this country, many of whose only source of income is unemployment insurance. When they run out of unemployment insurance eligibility, although the government is increasing their share toward unemployment insurance payments, they run out of unemployment insurance. Then they are on welfare and that is where this government walks away, particularly in three provinces, Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia, because of the capping.

What it is doing—I know the Chair has no part of this—is saying: "If you are suffering out there, you are the victims of economic restructuring". It is saying: "If you are suffering out there, you are the victims of an economic restructuring". It is an economic restructuring that somebody has to sacrifice themselves for and it might as well be the poor, the unemployed and the unemployables.

This government in this budget has not made one single gesture of understanding what peril it has put this nation in, in terms of the huge costs to provinces of welfare. This government has created more welfare problems in its eight years in power than we have seen in a generation before. Its response to dealing with this is to blame the Liberals. Lord knows, they need the blame. But we find the two old line parties trading off whose recession was worse. Is that the way to deal with a country? We are not here to talk about whose recession is the worst. Both of them caused the recession. We are here to talk about solutions and this government has come up with absolutely nothing.

The same old Tories were around in the last depression when we heard that famous expression by their American counterpart, the then President of the United States, Hoover, who said: "Root hog or die—Root hog or die". Free enterprise for the poor. Free enterprise for the middle class, but socialism for the rich.

Let us take a look at the banks in this country. The banks are protected by a form of marketing board, the very thing they want to destroy for the farmers. The Bank of Canada, in effect, is a form of marketing board; money supply, money control for the five private major banks in this country, a public instrument to protect those private banks that are now making higher profits than any other corporate sector in this country and being protected by this government; $4 billion last year of profits made by the banks—$4 billion that the super rich in this country are guaranteed protection on, yet the poor, the unemployed have no succour from this government.

An hon. member: They are paying taxes.

Mr. Barrett: Oh, they are paying tax. Let us hear it for the crying. If the banks paid taxes at the same rate that a bank clerk pays, we would all be a heck of a lot better off. Bank clerks pay more percentage than the bank itself does. Do not give me the stuff that banks are paying their fair share of taxes. The banks are protected by this government and a socialist instrument known as the Bank of Canada.

The insurance companies in this country are fat, loaded and doing well. To extend it further, we see that even a separate bank is going to be favoured by the North American free trade agreement with Mexico. Mr. Speaker, I refer you to a report, not in Canada but in the United States. In Canada, unlike Mexico, unlike the United States, the parliamentarians of this country have yet to have a briefing on the draft bracketed agreement on the Canada-U.S.-Mexico deal. The Mexican senators have had a briefing, the U.S. Congress people have had a briefing, but nothing here in Canada. Keep us in the dark no matter what you are planning to sign.

I quote from The Financial Post of just this morning. The Financial Post is not a supporter of the New Democratic Party. If it were, I would not buy it. This is what The Financial Post stated this morning, and I quote: "Washington—Canada will be the only nation to suffer under a North American free trade agreement according to a bleak study released yesterday".

An hon. member: By who?

Mr. Barrett: Wait, I am coming to that. Do not get nervous. I know his anxiety level is rising. I know the tension is overwhelming him, but I tell him, do not get nervous. I am in order.

"While Mexico gains 600,000 jobs, the U.S. gains 130,000 jobs, Canada stands to lose 5,000 jobs" says the Institute for International Economics, as it produced the gloomiest predictions for Canada of any serious scrutiny done of the contentious free trade debate. I emphasize any serious scrutiny because this government has produced absolutely no documents on its position in the negotiating of that agreement to this House. It was Southam News which, through the Freedom of information act, got access to the documents it had prepared for its own side of briefings for the Canadian position. The documents released under the information act, forced by Southam News, indicated the very same thing, that this government was going into a mine field on the Mexican negotiations. Let us understand very, very openly and obviously that this government is on a course of another sell-out just as the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement has been.

I do not intend to be negative for my full 20 minutes. I have some positive alternatives to help this government out of its mess. It is necessary to understand how stupid, how foolish and how closeted this government has been in the dealings on the North American free trade agreement with Mexico. Here is an American study by a reputable organization that has shown clearly exactly what the government's own private briefings had.

Do not run out, Mr. Member, I am not through yet. Furthermore, this study goes on to show in stark contrast the U.S. $2 billion trade deficit it had with Mexico in 1990 would undergo a positive swing of $9 billion by 1995. Another slap against Canada will be rediversion of U.S. imports from Canadian sources to Mexican sources. Why not? If under the free trade agreement with Canada and the United States the United States is forced to buy a Canadian product because of that agreement and we then go in with Mexico, it will obviously buy a similar Mexican product. Why would it not? Any dumb-bell can figure that out. Canadian wages are higher than Mexico. On average, secondary and tertiary manufacturing jobs require about $12 to $14 an hour here in Canada. The same job in Mexico pays 80 cents an hour. Where do you think people are going to buy? They are going to buy from Mexico. What does this study do? It says exactly that. Any dumb-bell can figure that out.

I do not know, the government is full of any kind of things, but any dumb-bell can figure that out. But it is still going to have to sign this deal. We are going to lose on secondary and tertiary manufacturing thousands of jobs because of the Maquiladora program in Mexico and because the Mexicans are paid 80 cents an hour in many instances in the Maquiladora. Talk about human rights, talk about health and safety standards, the committee of this House has not even visited the Maquiladora, has not even gone to Mexico to see what kind of competition we will be faced with and has not even questioned the violation of human rights against men and women in Mexico who the government, through its Prime Minister, says is a paramount interest, human rights all over the world except when it comes obviously to trading partners such as Mexico.

The most exploited group of the workers in Mexico are women between the ages 18 and 30. They have been removed essentially from the rural communities in Mexico, moved into the Maquiladora zone and are at mercy in the prey of unscrupulous employers documented through human rights violations and such organizations as Amnesty International and other religious community groups. What has this government done? Thumb its nose at it, make sanctimonious speeches about "Oh, we want to tie aid into human rights". What a pile of—well I will not say the word BS. I was thinking of saying BS but I will not say it.

There you go, Mr. Speaker, it is hypocrisy. I was thinking of that word but I know that is unparliamentary too. So there you go, a government that really does not give a fig about Canadian working people, and does not care about the Mexicans at the other end. The exploitation is there and even in the face of this evidence is still going ahead to sign that deal. Why?

I have come to a conclusion and I want to make an accusation. I think this government is tied into a U.S. corporate agenda and it is more interested in that corporate agenda for those international corporations than it is for the Canadian people, Canadian workers, men and women right across this country. I hate to be right on this one but I am right.

An hon. member: That will be a first.

Mr. Barrett: Well, if it is a first, it is a horrible example to start with. It is a hell of a mess and I cannot say that either, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. member: Well, don't say it.

Mr. Barrett: I will not say it.

This government has completely sold out in terms of any commitment to ordinary Canadians, to small business in this country, to working men and working women and sits there smugly saying: "We are not going to do anything to get us out of this mess because we did everything we could to get us into it".

• (1230)

That is its philosophy. Every single one of its policies brought us to this situation. The goods and services tax was part of it. The North American free trade negotiations with Mexico are stalling corporate investments, both internally and externally, in this country. How are we going to recruit foreign capital when we have to say that our wage structure is higher here but we are willing to join to have access to our market with a low wage partner in Mexico?

Do you think a German, Japanese or any international entrepreneur will invest in Canada when we are prepared to give away our markets to both Mexico and the United States? They are not stupid. However, this government, along with the GST, along with inadequate protection of our own Canadian markets, our own manufacturing base, entered into those two trade deals.

Now the government bleats about the debt. I have heard the government cry about the debt. I see the Liberals and the Tories complain to each other about who increased the debt most first. What an absurd argument. Who increased the debt most first? They are both lousy managers. They have both squandered away the resources of this country. They have both abandoned a sense of incorporating the wealth of this nation into some kind of sense.

An hon. member: Truth at last.

Mr. Barrett: There is a god-given cornucopia of natural resources in this country: the oil industry, the gas industry, lumber, fisheries. All of those god-given natural resources are available to the 27 million of us. This government squandered that cornucopia and arrived at a situation in which there are 1.5 million unemployed and a massive public debt and then it says to the very people who's money it took out of their pockets in the first place: "You have to dig deeper to pay up for the mess we have created".

An hon. member: Shame, shame.

Mr. Barrett: Lewis Carroll, if he were alive today, would be embarrassed. Alice in Wonderland becomes a reality and these guys become the biggest fairy tale of all. Who is the walrus over there? Who is the Mad Hatter? It changes hats with the Minister of Finance. Whoever the Minister of Finance is under the Tory government is the Mad Hatter and gets the hat.

What a bunch of wrecking crews. What a bunch of incompetents. How could they take a major economy that is a principal actor in the world, in the G-7, and turn it upside down into a disaster? Only the Liberals and Tories could figure out how to do it.

Mr. Lewis: What about B.C.?

Mr. Barrett: I left surpluses in B.C., balanced budgets plus $600 million worth of assets. I will put my seat up against anybody who says otherwise.

Having said that, I am just a socialist. I just made money. It was against the law for socialists to make money on behalf of the public. We did it anyway. We set up our own Crown corporation known as the British Columbia Insurance Corporation. Has one right winger who has been elected since in that province got rid of it? Come on, stand up. They have not because it makes money.

One thing that should attract the heart and soul of every Tory is a corporation that makes money. We can talk about resources. We can talk about a sense of commitment. We can talk about sensitivity to people but that will not get their attention. However, if we tell them how to make money, ding the bell goes on. Actually, the light goes on and the bell rings. Even the light going on and the bell ringing does not mean that they learn anything.

I want to use my last few minutes to give a primary economic lesson. The debt owed by this country requires 32 cents of every single dollar taken in to just pay the interest. Do we agree with that? Yes, we agree with that.

As an aside, these birds moan, squeal and cry about the Ontario government increasing its deficit. Ontario pays 7 cents on every dollar for debt servicing, and let us say it goes to 9 cents. This government would love to have that debt leverage ratio. It is 32 cents under the Tories and 7 cents under the NDP, who inherited a mess from the Liberals which I will not talk about. Seventy per cent of the debt owed by this country is internally financed. We are in hock for 70 per cent of the money we owe internally into this country.

One of the resources we have in this country is our own indigenous capital. We should not be afraid of it. This government has finally discovered a bit under the program of using RRSPs for down payments on homes. I do not think that is the best way of using that money, but at least the Tories have got it through their heads.

Do they understand what a bond is? I think so. They sell Canada savings bonds to raise revenue internally to meet both operating costs and debt payments. This government is not against Canada savings bonds. The Liberals are not against Canada savings bonds. Neither is the New Democratic Party.

What I have offered is another type of bond to attract savings in this country so that we can have a massive opening of expenditure in public works that would employ tens of thousands of people in this country. It would not cause the Government of Canada to go into further debt but would allow some imagination in deferring taxation on RRSPs.

It was The Globe and Mail of Canada, not an NDP newspaper, that took the trouble on February 10 to print this brilliant article explaining how one could use a municipal bond out of an RRSP in financing massive restructuring at the municipal town or city level right across this country. This brilliant article was written by one David Barrett, the former premier of British Columbia, and printed in The Globe and Mail.

An hon. member: It only lasted three years.

Mr. Barrett: Sure, it only lasted three years. Do you know why? It was because the Liberals got into bed with the Socreds. The Tories got into bed with the Socreds. They all represent the same interests. Once they were in the political bed we do not know who was doing what to whom, but we know who felt the effects. It was a political ménage à trois, and that is the limit of my French.

In any event, here is an opportunity based on the American experience from the 1930s to fund municipal bonds to provide for a basic restructuring of every single city, town and village in this country. It is very simple. It is so simple the Tories are baffled by it. It will not cost them five cents. It does not cater to the middle class as a tax exemption. It does not give speculative benefits to house buyers in the long run. It is simply an option to provide a low cost bond out of the RRSP and into a municipal bond that pays 4.5 per cent and allows the owners of the bonds, if they keep the capital in the RRSP, to accumulate the interest and at the end of a 10–year period take the money out tax–free and spend it on their kids or spend it on themselves. At the same time we have had 10 years' use of a massive amount of capital.

How much money am I talking about? By the government's own statistics there is now $103 billion in RRSPs. The next question is: "Where do you think that money has gone?" We are going to deal with that. Do not get impatient, I will take the House through it step by step. Half of the $103 billion is self–directed.

I understand, Mr. Speaker, that my time is up. Perhaps some merciful colleague will ask me a question so that I can complete this.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, on February 26, 1992, at page 7617 of Hansard, the New Democratic Party policy on capital cost allowance was definitely enunciated in the House by the member for Essex—Windsor of the New Democratic Party. He referred to capital cost allowances as "yet another new tax loophole to the manufacturing sector in this country, an increase in the capital cost allowance, which nobody has ever indicated increases investment any place in the world".

We were all astounded by this announcement of New Democratic Party policy that capital cost allowances were a tax loophole. I want to know just how far New Democrats will carry this new policy. Would they suggest the elimination altogether of capital cost allowance? What other wrinkles do they have in the policy they very clearly suggested which will devastate the manufacturing industry of Essex West and the Windsor area? I just wondered if my hon. friend could elaborate on why they are eliminating capital cost allowance from the tax system in Canada.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, a capital cost allowance under the program that I am outlining would save the taxpayers of this country hundreds of millions of dollars and at the same time have a protected benefit for that investor.

Here is what I am saying. If you have $50,000 in your RRSP and you lend it to the municipalities through a federal government agency at 4.5 per cent, in a 10–year period you will accumulate approximately $25,000 of interest inside your RRSP.

Mr. McDermid: Tax free.

Mr. Barrett: Tax free, absolutely. At the end of the 10 years I suggest—

Mr. McDermid: It sounds like a loophole.

Mr. Barrett: Oh, it is not a loophole. Wait until I tell the minister how much money we make on it. I suggest at the end of the 10 years you be allowed to take out the amount of money that you made in interest from your RRSP as a lump sum tax free.

Mr. McDermid: And it doesn't cost the taxpayer anything?

Mr. Barrett: Oh, wait a minute.

Mr. McDermid: We want the exact period that it is tax free.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, it is painful to take these people through a new idea step by step. We had to do it in socialized medicine. We had to do it on hospital insurance. We had to do it on all kinds of programs, but I will take them through it painfully. Perhaps if they would listen they could steal this idea. I would be the last to say

I authored it. I would be silent and say: "Lord, bless the Tories for providing jobs for the Canadian people".

Can we see it now? If they want that to happen they will just listen quietly. Allow half of the money available in the RRSPs, over $50 billion that is not self-directed, to have access to a municipal bond at the choice of the purchaser; no government order, no government structure.

Mr. McDermid: Where do you think the money is now?

Mr. Barrett: Where do I think the money is? Part of the money is going to Mexico. This study confirms that the Royal Bank of Canada will be expanding its infrastructure in Mexico using Canadian funds. I am saying: what the heck, if it is good enough for disposable or reinvestment funds to go to Mexico, sure as goodness' sake they should stay right here in Canada, and I am giving that option.

Mr. McDermid: What silliness.

Mr. Barrett: Oh, Mr. Speaker, there is no use trying to convert. There is none as deaf as those who do not want to hear.

This bond program was initiated by Franklin Delano Roosevelt in the United States of America in the middle of the 1930s when disposable income and/or massive savings were not as available as they are under the RRSPs. It was part of a boot-strap operation of revitalizing the American economy. It was one of many public instruments used by the Roosevelt administration to get the United States out of the depression it was in. This is a modified form of the United States Ginnie Maes, municipal bonds, as they are known in the United States. This would allow the municipalities right across this country to implement a study that was completed in 1985 which pointed out in detail what kind of infrastructure renewal was necessary in this country from coast to coast to coast. The study is there. The study is there on the RRSPs.

It is simply a matter of government will to understand that if we are going to get out of this recession we have to get out by our own bootstraps, using our own means and our own leadership.

We cannot cry wolf around the world. We cannot hide and say that things will get better, we hope. But we can use positive public instruments to get us out of this mess and put people to work.

Every single person who goes to work—and this is news to the government—pays income tax. Guess who gets the income tax? The government. Every single person who has a wage also pays GST. Guess who gets the money? The government.

Unemployed people do not pay a good rate of income tax. Unemployed people are not able to purchase and therefore pay the GST. If we put people to work using indigenous capital that needs to be mobilized in this country, the government will make money.

It will not pay it out in welfare, not pay it out in unemployment insurance, not continue a class division of Canadian citizens, but it will give Canadians something to look forward to.

For most people, all they want is a pay cheque. They do not care whether the cheque is in French or in English; they simply want a pay cheque so that they can maintain some dignity, some self-respect about their life in this country and achieving their own goals. Wisdom is what is lacking. Wisdom and political will.

In conclusion, I know this has been an edification for members of this House. This is not a political instrument. This is common sense used by the Americans. If we cannot use common sense, what hope is left for this government?

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to rise and participate in the debate on Bill C-61. There are a number of things I would like to say with respect to the budget.

There is a great temptation when one speaks after the hon. member from Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca not to make one's own speech but to respond to his. However, his was so full of fiction I am not sure that there is really any point in doing that. I would rather talk about what this budget is, rather than what it is not.

The actual debate before us is Bill C-61, the Borrowing Authority Act. I think it is important to comment on that because it is an important element of the budget but it is also an important part of the democratic process of government.

It is a bill that gives authority to the government to borrow money to operate with. It is a fundamental principle of parliamentary democracy that there should be no taxation without representation. That is what the borrowing authority bill is all about. It is legislation such as this that gives the government the authority to carry out the mandate it has been given by the people.

I want also to observe that significant progress is demonstrated and reflected in this bill. Last year the government's borrowing requirements were of the order of $30 billion.

I am very pleased to note that it has been reduced down to $24.7 billion this year, and look forward to further progress until over the next four or five years we will actually reach the point where the government will not have a borrowing cash requirement. That, indeed, is a sign of the tremendous progress that has been made by this government.

The budget that was brought down by the hon. Minister of Finance three days ago is beginning to show that Canadians are going to reap the benefits of the tough budgets that were brought in by the previous minister over the previous seven years.

The budget was not always brought in and received with overwhelming enthusiasm, I might say, by my hon. friends on the other side, not to mention with enthusiasm by everybody from coast to coast in Canada.

However, people like governments to govern in the interests of the nation; not simply to spend the taxpayers' money, giving the taxpayer little goodies that will make it popular and then get re-elected as a result of that. No.

What the people expect of government is responsibility. They expect government to do what needs to be done. Unfortunately, as has been alluded to by other speakers in this debate, when this government came into office it not only inherited a $200 billion debt which was accruing interest every year, but also it inherited a $16 billion operating deficit.

It is extremely commendable that during seven years of tough measures that have included not only reduction to the expenditures, but also have involved the introduction of taxes, which nobody likes to see happen, the result is we are now in a position where the government is operating on a $12 billion surplus, a $28 billion turn around.

My goodness, this country would be in a fantastic position today if we did not have the legacy of the previous government. That is the $200 billion debt, the interest on which has compounded to the point that that debt now exceeds $400 billion and would be more if it were not for the fact that this government is operating in the black and therefore is paying down a certain amount of that debt.

We have been through a recession and it has been tough. It has been tough on people from one end of this country to the other. We are also going through extraordinary economic changes throughout the world. We have to be cognizant of the fact that the recession is there and it has had an impact.

In fairness, we also have to recognize that Canadians and the Canadian economy have come through this recession in much better shape than virtually all of the other industrialized countries. This is because of the responsible measures that have been taken by this government over the years it has been in office.

It is thanks to the budgets of the former minister and the government's trade policy, much maligned by my hon. friends opposite, that Canada is so well-postured to take advantage of the global economy of the 21st century.

That is not to understate the problems that are faced by Canadians today and the difficult times that Canadians have faced in the past. When recessions occur, bankruptcies occur; people lose their jobs. When a job is lost, or a business goes under, it is a calamity and it is a personal tragedy. That should not be undersworn by anybody in this House.

In our region of Atlantic Canada, we have had a compounding effect because we have had a problem in the Atlantic fishery and people are particularly aware of the recent cutbacks that have been forced in the northern cod stock, the 2J-3K-L stock, that is going to have a profound impact on 2,500 to 3,000 people and their employment prospects over the next few months.

I expect this government will respond. It is hard to find money these days, but this government responded to the previous crisis with the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Package, with the Catch Failure Program and with other programs under the Canadian Jobs Strategy that will help people in communities to get by these difficulties.

Similarly, we have been negatively impacted by the over-capacity in the pulp and paper market. That is seen, for example, in Liverpool, Nova Scotia. It has seen cutbacks at the Bowater Mersey Paper Company. It has meant that people have been laid off. Fortunately, the signs are improving and there are some additional hours of work going in there. It has certainly impacted on the people that have wood lots who do not have the opportunity to sell as much as they would like of the wood that they cut.

Finally, of course, we face the challenge in our agriculture. I want to say that the whole issue which is before the public has been with those of us who have an interest in agriculture for some months. The concern over the supply management system and the preservation of food security in Canada is critically important to my province of Nova Scotia, as it is from coast to coast.

I encourage all members of this House to wholeheartedly support the vigorous efforts under the leadership of our Prime Minister. We must see that we get the outcome in the GATT negotiations that will preserve the very important food security, will preserve the culture of the family farm in Canada and will ensure that Canadian consumers can always get fresh milk and eggs and chicken and turkey and so on at the store.

We have to recognize that we do have tough challenges, but we will continue to meet those challenges. This budget signals a turn around for Canada. It clearly signals that economic recovery and sustained growth are beginning to occur and are well under way. The budget contains action to further stimulate that recovery.

There was a lot of speculation as to what was going to happen in terms of taxes. Nobody likes taxes. I think the Minister of Finance has hit a home run the first time out when he comes in with a budget in which there are absolutely no new taxes and indeed, there is a modest reduction in personal income taxes.

Now, my hon. friends opposite, of course, have decried that reduction as being inconsequential. I do not think it is going to be inconsequential to the taxpayers who find that they are getting a few dollars back in their income tax returns for this year and, indeed, for future years.

Similarly, the home buyers plan is going to be of tremendous benefit to many, many Canadians where individuals can withdraw up to $20,000 from their RRSP tax free to buy or build a home and repay it over 15 years.

I have already had phone calls from a number of people in my constituency and other parts of the country who were really delighted to see the government accept the recommendation that had come from the Canadian Real Estate Association and various other bodies, including my hon. friends opposite, because it will be tremendously beneficial and have a stimulative effect on our economy.

At the same time, I have heard a lot of—I was going to say yapping but that perhaps is not polite and parliamentary—noise from the other side of this House suggesting that nothing has been done in this budget to assist people currently unemployed in Canada.

There are two philosophies about where jobs come from. The philosophy that seems to prevail on the other side of this House is that the only way to get people employed is for the government to employ them, whether in make-work schemes, the expansion of the Public Service, the creation of new Crown corporations or the creation of advisory boards, agencies and so on.

We had that kind of government for many years in this country and we saw the legacy of debt, the millstone of debt, that it left around the necks of the Canadian people.

I do not think that is the way to create jobs. The proper way to create jobs is for the government to recognize that it is private industry that employs people, that it is up to business, flourishing business, to provide employment opportunities as well as opportunities for people to make money.

It is business that creates jobs. The processing and manufacturing sectors not only have tremendous potential for creating jobs but allow us to build and enjoy the benefits of the resources this country is so blessed with.

Exports create jobs. This budget and this government's policies are built around the principle that it is the private sector that creates employment opportunities, that creates wealth for the country and not expenditures by government.

Two much maligned policies of this government in the past, the GST and the free trade agreement, are major cogs in preparing Canada to take advantage of that.

My hon. friends opposite like to decry these things. Quite frankly, they have been very successful in convincing many members of the public that these things have had a negative effect when in fact the negative impacts which have caused us so much difficulty in the last year or so are really the results of the recession more than anything else.

The GST and the FTA have provided a sound basis for the development of our economy and for the increasing competitiveness of Canadian manufacturers. Mr. Speaker, you do not have to take it from me, you can take it from the Canadian Manufacturers' Association or the Canadian Exporters' Association.

I would like to read a letter that the Prime Minister received recently from Mr. Vim Kokar of the Early Canadian Furniture Shops. He writes to the Prime Minister: "Dear Prime Minister: These have been very difficult times for many Canadians. Some of your endeavours have been very unpopular and I feel it has been very courageous on your part to introduce initiatives like free trade and the GST to enable us to compete in the international markets".

He continues: "The furniture business has been hard hit in Canada. It took a while to adjust to the new realities of the marketplace, but I am pleased to report that free trade has brought us new opportunities. This year our sales have doubled and we can clearly see a prosperous future ahead".

The results of the free trade agreement and the GST are an increase in Canadian competitiveness and an increase in market opportunities abroad for Canadians. We are going to see more letters like this as these policies continue to come into effect.

We listen to the people who are actually running the businesses. They are the people who are actually creating the jobs, not the labour unions. Labour unions do not create jobs. I would not, but some people would suggest that the role of a labour union is to feather-bed jobs. I think that is pretty harsh.

Where are labour unions coming from? They are supposed to protect the jobs of the individuals who are members of the union and get the best benefits. That is their job. That is why their members pay union dues. They are supposed to do that. However, let us not view them as objective critics of a trade policy that might mean adjustment in employment, both coming in and going out, both ways.

We ought not be misled by people who have a vested interest in seeing Canada in terms of the old fortress mentality with high walls around it so that we do not have to face realities, such as competitiveness, which are there whether we like them or not, whether this government is in power or some other government is in power. Those things are not going to change.

The budgets of this government over the last few years have had an extraordinarily positive effect in terms of creating the kind of climate that has led the members of the G-7 and the OECD to say that Canada has the best prospects for growth of any country in the G-7. They have contained inflation. They have established price stability. They have led to low interest rates, down seven points in the last 18 months. The dollar has levelled off at a rate that enables Canadian companies to be reasonably competitive. They have the deficit under control. These are the results of the sound fiscal management of this government.

The budget that was brought down the other day clearly shows that we are beginning to reap the dividends that have been the result of those tough budgets of earlier years that were so decried by hon. friends opposite. Cuts in spending by this government have now led to cuts in taxes. Cuts in spending by this government have now led to a $4 billion reduction in the deficit this year, and we can look forward to further reductions in years ahead.

The budget reflects what Canadians said. This Minister of Finance, probably more extensively than any Minister of Finance before him, went coast to coast in this country listening to what Canadians said to him so that his budget would reflect what Canadians wanted.

That is one of the reasons this budget has been so well received from coast to coast. Canadians said they wanted realistic lasting solutions, not quick fixes. They said they wanted reductions in deficits. They said they wanted streamlining of government. They said they wanted social programs that are targeted at people who really need them.

We have heard a lot of gnashing of teeth in this House about universality. I happen to believe that most of the people who I represent in this place think that things like family allowance should not be paid to rich people, that such resources as we can allocate for family allowance should be targeted at the people who need them most.

Consequently, we have the white paper on the new child tax benefit which streamlines the system, provides a more responsible system and is better targeted to see that the dollars available are used for the benefit of the people who need help the most.

I am pleased to see that the new benefit will be paid on a monthly basis as opposed to what we have now which is a small monthly payment and a big lump sum at the end of the income tax time. By paying it out on a monthly basis it seems to me that not only can families make better ongoing use of that money but the money is more likely to stay in the community.

A pharmacist from Lockeport called me the other day and said he was particularly pleased with that aspect because with a big lump sum people are more inclined to go off to the city or somewhere and go on a spending spree. But if it comes on a monthly basis they will spend it in their own communities and there will be a local benefit. He is absolutely correct.

Canadians said they did not want any new taxes and they did not get them. Indeed, they got a modest reduction—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. The hon. member will have three minutes remaining when we return.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have the honour to inform the House that messages have been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed the following bills without amendment: Bill C–35, an act to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms and errors in the Statutes of Canada, to deal with other matters of a non–controversial and uncomplicated nature therein and to repeal certain provisions thereof that have expired or lapsed or otherwise ceased to have effect; and Bill C–57, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, the Honourable Deputy to the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

And being returned:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have the honour to inform the House that when the House went up to the Senate chamber the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following bills:

> Bill C–35, an act to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms and errors in the Statutes of Canada, to deal with other matters of non–controversial and uncomplicated nature therein and to repeal certain provisions thereof that have expired or lapsed or otherwise ceased to have effect—Chapter No. 1.
> Bill S–2, an act to implement conventions between Canada and Finland, Canada and the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic and Canada and the United Mexican States for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax and the prevention of fiscal evasion and a convention between Canada and the United Mexican States for the exchange of information with respect to taxes—Chapter No. 3.

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1992–93

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C–61, an act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year commencing April

1, 1992, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee E.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for South Shore has three minutes remaining.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have a bit of time to complete my remarks.

I was commenting on the many measures in the budget government has provided that are going to create the kind of climate for a business to flourish that results in job creation. I know that is a subject of concern to all members of this House.

The reduction in the manufacturing and processing tax is one example. Another example is the increase in the capital cost allowance, critically important to business, though I noticed my friends in the New Democratic Party consider it a loophole, which is rather bizarre. The reduction in the reciprocal withholding tax, increased incentives for R and D, and changes in capital gains exemption that will encourage investment in manufacturing are other examples. It is important to note, with respect to people who have properties now they were thinking of selling, that comes into effect on the date of the budget and not before. Further examples are enhanced support for small business and encouragement for the growth adventure capital funds.

All these are examples of items in the budget that are going to result not only in the flourishing of business but in the increasing of jobs. I believe the minister anticipates an impact of 500,000 jobs.

This is the kind of performance that the minister has delivered. He showed that he listened to Canadians. He has further listened to them by reducing wastage in government and unnecessary spending, the rationalization of some 46 agencies or indeed the abolition of those that are no longer required. We hear gnashing of teeth because a particular agency is going to be dissolved, but perhaps when that agency was established there were not all the private sector agencies performing the same functions. Why unnecessarily spend the taxpayer's money?

There are some significant, symbolic changes that will save a few dollars but, more important, will send a message to the people of Canada such as getting rid of first class air travel. I do not know why we ever had first class air travel at the expense of the taxpayer. The ministers themselves have bitten the bullet and taken a reduction in their own incomes, and I commend them for doing that.

I am delighted to see the continued improvement in benefits for disabled Canadians. It must be a goal of all members of this House, I am sure, to see measures brought in that are going to encourage the economic integration of these people into Canadian society and to ensure that each has the right to earn a living, to live with dignity and to make their contribution to Canadian life.

It all adds up to a good future for this country. I am sure all members of this House will want to join with me in commending the Minister of Finance for the outstanding job he has done in bringing forth this budget.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great attention to the previous speaker and I have two questions. If it is such a good idea and such an enormously successful budget, why are they at 11 per cent?

The second question I am sure I will be asking him next week is why they are at 6 per cent.

An hon. member: We do not want to peak too soon.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): He does not want to peak too soon. I knew there was a good reason.

I wanted to ask the member about something more important. It involves the cutbacks in the budget to legal defence funds and advocacy agencies. In the community of Powell River there are 22 women who have been driven out of their jobs by the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce. It has refused to bargain with them in good faith and they are now out of their jobs, over Christmas and continuing on, and strike-breakers have been hired by the bank to go in and replace these unionized workers.

Today we asked the Minister responsible for the Status of Women if she would meet with these women to discuss the kinds of problems they have. The Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce and the other chartered banks in Canada have a disastrous record with labour relations and the exploitation of women. The federal government has to get onboard. There has to be activity within the Department of Labour to inquire into the kinds of activities that are going on there. The Minister responsible for the Status of Women made an absolutely obscene comment today, that she does not think it is her role to get involved. In virtually every single case it is women who wind up in this situation. It is strictly union busting.

Thousands of people in the community of Powell River signed a petition to attempt to get this government to act because they recognize the absolute injustice. This is not a question of the fairness of the bargaining process. This is an absolute distortion of any sense of justice there. These women need the help of this government. They need advocacy services from the Department of Labour. They need advocacy services from the Minister responsible for the Status of Women. All women trapped in this vicious circle of union busting and discrimination and exploitation in the chartered banks of Canada need some protection. It can only come through a public inquiry into this activity. It is 22 women here today, it is 22 more women in another community. They partition them off, branch by branch, bust the union and get rid of the women who they no longer want in there because of the union organizing or even a hint of it.

If the chartered banks were playing fair with their workers and with the women in many cases who work in those banks, there would be the right to bargain collectively with their employer, but they have effectively destroyed it. This budget goes a distance in helping to even erode their position further with the Minister responsible for the Status of Women refusing to meet with them, refusing to countenance in any way a public inquiry into the exploitation in those chartered banks, particularly the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce.

In Powell River the citizens of that community are shifting to unionize financial institutions, saying at least in the credit union there is enormous growth going on and very positive activity because of this harshness.

The second thing is there is a movement in that community and other areas to transfer RRSPs out, to resist any purchase of RRSPs from the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce.

Finally, before the member answers the comment, there are the kinds of promotions that have been going on. Citizens should get behind cancelling these activities, no more RRSPs with the CIBC while their labour practices are so nefarious, no more purchase or acquisition of arrow gold Visas put on by Air Canada and the CIBC. There must be some action on the part of this government to help citizens who are attempting to help these women and to assist the women themselves against this exploitation.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure how much of my 10 minutes is left. I am not sure if my hon. friend was asking questions or giving his own speech, but I listened with great care nevertheless and I will certainly take advantage of what time remains.

He raised a number of issues and questions, and I will try to respond to all of them, though I think perhaps the issues on the status of women are kind of outside the realm of a budget debate.

He talked about polls and I would remind him, there is but one poll that counts and that is the one on the election day. I would remind him that in the last two general elections this party has done extremely well in those polls.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): On a point of order. I know my hon. colleague erred when he said the matters affecting the status of women were outside the scope of the Conservative budget. I know that he wants to immediately correct that statement. He does not want that to appear in the record.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Thorkelson): That is not a point of order. That is furthering the debate.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, what I said was this was a debate on the budget, not on the status of women. That is what I said.

My hon. friend concerns himself with the funding of advocacy groups and organizations. One of the things that it seems to me that has gone on in this country is that anybody who wants funding from the government gets it. I wonder at what point there is an appropriate role for the citizens of Canada, people who have a strong interest in whatever that particular advocacy group is about, instead of having their money impounded in taxation and handed out to advocacy groups, should fund their own advocacy groups.

The Court Challenges Program is a different circumstance. I appreciate my hon. friend raising that. When the charter came in, we did not know what the legal implications of it were. I think it was most appropriate that the government set aside funds to assist Canadians who may have legitimate issues or challenges against the charter or indeed against the government to determine exactly what the extent of their rights were under the charter. I think it was appropriate that that fund existed for many years. Indeed, as a result of that fund we have a legacy of many court cases that have gone a long way toward clarifying the implications of the charter. There comes a time where the purpose for which the fund was established has been achieved. Therefore, as with other government programs, they should not be funded ad nauseam. They are established in response to a need and when that need has been attended to, that is the point at which the fund should cease to come out of the pocket of the taxpayer.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, today we are debating the bill wherein the government is asking this House for permission to borrow money. How much money do the Tories want? I guess that is the first thing we should decide. They want $24,700,000,000. That is just so that Canadians know what it is we are discussing today.

We are discussing whether or not we should give those Tories $24,700,000,000. There is no need to spend 20 minutes debating that question. The answer is no. No. This government does not have the confidence of this House to run the affairs of the nation nor, of course, should this government be encouraged to go on any further. This government should step aside and let someone else take over.

This government recently tabled its budget. In that budget it announced very little.

There is, for instance, a provision for using registered retirement savings plans to buy a principal residence. I am pleased that, at least in this respect, the government listened to the Liberal leader and member for Beauséjour who made just such a suggestion. That is something good. The Conservatives understand a few things.

A few days earlier, the government opposite also decided to reduce the amount of the down payment on a new house. Again, this is great. The government listened to the suggestions made by the Liberal Party. I must also point out that the government agreed to cut $75 million spent on advertising and opinion surveys—maybe I should use the word propaganda—but anyway, I say again, that's great. It is a very good initiative. We must also remember that last year, with the government's prosperity program or prosperity agenda—I think that's what it's called—expenses had already increased by some $25 million. Therefore, Canadians should not think that the government has rediscovered virtue. It is not quite that. The government simply reduced the excesses that were already in the budget.

Moreover, I am pleased to see that they have finally understood the importance of stimulating the production of ethanol in this country. I must congratulate the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex, who has been urging the government to provide such incentives for a long time. Enough praise, Mr. Speaker, because the rest is not quite as rosy.

Several members asked for the creation of an economic recovery program. The member opposite who spoke a few moments ago told us that we were coming out of the recession and that things would improve. I hope so. However, I have in front of me an article by Eric Beauchesne, a journalist with Southam News, that gives us some facts.

[English]

This story is entitled: "Full recovery five years away".

• (1330)

Let me read what the story says: "The economy will not fully recover from the recession for another five years". That is what the finance department concedes in a sobering admission buried in the budget papers. "As bleak as the outlook is, the budget papers also warn that there is a risk that it could be worse". That is five years if things go right to get us out of the recession.

This is not according to the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. It is not according to an independent, objective person like Mr. Speaker either. No, no. That is not the way. That is according to the finance department of the minister across the way. Apparently it is going to take five years to get us out of this recession if things go right. It could be worse if they do not.

What I am saying is that we need concrete measures to get us out of the recession. I know the members across the way say: "Oh, well, a government should do nothing. Things will resolve themselves". Perhaps they will, but why should we take that chance? Are we not elected to govern? Or are we elected not to govern?

I suspect that we are elected to do something. I do not want to pretend here that we need to dig holes and bury them again to find things to do. That is not what I am advocating at all and that is not what the hon. Leader of the Opposition suggested either. He suggested that we invest in capital works, real works, real jobs.

I will give an example. The Perley Bridge in my riding between Hawkesbury, Ontario and Grenville, Quebec was built in 1931. I know, Mr. Speaker, you were wondering how long it would take before I got around to talking about my riding. It was built in 1931.

That particular bridge in 1975 was declared to be virtually finished, done. It needed to be replaced. As a matter of fact, I have correspondence from the Ontario Minister of Transportation at the time when he, the Conservative Minister of Transport, was refusing to get involved in the construction of a new bridge. This was at the request of the federal government.

We are in 1992. The bridge has been repaired a countless number of times. It needs to be replaced. Government has said that it wanted to replace it in 1995, but so far it has not even obtained an agreement with the two provinces in order to proceed with, not the construction of the bridge, but with the environmental assessment necessary prior to the drawing of the plans which are a prerequisite for the tendering which will be followed by the construction of the bridge.

Do you think the bridge will be finished by 1995? Surely not. I wrote a letter to the Minister of Public Works about two weeks ago and challenged him. He said: "The Ontario NDP premier", the guy who is busy closing hospital beds, Bob Rae, "has said that if the federal government wants to participate in a capital works project, it would match it dollar for dollar".

"There it is," I said, "surely, we will have a new Perley Bridge now if the federal government can get the province to match. We will have a new bridge." It did not happen. There was nothing in the federal budget.

What is worse, Mr. Speaker, is the number of closures and lay-offs in the riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. Allow me to give you a few examples just for the Hawkesbury region and Prescott county. I could also go on all day about closures in Glengarry county. You will remember the closure last summer of Glengarry Transport, GTL, in Alexandria, which meant the loss of 1,804 jobs. However, in the next few minutes I will tell you about some closures in the Prescott county area. Listen to this.

The Firogan plant closed on November 29, 1991: 20 people were laid off; the Fashion Town plant closed on December 28, 1991: 28 people were laid off; on October 31, 1991, Hawkesbury Paving went bankrupt: 8 people were laid off; in Saint-Isidore de Prescott the candling operation belonging to Maurice Lamoureux closed down following a sale: 35 people were laid off.

In December, Canadian Plastics laid off 16 employees; Bertrand et Frères laid off 40; Noreast laid off 100 for two weeks; the Fib-Pak plant in Hawkesbury laid off 18 in November because of a drop in the market; Amoco Fabrics laid off 16 because it said it was restructuring. Le Droit reported that Dominion Textiles laid off 86 employees on January 17, 1992.

I have a paper here which says that in December, the unemployment rate in Prescott county was 15 per cent.

Here is a story from the Standard Freeholder in Cornwall entitled: "Claims for UI come close to setting record." That was on December 28, 1991.

Here is another story. This is for the government across the way which thinks things are getting so much better. I really wish they were, but that is not the case right now, at least not in my riding. "All-party committee told eastern Ontario needs job help". That was August 28, 1991. Imagine if we needed job help then how much we need it now.

"Canadian Pacific Forest Products, Hawkesbury, to close doors after 88 years in the community". The closing of that factory caused the permanent lay-off of 51 employees, 35 of them were lab technicians, scientists and the like. That is a research lab that closed down in my constituency.

We all know how many jobs Canada has been losing since the free trade deal, since the government allowed the dollar to increase so much by propping up our interest rates.

In eastern Ontario, the area I represent, we have also had a loss of federal government programs that would encourage industry to establish in this area of traditionally high unemployment.

Let me describe some of the programs that previously existed. At one point we had a program called the Canadian Industrial Renewal Board, CIRB. There was another program known as the Industrial Regional Development Program, IRDP, as well as the Eastern Ontario Subsidiary Agreement, EOSA. All three of those programs were designed in some way to attract industry to our area so that eastern Ontario could get out of the economic situation that it was in.

All of those programs expired, were cancelled, or were just allowed to disappear. Nothing was reinstituted by the government across the way since 1984 so that we could attract jobs to eastern Ontario, the part of the country that I have the honour and privilege to represent in the House of Commons.

Now the government says: "Oh, well, we have adopted"—well, they don't quite put it that way, but the government in the budget says—"we have instituted the Registered Retirement Savings Plan initiative". You know, the one the Liberals asked them to do, the one I talked about a while ago.

That is fine. But what it did not brag about is the fact that it cancelled at the same time the Co-operative Housing Program. Yesterday, Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation brought out some numbers which showed quite clearly that the new housing that will be created by the RRSP program is less than the housing that will be lost with the cancellation of the co-op program. In other words, Canadians are net losers as a result of both initiatives being announced at the same time, one good, one bad. That is the situation we are in. People all over this country really thought that the co-op program was here to stay.

Particularly in Quebec, for example, we know that the Co-operative Housing Program was very successful. Canadians living in Quebec used this program to build low cost housing that was very useful for many people.

So, Mr. Speaker, as you see, things are not funny. Besides tabling its budget this week, the government gave us its spending plans, or Main Estimates, if you want the technical term.

[English]

Here is what was announced in the budgetary estimates. In 1986 the Prime Minister, in Vancouver, after hearing Nancy Reagan make a speech—you know Nancy Reagan, the boss of Ronald Reagan— said: "Canada is suffering from a drug epidemic.". Some people scratched their heads and said that perhaps it was an epidemic. I see the Solicitor General is paying close attention to these remarks.

"There is a national drug epidemic," said the Prime Minister. Canadians said that if we have an epidemic and the Prime Minister said so, it must be true. After all, the Prime Minister is notorious for always telling the truth, of course. So we believed him when he said there was a national drug epidemic.

The Prime Minister then develops his national drug strategy. Yesterday when the estimates were tabled, do you know what happened? The national drug strategy was cancelled, which led me to ask a question yesterday in the House of Commons. I asked the Prime Minister, given he had said there was an epidemic in 1986, I wanted to know from him exactly when the epidemic was cured and by whom.

The Prime Minister, of course, did not answer the question. The minister of health stood up and he probably discovered at the same time as I did the program had been cancelled and was kind of stuck without an answer.

Little did I know then, but also another program that was cancelled was the Driving While Impaired Program or the program to stop driving while impaired. Again, a very useful program. It was cancelled in yesterday's budgetary estimates. That leads me to ask the question again: when was this particular epidemic cured and by whom? I invite the Solicitor General to answer that question as well as the others. Perhaps he has an answer and I am sure he will jump up in his seat immediately and answer this very important question.

I want to say in the few moments I have left that this budget will not do much to create jobs in my constituency and elsewhere in Canada. True, there is the registered retirement savings plan initiative, but as I said a moment ago, the cancellation in regard to co-op housing makes it such that there is a net loss in the forecast of home construction this year as a result of that particular announcement.

We were all elected to this place to do something. It is the role of government to be pro-active, not to just say that things will take care of themselves because that is not so although we could wish that they would. Frankly, given that the government has done so little in the budget, I still wish that things correct themselves, too. Why do we want to continue to make 1.49 million Canadians suffer in the meantime? Today 1.49 million Canadians are out of a job. How many Canadians are unofficially out of a job? How many Canadians are not even part of the statistics because they are working part-time. You probably are familiar with the work share program. Many people are only working two or three days a week right now. They are not even included in the jobless statistic we talk about of 1.49 million people.

[Translation]

As far as I am concerned, this budget is unsatisfactory. I am sure that all Canadians will ask the government in the coming days to make major corrections to the budget presented this week, in order to create employment so that the 1.5 million or so Canadians who are unemployed today can again earn their living in some way. For all my constituents, Mr. Speaker, that is what I want. I say to the government members opposite: It's time to act. They are now at 11 per cent in the public opinion polls. Canadians no longer have confidence in them, but they were still elected to make decisions, I admit. So, in spite of their unpopularity, they have a duty to act and to act immediately.

[English]

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise with the hon. member the dilemma of the cuts to advocacy services and support for advocacy operations within the offices of the Minister responsible for the Status of Women and the Minister of Labour.

In Powell River, British Columbia, the Canadian Bank of Commerce has driven 22 of its employees into the street, all 22 women, some of whom are single parents trying to raise families. It is determined not to bargain in good faith. It did, with undignified haste, drive those women out of their jobs before Christmas in order to make them and their families suffer through Christmas in the hope that they would come back, give up their union and take the conditions imposed by the bank.

It appears that another very crafty stunt has been put in place by the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce. It is spreading a rumour that it will close the branch and that when it removes itself from the community of Powell River and the particular mall an arrangement has been made with another non-unionized chartered bank branch to come in and replace it, leaving the 22 women totally devastated and completely without any hope of returning and bargaining. Actions like this on the part of the chartered banks are not uncommon, particularly the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce.

A plan of action set forward by these women and thousands of the citizens of Powell River by way of petition basically says that the Minister responsible for the Status of Women should use her offices to meet with these women and assist them to get back to the bargaining table and get their employer bargaining in good faith.

The Minister of Labour for Canada should be involved in attempting to bring these parties together, to meet with these women, to meet with the bank, to get them back to the table and to discuss with the bank what constitutes fair labour practices.

There should be, on the part of the Minister responsible for the Status of Women, the member for Capilano—Howe Sound, an initiative to create a widespread public inquiry into the practices of the CIBC and other chartered banks in the exploitation of women employees and the union busting activities that have been going on.

The final step in this is that all citizens who work in an organized labour operation, who support trade unions, should be transferring their savings out of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, transferring their RRSPs away from that institution, failing to take up any of the offers by advertisement or other inducements, and making it clear to the bank that they are doing so because of retrogressive and unconscionable labour practices.

Finally, if the Minister responsible for the Status of Women is not prepared to meet with these women to take up the cause of exploited women in the community of Powell River, there should be pickets in front of her office in West Vancouver as soon as possible to get the point through to her exactly what her responsibility is to women in Canada.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. As he knows I will be visiting his constituency tomorrow, not speaking to a gathering of his opponents. It is a totally different situation where both he and I will be together visiting a capital works project to be installed later right here on Parliament Hill. I want to answer his question directly. First of all, I thought the answer from the member for South Shore a few moments ago was totally inadequate. He said that this budget is not about the status of women, or something to that effect. I am paraphrasing here. I think that is wrong. This budget is about improving the livelihood of all Canadians, particularly those who need it the most. Of course, if you look at the hard reality, many women, particularly women with children and sole support women, are in serious financial difficulty in Canada. It is absolutely terrible and it is our job through budgetary measures to try and make their lives better. Therefore, I disagree with the statement that was made in that regard.

In terms of the actual bank in question, I do not know much about that bank. There are not too many branches of it in my riding. Generally, the banks in my own riding have a good record of employment of women. Perhaps it is the opposite of what it is elsewhere. There are a large number of bank managers in my riding who are women. Probably half of them are. If you include bank managers and assistant managers, there are a good number of them, perhaps close to half all together. Anyway, it is a significant number compared to other businesses. Therefore, it is not quite that bad in the constituency I represent.

I do agree with the member though that if a bank has been engaged in such practices as preventing people from having their legal rights recognized, it is absolutely awful to say the least. If other financial institutions in that area are going to pick up the slack when such an institution behaves that way toward some of its own customers, and after all many of those employees are customers and their families are also customers, it is to their own peril.

However, in the case of the employees it is not that easy. They certainly have my total and full moral support. I only wish that the Minister responsible for the Status of Women, who is a member from that part of the country, so near, could at least invite those people to come to her constituency office, some 50, 60 or 70 miles away. I am sure those people could get in their cars, drive to Vancouver and meet the minister if she would make time available. That, as far as I am concerned, is the very least the minister could do. Meet with them and listen to them. Obviously, she should go beyond that and help them as well.

I would also like to take this opportunity to talk about this whole issue of court challenges. Government must continue to provide funds, not only to deal with the kind of matters just mentioned, but also to deal with official languages. As a member representing a francophone community outside Quebec, I view most unfavourably the cancellation of the Court Challenges Program.

The Secretary of State told us today that we could seek the help of the provinces. I will ask members opposite if they are prepared to entrust Don Getty with the job of defending the rights of Franco-Albertans for instance? It is that dramatic. That is what the Secretary of State told us to do in his speech today, or rather in response to a question from the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

This is also true elsewhere in the country, where several provinces do not allow francophones to manage their own schools. I suggest to my hon. colleagues opposite—I can see the hon. member for Beauharnois—Salaberry and others—and I urge them to look into this matter and to help us, francophones outside Quebec, restore funding for this program because we do need it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The period for questions and comments has now expired.

Mr. Guy Ricard (Laval–Ouest): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to express my support for Bill C–61, an act to provide borrowing authority for 1992–93.

Every year, after the federal budget is brought down, Parliament is asked to consider legislation that gives the government the financing authority to carry out public works and to finance other activities of a general nature.

The government is requesting authority to borrow $24.7 billion for the 1992–93 fiscal year.

Like borrowing bills in recent years, this bill contains three basic elements: financing authority to cover the financial requirements for 1992–93, exchange fund account profits and a contingency reserve. Details of financial requirements are contained in the budget papers.

There is a provision in the bill to cover exchange fund account earnings which gives rise to additional Canadian dollar borrowing requirements. This is because these earnings are retained in the exchange fund account to provide the government with the capacity to intervene in foreign exchange markets. The total amount requested in the bill must therefore include an amount equal to those earnings.

There is a $3 billion reserve, the same amount requested in borrowing authority bills over the past years. This reserve provides for unforeseen contingencies such as foreign exchange transactions, seasonal swings in borrowing requirements and delays in passing future year borrowing authority acts.

The bill also contains some minor technical changes that more clearly link fiscal year borrowing authority with fiscal year borrowing requirements.

The $3.9 billion required to cover the refunding of bills issued in 1991–92 under section 47 of the Financial Administration Act guarantees that these borrowing requirements for 1991–92 are not charged against regular 1992–93 borrowing authority. As was said repeatedly in the course of this debate, were we to issue less than the $3.9 billion requested, the residual would be deducted from the 1992–93 authority. The 1989 legislation had a similar provision, without the cap.

Another new provision provides for linking borrowing authority with borrowing requirements for 1992–93, even if the legislation receives royal assent before the beginning of the new fiscal year.

Finally, under another provision, the borrowing authority becomes effective on April 1, 1992, for the purposes of determining costs related to borrowing under the provisions of this legislation. In the course of this debate, we have also been advised of the report on the government's debt operations. Each year's program is carefully designed to minimize debt costs and reduce exposure to increases in debt service charges.

Hon. members are of course aware that the government cannot implement its new borrowing program for 1992–93 before this legislation is adopted. I would therefore urge all members of this House to adopt this bill as soon as possible, so that the government can maintain the most cost effective approach to its borrowing requirements.

I will stop here, Mr. Speaker, because I see many more members are anxious to speak. Thank you for having given me this opportunity to do so.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The vote will be deferred until Monday, March 9 at six o'clock p.m.

It being three o'clock p.m., pursuant to Order made Thursday, February 27, 1992, this House stands adjourned until Monday, March 9, 1992, at eleven o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Orders 28(2) and 24(1).

The House adjourned at 1.58 p.m.

VICTIMS OF CRIME COMPENSATION ACT

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria) moved that Bill C-310, an act respecting compensation for Canadian victims of crime travelling or posted abroad, be now read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee E.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I noticed the clock across from me has been sent off for repairs. It would be of assistance to me if I could be given a few minutes warning as I wind down to my peroration.

First of all, I appreciate the attendance of so many members in the House for this private members' bill. The bill would establish a federal criminal injuries compensation plan to cover Canadian citizens or permanent Canadian residents with protection if they are injured, while working or travelling abroad, as a result of a criminal act against them.

As the House will know, virtually every province has a criminal injuries compensation plan to cover its residents if they are injured as a result of a criminal act within the province. Virtually all provincial schemes not only cover Canadians who are injured within the province but also non-residents of Canada who suffer from criminal injuries within the province.

This bill is here because of two courageous people, Belinda and Mark Hillier, both of Victoria. Mark and Belinda in 1988 set off to Jamaica for what was to be their dream holiday. It was their first vacation overseas. They were looking forward to it. They went with friends.

While they were there they were the victims of a brutal crime. Two men got into their hotel room despite the security of the hotel in which they were staying. While in the room the two men robbed them, beat them and repeatedly raped Belinda Hillier.

The next morning, with no money left, they were given only a modicum of assistance to get out of the country and left with their holiday, their vacation and their lives in ruins.

Four years later they are still trying to recover from the trauma of this crime. I had read of their plight in the local newspaper, the Times Colonist. I called them and we had a chat. The story emerged not only of the crime itself but of the failure of our society to respond to their plight.

As I heard their story, I began recalling others of a similar kind. When we did some research into it, we discovered a gap in the protection applying to Canadians. While there are criminal injury programs at the provincial level covering the victims of crime, there is no such plan in place for Canadians who are working or travelling abroad.

I have introduced this bill into the House for the first reading and it now comes before the House for second reading. If my colleagues will agree before this hour is over, the bill can then go to legislative committee for detailed consideration. I ask the House to give it that approval.

As hon. members will know, if enough members keep going past 12 p.m. Ottawa time, the bill drops to the bottom of the Order Paper. I would ask members to consider the possibility and agree with me that it should be moved to legislative committee. I believe, from my consultations with members on all sides of the House, that this bill is a non-partisan idea. It is one which has appeal to members on all sides of the House. It is an important concept because there is a gap in our legislation and it should be dealt with.

Let me offer three fundamental reasons why we should have a criminal injuries compensation program that covers Canadians abroad. First of all, we already provide at least nominal assistance to Canadians who are in trouble overseas through our diplomatic service. That is one of the important functions of the diplomatic service abroad. We provide innumerable services to Canadians when they are overseas. This would be an extension of that principle.

Second, many countries that Canadians visit or work in have no criminal injuries program which would cover visitors from Canada. When crimes occur against Canadians overseas, that protection is simply not available to them. In some jurisdictions it is but in others it is not. It is a gap which should be filled.

Third, it is interesting that most of the provincial programs do cover foreign visitors coming to Canada. That principle has been accepted at the provincial level. The only way this gap can be filled properly is for the federal Parliament to exercise its jurisdiction and establish such a program or at least the framework of such a program that would apply overseas.

This bill establishes the framework in this way. It would authorize the government to enter into agreements with provincial agencies to administer the program. The bill does not propose establishing a new comprehensive bureaucracy at the federal level. The bill proposes that the responsibility of administering each particular case would be delegated to each provincial or territorial agency so that if someone were injured overseas and had a claim they would apply to their local provincial board or agency that administers the criminal injuries program in that province. In some cases it is workers' compensation boards; in other cases there is a separate criminal injuries compensation plan, a board that would administer the local plan, for example.

It would then be up to that board to adjudicate the claim based on the federal regulations and to pay the claim on a basis financed out of the federal treasury. The federal government would be responsible for the payments of federal claims to be decided under federal regulation by an agency negotiated by the federal government. It seems to me that it is a simple administrative system which builds on the system that already exists in Canada.

The federal government, under regulation, would have the authority to determine who would be entitled under the general rubric that any Canadian citizen or permanent resident in Canada—ordinarily residing here—would be entitled in general terms. The more narrow definition of what type of crime would be covered and the circumstances under which a valid claim would be accepted would be established by regulation.

The provincial programs are more or less consistent as to the kinds of crimes that are covered. It would be a relatively simple matter to settle that for a federal program.

It is possible for all provinces to provide an upper limit on the amount covered. Generally speaking, the limits are relatively modest. It is important to appreciate the real role of the criminal injuries compensation program. It is in part to cover specific losses, although anyone who is travelling abroad with valuables presumably ought to be responsible for their own insurance.

There are items which cannot be easily covered by insurance, most particularly the trauma suffered by a crime overseas or anywhere. This is what criminal injuries compensation plans are primarily aimed at. In the case of the Hilliers, they are already suffering and continue to suffer from the trauma they received in that terrible tragedy of May 1988. Because they are of modest means they cannot really afford the continuing counselling that is necessary.

We have had another example in which recently a British Columbia resident was murdered in Mexico. The costs of bringing the body back home are beyond the family's means. That kind of cost could be covered under a criminal injuries compensation program. There will be other examples of a similar kind that could only be met, and at the provincial level are only met, by these criminal injuries compensation programs.

The underlying principle is really that of social insurance; the concept that we are a Canadian family and that we have some responsibility as Canadians for each other. The incident of crimes causing injury is relatively minor out of the millions of Canadians who visit overseas or for the millions of Canadians who are in Canada. When it happens to a particular family or to particular Canadian individuals, it can be the most dramatic, traumatic event in his or her life. Surely we as a Canadian family can organize ourselves to provide a minimum safety net, a minimum social insurance that not only can provide real assistance in dollars, but can say to those Canadians that we as a Canadian family care about what happened to them.

My observation of the Hilliers is that this is really what is missing. They feel rejected by their own country because it has failed to respond in any way to what has happened to them. They have been turned away at every door they have come to for assistance. They agreed to make their case public because they wanted to tell a story in the hope that their pain could lead to some diminution of the pain of others who may suffer the same thing in the future.

I am really speaking for them when I ask the House not only to agree to this bill but to give it an opportunity to be discussed in detail as to the mechanics in committee. It will not cost Canada anything to take a look at this plan and to give it an opportunity to be considered in detail, to give the Hilliers and others an opportunity to come to the committee and offer their testimony and their witnesses. It would be a healing act for them and for others who have suffered without this kind of protection to be given an opportunity to do that.

I ask the House to endorse the bill. I appreciate very much the work that others have done to support this bill. At one point I got the great assistance of Professor John McLaren and students at the University of Victoria in providing a lot of the background material. I have a file full of material on the concept that has led to this bill.

I think it is a good bill. I appreciate the support that colleagues have already offered to me in private conversations and I look forward to their support in this debate.

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the member for Victoria on his presentation and the thought that has gone into the development of what I believe to be a very important and significant bill. I can sympathize with the Hilliers. I have a number of patients of my own who were victims of a hit and run accident in Spain and suffered medical injuries as a result of that very tragic accident.

However, what we are dealing with today is a question of jurisdiction as to who is to be responsible for the development of the law, where it is going to originate, and who is going to be responsible ultimately for the payment of this whole remuneration for injuries received while out of the country.

This proposed Bill C-310 which deals with the compensation for Canadian victims of crime while travelling or posted abroad cannot really be enacted without prior consultation with the provinces. Health care traditionally is a responsibility of the provinces. Since none of the provinces have requested this type of a bill and no one has come forward until this time with this concept, it brings up this whole question of jurisdiction.

Because Canadian citizens are provincial and territorial residents, these governments must be consulted with regard to such an important issue. Not to engage in meaningful consultations with our provincial colleagues to seek their support would be considered unacceptable and an infringement of provincial jurisdiction. It should be noted that provincial governments have already enacted legislation which the member for Victoria discussed, making possible the granting of financial compensation to victims of criminal acts within their own provinces.

Provincial laws cannot be applied outside their boundaries. A province that wishes to provide compensation to its citizens who have been victims of criminal acts abroad would have to request that the federal government enact legislation along the lines of Bill C-310 to give extraterritorial effect to their laws. This is why it is so essential that the legislation be considered and brought forward together with the provinces rather than in the present nature of a private member's bill.

The intention behind this bill, as I think we all agree, is commendable. The story of the Hilliers certainly develops a sympathy and an understanding, but the request should be coming from the provinces rather than the federal government. It is my understanding that competent federal authorities have not been approached by their provincial counterparts. Furthermore, adoption of Bill C-310 without provincial consent would be inappropriate at this time.

Hon. members will be aware that the federal government through the Departments of External Affairs and International Trade provides assistance to Canadian citizens travelling and living abroad. This is being done by Canadian representatives at more than 120 different missions around the globe. The presenter of the bill mentioned the care and the understanding given by our consulates abroad to Canadian citizens in trouble.

There is a wide range of consular services being provided to the Canadian public. These services vary from a simple request for information about travel abroad to assistance in major crisis situations such as the recent Persian Gulf war and the Middle East crisis. However, consular services entail general assistance to Canadians in need, intervention with local authorities where appropriate, help in obtaining legal counsel when required, and checking on the welfare of Canadian citizens in prison. When a Canadian citizen experiences difficulty abroad when his or her health is affected, consular representatives will do the maximum possible to ensure that proper medical attention and care is provided locally. Families or friends are informed through the Department of External Affairs in Ottawa.

This settlement of medical and hospital bills is the responsibility of the individual and claimable through provincial health plans. As part of the federal government's consular awareness programs we strongly urge all Canadian travellers to obtain appropriate personal and health insurance to cover costs which go beyond provincial plans. As a matter of fact we are aware that most Canadian travellers do take this added precaution when travelling abroad.

It is therefore evident that the Canadian government does not stand idly when it comes to the protection of its own citizens abroad. We can clearly state that compared to other countries Canada is quite generous in this regard.

The issue which Bill C-310 addresses deals largely with the provision of assistance and protection to Canadian travellers abroad. The issue addressed by Bill C-310 in my view is one which does not fall primarily within federal jurisdiction. Therefore I would have to suggest that this bill should not proceed until there has been more extensive consultation.

I think the general idea behind the bill is excellent. I feel we should provide support to Canadians who have been injured, to the victims of crime abroad, but I do feel that more work needs to be done and in consultation with the provinces to come up with a proposal. I have very mixed feelings about turning this bill down because I feel that there is merit to it.

It is the question that this is more appropriately done through other channels. I would encourage the government to continue to work with the provinces to bring forth a program that will cover the victims of crime such as have been mentioned and we are all familiar with.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I too am pleased to rise in the House this morning to make some comments with respect to the legislation before us, an act respecting compensation for Canadian victims of crime travelling or posted abroad.

The explanatory note in the legislation states:

> The purpose of this bill is to extend to Canadians and to permanent residents of Canada travelling or posted abroad the same rights to compensation as victims of crime that they would enjoy had they remained in Canada.

Let me compliment my colleague from Victoria who had the foresight and the industriousness to put together a private member's bill that reflects the feelings of the people he represents in the community of Victoria. With that in mind, it is obvious that the purpose of this legislation is to compensate on a parallel system those rights of victims that we experience in Canada.

I think it is best before we talk about compensation for victims outside Canada that we consider the procedures we have presently in place to compensate victims within the provinces of Canada.

My friend, the member for Delta, who just spoke previous to me, was quite right when he stated that compensation to victims is within the realm of provincial jurisdiction. First we should perhaps look at the procedure that happens in the province of Ontario with which I am most familiar. I am sure other provinces have similar procedures. An independent board is struck by the government of the province called the Criminal Compensation Board. Its purpose is to travel throughout the province to assess those victims who have been injured and have experienced pain and suffering as a result of crimes committed against either their person or against their property.

The panel meets in all jurisdictions provincially. After hearing all of the evidence and proof as to the pain and suffering experienced by the victim it then adjudicates on the evidence heard and awards some form of compensation to that victim. It may also choose not to award any compensation.

Unfortunately, our justice system can only compensate by way of dollars. We can never re-assess or go back in time and say that pain and suffering should be compensated in some other way. The only barometer and area of compensation we have is by way of monetary retribution.

As a result of the hearings that are held throughout the province of Ontario and other provinces in the country, the compensation is awarded as to the degree of pain and suffering of the victim.

I compliment the member for Victoria who has brought forward this bill to assist those people travelling outside of Canada. I must say at the outset should this bill be transferred to committee at the end of the day, that it would be our recommendation that the primary purpose of the criminal compensation board, although it is doing the best it can with the funds available, still does not meet the needs of the victims in our country.

The compensation awards are rather small when compared to awards given in civil litigation matters. The awards in no way compensate victims for the pain and suffering experienced in Canada as a result of abuse received from fellow citizens. This is a shortcoming within our system where the rights of the victim usually seem to take second place.

In my previous career as an assistant crown attorney in Thunder Bay, I was involved in the volumes of work that go into the actual mode of what really happens at a trial. The amount of work the crown attorney has to do in preparation often limits the amount of time that the assistant crown attorney has to spend with the actual victim of the crime.

The primary function is to assemble the facts, bring them to the proper jurisdiction, bring them to the court and get the facts into evidence as succinctly and as quickly as possible in order for the decision-maker to adjudicate on the facts that are presented. This often leaves the victim with the feeling that his day in court has not been properly exercised. It often leaves the victim with the feeling that the pain and suffering and the rights in the criminal procedure system have not properly addressed the victim's main concern.

I am not criticizing the system. The crown attorneys in this country do an exceptionally good job with respect to the time they have to prepare cases. Unfortunately, it leaves very little time to spend with actual victims of the crime.

In principle, we support what our colleague is attempting to do through this legislation. If it does get to the stage of committee hearings, I would also like to recommend a very advantageous program in Canada in particular, in Ontario.

I have had several occasions to participate in the program called the Victim-Offender Restitution Program. It is a procedure that began some years ago when the victims of crime did not feel that they were adequately compensated either by the degree of sentencing of the offender or that the compensation awarded was not adequate. Procedurally, the Victim-Offender Restitution Program would be undertaken by some voluntary organization within the communities in this country. The main purpose was to bring the victim of the crime into a controlled meeting setting with the offender of the crime in order to arrive at some satisfactory mutual agreement between the two parties. Joint submissions would then be made to the adjudicator of the court.

This has been working in some instances and it has been followed through in some of the areas in Canada, particularly in the areas of Thunder Bay and Windsor where it has worked very well.

It brings the victim of the crime, who has suffered the pain, suffering and the damage in a controlled setting with the offender. In this area they have been able to form some degree of a restitution process that seems to satisfy the victim more so than the sometimes cold, very impersonal court judicial process that they would normally go through.

I would like to reiterate one of the cases that I was involved in. I would suggest to the member if this does go to committee that perhaps we should give great thought to this Victim-Offender Restitution Program.

In this particular instance it was a matter that involved the loss of hundreds of thousands of dollars and injured and caused harm to many people through a series of transactions. After many hours of consultation and developing a formula for how to assess these damages, it was agreed between the victims—at that time there were well over 100 victims—and the offender, the person who had been properly tried and found guilty, and the leaders of the program that the compensation these victims would receive would be in the way of the fine that was levied on the guilty party.

I go from memory but it seems to me that the fine in that area was somewhere around $100,000 or $150,000 of which $10,000 was a penalty paid. We established a system where $140,000 was distributed between all of the victims that suffered from that penalty and the crime.

What I am saying is that it worked in that particular proposal. The victims were very happy with the compensation.

I would like to recommend to my friend from Victoria that should this very fine legislation that he has presented today to compensate victims in his riding of Victoria go to committee, I would like to attend the committee hearings. I would like to bring and to augment his thoughts with the Victim–Offender Restitution Program.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to make a brief contribution to this private members' hour and specifically in regard to Bill C–310 which has been proposed by our colleague from Victoria and which deals with the victims of criminal aggression abroad.

The objective of Bill C–310 is one which I am sure members on all sides of the House support, the intent being to reduce the burden which has to be borne by Canadians who find themselves victims of criminal abuse or aggression outside the borders of the country. It is certainly not an unreasonable thought but, at the same time, it does obviously deal with areas of provincial jurisdiction.

The Canadian provinces have enacted legislation which makes possible a granting of financial compensation to the victims of criminal acts within the provinces. The provincial laws of course cannot have any extraterritorial application.

Under this Bill C–310 as proposed, the province that wishes to provide compensation to its citizens who have been the victims of criminal acts abroad could ask the federal government to enact legislation that would give extraterritorial effect to provincial criminal compensation legislation.

Bill C–310 is plausible in a judicial way but obviously, it does lack some practicality constitutionally. The adoption of such legislation by the federal government should be undertaken only after extensive consultations with all of the provinces to determine if there is, in fact, provincial support for the proposed legislation.

Adoption of Bill C–310 without provincial consent could be very difficult and indeed very delicate in the context of the current constitutional debate. Some provinces may not accept the adoption by the federal government of legislation which affects areas of provincial jurisdiction.

It is not unreasonable to point out some specific areas of concern which have to be noted in regard to this bill.

First, the bill would provide for extraterritorial application of Canadian legal powers. This is an area of sensitivity for all governments because it is seen as a potential infringement on a country's sovereignty. We would have to take extreme care to ensure that all efforts have been made to avoid any possible friction between Canada and other foreign governments.

Again, it should be stressed that a government cannot extend its legal authority outside its boundaries unless prior agreement is sought from the other state or states involved. It should be noted in this regard that Canada has regularly and vigorously opposed the extraterritorial application of foreign laws on Canadian soil and I am sure would view any such attempts with great concern.

Bill C–310 as drafted would require major legal revisions after consultation with the provinces. For example, the bill as drafted generates some confusion with regard to a certain category of people, that is those Canadian citizens who live abroad but are not residents of any province. There are citizens of this country, Canadians on assignment for long periods of time outside Canada, who are employed neither in the private nor public sectors.

Furthermore, clause 3(a) of this proposed bill would have to be reviewed to introduce more specificity in relation to the Criminal Code. Moreover, the use of the double criminality concept would have to be built in. For example, a criminal act under the Canadian Criminal Code is not necessarily a criminal act in a foreign jurisdiction and vice versa.

The proposed bill is one which falls under the general context of providing assistance to Canadian citizens who unfortunately experience difficulty abroad. The intent, as has been mentioned by others in this House and by myself earlier, is a good one but I believe that the bill should not proceed until there is a demonstrated need for such legislation and all appropriate consultations with the provinces have taken place.

I have not had the opportunity to study this bill in detail and the background to it, but I am not entirely sure that all of the provinces of Canada at this point in time have their own legislation in place. I know that a number of them do. I am not sure whether all of the provinces have legislation which would compensate for the victims of crime taking place within the territorial boundaries of the particular province.

Indeed, I am sure that there is a lack of consistency between the provinces within Canada. Various jurisdictions have legislation but again I am guessing because I have not had the opportunity to look at this in detail, that there is inconsistency from province to province in terms of the criteria, compensation, and so on.

Therefore, I think it is a bit premature to be thinking in terms of the federal government trying to come forward unless and until there is unanimity within the provinces of Canada, that each of the provinces has legislation and indeed that there is consistency from province to province across the nation.

Clearly, that is not the case at the present time. Until it is, it seems to me that it would be difficult and I would suggest from a constitutional point of view, rather imprudent for the federal government to attempt to involve itself with Bill C–310 at this point in time.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I think we probably have a very good understanding of where we are right now and what this bill means and what changes this bill brings forward.

We are not passing the bill today. We are moving it through second reading so that we can study it in committee. That is it. What is wrong with the principle of this bill? Both Conservative members of this House who spoke had almost similar reasoning for not passing this legislation or not sending it to committee at this time.

Why would we object to the principle of indemnifying or compensating Canadians who are victims of crime when they are working or travelling in other countries? Why? That is what we are dealing with right here. Is the principle so offensive to your voters and your ridings?

Each and every one of you know of people who have had these problems. They have been injured, maimed, raped, attacked and have brought their problems to you and asked for compensation. It is not new. We have seen this as members of Parliament. I am sure in the past you have had to say to these people as my colleague from Victoria who proposed Bill C–310 said: "I would like to help you, but there is a gap". There is a gap between what a province would do if the injury was because of a criminal act in the province and what the federal government would do if the injury was because of a criminal act in another country. That is the gap.

What we have to concern ourselves with is the principle of this bill. Can we go back to our voters, the people who elected us and who wish us to initiate action to respond to their needs? Can we really tell them that on a question of principle, I voted against this compensation bill.

The bill is not raising taxes. It is not creating a heavy mechanism that is going to cost a great deal of money, not at all. One of the nice things about it is that it is piggy–backing on provincial programs which have been in effect for years. Also I understand that the territories have similar legislation.

We are dealing here with principle. It is most important that when we talk about principle that we look at some of the comments that were made on the Conservative side about what is good about Bill C–310.

Let us look at what the government side said is good about this bill. Those members say it is judicially plausible. That means we do not have any problem as far as the courts are concerned. Legally we can do it. Great. On all sides, members agree with the intent of this bill. Members agree also with the principle—we come back to the key word again—of the bill. Everyone agrees with it.

Everyone agrees, and I agree as well, that there must be consultation with the provinces. I am one who believes in consultation with the provinces. My gosh, I am a refugee from the Dobbie–Beaudoin committee. Having gone through that war, I can tell you the one thing our committee had pretty well burned into our collective skull was that we have to consult with the provinces in order to invoke any kind of constitutional change.

We are not talking about rewriting the Constitution here, we are simply talking about compensating Canadians who fall through the cracks, where there is no federal jurisdiction, Canadians who are travelling or working in other countries and who happen to be injured or killed as a result of a criminal act.

Government members say that these Canadians, rather than having this bill passed to help them and compensate them, could normally get help from the Canadian embassies abroad. This is not always the case. In the case my colleague from Victoria mentioned, the woman had been brutally raped and her family had their money and valuables stolen in Jamaica and they received no help whatsoever from the Canadian High Commissioner.

This bill will require, will mandate, will demand that these people get help. Do not tell me that private insurance will help these people who fall through the cracks. Private insurance will not cover many of these costs. Private insurance will not give the help when it is needed. If we are talking about private insurance to protect Canadians when these types of problems occur, why did that argument not work at the provincial and territorial level? Why did the provinces and territories not say: "We are not going to pass any victims' indemnity programs or laws. Go to the private insurance network. You are in better hands with All State." Give me a break. Why do we not just turn the entire social contract that Canadians have with our government to provide certain help for us all over to the insurance companies?

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Edmonston: A government member says hear, hear. This is incredible. We are here because our voters want action. That is another thing I learned from the Beaudoin–Dobbie constitution committee. People are tired of us pussy-footing around, playing off one jurisdiction against another, washing our hands of the thing and saying, it's not our problem, it's not our responsibility. The hon. member opposite just said "really", but he doesn't want us to spend money. The public is sick and tired of seeing us spend money.

But this bill isn't about spending money, because we already have provincial and territorial programs for compensating victims of criminal acts. We are not proposing a new bureaucracy, because the bureaucracy already exists. Victims can simply file an application with the provincial agency, which will then make arrangements with the federal government. That's all.

[English]

In conclusion, I wish to repeat that I support my colleague from Victoria and his private member's bill, C–310. It does something important which is not done at the provincial and territorial level regarding people who are victims of criminal acts while travelling in foreign countries or working there. I will be darned if I will accept the argument from the Conservative side of the House that we have to consult the provinces on the principle, that we have to go to insurance companies on a principle or that we have to pussy foot around on a principle.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to continue on the same theme as the member for Chambly. I did not intend to participate in this debate. I listened to the member for Chambly carefully and I tend to share his view.

We are talking about moving a piece of legislation into committee for further refinement on the basic mechanisms that are involved. I just do not understand how the government can object.

It seems to me if there was one thing I discovered when I was going through the Dobbie–Beaudoin committee report last week—of course, I do not agree with most of it—it was that one of the few things that the national government is left with after this report is the fact that we are the leaders in this nation on international affairs.

This bill, put in practical terms, is something that the government is missing the boat on. I want to give a very specific example that happened in my riding just two years ago.

A young woman was working in the southern United States. She was pregnant and was a victim of crime. This led to a premature birth. The hospital would not release her unless the bill was paid. The bill was somewhere in the neighbourhood of $50,000 to $60,000. This is a very specific example.

It is a mystery to me why the government is turning its back on putting a bill like this forward for further study. I want to support the proposer of this bill and the member for Chambly. I think they are on the right track. The government is plainly not looking at this clearly. I would defer now to the proposal.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): A point of order, the hon. member for Victoria.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, while I appreciate the airing that the House has given to this bill and the fact that it has had an opportunity to be discussed in this House, I would also like to give the House an opportunity to give unanimous consent to the motion to approve it on second reading and refer it to the legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired, there being no further members wishing to speak. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

FEDERAL–PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND FEDERAL POST–SECONDARY EDUCATION AND HEALTH CONTRIBUTIONS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C–60, an act to amend the Federal–Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post–Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee F.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak to this important piece of legislation which, as usual, has been somewhat misrepresented by members of the opposition, I am sorry to say.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may recall that the purpose of this bill is to provide for federal–provincial fiscal arrangements. These fiscal arrangements are important because they ensure that where certain specific services are concerned, all Canadians across the country have access to those services. And when we are talking about federal transfers to the provinces, we must remember there are three different programs under which money is transferred from the federal government to the provinces: first of all, the so–called transfer payments; second, equalization payments; and third, another program that also applies to certain provinces, but not to all.

Federal transfer payments to the provinces are important because they ensure a minimum standard of goods and services and quality of life for all Canadians, wherever they happen to be in this country. Since 1984 when this government was elected, transfer payments to the provinces have increased every year. Unfortunately, opposition members will say they did not, but that is false, and it is false, Mr. Speaker, because when we look at the figures for each year, the amounts transferred to the provinces have indeed increased.

Although these amounts have gone up substantially, more is of course always better. But I think that what we need, both at the federal level and the provincial level, is a balanced budget. We know that the federal government's debt is a big problem and therefore the federal government must meet its financial responsibilities and the provinces must play a part in reducing the national debt and in the collective effort we must all make to solve our national debt problem.

In that regard, I think that Bill C–60 is in keeping with the priorities that I mentioned. This bill deals, among other things, with post–secondary education and health care, two important issues in Canada. Given the importance of education in our country and given that unfortunately too many of our young people do not complete high school and then do not obtain what they consider a decent job or one they would like to have, it is important to emphasize that point and ensure that young people throughout Canada, as well as people who need health care, have these services at the same cost throughout Canada.

I think that Bill C–60 respects these important basic criteria which give a preferred status to education and health throughout Canada, be it in Newfoundland, British Columbia or Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, allow me to point out that the minister responsible for this bill, the Hon. John McDermid, is in the House. I would be prepared to give him some of my time so that he too can express his point of view on this important bill. I know that he is prepared to talk about it.

So, Mr. Speaker, I will conclude with that and leave some time for my colleague, the minister.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it my understanding that you are splitting your 40 minutes?

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I believe we need the permission of the House to do that. If I could just make a few concluding comments. The parliamentary secretary presented the case very well. There are just a couple of points that I would like to make, but it does need unanimous consent of the House and I would ask for that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I was just going to do that, thank you very much.

Is there unanimous consent to allow the Minister of State for Finance a few minutes to complete the statement?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, we have no objection on this side, but we would like to have some notice of that from now on so that we can get some previous notice from the ministers as to who is going to be splitting what time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is fine. I am sure that is agreeable. The hon. Minister of State for Finance can complete his statement.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleagues in the House for that kindness.

As the parliamentary secretary so ably pointed out this morning, this bill, Bill C–60, amends the Federal–Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act, the Federal Post–Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, and makes a number of minor changes within the acts that I have just mentioned to try and improve the simplicity of the tax system.

We are, of course, talking about some additional moneys that have been given to provinces in the equalization program, which is the cornerstone of Canadian fiscal federalism. This renewal is a result of about 20 months of consultation with the provinces. The provinces were extremely pleased with the results of the consultation as was expressed at the finance ministers' meeting that was held in Quebec City not too long ago. This bill will also allow the federal and provincial governments to mutually administer and enforce each other's taxes. That will allow us to simplify the tax system somewhat. If we have heard anything from business, from the consumer and so on, it is to please simplify the tax system. So this will simplify the payment of taxes for the taxpayers and for governments.

I think it is very important at this particular time where provincial governments are working in co–operation with the federal government in some instances, and I think others will follow suit, in collecting provincial sales taxes at the border.

These are not new taxes. I want to make that very clear. The provinces are owed these taxes as people purchase products on the other side of the border and bring them back into Canada. Over and above the exemption they must pay their federal sales tax, they must pay their provincial sales tax.

To date, the federal government has not been collecting the provincial sales taxes. We have now started with the province of Quebec because it has harmonized its system or will be harmonizing its system with the goods and services tax. Other provinces are very close to making a decision. Other provinces are looking into it in some detail now as to harmonizing their tax system with the federal goods and services tax system, especially in the goods area.

This will allow us to make agreements with the provinces to in fact collect those taxes. I think that is a very, very important part of the bill.

The bill provides for a generous renewal of the equalization program while maintaining our fiscal responsibility, and in addition by facilitating the mutual administration of taxes between federal and provincial governments. We are just improving our country's tax system as a whole. I think that is very important.

I just want to re-emphasize if I might one of the points that was raised by the parliamentary secretary. We keep hearing about cuts to provinces and that we have cut back on moneys for transfers to provinces and so on. This morning I went through in some detail the transfers to provinces over the period since 1984-85, since the Progressive Conservatives formed the government in Canada. As I go through province by province, the types of increases to the provinces that have gone on over that period of time, I think it is very important that the public understand exactly what those increases are. I am going to take just a moment to go province by province to point out the importance of fiscal transfers to the provinces and how they have grown and continue to grow over this period of fiscal restraint we are in.

For example, major transfers to Newfoundland have grown at an average annual rate of 5.5 per cent since 1984-85 and this year are likely to exceed $1.4 billion, accounting for about 44 per cent of Newfoundland's revenue.

Major transfers to Prince Edward Island, an annual rate of 5.3 per cent increase per year, likely to exceed $300 million this year. That is over 40 per cent of P.E.I.'s revenues.

Major transfers to Nova Scotia have grown at an annual average rate of 5.6 per cent since 1984-85, likely to exceed $1.8 billion this year. This accounts for 43 per cent of Nova Scotia's revenues.

Major transfers to New Brunswick have grown at an average annual rate of 5.7 per cent since 1984-85, expected to total almost $1.6 billion this year, accounts for about 39 per cent of New Brunswick's revenues.

Transfers to Quebec have grown at an average annual rate of 3.8 per cent since 1984-85, likely to total about $11 billion this year, accounts for about 31 per cent of Quebec's revenues.

To Ontario, the major transfers have grown at an average annual rate of 6.2 per cent since 1984-85, expected to exceed $9.9 billion this year and accounts for just over 20 per cent of Ontario's revenues.

Manitoba, we have seen an annual growth rate of 6.6 per cent since 1984-85, expected to exceed $1.9 billion this year. That accounts for close to 40 per cent of Manitoba's revenues.

To Saskatchewan, it has grown at an average annual rate of 8.3 per cent since 1984-85, the highest of any province, expected this year to exceed $1.3 billion and accounts for about 27 per cent of Saskatchewan's revenues.

For Alberta—and I know that you are interested in this, Mr. Speaker—the transfers have grown at an average annual rate of 5.2 per cent since 1984-85, expected to exceed $2.5 billion this year and accounts for about 20 per cent of the revenues for Alberta.

For British Columbia they have grown at an average rate of 4.8 per cent. They expect to total almost $3.3 billion this year. This accounts for more than 20 per cent of British Columbia's revenues.

For the Northwest Territories it has grown at 7.6 per cent, likely to exceed $880 million and, of course, accounts for about 80 per cent of the Territories' revenues.

For Yukon it has grown at 8.6 per cent since 1984-85, likely to exceed $250 million this year and accounts for about two thirds of Yukon's revenues.

Statistics can be extremely boring and no doubt these have proved to be boring. The point I want to make is this. Time after time we hear members of the opposition and provincial premiers moaning and groaning that they are not getting the share of revenue from the federal government that they should get, or that we are destroying medicare—and this is what the opposition says—or we are destroying post-secondary education. Yet we must look at the transfers to the provinces that have gone on year over year over the last period of time and continue to go on. Of course, this year there has been a reassessment. There will be an increase of some $400 million in one year that is going to the provinces, $200 million in retroactive and $200 million per year from there on extra, over and above, under the negotiations that have gone on. It is very plain to see that although the increases have slowed down—and I am not arguing that at all, the increases that the provinces might have expected or wanted, and of course they will take any largesse from the federal government that we can provide them—

An hon. member: No.

Mr. McDermid: Certainly they will. They relatively appreciate it but they will take it, that is for sure. I am talking about the extra equalization program that we came in with, that we negotiated with them and that they are very happy about, especially the province of Quebec.

The Minister of Finance from Quebec, the Hon. Gerard Levesque, was extremely pleased with the new negotiations and the decision that came down recently. My hon. friend from Montreal should not look quite so surprised because I was sitting beside Mr. Levesque when he sang the praises of the Minister of Finance for the Government of Canada at that particular time.

In any event, these measures are very important. They are important for the provinces. It is a two-year extension of the agreement. We will be continuing in the next two years negotiating the equalization program which I think will be very, very important.

I understand that there have been consultations and there is unanimous consent to refer this bill to the Standing Committee on Finance. Therefore, I move:

That pursuant to Standing Order 73(3), Bill C-60, an act to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act and the Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Members have heard the terms of the motion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Will those members who object to the motion, please rise in their places.

Mrs. Marleau: On a point of order. You did not recognize me on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will recognize the hon. member on a point of order, but this is the standard procedure when we have a minister rising in his place to refer the bill to a different committee. I will recognize the hon. member on a point of order.

Mrs. Marleau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister mentioned something about consultation. I am the critic in the House on this bill. No one has spoken to me about referring and changing the venue of the discussion for this bill. Perhaps if we did have some discussions I might be agreeable, but at this point I have not been consulted and I am not aware of anyone in my party having been consulted.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, it is my understanding that the agreement was between the House leaders. That was the information that was provided to me. I did not consult with my colleagues in the opposition as I was informed that consultations had in fact taken place. If they have not taken place, I will make sure they do take place, but I still would like to put that motion before the floor.

Mrs. Marleau: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. minister would allow me a few minutes to consult with the members of my party before proceeding with his motion. I would beg his indulgence, please.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there agreement?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All right, there is agreement.

• (1220)

I will wait and see what instructions the Chair receives within the next few minutes. I will carry on with the debate.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to debate Bill C-60, an act to amend the Federal-Provincial Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act.

I sat here and listened with a great deal of patience to the glorious renderings of the illustrious minister on the government side who was very busy telling us and Canadians how well they have behaved toward the provinces in terms of transfers and the huge increases that have come forward.

I sometimes wonder what kind of land they live in because wherever I go I hear of cutbacks. I hear from students how tuition fees have increased. I hear of massive closures in the health sector. I am not at all convinced that Canadians are prepared to acknowledge that the statements made by the minister are as optimistic as perhaps he would like us to believe.

Perhaps one of the biggest problems is always that it is so very easy to massage figures and to make them appear to be much better than they actually are. At this point, I have not had a great deal of opportunity to spend much time studying it. I know as a member of the finance committee I will get that opportunity. Perhaps then my remarks will be more definite as to what is good and what is bad with this bill.

When it comes to simply extending the equalization and transfer payments for another two years, I obviously have no opposition to that. I think that the whole basis for equalization and transfer payments has helped make us Canadian.

Any Canadian who lived through the Great Depression can still picture the breadlines and the transients riding the rails across the country. I have been told many stories by my parents and my grandparents of the years of the Depression and the horrors to which Canadians were subjected.

Most of our parents and others who lived through this Great Depression thought that they would never see these sights again. They thought that never again would they see the breadlines or the homeless. I believe that this is really what was at the source of the beginnings of our great social safety network. I believe that that is where the idea of equalization came from, the idea of helping those provinces with less to achieve and maintain a certain minimum of standard.

That is where all of these government initiatives really began. By and large, they were very successful in making sure, at least up until the last few years, that never again would we see these breadlines and these homeless people.

Here we are in the 1990s faced with exactly what we thought we would never see again. In the early 1980s when we went through that terrible recession, it was thought that it was a temporary measure to help these people during a particularly bad time. Here we are. We have gone through a number of very prosperous years. Not only have we not seen the decline of these homeless, these breadlines or these soup kitchens, but we have seen a proliferation of them. The only reason is that this social network that we created as a caring country has broken down. Therefore, the moneys that are needed are really not there.

We have forgotten what we as a government, as a governing party, as elected representatives were elected to do, and that is to look after the people of our country.

We have seen a reduction in government expenditures and non-action on others, all in the light of fighting the deficit. The government is saying it needs additional revenues to fight the deficit, so it has slashed all of these programs.

Has the deficit decreased? No. This government has presided over the doubling of the debt with its bottom line mentality of forgetting about people. Its economic policies have been absolutely disastrous. Rather than basing its policies on full unemployment, equality and decency for all it has had this bottom line mentality, this idea that fighting the deficit at all costs would save us. It has not saved us at all. We are faced with a very terrible future, far worse than any of us had ever thought we would see again.

We talk about fiscal arrangements. Regional disparities have been a problem in our country throughout our history. Without substantial financial contributions from the federal government, they would be much, much worse.

It would be much more difficult for some of the poorer provinces to provide accessible and affordable health care and higher education to their residents.

The funding framework is embodied in the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Established Programs Financing Act of 1977. Originally federal support for health and higher education was to keep pace each year with over-all growth in the economy. Since 1986, support has been cut back as a result of a series of unilateral decisions by the federal government aimed at reducing the deficit. As a result, the cash portion of basic federal support has declined.

To go back to the dismantling of the system, you go back to the budget of 1986. Bill C-96 it was called. They always have a new number. It depends on when they are introduced, in what cycle. This is from the budget of 1986. The established programs financing escalator used to be tied to the Gross National Product, GNP, but in 1986 it was reduced to the Gross National Product less 2 per cent. You could say that it would still allow it to grow, but not at the full level of growth of the Gross National Product.

There was a new budget introduced in 1987 with a new bill, Bill C-44. This again renewed the fiscal arrangements of the established programs financing until March 31, 1992, again keeping these lower than growth types of increases. In 1989, under Bill C-33, beginning in 1991 the rate of growth of the established programs financing transfers would be cut by one percentage point. Now we are down to the Gross National Product less 3 per cent, again a decrease in the increase.

At that time the government expected to save hundreds of millions of dollars. In the budget of 1990, we saw Bill C-69. I am a lot more familiar with some of these because I was actively involved in the debate on these bills. The transfer payments to the provinces on post-secondary education and health care were frozen again at the Gross National Product less 3 percentage points. And it carried on. Bill C-69 did not deal with CAP. We have had an extension of CAP already this year. Under the Canada Assistance Plan bill which allocates moneys for welfare, Alberta, Ontario and British Columbia were limited to the amounts of increases. Despite the fact that they have huge rates of welfare, that the unemployment rates and their rates have increased far and above what many others have, it would still not be allowed to raise the money that would be transferred to deal with these programs. Always we see a constant cutback. Year after year after year we see it happening.

The impact of these cuts and these freezes results in total losses to the provinces in the billions of dollars range. We see that reflected very much in what is happening with our health care system. Although it is true that our health care system is costly, it is still the best value for our money. If we compare what we get for our dollar here in Canada and what the U.S. gets for the amount of money that it spends, then we are far and above better served by every dollar that we invest in our health care.

There is no doubt in my mind that changes need to be made to some of the programs. Perhaps we need to emphasize other areas of health care more than some of the ones that we do.

Cutting back on the transfers in these areas has not contributed to better management of our health care system. They have only contributed to the cutbacks and to the fear that we feel now across the nation as the middle income group, which is the largest group of Canadians, are frightened and afraid of what is going to happen to them in the future. Will there be a health care system for them, will they be able to get the drugs that they need at the prices they can afford to pay when they need them, when they get to be a certain age. There is this feeling that perhaps the federal government is letting go of its responsibilities in this matter.

Obviously when we saw that Quebec was prepared to introduce user fees, as we allow the federal government to transfer fewer and fewer dollars to the provinces in these areas, then we also transfer the authority that we as a national government have. It would mean that in some areas of the country we would perhaps have better health care than in others.

I was always under the impression that the idea behind many of our programs was that we would have equal types of programs, equal care for people across the country, not where one richer province perhaps had more money to invest in one area versus another. I think that is totally unfair. We must be very careful to preserve one of the best universal medical health care systems in the world.

In the 1984 election, Brian Mulroney on August 18, 1984 said that "universal social programs are a sacred trust, not to be tampered with". I believe when he spoke of universal social programs he especially meant medicare, which is a social program, which is universal. However, many people now would have us believe that if one has money one should be able to pay for one's health care.

At first glance perhaps it might sound like the answer. It would be the beginning of the end of what we have now. I do not believe that health care should be based on a person's wallet, it should be based on the state of that person's health. Therefore, if a person is very poor, but very ill and dying, then he or she should get priority treatment. It should not matter whether he or she has money or not.

When we start going to a pay system of medicare, it means that the more money one has, the better treatment one gets. I do not believe that anyone in Canada, except for a very few people, have the kind of money that may be necessary in the case of a major health crisis.

I always think back to the years when I was a child. I was being raised, myself and my two brothers, by my mother. I remember how she did not use the health care system that we had because it was such a horrendous thing to be sick, the cost was something that she just could not afford. Perhaps she should have had medical care sooner, but this fear of the cost kept her from it. In the end she was admitted at emergency and it was a very harsh time in our lives, as children, and in her life as the sole supporting parent. I would like to believe that at no time should anyone be in a position like that again.

Our system has prevented this from happening. The transfer payments in terms of health care are especially important, because as we cut back on the amount of money we give to the provinces, we are losing control over this health care system, which is the best in the world and which most of us have benefited from.

If you wish to get some money back from the more wealthy Canadians, by all means do it. But do it through taxation, do not do it by tampering with this health care system. Obviously we do need to revamp some of the things that are done in the health care system. We need more rationalizing of some of the services we offer. We have to think of people first.

I am going to give you an example of something that has happened in Ontario in the health care sector which has come to my attention and which is a better utilization of some of the facilities. As you know, our Sudbury Memorial Hospital was one of the first hospitals to pioneer the heart by-pass surgery in the replacement and rebuilding of arteries.

For many years there was a problem because the lists of patients waiting for surgery became longer and longer. We heard of people out west who were waiting to have this surgery who died and others who were admitted right away in certain areas where the list was not as long.

A decision was made to put together a task force, maybe four or five years ago—and you can correct me on the number of years—that was adopted and that was to have a registry. Now anywhere in Ontario where there are facilities to do this coronary reconstructive surgery, the by-pass surgery, when you are in an emergency situation you need not wait. There is one central person that you call to and they will tell you which hospital has facilities available immediately or within the next few days. As a result, the backlog of emergency by-pass surgery has gone down to nothing. Now when a person needs the surgery the facilities are found and utilized. It has made for much better utilization of the operating rooms that are equipped to deal with these emergencies.

I would suggest that we should encourage this kind of a central registry for all kinds of surgery. For instance, at this time, at least in Ontario and perhaps in many other areas of this country, there is a problem with hip replacements. As you know, people who need hip replacements are in a great deal of pain and it may take, at times, six months, a year, a year and a half before they are called to have this hip replacement. I would strongly recommend that this kind of registry be set up so that again all of the facilities could be better utilized for these people who, although they may not be in danger of dying from this pain, are suffering a great deal. Perhaps we could shorten that time they have to wait and make their lives that much easier.

These are innovative ways of using what we have. We have to think in terms of people first. If we think only in terms of money saved, all we look at then is the bottom line. Perhaps one hospital will not do any hip replacements for six months. By the way it is a very costly procedure.

That is perhaps one of the reasons why more hospitals are not doing them. If one hospital is not being utilized to its fullest potential in that area and in another region of the country people are waiting months and months to receive this surgery, I do not believe that either the Canadian public or the system is being well served because the cost in terms of medication, pain control and health are dramatic. A person who is healed and well is far better able to serve the country and the community. It also costs a lot less in the short run if you heal them right away.

I am very, very adamant about reducing cutbacks generally and about more specific types of control as to where our moneys go. I would like to believe that Bill C-60 is not an outright cutback in program funding, but my experience with this government has taught me that everything is painted up. One of my colleagues once said "tarted up", made to look very glossy and great, but as soon as you look underneath, there is something hidden. There is something that we, as unsuspecting Canadians, do not know and there is some hidden motive and that is a motive of cutback, a motive of letting go of the responsibility for health care. One of the biggest mistakes we could make is to let go of that responsibility in health care.

Established Programs Financing also relates to education and we have heard the Prime Minister and everyone go on about competition, saying we can compete. We can only compete if we have the best educated people around. We have seen some dramatic cutbacks in the education system. How can we say we can compete when at the same time we have cut back and cut back on transfer payments to education? We have literally forced our deficit on to the provinces and said to the provinces they have a choice: they can either increase their taxes or cut back on their services. What we have seen in many instances is a mix of the two.

As a result, our post-secondary students are paying more in tuition fees. They are having a harder and harder time to get this first class education. Again, the idea behind being a Canadian is making sure that all of us have equal opportunities. It is making sure that those of us who come from poorer backgrounds and those of us who come from more affluent families have this same opportunity to access that education and to access those jobs.

The other day I had a call from a constituent of mine who was extremely disturbed because of the end of the family allowance that was announced in the budget. She was extremely disturbed because this was the amount of money she set aside every month and matched for her children's education. She was upset because this was going to be cut back, but she was also upset because she could see the increase in the cost of education. She could see that when her children, who are 7 and 9, got to be of an age to go to university, it would cost far more perhaps than she would have been able to put aside.

She was upset with the fact that the family allowance would no longer be there for her to put aside for her children. She was also upset with this fear that it is not going to be an education that is open to everyone.

As best I could, I tried to allay her fears, but I feel that there are times when it is justifiable to feel this need to be reassured that our children, the next generation, will be given the tools with which they can compete in a way that will make sure they can guarantee themselves and their future children a very comfortable life. Do not forget that a lot of the moneys that would go to fight the deficit come from tax revenues which are only generated when people have good, high-paying jobs; when their income is there to pay the taxes. Everything is connected.

What we have seen lately is more of this letting go. We find ourselves in a constitutional crisis in which we look at this debate with Quebec and with the provinces and we feel this fear that there is no strong central force. There is no one willing to stand up and say: "Yes, I will guarantee that there will be a Canadian medical system beyond all of them. Not a Quebec medical system or a Manitoba medical system, or an Ontario medical system, but a system that is truly Canadian for all of us in which all of us have equal access". The same thing applies to education. We need a Canadian system which guarantees that all education will be open to all. Every one of us who is able to go to school should have the right to do so in a way that does not break us.

In this last budget, on the one hand the government took away that 3 per cent surtax on loans that it had instituted, but on the other hand it has now said that it would start charging interest from the day that a person graduates. If you go to school for any number of years and you borrow, you could find yourself on the day of graduation owing $25,000 to $30,000. What a horrendous debt to have to start off with, especially in these days when the job market expectations are not particularly good even if you are a graduate from a university or from post-secondary education. The wages are not that high. To start off your adult life with a debt of that magnitude is extremely serious.

I have spoken of this matter before in the House. There is an example in which there was a single mother who went back to school and used a student loan to finance her education. She got her education and a job and now finds herself holding down two jobs and still having a great deal of difficulty getting rid of this student loan debt. The interest has grown faster than she can pay it off. She is now facing sending her own children to university with her own debt still unpaid, and her children will now be forced to borrow in even larger amounts because tuition fees are going up.

I ask that we reconsider what we are doing with this bill. Are we going to help these people? I think it is very important that we consider who we are hurting when we do these things. We are hearing that there are going to be some tax base improvements and that there will be perhaps some increased benefits to the provinces—the minister said $200 million. It will go only to certain provinces because in this whole system it is all based on need and equalization only goes to the poorer provinces. Have we reconsidered all of the provinces? Some of the provinces that were known to be rich have suffered the most lately.

All of these things have to be reconsidered seriously, and not just in light of the upcoming federal election in which this government is intent on going around saying to everybody: "See what a great government we are because we have given you $10 million". Forget the billions it has cut back before. I have a terrible feeling that this is what this bill is going to allow the government to do.

I am happy if the government can give things, but I do not want it to just do it once. I want the government to do it and mean it and not to be dismantling something behind the scenes after telling everyone that it has now found the true path to self-righteousness and all of the rest of it. I somehow do not believe the government. I would really think that the rest of Canadians feel as I do. How can we believe this government?

The government has told us things before that really did not come out. How can we and why should we believe that this will help anyone anywhere?

One of the things that this bill proposes is a change to the base year for the ceiling provision. The attitude is that the government is going to change the base year—nothing wrong with that. Normally you change the base year and things go their merry way. Currently the base year being used is 1987–88. This piece of legislation would make the base year 1992–93. How can we make the base year 1992–93 when we are not there yet? What about 1991–92? How do we use the 1992–93 base year for 1991–92?

• (1250)

Mr. McDermid: I will explain it to you.

Mrs. Marleau: I would really like to have you explain it to me. To me it is shenanigans. It is pure and simple.

Mr. McDermid: You better tell that to the provincial ministers because they negotiated it.

Mrs. Marleau: The minister is quite willing to give explanations now, but that is backtracking. I would like to believe that this was all done in good faith but I have this suspicious mind that there is more to it than meets the eye. Maybe not. Maybe for once, I am wrong. I hope I am wrong. I have not been wrong too many times before but maybe this once. If I am, I will honestly admit it and come out and congratulate you on a fabulous bill when it is all done.

This bill makes what are referred to as tax based improvements. There are about 30 tax base changes which are being made to update and improve the measurement of relative fiscal capacity of the provinces. Does that not sound great? It just sounds great, but what does it mean? That is exactly the case in point. What really does it mean?

According to the officials conducting the briefing I attended, this will result in a $200 million deal in additional benefits for the provinces for this year. Great, hallelujah. Two hundred million may sound like a large amount of money but perhaps the amounts should be $2 billion.

It is so easy to fool people when you are dealing with these large numbers. Believe me, $200 million is very little in the budgets of most provinces when they are dealing with health care and post-secondary education.

I realize it is in addition to what they get now, but they should probably get a lot more than this additional $200 million, which sounds like a large amount of money but is probably very little.

There are a number of other things in this bill. It says that it establishes a detailed framework for administration agreements dealing with all types of taxation. Oh, oh. This says an awful lot, but we are not quite sure. Does this mean there are going to be more tax points transferred to the provinces? Is that what that means? I do not know. If it means that, then it means the dismantling of the power from the centre to the provinces, which is not something my party really believes in at this time, especially when it comes to health care and post-secondary education.

Mr. Edmonston: Except for Quebec.

Mrs. Marleau: My colleague to the left here is saying except for Quebec. I disagree very strongly, but we will not get into that debate now.

There are designs to the tax system in this bill that would facilitate the collection and administration of taxes from both the government's and the taxpayers' perspectives. Is that to facilitate the collection of taxes at the border or is that to facilitate the harmonization of the GST and the provincial sales tax? It could well be, but we are not sure because it does not mention which taxes it would like to harmonize. We know the government wants to harmonize the GST.

Was this also negotiated with the provincial premiers? Has there somehow been a secret deal with some of these premiers that they would harmonize the GST. I wonder if the Premier of Ontario has agreed to the harmonization of the GST and the PST? The people of Ontario would really like to know whether that is really what this is about.

Mr. McDermid: The people of Ontario would like to see it so there is only one tax.

Mrs. Marleau: I have no idea whether the people of Ontario would like to see it. One of the things I do know is that the people of Ontario would like to know what kind of deal this government has cooked up behind closed doors on that.

Is that what this legislation is about? Are we going to see harmonization very, very quickly of our GST-PST system? That is one thing that leaves me to speculate.

The government is in a very big hurry to pass this bill. Perhaps it is necessary because it tells us that the end of the original agreement on the Established Programs Financing and on the transfer and equalization payments is in view.

We must give very serious consideration to the ramifications of this bill to make sure that we are protecting those areas which we, as Canadians, hold very near and dear.

There are very few areas now that we as Canadians can still feel very proud of. One of them is our health care system. We are still proud of it, despite some of the deficiencies that may or may not appear from time to time. It is still the best in the world.

I would hope that this legislation would not detract from it or deter from it. I would hope that all national standards be applied at all times and that a Canadian, whether he is born in Newfoundland, British Columbia, northern Ontario or Quebec would have access to the same kind of medical care no matter what his income, no matter what his position in life. I think it is very important that we ensure this.

I want to thank you, Mr. Speaker, for being very generous and allowing me to speak for as long as I have. Before I sit down, I would like to say that I have received a note from the people in my party. Yes, we do agree to having this bill sent to the finance committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize the hon. member for Chambly, I believe there is unanimous agreement for the motion of the Minister of State for Finance.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Debate will therefore resume on the motion for second reading of Bill C-60 and reference to the Standing Committee on Finance.

[Translation]

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, before commenting on the motion moved by the Minister of State (Finance and Privatization), I would like to outline very briefly what Bill C-60 proposes to do.

Bill C-60 is about equalization, but it is also about the harmonization of provincial and federal taxes, which is its real purpose. It remains to be seen whether the minister will manage to persuade the various provincial premiers to go along with this kind of harmonization, and all I can say is: good luck. So that is one of the goals of this legislation. The second one is, of course, to extend the programs for two more years.

When we talk about equalization programs, we must understand what this means. Equalization is a legislative program that is usually approved for a period of five years—a federal program, of course. The current legislation which authorizes equalization programs expires on March 31, 1992.

At the meeting of finance ministers on January 30, the Minister of Finance suggested that the federal government should renew equalization programs for a provisional two-year period, from April 1, 1992 to March 31, 1994.

Suppose we look at what this means in the way of additional amounts the federal government wants to give to the provinces, and here I am referring mainly to the so-called poorest provinces, as compared to the other provinces. Renewal of the equalization agreement would involve improvements worth more than $400 million for the provinces in 1992-93. Of that amount, nearly $200 million would be permanent improvements, while $200 million would be one-shot benefits.

As a member from Quebec, I am glad to see that we in Quebec will have a large share of this amount. I believe Quebec will receive nearly $200 million of the total $400 million.

We must understand that the purpose of equalization is to help the provinces pay for post-secondary education and health care. This is very important. As the hon. member for the Liberal Party said earlier, equalization is a spin-off of Canadian federalism. Whether you are from Quebec or from any other province, you cannot ignore the fact that this is a benefit of Canadian federalism. And I am very glad to see this happening, because nowadays, we as members from Quebec are trying to explain to our constituents why it is worth while for our province to stay in Canada. Quebecers often ask us: what's the point? What's in it for us? The point is that the federal government gives us this money which, of course, is collected in the form of income tax in the first place. Sometimes the money we get back is in proportion to the money collected, and sometimes it is not because the purpose is to give the money to the provinces that need it most.

Now we can, of course, challenge the figures given by the federal government. Is it fair for Quebec to receive such and such an amount, compared with what Ontario or British Columbia are getting? This can go on and on, Mr. Speaker, because as you know, figures can be made to say all kinds of things. It just depends how you want to read them.

So using the figures provided by the minister who led off the debate on this bill, I would like to quote, for each province, what percentage equalization is of provincial revenue. For instance, in Newfoundland, equalization represents 44 per cent of provincial revenue; in Prince Edward Island, 40 per cent; in Nova Scotia, 43 per cent; in New Brunswick, 39 per cent; in Manitoba, 40 per cent; in Ontario, 20 per cent. In Quebec, almost, but not quite, 31 per cent. In other words, that is the money transferred from the federal government to Quebec under equalization programs.

And just for your information, in Saskatchewan it is 27 per cent; in Alberta, 20 per cent; in British Columbia, about 20 per cent; in the Northwest Territories, about 80 per cent and in Yukon, two-thirds or 66 per cent.

Although one can disagree on the accuracy of these figures, one thing is clear: the provinces or territories that have less income to meet their expenses, which are very important, such as those for post-secondary education and health, receive the biggest pieces of the federal pie, if you want. For example, the Yukon receives 66 per cent, the Northwest Territories 80 per cent and the maritimes and Manitoba about 40 per cent.

Would this be a good reason for people in Quebec to say, "We only get 31 1/3 per cent, while other provinces receive 40 per cent of their revenue from the federal government. It is not worth staying in Canada!" I don't think so. If you believe that being Canadian is a social contract, an agreement you make with a government, then it should be done as one would in a family. Not only we but our brothers and sisters have needs, and maybe they need more than we do.

So it is hard for me to be against renewing this equalization program, because I think that it gives all provinces the money that they need, according to their needs. But after giving some support to Bill C-60, Mr. Speaker, I should criticize some things. My criticism will concern mainly the issue of harmonizing the provincial tax and the federal tax, commonly called the GST.

I know why so many provinces do not want to harmonize these two taxes. They know their voters very well, better than the federal government does. Yes, they are afraid, but this fear is real. Unfortunately the federal government and my friends and colleagues opposite did not share this fear, because it is based on reality, I believe. The reality is that when Parliament headed by this Conservative government is in session, our pocketbooks and purses are not safe.

As for the federal government, the GST and harmonization, if you, like me and my party, are against this tax, the GST, you can hardly be for a law that would harmonize these two taxes. We agree that the provinces can have their own taxes, but we think that the federal tax, the GST, should be abolished.

Now people will say, "Hold on. Abolish it?" The Liberals do not claim that it should be abolished. The Liberals claim that it should be—I don't know what the Liberal leader said just recently—transformed or changed, but kept and modified. Okay. We already heard that before: kept and modified. I think that one reason the government is so unpopular and why it will be beaten in the next election, Mr. Speaker, is not so much the Constitution or even other legislation affecting VIA Rail, Air Canada or anything else. No, it is not that. It is not because of privatization either.

Members from Quebec know why the government will be beaten in the next election. Members from British Columbia and members of that party from western Canada know why they will be beaten. It is not so hard to understand; it is clear. It is because they passed a law that allowed the GST to exist. And now, Mr. Speaker, when I talk about abolishing the GST, it means that we would not have to harmonize the provincial tax with the federal tax and charge one on top of the other, because that is what happens. I must tell you what the government could have done instead of passing an act to implement the goods and services tax. Again, you do not need magic to do it, and there are several things that can be done.

There is a gentleman, who is not a member of the NDP, nor a Liberal or a Conservative. I do not know what he is, but he is a gentleman who wrote a book entitled The Canadian Legislatures. He is the former administrator—I believe he was a bureaucrat—of the legislature of Ontario. His name is Mr. Robert Fleming. He talks about governments expenses, not only the federal government but both the federal and provincial governments. Mr. Fleming compared salaries, privileges, pensions, all kinds of expenses of the federal government—the Senate and the House of Commons—and of the provincial governments that make useless expenses which are in fact a real squandering of money.

In his report, Mr. Fleming tells us how much those governments cost us. As you know, Mr. Speaker, if I ask that we abolish a tax, I must also ask that we reduce the federal government expenses. In order to know where to reduce expenses, we must know where there are a lot of useless expenses, where there is a lot of money that is being squandered. According to Mr. Fleming, for all governments in Canada—that includes the federal and provincial governments—total expenses were of the order of $410 million five years ago. Today those expenses have climbed to $580 million, which represents an increase of 9.2 per cent each year. By gosh, if I were a union leader in Quebec and had obtained a contract giving the union members a 9.2 per cent raise per year, those workers would keep me there for life.

Mr. Speaker, the members of this House are not elected for life, nor in the legislatures elsewhere. In my opinion, it is indecent to have a 9.2 per cent increase per year, every year.

So if the government wants to make voters happy, if it really wants to do what must be done to harmonize taxes with every province, the solution is clear: it must abolish the GST, reduce its expenses and, finally, pass legislation that most Canadians and Quebecers could support.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the member for Chambly. In his opening remarks he mentioned that the people of Quebec feel that the equalization payments, the transfer payments, are one of the more positive reasons for the province of Quebec to stay as a part of Canada.

As the member knows, just in the last 10 years the fiscal transfers to the province of Quebec have been close to about $40 billion. I sometimes wonder, and I know that many of my constituents in downtown Toronto wonder when we hear that Quebecers want to separate. We all understand the cultural aspect of this and the emotional feeling, but just from an economic reality it seems to me and to a lot of my constituents that it is a large sum of money.

Does the member think lately that the federal presence, the federal contribution to the province of Quebec has really not been communicated clearly enough or substantially enough?

If he shares the concern that I have that it is not being communicated, does he think that maybe a very intense federal presence campaign in the province of Quebec may lessen the desire for separation?

Mr. Edmonston: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for the question. Being a Quebecer, it is something I have to think about almost constantly.

It is interesting being from Quebec. One generally buys about five papers a day to get a fairly well-rounded idea of what actually happened. There are different stories coming from different perspectives, depending on whether it is a French or English paper. It could be said that both perspectives are true. It is not that there is some sort of a conspiracy or some sort of a campaign to kill an idea or to make a mockery of certain government programs or certain people who happen to call themselves federalists.

However, I believe that the presence of the federal government is badly explained to Quebecers. It is mainly because there is such a split in Quebec right now. The latest poll shows about 58 per cent of the people would vote for separation, for independence or sovereignty. By the way, all these words do not mean the same thing to Quebecers.

Independence is the hard line question, the declaration of independence, and I do not think that is as saleable as sovereignty or sovereignty association.

The federal presence unfortunately has to be promoted. We have to promote the idea of Quebec coming into Canada through administrative arrangements. We do not need unanimity. We do not need what the separatists would say that we do need and that is Mr. Wells, Mr. Filmon and Mr. Getty and others on board. We can handle this thing administratively.

That is one of the things I enjoyed about the Dobbie-Beaudoin committee. We had the best minds working with us, the best people coming before us and enough time to come up with some specific proposals that gave latitude to Quebec without requiring all of the machinery and all of the acceptance from the other provinces.

Really, as much as Quebec has been criticized for not being specific enough, I think that the Dobbie-Beaudoin committee was very specific. I have no problem with defending its position.

In conclusion, I would like to say as a Quebecer that we are counting upon the other provinces to explain to us their own objections in ways that do not come out as simply meaning that we do not want bilingualism or we are unhappy with Quebec because Quebec has received more than its fair share. Quebec has not received more than its fair share and the question of bilingualism is really a red herring.

Mr. Mills: I am not sure that the member really got my point.

Nobody who believes in federalism would object to the $40 billion of fiscal transfers that went to the province of Quebec in the last 10 years. If it is more than that, then so be it.

• (1320)

What people have a difficult time understanding is that we accept naturally and we should accept because it is part of being in a family of federalism, the fact that we help disadvantaged regions of our country. That is part of our social contract to use the member's expression. People have a tough time understanding—and I will bring it down to the smallest example experienced last weekend—when our national orchestra with over one-third of its members Quebecers goes into the province of Quebec it cannot play the national anthem. It is very tough to understand.

Obviously we are doing something wrong in our communication. This government is a pretty good communicator in my mind. We are doing something wrong in our communication of the federal presence when after $40 billion of transfers we cannot play our national anthem in the province of Quebec with the national orchestra and its one-third Quebec members.

Mr. Edmonston: I understand the question from my hon. colleague. He is right in the sense that there is a lot of symbolism involved and symbolism in the sense of what sets off the polarization that we have between French and English. We can talk about the symphony where we have people in Quebec saying: "When you come with your symphony we don't want you playing O Canada". I disagree, I think O Canada is fine.

We will get beyond symbolism to the tangible in a moment. I just want to mention that symbolic gestures are taking on a life of their own in this country, which is very frightening. When we have for example one of the members of the Alberta legislature, Mr. Piquette, who was told to sit down because he was French-speaking and just simply wanted to throw a question out in French, that reverberates throughout the country.

When we have Quebec's flag being trampled on, by a Quebecer by the way, in an Ontario city—

Mr. Holtmann: I don't know them.

Mr. Edmonston: One of my colleagues on the other side said he does not know this particular individual. I am sure he does not, but this makes the symbolism very real.

I just want to respond that all the moneys which Quebecers receive through transfer payments, equalization payments, they will tell you: "We believe through our tax dollars that we deserve that amount".

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): I appreciate the opportunity to make a few comments during second reading of Bill C-60 which amends the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act and the Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act.

I would like to begin my remarks by briefly warding off a possible misconception about this bill. Despite its title, the legislation has only a peripheral and a positive effect on federal contributions to post-secondary education and health.

The peripheral involvement of health and education results from the fact that the proposed legislation corrects a transfer shortfall under Established Programs Financing or EPF that was caused by the interaction of this health and education transfer program and another federal transfer program that often is referred to as equalization. Our focus on improving equalization in this legislative proposal therefore of necessity has a slight positive impact on EPF transfers to equalization-receiving provinces.

Having made clear what this bill is not about, I would now like to explain what this bill proposes to do.

This bill involves the renewal of the equalization program, the cornerstone of Canadian fiscal federalism. This renewal follows more than 20 months of consultation with the provinces both at the official level and at the ministerial level. This bill also will facilitate co-operation between the federal and provincial governments in the mutual administration and enforcement of each other's taxes and will simplify the payment of taxes for taxpayers and for governments.

I would like to begin with a brief overview of the purpose of equalization. The purpose of equalization which is enshrined in subsection 36.2 of the Constitution Acts of Canada 1867 to 1982 is to enable provincial governments to provide reasonably comparable levels of public services at reasonably comparable levels of taxation.

I think it is important to stress exactly what is said, that it is to provide reasonably comparable levels of public services at reasonably comparable levels of taxation.

Because its benefits flow only to the less wealthy provinces, it is the most progressive of the major transfers to the provinces. In 1992-93 fiscal year, the government will provide about $8.5 billion in equalization to the less wealthy provinces. That is all of the provinces except for Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia.

Second, in renewing the equalization program, this bill provides a package of fair and generous improvements, especially when one considers the present federal government's fiscal position. These improvements are worth over $400 million for this coming fiscal year as additional dollars to the provinces for 1992–93. Of this, roughly $200 million will be ongoing and $200 million will be a one–time additional benefit.

The size of the package of improvements in this difficult fiscal period underscores this government's commitment to the principle of sharing within the country. Funding for the renewal package will be found within the existing fiscal framework. Budget priorities will be reallocated.

With this increase the government remains firmly committed to reducing the annual deficit, working toward the day when we will begin to reduce the debt, and living within its self–imposed ceiling of 3 per cent on increased program spending.

Third, I would like to make some remarks on the renewal package proposed in this bill. All the provinces receiving equalization will gain from the federal package in two ways: improvements will increase program payout and provide an additional one–time benefit, and the limit on the growth of equalization will not apply to the 1992 fiscal year.

There are four components of the renewal package made possible in this bill: first, the equalization program is renewed for two years; second, improvements will be made in the measurement of fiscal capacity; third, the equalization ceiling will be newly based or restructured in this bill, as the bill proposes; and, finally, a technical irritant related to the interaction of equalization and another federal transfer program, the Established Programs Financing, will be eliminated. The effect of this irritant has been to reduce the have–not provinces' share of cash payments under the Established Programs Financing. All the affected provinces will be compensated retroactively for the revenues they have foregone and this bill will ensure that the situation does not recur in the future.

This bill renews the equalization program for a period of two years. Further, the government will continue its extensive consultation with the provinces during this period. The two–year extension period will provide impetus and flexibility for further changes in the context of ongoing review of all major transfers to provinces. These transfers are under the three headings of equalization, Established Program Financing and the Canada Assistance Program.

I would like to make a few comments regarding the tax measures. The bill also contains measures that will facilitate the administration and the enforcement of federal taxes by provinces and vice versa.

Examples of the kind of arrangements that these measures are aimed at facilitating are the administration of the goods and services tax, the GST in the province of Quebec by the Quebec government and the collection of the Quebec sales tax at the U.S. border by federal customs agents.

In addition, administration agreements between the federal government and a province could be used to simplify remittance and banking arrangements. For example, in cases in which a province administers federal tax, a taxpayer will be able to make out a single cheque to the province covering both federal and provincial taxes. The agreements can cover income taxes or sales taxes.

These kinds of arrangements ensure better and more efficient administration of taxes and thereby contribute to a better and simpler tax system.

Before concluding my remarks on this bill, I would like to look at some of the figures and the hard evidence of what is really occurring within the major transfers from Ottawa to the provinces. It is important to know exactly what has been occurring.

I would like to look at the size and growth of the major transfers, that is, all of the transfers put together into a total package: equalization, Canada Assistance Plan, the EPF and some other transfers.

In 1984–85, these transfers represented $25.6 billion. For the coming fiscal year, 1992–93, it will be $38.9 billion. We have gone from $25.6 billion to $38.9 billion during those years. We often hear people saying that we are reducing the transfers or we are cutting the transfers. Every year, the transfers go up. They are not going down, and that is the first point.

From last year to this year, from 1991–92 to 1992–93, they will be going up from $37 billion to $38.9 billion or an increase of 5.1 per cent. That is 2 per cent higher than the self–imposed spending freeze which the federal government has placed upon itself over each of the next five years.

While we are trying to solve the problem of our annual deficit and while we are trying to get to the point of breaking even and starting to pay off on the national debt, these programs and major transfers are increasing at a rate greater, 5.1 per cent, than the ceiling imposed on all program spending. That 5.1 will take place within that ceiling, so it is important to remember that this increase is a part of that self-imposed constraint on spending by the federal government.

The rate of increase, as I indicated, will be 5.1 per cent for 1992–93 over last year. Let us put that in perspective for both a have-not province and a have province. In comparing two provinces, Newfoundland as one example and Ontario as the other.

We look at the transfers to Newfoundland. They have grown at an average annual rate of 5.5 per cent since 1984–85. This year they are likely to exceed $1.4 billion. That sum of money accounts for 44 per cent of Newfoundland's revenues and also represents a total of over $2,400 this year for every person in Newfoundland. That is almost twice the national average and is the highest of any province.

That is what this transfer program means to the province of Newfoundland. As the minister indicated in his comments earlier, only the Territories receive a larger share. Newfoundland's share is 44 per cent of total revenues. In the case of the Territories, it is 80 per cent. As I indicated here, Newfoundland's is 44 per cent of total revenues and in the case of the Territories it is 80 per cent.

Let me go on to how this applies to the province of Ontario. In the case of Ontario, the transfers have grown on an average rate of 6.2 per cent since 1984–85. This year, they are expected to exceed $9.9 billion. This total revenue in transfers accounts for over 20 per cent of total Ontario revenues. When one looks at this, over those years, this is an average increase from 1984–85 of 6.2 per cent. With the freeze that was introduced last year to the have provinces—Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia—the limit on the increase, it was not a decrease but a limit on the increase, is as follows.

On equalization, there is no annual growth rate but in the Established Programs Financing it will go up by 1 per cent according to a set formula. The Canada Assistance Plan has been frozen at a 5 per cent increase, as was announced in last year's budget. That continues this year at a freeze of 5 per cent. Therefore, the total major transfers to the province of Ontario have not been cut but they have been limited in the increase to a total of 1.9 per cent.

It is important to say that the government has not cut it but has limited the increase to the three wealthier provinces or the have provinces, as we often refer to them.

The member for Chambly was up before in response to a question of the importance of these transfers to the province of Quebec. That was a good point to be made. I am glad that the member for Broadview—Greenwood raised that point. It was an excellent point because we do not often hear it.

Let me refer to what the transfer program means to the province of Quebec in comparison to the other provinces I have just mentioned. The transfers have grown at an average annual rate of 3.8 per cent since 1984–85 to the province of Quebec. This year they are likely to total $11 billion. That is more than that received by any other province in Canada; $11 billion in the 1992–93 fiscal year. This will account for about 31 per cent of Quebec's total revenues. That also means that about $1,580 on a per capital basis is going to the province of Quebec, which is close to 25 per cent higher than the national average.

These transfer payments are a vital part of the programs for all of the provinces but particularly those which are not at the national average and therefore receive additional amounts beyond those of Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia.

In conclusion, let me add that this bill provides what I think is a fair and generous renewal of the equalization program, while at the same time maintaining fiscal responsibility in the total increase in spending by the federal government within the self-imposed constraint of 3 per cent that the government has set for itself for each of the next five years.

In addition, by facilitating the mutual administration of taxes between the federal and provincial governments, the tax measures will contribute to improving and simplifying our countries tax system as a whole.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the previous speaker for a fine presentation of a particular point of view.

In his remarks he made reference to a glitch in the calculation of the equalization payments and the Established Programs Financing resulting in a shortfall of revenue to the have-not provinces.

Could he explain what that glitch was and could he tell us how far back the shortfall went and the total amount it would have come to?

Mr. Reimer: I do not have the exact figures of the shortfall. I cannot put my hand on the exact numbers at the moment, but they will be retroactive to the have-not provinces, as I mentioned earlier. Therefore, part of the $400 million is to bring those people retroactively back up to where they should have been. Therefore, the total sum of money of a little over $400 million is made up in two parts. One is to solve part of that problem and the other is an additional $200 million to the have-not provinces to try and bring this program back on stream and to assist those who may have been suffering somewhat because of the way in which this program worked in the past.

Mr. Fisher: That pretty well answers the question. I understand the $200 million as making it up and the $200 million is the 1992-93 entitlement of the provinces but the other $200 million must represent more than one year of revenue which the provinces had not received but ordinarily would have been entitled to.

I guess we do not have an answer to how far back they were owed that money.

Mr. Reimer: I am sorry, I do not know how far back that goes. Just to illustrate, the tax base improvement of this $422 million is $212 million and the EPF equalization interaction part which would go on into the next year is $211 million. Therefore, we have $212 million in the tax improvement base and part of that is retroactive, and the $211 million totalling the $422 million.

I am sorry. We could get the figures for the member as to how far back that goes. I do not have them with me.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have an opportunity to participate in the debate on this bill, an act to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act.

I believe that this piece of legislation goes to the very core of what Canadians are debating in their own backyards, kitchens and coffee shops. It has to do with the arrangements going on right now between the national government and all of the provinces and the territories.

Quite frankly, I support the basic thrust of this bill because the objective of this bill is to make sure that those provinces that from time to time are less advantaged than others are supported through equalization payments so that national standards can be maintained in education and health care. To me that is really what this country is all about: a nation that can have national standards. A nation that can maintain national standards on health care and education is going to have a national will that will allow it to remain strong and vital.

The stronger we are in supporting these national standards, the more the possibility of people wanting to separate diminishes. There is so much talk going on today about whether we will we stay together.

It is important for people to understand that one of the things that has galvanized us as a country has been legislation like this that has allowed us to make sure that all regions of the country are treated the same.

Part of section 7, Tax Collection Agreements, reads:

> (1) Where a province imposes taxes on the incomes of individuals or corporations, or both, the Minister, with the approval of the Governor in Council, may on behalf of the Government of Canada enter into a tax collection agreement with the government of the province pursuant to which the Government of Canada will collect the provincial taxes on behalf of the province and will make payments to the province in respect of the taxes so collected in accordance with such terms and conditions as the agreement prescribes.

I think this is something that Canadians want. The Minister of State for Finance and Privatization said earlier today in the House that this will lead toward a simplification of the tax system. Canadians are crying out for a simplification of the tax system. They are crying out for a single tax system. The paper burden not only on the personal side but on the corporate side, especially for small and medium sized business, is reaching such proportions today that people are asking if there is some political will that can organize this.

Normally, I am very disturbed and distressed by this government's basic thrust of dismantling and giving everything away to the provinces, but on this particular issue I see a reversal of form for the government. I see it trying to consolidate the tax collecting in this country. I see it trying to orchestrate or organize a single tax. Quite frankly, if it manages this properly this would put tremendous pressure on each one of the premiers to come onside. Just think of the millions and millions of dollars that this would save in just tax collection.

The Minister of State for Finance and Privatization was talking with me earlier about the harmonization of just the one tax, the GST, in the province of Quebec. I would scrap the GST in a flash if I ever had the chance.

Some hon. members: And do what?

Mr. Mills: Do not bait me with "do what". There are many tax options and tax alternatives out there and I am not going to give you a pitch today on a single tax. There is a difference between single and flat. Under a single tax, we make sure the disadvantaged in our communities are looked after and we make sure in our latest discussion on a single tax that there was a $100,000 credit for small and medium sized business so that it would decrease the paper burden tremendously.

The point is that there are many options. The member has taken me off my train of thought.

The minister basically said to me that in the province of Quebec alone, just on the GST, through harmonization, there was an administration savings of $45 million. Just multiply that. I am sure it would be no less in the province of Ontario. Let us say that the rest of the provinces were equal to that. That is a possible $200 million, $150 million, $170 million savings by eliminating duplication of tax collection services.

This is precisely the kind of efficiency that Canadians want to see. This is a situation in which the national government, for once in the last few years, is not relinquishing an administrative procedure to the province, but it is consolidating and refining the tax collection system here at the national level. I think that particular aspect of Bill C-60 should be pursued more aggressively in committee to see if we can work with each other to put pressure on all the premiers to come onside with this kind of an approach. A single tax system for the entire nation would go a long way toward increasing productivity.

Why do I say productivity? People in this country feel right now with the basic tax system, with so many different layers of taxes from so many different levels of government, that they are being treated unfairly. We know that in many instances they are. Under a system like this, accountability would be a much easier exercise. When people feel they understand a system and can make their governments accountable, they tend to produce more. They tend to be more productive. That, of course, will help our entire economy.

The other thing I propose in this bill is the fact that we make sure certain minimal national standards are maintained. I am a little bit concerned that the exercise of monitoring national standards is slipping away from us. I am concerned that the federal presence in all of the provinces is not being exercised right now. In other words, I am getting a sense that the provincial presence is now basically overtaking the national presence, the federal presence. This eventually is going to lead to a breakdown in our system.

When we have a bill like this where basically the national government is controlling the transfers to the provinces and where many of these transfers are equalization transfers, I wonder if the government should consider having some kind of federal presence formula attached to the transfer. I will be very specific. Naturally, I am concerned about this because of what has gone on in the last week or so where our National Arts Centre orchestra cannot play O Canada in the province of Quebec. I cannot imagine a national orchestra, funded by the Canadian taxpayers, coming to Toronto and not being allowed to play the national anthem. It is beyond me.

The reason I am concerned about this federal presence so much is that I wonder if maybe it would not serve all of us a little better if all of the post-secondary schools and hospitals in Canada which are basically receiving through this fund transfers as part of the federal presence were required to put a Canadian flag in front of the hospital or school to remind people that we are part of a national government. We are part of a country where the whole is bigger than the sum of its parts. I know that we used to have a federal presence requirement when we transferred funds to the provinces. I am wondering if we should perhaps revisit that.

The rest of this bill is basically the maintenance of a formula that has been going on for many years. At a time like this when we are suffering from deep economic pain and money is short, obviously all of the provinces require more funds to maintain these national standards. We have to be practical here and realize that the government is dealing with a limited amount of resources and not be blind to the dilemma that the government has in terms of transferring to the provinces. The government should also be aware that because of this litany of cutbacks or the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan, et cetera, that even though it is transferring money to the provinces, there is still a lot of pain because of the lien on welfare funds and the general shortage due to the economic turndown. We really are going to have to work all of this through together.

All in all, I think that I have covered most of what I want to say here. I want to repeat what I said earlier to the member from Chambly, that I think the national government has a responsibility to communicate very clearly and precisely the amount of moneys being transferred to all provinces in this country, especially through equalization. It is through that awareness that our chances of staying together are going to be a lot better.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the member a very brief question. I heard him mention earlier that there was no difference between a single tax and a flat tax. I would like him to explain that to us, please.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, normally a flat tax system does not take into account those people in our society who are disadvantaged. It could be single mothers, families with children, charitable organizations or small businesses. Under the single tax we have made sure that there are very progressive tax credits to look after those people in our society and smaller corporations, whereas under a flat tax it is basically one rate with no credits.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I have a question along the same line as the question that was put by the hon. member. In view of what the minister interjected when the hon. member mentioned the GST, let me ask the hon. member this question.

What would his tax system do for this growing number of people in our society who according to Statistics Canada make over $250,000 a year, report it on their income tax and do not pay one penny of income tax? A lot of them claim the child tax credit which is designed for low and modest income people. What would his tax system do to correct what this government has been doing for these people?

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague from Gander—Grand Falls. As he and most members in this House know so well, we have a tax act today with close to 15,000 legal loopholes or tax preferences. Many of them are antiquated and no longer meet the objective that they were originally designed to meet. Under our single tax system, all of those tax preferences would be flushed out and everybody would be in the loop.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being two o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

SOCIAL WORK

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, last week, for the second year, the Canadian Association of Social Workers observed National Social Work Week. Social work is a profession with a long tradition of dedication to improving the welfare of Canadians, especially those with special needs. These days, social workers are employed by family service organizations, hospitals, schools and child protection services. Some work directly with individuals, families, groups and communities; others do social action or research, plan social policies and develop social programs.

The 12,500 members of the Canadian Association of Social Workers should be recognized for their contribution to improving our society.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, last Friday the U.S. commerce department's International Trade Commission handed down yet another ruling, declaring that Canadian softwood lumber exports to the United States are unfairly subsidized.

This ruling, which has resulted in a punitive action of 14.48 per cent duty on Canadian lumber imports, is totally unacceptable. The softwood lumber industry stands to lose some $440 million a year as well as thousands and thousands of jobs.

The Americans are not playing fairly. Canadians more than ever believe that the free trade agreement is a one-way street leading straight to the United States. This is an election year in the U.S. They are using protectionism for political gain. This is the third time in 10 years that the Americans have changed their definition of a subsidy only to suit their purposes.

Clearly, this is harassment and the Canadian government should retaliate by imposing an import tax on American products. This is a provocation that absolutely needs to be responded to.

CANADA-U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, today I join with all Canadians in expressing my disappointment in the unfair bully tactics of the U.S. government. Last Friday's announcement of a 14 per cent countervailing duty on our softwood lumber exports to the U.S. is a reflection of simple-minded political protectionism. This is completely unjustified and inappropriate in this difficult period of global economic restructuring. Fortunately for Canadians, we are able to turn to the dispute settlement mechanism of the free trade agreement for a just ruling.

I am equally disturbed by other unfair U.S. trading practices, such as the "Buy American" provision of the Surface Transportation Act. This act bars Canadian manufacturers from supplying construction materials to the U.S. for use in federally funded projects. It has had a detrimental effect on the cement and steel industries in my riding of Delta.

I encourage the Canadian government to take every step possible to ensure a level playing field for Canadian producers.

TOBACCO INDUSTRY

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, this morning we attended a demonstration of tobacco industry workers who came to denounce the special tax on exports of their products.

This discriminatory tax makes exports of their products uncompetitive and endangers hundreds of well-paid jobs, especially in Montreal and Quebec City. The factories concerned by these job losses are located in some of the poorest neighborhoods of our two cities, where unemployment is already over 20 per cent. We need measures to create jobs, not eliminate them.

Canada is the only country in the world to tax its products for export in this way, even though it has no import tax on tobacco products. This is an incentive for companies to produce outside our borders. This tax is wrong. It must be abolished immediately.

BOB DRAWARD

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay special tribute to a constituent of mine, Mr. Bob Draward of St. Clement's, Manitoba. He recently completed an 800 kilometre dog sled run to raise funds for the Manitoba division of the Canadian Cancer Society.

Mr. Draward was accompanied in the final leg of the trip by a young girl from Winnipeg, Marie-Josée, who is currently undergoing treatment for cancer.

The efforts of Canadians like Mr. Draward to raise funds for the Camps for Kids program and research projects is most needed and greatly appreciated.

On behalf of all Canadians, I would like to thank Mr. Draward and all the participants in the Mushing for Miracles dog sled run.

GASOLINE ADDITIVES

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, the federal government's announced intention to remove the excise tax on the ethanol portion of blended fuels is an important step in the development of this new industry, but additional action needs to be taken.

I recently toured the Poundmaker ethanol plant and feedlot operating at Lanagan, Saskatchewan, and I must say that I am impressed with the development of that industry in Canada. We have the ability to reduce our dependence on imported light crude, restore confidence in sustainable energy and agricultural economies and improve environmental quality.

Ethanol plants can be developed in various prairie communities such as Big River, Saskatchewan, in my constituency, but the industry needs a greater federal commitment, a commitment that includes greater promotion of ethanol blended fuels, a legislated mandatory 10 per cent blend for all automotive fuels and new start-up incentives for community development of grain fed production plants like the one in Lanagan.

The economy and the environment will benefit from ethanol-related development and I urge the government to continue what it has started, and to do so quickly.

U.S. UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, have you watched American television news lately?

I did last week, and what did I see? I saw story after story about unemployment, permanent lay-offs, plant closings and manufacturing jobs disappearing forever. No, they were not Canadian jobs. They were American jobs.

In fact, between June of last year and this past January, there were some 350,000 industrial, retail and service jobs lost in the United States. General Motors is laying off 74,000 American employees and closing 12 U.S. auto plants. IBM is reducing its American staff by 40,000 and 22,000 American jobs have disappeared at Pan-Am.

Could this be the result of free trade with Canada, the GST or cross-border shopping? What do you think?

WOMEN'S EQUITY

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, if women really counted for this government and if public policy promoted fairness and equity, our sons and daughters would be given equal opportunities.

Women would earn the same as men for doing the same type of job instead of the current 67.6 per cent, and the government would not refuse to meet its pay equity balance.

The face of poverty would not be female with many elderly women on tea and toast and mother-led families the poorest, occupying over half of the social housing in Canada.

Public policy is about choices. This government says it is cutting taxes, creating jobs and encouraging housing, yet since 1990, it axed co-op and cut social housing by 50 per cent, leaving 1 million in desperate need. It decreased by 1 per cent the personal income surtax, saving just 2 loonies per year for a one-earner, two-parent, two-children family making $15,000 while a single taxpayer with the same income saves $7. Big deal.

It has deep-sixed its child care program.

I find it hard to understand the choices this government makes, increasing interest rates by close to 1 per cent which ups mortgage costs and takes away up to $1.8 billion to service the debt. Instead, it could have reinstated social housing and introduced a national child care program, that basic building block for women's equity.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

HALTON—PEEL SURVEY

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, my constituents have been offering me some pretty good advice lately.

Jerry Horak of Burlington writes: "I would like to see changes to the Income Tax Act, to allow equal profit-sharing for spouses, even though only one is receiving income and the other is raising a family".

Philip Tyas of Bolton comments: "Too many people place responsibility on the 'government' for all their ills and blame it for all their own shortcomings. Too few people now believe they should take responsibility for their own welfare".

Ronald Champagne of Burlington writes: "We need to educate, motivate, make people feel good about who they are and what role they play in making our country the best in the world. When you feel good about yourself, you are more productive. Productivity drives the economy."

My constituents thank you for the ongoing opportunity to put their thoughts before Parliament.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I rise today in commemoration of International Women's Day to recognize and celebrate the achievements of women.

As we reflect upon the important contributions women have made to our society over the years, let us join together in an effort to continue our fight to eliminate violence and discrimination against women.

Canadian women, from Nellie McClung, a pioneer of the women's suffrage movement, to Dr. Roberta Bondar, Canada's first woman in space, have provided women with inspiration to achieve their goals and contribute their full potential to society. Yet, despite these accomplishments, we still have a long way to go. The statistics speak for themselves.

At least one in every 10 women is battered by her husband or male partner. Women earn 66 per cent of men's salaries and only 2 per cent of executives are women.

It is paramount that we continue to promote the equality of all women, not just on International Women's Day, but every day.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the U.S. commerce department has announced its preliminary ruling on Canadian softwood lumber. It is totally unfounded and unjustified. I can see no reason to hold an inquiry considering that softwood production is not subsidized in Canada or in Quebec.

• (1410)

Right now, the major American forest company Georgia Pacific Limited controls the U.S. commerce department and imposing a countervailing duty would only undermine President Bush's credibility in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, the viability of the forest industry in Abitibi must be preserved. We must fight this American action all the way and win for the sake of the Canadian and Quebec forest product producers.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, Friday's ruling by the U.S. commerce department that Canada unfairly subsidizes our softwood lumber exports is unfair and unjustified.

The allegation about B.C.'s log export restrictions are hypocritical since the U.S. does the same thing.

Canadians who work in the over 300 forestry-dominated communities in our country will be hurt by this decision. We cannot have a repeat of the 1986 Conservative sell-out of our forests which the Prime Minister said was good for Canada.

What Canadians realize from this is that the free trade agreement is not working and that we are facing an ongoing series of trade disputes. The decision on our softwood lumber means that a trade war has started over our forests and that people working in this industry cannot rest until the free trade agreement is scrapped and we get Canadian trade back on an even keel.

MONETARY POLICY

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, this government continues to pursue its inconsistent and devastating monetary policy. Not only does it have the effect of slowing down sales for Canadian exporters, but in February alone, this government had to spend $1.08 billion just to maintain it.

This government has the gall to describe as interference the Liberal policy to devalue the Canadian dollar. Maintaining our currency at an artificially high level as the Conservatives have been doing fits the definition of interference to a T. The only difference between the two is that the Conservative policy has cost us $1.08 billion in a single month on top of having a disastrous effect on our economy.

This government would be well advised to stand up for the Canadian exporters instead of defending such a harmful policy.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to express the outrage felt by all Canadians, and in particular British Columbians, over the recent U.S. decision to place a tariff on Canadian softwood lumber imports.

Unfortunately the decision has little to do with facts and reality, but has everything to do with the politics based on greed and hypocrisy of a few large U.S. lumber companies and the politicians acting on their behalf.

Our case in Canada is strong. We do not subsidize our forest industry. There may be some differences on how we regulate our industry, but that is our right. It is outrageous for the U.S. to try and bully a neighbour which has been its largest trading partner and closest ally since our two nations were founded.

So far we in Canada have acted properly, and we must continue to act strongly. We will win because we are in the right and because we have the free trade agreement. But we will not soon forget the shabby treatment we have received.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S WEEK

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, this weekend women in all parts of the world gathered together to celebrate the beginning of International Women's Week. This past December, for the first time, Canadians commemorated a national day for action on violence against women. At the Winter Olympics we celebrated as Kerrin Lee–Gartner won Canada's first–ever women's downhill gold medal.

International Women's Week is also a time to reflect on what needs to be done and examine our direction for the future. Bill C–26, the Public Service Act, will absolve the government of its employment equity obligations. The budget will deprive some of child benefits and others of justly–earned retroactive pay equity payments. Dissolving the Court Challenges Program infringes on the basic rights and freedoms of women.

Today we celebrate, but we must also continue to work to ensure equality for women across Canada and in all parts of the world.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, there is a strong allegation in my community and many others across the country that a tight money policy by our bankers is stifling economic recovery. A survey of small businesses in my community revealed that 50 per cent feel they are being dealt with unfairly. A more disturbing fact is that they are fearful of communicating with their banker for fear of repercussions. At my request, the vice–president of the Canadian Banker's Association was in Sault Ste. Marie. He stated that banks were low risk lenders, that financial policies are consistent across the country and that similar tight money complaints were heard in Fredericton, Saskatoon and Victoria. That does not rationalize the excess of profits, exorbitant credit card rates and outlandish service charge increases.

Is it acceptable that small business in Canada is fearful of the banking community?

I encourage all MPs to solicit feedback from the small businesses in their communities and report these findings to the local and national financial community.

Bank presidents are quick to advise governments. Perhaps our advice to them should be: "Loosen the purse strings or purse your lips."

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

TRADE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Prime Minister.

When I was in the United States, talking with President Bush and telling him that friendship is friendship and business is business, the Prime Minister, almost laughing, said that there was no point in getting tough with the Americans.

Yesterday after the Honda, the softwood and the magnesium cases, the Prime Minister started talking a little bit tougher.

It was the Prime Minister who gave us this trade deal. He said then that his good friends, the Americans, would never harass us the way they are doing today if we had that deal.

When will he put his money where his mouth is and do something to stop this trade harassment by the Americans?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition makes two statements that he attributes to me.

First he says that I said there was no point in getting tough with the Americans. That statement is false, completely and totally.

He then said that I said that the Americans would never harass us. That statement is false, totally and directly.

My friend is chuckling. He has just put on the floor of the House of Commons two false statements. He must withdraw those statements or corroborate them.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I will not withdraw anything. This trade deal has been managed by him and it is a disaster for Canadians today. It is only today that he is starting to talk a little bit tougher with the President. He should have done it two or three years ago but the only thing he could do at that time for the President of the United States was to sing him some Irish love songs.

Will the Prime Minister tell us what specific trade action this government is about to take against the Americans, action that will hurt them like these problems are hurting Canadians today.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make sure that I understand my hon. friend. He made two statements which I have said are false, which he imputes to me. He now says that he is not going to answer those, he is going to move on and refer to something else that has to do with the trade deal.

The hon. House leader will go out and check for those statements. He can check for a long time and he will not find them. My hon. friend clearly understands that there are $256 billion a year of bilateral trade going back and forth and obviously there are going to be disputes.

I have indicated in different circumstances and again recently that these particular disputes in regard to softwood lumber and Honda constitute vexatious harassment. They are not based in international trade law, they are based on pure politics at a lower level in the United States of America.

Fortunately, because of the free trade agreement, we now have a dispute settlement mechanism which no other country in the world has.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: I hear the yells coming from the socialists over there. I can tell you this is the only way this will be resolved. Some of the people from British Columbia representing the softwood lumber industry would be interested to know that the socialists are chuckling when they should be cheering the fact that the only way this will be resolved is through an independent dispute settlement mechanism. If it just depended on the American trade law, we would be dead as door nails. But we are going to win because we have the free trade agreement with an independent dispute settlement mechanism.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to repeat to the Prime Minister in French what he did not seem to understand in English. The three actions that the American government decided to take immediately affect Quebec industries like lumber, magnesium and auto parts. I would like the Prime Minister to tell me when he intends to take some action.

The Americans referred none of these problems to the arbitration tribunal which the Prime Minister has praised. The Americans have taken concrete action that hurts the Canadian economy. When will we take concrete action to hurt the American economy? That is what we want to know.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my friend may be right. Perhaps I misunderstood in English because I am not an expert linguist like my friend. Perhaps he is right; I might have misunderstood, in English or in French. However, I did understand that his statement was wrong in English as in French.

The answer is that if we have a problem now under the free trade treaty, there is an independent body or mechanism to solve it, whereas before we did not have that provision.

Nevertheless, the actions taken recently by the Americans are harassment, pure and simple, as far as we are concerned. On Sunday, in a conversation with the President, I protested on behalf of the Canadian government and we will take all appropriate action to win these two cases for Canadian industry.

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to raise a question with the Prime Minister.

In 1986 the Minister for International Trade, under this government, returned from the beaches of Hawaii and claimed a great victory in the signing of the agreement on softwood lumber.

The Prime Minister, and I will refer directly to Hansard at page 2364 of January 19, just to refresh his memory, said that it was a properly constituted deal and in the best interests of Canada. Well that so-called good deal was a monumental appeasement that sold out the lumber industry of this country.

Rather than whining about unnamed U.S. bureaucrats, will the Prime Minister finally learn from his mistakes? Will he give an assurance that this government will tell the President of the United States and the Congress they cannot dictate policies in Canadian natural resources? Will he also say very clearly that he will never again negotiate the kind of deal that this government negotiated that sold our rights and our sovereignty away for a price of pottage.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Sold our rights away for a price of pottage?

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): The free trade deal sold it away.

Mr. Mulroney: Oh, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says that we sold the rights away for the free trade deal.

An hon. member: That's right.

Mr. Mulroney: All right. Now is it the position of the Liberal Party that you would propose to revoke that deal?

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): No, we are going to renegotiate it.

Mr. Mulroney: Oh.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: This deal is so bad that we sold out our sovereignty, Mr. Speaker, but are they going to revoke it? No, they are going to renegotiate it.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, at least this party has the courage to say the deal is not working, that Canadians are suffering and that we are prepared to do something about it rather than standing with our paws in the air like this Prime Minister does. I wish the Prime Minister would stop saying bow-wow to the U.S. President every time he barks.

I want to ask the Prime Minister a specific question. Because of the mishandling of the lumber agreement, thousands of Canadian workers are bound to lose their jobs and hundreds of sawmills will close down. I am going to ask the Prime Minister this. Will this government now share the responsibility of paying the U.S. bond, paying the legal costs, so that we can protect Canadian workers, keep the sawmills open until we can get rid of this nefarious deal that this government signed?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I have already indicated, we are challenging this matter very vigorously. We fully expect to win because the action was initiated on behalf of lobby interests in the United States, on a basis that we consider, quite frankly, to be vexatious harassment. We fully expect that before an independent court of law, as took place during the pork dispute, Canada's rights will prevail.

My hon. friend asks with some great indignation and outrage whether we are going to do something about it. Are we going to have the courage to stand up and be counted? I will tell what we will not do. We will not follow the example of the Liberal Party when the gulf war was declared where they said: "We will stand up and fight. We will stand up and fight for Canada, but at the first shot that is fired, we are bringing the troops home.". That is appeasement, not what we are doing.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): My question is for the Prime Minister. Since the Canada–U.S. trade deal—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yukon has the floor.

Ms. McLaughlin: Since the Canada–U.S. trade deal came into effect, Canada has lost 400,000 jobs. The manufacturing sector has been devastated, the dollar has been at a very high level, much higher than when the trade deal was negotiated and trade relations with the United States, whether we are talking about Honda automobiles or softwood lumber, have never been worse. The softwood lumber tariff decision was the final kick in the teeth to Canadians. It is clear protests are simply not enough. My question is simple. Will the Prime Minister send a real message to the United States, withdraw from talks between Canada, the U.S. and Mexico and show that Canada will not be a part of bad trade deals?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): My hon. friend says that we have lost a substantial number of manufacturing jobs and she is quite right. We have lost these jobs during this recession when we had the free trade agreement. In 1981–82, without the free trade agreement, we lost approximately twice the number of jobs.

Mr. Martin: But not permanent.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend says "But not permanent.". We just lost the jobs, they were not permanent. The argument could then be made that because of the free trade agreement, we have lost fewer jobs today than were lost in 1981–82.

Trade has increased, even though we have been in a recession. Trade with the United States has increased by $35 billion approximately since 1988. It is going the right way. We have secured something that most other nations would give their eye teeth for; a dispute settlement mechanism in the trade involved with our greatest trading partner. This is a major acquisition. It has served Canada well and its absence would cause us enormous damage.

We think there are good parts and there are some that are less good in any arrangement. We believe that on balance this is a major advance for Canada and we propose to proceed to live with it, to strengthen it and to improve it.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): The Prime Minister says this has been a good deal for Canadians. I believe he should talk to the 1.5 million unemployed Canadians. He should talk to the many women who have lost their jobs because of those sectors being affected by this trade deal. He should talk to those businesses that have gone bankrupt in Canada.

Last week we learned that the Financial Post has seen a copy of the bracketed trade agreement with Mexico. We know that the Canada–U.S. trade deal is a bad deal for Canada. Why will the Prime Minister not send a real message to Mexico and say we are pulling out of those talks until Canada can get a good deal in trade talks?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): This is interesting. Here you have a socialist party that lectures everybody else in Canada on questions of morality and helping Third World countries with developing economies. We have an opportunity here to assist a developing country, provide for 85 million citizens, not through aid, but through trade, an exchange of technology. Liberalizing trade has always been the surest way to lift countries out of economic difficulty and out of poverty, to give them an opportunity to trade into industrialized markets. The NDP is saying: "Cut off developing countries like Mexico, don't do business with them". And why? Because they are poorer than we are, because their wage rates are lower than ours.

What we are saying is we are going to open both our hearts and our doors in reasonable and thoughtful ways to enhance trade. By lowering barriers we create new wealth on both sides of the border, because we want Mexico and we want the other developing countries to have a greater share of industrialized prosperity and not less.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

Yesterday in Montreal, a Mexican labour leader said that working conditions for Mexican women employed in the maquiladoras were "inhuman".

Today the Prime Minister said it was in the interests of the people of Mexico to sign this free trade agreement. I have the following question for the Prime Minister: Is he sure that the standard of living of Mexicans will improve and that their salaries will increase now that he knows that the situation in Mexico is disastrous, especially where women are concerned? Will his government defend the women of Mexico and the women of Canada during International Women's Week and ensure that the free trade agreements will be fair to women and to the rest of Canada? I think the Prime Minister is not convinced the agreement will be a good thing for Mexican women.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, how blatantly paternalistic can you get? Why don't we let the people of Mexico make their own decisions? Why don't we let them decide whether they want to negociate with the United States and Canada to become more prosperous and help Mexican women and their families take advantage of North American technology and resources?

Would the hon. member have had Europe exclude countries like Spain and Portugal, just because they were less prosperous? According to the hon. member's rules, the women of Portugal and Spain would have had no access to the rich markets of Europe. Nevertheless, the Europeans expanded their market to a total membership of 12, including Spain and Portugal.

As a result, these countries have substantially improved their standard of living. That is how it works. By eliminating tariff barriers and asking poorer countries to join, we make them more prosperous, and that is what we want. We want to help developing countries.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

On February 28 the minister said in the House: "It is my responsibility and my duty to ensure that the laws and the policy of the Government of Canada conform to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms".

I ask the minister: How can she possibly justify staying silent while the government plans to overrule the Human Rights Commission on such a fundamental human right as equal pay for women?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, we did not plan to override the human rights tribunal. There was a disagreement on the interpretation of some documents that were requested from us.

For a period of five years we worked with the unions to establish our position, at the end of which we did put forward a massive amount of money to make up for pay equity. These documents were acquired or established with the understanding that they will be kept confidential. We asked the court to pass judgment on that and we intend to respect its decision.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the minister responsible for protecting the Charter of Rights and Freedoms for all Canadians.

The minister knows very well the shameful poverty among Canadian women precisely because of the kind of discrimination the government intends to perpetuate and the President of Treasury Board has indicated that it intends to perpetuate. Some 75,000 women are owed up to $1 billion by the government. Many are poor, will remain poor, will grow old poor, and will die poor.

Will the minister say now that it is wrong to deprive the government's own employees of money they have earned?

As defender of the charter, will the minister demand that they get what the Human Rights Commission says they are entitled to? Will she stop this economic abuse?

[Translation]

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. member does not take her own rhetoric seriously. We had a lot of catching up to do, $317 million worth, because the Liberals didn't do their job when they were in power. This government had to clean up the mess. Where were you all that time? We have paid $317 million, and we will continue to pay out $80 million annually for the sake of a cause that is vitally important: wage parity.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

International Women's Day provided women across this country with very little to cheer about. Canadian women are quickly discovering that they were abandoned in the latest budget. There will never be a national day care program as long as this government continues in power. There will never be adequate help for working families. There will never be enough support for the 3.5 million women and families who live off meagre assistance programs.

Could the Prime Minister explain why the government chose this budget to abandon Canadian families?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, I want to give this House the assurance that, as a government, we never gave up our concept of a national day care program. We feel this is an important issue. In the last budget, we had to set a number of priorities, and that is why we decided to help those children, women and families who are most in need. The proposals in our last budget are an accurate reflection of the government's concern for helping needy families, including women who are single parents and children who really need help.

[English]

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister.

Two weeks ago the minister of health stated that the national day care program was being abandoned because the government wanted to help abused and hungry children. Yet for the past seven years this government has cut back on every support for these same abandoned and hungry children, including transfer payments under the Canada Assistance Plan, health care and, now in this most recent budget, family allowances.

How can the Prime Minister possibly argue that throwing out day care will in any way help the one million poor children his government already abandoned months and years ago?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, I repeat, we never gave up our concept of day care. The measures we have put in place are fairer, more equitable and more generous to deal with a need we were able to substantiate as a result of our consultations and in line with recommendations contained in certain reports—the need to keep supporting women who need help.

As part of the special measures we have put in place, we are also able to provide support for day care. For instance, in the last budget the $1,000 deduction for day care was increased to $5,000 per child under seven and to $3,000 for children between the ages of seven and fourteen. These measures do not provide direct funding but they do help families with young children who need assistance. And that is what we are trying to achieve by improving the economy of this country.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, the official report which I have here of the finance minister shows the government last month spent $1.1 billion in taxpayers' money to push up the value of the Canadian dollar. Now the Bank of Canada is trying to do the same thing through high interest rates, up three-quarters of a per cent in the prime rate, severely damaging consumer confidence, exports and economic recovery.

When is the Minister of Finance going to change this insane policy, or is this simply proof that those who say there is a secret understanding in the free trade deal to keep the dollar high are absolutely correct?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is aware that the Bank of Canada intervenes on behalf of the Government of Canada to smooth out any erratic fluctuations in order to maintain an orderly and stable market.

I remind the hon. member that monetary conditions have eased dramatically over the last 18 months both on the interest rate side, almost 7 per cent, and on the exchange rate side by more than five cents. Both these conditions provide for economic activity and provide the opportunities for businesses to be more competitive in the international marketplace.

Given the fact that the fundamentals are right, I believe that we can expect this kind of moderation can continue. Obviously there are times when there is certain volatility in the financial markets. We are going through that now, but I think the hon. member will agree that the policy of the government, the Bank of Canada, is indeed sound.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister on the softwood lumber tariff.

Friday's ruling by the U.S. commerce department that Canada unfairly subsidizes our softwood lumber exports is unfair and unjustified. The allegations about B.C. log export restrictions are hypocritical. Just because a province wants to pursue a policy that keeps jobs at home is no reason to apply this tariff. Washington state does it, Oregon state does it, and Washington D.C. approves it.

Why punish B.C. and Canada?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I have to agree with the hon. member that the American case is ridiculous. He has put his finger on one of the more ridiculous aspects of it.

Raw lumber exports have been treated in a silly way by the American decision. This affects other provinces, not just British Columbia. They export raw logs themselves.

There is no doubt in my mind, as the Prime Minister has made very clear, that this is vexatious harassment. In fact when we take this to an instrument we have never had before until we had the free trade agreement, the dispute settlement mechanism, we will win and we will win for reasons the hon. member educes as well as many others.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the United States customs service has ruled that Canadian built Honda automobiles do not meet the North American content requirements of the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

The agreement which was intended to liberalize trade between the two countries is now being manipulated by the United States government to harass, and I use the Prime Minister's own phrase: "to harass foreign investment in Canada".

Since the agreement is evidently open to manipulation by the United States, what does the government now intend to do to ensure the secure access to the American market which was its original justification?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I will remind my hon. friend that in fact the Americans seem to be doing this sort of thing to all sorts of countries, not just to us.

In this particular case, the determination by the customs officials in the U.S. is totally unacceptable to us. We have many allies on this issue not just in the provinces across Canada but in the U.S. as well. We are in a situation whereby we can continue to fight this vigorously. We have already indicated that we are going to pursue our rights under section 18. We have had meetings. Officials on both sides of the border have been meeting. We actually had a very productive meeting last week, and this week we will be pursuing it further.

If we do not reach a satisfactory understanding we will continue to pursue our rights, even to go so far as to evoke the bi-national panel.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the minister claims that Canadian exporters can have recourse to dispute settlement mechanisms but he knows that they are both time consuming and costly. Further, in the case of the section 18 of the agreement which he mentions, decisions are not binding.

The question remains: How does the government intend to address the fundamental problems with the free trade agreement such as the ill-defined rules of origin and the continuing absence of any definition of subsidies? Does it intend to reopen the free trade agreement, or does it believe that it can somehow resolve these and other problems in the context of the North American free trade agreement which it is now negotiating?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, generally on this issue the hon. member's party is taking the position that GATT dispute mechanisms should settle all problems of this sort.

In fact GATT in many cases is not binding at all. It has moral suasion but it is not binding at all compared to the free trade agreement bi-national panel. Under section 18 the binding quality is far different from any GATT resolution.

Also, the time it takes through GATT to settle these issues can be not just months but years, whereas under the free trade agreement there is a set number of days, some 300-odd days when the decision has to begin and end.

There is no doubt that if you have this kind of dispute with the United States of America, it is a tremendously new, positive thing to have a dispute settlement mechanism which we did not have before the free trade agreement.

TOBACCO INDUSTRY

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The export tax on tobacco will neither keep people from smoking nor prevent smuggling. The danger with this tax increases with its use. This tax will only have one real impact, and that is to export our jobs to the United States.

The Prime Minister claims that he talks tough to President Bush. Will he talk tough to his minister for national revenue? Will he tell him to withdraw that tax immediately? There are 4,000 Canadian jobs at stake.

[English]

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I find it very interesting that the critic on the environment would take this position when the Liberal Party's critic on health said on February 13, the day after the anti-smuggling announcement: "For the sake of health and business, hurrah for yesterday's proposed new $1 per package export tax on Canadian cigarettes". Hurrah as well, for high fines for smugglers. Hurrah for the government.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, this export tax on tobacco is not a contraband issue. It is not a health issue. It is an economic issue, a job issue.

This tax will result in even more cigarettes being smuggled into Canada, American cigarettes. One major Canadian processor is withdrawing from purchasing supplies here in Canada. This will cause massive job lay-offs within the industry.

Canadian growers plant their seedlings later this month. They need to know if the industry will survive.

Will this minister assure this House today that he will scrap this devastating export tax?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that he had the guts to stand up after I just read what the health critic of his own party stated.

I can also tell him that the Non-Smokers' Rights Association today came out with a press release categorically supporting the moves of this government and supporting the Liberal health critic by the way. It was supporting the actions of this government on the export tax.

The export tax is not there against Canadian workers. It is not there against legitimate Canadian exports of tobacco products. It is there as a broader package against the smuggling of cigarette products back into Canada. If we put a dent into smuggling, we will not only protect the jobs of Canadian retailers and wholesalers in the industry but in fact we will be in a position to protect and create some more jobs for Canadians.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

In 1985 the Prime Minister categorically rejected Canadian government participation in the U.S. strategic defence initiative or star wars. Apparently star wars is now back on the Prime Minister's desk under the beguiling name Global Protection Against Limited Strikes or GPALS.

Will the Prime Minister agree that this project is in violation of Canadian policy expressed at the UN, is in violation of the anti-ballistic missile treaty of 1972 and is a complete contradiction to the findings of a committee of this House? Will the Prime Minister assure the House that not $1 of Canadian public money will be spent on this boondoggle?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend would agree the threat to the proliferation of nuclear missiles has certainly been a great concern to members of this House and all Canadians. We are obviously also concerned about ballistic missile defence.

The project that my hon. colleague refers to is very different from the SDI referred to in the mid-1980s.

We have made no decision about participation. I think it would be wise, obviously, to get more information and to be involved in consultations in order to ensure that if anything does happen it would be done within the legal and the policy confines of our government and other governments as well.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, it is already very clear from public information, as the minister will know, that it is in violation of the anti-ballistic missile treaty and involves the abandonment of that treaty.

In 1985 before the government got involved and made the policy decision it made, there was a full public joint committee that toured this country and heard from the public. That was before a decision was made. That committee recommended no to star wars.

Will the minister commit the government before any Canadian involvement in this project takes place that there will be a similar public parliamentary review of this project?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I am sure my hon. colleague is aware that even in the U.S. Congress they have passed laws that provide very strict limitations in the context of any program.

We are not talking about the star wars program at all. It is far too early. There have not been any discussions. I think it would be wise just to get more information about what may be proposed, Canada along with other countries around the world, to determine whether or not it is a program in which we might even wish to enter into any further longer term discussions.

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

In the minister's budget he said that we will sell surplus lands at Downsview. Following the budget speech, neither the Treasury Board officials who administer federal government lands nor the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation officials who own some but not all of the government lands at Downsview, nor the minister's own officials knew what lands the minister was referring to.

Does the minister know? If he does, will he tell us?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to be able to inform my colleague that for clarification, the 50 hectares of land which are under the jurisdiction of CMHC are certainly not slated for any other treatment than to be used for the development of housing.

As a matter of fact, with the sale that is taking place from Boeing to Bombardier, we are trying to effect a right of way for a collector road. Treasury Board and other officials of my department are trying to enhance the pace of development for these lands.

FORESTRY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

The Abitibi-Témiscamingue area is one of the great forest regions in Canada. The forest exporters will have to deposit bonds equivalent to the temporary countervailing duty of 14.48 per cent, which will represent an additional cost for Canadian and Quebec companies.

Is the minister prepared, along with the provinces and the forest industry, to face "general" Bush and his forest soldiers in order to win the fight for Canadian forest workers?

[English]

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): I would like to thank my hon. friend for a very thoughtful question. He raises a very important point.

The rates of subsidy that are alleged by the United States vary enormously from province to province with a particular unfairness when it comes to its application to his constituency.

Let us look at the facts. We have only had the second of four determinations from the United States. The department of commerce will make its final determination of subsidy by May 19. Following that we will have access to the dispute settlement mechanism under the free trade agreement which we will vigorously pursue.

I would remind him as well that we strongly object to the way the department of commerce conducted this case and we will continue to make that point.

PETRO-CANADA

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources stated in a press release last week, following a statement by William Hopper of Petro-Canada that if a new partner is not found within 60 days then Hibernia will be moth-balled.

If it is so committed to Hibernia, then why did the Government of Canada through its appointments to the board of directors approve a drilling program for Petro-Canada for this year of wells to be drilled in Vietnam and the Mekong delta; in Columbia, the home of the drug lords; in Myanmar, the kingdom of corrupt government?

Will this minister now tell Mr. Hopper to hop to it, cancel those foreign investments and to spend our taxpayers' dollars in Canada? Then we would not need another partner in Hibernia.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, first of all I will try to answer that question.

I know it is within the jurisdiction of CIDA because what the hon. member is talking about is the former Petroleum Canada International Assistance Corporation, PCIAC. It had a $50 million budget which was administered by Petro-Canada. It was through that budget that Petro-Canada was making various investments in various places around the world, some of which he mentioned. PCIAC was wound up not by this last budget but the previous-to-last budget and it was put into the CIDA account at that time.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada presently owns 80.5 per cent of Petro-Canada and has appointed every single member to the board of directors of Petro-Canada.

Not only did the government approve a Petro-Canada deal with that cruel military dictatorship in Myanmar, but this government also approved through the board of directors—they knew about it—a $6 million so-called signing bonus to be paid to these military dictators.

Why did the government allow the deal to be signed in the first place, and then the $6 million to be used as a 100 per cent deduction as a business expense on the income tax return of Petro–Canada, when everybody knows all it was was a bribe?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think this issue came up once before. In fact, if I recall the last time it came up in the House it related to Canada's international policy.

From what I know as Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, first I say to the member that in a number of the allegations he makes he possibly should be somewhat careful as to what he says.

Second, I would point out to him that yes, Petro–Canada does operate in the marketplace as a company within that discipline. I have been concerned in terms of this relationship where, on the one hand, though I am very willing to take my responsibilities as energy minister, and yet Petro–Canada through the privatization is now found in another jurisdiction, the fact of the matter is that with Petro–Canada we have allowed it to operate at arm's length.

I am not pleased when the chairman of Petro–Canada makes those kinds of comments about Hibernia and I have rebuked him publicly. I frankly do not like some of the manner in which Petro–Canada operates.

In terms of the money that the hon. member mentions, I have checked as I promised I would and there was $6 million that went from Petro–Canada to Myanmar Oil which is owned by the government of that country.

I am not particularly pleased that there are all types of these kinds of arrangements made not only with Petro–Canada and the oil industry internationally but also a number of other industrial organizations as well.

I am not trying to duck the responsibility but if the hon. member wants more information I do think he should ask Petro–Canada specifically as to why and to what policy it is really directing itself when it made those deals.

ATLANTIC FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister, who will know that foreign overfishing off Canada's east coast is and has been characterized as an international scandal. The fishermen know that who are now without jobs; the plant workers know it; last night on national radio conservationists and environmentalists from all over the world said so. They said the government ought to have acted on it long ago.

I want to ask the Prime Minister, because people down east particularly want to know where he stands on this issue: When is the government finally going to admit that the sweet talk on this one, the diplomacy, is not working? He knows that. Would he now move to take over custodial management of the transboundary fish stocks down there?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I met last week with Premier Wells and I am meeting in a few days with Mr. Cashin with whom I have spoken, so as to co–ordinate all activities, provincial and federal, in regard to how we can deal with this very serious problem.

It is not easy because as my hon. friend knows much of the problem is caused by the fact that foreign overfishing is taking place immediately outside the 200–mile zone. Therefore, while they are technically legal, they are offending the principle because fishing at that spot, across that barrier, continues to undermine the stock and ultimately destroys the resource.

I have had conservations as late as last evening with the Prime Minister of Italy on behalf of his European obligations. I have discussed it with Premier Wells as to the manner in which this can be raised as a very serious environmental issue at the Rio conference.

The minister of fisheries and I have examined a proposal of some seven or eight items that we are considering with the Government of Newfoundland and others. We view it as an extremely serious matter that affects the people of Newfoundland and Labrador in a most unfair way. We are going to act strongly and vigorously and I would be grateful for any ideas or suggestions or help the hon. member might be able to provide the government.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, there are those who would disagree with him that it is legal even from a technical standpoint. NAFO gave this government, years ago, the option of taking over custodial management, but it is good to hear that the Prime Minister is focusing on the issue. He will know that Canadian fishermen have had enough on this one and they have given notice that they intend to confront those pirates, the Spanish and the Portuguese, out there on the high seas with the tacit blessing of the minister of fisheries.

I want to ask the Prime Minister this. Why is the government just standing by and allowing the fishermen to go out and fight their battle alone? Would he not agree that it would be much more productive and in line with his new-found support for this cause if he were to provide some Canadian ships that go out there and accompany the trawler protest? Or is this another case of letting others do the government's dirty work for it?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we are not engaging in any dirty work and we are not asking anybody to engage in any dirty work on behalf of Canada. We are a country that does not engage in dirty work nor do we encourage it.

We are a country that lives by international law and demands respect of international law by others, including the Europeans who are contributing to the destruction of an important national resource off the coasts of Newfoundland and Labrador by their deliberate and wilful acts. We are in the process of persuading them of the self-delusion of which they are capable by their very acts and the ultimate destruction of this great resource which will harm them and harm everybody in Newfoundland and Labrador.

We are pursuing this. The minister of fisheries is pursuing this vigorously in a dozen different ways. Many of them lack the drama of dispatching the navy or military instruments out there. It lacks that drama, but it retains a great sense of reasonableness and force and effectiveness on behalf of the people of Canada.

We will only resolve this important question by deploying all of the resources of the government and the people of Canada in defence of the interests of Newfoundland and Labrador. However, this does not include, and never has, the dispatching of military force against our allies while they are operating outside of the 200-mile zone.

We believe that good sense will prevail and that the programs we have in force and the activity we are going to engender will prevail on behalf of the fishermen and the people of Newfoundland and Labrador.

PRIVILEGE

STANDING COMMITTEE ON EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND INTERNATIONAL TRADE

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I initiated this question of privilege on January 22 of this year, which was the earliest opportunity that I could do so following receipt of correspondence from Mr. Douglas Rutherford, the associate deputy minister of justice.

The Table at that time suggested that it was appropriate first to seek the tabling of U.S. justice department correspondence by the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade.

On February 25 of this year, the chair, the Hon. John Bosley, wrote back advising that there was no direct reference to the letter in the minutes for the purpose of tabling. However, the contents of that letter were referred to on page 1325 of the October 29, 1991 committee hearing.

I believe I can demonstrate, Mr. Speaker, that there is a prima facie case of a senior public servant knowingly misleading a member of this House. This is a most serious contempt of Parliament and cannot go unchallenged.

The associate deputy minister of the litigation section, Mr. Douglas Rutherford, was a witness before the external affairs and international trade committee on October 29 where he gave evidence on the extradition of Leonard Peltier from Canada to the United States. Mr. Rutherford, following adjournment, advised me that he had in his possession the U.S. justice department response regarding the Peltier extradition matter that was referred to in a letter between Judge Heaney of the U.S. Court of Appeal and Senator Inouye from Hawaii. He produced a file and held the file to allow me to read the letter. In fact, Mr. Rutherford turned the pages to allow me to complete reading the letter. It was a recently dated and signed document from the U.S. department of justice.

Unknown to me, Mr. Rutherford had no legal authority whatsoever to reveal the privileged contents of the letter. In fact, in his November 1, 1991 letter to the U.S. department of justice he requested consent for disclosure three days after having disclosed it to me in the committee room, 269 West Block. He in fact offered up a mechanism to block the release of the document on the Canadian side if the U.S. government wanted that done.

The prima facie basis of the case are the following in point form. First, I saw the letter and read both pages and can identify it. Second, I saw the date and signature. Third, the associate deputy minister, Mr. Rutherford, permitted me to read the letter and then denied that he had done so in writing. Fourth, Mr. Rutherford then suggests: "Had you been able to read the actual letter" suggesting that perhaps I, as a member of the House, had done something untoward or possibly illegal about my access to that letter. Fifth, the fact is Mr. Rutherford disclosed material for which he did not have disclosure authority and subsequently made false statements and attempted to cover that up. He was in violation of both ethical and legal authorities.

He therefore chose to deliberately mislead a member of the House in an attempt to sanitize his own improper, unethical and illegal activity.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I have listened. The hon. member has given me some indication of the line of argument that he was going to take and I have listened carefully. I do not think that the hon. member needs to pursue it further at the moment.

I have to say to the hon. member that there are other avenues available to him which he may decide to use. One of them of course is to take further steps within the committee.

I am not persuaded at the moment that there is a prima facie case of privilege. There may be a matter in which the hon. member takes very strong exception and that matter might be pursued further, but I have to advise the hon. member that certainly at the moment there is not a prima facie case and I would ask him to accept that, as I know he will.

There may be further developments in the matter and if there are, I would be prepared to hear them further.

THE COMMONWEALTH

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House to invite all Canadians to celebrate their membership in the Commonwealth. Canadians can take pride today in the accomplishments of this dynamic institution.

The Commonwealth is very diverse in composition yet it is united by a common heritage and common values. This community and diversity is the Commonwealth's greatest strength. It is now a family of countries grown from common roots to include more than one-quarter of the world's population, over 1.3 billion people on five continents.

[Translation]

In the last 12 months, the Commonwealth has redefined its role and its direction. At the meeting of the heads of Commonwealth governments in Harare last October, we reaffirmed our commitment to the principles of peace and order, personal freedom provided for in the act, recognition of racial equality, and closing of the gap between the rich and the poor. More importantly, the heads of governments have made sta- tements in Harare that express a new set of objectives, values and priority strategies for the Commonwealth of the 1990s and the beginning of the next century. Prime Minister Mulroney, who was a member of the high level task force, made a very useful contribution to the drafting of the text of the declaration and emphasized the important contribution of this stable democratic group at a time when many countries are turning to democracy.

[English]

The renewed Commonwealth is dedicated to the protection and promotion of the fundamental human values important to Canadians and to citizens of the Commonwealth; good governance, democracy, fundamental human rights and women's equality.

One important facet of the Commonwealth has not changed. The vigour and relevance of the Commonwealth springs from its pragmatic approaches and from its grassroot ties. The Commonwealth nurtures links between our societies, establishes people-to-people contacts in a vast international network of professional, cultural and sports organizations. These organizations constitute the backbone of the Commonwealth and ensure its continuing vitality. Members know that these organizations reach into this very Chamber in the form of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association which, per the Harare declaration, should play its full part in promoting the objectives of good governance, democratic development and the promotion of human rights and women's equality in a spirit of co-operation and mutual support.

[Translation]

The capacity of the Commonwealth to establish links between different nations is a living symbol of international co-operation, as well as an example for other international organizations. Canada was honoured by the fact that the Secretary of State for External Affairs presided the meeting of ministers for external affairs when they met in New Delhi last September, at which time they recommended the gradual lifting of the sanctions taken against South Africa. The following month in Harare, the heads of governments followed up on this recommendation and lifted the sanctions that directly affected the population. Canada is pleased to see the progress accomplished so far toward a reform in South Africa and it will continue to promote the negotiation process between the South African government and the other groups.

[English]

The Commonwealth continues to be one of Canada's most important windows on the world. We want to ensure that it not only continues as a force for peace, human rights and development, but also becomes a model and a catalyst for new forms of international co-operation in the 1990s and beyond. As the new century approaches, we should all remember that one of the many advantages of the Commonwealth lies in its ability to spark friendly, open and fruitful dialogue.

Today we celebrate the Commonwealth in the knowledge that Canada is not alone as it faces the global challenges of the future. We are among family.

[Translation]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to join with the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs in asking all Canadians to celebrate Commonwealth Day, which marks their membership in the Commonwealth. Of course we believe that the Commonwealth is a very attractive international organization for Canada and the whole world.

[English]

The Secretary of State pointed out in his remarks, and it was an appropriate time, that the Commonwealth like every other international body is going through a period of re-evaluation, review of the future directions and missions. Certainly we were all supportive of the statements at Harare in setting out new goals and values and purposes. It would be less than honest if we did not begin to raise the question of what has happened since. Where is the beef? What is happening in the Commonwealth and what is happening to Canada's commitment to it?

I suppose there is no more profound way of indicating a government's commitment to a project or a program or an organization than where it puts its money. It is interesting that in the estimates tabled some 10 days ago, there is a substantial reduction in the Government of Canada's commitment to the Secretariat of the Commonwealth.

I recognize that all organizations must tighten their belts accordingly, but one has to measure this belt tightening and the reduced commitment of the Canadian government to the Commonwealth against the increased needs that many of the Commonwealth countries are facing, indeed that the Commonwealth organization should be supplying. There was one lesson to be drawn out of the Harare declaration.

• (1520)

The Commonwealth must now begin to target specifically a number of key areas of support in the development of democratic governments and in the promotion of human rights.

I was dismayed in reading a report from Amnesty International just last week pointing out the frequent incidents of forceful abuse of women by governments—torture, rape, interment—included among its several Commonwealth countries.

We, as a member of the Commonwealth, have been less than active in bringing that very serious and very specific issue to the forefront. Perhaps it was most clearly demonstrated in the events in Kenya in the past three or four weeks when the leader of the opposition, one of the outstanding women in the Commonwealth organization, was beaten, tortured, put in prison and only finally let loose after there was some protest.

It does demonstrate clearly that the Harare declaration has a long way to go before it becomes reality. It would seem to me that the responsibility of Canada in many of these cases, as the secretary himself stated, is to put forward the equality of women, to use one example, as a priority for discussion within Commonwealth circles to see how we can begin to respond to that very serious issue.

I think Amnesty International is not an organization known for excesses in its assessment or analysis. Here is an area in which we can do some very specific good. It may not be as dramatic as fighting apartheid was back in the days when that scourge was on the world stage and which is now we ameliorating, we believe.

Certainly as we move into a period in which more and more people at the grassroots are reaching out to build a new foundation of human rights and democratic institutions, there is a crying need for us to support them. That is purely, if you want to put it in the crassest terms, enlightened self-interest.

The more democracies there are, the less trouble we will have in the world. There will be fewer possibilities of invasion, transgression, conquest and forcible use of arms. It is a good investment.

I know I do not have much time to respond to the hon. minister's statement, but for all the reasons that were enunciated in the original statement about the value of the Commonwealth, its history, its experience, its ability to bring countries together from diverse cultures and diverse regional areas, now is the time to be giving it a new set of activities, a new set of missions.

It is not the time for grand declarations of heads of state at photo opportunities once a year, but rather the time for using the Commonwealth to bring to the fore very specific initiatives, such as the kind I mentioned. There can be many others.

I say to the members of the government that it would be valuable to our Commonwealth partners if Canada became a far more active advocate on the world stage as we go to G-7, OECD or IMF meetings to tackle the problem of Third World debt, which is crippling many of our Commonwealth nations and bringing them to their needs.

I might point out that because of the austerity measures being imposed by international financial institutions, the victims again are women, children, schools. Again, we are not on the forefront. We have not taken leadership at the IMF or the G-7 saying: "Do something about it".

The most important way we can celebrate Commonwealth Day is to give the Commonwealth organization something real, valuable and meaningful to do. Members of the Commonwealth look to this country to take that initiative.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I too am pleased to rise today on the occasion of Commonwealth Day to recognize the challenges that face us as a nation and that face the Commonwealth at this very important time in global history.

Today we in Canada join with some 49 other countries in the Commonwealth in marking Commonwealth Day. Many of us were particularly pleased that in 1990 the 50th member state of the Commonwealth, the free nation of Namibia, joined the Commonwealth.

I think it fair to say today that perhaps more than ever before people within the Commonwealth, leaders within the Commonwealth, are questioning the direction, the focus and the objectives of the Commonwealth itself.

Just today at a luncheon hosted by the Speaker with High Commissioners from the Commonwealth, Senators, members of this House, we heard from the Dean of the Commonwealth High Commissioners, the High Commissioner of Ghana, who spoke eloquently about the particular challenge that faces the people of the Commonwealth, the challenge of grinding poverty and injustice that faces too many of our member nations.

At the most recent conference of heads of government of Commonwealth, which was held last fall in Harare, Zimbabwe, leaders of the Commonwealth had an opportunity to clearly state their commitment to fundamental human rights, to a serious implementation of those principles.

A special working body headed by Flora MacDonald stated that the Commonwealth's record with respect to human rights has, in many instances, left a great deal to be desired. Despite a clear challenge by the working party headed by Flora MacDonald, the Commonwealth did not respond. Instead, the closing declaration of the Commonwealth in Harare was, in the words of Flora MacDonald, full of pious words that were inadequate to deal with the flagrant abuses that take place in Commonwealth countries.

Let us be clear when we talk about human rights. We are speaking of traditional civil and political rights, rights which are brutally suppressed in too many member nations of the Commonwealth. We are also speaking of economic, social and cultural rights. It is here where there are great challenges remaining. The fact is that while Canada on the one hand supports a clear commitment to democracy, to the rule of law, to freedom of speech and freedom of association, too frequently Canada within the World Bank, within the IMF, also supports policies of structural adjustment which increase the gap between rich and poor.

Surely as Canadians we recognize that the right to decent health care, housing, a proper diet are just as fundamental, just as important, as the right to the traditional civil and political rights.

As the very distinguished Canadian scholar Frank Scott has pointed out, the trappings of democracy hang loosely on an emaciated body politic. It is essential that our government play a leadership role within the Commonwealth in ensuring that the Commonwealth means business when it comes to human rights, that there is a mechanism for implementation

Particularly in this year of the international conference on the environment in Rio de Janiero in June, we must recognize that human rights must include the right to a clean and sustainable environment as well.

I recently returned from travelling in a number of Commonwealth countries such as Sri Lanka, India, Malaysia and I very much regret that in each of those countries there are serious human rights abuses that continue.

In the context of Malaysia, for example, repressive security laws are in existence. As well, we know that the right to protection of the environment, the rain forest in Sarawak, is being devastated and the very survival of indigenous peoples, particularly the Penan Indians, is at stake.

I think it is time that while we recognize the contribution the Commonwealth has made, we also have to recognize that the Commonwealth is becoming an increasingly irrelevant institution. Unless it finds its bearings, unless it recognizes the challenge that lies ahead with respect to human rights in the broadest sense of the world, it will continue to be merely an old boys club of the former colonies. Surely that is not acceptable.

I say in closing that Canada will be taking part in hosting the Commonwealth Games in Victoria in 1994 in the constituency of my colleague from Victoria. I would hope that by 1994 Canada would recognize that our most significant commitment in the Commonwealth can be a reaffirmation of the principles of democracy, peace, of the rule of law, of true respect for human rights and equality, of a clean environment. These must be the values that guide the Commonwealth if it is not to fade into total irrelevance.

STATUS OF WOMEN

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I rise with pride today to join with women across the country and around the world to recognize International Women's Day.

International Women's Day is an occasion for all of us to take a few minutes to pause and reflect on the progress of women toward equality in our society. We applaud the achievements of the past, we endorse the initiatives of the present and we look ahead to the challenges of the future.

International Women's Day was born over 80 years ago out of the struggle of women in the sweat-shops of the garment industry. They were working to achieve better pay and better working conditions. Clearly we have come a long way since the turn of the century, but we still have a long way to go.

History teaches us that many of the advances that women have made have come from solidarity. In Canada, women joined together over 60 years ago to fight for the right to be considered persons under Canada law.

Today, hundreds of national and local women's organizations are active in promoting all aspects of women's rights. In partnership with government, labour and other sectors, they have been successful in bringing issues of concern to women to the forefront of the national conscience because women's issues must become society's issues.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, we must never lose sight of the achievements of women who have contributed to the richness and vitality of Canadian life. I was therefore pleased this morning to announce that October would be women's history month in Canada.

We chose October because it was on October 18, 1929, after a long hard struggle, that Canadian women won a victory in the "Persons Case" that made them eligible for the Senate.

[English]

Women's History Month will promote public awareness of achievements like the persons case, achievements that are significant but often forgotten.

Women's History Month will encourage Canadians to reflect upon and celebrate women's contribution to our history as a nation and as a people.

Women's History Month will remind us of the initiatives of the present that are built upon the accomplishments of the past. Thus, Women's History Month will help foster a better understanding of the diverse roles that women play in contemporary society.

Canada is also proud of its record of achievement for women both domestically and internationally. We are making important progress toward equality on many fronts.

The government has put violence against women at the top of the public agenda. What began as a grassroots women's movement with its origins in rape crisis centres and shelters for battered women has now moved on to the national stage with the establishment of the Canadian Panel on Violence Against Women which is currently criss-crossing the country and talking to women and men and seeking solutions and preventive measures.

So we eagerly await the recommendations of the panel this December and to be able to move forward to solutions.

[Translation]

Last year, the parliamentary committee on health, welfare, social affairs, seniors and the status of women published recommendations on violence against women in its report entitled "The War on Women". The government responded in November with initiatives in prevention and education and changes to the legal system and to services for victims, offenders and members of their families.

In the past year, the House also passed stricter firearm control measures and proclaimed December 6, the anniversary of the massacre of 14 young women engineering students in Montreal, a National Day of Remembrance and Action on Violence against Women.

[English]

Canada is also proud to be in the forefront of international efforts to promote political, economic and social equality for women working within key international organizations. Within the United Nations we are one of the leading countries addressing the global problem of violence against women.

Canada recently sponsored a meeting of international experts to develop strategies to eliminate all forms of violence against women. In our Canadian delegation to the UN Commission on the Status of Women, which is meeting in Vienna this week and next, we will be seeking broad support for our international measures to counter violence against women.

We have also been working with the Organization of American States to develop an inter-American convention to eradicate violence against women. Indeed, within the Commonwealth, which we are also honouring today, Canada was successful in achieving renewed commitment for equality for women at our recent heads of government meeting. In fact, the Commonwealth leaders endorsed what is now called the Ottawa Declaration on Women in Structural Adjustment which the status of women ministers developed during their meeting here in Ottawa and which is aimed at promoting economic equality for women.

[Translation]

At the recent francophone summit, the Prime Minister announced that Canada would sponsor the establishment of a network of legal aid and referral centres for women in order to meet the needs of women in those countries.

On this International Women's Day, Mr. Speaker, while we celebrate our achievements of yesterday and today, it is also important to look to the next decade and the work that remains to be done to break down the final barriers to equality for women.

[English]

The challenges are many. I would like to see a future in which the only limits to women's achievements would be delivered by each individual herself. I would like to see a future in which half the seats in this House, in the Senate and in elected chambers across the land are held by women. And I would like to see a future in which women hold half the management jobs in both the public and the private sectors, and employers consider it routine to help workers better balance work and family responsibilities.

But most of all, I would like to see a future in which Canadians resolve conflicts in non-violent manners and treat each other with fairness and respect.

To achieve this future, women and men must continue to work together. The lessons of the past and the present, the things done when we work together to bring about change, must not be forgotten.

Canada's commitment to the promotion of equality for women right across the world remains firm and unequivocal. On the occasion of International Women's Day, I wish to assure this House that the promotion and protection of women's rights will continue to be a fundamental aspect of both Canadian domestic and foreign policy.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond to the minister on this very important International Women's Day.

Women have made significant gains in the last century. However, we still are a long way from being equal citizens. We have improved our position in society, not because those in power acted in an altruistic manner, believing that women were deserving of equal rights in the social, political and economic realms; rather, women have earned these rights and the right to be considered citizens and persons because they had to fight long and hard battles, most often without allies. Our rights have almost always been accorded grudgingly.

We are far from having obtained true equality. Women still earn only 65 per cent of what men do, and the glass ceiling still prevents women from climbing the corporate ladder and from reaching the upper echelons of the civil service.

This government's record belies the commitment to the advancement of women. At best, it is an uncomfortable commitment. Stricter gun control laws and the panel on violence against women are notable achievements for all women and for society in general. However, what the government gives with one hand, it takes away with the other.

I listened very carefully to the minister responsible for women's issues speaking of what she would like to see women achieve in the next while with regard to a high percentage at the corporate level and a high percentage here in the House of Commons. I think we all would like to see that. However, when I look at what has happened in this recent budget, it gives me great doubt that she is really serious. For instance, this recent budget has axed day care, thus reneging on the government's 1984 electoral promise to create a national day care system.

It has stated that it will not make retroactive payments prior to 1990 for pay equity. It has announced that it will cancel a spousal allowance program should it result in substantial increases in government funding. It has cancelled the Court Challenges Program, denying many women, among others, the chance to make their charter rights become reality. It has cut back spending on social housing and cut the co–operative housing program, two programs upon which many Canadian women are dependent. Royal commissions and new laws are not sufficient when the financial underpinnings are absent. Good publicity, bad social and economic policy is just not good enough.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, when women gather these days, it is often to talk about hardship. We talk about violence and we talk about fear, violence against our sisters, our friends, our mothers, our daughters and ourselves, and our worries for the next generation. Today, however, for International Women's Day I prefer to honour our achievements of the past, reflect on the connections between women's lives and celebrate our role in the ongoing struggle against discrimination.

Women have had to struggle for every right we have. I stand here now, a member of Parliament, when once I would have been barred from voting. I have been inspired by the first woman member of Parliament, Agnes Macphail, who was a member of the party which later become the New Democratic Party. While journalists quoted the speeches of her colleagues, they criticized the cut of her clothes, focusing solely on her appearance. All eyes were upon her watching, waiting for a mistake that would prove women were not fit for politics.

When I was first elected, I thought things had changed. Yet still, as women members of Parliament, we face ridicule. Journalists continue to focus on our appearance. We rise to speak in the House of Commons surrounded by a sea of suits.

I want to acknowledge the minister's comments regarding wanting to have 50 per cent of the House of Commons as women and the Liberal spokesperson applauding that. I want to point out that the New Democratic Party has taken the only steps possible for affirmative action that would encourage more women to run. It was a tough decision, but this party has once again been put on the forefront of that cutting edge, trying to include women in the politics of Canada.

The difference between Agnes Macphail and me is that although it often feels lonely being a woman member of Parliament, I am not alone. I look at the bench in front of me and see my leader, the first woman leader of a major federal political party in North America. I watch my leader rise and speak out for women, and I am proud.

Woman are often asked a curious question and those of us who are women in the House will remember this. We are asked: "Do you work?" Women have always worked. We have worked in our homes, bearing and raising children, cleaning, cooking. We have worked in the fields as slaves, as labourers and as farmers. We have worked as nurses on the front line, even though in times past we were excluded from becoming doctors because men said we could not stand the sight of blood. We have worked at the side of husbands, as merchants and are now setting up our own businesses and succeeding at a greater rate than our male counterparts, despite reduced access to credit.

We still face our many battles. A recent motion in the House of Commons to provide adequate funding for birth control research and education put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for New Westminister—Burnaby, was defeated by the Conservative members of Parliament.

The Court Challenges Program was a victim of the recent budget cuts. This action by this federal government acts to silence women and other disadvantaged groups. Thankfully the B.C. government announced only last week ongoing operational funding of over $1 million a year for women's centres.

The provincial government is acknowledging the value these centres bring to each community, while in stark contrast the Conservative government's budget once again says no to women, no pay equity, no child care. Know your place.

We are women who know our place all right. Our place is one of equality. On International Women's Day and every day I urge you to think of building a world-wide movement for social justice, for positive change for all people, for without a dream and a vision where would any of us be?

PETITIONS

JUSTICE

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have several hundred petitions to present with many thousands of signatures from my own riding of Hamilton Mountain, from around the Hamilton area and indeed from right across Canada.

These signatures are to be added to the over 250,000 signatures that have been presented to the clerk by me. There are many thousands that have been presented by other members of Parliament.

These petitioners feel that there are serious deficiencies in the criminal justice system. They feel that sentencing in crimes of violence does not appropriately reflect society's abhorrence of violence in order to act as a true deterrent to protect the public by removal of the offender from society.

These petitioners request that Parliament recognize that crimes of violence against a person are serious and abhorrent to society. They ask that the government amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act of 1972 and the Parole Act accordingly.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I too have a petition from hundreds of individuals from my riding of York West.

The petitioners largely recognize that the drug abuse situation in metropolitan Toronto is unfortunately on the increase, ruining the futures of our young and the livelihoods of families.

They are asking that the Government of Canada amend the Narcotics Control Act where seizures coming from the assets of a drug offence or offender are immediately channelled into general revenues in the federal coffers in Ottawa.

The petitioners are asking that this be amended so that part of the moneys remain with our local police forces and local organizations that are clearly on the leading edge of battling this wave of drugs.

I hope that the Solicitor General will take stock of the countless people who are requesting that so we can win this battle in the name of our young, our families and our communities.

FINLAND

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, it is truly an honour for me today to present this petition on behalf of over 100,000 Canadians whose parents either came from Finland or were of Finnish origin.

Thunder Bay is extremely proud to have in the area I represent the greatest community of Finnish people in the world living outside of Finland. It is truly a momentous occasion as much as this is the year that Finland is celebrating 75 years of political independence and political freedom.

The petitioners that I represent here from Thunder Bay ask that the good relations and the continuing good spirit that exist between Canada and Finland continue to exist with spirit and freedom for the two great countries.

• (1550)

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present a petition which reflects the ongoing fight by the New Democrats to scrap the very unfair GST.

These petitioners are primarily from the interior of British Columbia. They call upon the government to bring in an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations and call for real progressive tax reform in Canada.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, Question No. 221 will be answered today.

[Text]

Question No. 221—Ms. Callbeck:

How many federal public servants are there in Prince Edward Island and how many are in positions designated bilingual?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): As of December 1991, there were 1,970 active Public Service employees represented by Treasury Board in accordance with the Public Service Staff Relations Act, Schedule I, Part I, working in the province of Prince Edward Island. Of these, 441 employees occupied bilingual positions.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary has been answered.

Mr. Cooper: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I wish to inform the House, pursuant to Standing Order 33(2)(b), that because of ministerial statements Government Orders will be extended by 32 minutes, unless the government whips can get together to defer or delete it.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C–60, an act to amend the Federal–Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post–Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There were two minutes remaining on question and comments.

Mr. Gardiner: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps you could check with the Table. I had written late last week to Mr. Speaker regarding an emergency debate in the House under the provisions of Standing Order 52 on the important issue of softwood lumber. I am wondering, Mr. Speaker, if you could check on that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not have it in front of me. I will check on it and get back to the hon. member.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I just want to finish commenting on the last point that was put to me before Question Period.

For our viewers out there, we were talking about Bill C–60 to amend the fiscal arrangements between the national government and the provinces. Basically this bill makes sure that our equalization payments or transfers to the provinces are brought up to speed.

As I was saying before Question Period, the importance of this bill in maintaining our national will is obvious. As long as we as a national government are able to take money from those provinces that are doing exceedingly well and transfer it to provinces that are not doing so well so that national standards on education and health care can be maintained, I think our ability to function as a nation is going to be maintained.

The point I was trying to suggest to the government had to do with federal presence. I believe there should be some amendment to this bill that could be discussed when we are in committee. The amendment should somehow promote the federal presence in all the institutions supported by federal transfers. All schools in all provinces of the country should fly Canadian flags. All hospitals in all provinces should have Canadian flags. There should never ever be any question about the national anthem and where it should be played. It should be played in every part of this country. If a particular province were to refuse to fly the Canadian flag, if it were to refuse to play the national anthem, then quite frankly I think we should revisit this kind of an arrangement.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe you will find unanimous consent for the following motion:

> That, notwithstanding any Standing Order or usual practice of this House, at ten o'clock a.m. on Tuesday, March 10, 1992, the Speaker shall call upon the President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister of Constitutional Affairs to make a short statement on the recognition of Louis Riel; that the provisions of Standing Order 33(2) apply; that upon the completion of remarks by a member for each of the parties a motion regarding the recognition of Louis Riel shall be deemed moved and the question shall be deemed put and adopted without debate or amendment; and that immediately thereafter the House shall proceed to the daily routine of business proceedings.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, before we agree I would just like to clarify something with the hon. parliamentary secretary.

The motion that was just read to the House calls for a motion to be deemed moved and the question deemed put and agreed to without debate or amendment after some speeches. In essence, we are being asked to approve a motion that is not before the House, that we have not seen.

I would like assurances from the parliamentary secretary that in fact the motion that will be put will be one that has been under discussion by the House leaders of the parties for the last couple of months.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I can give the hon. member the assurance that when I move a motion it is always based upon the negotiations and discussions we have had.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, we are back at a subject that I would have thought this government would not want to be reminded of. We are talking about amendments to the Federal–Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and the Federal Post–Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act.

Why would the government not want to be reminded of those particular subjects? Anybody who has looked for a hospital bed for elective surgery in almost any part of this country could answer that question.

If there were no other irritants out there, no other reasons why the people of Canada are angry at this government and in particular at the Prime Minister, though not exclusively at the Prime Minister, they would be angry about this particular subject. If the Prime Minister, were to disappear from the scene tomorrow there would still be a lot of anger because the people over there have aided and abetted what he has done to social programs, to education cost, and to health care all over this country.

I was about to say that if the people of Canada had no other reasons to be angry they would be angry on this particular subject because almost every family out there has been adversely affected or, let us put it bluntly, has been kicked in the guts by this Prime Minister and this government. How do I mean kicked in the guts in terms of trying to get a bed for elective surgery? They have had to wait because of the cutbacks to the provinces.

Let me refer to my own little province of Newfoundland as an example of this government's cutbacks on account of health care and post–secondary education. I refer to the little province of Newfoundland, little in terms of population but much larger in terms of geography and resources and spirit of its people and all those things. In terms of population it is one of the smaller provinces of Canada with just a half million souls, some 560,000 people on the island and in Labrador.

That little province, in terms of population, will have lost $845 million by the year 1996. That is over the 10-year period from fiscal 1986-87 when this government began putting the blocks to health care and post-secondary education by rolling back payments to the provinces in respect of those accounts under the so-called EPF, the Established Programs Financing.

The member for Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louise says this is not true. I think what he is doing is contradicting the Department of Finance figures that tell me that in the 10 years fiscal 1986-87 to fiscal 1995-96 the savings in respect of the 1986 budget, the amount that will not be paid that would have been paid without the cut-back in the 1986 budget, will amount to $845 million.

He is playing with some figures. He realizes that because of the announcement the minister made in January, Newfoundland is going to receive a few shekels, that it will be down $845 million now because it would get $31 million of that as a result of this particular bill. He has in mind that we are not talking $845 million but we are talking something closer to the $800 million.

I want to say to my good friend, the member for Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louise, that if he were the administrator of the Grace Hospital, the great institution in St. John's, Newfoundland, or the Burgeo Hospital, or the Burin Peninsula Hospital at Salt Pond or the hospital in Port-aux-Basques, or the hospital in Stephenville, or if he were a member of the board sitting around the table trying to find the bucks, he would find there were fewer bucks as a result of the 1986 budget. I am talking about 1986, because this pillaging of health facilities has been going on by this government for five to six years.

Now, as we come just a little closer to accountability time when the bets are called in, when this government is going to be called to account, it is giving itself some legislation that can mean different things depending on what you want it to mean. For example, it could mean that the government might decide to get a bit generous during an election year. That would be a great surprise. The government might get generous, notwithstanding all the cut-backs of $800 million or so in respect of Newfoundland, and that is only one province. I could give other figures of nearly $200 million in respect to Prince Edward Island; $1.3 billion over the 10-year period in respect of Nova Scotia, and so on.

Mr.Layton: Out of whose pocket? Against which debt?

Mr. Simmons: The member has been there too long. He has got all the lines memorized. I am not sure he understands what they mean but he memorizes them well and he speaks them well.

Whose pocket? We know whose pocket: the pocket of the Canadian taxpayer, the same pocket out of which he and his buddies got the money to fly two cars down to Costa Rica, because there were no cars down there good enough to carry his buddy the Prime Minister. That is whose pocket we are talking about.

If he does not understand that particular example, if he does not recognize the incident I am talking about, I will remind him. His Prime Minister, the one and only boy from Baie Comeau, had to go to Costa Rica. There are no cars down there, you understand, good enough for him, so they flew two cars down. He knows this, does he?

Do not spoil my punch line. They flew two cars down.

Mr. Layton: It had nothing to do with the RCMP and its security.

Mr. Simmons: No, it had nothing to do with anything. It had to do with taxpayers. A minute ago, the member wanted me to talk about taxpayers. His question was whose pocket? I am answering: the Canadian taxpayers' pocket, the same taxpayers' pocket that paid for two cars to be flown down. I know the official line. He has got the official line: "Security. Security. Security".

They flew the two cars down. These guys are looking after security. They are not just the ordinary taxpayers out there spending money right, left and centre. They know what they are up to. They get the cars down there as fast as they can. They are bullet proof cars—proper vehicles. They were so bright, those Keystone Kops, those spenders of taxpayers' money that could have been used under Established Programs Financing.

These Keystone Kops forgot to check one little tiny detail, just one detail—do not be too hard on them. They could not find any unleaded gas down there. They could not find any unleaded gas so the cars never got used.

They were paid for and my friend's question again is who paid for them? The Canadian taxpayer paid for them.

Mr. Brewin: How do you like the $20 million on competitive as Canada promotion? Is that a good one?

Mr. Simmons: I have friends in all parties who write speeches for me even as I talk, like my friend from Victoria in the wrong party but with a good idea, and I congratulate him. It gives me another marvellous example of how this government knows how not to spend money.

I digress and I do not want to try the patience of my good friend, the Speaker, too much. I was making the point that the people of my province, like the people of every other province, are being short changed very badly in terms of their access to health care. I made that point. I wanted to go on and give the other example of their access to post-secondary education.

I am sure you were all thrilled last week when you heard that budget. If ever there was a candy-coated budget, it was last week's. You can candy coat different kinds of things. People have been known to candy coat arsenic. You can candy coat anything you want. That does not change the flavour or the effect of what is under the candy. It was a candy-coated budget and for students at Canadian universities, once they got past the candy part, here is what they found.

The government had tampered further with post-secondary education. The government heretofore under the Canada Student Loan Program had allowed a six month period of grace, six months after the student finishes university, during which there is an interest holiday. There is no interest charged on the loan. They have to pay the loan, but they did not have to pay interest on that loan in respect to the first six months after the student finished university.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Will the hon. member allow the Speaker to make a ruling and then carry on with his speech? The hon. Speaker has a ruling to make for the member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley and then I will get back to the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: I say, first of all, to the hon. member for Burin—St. George's that I appreciate very much his courtesy and the courtesy extended to me by the other members of the House.

To the hon. member, I will hear the argument.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your brief time today to consider what I think is an important issue and to rise under Standing Order 52. It relates to the matters raised in the House today by members from all sides of the House. It relates to the decision on Friday that precipitated a decision from the commerce department in the United States regarding the very important debate over softwood lumber and our exports to the United States.

• (1610)

We have had a number of negative decisions on trade policy from Washington, D.C. They are certainly impairing our country's ability to trade with the United States. This decision in particular on softwood lumber tariff will have an impact on well over 300 forest communities throughout Canada.

It is a very important issue. It falls under the provisions of Standing Order 52 because of its importance. The dollar value alone relates to this issue, given the vast amount of lumber exports into the United States and the number of communities across Canada that are affected by this.

It is an important debate that this House must have, and I would certainly be prepared to assist in any arrangements that might allow for that debate so that all Canadians can know what the members of this House feel about this most important issue.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: First of all I thank the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley for giving me notice in advance.

I should say that a number of members raised the matter today and there was a considerable exchange at Question Period on this very important matter.

I would say to the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley that while I am not disposed to move this afternoon on it, I will be watching the matter very closely. It may well be that hon. members will want to seek the Chair's advice and guidance tomorrow or the next day.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-60, an act to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Burin—St. George's had five minutes remaining in his debate, and because of his indulgence I will give him another 30 seconds.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, my good friend who has made a welcome appearance in the House from the good riding of Delta says that I forgot where I was.

I was explaining to his colleagues that in the latest budget, the whole question of Canada student loans was a bit candy coated. Underneath the candy, there were a couple of very stark realities. He will know them.

As a matter of fact, if he wants a little of my time, he might want to tell the House whether he explained those couple of wrinkles to his constituents in Delta.

First, until now the students at Canadian universities who had loans, once they came they had six months before the interest began to accumulate. With this budget, it accumulates the day they stop studying. Therefore, they pay another six months of interest. Did he explain that to his constituents?

Second, did he explain to them that the government wants to privatize student loans? Did he explain the reason? Did he explain that the reason the government wants to private student loans is that it wants the banks to do its dirty work for it? It wants the private banks to hustle those students who, through no fault of their own, do not have jobs or income.

That is what it is all about. That is what is underneath the candy in that particular budget when it comes to student loans. This government's record in so far as post-secondary education and health care are concerned is absolutely abysmal. It is absolutely shocking. How it can now even have the face to bring another piece of legislation before this House, one wonders.

As the fishermen off the east coast of Canada are finding out, you cannot rely on this government in the crunch. You just cannot rely on this government. As the stores near the border are finding out, you cannot rely on this government in the crunch. The farmers are finding that you cannot rely on this government in the crunch. You just cannot rely on it.

A lot of people took the government's word on the free trade issue, and we see the sad results of that these days. We took their word on so many things. I heard the Prime Minister today and I would dearly like to take his word when he talks about foreign overfishing.

Mr. Worthy: We can't believe your word when you talk. That's extreme talk.

Mr. Simmons: The member from Chilcotin today talks about a Damascus road experience, talks about somebody seeing the light, in the last hour or two hours ago was up on his feet actually blasting who? The Americans.

I remember a time not so long ago when he was chairing a meeting of Canadian-American parliamentarians. He almost suppressed the subject that he addressed today. He would hardly let it be discussed, it was so foolish a subject. He did not see the need for it. He sees the need today. He had to get up and make a speech today to help save his hide back home, on the very issue that he tried to shove under the table not so very long ago.

Mr. Worthy: You're despicable in your politics.

Mr. Simmons: The member knows the meeting I am talking about. Now he says I am despicable.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. The hon. member has the floor. I cannot really hear him because there is too much action going across the floor. I would like to hear the hon. member's speech. The hon. member for Burin—St. George's has the floor.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I did not want to upset my friend from Chilcotin. The truth does hurt. In case somebody did not understand the import of what I said, some months ago he was chairing a meeting and the subject—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On a point of order, the hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, the member is clearly off the topic. We are debating Bill C-60. He does this quite frequently. We want to hear what he has to say in regard to Bill C-60 and we can debate that point. I think he has transcended the bounds of this debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think the hon. member knows relevancy and I know that he is coming right to the point. The hon. member for Burin—St. George's.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Chilcotin had asked me a question about whether my assessment on Bill C-60 could be trusted. I think these were his words. I wanted to illustrate my meaning to him by using a parallel example. I gave him an example that he was in the middle of, that on one occasion he chaired a meeting about a subject. Today he spoke on the subject. He has taken two opposite views on the issue. I thought I would put it back to him the saying about people who live in glass houses, Mr. Speaker. If trust is what he wants debated on the floor of the House this afternoon, we can give him some examples about who ought to be trusted on Bill C-60 or on any other subject.

I say to the gentleman from Carleton—Charlotte, these are my views on Bill C-60, my views on trust, my views on why we cannot trust this government on post-secondary education, on the fisheries jurisdiction, on the trade issue or on any other issue. Why does the government want us now to trust it on Bill C-60? I do not trust the government on this issue. I see more health care going down the drain. I see more post-secondary education going down the drain. I see some not well-off students being able to less afford post-secondary education as a result of the latest move by this government.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, in response to the member for Burin—St. George's, politicians are often accused of being actors, sometimes good actors and others bad. This was an example of acting at its very best. The trouble is the hon. member got his figures wrong, as he always does. He wants to suggest and to use only the figures that he wants to use. The truth is that most of what he is saying is totally erroneous.

I guess if we want to go beyond calling the member an actor, I might suggest that he is a magician. He is confused in his role as a magician as well because usually a magician makes more with less, but he is taking more and turning it into less.

Since this government was elected there has been more money transferred to his province than in any other time in the history of this country. He knows that for a fact.

I want to step through some of those numbers. The annual rate of growth in major transfers to Newfoundland has been 5.5 per cent since 1984-85. He cannot dispute that because it is happening. This year the direct transfers to his province will exceed $1.4 billion. Do you know what that accounts for? It accounts for about 44 per cent of Newfoundland's total revenue, coming from the Government of Canada, from other taxpayers, to the Government of Newfoundland.

I do not think the member can argue convincingly on that number at all. I think he is going to have to get into some of those little magic numbers that he himself comes up with. Where he comes up with them I will never know. But again, he is very convincing in his delivery, there is no question about that. We do not question his delivery as a speaker but we do question the numbers he uses. Also, if we are looking at transfers to his province, they amount to about $2,400 per individual.

When we are talking about transfers at this level, government to government, it really does not measure the other support programs that go into his province, through the UIC act for example. If you measure that in total the figure goes far beyond $2,400. They tell me that on transfers to individual citizens directly from the Government of Canada, the figure is more in the $4,500 to $5,500 range. So that, coupled with transfers from the federal government to the provincial government to allow it to do the types of things it does in the delivery of services, there has been no government in the history of this country that has done more for the province of Newfoundland than this government.

Those are the figures that he has to use when he stands on his feet. I think this maze of figures that he steps through and the confusing way in which he delivers them is not portraying an accurate picture at all.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I used to be a teacher before I became an actor and I thank the gentleman. I say to the gentleman from Carleton—Charlotte that we learned to tailor the message to the audience so I will try it one more time for that particular audience. I will make it very simple.

What I said, and I apologize to him if it was confusing, was that in the 10-year period from fiscal 1986-87 to 1995-96, Newfoundland will be down by $845 million in payments for EPF, lower than it would have been if the government had not changed the act with the 1986 budget. That is what I said.

I then amended that with the $31 million that the government is putting back in this year. I later said that it is now of the order of $800 million or $820 million or something like that. I am sure he can do that bit of subtraction.

Now he says that the transfer payments represent 44 per cent of the budget. He is absolutely right on that. What he did not say is that it is down from 48 per cent. Before this government became involved it was 48 per cent of the provincial budget.

Per cents aside, you heard the key phrase: Newfoundland is getting from other taxpayers. Now let us listen to that phrase. Is the member telling us that the taxpayers in Newfoundland do not pay federal income taxes and all the other taxes? Does he not know that the Government of Canada pot is in respect of all the taxpayers in Canada and some of that 44 per cent is out of the pockets of Newfoundlanders? Of course it is. This suggestion that somehow the other nine are keeping us on pogey all the time, I resent that. It is the old welfare argument that says take it but be quiet about it.

Why are many of my fellow countrymen in Newfoundland on UI these days? Why are they out there? Because the government of which this member is a supporter has allowed the Spanish and the Portuguese to pillage the stocks. The overfishing started in the first fishing season after this government took office. There was no overfishing up to and including 1984. None, not one fish. Starting in 1985 the European Community took eight times their quota. In 1986 it took 12 times their quota.

The French had not overfished until 1984. In 1985 they took three times their quota, in 1986 they took three times their quota and the pillaging has gone on and not a peep, not a word from that crowd over there. Why are thousands of my fishermen in Burin—St. George's drawing UI? Because they cannot fish. Why? Because they are lazy? No, because that man over there and his clique have allowed the Spanish and Portuguese to pillage our way of life and our fish stocks. Therefore, they have to stay home, sit on the wharf instead of going out to fish, which is what they would like to do.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I listened with considerable interest to what I thought was a report of the critic on the Liberal member's acting ability.

I was impressed with the hon. Conservative member's ability to extend for almost infinite time so little in a question. He must have taken lessons from the Prime Minister.

My question to the hon. member is simply this. Sometimes we talk about the impact of cutbacks on EPF and other transfer payments somewhat in the abstract. The hon. member has done a very good job of giving some concrete images to the policies of this government and how they have affected the fishers of Newfoundland.

I would be interested in having some specificity lent to the impact on post-secondary education in Newfoundland as a result of the cutbacks in the Established Programs Financing that this government has perpetrated since it came into office. Perhaps the hon. member could extend that to cover the whole of the $11 billion that have been cut since 1982-83.

Mr. Simmons: I thank my friend from Windsor—St. Clair for the question about post-secondary education. I was just beginning to get into the mood of that subject when unfortunately my time ran out.

One of the amazing things about Newfoundland over the last two, three or four decades is the numbers of people as a percentage of total population and in absolute numbers that went to university. I remember when I went to Memorial University, the one university in Newfoundland, there were about 1,100 students there.

Now the total enrolment I would think is of the order of 12,000 or 13,000 plus, and many others in evening and part-time studies. Many thousands of people go to that university and get undergraduate degrees, graduate degrees, doctorate degrees in many disciplines.

Many of those people came from humble origins. By humble I mean economically not terribly prosperous. But they were able to go to university and get their education because of a number of programs, including the Canada Student Loan Program. They had come to rely on it as a stepping stone. If you check the rate of payback of Canada student loans in Newfoundland as opposed to other parts of Canada, you will find that there is no high delinquency rate. They are good payers of loans once they get the income with which to pay those loans.

The point I make in response to my friend from Windsor—St. Clair is that in the area of post-secondary education, nowhere is the curse of this government more apparent, more in evidence than it is in the way it has stunted opportunities for university education in Newfoundland.

Only this past weekend I was with a couple of people, would-be students, who told me that they are not able to go to university. One of the reasons they are not able is because this government, for all its tampering with Canada student loans, has not raised the floor. My friend from the Magdalen Islands will know this. It has not raised the base amount that a student may apply for since 1984.

Inflation in those eight years alone has done things to his students, his constituents. Why is he not lobbying for them? Why does he not beat some sense into the Prime Minister and tell him that eight years of inflation have eroded the buying power of those students who would like to go to university, but they have to do their borrowing on the basis of 1984 figures. That is shameful. He knows that and I am sure he will want to talk about it and dissociate himself from it when he gets up to speak.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): As a previous speaker indicated, it must be of some embarrassment to the members on the other side that in Bill C-60 they have produced another opportunity to talk about what this government has done with respect to transfer payments to the provinces, in particular, those payments that go to the provinces for the benefit of post-secondary education and medicare.

Basically, the bill could be described in some respects as housekeeping. It deals with the fact that it is now necessary to extend the present fiscal arrangements with respect to established programs funding, more specifically to provide for changes in the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act so that the present legislation will apply to 1994.

It will also provide for administrative arrangements that would allow the provincial governments to collect taxes on behalf of the federal government and for the federal government to collect taxes on behalf of the provincial governments and make provisions for taxpayers who have paid through one or the other to have those payments taken into account by those respective governments.

It also would provide that this present ceiling on the EPF payments would be based on the 1992-1993 fiscal year rather than the 1987-88 fiscal year.

Now, of course, one of the elements of this bill that may pass unnoticed is the fact that it is necessary to extend the present transfer payments for post-secondary education and health because of the fact that the government has failed to negotiate new arrangements under EPF.

This was something that was supposed to have been completed last year. It is an issue that has been the subject of debate in this House on numerous occasions since 1984. You will know, Mr. Speaker, that there was considerable concern about the erosion of contributions to the provinces as well as some concern about the relative responsibilities of the provincial governments and the federal government with respect to post-secondary education.

The issue is not drawn so sharply with respect to medicare, but we will come to that later.

The fact of the matter is there was a problem out there that we should identify with respect to the responsibility of the provinces. That is, there was concern that the provinces were not making their due contribution. We asked over and over again that there be, first of all, a real negotiation of EPF to provide for stipulated transfer payments for post-secondary education and that there would be an identified contribution from the provincial level and that the level of contributions to post-secondary education would not continue to erode as it has been doing since the beginning of this decade.

I want to make clear that erosion is one that did not begin with this government. In fact it began with the changes made in the legislation by the previous government beginning in 1977. Most notably were the 6 and 5 cutbacks in 1982 and 1983 which cost a considerable amount of money to the system.

Looking at the $9 billion it was costing the system by the changes made by the present government and adding to that the $2 billion which was taken away from EPF in cutbacks by the Liberal government, there has been a net decrease of some $11 billion in the expected contributions for post-secondary education that we should have expected from this government. This has to be looked at in the context of what the government has identified as its prosperity agenda.

Mr. Speaker, I know that you will recall because I know you were as enthusiastic about that announcement then as you are now, that the federal government had promised that it would quadruple the number of trainees that were produced in this country so that at least we would meet the level of training in industry that is achieved in the United States, which falls considerably short of the levels achieved in Europe and more specifically in Germany.

It announced the rather ambitious goal of doubling the number of scientists, engineers and mathematicians. It promised that it would eliminate the 20 per cent functional illiteracy rate that we have in this country. It said, and we lauded this recommendation, that we would achieve a 90 per cent graduation rate from high schools.

Looking at this present budget and looking at this legislation we see and have seen that it is a continuation of a policy which has been completely contradictory to its promises.

We were ready to forgive this government for its failures up until the 1992-93 fiscal year if it had shown the slightest evidence that it was going to truly commit itself to those educational and training elements that were the bedrock we were told, or at least it was suggested to us, of the government's prosperity agenda.

New Democrats have considerable problems with some of the right-wing ideological pap that goes into the federal government's prosperity agenda. But we do understand that if we are going to have a value-added economy of the sort that is going to permit Canadians to go to work and which will create wealth, that wealth will only be generated on the basis that we create opportunities for all of our citizens through training and education, through the development of skills.

When we get right down to it, if any wealth is going to be created, it is created from the minds and the creativity and the capacity for innovation that Canadians have in great abundance if they are given the opportunity to do this.

Whether we are looking at EPF or whether we are looking at the over-all training budget, the government has cut $200 million from the training program under the Canadian Jobs Strategy. We have to understand that that relates to young people who are not working and who are largely not working because they do not have the skills to work.

It purports to be a government that understands the significance of training and education. Since it has been in office there has been a sharp erosion of the over-all expenditures by this government for training and education.

We find that there has been a decrease. The figures are right here. Since 1986-87 until 1991 the over-all increase in the cost of living has been 25.5 per cent, but we find that for education and training over-all government contributions have only risen 6.5 per cent. That is scandalous on the face of it.

What is more important is that it is tragic in its very fundamentals in what it is doing to our nation in its capacity to create the wealth that will allow our citizens to prosper.

This government has the notion that you have to somehow have the wealth and then you will have adequate social programs, when in fact if you do not have adequate social programs, you have not a chance in this world of creating wealth. The key social program in that context obviously is training and education.

The enrolment in post-secondary education in this country has risen 43 per cent, and I just mentioned that the expenditures on training and education have risen about 6.7 per cent.

It is a strange thing to look at the front page of The Globe and Mail and get this, it reads "Education Only For the Wealthy". Reading The Globe and Mail it might be thought to be positive advertisement. But even The Globe and Mail had to be concerned about what is happening to our post-secondary institutions. They are in dreadful shape.

I wish that my Liberal colleague from Newfoundland had pointed out that they have laid off in the major institution not tens but hundreds of staff. In some universities in this country tuition has risen up to 250 per cent.

To give some specificity to this, let me look at some other figures that I think I have available to me on my desk. In 1980-81, in Newfoundland, which is an appropriate example, tuition fees amounted to 10.2 per cent of general operating income at Memorial University. By 1988-89, and that does not include the budget years 1990-91, 1991-92, or 1992-1993, already by 1989 the portion cut of operating income at Memorial University met by tuition fees was 13 per cent. By God, it must be on its way to 16, 17, 18 per cent, perhaps 20 per cent. I am sure if I had the figures before me that is what I would find.

In Nova Scotia it has risen from 14.7 to 21.6 per cent and in Ontario from 16.9 to 20.4 per cent. In Ontario a New Democratic government for heaven's sake has had to increase tuition because this government has deprived Ontario to an extent even greater than other provinces of the transfer of payments for post-secondary education and medicare.

Oh yes, it brings in a bill and does a little bit of housekeeping. But people understand that this is just part of a continuing action by this government with its hypocritical stance with respect to training and education. It continues to do one thing and say quite another.

Of course we are talking about medicare and we are talking about Established Programs Financing. I do not have to elaborate on what is happening to medicare in this country. Here we have in our nation the exemplary example of what a nation should provide for its citizens with respect to health, with respect to accessibility, universality and affordability.

And it is because of this government that provinces such as Quebec, New Brunswick and Alberta are talking about user fees for medicare, talking about a system of two-tiered health in which the rich will be healthy because they can afford it and the poor will be increasingly unhealthy, mimicking the situation in the United States. There, only the rich can go into a hospital waiting room with impunity and hope to get a bed because they can afford it. Then one of, I suppose, the least controversial elements in this bill really does provide for the harmonization of the GST and the provincial sales tax. I do not want to engage at this stage of the game, because I have so little time to do so, in an appropriate criticism of the GST. The GST replaced the MST, the manufacturers' sales tax, which was described as a silent killer of jobs. One advantage of the GST is that it kills jobs and everybody knows it.

It kills jobs and everybody knows it. I hear a Conservative member over there quietly saying: "Ah ha".

An hon. member: Nonsense.

Mr. McCurdy: Let me tell you, I hope that my province will not succumb to a transparent blackmail being perpetrated by this government to force my province to integrate its sales tax with this abominable federal sales tax which is killing jobs in Windsor at a rate that is absolutely scandalous.

There is no reason why this government could not have attacked the issue of cross-border shopping, which is a serious problem, in a creative way rather than trying to use a bludgeon of cross-border shopping to force the provinces to fit into this tax which has been the offspring of an ideology which has not been in the interests of this country and an ideology that will die a mortal death.

It will certainly die a death in the next election and will turn back the clock to a time in which Canadians could be confident that they had a government that had a commitment to fairness and social justice as this government does not.

Let us have this little housekeeping bill, but let us keep in mind that what this bill does is make it a little bit easier for this government to perpetrate another sin on a long record of sins against the Canadian people.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend my colleague for a very fine speech and a most astute analysis of the situation in which the country finds itself.

I know that time is limited and one does not always hit every subject one might like. Something I would have liked to have heard the hon. member speak about is the matter of the killing of some of the committees, the Economic Council of Canada in the last budget, and I know something that was very near and dear to his heart and also right in line with education, and that is the Science Council of Canada.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, actually I understand the death of the Science Council. The Science Council was like a rabid dog biting at the ankles of this government and it had to be killed. The Science Council was an institution that had the capacity, the wherewithal, the knowledge and the research capacity to be objectively critical of this government and non-partisanly critical of this government and it was critical of this government.

As you know, the Science Council was about to do a number of studies. It would have demonstrated the inadequacy of this government's commitment to science, to training and to education.

The Economic Council did not criticize the government too much, but the government got the notion that it might and so it had to be killed too.

Also there is the Race Relations Foundation. That is the most peculiar one of all because it was killed along with the Court Challenges Program. This was done at a time when many people in this country are increasingly concerned about the rise of xenophobia and racism among those people who are looking for scapegoats that can be blamed for the actions of this government as they fear for their very livelihoods, their homes, their jobs and their capacity to raise their families.

• (1650)

One does not have to be a deeply suspicious person, but when I find out that representatives of this Conservative government that killed the Race Relations Institute, that killed the Court Challenges Program was also the same government, the same party that refused in the constitutional report to support a commitment to equality for racial and ethnic minorities and with the collusion of the Liberals have seen that one-third of the population is not even included in a constitutional round that was supposed to be a people's round. Oh yes, there are some dear things in the budget that have been sacrificed.

With respect to the Science Council and the Economic Council and the foundation, if you add up that long list of cutbacks of various institutions that this government severed from the public area, it all adds up to $23 million. It spent that much sending people all across this country to speak to 30 or 40 people about this prosperity agenda that has been the subject of so much appropriate ridicule.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, this particular bill also has a section in it which deals with taxation matters. They are apparently designed to facilitate the collection of taxes by both federal and provincial governments.

I would like to ask the hon. member if he believes that it contains also certain elements that would facilitate the harmonization of the GST and the provincial sales tax? In view of the fact that many of these particular points were discussed during the meeting that was held with the provincial premiers, would he be aware whether Mr. Rae is deciding on whether to harmonize the GST with the PST in Ontario?

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, you will know that I did address the issue. I guess the member's question is: will the Premier of Ontario be forced to succumb to blackmail? It really comes down to something that simple. It is a question of whether it will be possible to negotiate a reasonable arrangement with the federal government for the collection of two different taxes, the GST and the PST, the provincial sales tax, without being forced into harmonization.

That question is something like: "If I am shot, will I fall down"? Specifically, in Mr. Rae's shoes I do not stand. But I hope that if they shoot him with the GST he will not fall down.

Mr. Darryl L. Gray (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the former speakers as we discuss the equalization program. I must confess that from the opposition benches, I guess if I did understand one word, "harmony" does not belong in their vocabulary.

To set the record straight, perhaps I could read how equalization works.

> Equalization payments are determined on the basis of a formula set out in federal legislation. First, the amount of revenue that each province could raise from a typical tax base, taking into account virtually all provincial and local potential sources of revenue from taxation is calculated.
> Second, each province's overall per capita capacity to raise revenues from these sources is compared to that of five provinces making up a representative standard. This standard is currently equal to about $4,700 per capita.

I will not go any further. I listened with interest as my hon. colleague from Newfoundland made reference to the Magdalen Islands and the students from the Magdalen Islands. To be in opposition is one thing but to be realistic is another.

Of course, when we talk about our students, whether they come from Newfoundland or from the Magdalen Islands or the Gaspésie——or anywhere in Canada, Mr. Speaker, this is important, as the Prime Minister said so before in this House, because the taxpayers are always the same. Whether we are talking about municipal, provincial or federal taxes, the same person pays all three.

[English]

We must take that into consideration when we discuss and look at what has been proposed from now until March 31, 1994, as mentioned in the budget of the Minister of Finance.

Hollering from the opposite side, they say we have cut back. That is not true. We are jumping from 5.9 per cent in 1984–85 to 7.8 per cent in equalization payments. Being a former teacher of mathematics that represents an increase.

Equalization in 1984–85 was roughly $5.422 billion. These figures are available to all concerned. The figure proposed for 1992–93 is $8.56 billion. Which brings us to the point, has this government done enough? Of course, it is very difficult when you deal with personal and public finances. In order to spend and spend and spend with no limits, someone must take the heat.

At the same time, we talk about equalization payments, harmony, the GST and provincial sales tax. As members are aware, we are in the process now of building a unified Canada and a Constitution that will make us stronger, not weaker. We talk about have-nots and haves. My friend from Newfoundland stated earlier that we are all part of this great country because the have-nots can benefit from the haves which has been the case in the past. I hope with all due sincerity this will continue in the future.

We talk about spending dollars and the same taxpayers' dollars but we must face reality, not only when we talk about equalization payments but when we talk about every ministership in our honourable cabinet. Whether it is us as the government of the day or another government, we cannot spend frivolously. We cannot over-borrow.

Far be it for me to take the part of the opposition. If the Official Opposition had been in government perhaps our annual deficit today would be in excess of $100 billion with all the things they suggest we do.

But the taxpayer would be outraged. They would not like that. These things are very difficult. It is very easy for the people of Newfoundland, for the people from British Columbia or for the people from my constituency to criticize. We were elected in 1984 and again in 1988 to put some kind of sense into the spending of this government. It has not been easy.

I say that $5.4 billion to $8.5 billion is not a loss, it is an increase. Members opposite fail to mention at the same time that our inflation rate has dropped to approximately 1.6 per cent. We were criticized for our policies but that fiscal policy has benefited the provinces.

My colleague from Ontario mentioned that Mr. Rae will not bend down to harmonize—and far be it from us in the debate on this bill to get too involved in the Constitution and Canadian harmony—but I would say that when we harmonize, when we talk about the better spending of our taxpayers' dollars, be it municipal, be it provincial or be it federal, there can only be one winner and that is the taxpayer. The final winner is our great country of Canada.

They talk about how devastated they are. We are devastated because we cannot afford to spend any more money. We are looking forward to the day when we have our finances in order and we can go back to the university students and the provinces, regardless of whether they have a social agenda in which they want to make everybody equal. We want to put all Canadians to work. It is the wish, the desire, the aim, and the goal of this government. That is our aim from this side of the floor and that will continue to be the fact.

In any provincial political agenda it may be the wish to say: "Take more from Ottawa, give it to the provinces, and let us look after it". This is why we have the two years till March 31, 1994 when our provincial ministers of finance, our Prime Minister of Canada and our premiers of the provinces can get together and look at the tax base and at all money spent being spent wisely and for the benefit of all Canadians, including those who pay their taxes.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise on behalf of our caucus and constituents from York West to speak to Bill C–60. It talks about the equalization and transfer payments to the provinces, which essentially help them to look after their jurisdictions under the Constitution of our country on behalf of that same single taxpayer.

The debate today specifically touched on the whole question of transfer payments as they relate to education, post–secondary education and training. I think it would be highly valuable not only to look at Bill C–60 from a narrow perspective. We should in fact take a look at what the general government track record has been in terms of keeping up with its payments to the provinces.

If we look back a number of years, certainly last year with the introduction of the GST, inflation was not at 2 per cent, not at 3 per cent, not at 4 per cent, but was upward of 5 per cent. The transfer payments were much less than the growth of both the GNP and the rate of inflation. That was the case for a number of years consecutively.

The Prime Minister, the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology, and the Minister for International Trade talk about making Canadians and Canada competitive again and about a prosperity agenda. They talk about ridding our country of illiteracy. They talk about keeping Canada apace with a world that is certainly moving quickly and does not owe us a free lunch or dinner or breakfast.

What does that mean? It means that there is a gulf of difference between the rhetoric and the words put on paper that our Prime Minister tries to inspire the country with at whatever stop or before whatever audience. It means that there is a gulf of difference between that and the substance or the fact that when it comes time to pay and give over transfer payments for post–secondary education it is not there.

We are unlike certain parts of western Europe where there is an equilibrium between the number of applicants applying for post–secondary education, largely university, and the number of people accepted. In large measure they are equal because a greater pool of Europeans go through college and through training apprenticeship programs for electricians and tool and die makers than in this country.

We have talked today about Canadians not being able to afford to go to university. The fact or the reality is that the universities and post–secondary institutions of our country cannot even afford to have the spaces. Never mind if people can afford it; they do not have the spaces to come close to responding to the demand of young people wishing to enter university. That is related directly to the budgets of those universities for expansion, for facility space, and for professors. That is also related in practical measure to the debate we are now having on the floor of the House of Commons.

We are saying quite simply that if the Government of Canada wishes to equip its young with an education to meet not only their aspirations but the aspirations of a country, if we are to train individual Canadians both young and old, those whose employment was terminated at age 50 because a plant closed, moved to Buffalo or it costs a peso to construct widgets in Mexico and ship them back for the same kind of profit, if it means that we are going to give those people a place to stand, then it means that the Government of Canada will have to match its words with dollars.

Unfortunately the dollars have not matched the flowery images of the rhetoric. A few minutes ago a member on the government side asked if Bill C–60 enables Canadians to trust this government with fiscal arrangements. I say no. We are two weeks after the presentation of a federal budget and I am asking if Canadians trust this government more to take care of and look after their interests on a fiscal budgetary playing field.

We had headlines in yesterday's papers, for instance, that seven out of ten Canadians, according to an inside Canada research study, not only said no to this Prime Minister, but seven out of ten Canadians said never again to this Prime Minister. That is the essence of the trustability.

If we look at the federal budget, how do we measure whether Canadians give a passing grade or whether Canadians have a sense of confidence or trust in this government? One measurement is if a unemployed person tuned in at 4.30 p.m. on February 25, that Tuesday afternoon, and got any more trust or hope from that budget in terms of putting him or her back to work. The answer was clearly no, because there was no stimulus aside from allowing RRSP contributions to be utilized in portion toward the purchase of homes. Aside from that measure there was no stimulus, no program, no concerted effort, no sensitivity, no recognition, no admission that 1.5 million fellow Canadian citizens do not have a place to go when the alarm clock wakes them up to start a brand new day. Clearly one measurement is if there was at least naive hope that somehow the Minister of Finance was going to give a sense of optimism to both the unemployed and the general economy. It was not to be, and this was from a government that promised jobs, jobs, jobs, a government that said that the free trade agreement was going to ensure prosperity.

Do we remember the letters during the 1988 campaign from chief executive officers across the country warning their workers that if we do not sign on their places of work would be in jeopardy? Those are the same jobs that are indeed in jeopardy, the same jobs that Canadians have lost.

Where are the transitional programs? Remember when we had a campaign on that. This Prime Minister responded to our leader of the time by saying that we will have the greatest transitional programs that the western world will have ever initiated.

Mr. Harb: Where is it?

Mr. Marchi: My colleague from Ottawa Centre asks: "Where is it?" Canadians are asking themselves: "Where is it?"

They cannot have it both ways. They cannot propel the country into a free trade agreement where more of our sectors are hurting, where more of our people are getting belted, and then at the same time not even help with the realistic measures of transitional programs. It means they do not care about Canadians. It means they are not willing to take some of those moneys, $30 billion a year, that we pay for unemployed Canadians and for people on welfare. We tell Canadians we are going to pay them an average of $12,000 to collect unemployment. Then when these persons are finished unemployment benefits, they go to the government again and the government says: "Now we are going to pay you another $14,000 a year; go collect welfare".

Thirty billion dollars a year, is that a good expenditure to invest in human dignity and in productivity? Are we to accept that this government is always going to hide behind this thing called the debt. No one in this House is irresponsible. We all want to pay our way. We all carry debts. I mean I carry a debt. It is called a mortgage. The bank owns more of my house than I do. That does not preclude me within reason from making other sorts of expenditures either for need or for lifestyle.

In the same way, while the government has responsibilities to maintain and manage this debt situation, it also has to balance the human need of people who are not working, who are not living in dignity, with at the same time an expenditure of $30 billion. It would have paid to have used portions of that $30 billion expenditure to put Canadians back to work. However, as soon as we say this we are tagged as being irresponsible free loaders, money spenders and the like when in fact by putting Canadians back to work we would be giving them back their legitimate dignity. They would be working. They would be productive. They would be paying taxes. They would have a weekly income that supersedes what they were getting from welfare and unemployment. It would allow them to make a few purchases of commodities. Perhaps it would encourage the economy back on its feet again and the cycle would kick back and reduce that $30 billion a year payment for people to sit at home and watch soap operas. That is one of the measurements of a budget.

A member from the other side asked: "Why not trust this government?" It is two weeks after the federal budget was presented and unemployed Canadians are saying: "I still don't trust you".

What about taxation? Bill C–60 provides a general comprehensive framework between the federal and provincial governments with all sorts of taxation. This government, this Prime Minister and this Minister of Finance prided themselves in saying: "We have given you this year through the budget a tax break".

The Leader of the Official Opposition and the member from Windsor who is our finance critic analysed that and concluded that for a family earning on average between $15,000 and $20,000 the net reduction is $2 a year; for a family $30,000 to $35,000, a net reduction of $15. Do you know what Canadians are saying, Mr. Speaker? Canadians are saying: "Thank you very much, Mr. Government, but keep your $15".

It is just like the senior citizens whose pensions were increased by 75 cents a month. I have had senior citizens who have put 75 cents in an envelope postage–free, sent it to my office, and said: "Give it back to the government because we don't need 75 cents. If it is that poor it can keep it".

This is from a government that expects applause for a $15 reduction after 33 new tax increases since 1984 and is the architect of the GST. Even if we give the entire benefit of a doubt that the GST is a good tax, the timing could not have been worse. We have a government that is causing tax strangulation. There are people in all of our ridings, and we know this, who come to see us on Saturday mornings. They tell us that with a municipal tax on property that is going through the roof, particularly if you are a senior citizen on fixed income, the provincial, the federal, the GST, at the end of the month they get a feeling they are working more for the government than they are for themselves. At the end of the month, they are not putting anything away. At the end of the month, they cannot even meet the expenses incurred during that month.

We have people coming to all of our offices and showing us their expenses. At least, they showed some of their expenses to me. They say: "What do you suggest?" You try to help a senior citizen. Do you know what the answer from the federal government is? "Well, if you cannot afford your house, sell it." That is what it is telling them.

We have senior citizens in my riding and in ridings of my colleagues who have worked for their castle for years and years and years, Canadians of all walks of life, new Canadians, old Canadians, Canadian born and immigrants who take pride in having built that home. A senior citizen who has raised a family, bought a home, paid it off, with their kids now off and doing their thing, has the Canadian government saying to them: "Well, if you cannot afford the increased property taxes, sell it". That is the biggest investment most Canadians make in their life. If they are reduced to selling that after paying the mortgage for some 30–odd years on 25 year amortization programs that they used to have, that they no longer have, what are we telling them?

I go back again to the question of the member on the government side. "Do you not trust us now in C–60 to take care of the over–all taxation situation?" From a practical view: why should they?

Take a look at the whole question of family child benefits. There has been much to–do about this much heralded new program. If you are in the $30,000 to $40,000 bracket of income for a family, the increase for your child benefits are $4 more than they are under the current regime. Between 1986 and 1991, some $3.5 billion was removed by this government in the area of child benefits.

Then the government comes along and expects, once again, to be applauded. Then you have the minister of health who takes pride in getting up and being "the killer" of child care in this country. In my riding, and the riding of my hon. friends on this side of the House, when we go door–knocking during and before a campaign–it does not matter–often you see what? You see a six–year–old answering the door who is taking care of his two or three–year–old brother because both parents are forced to work. They cannot afford child care and therefore that is the situation.

Are we really equipping our nation? Are we really permitting the opportunity for men and women to work while at the same time allowing for quality care of our youth of tomorrow's future as the word and as the statement that is over–used goes? To my hon. friend who asked, "Don't you trust this government in Bill C–60 to look after the needs, whether it is children, whether it is on the taxation front, whether it is the unemployed, whether it is training or education?", the answer is no. It is not a no because we happen to be in the opposition and that is the thing to say when you are in the opposition. It is no on behalf of Canadians.

This is not only a question of passing the burden on to provincial governments. This is a question of passing on a burden to the country, a burden that it will be paying for years to come because as I said initially, the world does not owe us a free lunch. Other governments, whether in Europe or in the Asia Pacific, are not only meeting their words with money, but are beginning to certainly have a greater spread between their countries, their economies, their training, their apprenticeship programs and us. Europe 1992 has arrived. It is here. They are getting their act together. We still do not have free trade among our provinces. We have got to wake up. When I say "we", I mean our country. I mean this Parliament that speaks on behalf of the country, at least as it speaks today and hopefully in the future.

If we truly want to equip our youth with the best education, if we truly wish to equip Canadian citizens with training and apprenticeship programs, then why over the last number of years have these transfer payments been far under the rate of inflation or the growth of our GNP? Why? The question will come back to haunt us.

This government is always looking back and always taking things out of 1981 and 1972 and 1953. The challenge for this government today is not to be an erroneous historian. The challenge for this government is to have a breath of vision for things to come. On that score the budget was a failure and Bill C–60 is a failure.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I rise to comment because I am rather displeased with what I heard.

I heard the comment that the hon. member does not want us to refer back to 1981, 1982 or 1983, so I will not. I will respect that wish.

He did refer back, of course, to our period in government, starting in 1984. He talked about the fact that we have been cutting transfer payments and we have not kept pace with the rate of inflation and so on.

The member is from Ontario. I believe his riding is York West. I think I have the name of the riding correct. It is close, anyway. I represent a riding in Ontario as well, not too far removed from his.

I note, based on information that is readily available, that the Government of Canada transferred to the province of Ontario in the period between 1984 and 1991–92 some $9.9 billion, which over that period of time was a 62 per cent increase in funding, well in excess of the rate of inflation.

I would caution the member that when all of that increase took place those problems he has referenced with regard to training and education programs were in fact there and were not being addressed by all the money being thrown at them.

I would like to comment a little further. He stated that our budget had no recognition for those who are unemployed, the problems of the economy, no stimulus, no incentive. I think he used no plus some other adjective about eight or ten times about how this budget was a disaster.

I rise to say that I am sorry if he did not relate to his constituents how this budget was good for his riding, good for my riding and good for all those ridings in Ontario where there is extensive manufacturing. In the manufacturing sector we have improved the capital cost allowance. That is good for investment. That is good for job creation. We have reduced the withholding tax on manufacturers' dividends. That is positive for manufacturing. We have also cut the income tax rate for manufacturers.

I do not know if General Motors is very big in his riding but out my way General Motors has a significant employee base, along with Chrysler and many multinational manufacturing companies. We have just cut the income tax rate. That is good for job creation by those companies.

We have developed a small business financing bond, a venture capital fund. We have enlarged the small business development loan. All of those things are good for Ontario.

I am sorry that the member decided that he would ignore all of those good things for Ontario in his comments about our budget.

Finally, he talked about training and education. We have allotted some $3.4 billion in federal funding toward training and retraining programs for the work force.

I say to the member, I do not want to look back because I respect his comment. What I would like him to do is look forward. There is the federal $3.4 billion going directly into training. He does not want us to mortgage the future. He does not want us to be irresponsible and spend what we do not have, but he does feel we should put more money into the system.

If $3.4 billion is not enough, would the member mind telling me just how much more he thinks the Government of Canada should borrow in order to increase that training budget from $3.4 billion to whatever he thinks it ought to be.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, if you take the comments of my hon. friend, you would think that people in Ontario are dancing in the streets. You would think that after the presentation of the federal budget that they would be rejoicing, that they would be going to the constituency offices of the government members and saying "Thank you so much", but I try to remind the member of Parliament that the statistics speak for themselves better than I can ever articulate the argument: 1.5 million unemployed, another million or so on welfare. In the city of Toronto there are over 10 per cent unemployed. He talks about the bonanza that this budget is going to bring for the manufacturing sectors in Ontario. I have large industrial parks in my riding of York West. Unfortunately, many of those are gone, many of those are hurting and many of those are beyond salvaging, thanks to the measure here.

We also have to keep in mind that the other challenge of that budget was to inspire and induce consumer confidence so that people would be confident in spending to buy the products that our business people and our entrepreneurs wish to create and fabricate.

If you will remember, the government also talked about increasing the small business loans to $200,000. Our critic for entrepreneurship and tourism pointed out in the debate in this House of Commons that many business people cannot even get a $100,000 loan from their banks. The banks are not lending those kinds of money. Yet the government comes along and says: "Hey, we are going to increase the ceiling from $100,000 to $200,000", knowing full well that while it might be good cosmetic public relations, it does not do one iota for the individual who is turned down both by the chartered banks, the top six, and then by FBDB and then comes to us and says: "Now where do I go?". Are we going to tell them: "Well look, the ceiling has been increased to $200,000. Go back to your bank", when they refuse them a loan of $100,000 or less?

What I am asking the hon. member to do is to face the realistic statistics that speak volumes about the health of our economy, about people who find themselves outside of our economy, an economy that is not working for them, a consumer confidence that is not going to inspire any kind of recovery. Therefore, there is the onus on a national government, on behalf of its country and citizenry, to inspire and induce that confidence if it is not going to come from its population.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, just a comment, if I could, because we are talking about the situation in Ontario. It is a situation which you would believe from the one side of the House, the government side of the House, is magnificent and which you would believe from the Liberal side of this debate is deplorable. I think that it is important for some facts to be put before the House and put before the country.

One of the facts which is most crucial to the reality which exists in the province of Ontario at the moment, despite the money which my Conservative friend referred to as having been transferred by the federal government to the province of Ontario, in fact in this most recent fiscal year the amount of money which was cut back, which had been promised to the province of Ontario under the transfers that were supposed to take place under the Canada Assistance Program, amounted to $1.8 billion.

No province anywhere in the country could survive that kind of onslaught. The province of Ontario has been faced with government policy on the Conservative side. I quote from the most recent labour force statistics which just came out this past Friday which show that "full-time employment across this country under this Conservative government went down by 73,000 in this past year, manufacturing employment went down by 76,000 in this past year".

That is what we have had as a record from this government. It seems to me that with a record like that, if I were the member from Ontario on the Conservative side, I would not get up and start asking questions and making comments. I would sit in the back row and hang my head in shame and be pleased that nobody noticed that the member in question is a member of the Conservative Party.

I hope my friend from the Liberal Party would agree with me about this kind of boasting of what Ontario has received. In fact, Ontario has been hit so hard by this government. People across Ontario have been damaged so badly by the free trade deal, by the GST, by the cutbacks which have hit the Ontario budget.

Surely, it seems to me to be mistaken for this member from the Conservative side to get up and suggest that somehow manufacturing has been helped by these extra tax handouts that have been given.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, the other fact and the other great variable of this equation awaits us in a number of weeks when the hon. member's friends in Ontario present their budget. We have had bad federal policy aggravated at the provincial level by a government that seems to be anti-business. If that bill goes throught, it will be passing labour laws and regulations found in no international jurisdiction. It is a question of not aggravating an already bad situation.

I implore the Premier of Ontario certainly to offer some light and some hope in a number of weeks when the government brings down its Ontario budget.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, as I listened to this debate in the last few moments I have become more suspicious of what is intended here than I was before I came in here.

I rise today as a representative of a constituency in a province that out of necessity has been a recipient of equalization and transfer payments for a great many years.

I am sure I speak for all residents of that province when I say that this is not the way we like to have it, but this is the way that it has been. We would rather be in a financial situation where we are on the other end and contributing to the equalization rather than on the receiving end. Unfortunately, at least for the short-term future, it would appear that we will continue to be on this end. As for legislation which affects this, it is of great interest to me and to members of my province.

The whole question of transfer payments and equalization goes to the very heart of being a Canadian. In these times of far-reaching talks on national unity, we must always remember that this country and its various parts must receive the same level of services from its governments. We cannot allow our dedication to deficit fighting create two or more different classes of Canadians.

As residents of this country we are entitled to equal services wherever we live. This is something which we can never allow to slip away. Residents of Prince Edward Island, Atlantic Canada, western Canada, northern Canada and central Canada are all entitled to the same level of services.

I fear that over the past years we have seen some slippage in these principles. The provinces in my part of the country are faced with mounting deficits because of cuts to payments they receive from the federal government.

When the ministers of finance met in January they announced a minor increase in transfer payments. That was small comfort to those provinces that had large pieces of their budgets taken away earlier. I again urge the government not to fight the deficit on the backs of the poorest people in the poorest provinces of our country.

Last week when we were in our constituencies I had the opportunity to speak to students in junior and senior high schools about staying in school. I took this proposition to them. I think I was successful in convincing some who had been thinking about leaving this year in the senior high school to go out into the workforce that they would be better off probably to stay in school for another term. The question that was most often asked of me by them was: "If we are going on to post-secondary education, how are we going to afford it?"

This is a very serious question across the country. The less money going to the provinces for post-secondary education, students are forced to pay higher tuition fees. Of course, when you add that to the fact that they are out there competing with so many people looking for summer jobs, jobs that are not there, this almost says to these students what I fear is coming, that if you do not belong to the rich class, you are not going to be able to go to university.

I hope that I will not live to see that day return to this country. We have a great young population out there. As I told them that day, they are the people who will be running this country in the future. I am sure and I hope that they do a much better job of it than is being done at the present time.

There are a couple of more specific issues here that I would like to speak on.

The plan of the government is to extend these equalization and transfer payments systems for another two years rather than concluding with another five year agreement.

We all know that this government will be forced by law within the next 18 months to go to the electorate. I have a fear that by simply extending the current agreements it is only buying time, trying to get by the next election before some more Draconian measures will be brought in to deal with the provinces.

I hate to see this idea of letting us wait until after the election. When I hear governments saying, "Have we got a deal for you" I begin to get suspicious. If after the election, if by some quirk of fate, that this government happens to be successful, I fear that it will continue the program of dismantling the structures which have made Canada what it is today.

There is a change also proposed in the base year of the payments. This could be another way to allow the government more manoeuvrability in an election year.

Another issue in the proposed legislation is that the government is still trying to coerce the provinces into harmonizing the goods and services tax with the provincial sales tax thereby broadening the tax base for Canadians.

• (1740)

With the generous return of $2 to taxpayers in the recent federal budget, I do not feel that many taxpayers across the country would be enthused by the prospect of harmonization of the provincial tax with the favourite tax of this government, the GST.

All in all I fear that this legislation signals yet another step in the move to change Canada away from a caring, concerned country where the strong look after and assist the weak to one where the government moves its responsibilities to another jurisdiction.

I fear this because we get into the other area of funding for medical services. This is one that has been talked about much in the last number of months. Many speakers have spoken on it.

Many people in the smaller provinces are scared of what is going to happen if the transfers going to the provinces continue to drop. Certainly, we are then going to be into a situation of different levels of medical services across the country.

When the constitutional committee was in Charlottetown during the first meeting it had as it started its journey across the country the premier of my province said that he would not want to see a checker-board type of medical services in this country. I am certain that nobody else wants to see that happen in this great country of ours.

I plead with the government that it not try to move this down the road for its own means, that it will be serious and that it will make sure that the transfers and the equalization payments are maintained and increased in this country. There are still many jurisdictions out there that are going to need the help of the central government and the other more affluent provinces for a long time to come.

I urge this government to be prepared to continue this, to improve it, not to stop it in the two years down the road and not to dismantle it.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment my colleague from Hillsborough. I share his view when he stated that this bill really deals with the very heart of what being a Canadian is.

He talked about the fact that his province, Prince Edward Island, is a province that is a recipient of funding from the national government. There are times when obviously the province of P.E.I. does not generate the wealth that some of the other provinces have.

I would like to say to my colleague that coming from Ontario, most of the people in Ontario, in fact a large majority of them have absolutely no difficulty in sharing the resources and the wealth creation mechanisms that are in the province of Ontario with all regions of the country.

What I am hearing time and time again is that the people of Ontario want a strong national government. They want the standards in medical care and in education in Prince Edward Island to be the same standards that we have in the province of Ontario. They want these national standards.

As the member for Hillsborough said, they want to make sure that this government is equipped to monitor and to maintain those standards in all provinces.

Does he not believe that the direction we are heading in is going to lead to us as national legislators to having a much more difficult time in meeting those national standards?

Mr. Proud: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. colleague for his comments and his question. What I have said here today and what I feel each time I rise in this House to speak on topics regarding budgetary matters, equalization payments, is that I am afraid we are headed in the direction that the country you and I grew up in is changing dramatically. I mentioned this in my speech. I am terrified that we are going to a more selfish type of government in which the rich are getting richer but the poor are not being looked after by the government the way that I knew it and that you knew it.

I see this happening and it is something that has happened over the last number of years. It makes me very sad to see this happening, not just because I come from one of the financially poorer parts of the country, but because Canadians—as you said, people in Ontario, people in Quebec, people in other parts of the country—believe that we should share this way, the way we have been sharing certainly for the last 50 years.

I am sure that if a poll were taken today it would show that. I would urge the government opposite not to go off on that route it seems to be taking, on which it is going to dismantle all of the things that I stand for and that I am sure many people in this House stand for.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, some might have believed the hype put out by the government on this bill which referred to it primarily as "housekeeping". That is the way I took it at first. It seemed as though it was going to be a rather humdrum affair, that there really was not all that much to talk about. I was certainly drawn back to reality when the minister, giving his opening speech on the bill this morning, started bragging about all the transfer payments that had gone from the federal government to the provinces.

I am from Saskatchewan and when I see what has happened to the province of Saskatchewan, not only by the Conservative government in Ottawa over the last few years, but also the Conservative government in power in Saskatchewan over the last 10 years, I can tell you that it certainly got my attention when it was talking about all this money and implying thereby that somehow this had imposed prosperity, not only on Saskatchewan but by implication, from what the minister said, on the nation as well.

It does not take a lot of imagination, study or observation to realize that what the minister was really doing was sounding, in most unequivocal terms, the failure of the very system which he was purporting to uphold.

In Canada, which most of us would acknowledge is potentially one of the richest countries in the world, for the minister to be speaking on this bill and bragging about how the increases to the provinces had gone up many-fold over the last number of years is really an indication of the failure of the system. I say a failure of the system because I would suspect that had we not had a failure of the system then most likely the provinces and the regions would have received less money.

• (1750)

Less money because the system, the economic system we have in place in the country, the economic leadership provided by the federal government, would have lead in truth to a prosperity in the regions. The opposite has been the case.

I know that there are times, certainly in our part of the country, when the economic situation is going to deteriorate somewhat. There are also instances in other parts of the country such as the fishery when you get a severely cold winter and the fish, in order to escape the more frigid waters, go elsewhere and are more difficult to catch. Therefore there is a failure in the fishery.

I do not want to leave the impression that I am not aware of what has happened under the aegis of this government. I am very well aware that along with all the government's other failed programs, its failure to support the fishery, its failure to husband the fishery, has led to economic disaster in the maritimes.

In this federal system of ours, often referred to as a co-operative federalism, we have agreed in our past history that there would be equalization payments to the regions or to the provinces in case of an economic decline. That makes very good sense and I will use Saskatchewan as an example because we are a province in transition and have been for quite some time. There are fewer people on the land now than there were a decade or several decades ago because of the mechanization of the agriculture industry. What this has meant is that many people have had to leave Saskatchewan.

I might add that since this government came to power in Ottawa, and we had a government with a similar philosophy in Saskatchewan, people have been leaving in far greater numbers because of the devastation which its policies have caused to the agricultural community.

The point is that when these people leave they are quite often highly educated people; not always in the universities but many of them with post-secondary education and skills who have gone and helped other parts of the country enormously in their development, whether it be academically through the university trained people or whether it be industrially through the skills which they have picked up in our technical institutes.

There we have the obvious reason why there has to be some kind of a transfer of funds from the federal government for post-secondary education. Transfer funds coupled with the transfer funds through the extended payment financing, the EPF, also include medicare, which over the years, the later part of the 1970s, includes the previous Liberal government under which the funding mechanism for post-secondary education and medicare was changed from specific tied funds to block funding.

We certainly lost a lot of the control which we otherwise would have had. The federal government lost a lot of control which otherwise it would have had for the financing of these programs.

The funding has gone down enormously. I know my time is limited. I will zero in primarily on education.

The university has had to become, as it was described a week or so ago at a conference, a business visage, more business-like. I would suggest that if we are going to insist that the universities become more business-like and if they take on the business pattern that this present government has adopted, not only is the economy of the nation obviously in danger, as has been evidenced, but also the educational system will be as devastated as the national economy has been.

What it has meant for the young people of Saskatchewan is that the university was forced to cut back on the number of professors and other services which it had available. In order to accommodate the decreased capacity of the university to supply services in the province, it raised the entrance requirements and also the tuition fees. You have the double whammy of it being more costly for the young people of Saskatchewan to attend university and you have also made it more difficult for many of them to get into university.

If you can imagine, we have a situation in the province now in which in order to get into some of the colleges in the University of Saskatchewan, the students have to have averages sometimes well over the mid-80s. In some cases, I have heard students have to have averages over 90.

There is no one here who, at least on the surface of it, would not say that they certainly value education. If we are talking in terms of people having to have over a 90 per cent average in order to get into university, we are talking in the realm of absolute stupidity. I remember when I was getting out of high school, the average, I believe, for university entrance was somewhere around 65 or 70 per cent. I would suggest Saskatchewan is a very good example of very well educated people having gone into the universities with those kinds of entrance requirements and having gone on to serve not only the province of Saskatchewan and the country of Canada, but the world, very well with averages that were not anywhere near that high.

I think we have to be careful here. I very nearly said cuts. The fact of the matter is that on the surface of it the number of dollars transferred to Saskatchewan from the federal government has not gone down, it has not been cut. What has happened is that the funds transferred to the province of Saskatchewan for post-secondary education and medicare have not kept up with inflation, which in the reality of the student going to university might as well be a cut because it affects them just as surely as if the government had made the enormous slashes to the funds of the university.

I see my time is almost up and there are so many other things we could talk about. We could certainly talk about the budget for a long time as well. The member from Ontario was bragging about how this budget was so good for business. All these cuts were going to turn, not only Ontario, but the nation into a nation of productive and efficient workers.

Since this nation began, that is the philosophy we have had. We have been giving money away hand and fist to corporations and companies and what have we got? We have got a country that is bankrupt. Four hundred billion is a lot of money. That has been the problem. We have been giving money away to these financiers and it has not helped us a bit. There was a line in an editorial in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix just at the time when someone was suggesting what we ought to do is cut back on the unemployment funds to people. The question asked in the editorial was: Do you really think that putting plenty into the hands of the gentry is going to improve the financial and economic situation in this country? The answer, of course, is no. The failure of this nation and the failure of the economic leaders of this government have been that we have been giving too much money to the corporations. We have been giving too much money to the financiers. What they have done is taken it and run.

I would suggest that when money is put into the hands of the small business people they do not run across the border. I suppose they could, but they do not want to. They want to stay in the communities and they want to develop the jobs there. Certainly the evidence is that small business people do that. I suggest that the time for putting plenty into the hands of the gentry has long since past. I only wish that this government would wake up to the fact that this is the latter part of the 20th century and realize that it does not work. It has not worked in any of our past history. It certainly did not work in the 1930s and it is not working now.

Mr. Speaker, how much time do I have left?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member has three minutes left.

Mr. Fisher: Oh, three minutes. Okay, that is wonderful. I just have time to relate a joke.

I studied theology at one time in the United Church. There was a joke among the theologians at the time about this United Church minister who went down to Vegas. Now United Church ministers and United Church people in general are not gamblers, but he is down there and he is sure that none of his parishioners are around.

He says: "Well, by golly I am going to gamble just once." So he decides he is going to gamble on a horse race and he figures that the best thing to do is go around the stables. He has heard peripherally that is what you do and you can maybe get some inside dope.

So help me, he sees a priest and the priest is paying quite close attention to one of the horses that is in the race. He says to himself: "Ah ha, that is just the kind of inside information I need." So he bets on the horse and it comes in last.

He figured that it served him right because he should not have been gambling in the first place. By chance he ran into this priest a little while later and related to him what he had done. The priest just laughed. He says: "That is the trouble with you United Church ministers, you do not know the difference between the blessing and the last rites."

Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to you that this government does not know when it ought to be administered the last rites.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I thought I would respond on two points.

Obviously there was some comment made with regard to my comments about the items in this budget that are good for Ontario. I do not apologize for those comments at all.

Suffice to say that some of the items in the budget have recognized some of the comments not only from members opposite but from an extensive public community about the problems of manufacturing in Ontario. I am pleased to see that the government, through the budget announcements, has recognized that there are some problems and we have acted in our jurisdiction, where we can, to try to resolve some of them.

The other point I would like to raise is the issue of transfers to the province of Saskatchewan. The member who has just spoken clearly stated that our transfers to the province of Saskatchewan have not kept pace with the rate of inflation. In the period from 1984–85 to the present, transfers to the province of Saskatchewan have grown 89 per cent. That equates to an average annual growth rate of 8.3 per cent, which I would suggest, if the member goes back and looks at the statistics, is probably about twice the rate of inflation over that same period of time. The hon. member says we have not kept pace with the rate of inflation. Was he suggesting that we were transferring less than the rate of inflation or more than the rate of inflation? The facts show that we have transferred to the province of Saskatchewan, transfers that were almost double the rate of inflation. Is that what he was referring to? Is he not familiar with the exact numbers? In 1984 it was $727 million; in 1992–93 it is proposed to be $1.374 billion, 89 per cent more. I would like your comments on that.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, as I said, there are times when untoward circumstances happen in the regions. The most untoward circumstance that happened to the province of Saskatchewan was that it elected a PC government in 1982.

Prior to 1982 the province of Saskatchewan was very nearly a have province, which was quite an accomplishment for that region of the country. Over the years when the CCF first came in and then in 1971 when the Allan Blakeney government came in, the province prospered and the transfer payments going to the province really did decline.

As I said, it is nothing to brag about that we transfer all this money to our province. We should keep in mind that a lot of this money has come to the federal government from the province anyway. The province of Ontario supplies the federal government with 45 per cent of its tax money. A lot of the money belongs to the people anyway.

I know there has been a lot of money going to agriculture in Saskatchewan but the federal government, whether it is the final payment from the Wheat Board or payment under grain stabilization or whatever, fails to take into account that there is a goodly portion of that money that belongs to the people who have paid for insurance programs and so on. It really is very galling that the federal government takes so much credit for it.

While we are speaking of agriculture and support, I suppose we could also talk in terms of lack of support. It is amazing that the last budget had no reference at all to agriculture. That is rather strange because agriculture is certainly in the forefront of the minds of a good many Canadians, not just farmers right now. Of course we have the situation where the marketing boards are in so much danger and talks are going on concerning the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

I was talking to a member of the National Farmers' Union the other day and he told me how in the early days of this present round of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, this government actually had committed Canada to a tariffication of those agricultural products and the flim–flam we have seen lately and the tremendous support it ostensibly has for marketing boards is just that, flim–flam.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to say a few words on this legislation which is an act to amend the Federal–Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act and Federal Post–Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act and to really speak to the legislation this bill is designed to amend.

The equalization payment system and the federal–provincial transfer payment system that is described in this legislation is really, as the minister in introducing the legislation remarked earlier today, the cornerstone of the system of fiscal federalism in Canada and a very key element of what it means fiscally to be a Canadian.

The equalization payments system which has been developed over the last 30 odd years under both Liberal and Conservative governments is really an important aspect of what ties this country together. It allows those people living in provinces and in regions which do not have the fiscal capacity of those living in wealthier regions to be able to have the same level of public services as other provinces and regions that have a larger income base. They may have this base through natural resource endowments or sources of income. In that way they allow Canadians wherever they live to be able to have the same level of services without having to pay extraordinary levels of provincial and federal taxes.

That is really what the federal equalization payment system and the system of transfers for post-secondary education and health are all about. They are a very complex and a very important system of transfers and of government expenditures which have been developed over the years and of which all Canadians have a justifiable right to be proud.

If we look at the equalization payments formula, we will see that it is a marvel tying all of the sources of public revenue, the 37 or so provincial tax forms across the country together, and correcting the inadequacies in each of those tax forms in each of the provinces where they exist in order to make Canadians, for example living in Nova Scotia, able to aspire to the same level of public services as Canadians living in Ontario without having to move.

It really is a very remarkable and uniquely Canadian system that we have here and which we in Canada have a right to be proud of and to want to preserve as our government sought to do by enshrining the principle of equalization as item number 36 in the 1982 Constitution.

The minister was right in describing this as a cornerstone of the federal fiscal system in Canada. The legislation that is before us today makes what are somewhat minor amendments to this system, extending the legislation for two years and making limited changes that will not bind this country for the same number of years that it normally does, which is five years, by only extending the legislation to two.

Nevertheless, the importance of this legislation, the fact that over $22 billion in funds were transferred to provinces and territories last year through this system and more than $8 billion were transferred under the equalization payments program alone, means that parliamentarians ought to be concerned and ought to have the time in this House and through the parliamentary committees to really examine closely what is being done and what is being transferred through this system.

It is unfortunate that we are receiving this almost at the end of the period when those arrangements are expiring. The current equalization payments will expire at the end of March. Here it is March 9 and we are only now receiving the government's plan for extending the equalization payments.

My first point is that I would have asked that the minister give us more time as parliamentarians to understand the implications of what is being proposed in this bill even though it is not radically transforming the bill, but it is making certain significant changes to it. That is my first point.

The next point which I would like to make has to do with the minister's remarks that he has, in fact, consulted for over 20 months with his provincial counterparts. He reports today that they are very happy with the results of the consultation and with the improvements to the tax collection agreements and to the equalization payments that have been proposed in this legislation.

That may well be the case. Perhaps we should be rejoicing the fact that the Minister of Finance was able to achieve this degree of harmony, given the fact that more than $600 million will be transferred to the provincial treasuries as a result of this legislation. I would not be surprised that the ministers of finance of the respective provincial governments would be happy with that arrangement.

I do not consider that a reason to be assured that the provincial governments are satisfied with these consultations because for many months Canadians have been very concerned about the erosion of the role of the federal government, the powers of the federal government and the abilities of the federal government to maintain a strong presence across Canada.

That was expressed time and time again throughout the debates of the special joint committee on the Constitution as one of the reasons Canadians are urging this government not to allow the federal powers to be weakened as they very much have been weakened and given away under this administration to the provinces and indeed to other countries, notably the United States.

I think we should be very concerned about that. I think we should be very concerned that the wholesale transfer of spending authority to provincial governments should not be given unequivocally and unconditionally. The federal government should maintain its abilities to act in the interests of all Canadians.

While it may be a good thing that the provincial ministers of finance were happy with the arrangements that go into this legislation, I have not had a chance to look at it in great detail, but I do not take that as any reason to be comforted as the minister would like to have me and other members of this House believe.

We should be looking at this very carefully for precisely that reason, because this government has been all too prone to giving away the store to provincial governments with the result that we are losing as a federal government and as a federal Parliament the ability to make laws for the benefit of all Canadians.

One of the items that occurred and which is of particular concern to me was a topic of debate through the activities of the joint committee on the Constitution.

It had to do with regional development. Regional development is one aspect and one reason the federal equalization payments exist. The federal equalization payments exist to help those provinces which are regionally disadvantaged to provide public services to attract investment, to attract industry and to enable their populations to have the base of income and of public services to create the wealth and employment that they need in order to reduce the disparities which still persist in this country.

One of the things that worries me in the document of the joint committee is that regional development, according to the majority report, would be transferred to provincial governments. The federal government would in fact not have the authority that it ought to have under the Constitution and that it rightly should have as a national government to promote the interests of all Canadians in particular matters of regional development, those it ought to have under the Constitution.

As a national government it rightly should have to promote the interests of all Canadians in particular matters of regional development, those Canadians who live in disadvantaged or less favourable economic regions of this country. Those situations change over time and the factors influencing them change over time.

In Atlantic Canada, we have persistently suffered as a result of living in a part of the country that has not had the wealth base of the richer provinces such as Ontario, British Columbia, and Alberta.

As a result, we have constantly had to endure receiving higher unemployment insurance payments and transfer payments while we attempt to restructure our economies and to build a base that we can use to be actual contributors to the federal government and to other Canadians in the form of equalization payments.

We need in Atlantic Canada more than anywhere else a strong central government that has the ability and the power to act in terms of regional development and in those areas of competency that impact on regional development, impact on the location of economic activity in this country. Then our natural weakness vis-à-vis the rest of the country can be counterbalanced by that strong central government.

I am glad in a way that this legislation which has been introduced today only extends the current arrangements and those arrangements which have been negotiated by the Minister of Finance with the provincial governments for another two years.

Hopefully by that time we will have a Liberal government in power which will be in a position to redress the dreadful slide which has occurred over the last eight years in terms of the powers and the abilities of the federal government to act for all Canadians.

In having a government with the will to do so and the will to act in favour of the more disadvantaged regions of this country, we will be able to enable the national government to finally act for all Canadians powerfully and strongly.

Our system of equalization transfers will reflect that. We will not be shy about affirming that responsibility which exists in the Constitution and which needs to be reinforced and backed up by a federal government with the commitment and resources with which to do that.

That is my main point about this legislation. I have not had a chance to look at it in detail, to look at the arrangements that are being made in terms of harmonization of tax systems with the provinces.

I know that the government would like to boast about the fact that the GST will be harmonized with the provinces. That is not something that the federal government should be boasting about. It should be ashamed that it has the GST because the GST has caused so much havoc and so much destruction in the Canadian economy across the country.

That is partly because it was not harmonized to begin with, but mostly because it was there and it has done so much to discourage economic activity in Canada to force it south of the border. It has been partly responsible for the severe recession which Canadians are now facing.

In conclusion, I would hope that in the course of the debate on this bill in committee, we will have a chance as parliamentarians to look carefully at the fine print of this legislation, what has been negotiated with the provincial governments, what it means for the future of equalization payments and transfers, the very important responsibility which this government has to have to manage and to promote the interests of all Canadians regardless of where they live.

I hope and expect that that will occur in the next three weeks. I lament that we will not have had more time in which to do so, in which to really take seriously what is really a very fundamental piece of legislation.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment my colleague from Cape Breton Highlands—Canso and I want to ask him a question about federal presence.

The Prime Minister of Canada a few months ago came out with this speech—I do not know if he was on one of his talk shows—and he was saying that Canadians have to be more patriotic. This was on the front page of all the Toronto papers and I am sure it made the front pages of most papers right across the country. Quite frankly, I agreed with the Prime Minister. I think Canadians should be more patriotic.

However, I think that with the way the way the Prime Minister is dismantling programs and handing over added responsibilities to the provinces we are working against the federal presence in our country which ultimately leads to a feeling of patriotism.

When the member talked about the fact that there is close to $30 billion in fiscal transfers equalization payments, I wondered what the member's views would be that somehow tied to those transfers, to those equalization payments, there would be some kind of a federal presence formula so that in the universities and the hospitals and wherever else funding is from the national government through those arrangements, it would somehow be reflected in some kind of a federal presence which would ultimately lead to a feeling of patriotism, the very thing that the Prime Minister says we need so badly.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood who has demonstrated in so many creative interventions in this House and elsewhere ideas that can lead to that renewed sense of patriotism and spirit of national pride that we as Canadians can justifiably have and need to express more openly.

I think one of the problems with this government and with this Prime Minister is that they have been unwilling and timid in their expression of leadership in the face of perhaps opposition in certain parts of the country when it comes to asserting the pride of Canadians and the pride of being a Canadian and reflecting that pride in our national institutions.

There are all kinds of examples in which the government has done that. For example, as my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell mentions, the removal of Canada Post from the logo of the Canada Post Corporation is a small example. There is another example: it is Radio Canada International. Another example which has caused constituents of mine to be outraged is the fact that the National Arts Centre in its travelling tour is not going to be singing the national anthem in the province of Quebec, and the failure of the Prime Minister of Canada to take it to task for that.

Those are just small examples in which we as Canadians who want to affirm our Canadian identity and want to have that transcend our local identity need to see the leadership from our government in order to do that. The member is quite right. I believe it would be an excellent idea to put the Canadian flag up front, to put some symbol of the Canadian government's participation in programs that the Canadian government is participating in.

That was done when the Liberal government was in power. You would see signs that indicated the federal presence very clearly. It was a source of pride and it showed Canadians that their tax dollars have gone into that project.

Those gestures and those symbols are important, particularly at this crucial time.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I just wish to draw to the attention of Canadians that the Tories, after having said they would not alter the transfer formula, have done so. They cut it by 2 per cent in 1986, they cut it by 1 per cent in 1989–90, and they froze the formula in 1990–91. This bill freezes it for another two years. If one takes the total effect of the current Tory decisions on the transfer formula from 1986 to 1995, there will be almost $9 billion fewer dollars transferred to the provinces for post-secondary education.

I want to ask the member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso: What is the unemployment rate in his area and what effect will this reduced amount of money going to his province for post-secondary education have on the unemployed students? As he knows the higher the students are educated, the greater their opportunities of obtaining employment and keeping employment; the lower education of course, the less opportunity. What impact will such a bill have on the students entering post-secondary education in his province?

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): I would like to thank my colleague for that question. In the part of Nova Scotia where I live, the unemployment rate is in the neighbourhood of 20 per cent and in some places much higher. That is the official unemployment rate. The actual unemployment rate is probably much greater.

To the precise question asked, the reduction in equalization and transfers to post-secondary education are already having an effect. They are having an effect by forcing universities in Nova Scotia to raise their tuition fees beyond those in other parts of Canada. They have tuition fees that are the highest in the country and they are making it more and more difficult for students from our area, where their parents are very often unemployed, to attend university to pursue higher education and to prepare themselves for decent well paying jobs in Nova Scotia or elsewhere in Canada.

They are having a very detrimental and immediate impact in my area.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 6.32 o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 45(6), the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division on the motion at second reading stage of Bill C-61, an act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year commencing April 1, 1992.

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1992–93

The House resumed from Friday, February 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-61, an act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year commencing April 1, 1992, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee E.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to order made Monday, March 9, 1992, I would ask the Hon. President of the Privy Council of Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs to make a brief statement on the recognition of Louis Riel.

[English]

LOUIS RIEL

STATEMENT PURSUANT TO ORDER

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to introduce this resolution which I propose to read before my remarks. The resolution agreed to by members of this House and of the other place is the following:

That this House take note that the Métis people of Rupert's Land and the North Western Territory through democratic structures and procedures took effective steps to maintain order and protect the lives, rights and property of the people of the Red River;

That this House take note that, in 1870, under the leadership of Louis Riel, the Métis of the Red River adopted a List of Rights;

That this House take note that, based on the List of Rights, Louis Riel negotiated the terms for the admission of Rupert's Land and the North Western Territory into the Dominion of Canada;

That this House take note that these terms for admission form part of the Manitoba Act;

That this House take note that, after negotiating take Manitoba's entry into Confederation, Louis Riel was elected thrice to the House of Commons;

[English]

That this House take note that, in 1885, Louis Riel paid with his life for his leadership in a movement which fought for the maintenance of the rights and freedoms of the Métis people;

That this House take note that the Constitution Act, 1982, recognizes and affirms the existing aboriginal and treaty right of the Métis;

That this House take note that since the death of Louis Riel, the Métis people have honoured his memory and continued his purposes in their honourable striving for the implementation of those rights;

That this House recognize the unique and historic role of Louis Riel as a founder of Manitoba and his contribution in the development of Confederation; and

2. That this House support by its actions the true attainment, both in principle and practice, of the constitutional rights of the Metis people.

[English]

Sir, it is a particular honour for me to move this motion in the presence in the galleries today of Mr. Yvon Dumont, who is the Speaker of the Métis National Council, the presidents of the Métis associations of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Ontario and the Northwest Territories, and other leaders of the Métis people of Canada.

I should say that I note, as I hope the House will, the presence in the Chamber of the member for Provencher, a minister of this government, representing now the seat that was occupied and to which Louis Riel was elected three times when he was a member of this House.

I rise today to introduce a motion to recognize the role of a Canadian who made a major contribution to the development of Canada as we know it. In this process the Parliament of Canada can take an important step toward recognizing the major role played by the Canadian Métis people historically and today and help them generate pride in their history, in their heroes, and in their country.

I will not attempt to review Louis Riel's entire life and career. That would take much longer than the time available here. It is unnecessary in view of the fact that more has been written about Riel than possibly any other Canadian figure. I do wish, however, to take this opportunity to express my admiration for his devotion to the interests of the Métis people of Canada.

[Translation]

The courage, determination and ingenuity he showed as a young man in leading the Red River community through a troubled time in its history and in resolving a very difficult situation are indeed remarkable. I think it is safe to say that for Riel, returning to the Red River Settlement after several years' absence during which he pursued his studies in Montreal, the thought of becoming involved in a heated political debate was indeed far from his mind.

What he found upon returning, however, was a community which was deeply worried about its future as part of the new Dominion of Canada. The Métis people, who formed the majority in the Red River community, looked to him for leadership, as someone who was articulate, educated, bilingual and knowledgeable in the ways of the country which was preparing to annex their territory.

Louis Riel, this young man barely into his twenties, answered the call for help. He worked closely with the members of the community and with them succeeded in defining and articulating their concerns and objectives. Showing a remarkable respect for democratic procedures, he actively sought to achieve broad consensus for these objectives by organizing public meetings to discuss the demands they would submit to the Canadian government. Riel's success in uniting most of the Red River Settlement behind these initiatives was a major achievement. His failure to win unanimous support was simply a reflection of the deep divisions that existed in the community at that time.

[English]

In the end, Riel's accomplishments in what historians call the Red River resistance were numerous and they were significant. He had an important role in ensuring that Manitoba entered Confederation with provincial status instead of as part of the Northwest Territories, and that religious and language guarantees were incorporated in the Manitoba Act.

The issuing of land grants for Métis to respond to Métis concerns about the need for land for themselves and for future generations was also a part of the legacy of Louis Riel.

Fifteen years later, Riel was again involved in a movement to defend the interests of the Métis people along the banks of the Saskatchewan River. Sadly these events ended in tragedy and controversy. But who could fail to be struck by Riel's deep devotion to his people and his willingness to pay the ultimate price of his life to help his people.

It is now time to recognize the very important and constructive role Louis Riel played in defending the interests of the Métis people and of contributing to the political development of the west and of Canada.

For years Louis Riel's life and death reminded Canadians of the divisions which exist in our society. Recollections of the events with which Louis Riel was involved brought to the surface tensions between aboriginal and non-aboriginal Canadians, between francophones and anglophones, and between western Canadians and central Canadians.

However we must now build on the positive, not the negative dimensions of this experience. The long overdue recognition by this House of Louis Riel's important role in shaping Canada as we know it today is an indication that we have matured as a nation. It is a demonstration that we see in our common history a source of strength, not of weakness.

As one Canadian, one western Canadian, I am proud to have a role in providing an opportunity for that recognition to take place in this House of Commons.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and a privilege to rise in the House today to speak before an audience that in addition to a large number of members of our three main political parties also includes leaders of the Métis people and a number of their representatives.

I appreciate this resolution by the government. I feel the government has taken a major step forward, but although it is a very important step, I would like to see the government take one more step, be it more modest. Let me explain.

[English]

The government has identified a number of important points related to Louis Riel's contribution to Canada, and I am pleased with that. I simply want to add a bit, perhaps build upon the statement that has already been provided.

We have the opportunity as a Parliament to recognize the historic role of Louis Riel as a founder of Manitoba. I am delighted that we are in the process of doing that.

[Translation]

It is an honour for me particularly, as the member for the federal electoral district of St. Boniface. As you know, Louis Riel's family home is in my riding. The parish of St. Vital where he had some very close ties is in the same riding. He was buried in St. Boniface, near the cathedral, and the Red River, which is part of my riding, was a major meeting place for the Métis people.

Although Canadians know their country well, I am afraid that they do not know it well enough. They do not know enough about the story of Louis Riel and the Métis people.

The minister mentioned earlier that Métis leaders in the Red River colony in the Northwest Territories and Rupert's Land had taken appropriate democratic action to protect their traditional rights and their property. People tend to forget this is what motivated Riel to act.

In 1869, Louis Riel drew up a list of rights protecting all settlers living in the Northwest Territories. We should remember that at the time the population was about 12,000. There were about 6,000 French speaking Métis, 4,000 English speaking Métis, and 2,000 other Canadians, although they had yet to become a part of Canada. These people were a major presence in that province.

We must not forget that the transfer of land, this huge land grant, was conditional on the list of rights being accepted by the Parliament of Canada. And it was accepted. In fact, as a direct result of the approval of the list of rights in 1870, the Parliament of Canada passed the Manitoba Act.

[English]

As a result, all lands draining into the Hudson Bay were transferred to Canada on July 15, 1870. As well, the lands contained in the northwestern territories, which now form the major part of Canada, were added. That is a massive addition to our country.

I want to recognize as well that Manitoba was the first western province to join Confederation.

We must remember as well a very unique contribution is the fact that this list of rights that was provided by Louis Riel not only for his people but for all peoples in that area at that time came well over 100 years before our own Charter of Rights and Freedoms. There are many, many similarities between both documents.

[Translation]

The name Manitoba was submitted by Riel and selected by the Parliament of Canada as the name of the new province. The name Manitoba is a native expression which means "the spirit who speaks". Many informed sources have affirmed that Louis Riel is a founder of Manitoba.

[English]

I want to recognize as well that in 1871, during the American Fenian threat, Louis Riel organized the Métis people to protect the border of Canada against this invasion that could have changed the whole course of Canadian history. This is often forgotten.

• (1020)

People have forgotten that Riel and his people were publicly commended for their patriotic actions by Adams G. Archibald, Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba and the Northwest Territories.

After negotiating Manitoba's entry into Confederation, Riel was elected three times to the House of Commons. This was pointed out earlier by the minister, but I think it is worth repeating that Riel was elected three times as member of this House.

In 1884, as you will know, the Métis people asked Riel to form a provisional government that would claim and renegotiate the rights they thought they had obtained from the Parliament of Canada in preceding years. Unfortunately those rights existed only on paper. The Canadian government at the time, and I say this without rancour, ignored the crisis involving Métis and aboriginal people in the Northwest Territories. And, as you know, the Canadian government sent troops to crush the rebellion.

Interestingly Riel gave himself up to the authorities. Later, when they decided what to do with him, he was accused of treason.

According to many experts, Riel was falsely charged, convicted and executed for high treason on November 16, 1885 by the Canadian government. Riel paid with his life for the fact that he headed a political movement that struggled to maintain the rights and freedoms of the Métis people.

[English]

This House should also know that the Constitution Act of 1982 recognizes and affirms the existing aboriginal treaty rights of the Métis people. Clearly I think we would agree that this would not have been done unless there had been some historic reality for the recognition.

Since the death of Louis Riel, the Métis people have honoured his memory on a regular basis. They have attempted in every possible way to bring about the implementation of those previously agreed rights.

[Translation]

I am pleased to support the conclusion of this resolution:

(1) That this House recognize the unique and historic role of Louis Riel as a founder of Manitoba and his contribution in the development of Confederation; and

(2) That this House support by its actions the true attainment, both in principle and practice, of the constitutional rights of the Metis people.

[English]

Having served as a member of the Special Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada, there is some concern right now by the Métis people as to how we can respond to their legitimate concerns and rights. This is a great opportunity to do exactly that.

Acceptance of this resolution would be an invaluable contribution made by us to realize and concretize that the Métis people and Louis Riel had made immense contribution to this country.

Let me terminate very quickly by adding the following. This House of Commons in this period, most of us would agree, of constitutional and political instability is a great opportunity to correct the historical record, to acknowledge the contribution of Louis Riel and his people to Canada, to recognize Louis Riel not only as the founder of Manitoba but clearly, if he was a founder of Manitoba and Manitoba is part of Canada, as a Father of Confederation.

There have been precedents where people have been falsely accused and where we have been able to go back and correct those wrongs. In a sense, we are doing that today.

If Louis Riel's trial were taking place today, if he and his people were to be judged by his peers and by our leading historians, Louis Riel would in all probability not be judged guilty as he was over 100 years ago.

[Translation]

In the spirit of justice, and at a time of great instability in this country, I urge the House to take one more step: Let us recognize Louis Riel, not only as the founder of the province of Manitoba but also as one of the Fathers of Confederation.

[English]

It is time to redress the injury to Louis Riel's name and to his people. I would say that all this House needs to do is to take one more step forward.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, as a member from western Canada and a representative of a large number of Métis people, I am very happy to stand in this House today and support the motion that is before us.

It is not the first time that I have had the opportunity to get up on this very important issue. In 1982, on the 97th anniversary of the hanging of Louis Riel, I, seconded by the then hon. member for Saskatoon East, Father Bob Ogle, asked for a posthumous pardon for Louis Riel. That was the wish of the Métis people at that time. Things have evolved over the years and that is no longer the direct demand of those people. It was a wish and a concern that I had and I expressed on behalf of my constituents. Unfortunately that request was denied under the rules of the House of Commons at that time.

Later on, in 1986, I also had an opportunity to speak on Louis Riel and his contribution to Canada. If I may, I would like to quote one paragraph from that speech because it really relates to what we are doing today in the House of Commons. In the speech I said the following:

> The history of Louis Riel does not have to be debated in this House. I think all of us recognize his contribution. There may be some who would argue about the details of it. However, there can be no legitimate debate with respect to the fact that Louis Riel was the founder of Manitoba and through the process he established, the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta were able to develop in a way which may not have happened had the negotiations not taken place between the people of the Red River settlement and the Government of Canada in the years 1869–1870. That was a recognition which took place between the people who lived in Red River and the people who were running the Government of Canada. It set out the Manitoba Act which is the basic Constitution of the province. It obviously influenced the development of our province. By anyone's definition, that would be good enough to ensure that Louis Riel be recognized as the founder of Manitoba and a legitimate Father of Confederation in his own right. I hope that this would not be questioned by anyone in this House.

The motion that goes before us today moves in that direction. I am happy that the Government of Canada is recognizing Louis Riel as a founder, but I do believe we must go that further step and recognize him as a true Father of Confederation.

As other speakers have indicated, he did negotiate with the Government of Canada. He did set up the rights, the very constitution of the province of Manitoba. He recognized the English and the French, the native and the non-native. It was a true negotiation, in many ways, in almost a Canadian scene where we have the situation where Louis Riel and his supporters were in Fort Garry negotiating through the Catholic Church with the Government of Canada. They were negotiating for their rights. They were negotiating for their people. They were negotiating for the people of the west. They did represent a legitimate authority and a legitimate voice of the people of western Canada.

That recognition is in part being met today, but I think we should go further. I would hope that at some time in the future that would happen. I too would like to bend the rules of the House and recognize the people in the gallery. I know that the minister, when he spoke, recognized that he maybe should not have done that according to the rules, but I think their contribution and their presence today in this House is very appropriate.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Murphy: In the few minutes that I have left, I would like to say that we cannot stop here. We are in the process of another constitutional round. The Métis people must be recognized. They must have their rights enshrined in the Constitution in a more definite manner than is presently being suggested. That must happen. We have had over 120 years since Louis Riel was in Fort Garry and things should be happening on the constitutional scene at this time.

In addition, it should be recognized that the economic plight of many Métis people is still something that is a disgrace to this country. In terms of education, social services and housing, we have a situation which is completely unacceptable. They have been left out as the white men have made the rules of this country and have developed the social programs of this country. They have lost the land base that the minister spoke of. They have lost the economic base and that must be restored. The responsibility of the federal government to the Métis people of Canada must be recognized and must be restored at full value.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I want to draw to your attention this rule that only allows parties and spokespeople from parties and a minister to comment.

I was in the House yesterday but unfortunately went up to my office and just saw the tail end of the parliamentary secretary saying that there had been consultations with party leaders on this motion. Without getting into the debate of the motion, I do not think Standing Order 33(2) precludes other members who are not members of parties from participating in a brief way in this debate.

I appreciate that the rule is very circumspect, but the rule is so tight that it does not even give the opportunity for members to vote on this type of motion. The motion moved yesterday makes the motion automatic.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, I am begging your indulgence to say a few words. I would like to make a few comments on the speeches previously made. I have been in this House, as the hon. member for Churchill mentioned, when there have been other suggestions of rewriting Louis Riel history—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. Is there unanimous consent to allow the member to say a few words?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I will be very short.

I come from an area where there was an injustice done many years ago, when in 1755 the Acadians were expelled. For all the laudable reasons mentioned here about Mr. Louis Riel, member of the House of Commons, perhaps there should be a motion brought by me to redress that wrong. Where do we stop? Benedict Arnold, if he had been on the side that won the war, would not have been hung.

All I want to say is that there have been positive remarks made, especially those by the hon. member for St. Boniface. The motion just hit me yesterday and I most likely might have agreed with it. I appreciate the indulgence of members and I am not going to abuse it. The motion hit me.

We came back after a break. There was not a question to the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs about what is ripping the country apart and out of the blue we start to rewrite a page of history for something that was done in the past.

I must say in conclusion, if there was ever a commentary on the sad state of this Parliament, regardless of some of the nice things said about it today in some of the speeches, this is the best example.

Goodness gracious, who knows? In another Parliament 100 years down the road when we revise history and are politically correct, we will find that Mackenzie King was a security risk because he did things during the war according to a medium's ball that in effect were very risqué.

I could go on. The record shows that Churchill had something to do perhaps with that horrible bombing in Dresden which may or may not have been necessary. He kept quiet about Coventry. The record goes on and where does it stop?

Surely members of this House who have spoken well about the past will have the intestinal fortitude to speak on present problems and have the minister respond to questions about the present constitutional problems. That is part of the reason I wanted to speak.

I want to make it very clear that I agree with the member for St. Boniface that if the trial was today many other factors would apply. The fact of the matter is that if this motion had been in the House then, it would not have passed.

I just think it is a waste of our time to in effect revise history because of something which circumstances changed later.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to order made Monday, March 9, 1992, the motion regarding the recognition of Louis Riel which appears on today's Notice Paper is deemed to have been moved, the question thereon is deemed to have been put, and the motion is deemed to have been adopted.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF FRENCH SPEAKING PARLIAMENTARIANS

PRESENTATION OF REPORT OF ACTIVITIES OF CANADIAN SECTION

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleague from Richmond—Wolfe and pursuant to Standing Order 34, I have the honour to present to the House, in both official languages, the report of the activities of the Canadian section of the International Association of French Speaking Parliamentarians at the meeting of the board and commission for co-operation and development held in Berne, Switzerland from January 19 to 25, 1992.

ENVIRONMENT

SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 108(1), I have the honour of presenting, in both official languages, the second report of the Standing Committee on the Environment entitled Environment and the Constitution.

The report received the unanimous support of all members of the committee. The committee commenced its study in June 1991 in the context of a broad constitutional debate with particular emphasis on the future role of the federal government in environmental matters.

Members will know the environment knows no borders. Water pollution, ozone depletion, global warming and other similar issues are extremely complex both in terms of causes and solutions.

The committee strongly advocates partnership and co-operation among all levels of government. Mechanisms must be established to encourage and strengthen partnership and co-operation and to avoid unnecessary and expensive overlap.

Our committee also believes there is need for a strong federal power to negotiate international commitments and agreements. It is very important in the present context of the lead-up to the earth's summit.

Further, the residual power, peace, order and good government must be recognized as a basic foundation enabling the federal government to deal with environmental needs.

[Translation]

I thank members of all three parties for their patience and dedication.

Pursuant to Standing Order 109 the government's response is requested.

Routine Proceedings

CANADA EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION ADVISORY COUNCIL

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Monique Vézina (for the Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-63, an act to dissolve or terminate certain corporations and other bodies.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mrs. Vézina (for the Minister of Finance), moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

VICTIMS OF CRIME

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by a number of residents of the Victoria area calling on this Parliament to adopt Bill C-310. Unfortunately in private members' hour yesterday the bill did not receive the approval of the House and falls from the Order Paper.

The sentiment of those petitioners should be filed with the House. The bill called for the establishment of a criminal injuries compensation plan, and I can assure the House and the petitioners that it is my intention to reintroduce the bill in the hope the House will have an opportunity to again do the right thing.

JUSTICE

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, my petition this morning has been sent to me by citizens of Mississauga and deals with the nasty murder of Nina de Villiers on the night of August 9, 1991.

A crime was committed by a person who, while on bail, was allowed out on a simple signature without any great posting of money. The situation calls for reform of the Bail Reform Act of 1972 and the Parole Act or other statutes, and the better enforcement of the current rules by our police forces and others involved in law enforcement.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present a petition with 38 signatures with regard to the murder of Nina de Villiers on August 9, 1991 which has exposed serious deficiencies in the criminal justice system.

There are many vulnerable persons who have little protection under the current system. Women, children and disabled persons are particularly at risk. Therefore, the statutes governing the criminal system in Canada should be revised to reflect societal attitudes.

These petitioners request that Parliament recognize that crimes of violence against the person are serious and a harm to society and ask that the Criminal Code be so amended.

• (1040)

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I too have petitions in support of the parents of Nina de Villiers signed by a number of my constituents from Caledonia, Hagarsville, Dunville and surrounding area.

These petitioners are requesting Parliament to recognize that crimes of violence against persons are serious and abhorrent to society and to amend the Criminal Code to help deal with these situations.

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure of introducing a petition to this House, signed by many of my constituents as well as constituents of Nepean, Osgoode, Gloucester, Lanark and area.

These constituents are disappointed with the gasoline prices in the Ottawa–Carleton region and are calling on the government to take action in order to correct this injustice.

JUSTICE

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I too am pleased to present a petition which was triggered by the death of Nina de Villiers in August 1991.

A large number of the people of Sudbury have signed this petition. They want to underline their concern about the criminal justice system and the fact that the sentencing of many violent criminals does not reflect the seriousness of the crimes they commit.

The petitioners ask that amendments to the Criminal Code, Bail Reform Act and the Parole Act be made to recognize the seriousness of these crimes.

HOUSING

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition here from a number of residents of Sudbury. They are residents of a co–op housing project. They underline their concern with the lack of affordable housing for many others.

Their petition is especially important at this time when this particular government has announced that it will completely go out of the co–op housing market. These people are asking very seriously that this government remain in the subsidized housing area because there is a lack.

TAXATION

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition today signed primarily by residents of the central interior of British Columbia, Williams Lake, 100 Mile House, 150 Mile House regarding tax fairness.

The petitioners call upon the government to ensure that it brings in an effective and fair tax system in Canada.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, if Question No. 110 could be made an Order for Return, this return would be tabled immediately.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House that Question No. 110 be deemed to have been made an Order for Return?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Question No. 110—Mr. Boudria:

Since 1984, how many contracts has Secor Inc. entered into with (a) the government (b) crown corporations (c) government agencies and, in each instance, for how much and for what purpose?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief.

Members will know that yesterday I appealed to Your Honour, given the very important and unfair decision on Friday by the U.S. commerce department on the softwood lumber tariff on exports from Canada to the United States and the importance of that issue to all of Canada and the over 300 forest communities whose jobs will be potentially threatened by this decision.

At that time, the ruling was to give consideration to how this issue would develop. Since yesterday, when I raised this matter in the House for an emergency debate, the issue has escalated dramatically. We know cabinet is meeting to consider retaliation against the United States. This is quickly escalating into a dramatic trade war between our country and the United States.

Given that the government is considering what actions should be taken, if any, against the United States in an attempt to defend our sovereignty and our right to make our own decisions in the way we manage our forests in Canada, I think it is opportune and timely that this House have an opportunity to present its opinions and comments so that the Prime Minister can hear what Canadians have to say about this issue.

I would again urge you to consider this matter seriously to give the House and all members an opportunity to have their say on this very important issue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I know the hon. member presented his case yesterday and also again today. The Chair is looking at it as the day progresses. I know the table officers and the Speaker particularly will be looking at it. At this time we would like to reserve and to have another look at the application.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Thursday, February 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government; and the amendment of Mr. Gray (Windsor West) (p.7631).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize the hon. Minister of Veterans Affairs, because of Statements by Ministers the sitting of the House will be extended 27 minutes during the lunch hour.

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to take part in the budget debate again today and to speak to Canadians about the importance of this government's fiscal plan as outlined by the Minister of Finance on February 25 in this very Chamber.

At best, the debates in this House combine partisan differences with healthy exchange of views and ideas and allow the public to gain some perspective on what the issues are and how we as members of Parliament approach those issues.

We as a government have just produced a document in the form of the budget that in many ways sets out our philosophy. The vast majority of those who follow government and political issues think that this budget document is a very positive approach to managing the Canadian economy in these difficult times.

Our country faces a very serious threat to its economic future in the form of a large accumulated debt. Let us all be honest and admit that. We are spending 36 cents out of every tax dollar just to pay the interest on our accumulated debt.

To pay 36 per cent of all of your family income to service your own personal debts would cause a family crisis. It is a crisis for our Canadian family as well. If we do not exercise control of our spending, we will destroy our ability to build a solid future for Canada.

I know there are some members who feel that our present difficulties are so great that they must be tended to on a crisis basis. I know that people have immediate needs and they are hurting. But we have to realize that the problems of a debt plagued economy can never be solved by more spending any more than the problems of an alcoholic can be solved by more alcohol.

I have heard members of the New Democratic Party calling for the expenditure of several billions of dollars for job creation. I know a proposal of that sort always has a certain appeal.

One of the features of an opposition party is that it desires to paint the government as one that does not care about the unemployed and the problem of unemployment could be solved if only the government cared enough to spend a few billion extra dollars.

In this case our government would have to borrow those billions of dollars and ultimately pass the responsibility for repaying it to our children and to our grandchildren.

There had been a time when Canadians thought we could go on a spending spree and isolate ourselves from a world-wide recession. Today, however, the unpaid bills of the past have effectively eliminated our room to manoeuvre. Had our predecessors been wiser today we would have had tens of billions of extra dollars each year to spend on those kinds of experiments, but they were not and we do not.

Some opposition members seem to feel that we should be further mortgaging our future for the sake of short-term gain. To those members we can only recommend the example of the premiers of Ontario and British Columbia. The former tripled his deficit and achieved nothing. The latter has now adopted the common sense approach to expenditures that some members of the socialist party have been known to call heartless.

It is not heartless to put long-term stability of Canada ahead of the futile public relations exercise in more government spending. We all must realize that the role of government is to get the fundamentals of the economy right so that people find long-term, meaningful, productive jobs in the private sector.

• (1050)

We cannot throw away the long-term interests of all Canadians to solve what we think will be short-term problems. Bringing spending under control is a very long and agonizing process. We are forced to balance the present needs of Canadians against the long-term needs of our country.

This budget represents that balance. Some members would seem to prefer that with one breath to protest the decreases in expenditures we have made and then condemn us for not doing enough to lower the deficit.

If I understand the position, we should increase spending, decrease the deficit and lower taxes simultaneously. I am sure that plays well with the dream merchants but it does not provide much substantive input nor does it help Canadians to face up to economic realities.

I should like to make a few comments about my own department, Veterans Affairs Canada. In this budget we have tried to balance the needs of our clients, the veterans of Canada, with the necessity to control spending. Some areas have been increased and others decreased.

There has been a $22.5 million decrease in war veterans allowance as a result of declines in the client population and shifts to other sources of support in the social safety net of our country.

At the same time as our veteran population ages, however, its health care needs increases. We have made an additional $100 million available for those needs through purchases of new services, construction of new long-term veterans beds and increased funding for the Veterans Independence Program. At the same time we have increased disability pension benefits by nearly $65 million.

These measures are an indication of the very sensitive way in which we have tried to control expenditures.

[Translation]

Veterans risked their lives to preserve our country's freedom and independence and in return we provide them with the best programs and benefits in the world.

As Minister of Veterans Affairs I am proud of these achievements and Canadians should be proud of them too.

[English]

We in Canada have the best veterans affairs programs in the world.

Over the last year we have spoken with many Canadians about what the 1992–93 federal budget should do for Canada. These Canadians from every walk of life told us that they want realistic lasting solutions to Canada's economic problems and not quick fixes that were tried in the past and failed.

They want us to cut the deficit. They want us to cut government waste and duplication and to streamline government operations. They want us to better prepare our youth and our labour force to meet the challenge of a brand new global economy in which we find ourselves competing. They want us to be compassionate and caring with our social programs, especially protecting the more poor and needy Canadians.

This government listened and responded with action in these very difficult times.

In this budget we will substantially reduce the deficit. We will cut spending. We will cut taxes. All 14 million Canadian taxpayers, 1.5 million in my own area of Canada, Atlantic Canada, will have their income taxes reduced this year.

We will restructure and streamline the operations of government. We will increase support for research and development in our industries, in our economic sector. We will reduce the tax burden from manufacturing and the processing sector. We will enhance our assistance to small business.

We will streamline and enrich support for families and for children and we will introduce a home buyers program whereby Canadians can access funds from their RRSPs to buy or build a home. We will increase our support for Canadians with disabilities and we will provide additional tax assistance to our students.

This is what Canadians asked for in our consultations. Canadians asked, we listened, and we delivered.

This is an appropriate budget for Canada in these trying times. I support it and I call for all members of this House to do so as well.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like to clarify that the two speakers with 10-minute speeches will be the hon. Minister of Veterans Affairs and the hon. member for Manicouagan. There will be five minutes for questions and comments.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister could answer a question. His government is either getting rid of or reducing a number of agencies.

Let us take the Economic Council of Canada. Does the government really think that getting rid of the Economic Council is sound public policy at a time when our economy is in enormous difficulty largely because of the policies of this government?

I will try to make this simple. A friend of mine who has six children told me the other day that the government has ruined our natural resource exports by its high dollar and formerly high interest rates.

The government is now spending about 300,000 ounces a month of the Bank of Canada's gold in an attempt to try to keep the dollar above 84 cents currently and in an attempt to try to fool Canadians into thinking that it has reduced the deficit, which of course it has not.

The government's spending has been about $30 billion a year during six or seven good years.

There is an old saying that nobody ever went broke underestimating the intelligence of the American people. I would put it that this minister and his government are treating Canadians as if they were all completely and utterly illiterate in terms of the economy.

I wonder if the minister can give some intelligible answers to those questions.

Mr. Merrithew: For seven years now this government has tried over a period of time to reduce the duplication in government, to avoid some of the expenditures where we can save dollars, the taxpayers' dollars. That is what the people of Canada have asked for and we have been doing it over a period of time. Most Canadians support that.

In this particular budget we have indicated that we can reduce or amalgamate 46 different agencies, boards and commissions of the government, all of which costs the Canadian taxpayers a great deal of money. Now some people may wish to debate whether some of those are wise decisions or not.

In my case, in my own department we have abolished the Veterans Land Act simply because we have not given any additional loans or mortgages to the veterans of Canada since 1977. We have essentially reduced that whole operation by 80 per cent even in the last three or four years.

Sometimes it is found that there are agencies in government like the Farm Credit Corporation. Because many of these properties bought through VLA by our veterans after the war are farm properties, perhaps CMHC can manage those.

We can find a way to reduce 64 positions and save the government and the taxpayers of Canada a lot of money. We have chosen to do that and in fact, in this particular budget, we have reduced 46 of those operations.

The hon. member knows full well that from time to time every government in the history of Canada has had to support the Canadian dollar and bolster the dollar for obvious economic reasons. He knows that full well. To try to say that has never happened before under the party which he represents is of course absolute nonsense. He knows this happens from time to time.

The dollar of course has gone down. Those who would like to export must have the Canadian dollar at a lower rate or would like to have it, but there is a limit to what the dollar level should be and the government has to intervene on occasion.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, two weeks ago today, the Minister of Finance tabled the budget of the Government of Canada for the 1992–93 fiscal year in the House of Commons. This budget sends positive signals to all Canadian taxpayers and to the business community.

• (1100)

Let us take the next few minutes together, Mr. Speaker, to look at the highlights of this budget for fiscal 1992–93. First, the budget brings big reductions in personal income tax. For many years, Canadian taxpayers were used to seeing their taxes go up year after year, budget after budget, under successive federal governments. On February 25, Canadian taxpayers for the first time heard their Minister of Finance announce income tax cuts.

The individual income surtax will be reduced from the present 5 per cent to 4 per cent as of July 1, 1992 and 3 per cent as of January 1, 1993. This measure will give Canadians $500 million more in after tax income in fiscal 1992–93 and $1.2 billion a year after that.

The most important point is that all 14.6 million Canadian taxpayers will benefit from this measure. Undoubtedly it will help the Canadian economy recover because it will give Canadian consumers more spending power so that they can acquire goods that they had been planning to buy for years but had postponed buying because of the difficult conditions in the Canadian economy. This tax measure in the budget will now help these people acquire goods that they have needed to buy for years. This is excellent news for Canadians.

The second important measure announced in the budget will allow withdrawing up to $20,000 tax-free from a registered retirement savings plan to buy or build a principal residence. This measure, together with the current low interest rates, should encourage many Canadians to buy or build a home. It should stimulate a major recovery in the construction industry and in real estate sales.

Home building creates jobs and provides significant economic benefits in businesses that sell construction materials, hardware and electrical equipment, and of course it stimulates job creation as well.

Home ownership is a right with a very long tradition in Canada. Use of a portion of a registered retirement savings plan to buy or build a principal residence will contribute to facilitating access to home ownership.

The Minister of Finance also announced tax breaks for the manufacturing and processing industries. It must be noted that the manufacturing industry provides one job in five in Canada and accounts for one-fifth of the total production of goods in the country. Canadian processors and manufacturers export over 40 per cent of their production. They must now meet the challenge of globalization. To help them meet this major challenge, the Minister of Finance proposed in the budget that the tax rate for profits derived from manufacturing and processing be lowered from 23 to 22 per cent as of January 1, 1993 and then to 21 per cent on January 1, 1994.

This is another positive measure that will allow for Canadian manufacturers and processors of new products, for technological change and for investment in new market research.

Small businesses will also benefit from positive measures announced in the budget.

The Small Business Financing Program will help small businesses in financial difficulty, including farmers, to obtain loans at lower interest rates.

At the present time the ceiling for loans to individual small businesses under the Small Businesses Loans Act is $100,000, but under the new budget it will be doubled to $200,000.

It is a fact that small businesses are the key to the healthy growth of Canada's economy, including job creation.

Although the federal tax treatment of small businesses is among the most favourable in the world, the changes announced in the budget will make it even more favourable.

This is a measure that will be favourable to small businesses and is expected to encourage investment in the many sectors of our economy in which small businesses are particularly active.

I would also like to say a few words about the program to improve family allowances. In recent months, a committee of members of our party, chaired by the hon. member for Calgary North, prepared a series of recommendations aimed at improving and increasing the effectiveness of federal assistance to Canadian families.

These suggestions were given due consideration, so much so that now there will be one monthly child benefit. The benefit will be as much as $144 per month for one child, for a total of $1,733 per year. Benefits will be targeted toward lower and middle income families and will not be taxable.

There have also been major improvements in the child care expense deduction. This measure should help low income families where both parents work.

These are the positive results of the work done by a group of members sitting on this side of the House, results that reflect the response their work received from the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of Finance.

Taxpayers may wonder how the government intends to finance the measures announced in the budget. The answer is simple: the government will pay for these tax measures by continuing to reduce spending, streamlining services, eliminating agencies and advisory committees, and privatizing Crown corporations.

This government will continue its efforts to reduce the deficit and the debt. It will reduce government bureaucracy, encourage private ventures and help business develop new products and reach new markets.

More important, the budget introduces measures that will help reduce personal income tax and the corporate tax burden, something unprecedented in Canadian history.

Canadians welcomed these measures with enthusiasm, which augurs well for economic recovery and job creation.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you for giving me a chance to speak in this important debate on the budget brought down by the Minister of Finance.

• (1110)

You know, Mr. Speaker, this budget is trying to fool Canadians. It offers us fine words but does nothing to improve the country's economy or to help the millions of Canadians who are victims of this government's policies to pick themselves up and regain control of their lives.

For example, the government claims that this budget will reduce taxes for Canadians who are still suffering from the effects of the 33 tax increases, including the GST, that the government imposed on them. However, Canadians are not stupid and when they look at this budget closely, they will realize that the government is trying to trick them.

Indeed, what does this budget offer Canadians below the poverty line, those who have to make do with an annual income of $15,000 to support their family? Well, I will tell you: It reduces their income tax by $2 a year. For an average family earning about $40,000 a year, the budget offers a $27 reduction. That is not much.

The new child benefit program, for its part, is hardly better. An average family gets little from this proposal. For example, a family with an annual income of $40,000 will receive only $44 more in benefits. In three years, the value of this benefit will be 10 per cent less and in ten years, most families will no longer receive any assistance since this benefit is not indexed to inflation.

The government's proposal will increase aid to children by $2.1 billion over five years starting January 1, 1993. The Minister of Finance must hope Canadians have forgotten that between 1986 and 1991 the Conservative government reduced this aid by over $3.5 billion. The new child benefit program still does not give back to Canadian families all the money that the government took from them, and this program completely misses the boat as far as day care is concerned.

All this government's advertising about this new program hides the obvious fact that it has abandoned the commitment it made to a national child care program that would provide facilities for children while their parents had to work.

In addition, the government is proposing to increase the deduction for child care expenses by $1,000, but obviously this deduction is of no use to families whose income is too low to benefit from it. Furthermore, this program will not take effect for a year. If it provides additional benefits, these will not be made available to Canadian families at a time when they are suffering the consequences of this very serious recession brought on by this government.

On the positive side, the government saw fit to take up the Liberal Party's recommendation on using registered retirement savings plans for buying a first home. Unfortunately the Conservatives neglected to include all the details of this proposal. Besides, when we see how they treated housing, the positive feature of this budget pales by comparison. The Conservatives cancelled the co-operative housing program. They slowed the growth in funding which the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation provides for other low income housing programs.

Of course the possibility of using RRSPs and the lower down payment requirements will be useful, but these programs do nothing to help people who cannot afford to invest in RRSPs or even make a 5 per cent down payment to buy a first home. Instead of making it easier for tens of thousands of low income Canadians to own their own homes, this budget makes it much harder for them to have access to decent and affordable housing.

As far as education is concerned, this budget has very little to offer. The government slightly increased education tax credits from $60 to $80 per month of full-time study in a post-secondary institution. However, the budget contains no measures to restore the amounts cut in transfers to the provinces for post-secondary education.

These cutbacks mean that far fewer young people will be able to go to university next year. In fact, an increase in the tax credit for post-secondary education will not be much use, if young Canadians cannot be admitted to university because of cuts in transfer payments to the provinces for post-secondary education, since universities will have to reduce the number of students as a result of these cuts.

Mr. Speaker as you know, the Conservatives have been boring us with their empty slogans ever since they came to power, calling for the country to invest in education and research so it will be better able to meet the challenges of an increasingly competitive world. However, what they are saying does not mean a thing, because when we look for concrete commitments in these areas, we soon realize they are involved in a scorched earth operation and are busy turning this country into an empty shell.

The budget is apparently changing the tax system to benefit the corporate sector. However, whatever this budget does to help business will never compensate for the tremendous harm the Conservatives have done to business, especially in the manufacturing sector, with their high dollar and high interest rate policies.

This budget has taken no steps to reduce interest rates. Nor does it address the need to reduce the value of the Canadian dollar. The government seems to want to keep our dollar high, despite protests from companies in the resource sector and from manufacturers who claim that a lower dollar would help make them more competitive on international markets.

The government's attitude has had a devastating impact in my riding. The government's economic policies have wreaked havoc in the forestry sector in my riding, leading to 300 lay-offs in Atholville, while 400 are scheduled at the plant in Dalhousie. Nevertheless, the government stubbornly maintains its disastrous policies.

When the government talks about basic principles, I find it very hard to take it seriously. How could I when this government refuses to admit in the budget that there is anything wrong with basic principles which are aimed at maintaining interest rates and the Canadian dollar at current levels and goes against the best interests of Canadian business? The same government also refuses to acknowledge that the GST and the free trade agreement were a terrible mistake.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, this government's economic policies have led to record levels of personal and business bankruptcies in Canada. There can be no economic growth until businesses are able to develop in an environment that is relatively stable and healthy.

[English]

I want to outline some of the effects of the budget as it pertains to my riding, the riding of Restigouche—Chaleur in northern New Brunswick.

As I mentioned previously, the Atholville mill is on a permanent shutdown. We are hoping that it will be reopened, but we are looking at 300 lay-offs in that area. The Dalhousie mill is looking at 400 lay-offs. It may even be as high as 500 before time is out.

We have businesses that are going bankrupt. In fact, I spoke to a senior citizen yesterday who is trying to make ends meet with a restaurant in Tide Head in my riding. Mrs. Joyce Mabie, when we spoke for about half an hour, mentioned some of the problems that she is having with her business and some of the help that she needs. Adjacent to my riding, at Stone Consolidated of Bathurst where a lot of my constituents work, there is a possibility that mill may close as well. Therefore, the budget that we see before us does not give us any solutions to those types of problems. It does not give us any hope.

What I am trying to say today, and I hope government members and ministers will be listening, is that we need some assistance. We need the government to start stimulating the economy and it has not been doing that. It has been doing the opposite in some respects.

What we need in our riding at the Dalhousie mill is a new paper machine. I do not expect the government to say it is going to buy a new paper machine for the mill in Dalhousie, but I expect it to make it easier for that company to be able to purchase a new machine, to be able to invest in new machinery. I would hope that the government would sit down with company officials and look at that situation in a realistic fashion and say: "What can we really do to help with the Dalhousie situation?"

There is a similar situation in the Atholville mill. We need that mill reopened. We need a value added product there. It is now making chlorine-free pulp. There should be a market out there. The dollar has fallen slightly and there should be a reason to reopen that mill in the near future.

The province of New Brunswick has developed a plan to help the forestry industry in New Brunswick. It is a controversial plan in some respects, but the federal government has not really sat down and said: "This is what we want to do for the natural resource sector". What is its plan? That is what we are asking the Government of Canada to do. It has that responsibility.

There should be a diversification agreement specifically for the northern New Brunswick areas, not just to get those mills back on line but to assist the unemployment rate in my riding which is 18.2 per cent. There are other people out of work as well. There should be some type of strategy, some type of plan put in place to assist those people to get back to work.

There should be more federal presence in the riding. The existing federal presence should remain. There should not be any cutbacks. The Chaleur airport has been threatened with a cutback. There should be no diminution of services at the Chaleur airport.

Post offices should remain open. They should not be closing. What type of signal or message is being sent out to the business community? If the government is withdrawing services from an area, what confidence does this give to businesses to continue to expand, or even to stay in business?

The ports of Dalhousie and Belledune have no strategic plan. There is no development, no promotion of those ports by the federal government. That has to be done.

The wharfs at Pointe-Verte and Petit-Rocher need upgrading for fishermen.

Turning to municipal infrastructure, I was on the phone yesterday with the mayor of Jacquet River. He is looking for financing. They have some financing available from the province and from their own community to put water and sewage in their community. Why is the federal government not making plans to assist those types of communities?

When we are talking about some of these plans the rhetoric from the government is: "Those are short-term solutions. We are putting in place long-term solutions". Well, short-term should go with long-term. A very direct example of that, and I hate to use medical examples, may be someone suffering a heart attack that may have been caused by a poor diet arriving at a hospital. They do not put them in a little room and say: "Here is your diet. Follow it". They treat the patient right away. This is what we need right now. The economy is a patient and it is going to die if we do not treat it immediately.

We definitely need long-term solutions. But the patient is in intensive care right now. We need compassion and we need solutions immediately.

Another area that is of great concern to me is the area of severance pay for some of these employees who are going to be put out on the street. Their severance pay is regarded as earnings and therefore makes them ineligible for unemployment insurance. I would hope that the government would look on that as a short-term measure and maybe change the regulation to allow people to draw their UI and use the severance pay to either invest in business, to open their own business, or to at least make ends meet in the meantime while they are pursuing employment.

Speaking about employment and immigration, the Minister of Employment and Immigration recently made an announcement in the riding with regard to a major project. I congratulate him on that and ask him to continue in that vein. No doubt, we always want more. There are other projects. That was Recreaplex in Dalhousie, but we do have a major project in Campbellton, the civic centre in Campbellton. The Eel River Bar Reserve is looking for a major project, a community centre-office building complex for the Jacquet River, St. Quentin and Beresford areas. I would hope that the minister would look upon those projects with compassion, flexibility and assist those areas.

I guess my time is almost at an end. I would like to say that one of the problems when we look at the budget is not necessarily what is in the budget. It is what is not in the budget. That is the key.

There is no new plan for recovery. There is no new deal for Canadians. There are approximately 1.5 million people out of work. There are approximately another 1.5 million people out of work and not looking for work. The real statistics when we talk about unemployment are that there are three million people out there who are unemployed.

There is no real plan to put those people back to work. In fact, there is a cutback in employment and immigration in job creation programs. That is a concern of mine. There is no hope for the unemployed. The government is saying: "Listen, we have accepted you. You are unemployed. There is nothing we can do".

I say to the government, through you Mr. Speaker, that the budget has to be redrafted with compassion and flexibility. The government has to understand that there are areas that are suffering. My area, for instance, has an 18.2 per cent unemployment rate. That does not make sense in this day and age.

Canadians need a new deal. Enough is enough with regard to the deficit. It is a problem but I guess the biggest deficit that we have is the deficit of new ideas.

I think about my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood. I saw him on TV on the weekend expressing his ideas with regard to taxes and his idea about the single tax. I am not saying we are totally in support of it, but why not look at this new idea?

I should say, in wrapping everything up, Canadians need a new deal. We need a new budget and definitely we need a new government.

[Translation]

Mrs. Marie Gibeau (Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank our hon. colleague in the opposition whose role it is indeed to discredit government action.

However, the comment most often heard today is that government is not giving enough, which would tend to indicate that it has nonetheless managed to give something and to take concrete steps.

I think it is important that I rise today to help the people in the galleries, as well as those who are watching this debate at home, make allowances for what they hear from the opposition whose role it is, after all, to raise problems and mention negative aspects that do not necessarily exist.

What must be said, in my opinion, is that the budget recently tabled by our Minister of Finance meets the expectations and comments made to us in our ridings. Our constituents have requested realistic, lasting solutions to both economic and social problems, not quick fixes.

I must remind this House that upon coming to office our government inherited a $206 billion debt. That is what makes it impossible at the present time for the government to balance its budget strictly from the point of view of its annual revenue and expenditures. Had we not inherited this debt in 1984, we would have a $25 billion operating surplus by now. That is a lot of money.

What this means for our constituents is that in this system of ours the money they pay in taxes would be enough to finance all existing social and economic programs.

Unfortunately we inherited a huge debt and the recession that is going on in Canada is not exclusively made in Canada.

Even if he sits in the opposition, my hon. colleague will recognize that our partners, starting with the United States, also experience serious economic difficulties that have consequences, not only in the United States but also in Canada. We know that in Europe there are social and economic adjustments that create difficulties and that have consequences on everything that is called world markets.

I would like to tell my colleague that even if he thinks manufacturers or small businesses in his riding are not pleased, the comments that we heard go totally against what he advocates. For instance, the president of the manufacturers' association—this is not a small business person; this is the person representing all manufacturers—Mr. Richard Le Hir mentions three measures that our government implemented in the last budget to promote economic recovery. Among other things, Mr. Le Hir said: "The accelerated capital cost allowance on machinery, the lowering of the manufacturing tax, as well as the $230 million budgeted for research and development are three concrete measures that must be applauded". Again those are the words of the president of the manufacturers association.

The minister of finance of Quebec, Mr. Gérard D. Lévesque, who is not necessarily an unconditional supporter of our government, said that he was generally pleased with the federal budget, adding that the budget enabled Ottawa to reduce its deficit while helping the Canadian and Quebec economies to again experience a growth.

Those are a few examples. You are telling me that my time is up, but I would simply like to tell the voters that are listening that the opposition fulfills its role; it is there to say that this is a botched job. However, the population does not agree with the opposition.

Mr. Arseneault: Mr. Speaker, I simply want to tell my colleague in the government that the unemployment rate in my constituency stands at 18.2 per cent. If you look at the budget that was just tabled in the House, you will see that the budget for the Department of Employment and Immigration was reduced by $177 million, mainly in the job creation and vocational training sectors. That says a lot.

[English]

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur on the compassion in his speech. I know that he understands, and every member of this House should understand, that if there was ever a time when there should be some empathy and some sympathy and some feeling and some concrete measures to be taken for the people of Canada, it is today.

The hon. member mentioned Stone Consolidated at Bathurst. I want to tell him that just within the last few days, last Friday, Stone Consolidated announced the closure of the mill at Braeside, just about 43 miles up the Ottawa River from Ottawa, and it means the loss of 160 jobs in total.

About 10 days ago Storwal International in the city of Pembroke announced bankruptcy with 250 employees being put out of work in the next few days.

It is a desperate situation and I am glad that the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur highlighted his speech this morning with that empathy and that feeling for people out there.

On Saturday morning at a meeting in Pembroke there were people sitting there, employees of Storwal International, tears in their eyes, at a total loss as to how they are going to pay their mortgages or make their car or truck payments. And this comes on top of the collapse of the lumber industry in the Ottawa valley generally.

As the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur knows, there is a lot of comparison between the economy of his area and the economy of the area that I represent.

I am sure that this is another figure that would relate to his case as well. In 1991 in the county of Renfrew and the immediate surrounding townships, $50 million was paid out in unemployment insurance. The welfare budget in a small village of 1,400 people has increased 2,000 per cent over a year ago.

I want to join the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur in stating that I do not know how this can go on without this Parliament and this government doing something about it.

It is not a case of lambasting one another any longer in this House. It is a case of what are we going to do for those people out there who stand to lose their homes. They have lost their jobs. We have people 50 years of age who have worked in a mill or a factory for 20 to 25 years. Where are they going to go? We have the older workers program. I certainly hope it applies because I am going to be attempting to make use of it.

There is an attempt on the part of the employees of Storwal International to try to buy the plant and they have been putting forward a mammoth effort. I would like to call upon the government and the Department of Industry, Science and Technology to give these people some assistance to really try to work with them in setting up a new structure.

I see that the Minister of Supply and Services is in the House today. In keeping with the empathy and the seriousness of this situation out there, I want to say that I stopped at the truck stop on Highway 17 at Antrim on the way down yesterday morning. There were two men there, truck drivers who had just finished delivering a load of furniture to the Government of Canada, purchased through the Department of Supply and Services. That was the last load of furniture that would be coming down from Storwal International to the federal government.

I want to say that at least the federal government was buying that product, a Canadian product. I think that is the emphasis we have to go on. I know that the Minister of Supply and Services, when I make this representation will know that it is a very serious one and that he takes these things very seriously.

If we are going to be lambasted by the Americans at this particular time for the sake of an American election, I think it is time to really get aggressive about buying Canadian. I hope that the cabinet comes in with that decision. I for one, and I am sure that people on this side of the House, will be totally in consort with that because we have to stand up and be counted as Canadians and fight for our Canadian people.

I thank the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur for his excellent input.

Mr. Arseneault: I would like to say first of all, if we can go back a little bit, in 1984 the Conservatives campaigned on fiscal responsibility. They said they would put the fiscal house in order.

Now here we are so many years later and all we hear every time we talk about fiscal responsibility is: "Oh, well, we inherited a debt". If they cannot put the house in order, they should not be there. It is as simple as that. If they have given up, tell us that they have given up and get out of office. It is as simple that.

There is another point I would like to make when we talk about compassion. There is a quote I would like to leave the House with, which says simply:

> We shall be judged both as individuals and as a society by the manner in which we care for those unable to care for themselves.

That is a direct quote from our present Prime Minister in the book Where I Stand. I would hope that he will go back and read those words and think about the unemployed people of Canada.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take a few minutes today to participate in this debate on the budget.

First, I would like to congratulate the Minister of Finance for staying the course and continuing to cut government expenditures, for lowering the deficit and most important for cutting personal income tax. It was a prudent approach.

• (1140)

The minister resisted the demands to spend more, to use the fiscal and tax measures to stimulate the economy. The member for Vegreville travelled about the country, from coast to coast.

He visited and talked to experts, to agencies, to his provincial counterparts and to the people. He talked to the taxpayer because there is only one taxpayer. He talked to the consumer, Canadians from all walks of life. He listened and he listened, and he took the ideas, the advice and the concerns. After much in-depth thought and planning he responded.

This budget cuts spending to cut taxes and boost economic growth. It also ensures deficit reductions for 1992 and beyond. This government remains on course in the direction that we have set over the past seven years. The tough measures that we have taken in the past are starting to pay off.

In personal income tax cuts the surtax will be reduced by 1 per cent in July 1992 and another 1 per cent January 1993. This move will put over $500 million back into the economy this year and more than $1.2 billion next year.

The home buyers plan allows RRSP withdrawals up to $20,000 for a person to buy or build a home. The borrowed funds must be repaid within 15 years in annual instalments. The property may be a house, a condominium or a share in a co-operative unit located here in Canada. The plan will be available for one year.

This budget also encourages initiative, productive investment and growth by reducing the tax burden on manufacturers and processors. We will provide new support for research and development and more generous financing for small business.

Now the manufacturing and processing tax rate will drop from 23 per cent to 22 per cent in 1993 and down to 21 per cent in 1994.

Another important area is the capital cost allowance on equipment for those specific areas, manufacturing and processing. It will increase from 25 per cent to a 30 per cent write-off. The new support for research and development will be $230 million over five years.

Government spending is going to be cut by $1 billion in 1992-93 and by $7 billion over the next five years. We will save $2.2 billion on defence spending over the next five years. Also, cuts to departmental operating budgets are going to save $150 million next year and each year after that.

Travel and departmental communications budgets, ministerial salaries and the salary of the Prime Minister will be cut.

To streamline the operations of government 46 agencies, boards, commissions and advisory bodies are going to be eliminated, consolidated, deferred or privatized.

Canadians want less government and they want better service. We have to make it easier for business and individuals to deal with the government and that is just what we are going to do.

The deficit for 1991-92 is forecast at $31.4 billion and that is up from our target which was $30.5 billion. It is true, the recession has played havoc with the accounts. The budgetary revenues for this year and next year are down approximately $4 billion and $7 billion respectively from our projections. This sends an even stronger message for tighter controls and more government cutbacks.

The Minister of Finance did not cave in to the demand to spend, spend, spend which we just heard from the previous speaker. That would be truly disastrous.

When we formed the government in 1984 we designed our first budget around a plan called an agenda for economic renewal. This was the framework for a gradual reduction of the deficit and cuts to expenditures. We should have acted more aggressively during the buoyant years and I accept that, but we have continued to follow the guidelines that were established in 1984 and they are producing results.

One particular area is the importance of the inflation figure. Last year's budget contained targets which seemed really unrealistic to people sitting across the way, but they have been exceeded with the strong co–operation of the Bank of Canada. Inflation is presently under 2 per cent. Interest rates are down and hopefully they will drop even further in the coming weeks. Today we have legislated spending controls of 3 per cent on government programs. Today we have legislated debt servicing in a reduction fund where the GST revenues flow to service the debt and pay down the debt. It is by law and it is retroactive to April 1, 1991.

I would like to comment on the child benefit package that came out with the budget. I want to congratulate my colleague from Calgary North who worked for almost two years chairing the family caucus to implement fairer tax treatment for families with children.

The new enriched child tax benefit to be implemented next January is streamlined, responsible and better targeted. This new child tax benefit will be based on family income paid monthly mostly to mothers for children under 18 years of age. This particular benefit will not be taxed and will be aimed at single parent families and families with incomes below $70,000. It will be simpler, it will be more generous and it will be fairer. It will put about $2.2 billion more into the child assistance benefits over the next five years.

This one monthly child tax benefit can be as much as $144 per month per child or a total of $1,733 per year, non–taxable. Also the maximum child care expense deduction will be increased by $1,000 to $5,000 for each child under age seven and $3,000 for other eligible children.

Also beginning in 1993, common law couples will be treated the same as married couples. Again I congratulate my colleague from Calgary North.

What can we afford? That is what this budget is all about. The advice to the government from all people from coast to coast has been to reduce the deficit, reduce inflation and reduce interest rates. The minister in this, his first budget, has shown that he has listened not just to elected officials, not just to people in the bureaucracy, but to the taxpayers. He has taken important steps to bring more order to government finances.

The inflation target is well below what we anticipated last year. While it has been tough to get down, the deficit is working its way down. In 1995–96 the government will no longer have to borrow outside and we can start paying down the national debt. A lot more work has to be done and we realize that.

It is interesting. We were wrong when we announced last fall that the recession was over. That was a mistake and I admit it. Inflation is at a 20–year low. Interest rates are below 9 per cent which means mortgages and the cost of borrowing are lower and that was no mistake. We worked at it and we got it. We should have reduced the deficit far more quickly when we were first elected and that was a mistake, but we have improved the efficiency of the government operations from a $16 billion deficit to a surplus of $13 billion and that was no mistake.

Many Canadians felt left out of the Meech Lake constitutional process. That was a mistake and we learned our lesson. We have responded with the broadest consultations right across the country and that is no mistake.

Free trade and the GST were poorly communicated and that was a mistake, but the free trade agreement gives us protection to go to the dispute settlement mechanism. We will win on the softwood lumber.

• (1150)

I have been very pleased to participate in this debate. I know we have a lot more work to do. I want to work with the people on all sides of this House, but please do not ask us to spend, spend, spend. Members opposite tried that in the 1970s and in the 1980s, and it did not work.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the speech of the member for Calgary Southwest.

She hit on a number of very important points, but I feel obliged to comment on a few things. She suggested that the finance minister travelled this country and spoke with corporations, business, constituents and the little person out there, and that he was concerned with people.

One of the questions that I would have to ask her relates to her saying that he was instructed to cut, cut, cut, that there was only one taxpayer in this nation. There are a number of people in this nation who do not make enough money to be taxpayers and they are the ones who are being severely hurt by this budget.

Cut, cut, cut might not hurt some of the average citizens but it certainly will hurt those with lower incomes. If you stop to think about the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan, on health care costs, the transfers payments to the provinces by the federal government, all have been drastically cut which in turn ends up putting a further cost on the people.

Another area where people have been hurt is in the pay equity program. The government is literally cancelling the pay equity commitment that it made to the people of Canada, disabled people and women in particular. That has been cut back.

She acknowledged that the government really should have paid down the deficit in the glory years from 1984 to 1988. I love to bring up this point in the House of Commons. Between 1984 and 1988 this government realized—it does not tell us the exact figures—I understand in the area of $100 billion excess revenue over what was anticipated and we do not have one idea what it did with that money. The government will not tell us. I have been trying for three and a half years to find that out.

Who does the Court Challenges Program hurt?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): If the hon. member does not put her question, she will not get an answer.

Mrs. Gaffney: I would like the member to respond to those little people who she says have not been hurt. I think they have been hurt drastically, and I would like the hon. member for Calgary Southwest to comment on that.

Mrs. Sparrow: Mr. Speaker, I certainly appreciate the questions from my colleague. I know she works hard on behalf of her constituents.

There are a lot of people who are unemployed. They have lost their jobs over the last few years, and I certainly admit to that. We are going through a change right around the world where we have to become more productive and competitive.

It is very interesting chairing the committee on industry, science and technology with my colleagues from the other side. One thing we learned very clearly is that we simply have to educate better, train and retrain better. No longer can Canadians rely on the natural resources that we were blessed with to maintain our standard of living. Within the global trading community, we are all going to have to change our goals and our futures.

One thing that we have done is set aside $2.8 billion with regard to the Unemployment Insurance Act for training people out of work. I recognize that a lot more has to be done. By the way, there was a surplus in 1979 of $332 million and when we came in, in 1984, that $332 million had changed to a $38.5 billion deficit. Let us not be blaming each other. Let us work for common goals.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, earlier the House heard in this debate from the Minister for Veterans Affairs. I did not get an opportunity to ask him directly to comment so I will do it, if I can, by asking this member for a comment on the issue of merchant mariners.

Recently the veterans affairs committee tabled a report calling on the government to provide benefits equivalent of veterans to those who served in our merchant marine during the war and who served Canada and the allied cause honourably and with great courage. Years and years have passed. The time has surely come for the government to act on the committee's recommendation.

Last Friday we received a comment saying that the government was going to get around to it. I wonder if the member—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that the question is not relevant to the member who spoke. Therefore the questions and comments are completed.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to rise today to speak in the budget debate and to mention the benefits that have and will accrue to my constituents and to Canada as a whole.

First I want to compliment the minister. This is my fourth budget as a member of Parliament. I found today that it certainly has been a very open process, open in many contexts. For example, the first ministers from across Canada travelled to Ottawa to publicly, in front of television, tell the Canadian people what they wanted to see from the Government of Canada in the budget process. I do not recall that being done before. It was certainly a very positive step. I note the budget deals with many of the suggestions that came from the first ministers when they travelled to Ottawa to share their thoughts.

The Minister of Finance was involved in many sectoral consultations. Many of the groups that submitted their views to the minister sent those views on to various parliamentary committees. As a member of the finance committee, we received many of the submissions that were also submitted to the Minister of Finance, again a very broad sectoral process.

The minister consulted with individuals who had no particular expertise in an area or simply, as happened in many cases, were citizens who had concerns. As an MP I had the opportunity for direct input into the process, through the caucus, through the minister in a direct fashion. I have to suggest that I was really quite pleased with the budget because I think it reflects what many of my constituents were asking me to relay to the Minister of Finance.

There was also input through the various committees, for example the proposal dealing with the RRSP funding or the use of the RRSPs in the purchase of a home. This had been referred to our committee to do some investigative work. We were able to bring in many representatives that would be affected by the decision which enabled myself and other members of Parliament and the Government of Canada to fully research the idea before it was put in the budget. I compliment the minister for that very open process which took place with this budget.

One of the things I feel very good about is that finally we have seen a significant reduction in the deficit. It is dropping some $4 billion and I think that that is long overdue. We had some difficult circumstances to deal with. The most difficult circumstance of all that we will have to deal with is the national debt of this country. If we do not very quickly stop it from growing at tremendous rates, it will be a problem that future governments will have to deal with and they will have to ignore everything else because there will be no money. I am pleased to see that reduction in the deficit.

At the same time, I have had some communications from some constituents who say that although the deficit has been cut and they are pleased to see that, why were taxes also cut? Why did we do that? Why did we not keep them paying taxes so that we can reduce the deficit even further? I realize that this is somewhat a unique thought but I guess, from our perspective, we are trying to convince Canadians that we do have a good grasp on where we are going and we are able, because of our fiscal management, to in fact do both, cut the deficit and cut the tax rates individuals are paying. I am sure every person in this House, although I have not heard everyone say it, would be happy to tell their constituents, regardless of how much money they make, that they have a tax cut. I think that is important in the over-all scheme of things.

Part of the solution to the present economic problems is to convince the consumers of Canada that there is some light at the end of the tunnel and that they can start freeing up some, making some decisions for the long term that would be good for the over-all economy. I think a tax cut signifies that. To be blunt about it, I hope we have another one next year.

My constituents certainly say they are paying enough taxes and that we have to reduce the deficit. If we can do both, which I hope we can do in the next budget, that will be just fine with me. That is certainly the direction I will be encouraging the Minister of Finance to follow.

If we come along a little further, we say: "Okay, those are generalities, let's get to some specifics". What are the specifics in the budget? If I had to stand up and say that this was a made for Ontario budget, I know some of my colleagues in this House would be upset with me, but I am quite proud to say this is a made for Ontario budget. The economic conditions of this country are being felt extremely hard in Ontario because Ontario has the manufacturing sector in the economy. I understand that and I am glad to see that the Government of Canada dealt with the problem that Ontario faces. It faces manufacturing problems. We hear about manufacturing plants going down.

General Motors in a neighbouring riding has announced or is in the throes of discussing whether it is going to shut down one of its assembly lines. I know the MP who represents that area from the NDP would not want to compliment the government on its action, but in fact what we did for General Motors and all of the feeder plants that are located in my riding and in all the ridings around GM is cut the income tax rate for manufacturing. That is good for every one of the employers in my riding and the GM plant that has to make that decision. We have raised the capital cost allowance which is absolutely fantastically good for the manufacturing sector located in my riding and in those ridings throughout southern Ontario and in other parts of Canada where there is manufacturing. We have also cut the withholding tax on dividends.

These are three very positive steps for manufacturing. That is good for Ontario. I know that when the Ontario economy is functioning that that is good for Canada. I do not have any trouble in supporting that particular aspect of it.

It goes a little further than that. One of the things that the Canadian economy has is this issue of competitiveness. We are not competitive in all aspects. In this budget there is an increase in the tax incentives for research and development. Again, that is good for all the manufacturers in southern Ontario. To be fair, I know it is good for other parts of the economy as well. I comfortably say that those four areas address very clearly a problem that southern Ontario has and I am pleased to see that.

It goes a little further. In the budget we have reviewed the capital gains exemption and have confirmed that that exemption is designed for productive investments. One of the major problems my constituents had back in 1988 and 1989 was all the speculators who drove the price of housing through the roof. House prices literally doubled because people had this ability to speculate on land, on real estate and take their capital gains. No more. I realize some people get hurt by that. They are the speculators.

Do you know who wins by that? All the families in my riding and in the ridings across Canada where they are trying to save money to buy a home, to invest in their future living conditions. We have just taken away the speculative incentive by those who are not in that market. If you want to make money, more power to you, but you are not going to do it on the backs of citizens in my riding.

I could go on. I have 10 pages of really good ideas. I am sorry that the time allotment does not permit me to expand on them. I wanted to share with you, Mr. Speaker, that in Ontario this is an absolutely great budget.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, the crocodile tears from the member when he talked about cutting taxes were a bit hard to take. As you know, Mr. Speaker, there have been 33 or 34 tax increases by this government since it took office, including of all things the GST during a recession.

I want to ask the member whether he thinks that it is true, as some people believe, that in fact his government induced this recession by having a very high dollar and very high interest rates for a prolonged period and we all are suffering enormously because of that.

The member will be aware of a study by WEFA Canada Limited which came out last week and which blames his government and some provincial governments to a very considerable extent for prolonging and deepening the recession. WEFA says that his government has loosened fiscal policy in boom times from 1984 to 1987 and 1988 and tightened it in the recession which is, of course, what this budget is doing, the opposite of what stabilization policy should do.

The study goes on to say that under an intelligent stabilization policy with a lower dollar we would now have 100,000 of the 280,000 manufacturing jobs, which his government has killed, and these people would be working.

As somebody who comes from a manufacturing riding, I wonder if the member has anything to say on these statements.

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his comment. I recall campaigning in the last election on the idea of a new value added tax. I was elected on that basis. I know he was as well when he campaigned in favour of that tax during the election and he was also elected. I find it interesting that now he would say that that is something we brought on when he campaigned in favour of it.

He talks about the tax increases that took place between 1984 and 1987. He is absolutely right, there were an awful lot of them. I was not a member of Parliament then so I could not very well speak out, but I know he was. He was on the government side so I presume that when he was voting he was speaking out against all these taxes, or just what was he doing?

Let me come back to the idea when he talks about the loss of jobs in manufacturing and so on. Yes, the dollar has had an impact. There is no doubt about that, but I would suggest the greater impact on southern Ontario manufacturing job losses is in fact the spending record of the provincial governments. I should point out that it is a spending record that he supports, being a member of the Liberal Party.

The Liberal Party of Ontario increased spending in southern Ontario at a rate of 14 per cent a year for all of those years when he is talking about the federal government keeping its spending under constraint. If we had not had those huge increases in spending, I would suggest that the NDP today would not be faced with $14 billion deficits. Some of it is NDP fault, but I would suggest that it was Liberal policies in Ontario that caused the major problems that the Ontario manufacturers have. It was Liberal policies in Ontario that made the Ontario economy the highest taxed economy in North America. It has taken it in a space of five years from being one of the lowest taxed in North America to the highest taxed in North America. Now the NDP are simply going to build on that. That is the problem of southern Ontario.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, in the budget you introduced a decrease in the manufacturers' tax or in taxation for manufacturing companies. I want to say that it is always good for corporations to have a decrease in taxation. But I am wondering whether it was such a good move seeing as we all are very well aware of what the NDP in Ontario stand for and that is: Get those big bad large corporations and tax them as much as you can.

I am wondering whether you are aware of whether your Minister of Finance had any negotiations with the province of Ontario as to whether it would now move into this area that you have vacated and whether we should perhaps be considering some other way of giving these people a break if all that is going to happen is the provinces will move in and take over that tax area, and whether you really think that the—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member has a minute to answer that question.

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, that is certainly a major concern. We have through not just the income tax cut but through several other measures provided for Ontario based industries, in fairness for industry all across Canada but I represent an Ontario riding and we have major industries in southern Ontario.

We cannot guarantee that the provincial NDP will not sabotage our efforts. If it does, that is unfortunate. I guess the nice part of this is that there are manufacturing sectors all across Canada, not that I would like to see Ontario based manufacturers move, but we have to address the entire Canadian problem. Hopefully, within Ontario—for example, in the adjoining riding where GM is making some major decisions—they can apply appropriate pressure on their provincial MPPs to make sure that the tax planning of the provincial government does not negate all of the positive things that we have done federally.

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, in my speech on the budget last year, I suggested that there was an alternative to the Conservative government's present policies. Today I could repeat much of the speech I gave last year, but I will rather stick to the essential.

Like many Canadians, our party recognizes that the federal deficit is a serious economic and political problem. We recognize as well that limiting inflation is also an important objective. We thus agree with the government on these two points.

However, we do not believe that it is necessary to knock the economy out, to create unemployment for millions of Canadians in order to fight inflation. For nearly 20 years, many European countries have been able to fight inflation without creating unemployment.

In my speech last year, I repeated the recommendations which the Economic Council of Canada made in its 1990 annual statement. It gave the government suggestions on pursuing such a policy in Canada. The Economic Council of Canada noted that those European countries have some things in common. First of all, they are committed to full employment; second, government, management and labour work together in those countries. The council believed that better co-ordination of federal and provincial economic policy was possible in Canada and that management and labour could be brought together in this country.

I said last year and maintain today that the Economic Council of Canada recommendations provided an alternative to the Conservative government's present policies. Not only has the government rejected the recommendations of the Economic Council of Canada but it has decided to kill that agency. It is obvious that the government wants to eliminate any independent voice.

[English]

The government has ignored the alternatives suggested by the Economic Council of Canada, has killed the council and has deliberately pursued a policy of high unemployment in order to control inflation.

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Berger: That is why we have a million and a half Canadians who are looking for work today.

We in our party do not believe that high unemployment is acceptable. We in our party do not believe that high unemployment is inevitable. We do not believe that there is no other way. We do not believe that government must resign itself to massive unemployment. Neither did the members of the Economic Council of Canada.

An hon. member: That's why they are gone.

Mr. Berger: Today they are gone, for having dared put forward a view that is contrary to this government.

Our party believes that things can be done in the short term to alleviate some of the suffering that Canadians are experiencing and to provide Canadians with the dignity that only comes from working. We believe that it would be appropriate to increase the deficit, just slightly, in order to put people back to work.

Last year in my budget speech I pointed out that the former Minister of Finance in his first budget in 1985, I believe it was, predicted that he would reduce the government's fiscal deficit to $18 billion by the end of the decade. We know that in last year's budget he was forecasting a deficit of $30.5 billion, so he missed the mark by the small sum of $12.5 billion.

In this budget tabled several weeks ago the current Minister of Finance of course says that no, the $30.5 billion figure cannot be met and is now talking about $31.5 billion. There are many economists who even regard that estimate as overly optimistic.

When the leader of our party suggests that in order to put Canadians back to work the government might consider increasing the deficit by, for argument's sake, $1 billion this year, in order to provide Canadians with the dignity of working, that only comes from working as I said earlier, is it such an unreasonable proposal? Is it such a ludicrous proposal that it would be rejected out of hand by this government and by the Minister of Finance?

When we say perhaps increasing the deficit slightly in order to put people back to work, the leader of our party has pointed out that it may not be money that would be a net drain on the government's finances because this expenditure would be paid back in the form of lower unemployment insurance payments, lower welfare payments and more taxes.

We in our party realize that Canadians are not looking for short-term fixes. Canadians realize that there is no quick fix to what it took the Tories eight years to destroy.

On the other hand, we believe that the government has a responsibility to help Canadians through difficult times. That is why our party has put forward some proposals to stimulate the economy in the midst of this recession.

In the long term Canadians need a government to implement a strategy to ensure the sustained growth of the Canadian economy, to create wealth in a knowledge-based world economy, to ensure prosperity on an ongoing basis. It is evident that the government has no such strategy.

I have spoken in this House many times about Canada's deficiencies in the area of science and technology. We have to invest more in R and D in this country in order to increase value added, in order to provide high wages to our workers, in order to produce quality products. I am talking about value added products for export and for consumption in our domestic market to compete with imports.

Is there anybody in this House who believes that we should compete with the low wage developing countries for low value added goods and services, low wages and low skills? Is that the game we should be in? Or do we want high wages and high skills? The only way to have high wages and high skills is to increase the value added of what we produce and of the services we offer here in Canada.

Anyone and everyone who has analysed Canada's performance in science and technology recognizes that we have a problem and that this problem must be addressed if we wish to create wealth and maintain a high standard of living for Canadians. The government itself has launched what it calls its prosperity initiative in which it is asking Canadians what can or should be done to ensure Canada's competitiveness.

In my speech a year ago I termed this prosperity initiative an admission of failure, an admission that we have lost eight years—seven years then, eight years today—when this government should have taken steps to ensure that all Canadians receive a quality education and that Canadian businesses do enough R and D, all of the things it says we have to do today and, of course, which it has done nothing about for the past eight years.

On the contrary, we have seen that many of the government's actions have defeated those very purposes. For example, it has reduced funding for R and D in industry and in government. It has eliminated a number of training programs. It has cut back on funding for post-secondary education, to name only a few. As a result of these actions, total support for Canada's research and development efforts has actually declined since the Conservatives took office.

What I find particularly infuriating is despite this abysmal record the government pretends to be improving support for research and development and science and technology. This budget is no exception. The Minister of Finance said on page 13 of his budget speech:

> The government recognizes the importance of research and development.

What I want to emphasize is the enormous gap between what the government says and what is actually happening.

Schoolchildren understand there is a difference between saying something and doing something. But this government has it down to a fine art. It figures that if it repeats something often enough, people will think it is the truth. This is known as the theory of the big lie.

I do not know who the government thinks it is fooling. Report after report has emphasized that we have a problem and yet the government in its actions does not recognize that a problem exists.

The Minister of Finance in his budget speech stated:

> Canada's system of tax incentives to support R and D is already one of the most generous in the world.

He is trying to convince Canadians that everything is fine and there is no need to increase tax incentives or non-tax incentives, which I will get to in a minute. Indeed the budget committed an additional $230 million over the next five years to improve these incentives.

I would like to point something out to the Minister of Finance, to the members of this House and to Canadians who may be watching this debate.

If tax incentives were the answer, we would not have an R and D problem in Canada. While I welcome this additional support for R and D through the tax system, I maintain that tax incentives alone will not improve Canada's dismal R and D record.

The minister himself observed, as I said, that Canada's tax incentives are already among the most generous in the world so it is a matter of simple logic.

We already have generous tax incentives for R and D. If tax incentives were all that were required to stimulate industrial R and D, then we would not have a problem. We would be right up there. But we are not up there. We only spend half as much as our competitors do on research and development, so the problem must lie elsewhere. This is the government's blind spot.

Indeed, the minister responsible for our prosperity initiative, the Minister for Industry, Science and Technology and International Trade, refuses to admit that we have a problem. He may not even understand that we have a problem.

When he appeared before the Standing Committee on Industry, Science and Technology, Regional and Northern Development on December 4, he said:

> We have looked at the federal level of support for research and development and Canada compares reasonably with other countries.

The minister is either incredibly naive, he does not know the first thing of what he is talking about, or it is part of this big lie strategy that I referred to earlier in which the government is just trying to hoodwink Canadians into believing that everything is just fine and dandy.

The minister does not seem to understand that Canada lags far behind our competitors when it comes to non-tax support for R and D. This is an important distinction, the support that is offered through the tax system, tax support, and the support that is offered for R and D through other methods, through non-tax methods.

By non-tax R and D, what I am talking about is contract research or government procurement which are widely used in many countries to stimulate innovation and industrial development.

Canada is just not in the same league as many of our competitors in Japan, the United States, Germany, the Scandinavian countries and France when it comes to non-tax support for R and D which in those countries is offered through defence procurement, defence spending in the United States, projects like the fifth generation computer project in Japan and the aerospace industry in France.

I just came back from the west coast. I had the pleasure of attending a forum with business persons interested in science and technology in Vancouver last Friday morning.

One of the people I had the pleasure of speaking to and meeting with again is John MacDonald, president of MacDonald Dettwiler in Vancouver which employs some 800 persons. These are all people who are working in the field of systems integration and software development.

Mr. MacDonald referred to the old unsolicited proposals program, which this government cancelled, as the best lever the government had to promote industrial development. This was a program again which this shamed government cancelled.

Another kind of program which has been highly successful and which has been perhaps the government's best mechanism for getting small and medium sized businesses across Canada to do research and development is the national Industrial Research Assistance Program.

We all know that this program has been starved for funds by this government. The funding of IRAP has declined by some 28 per cent in the past seven years. IRAP has suffered from management instability. The current management of the NRC has attempted to change the program from a program which serves the interests of clients to a program which will serve as a marketing arm for the NRC labs.

The committee of which I am a member, the industry, science and technology committee of this House, undertook a study of this program in the fall. It concluded that IRAP suffers from the absence of a clear government perspective on its role and responsibilities not just now, but also in terms of what the program should be in the context of the prosperity agenda that the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology is promoting.

This budget provides a minimal increase in the budget of IRAP nowhere near the funds that were recommended by the industry, science and technology committee and the Sparrow report one and one-half years ago. That committee was chaired by the member who spoke just a few minutes ago. These funds are nowhere near the funds necessary to allow the program to fulfil its potential and meet the needs of Canadian industry.

The government is not only content to destroy support for industrial R and D, but also it has decided to destroy this country's knowledge base. In the budget, the government of course delivered the coup de grâce to the Science Council of Canada.

The Minister of Finance said that there are other similar types of organizations that do the same thing as the Science Council of Canada. That is not so. That is simply wrong. There is no other organization in the country that does the same thing as the Science Council, that looks at science policy from a long-term perspective and in an independent manner.

I spoke last week to a member of the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology, the Prime Minister's own National Advisory Board on Science and Technology. A board member told me that to suggest that the Science Council is similar to the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology is just ludicrous. He said that NABST is different in concept and different in construct, to put it shortly.

The same member of the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology, who happens to work on Bay Street, told me that the business community generally supports the budget, which is something I might take issue with. But it thinks the government has gone off the deep end in killing the Science Council and the Economic Council, and he likened this to Archimedes who was drawing geometric figures in the sand and was killed by a Roman soldier. He referred to barbarians slaughtering the brains trust. He said: "This looks like book bashing, book burning".

This does not come from me but from a member of the business community on Bay Street who was describing this government's killing of the Science Council and the Economic Council.

Mr. Holtmann: Archimedes.

• (1230)

Mr. Berger: This is something the member for Portage—Interlake is quite familiar with. He has had some practice at book burning. I say that with due respect. He will probably want to ask me a question about that.

Oscar Wilde said that a cynic is a man who knows the price of everything and the value of nothing. I think that pretty well sums up the Tory approach to government. I think you would agree with me that Canadians deserve better than that.

In closing, I want to move a motion, under Standing Order 26, to continue sitting through the lunch hour for the purpose of allowing as many speakers as possible to participate in this debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe there is unanimous consent to carry on until two o'clock.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I very much enjoyed listening to the member for Saint-Henri—Westmount. I would like to say to the House that if Archimedes were living today, he would probably come out with a statement something like: Beware a Liberal government or a Liberal administrated government because the big dynamic hole of bankruptcy will grow and grow and grow. That is what Archimedes would say if he were around today and had that much history behind him.

I listened with interest this morning and this afternoon to what a colleague in the House had to say about how they would get out of this particular recession. He said the government should just spend slightly more. The government and the people of Canada are still paying for those "slightly mores" during the Liberal administration, those billions of "slightly mores".

I have sat through eight budgets since this government came to office in 1984—

Mr. Kilgour: All Tory ones.

Mr. Holtmann: We will get back to the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast about all Tory ones because he was a member of the Tory Party and supported it for six of the eight years quite happily. I heard comments from the member from Alberta who pointed out that it was the Liberal administration that drew us into this deep quagmire of debt.

In every budget the present opposition demanded the government spend more. Instead of the current debt we have, it would likely be another $100 billion more. I sat in this House on many occasions where members across asked the government to spend more. In fact we spent less, significantly less.

The members opposite should poll their constituents before making statements that this government should be spending slightly more and not mentioning how much. I am sure they would find, especially the member for Edmonton Southeast, that their constituents and the constituents in their provinces would very much want to reduce government expenditures. That is why this new party is springing up in leaps and bounds wanting the government to spend less, not more.

With all due respect to the two members who have made some comments, I would like to ask the member for Saint Henri—Westmount a question. There is a grass roots movement in this country to spend less. Does he not see in his party that going back to the old traits of throwing money at this problem to make it go away is certainly not the way the public that would support his party would want him to go? I want him to really examine the question I have put to him about his grass roots supporters today.

Mr. Berger: I really think the member and all the members of the government ought to be a little bit bashful about standing up in this House and giving us lectures about bankruptcy and the deficit.

I am reminded of a comment made by a very wise person, Senator David Croll who passed away just this last year in his early nineties. He was active in our caucus until the day of his death. I remember him telling me: "The way Michael Wilson talks about the deficit, you would think he had licked it". I can just hear David Croll's words and manner of speaking as I repeat what he said.

The former Minister of Finance, said he would get the deficit down to $18 billion by the end of the decade. We are talking this year about a deficit of $31.5 billion. The member for Etobicoke Centre or this government missed the mark by $13.5 billion. He has the nerve to stand up here and tell us he has any conception whatsoever how to reduce the deficit.

It is high time this government took responsibility for its actions over the course of the past eight years. I would like to quote what the former Minister of Finance said in his budget speech a year ago. On the very first page, he said:

> We must deal with the world as it is and not as we might wish it to be.

This government is responsible for the world as it is. The economic situation in Canada today is what it is in large part because of the actions of this government. It is time, I believe, for this member and this government to assume responsibility for the difficult economic circumstances in which we find ourselves in this country today. As I tried to indicate in my speech, it is a big world that we are living in; a knowledge based world economy in which Canadians have to compete. We require a growth strategy to enable Canadians to create wealth. The challenge of the deficit is to create wealth in this country to put people to work and get people paying taxes. That is how this deficit must be fought, not by the cost cutting methods of this government.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in the budget debate. It is a very important debate in that this year's budget continues what we started in 1984. It is a modest budget, but I think it is a very specific response to the many questions being asked by Canadians and a response to the many examples of past injustice which this budget attempts to remedy.

The present Minister of Finance has given us a sound budget that reflects the aspirations of Canadians and is firmly based on the strategy we developed in 1984, which was to reduce the deficit, put public spending on a sound footing, help the neediest in this country, eliminate duplication, where appropriate, as well as unnecessary assets, and bring certain agencies within the purview of the departments. We saw in the budget that there are a number of agencies that will be either wound up or merged with others. I think that in a recession like the one we are experiencing today we must make these decisions because they mean making the best possible use of taxpayers' money.

That being said, it is not always easy to make those decisions. The Minister of Finance could have done what other ministers did in the past, which was to try and keep Canadians happy by handing out subsidies and creating programs right and left so Canadians would remember the government's generosity but unfortunately mortgaging their future in the process.

• (1240)

This was quite obvious during the previous government's last few years in power, when government spending was substantially increased to enhance public support. For instance, if we look at the record for total spending when the Liberals were in power, the average annual increase was 14.6 per cent between 1980 and 1984. Since we came to power, the average annual increase has remained at 5 per cent.

When we look at total spending as a percentage of GDP under the previous government, this ratio rose from 16.9 per cent of GDP in 1967, centennial year, to 24.6 per cent in 1984.

When we look at the Conservative record, because the opposition is often critical of the way we managed the country's finances, between 1984 and 1982 the percentage of GDP dropped to 22.8 per cent and it is expected to go down to 18.3 per cent by 1996.

When we took over the administration of this country's finances in 1984, we inherited a very substantial deficit. When the Liberals or the New Democrats tell us things have not changed under the Conservatives since the deficit has increased considerably, I would ask them to do some simple figuring with compound interest. It should be obvious that if we had pursued the same approach to spending the Liberals had before 1984, the current deficit would be much higher than it is now.

I think it was a choice the government had to make and a choice voters made in the two last elections. It came as no surprise to anyone when we said we wanted to reduce the deficit. It came as no surprise when we said we would have to make certain adjustments in a number of departments and programs so that would be able to live within our means.

I suggest that if we continue to compare the records of both governments on the way they handled public spending since the other side is so critical, perhaps we should look at the operating balance which is extremely important. In 1984 under the Liberal government the cost of programs, before interest charges, was $16 billion more than our revenues. This means that on top of having a budget and reaching into the pockets of taxpayers, the government in its estimates was spending $16 billion more than what it was to take in, and that is not counting the debt service. In other words, we were quickly getting deeper and deeper into debt.

We had an operating surplus of $10 billion last year and that means a turnaround of $26 billion. We went from an operating deficit to an operating surplus, notwithstanding the debt. That is extremely important. It is a sign that the government is really controlling the expenditures of this country. If the trend persists, if we keep to our goal of restraining expenditures, of controlling the increase in expenditures, we will have more room to manoeuvre in the areas of social programs and economic development.

Today, in 1992, Canadians cannot believe that a government is a serious or responsible one if it says: "Forget the deficit; we don't have to take it into account. Regardless of the deficit, if I were in office I would create new health programs, new industrial growth programs; if I were in office I would offer this incentive or that one". I feel that a responsible government must give an exact picture to the people. In recent years our government has succeeded to a great extent in straightening up the public spending in a satisfactory, if not very popular, fashion.

I think the budget tabled by the Minister of Finance is an excellent budget for the people of Quebec, considering that the 4.7 million taxpayers in Quebec will benefit from the cut in the personal income surtax. Let us not forget that we will also simplify, streamline and enrich our support for the 2.9 million families and 2.3 million children in Quebec. Nationally total child benefits will increase by $400 million per year.

One of the most important aspects of this budget was pointed out when the Minister of Finance recognized that common-law couples and married couples were not treated equally under the tax system. This measure is in response to strong pressure put on all members of this House and addresses at the same time an injustice which unfortunately continued over the years and had to be redressed.

There was also the home buyers' plan through which we are encouraging individuals to boost the economy by allowing them to use their RRSPs to purchase homes. This will be most beneficial for some.

Members opposite keep asking us what we are doing to boost the Canadian economy. We will reduce the tax burden of the 11,000 Quebec companies in the manufacturing and processing sectors. We will also take measures to help small business and farmers. We will increase the capital cost allowance rate for these businesses.

While this budget as a whole may be moderate, it is very important in order to boost the economy and to ensure that the confidence of the Canadian people in their government is maintained. This budget is especially important because budgets such as this one allow us not to mortgage our future but rather to prepare for it with enough flexibility to set up adequate programs.

That is what is important, and that is why I strongly support this budget.

[English]

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to participate in the budget debate of 1992.

I, have found this budget to be a sensible, tough, consistent, creative and fairer than many previous budgets. I propose in the limited time available to me to address those characteristics, to suggest where a future budget might make some improvements, and to review what is contained in this budget for Albertans and what Albertans are saying about the budget itself.

One of the aspects which I find fairer in this budget than in previous budgets is the provision which my hon. friend has just referred to, and that is making the tax system even-handed in dealing with common law couples as it does with married couples.

But there is one aspect where I think there is some good work to be done in the future. I applaud the moves contained in the budget that better provide for families with children. I think that initiative, put forward by the hon. member for Calgary North and proposed by him to the Standing Committee on Finance on December 11, has been well responded to and will be welcomed by Canadians, not only those who have families at this moment but those who applaud the institution of the family as the foundation stone of our society.

I wish to address the question of child care choices. As my friend from Calgary North told the finance committee in December, our present system "fails to recognize the worth and cost of stay at home parents. The government interferes with the parents' ability to choose the kind of day care they believe is best for their children because financial support through the tax system is only provided to those parents who choose professional day care with the child care expense allowance. Parents who decide to stay at home with the child can make no such claim".

The analysis which the member for Calgary North and his committee conducted during last year found that current child care costs in the tax system consist of the child care expense allowance, which could be claimed as a deduction by the lower income parent. The maximum allowed until this budget was $4,000 for children under the age of seven and $2,000 for children between the ages of seven and twelve, to a maximum of two-thirds of the income of the parent with the lowest income. The member for Calgary North, with some assistance from others, ran a computer simulation and found that the effect of putting the current child care expense allowance funding into an enhanced refundable child tax credit would result in the average married couple with young children, earning less than $60,000, who use child care would be better off if the child care expense allowance were cancelled and if the money saved were rolled together with the other items within the IRCTC.

Further, adding this result to the bias that the CCEA introduces against the parent who decides to stay at home to look after the child would make a very strong case for abolishing the CCEA. The only concern is whether the statistical averages in the simulations might hide some new hardship induced by this policy change.

There are low income families who find themselves in districts with insufficient low cost day care. This problem ought to be addressed through the combined efforts of the federal and provincial governments using the Canada Assistance Plan directly to lower day care costs locally rather than perhaps through the income tax system.

Those were some of the recommendations made by the member for Calgary North and his committee. I was very pleased that not only was there a strong element of social policy made in Alberta introduced into this budget, but also that we have had a budget speech delivered by a western Canadian for the first time in some 60 years, and a fine speech it was. I will in a few moments be coming to some of the aspects of how that speech was received in my home city and my home province.

There have been many who have asked me: "What does this budget contain for Albertans?" I am happy to say that my study of the budget documents indicates that it is even-handed treatment for all Canadians regardless of what part of the country they live in. I have done some calculating as to what the impact of the budget will be on the life of Albertans.

The budget cuts spending, cuts taxes and bolsters economic recovery. It also ensures substantial declines in the deficit for 1992 to 1993 and beyond. Spending will be cut by $1 billion next year and $7 billion over the next five years. All 1.6 million Alberta taxpayers will have their personal income taxes cut through a reduction in the surtax. There will be an elimination of the excise tax on ethanol and methanol portions of blended fuels that are mainly gasoline. Good news for our agricultural economy and good news for the environment.

Our support for 1.1 million families and one million children in Alberta will be simplified, streamlined and substantially increased by $400 million per year nationally. Tax disadvantages for the traditional family unit will be eliminated and will assist Alberta families to buy homes using their existing RRSPs.

We will be increasing support to approximately 16,000 Alberta residents with disabilities and will be providing additional tax assistance to approximately 4,000 Alberta post-secondary students.

The tax burden for the approximately 4,000 manufacturers and processors in Alberta will be reduced. We will be increasing the capital cost allowance rate for manufacturing and processing equipment.

Increased spending on research and development will encourage productive investment in the province of Alberta.

Those are the characteristics that impact on my home province and what has been the reaction in that part of our country.

Here is a headline from The Edmonton Sun of Wednesday, February 26: "Maz makes our day. His first budget hits the mark". In The Calgary Sun of the same date: "Maiden budget surprisingly painless. Good news in bad times".

In the analysis section, when the Minister of Finance spoke to the Edmonton Chamber of Commerce recently, the chamber president, in thanking him said: "A projected 1992-93 federal deficit of $27.52 billion is a little higher than we would like. But the over-all message", he said, "is positive". "I would give it a silver medal", said John Knebel, "a 7.5 out of 10".

John Knebel is president of the Edmonton Chamber of Commerce and a distinguished trade lawyer in the city of Edmonton. To the best of my knowledge, he is a political independent.

An editorial in the Edmonton Sun on Thursday, February 20, gave some advice in advance of the budget: "Stay the course, Maz". And reacting to the actual budget itself, the same newspaper the morning after wrote: "Small Maz-terpiece".

Those are headlines. Other significant headlines sum up the reaction: "Middle class aided", "RRSPs Build Homes".

I want to touch on the reaction of the provincial Government of Alberta to this particular budget. Reported in The Calgary Sun, the treasurer of Alberta, Mr. Dick Johnston, praised the federal budget as " a very good package for national recovery". He went on to say: "This is the right message to consumers in Canada. It instils a sense that the future is strong". Remarkable words from the treasurer of Alberta.

To give some balance, I would also like to quote from the hon. member for Edmonton East in his reaction to this budget since I am giving a survey of Alberta reaction. He says: "The Minister of Finance has forgotten his Alberta roots and has become a loyal, enthusiastic sorcerer's apprentice to that old monetarist warlock, the former Minister of Finance".

This is a member of Parliament who listed his occupation, prior to his election, as wordsmith. He has shown his facility with words and indeed his shallowness of analysis in that reaction. If he could not say anything more analytical about the budget then I think he had better stick to wordsmithing.

Editorial comment from The Calgary Herald states: "A modest 1 per cent decrease in the personal income tax surcharge this year won't send consumers racing to the stores to run up their credit cards but it is all Mazankowski could afford. But he deserves credit for boldly scrapping the baby bonus in favour of targeting lower income Canadians with as much as $100 a month more for each child".

In the same newspaper the next day: "Let's hand it to Don Mazankowski. Yesterday's budget was the first we can recall in a long while that hasn't soaked average Canadians or bludgeoned business".

There are voices out there urging this government to spend more. In order to spend more, naturally we would have to borrow or we would have simply to print money and depreciate the value of our currency as so many countries have done. But I admire the courage of this finance minister and his predecessor in staying the course and ensuring that the Canadian economy remains sound.

If we were not to follow the course that has been followed over nearly the last eight years, we would not have the Governor General sitting in Rideau Hall, we would not have the Prime Minister at 24 Sussex, we would have the International Monetary Fund running the affairs of our country. On the other side of the equation, there are those who say slash to the bone and slash beyond the bone. There are those who say cut $50 billion from the budget, or the next day maybe it is 15 per cent.

Canadians are not paying much attention to that kind of thing because this is the same organization which is urging people to turn over their life insurance policies to a particular political party. Their next move may be the necromancy of advising that life insurance policies be turned over to the Government of Canada.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, this budget allows Canadians to take $20,000 out of their RRSP and buy a home. The hon. member mentioned that. That is great for Canadians who are fortunate enough to have an RRSP, and I believe there are approximately 10 per cent of Canadians in that category.

This same budget goes on and eliminates the co-op housing program. It puts a cap of 3 per cent on spending in social housing.

I want to ask the hon. member a question. Does he not feel that in the area of housing this budget helps the fortunate and hurts the less fortunate?

• (1300)

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, on the contrary. I believe the general thrust of this budget is to generate confidence in the Canadian economy and to send a message to the less fortunate that this government does care for them.

I may have neglected to say this budget has a great deal for Canadians with disabilities contained in its provisions. I am sure my friend from Malpeque will welcome that.

She asked questions about the RRSP plan which I welcome. I hope it will have the desired effect and I believe it will. She tied that in with the abolition of the co-op housing program. That is a move I think ought to be re-examined. I did not welcome that move with enthusiasm because I had a hand in seeing the co-op program work very creatively to offer housing to people who prefer that style of life. Living in co-op housing would not be to my taste, but I recognize it is to the taste of quite a number of Canadians. There are provisions within the former co-op housing program for the disabled and for lower income Canadians that are truly advantageous. I can cite the example of the Summit Village Co-op Project at 149th Street and Stony Plain Road in my riding which the former minister of housing, my distinguished friend from Don Valley East, helped me develop some two years ago. That was a situation where co-op housing funds were channelled to provide not only accommodation for the disabled and elderly, but for a broad cross-section of Edmontonians who pronounced themselves very happy with their current habitat. I am pleased to add there is a waiting list of some 86 couples who would like to get into that project.

I will join with my friend from Malpeque in asking for a review of that particular move in this budget. I do not embrace every one of its provisions and that is one of them.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Edmonton Southwest is one of the particularly distinguished and respected members of this House. I have listened with interest to his comments particularly on the budget's effect on the family.

The issue he just addressed surely is one which undermines the family in this country. The co-op housing program was particularly successful in integrating those of lower income with those of somewhat higher incomes in a housing development rather than isolating low income people off in a corner. I think the member will agree that cutting off that program was particularly damaging to Canadian families.

The hon. member must be troubled at the very least by the breach of commitment by the government on the issue of a national child care program. He campaigned along with other Conservatives in the last election on the government's commitment for a national child care program. The very fact that the government has broken its solemn commitment made to the Canadian people must trouble the hon. member.

I would like to comment on the decision by legislation of the government not to honour pay equity beyond the latter part of 1990. It will simply cut off the legal rights that may be established to pay equity and will again damage lower income women in particular who are trying to support families, along with the end of the Court Challenges Program which was being used to establish rights of lower income Canadians.

I would ask him to comment on these because it seems to me that the budget is in fact a devastating blow to families in Canada.

Mr. Edwards: I appreciate the intervention of my friend from Victoria who is a fine, constructive member of this House and asks very good questions.

I find his question concerning pay equity somewhat troublesome. My understanding of what was announced in the budget was that there would not be retroactivity applied to whatever pay equity decisions were to be made in the future. I understood there was a point beyond which in the past one would not go in making those retroactive payments.

I believe that some of those rights have yet to be determined by the courts, and one cannot say that something is wiped out which is not yet established in its precise terms. The principle is established, but the terms and conditions have not yet been fully established by the court.

On the question of the child care program, yes I did campaign in the 1988 election. I knocked on door after door and was greeted by a great cross-section of people, in terms of income, in my riding. I was astonished to hear people rejecting the idea of universal day care.

It was a ground swell, and one that I felt could not be ignored. There were young mothers, many of them professionals or otherwise, who had chosen to take up to four or five years out of their careers in order to nurture and bond with their children. They said it was great if the two income families chose to both continue working and using day care, but what about mothers at home? They made a choice they felt was necessary for their children. They did not want to judge what other people did. They believed staying at home was very important to the nurturing and upbringing of their children and they were given no recognition for that through the tax system.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to put on the record some comments on the budget and to make an analogy. I think it will paint a picture for people. The analogy is that the budget is a prescription. The patient is Canada, and we have two specialists in charge of a sick patient.

Canada is economically sick. We have two doctors: Dr. John Crow and Dr. Maz. Before you can actually write a prescription, one has to assume that you do a diagnosis of the ills of the patient. I have heard all of these Tories get up and trumpet how fine it is that this budget is cutting taxes.

What do they want us to give them, a medal? They have been putting taxes up from the day they took office in 1984. Thirty times they increased direct and indirect taxes, on the backs of Canadians. They dropped the surtax, that is the tax on the tax. They dropped it a little bit, and they want us all to fall on our knees and worship them for that.

Who put the taxes up in the first place? They did. They put the taxes up which in fact increased the dangers to the health of the patient in the first place. Those taxes contributed to inflation. The doctor who was in charge of purging decided that the way to purge all the bad humours from the patient's body was to increase taxes because we had to reduce the deficit.

What happens? It raises the temperature of the body, so now the haematologist comes into the operating room. He says he has to use the old tried and true method and bleed the patient. Let interest rates rise because we have to dampen the fires of inflation; the fever is high. We have to get the temperature down, so up goes interest rates. Up went the interest rates.

In fact I remember when Dr. Crow was brought before the finance committee that looks at the ethics of doctors. When we brought him before the finance committee, the whole question was why were we putting Canada into an inflationary period? It was a made-in-Canada inflation at that time. Mr. Crow told us wage demands were too high in this country compared to our competing partners and we had to get those wage demands down; we had to get the temperature down. By golly, he let those interest rates rise.

We had interest rates rising and we had taxes rising. This was the period when we got hit with the GST. At the same time this government deliberately removed itself from any responsibility for unemployment insurance. The Liberals of course had gone a long way toward transferring a lot of that cost on to the backs of employers and employees. With Bill C-21 this government went all the way. It absolved itself from any contribution to the unemployment insurance fund, so it contributed nothing. Did it have an interest in making sure the unemployment rate did not rise? Of course not. It could not give two figs whether people became unemployed in this country because the government was not putting money into the fund any more. It was strictly a payroll tax on employers and employees. In fact it brought out the most recent increase in January of this year.

Why should it feel any responsibility for keeping unemployment down? Of course it let unemployment rise. At this time part of the diagnosis which would lead to the formation of a prescription is the fact that we are now sitting with 1.5 million Canadians unemployed. That is official, 1.5 million, and that is only a statistic. You have to see the actual effects on individuals.

The doctors over there who are writing the prescription do not start out with that first principle, but that is one of the conditions we have to deal with. They will not deal with that at all. As a matter of fact, on this question of writing a prescription, the good doctors decided what they had to do was consult. So they brought in the premiers for a consultation. The premiers and responsible elected Canadians at the municipal level all around said they should be putting specifically targeted money into direct job creation. They should be rebuilding the infrastructures of our municipalities across the country instead of frivolously throwing money at increasing payments to deal with the victims' problems, serious as they are. They should deal with rebuilding the infrastructure of municipalities which down the road would give us a decided advantage when the economy rebounds. All of the premiers came and I read that most of them said the government should be doing that. What happened when the prescription, which is the budget, was written? Not one penny was put into direct job creation, not one penny.

We talked about the problems we have with respect to interest rates. We have an economy where in fact there is no growth taking place. He has brought the fever down; the patient is not running any temperature at all. The inflation rate is less than 2 per cent. There is no growth in the economy; it is just sitting there. As Michael McCracken said, "The cost of doing nothing is not zero". The government just sits there, no stimulus to get it moving. As we look at the economy, the real interest rates of this country are about 3 per cent higher than the real interest rates in the United States. The real interest rate in the United States is less than 1 per cent. We are running real interest rates of about 3 per cent above that. So we are about 4.5 per cent.

Why? There is room to let that interest come down. As a matter of fact, on the contrary, in a period of no growth at all we see the interest rate rising again. We see loads of money, Canadian money, being used to prop and keep the dollar up. That is where the money is being spent. Surely the diagnosis has to be that something has to be done to kick-start the economy.

We have to bring our interest rates down back to the traditional 2 per cent difference between our rates and the American rates. In fact, the American real rates are so attractive that Canadian utilities are using Canadian banks to borrow in the United States, which only aggravates the balance of payments situation when we have to send the money out to pay the interest on the debt that is incurred.

There is room. We are not talking about spending money and increasing the deficit. We are not talking about cutting spending. We are talking about spending wisely. The interest rates have come down seven points, as Dr. Maz pointed out. They have come down and surely that has given us some room with respect to the interest on the debt. That is where we could get about $1 billion which could be put into that infrastructure rebuilding we talked about. Surely that has to be part of the prescription that was written, but it was not written there at all.

Mr. Nunziata: Do not forget rates went up last week.

Mr. Rodriguez: I said that. I said that rates have started to go up. Imagine, there is no growth in this economy, literally none, because we have 2 per cent inflation. There is good inflation and there is bad inflation. With this inflation of less than 2 per cent, there is nothing happening here. It is stagnant. The patient is there. Mr. Crow was successful. The only thing is that the patient is expiring.

Mr. Brewin: They put on leeches.

Mr. Rodriguez: He did. He put on leeches; he bled the patient.

I mentioned the fact that there is something else about the budget that really bothers me a great deal. It is maybe the second incursion into destroying the principle of universality of social programs. I have always taken the position that the universal principle means that it does not matter whether one is in the upper income levels or the bottom income levels. The universality of a social program covering all Canadians really binds us together in a commitment to the program so that no government can separate those who have little income from those who have a lot of income. The means test is the thin edge of the wedge that separates people; it does not bind them together.

• (1320)

I have always seen every attempt to destroy universality as not binding Canadians together but rather separating them. The principle on which this country was built was not this atavistic, selfish attitude that I have seen in other jurisdictions, where everybody is for himself or herself, and the devil takes the hindmost.

We built the country based on the principle of co-operation, that in fact I am my brother's keeper, I am my sister's keeper. That is the principle on which we built the country: the co-op movements, co-op housing, the caisses populaires, the credit unions, the principle of people working together for the common good. This is not some wishy-washy Marxist idea that deprives people of personal initiative. It recognizes and it challenges us to work together to build a social program, to build a community, to build a society. That is what it is all about.

To run out there and use this very simplistic slogan of why should bank presidents get family allowance or get old age pension is not the issue. The principle is there. The issue is: If we think he should not be getting it then maybe we had better look at the way we tax them and maybe we ought to look at the kinds of things we have been saying in this party for years about fair taxation. Maybe we ought not to let them enjoy the perks of being the president of Inco or the president of a bank by writing off their box tickets at the Blue Jay games against their business expenses. Maybe we ought to take a good hard look at that.

These are the kinds of things we have been saying. I am concerned that in this prescription they have inserted something that will make the condition even worse down the road. What will be next? Is the next one medicare? After all, we could make exactly the same arguments about family allowances and old age pensions. We could make exactly the same arguments on the medicare issue.

Mr. Nunziata: Do you remember the sacred trust, John?

Mr. Rodriguez: Oh, I remember it well. I remember the sacred trust. But that is why they are at 11 per cent now, brothers. This prescription I have said is an 8 per cent prescription. Some Tory asked me: "Does that mean we will go up 8 per cent?" I said: "No, brothers, you will go down to 8 per cent".

If we looked at the diagnosis, we need to let Canadians keep more of the money they earn. I hear them all the time saying: "We have to get the consumer out into the marketplace".

Mr. Nunziata: With what?

Mr. Rodriguez: With what, exactly. That is why he is going across the border. He thinks he is getting a better deal. He is getting more bang for the buck he is spending. That is why the rate of savings for Canadians is not as high as it has been in the past. Governments have been taking money out of their pockets at every turn. Remember, it is not just this government that is taking money from them. The provincial governments, the municipal governments and the school boards are all taking money. There is only one taxpayer.

Yes, a New Democrat is telling you that, brother. There is only one patient. He has only one artery. He has only one heart. When we start bleeding him and, as my friend said, putting the leeches on him we are only exacerbating the weakness of his body, sapping the strength from his body.

An hon. member: Rigor mortis is imminent.

Mr. Rodriguez: We say: "Why not? What an opportunity to give a boost to the economy". The diagnosis recognizes that in fact the patient needs some resuscitation and needs to keep more of the money he earns. In this valley of tears when people are losing their jobs and industries are going, is it not an amazing fact that the only people making money are the bankruptcy trustees? One bankruptcy trustees said: "I've got so much business I don't know where I'm going to get the help to do it".

Another amazing thing is that banks are now making fantastic profits on service charges. This budget did not touch the rich at all in this country.

I have long thought that it is all part and parcel, where the Liberals in the past have always very overtly put on an incomes policy called wage controls because they never controlled prices. My Liberal colleagues who are sitting to my right, appropriately, brought in wage controls right up front, even though they ran a campaign against it. That is another story, but they did it.

Mr. Nunziata: A material change in circumstances.

Mr. Rodriguez: A material change in circumstance, right on.

Mr. Nunziata: Do you want to talk about Bob Rae now and what he is doing to Ontario?

Mr. Rodriguez: The Tories looked at this experiment and saw that it did not work. We have to give them credit. They are very perceptive. They saw that this would antagonize the 11 per cent that support them and that it would erode them down to zero. What have they replaced it with? A new incomes policy. What is the incomes policy? We keep this inflation rate right down below 2 per cent. We let the economy just stay flat and we have this large pool of unemployed people. We keep a large pool of unemployed people. We squeeze them. We put them right on the edge of poverty and just squeeze them there.

It is obvious that when employers come to them and say "I'm sorry, it is either you take a wage cut or it is the door", they are much more pliable. If they come to them and say "you either cut back on your benefits or else you're out the door", they are much more pliable to do that.

There is a large pool of unemployed folk who are willing to work for whatever they are willing to pay. I have known some young people who are willing to work for nothing, just to get the experience. I have even known of a case where a person is paying the employer to give him the job.

I saw a sad case in the United States and I can see it coming here. I came off one of the highways in Fort Lauderdale and to a stop sign to go into the town. There was an older woman standing with a sign around her neck saying: "Hire me please. I need to work. I am hungry".

What a plea. I can see that if we continue with the kinds of prescriptions that are in this budget that Dr. Maz and Dr. Crow have put on us, it is going to very quickly require the only people who are making money—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired.

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, we have just had a very entertaining speech from the hon. member for Nickel Belt.

The test of this budget is not going to be the way in which the opposition members condemn it, nor the way in which the government members praise it, but rather whether or not this budget gets the Canadian economy moving again so that it produces jobs, jobs, jobs.

• (1330)

Frankly, in my own riding we have been devastated by this recession. A few days ago eleven of my constituents came to see me. Seven out of those eleven were without work. These were people who had worked all their lives. They wanted to work. They did not want to be receiving welfare. They did not want to be receiving unemployment insurance payments, but they were. They wanted to get back to work but could not because there were no jobs available.

Across the street from my constituency office in the O'Connor–Bermondsey, East York–North York industrial commercial area, literally one–third of all the plants are closed.

It was because of that situation that I wrote to the Prime Minister on January 8, 1992. In that letter I said: "Among the 17 larger advanced industrial countries in the world Canada has the highest unemployment rate. This is clearly unacceptable".

The Prime Minister wrote back to me on February 24 and he said among other things: "I agree with you that the current level of unemployment in Canada is clearly unacceptable. Reducing it must be at the very top of our policy agenda".

In my letter to the Prime Minister I went on to point out some of the ways which I believe we could deal with this situation.

I said that if business were to expand production and create jobs we needed to increase consumer spending. We can do this immediately by allowing 5 per cent down payments for first-time home buyers, by using RRSP capital for down payments for first-time home buyers, by substantially narrowing the differential between Canadian and U.S. interest rates, by cutting personal income taxes, and by instituting a $14 billion municipal public works program.

This $14 billion expenditure will not increase our deficit. According to Professor Pierre Fortin of l'Université du Québec à Montréal he has calculated that if Canada's unemployment rate was only 7 per cent rather than 10 per cent as it is now, our federal deficit would be reduced by some $14 billion annually. This is because fewer people would be receiving unemployment benefits and welfare payments while at the same time tax revenues would increase.

As well, Professor Fortin calculated that if the differential between the Canadian and U.S. interest rates was reduced from its present 3 percentage points to one-half of a percentage point as it was during the 1970s, the resulting Canadian corporate and other tax revenue increase would cut our deficit by a further $12 billion annually.

On February 3, 1992, the government responded to the first of my points by introducing a plan for 5 per cent down payments or 95 per cent mortgaging. Then in the budget on February 25, the government announced a program for the use of Registered Retirement Savings Plans for down payments for the purchasing of principal residences.

Since January 8, 1992, when I wrote to the Prime Minister, the value of the Canadian dollar has fallen from 87 cents U.S. to below 84 cents U.S. now and it was 89 cents U.S. a short time ago.

In addition, again in the budget of February 25, the government announced a personal income tax reduction whereby the surtax will drop from 5 per cent to 4 per cent on July 1, 1992 and to 3 per cent on January 1, 1993. That will put an extra half billion dollars in the hands of Canadians during the fiscal year 1992-93 and $1.2 billion each year after that.

Unfortunately, in my view at least, there was no announcement of a public works program. But fortunately the government did not close the door and the budget did not close the door to something in the way of a public works program on infrastructure in the future.

In his budget speech the Minister of Finance said: "We are, for example, working with the private sector to develop airport infrastructure. We are actively pursuing building a fixed link from the mainland to Prince Edward Island with private sector financing. We are prepared to work with the provinces to explore ways by which the national highway system might be upgraded in a fiscally responsible manner".

In addition to the points I raised in my letter to Prime Minister, I also have raised in this House two other concerns that I believe stand in the way of our economic recovery.

The first has to do with the level playing field of corporation taxes between the United States and Canada. You will recall that on February 10 of this year I said that one reason businesses move to the United States was taxes.

Prior to 1986 the average U.S. corporate tax rate was 51 per cent, while the comparable Canadian rate was 48 per cent. Today the U.S. rate is approximately 39 per cent, compared with a 42 per cent Canadian rate. Our corporate tax rates previously lower than the United States are now higher. When withholding taxes as they affect Canadian subsidiaries of U.S. corporations are taken into account, Canadian rates are substantially higher than U.S. rates. No wonder we are losing jobs.

Again, the budget responded to that issue. In his speech the Minister of Finance said:

> To help the Canadian manufacturing and processing sector meet the challenges of globalization, the manufacturing and processing tax rate will be reduced from 23 per cent to 22 per cent, effective January 1, 1993, with a further reduction to 21 per cent on January 1, 1994.
> The capital cost allowance rate will be increased for manufacturing and processing machinery from 25 to 30 per cent, effective for acquisitions made after today.
> New activity in all sectors will be encouraged by reducing the withholding tax rate on direct dividends to 5 per cent. The government is prepared, in tax treaty negotiations, to begin reducing the rate on January 1, 1993. This will help Canada compete for international direct investment. It is particularly important now, as international businesses restructure their world-wide operations.

Again I raised another concern just prior to the budget, on February 25, and that had to do with the question of the financing of small businesses.

In my statement that day I said that since the beginning of 1991 the Bank of Canada and the chartered banks have been steadily lowering their interest rates, but the banks still have the credit squeeze on. No loans for inventory, no lines of credit. It is asset based, fully secured loans only.

Again in the budget speech the Minister of Finance responded to that and said that the government was announcing two measures to help small business.

The small business financing program will help small business in financial difficulty, including farmers, to obtain loans at lower rates. In addition, the ceiling for loans to individual small businesses under the Small Businesses Loans Act will be doubled from $100,000 to $200,000.

Clearly the Minister of Finance and the government have acted on the suggestions that I have made and on the suggestions that many others have made with respect to how to get the economy moving again.

Understandably the opposition wants more. It wants the government to do more. That, of course, is a job of the opposition. It is its job to oppose.

As I understand it, the Leader of the Official Opposition, when asked what his policy is, has said: "Well, if the government is for it, I am against it". That, of course, is the nature of our system, regrettable as I personally believe that to be and as I think more and more Canadians believe it to be.

I hope members of Parliament from all parties will start to work together in the days ahead for the good of Canada and for the good of Canadians.

The government has taken a number of initiatives. It has taken those on the assumption that recovery is either under way already or all it needs is a modest nudge.

• (1340)

Hopefully that advice has been the right advice. If it is not, I hope that the government will be prepared to take further action and take it rather quickly. But the proof is not in what we say here; the proof is whether this budget gets the economy moving again and whether or not we get jobs, jobs, jobs.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pose a couple of questions to the hon. member.

He has talked about the banks and financing for small businesses, which are of extreme importance. I am sure he agrees that today our chartered banks are pretty tough on small businesses. Cash is very tight. Small businesses are finding it very difficult not only because taxes are high but also because they are trying to wade through the recession with all the difficulties it presents to them.

I wonder if the hon. member could tell us whether there should be more measures taken. What additional measures could be taken to loosen up some finances for small business?

Surely the government could have done more than it did without actually costing the taxpayers of Canada more money. Of course, in times of recession the secret is to loosen up the money and get it flowing into productive areas. We know that small business has been one of the most productive parts of our economy over the years.

I would also like to ask him if he felt that the government should have taken a serious look at the Federal Business Development Bank. It was initiated to be the bank of last resort for businesses and entrepreneurs. Is there not something that could be done there that the government did not do?

Finally, in the area of research and development, I must remind him and the government that in 1984 they travelled across this country campaigning in that election. They were going to do wondrous things for research and development.

They did not campaign on the basis that it was going to be private enterprise money. They campaigned on the basis that there was going to be 3 per cent real input into research and development from a Conservative government.

This has never been the case. Right now research and development is at one of the lowest ebbs of public funding in our history. We all know as we talk about competitiveness in the world that research and development are key. They are almost the motor that drives the whole organization. If you do not have that, you are not going to keep pace today.

Would the member tell us why the government did not do more about promoting research and development and giving the industrial community of Canada and research institutions a little more spurring on? Surely this would bring dividends back. It is an investment rather than a spending of money.

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his observations and his comments.

Unfortunately in my view the approach that he has taken is a typical opposition approach. I think the time has come for all of us to try to get together and, as the hon. member who spoke before me said, be more co-operative in this House. We should work together for the benefit of Canada and all Canadians.

It is not just a question of more, more, more or oppose everything that is said; it is a question of let us try to get the problems of the country dealt with and dealt with properly.

I know the hon. member was listening to me very carefully during Question Period on February 25, prior to the budget, when in fact I spoke on this issue of small businesses and the difficulty they have in receiving financing. I talked about the role the Federal Business Development Bank should be playing in that process.

I just go on to quote the balance of my comments that day. I said that unfortunately the policies of our lender of last resort, the Federal Business Development Bank, are no different from those of the chartered banks.

If we are ever going to get the economy going again or even save what we still have, the banks will not help. If the banks will not help, then the Federal Business Development Bank must lighten up its lending policies.

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege for me to rise in this House today to participate in the 1992 budget debate.

This budget demonstrates that a prudent, consistent, fiscally responsible course of action is the road to economic recovery and growth.

Since being elected as the member for Wild Rose in 1988 I have spent a great deal of time consulting with my constituents about the affairs of government. They have expressed a desire for government to be responsible and responsive.

All Canadians, especially in these tough economic times, are familiar with the difficulties in balancing a budget, whether it is personal or business. I believe this budget provides realistic and lasting solutions that will ensure our economic recovery.

Canadians are adamant in their desire for an effective and efficient government. They want a government that does not duplicate or overlap services. They want a government that is dedicated to the elimination of the public debt. The Minister of Finance, through this budget, has assured Canadians that this government is on the right track.

This budget addresses spending cuts, reorganization and restraint throughout the government. It starts with the elimination, consolidation or privatization of 46 agencies, boards, commissions, corporations and advisory bodies. It cuts non-wage operating budgets in government departments by 3 per cent, reduces international travel and the eliminates first-class travel for members of Parliament, senators and senior public servants. Last fall it put a freeze on ministerial, parliamentary and public service pay to help curtail spending.

These steps will curb government spending and enable this government to reduce the deficit by $4 billion in the 1992-93 fiscal year and a further $5 billion in the 1993-94 year.

This is a budget prepared for the people of Canada. It is a budget about people, programs and services. The Minister of Finance spoke in his budget speech about an expenditure control plan that was introduced in the 1990 budget. His remarks were to reassure Canadians that this government would not be cutting services to Canadians. Instead, government departments would be offering more efficient service.

The control plan would be left in place, but it would continue to look after the highest priority programs. These areas include major social transfers such as elderly benefits, family benefits, veterans allowances and pensions, unemployment insurance benefits and certain transfers to provinces, equalization and Canada Assistance Plan transfers to equalization receiving provinces.

• (1350)

The many changes that have taken place in the world during the last year have made it possible for this government to alter certain areas of expenditures and internal structure within our Armed Forces.

The budget addresses the recommendations made by the defence review last September which redefines our defence policy. The budget cuts defence spending by $2.2 billion over the next five years while still providing security at home and maintaining our commitment to NATO.

These strong measures have been necessary. In this budget the Minister of Finance has used sound judgment. There are no huge giveaways and no major new initiatives to increase our debt; just good, strong, solid common sense on how to get the most benefits for our tax dollars.

This budget also promises stability and shows signs of recovery for our economy. Because we have been prudent the budget offers incentives and benefits in areas where Canadian families interact with the government.

The Minister of Finance has found ways to encourage families concerning their financial situations. He has made changes to our tax system that will ensure that Canadian taxpayers will have their personal income taxes cut through a reduction in the surtax.

This budget has provided assistance where it is most needed. Lower income families and children will benefit. There will be one monthly child benefit that will not be subject to tax. Children under the age of 18 will be eligible. The new benefit will include a new earned income supplement of up $500 per year for low income working families with children. This benefit will provide as much as $144 per month or $1,733 per year per child.

The child care expense deduction takes on a new look as it increases to $5,000 for each child under seven and $3,000 for other eligible children.

The need for a fairer and more consistent tax treatment where common law and married couples are treated the same has long been evident. The minister in this budget has found the necessary formula.

The introduction of a home buyers plan allows Canadians to use their existing RRSPs up to $40,000 per couple to buy or build a principal residence. Some people may say it is an unwise move to use retirement money to invest in a home. I say the Minister of Finance has very wisely added some restrictions that will ensure funds initially put aside for retirement will be paid back.

The limit for lifetime capital gains exemption has been changed. It is still $100,000 but some of the rules have changed. For instance, capital gains accrued on real estate after February 1992 will no longer qualify for this exemption. Gains accrued prior to March 1992 will qualify.

Canadians should note that this restriction does not apply to real estate used in an operational business. It does not affect the $500,000 exemption for small business or qualified farm property. Principal residences will continue to be fully exempt from taxes on capital gains.

The manufacturing and processing industry has experienced a very difficult time during this economic slowdown. The budget will provide the incentive and ability needed to put this industry back on a stable footing in a very competitive marketplace through reducing the manufacturing and processing tax rate from 23 per cent to 22 per cent as of January 1, 1993 and 21 per cent as of January 1, 1994.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the hon. member. She indicated that the budget was prepared for the people of Canada.

In this country we have 1.5 million unemployed people. The unemployment rate in my province is over 16 per cent. That is a very serious situation but it is a situation that this government has not addressed. It is not dealt with in the budget because there is simply no plan to get people back to work.

I want to ask the hon. member who as I said has indicated that the budget is prepared for the people of Canada, what hope is offered in the budget for the 1.5 million unemployed people in this country?

Mrs. Feltham: Mr. Speaker, in 1984, when we looked at the problems this government would encounter over the next number of years, we had to make a decision on what this government would look at as far as fiscal responsibility was concerned.

Not only did we inherit a debt of $200 billion, plus the interest that was accumulating, but we also inherited a $16 billion program for which there was no money.

Over the number of years this government has been in power we have looked at ways of reducing or eliminating the $16 billion in programs for which there was no money.

After that was done, we then looked at ways and means that we could continue to support the people of Canada with additional programs that this government felt were necessary.

Over the last few years we have looked at unemployment insurance and a number of issues to help the people who are temporarily unemployed. We have looked for ways and means whereby we could put into place responsible agencies and groups.

We have looked at how we can help small business and large business to provide jobs for the people of Canada.

I feel this budget does give a good economic stable basis for the future and this will help all Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being two o'clock, the House will now proceed to Statements pursuant to Standing Order 31.

TRIBUTE TO NATIVE WOMEN

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Speaker, this year Health and Welfare Canada celebrated International Women's Day by paying tribute to eight native women leaders who were proposed by native women's associations and department officials.

On March 6, 1992, Health and Welfare Canada awarded certificates of merit to Bibiane Courtois, Joanne Francis, Joan Glode, Martha Greig, Jenny Margetts, who unfortunately is now deceased, Jacquelyne McPherson, Gail Stacey-Moore and Mary Sillett, in recognition of their contribution to better health and social conditions for Canadian women, their families and communities.

THE LATE MENACHEM BEGIN

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to note the passing of His Excellency Menachem Begin.

A pioneer of the state of Israel who rose to be its prime minister, his leadership earned the Nobel Peace Prize for securing peace along one of Israel's borders. In the event he showed flexibility and willingness to compromise for peace, which in a better world would have brought peace with all Israel's neighbours. He was a great man.

I had the pleasure and honour of receiving Mr. Begin during several of his visits to Canada, once as head of government, and of being received by him in Israel. He admired this blessed country of Canada, not least our good fortune to live so far from theatres of war.

He and his beloved wife Aliza knew little peace in life. From prison and torture in Europe they fled to Palestine with a clear Zionist vision of Israel, and they struggled to build it.

Little Israel, which in total is about the size of Lake Ontario, has produced more than its share of leaders of world stature. Menachem Begin will always be remembered as one.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I am upset with the way the environmentalists like the International Fund for Animal Welfare have begun again to misrepresent the facts about the sealing industry and the Newfoundland fishermen.

This is much like the situation back home. Wolves and foxes in Timiskaming have become troublesome to area farmers and tourist operators. Green Peace's unrealistic solution to this threat is to neuter the animals and release them. I tell Green Peace this does nothing for the wolves' appetites.

It is just like Green Peace's solution to Newfoundland's cod stocks and the abundance of seals off the east coast. It is shameful and I say that ignorant environmentalists have done enough damage. They know nothing about resource management. They do not accept that man can use its resources.

Until greenies realize that there is room for responsible management of our fish, fur and forestry, they have no right dictating solutions to Canadians. Canada was built on these resources and there are many who still depend on their development.

We Canadians from such regions of the country have a right and should be allowed to live from the land and develop it as we have for hundreds of years.

These ads are just plain shameful.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S WEEK

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, recognizing that this is International Women's Week, I would like to take this opportunity to focus on Third World issues.

Women world-wide represent half the world's population but contribute two-thirds of the world's working hours and raise half of the world's food. In Africa women produce 80 per cent of the food and in Asia, 60 per cent of the food.

Women are recognized world-wide as the principal child care providers, yet in the Third World they receive only the leftovers in resources, nutrition, health and education. Inadequately provided for themselves, they are unable to nurture their exploding numbers of children properly.

Women must be allowed to be equal partners in decision making. Without adequate recognition within the Third World and donor countries of how existing systems exclude women and perpetrate the cycle of poverty and environmental degradation, our global community will be at increasing risk.

The cycle must be broken. Third World women's issues must be addressed with priority emphasis—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Beaches—Woodbine.

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, former Supreme Court Justice Madam Bertha Wilson has written to the Minister of Justice expressing her dismay and distress over the recent cancellation of the Court Challenges Program. She goes on to say:

> I have on numerous occasions publicly expressed the view that it is totally illusory to confer rights on people who do not have the means to enforce them. I saw for myself when I was a member of the Supreme Court how invaluable this program has been to minority groups and to the disadvantaged. It has clearly been well and efficiently administered and has resulted in an excellent input into many very significant 'test' cases. I am sure that my former colleagues on the Court, if asked, would confirm that view. If there is any possibility that the government's decision on the Court Challenges Program might be reversed, may I respectfully add my voice to what I am sure is a chorus of disapproval of the cancellation of this very imaginative and worthwhile program.

SENIORS

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, our seniors are special people who deserve the very best we can give them.

Until 1986 the Government of Alberta provided lodges for all senior Albertans who wished to use them. There was no discrimination or means testing; everyone was treated equally.

That has now changed. Seniors must have means tests when applying for residency in a new or renovated seniors lodge. Is this short-sighted? Where will middle income seniors reside in rural areas? Will medical costs increase for those who are refused accommodation? Will nursing homes be substituted?

Lodges are essential for all seniors in rural areas. There should be no means tests or refusals. We must recognize those who contributed so much to Canada's growth.

EMISSION STANDARDS

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, on February 20, the Minister of Transport claimed Canada's new emission standards for cars would be the most rigorous in the world. This is a sham. Standards are only as good as their testing, and in this case the government is using gasoline for emission testing that is not available in Canada.

The Canadian government cross-border shops for its test fuel to get MMT-free gasoline. If it used gasoline containing MMT, Canadian automobiles would not pass the emission tests.

MMT, in addition to being a suspected health risk which has been banned in the United States since 1978 for its damaging effects on the pollution control devices of cars, boosted hydrocarbon emissions by up to 27 per cent according to the government's own testing in 1985.

Instead of waiting until 1996 to cut hydrocarbons in the lab by 29 per cent, I call on the minister now to ban MMT and cut those emissions by as much as 27 per cent.

It is time the government came clean on its emission testing standards and revealed just how bad MMT emissions really are. Faking emission testing will not help the environment; real cuts will.

SPONSORS

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, today I would like to point out the important contribution, which unfortunately is too often overlooked, of those who support the Canadian sports community. Of course I mean the many sponsors. As much as the athletes, they deserve our sincerest thanks and congratulations.

For example, they make it possible for young soccer players to enjoy their sport on Canada's many playing fields in the summer. They help provide refreshments, equip them and transport them to sports meets outside their community. They also co-operate in many receptions to honour the most deserving players and they help leading athletes reach the top of their field. In short, they help our young people fufil their dreams and make it as far as the Olympic level.

Although they give considerable amounts, we are grateful to them much more for their deep commitment to the basic values of amateur sport. They thus help make Canada a better country in which to live.

[English]

SENIORS

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, in the budget the government cut the seniors independence programs by over 22 per cent.

The Minister of State for Seniors should be well aware that the one thing seniors want the most is independence. Seniors deserve the right to live their lives as they choose and they want the government to support that objective. The Seniors Independence Program and Seniors Independence Research Program are important in meeting this objective. Seniors want to remain independent and live in their communities as long as possible.

The minister must commit the government to the independence of seniors and restore funding to these two important programs. Supporting the independence of seniors is a step in the right direction, but with these cuts the government has taken a giant step backward.

I urge the government to reverse this decision and to support seniors.

WORK PLACE SAFETY

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to the attention of the Minister of Labour a dispute that is ongoing between Labour Canada and CAW representing railway carmen. It has to do with the presence of PCBs in paint on rolling stock that carmen are being called to work on.

On numerous occasions carmen have expressed their concern about this matter. There is growing anxiety and even anger among them that Labour Canada does not appear to want to take an interest in this issue. Labour Canada does not exist to defend the interests of the CPR or the CNR. It exists to enforce existing rules and to make sure that there is such a thing as work place safety and health.

I call on the minister to take an interest in this issue by making sure that something is done about the information that has come to light about PCBs in paint on certain cars, and most recently with respect to truck sides that carmen have to work on. I hope the minister will soon do something about this and have Labour Canada live up to its mandate.

DAIRY FARMERS OF CANADA

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, in 13 years as an MP I have never been exposed to the hypocrisy and cynicism as that practised by the leadership of the Dairy Farmers of Canada.

• (1410)

I refer to the TV clips and full-page newspaper ads purporting to show an existing and lovely dairy farm deteriorating into an old, abandoned dairy farm. They blame the government and its GATT proposals.

In fact, the so-called abandoned farm in the ads is an existing but abandoned farmstead that got that way under the current supply managed system. Indeed, they hauled in the weeds to make it look worse.

The so-called existing and lovely dairy farm in the ads was the result of spending many thousands of dollars clearing out the weeds, repairing and painting the abandoned house, barn, fences, et cetera.

The deceit of the dairy leadership is an insult to Canadians in general but especially to the honest and well respected men and women who daily work long and hard hours to provide safe and healthy milk for us all. Shame on the so-called dairy leaders.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, an Ottawa business was recently denied an opportunity to air a commercial showing its concern for and support of a united Canada.

The CBC refused to air the ad, citing a policy that prohibits the advocacy of a point of view or course of action on a public issue. This is the message that Mr. Brian McGarry wanted to deliver:

> Now is the time to examine, not those things which divide, but rather those things which unite us. Our common Canadian heritage makes us one of the greatest nations in the world. For nearly 125 years, Canadians have stood together through good times and bad. The task has never been easy, nor will it be in the days ahead. We must unite to ensure this family of ours stays together.

Have we really reached the point where we cannot say "I love Canada" on our national network? Is this what the government had in mind when it removed national unity from the mandate of the CBC?

I am appalled. One wonders what will become of the CBC itself if Mr. McGarry's heart-felt message is not heeded.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, the issue of the environment is one that is of increasing importance to all Canadians.

However, as our cities continue to grow and this increased urbanization creates a challenge of environmental protection, careful planning becomes essential.

From March 15 through to March 20 a conference will be held in Vancouver to discuss these vital issues. The Global Parliamentarians Conference on Human Settlements and Sustainable Development will attempt to analyse the inter-relationships among human settlements, environment and development with particular interest to my province of B.C.

One of the three areas of the world that the conference will be concentrating its work on will be the Vancouver to Seattle corridor. As my Delta constituents know, this is one of the fastest growing regions of the developed world. Environmental concerns are important as this region expands. Delegates from 60 to 65 nations around the globe will attend and the Canadian delegation will assume leadership.

I would like to encourage all my colleagues to attend this important conference as well as the Globe 92 conference.

REFORM PARTY

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, Reform Party members in Manitoba are like a bunch of retreaded tires. History shows what happens to retreads: They blow their side-walls, they slip their belts, and they lose their grip.

First Mr. Manning ditched four national executive retreads from Manitoba. The news in Manitoba today has blow-outs by a large number of retreads from the ridings of Winnipeg South, Winnipeg St. James and Selkirk—Red River; they have separated from the rim.

Now Preston Manning and his retreads are preaching to seniors to give their inheritance to the party instead of to their loved ones. This reformed tire company is on its way to the grinder. It will all end up as tar and asphalt from which it came.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring the deplorable situation faced by CNR pensioners who have suffered 30 years of non-indexed pensions to the attention of the House.

In 1986, a subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Transport unanimously recommended, among other things, that the pension fund could and should take inflation into account. It also recommended that the surviving spouse should receive more than 50 per cent of the retiree's pension.

To date, none of the recommendations have been addressed in the spirit which the committee intended. The CN pension fund has a total value of over $7.25 billion, and yet the pensioners and their families who gave their lives to the railroad are forced to try to exist on pensions which are woefully inadequate.

The surviving spouses' benefits must be raised. In fact, if they were raised to the standard level, most of these widows would not have to receive the Guaranteed Income Supplement. It is time the CNR started treating its past employees and their families fairly and stopped forcing the Canadian taxpayer to subsidize CNR pensioners.

MEMBERS' EXPENSES

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, today, like thousands of other Canadians, I read Gilles Paquin's article in La Presse under the heading: "MPs and senators spend more".

For months I have been saying we could cut down on our expenses in Parliament, considering the present state of the economy, but this article confirms there has been no real attempt to cut expenses in a number of areas.

I have repeatedly suggested to the Board of Internal Economy how we could save taxpayers' money. In 1991 I was the first Canadian member of Parliament to disclose my expenses, and I take pride in showing my books to the people in Abitibi. They know I have nothing to hide.

I would like the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons to send me, as soon as possible, a copy of the budget for MPs' expenses for 1992–93.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

TRADE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade. We have asked the government to resort to retaliatory action against unfair trade practices by the United States, following incidents involving softwood lumber, Honda cars and magnesium. Today we are told that cabinet will meet to reassess the kind of retaliatory action Canada might consider. Since cabinet is considering such action, does this mean the government admits that the agreement it negotiated is no good? Is the government admitting this agreement contains no effective remedy against unfair practices by the United States?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept that at all. In fact Canada, as a result of the free trade agreement with the United States, is the only country in the world that has access to a binding dispute settlement mechanism which is better than what is available in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, the GATT.

Under the GATT, countries that are found guilty of any illegal trade actions can put off taking action, can put off remedying the problem that they have been found guilty of. That is not possible under the free trade agreement. That is the benefit of the dispute settlement mechanism under the FTA. I repeat, Canada is the only country that has this.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I can see the embarrassment of the minister. I remember very well the Prime Minister standing in this House on December 22, 1988, when talking about free trade, and saying: "We will have a genuine shield against new U.S. protectionism, whether from Congress or the administration".

If that so-called shield against U.S. protectionism is so great, why has the cabinet gone into hiding to decide if and how it will retaliate against the Americans?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the cabinet is not in hiding. The cabinet met this morning. The cabinet will meet on Thursday. The cabinet will meet a week from today to deal with the various issues of government.

As far as my hon. friend's question is concerned, do we have a shield? Yes, we do have a shield. The shield is called the binding dispute settlement mechanism which was in force. As my hon. friend recalls, last year there was a very strong push from the Americans to take action against our pork exports. We took it to the dispute settlement mechanism. We took it right to the top of that, and what happened? We won. If we did not have the free trade agreement, we could not have taken it to that dispute settlement mechanism. We would have lost and the pork farmers of Canada would have had a countervailing duty which we could not have got out of paying.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to see the minister tell that to Canadians who are losing their jobs, one after the other, every day. We want to know from this government when it will wake up to that reality. Will it wait until we have two million people unemployed in Canada to fight this sanction by the Americans? Never have we seen the Americans so aggressive against Canadians since you made that crazy deal with them.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I ask my hon. friend to go and make the statement he has just made to the pork producers of Canada. He will find that the pork producers of Canada are very pleased with the free trade agreement and the actions that this government took in defending their interests against the Americans under the free trade agreement with the binding dispute settlement mechanism.

Mr. Chrétien: It's not working.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): My hon. friend says it is not working. Ask the pork producers whether it is working. They will tell you that it is working.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pose a question to the same minister. The government seems to be at a total loss at finding any way of standing up for Canada on this crucial issue.

I want to ask the minister this. Under the 1971 Employment Support Act passed by a Liberal government, federal authorities have a right to provide financial assistance directly to any industry "whose exports are subject to unfair duties and harassment by foreign countries". Considering the mess that the government made of this entire dispute by signing the softwood agreement, will the government now invoke that Employment Support Act to provide direct assistance to industries and workers so that they can maintain their employment and maintain their production? Will this government stand up for these industries and not allow another government to dictate to us what our natural resource policies should be?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, that is precisely why we terminated the memorandum of understanding on softwood lumber so that the resource policies would be established in provinces in Canada and not by Washington. That is precisely why we terminated that agreement.

My hon. friend asks are we sitting back or are we standing up for Canadian interests. We are standing up for Canadian interests. That is why we terminated the memorandum of understanding. That is why on the Honda issue we have issued two strong statements to the United States government and why we have had a series of meetings since then to try to resolve this issue. That is why in the case of the softwood lumber issue we have bound together a coalition of the provinces and the industry affected and are taking that same strong, united position.

What I hear from the Liberals on the other side is that they do not want to see a united position. They want to see the whole matter collapse so that we will not win, but we are determined to beat this one.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, what this government seems to be trying to say is that the mess it has created it is now trying to mop up. The victims of that will be the workers in the softwood lumber industry who will have to pay the price with the loss of their jobs.

I want to ask the minister again: Will he listen carefully, rather than flying off on his own direction? There is an act under the federal statutes, the Employment Support Act, which gives this government the right to provide direct financial assistance to help industries pay bonds, to keep workers on the job, to provide financial assistance while we go through this dispute.

If the minister wants to stand up for Canada and its workers, is he prepared to invoke that act and use the authority he has to defend our rights as a sovereign country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes, I am aware of that act and yes, that is an option we can use. But that is only a very small part of the battle that we are taking on this to the United States.

We are dealing with it, as far as the industry and the provinces are concerned, in the broadest possible way to ensure that a strong, united Canadian position is put forward to the United States administration and dealing with the efforts of the Prime Minister in speaking directly to the president.

I do not recall one time when the former Prime Minister who was sitting here, Mr. Trudeau, ever picked up the phone and dealt with the President of the United States in dealing with any trade issues.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. It is clearer every day that people see what a bad deal this Canada–U.S. trade deal has been for all sectors of the economy.

I want to quote the comment of a former deputy chief negotiator for the trade deal who said that the trade deal was based on two principles, that the trade barriers would come down and the trade barriers would not be put up again in a capricious manner. The former deputy chief negotiator said that both of these principles have been broken by the United States and that "Canada is being treated significantly worse than other trading partners". Despite what the minister wants to say, Canada is getting the bad end of a bad deal. I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister if the government will finally admit that the deal is a failure, that we want fair trade with the United States, scrap the Canada–U.S. trade deal, pull out of the NAFTA talks and send a real message to the United States about where Canada stands.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I do not quite understand the Leader of the New Democratic Party. Exports are up since 1988, the year before the free trade agreement came in. Our trade surplus is up. The net investment flows into Canada are up all of them helping to increase economic activity in Canada over what it would have been if we did not have the free trade agreement.

Now I hear my hon. friend saying she does not want to have the free trade agreement. She is saying that, I presume, under the full understanding that if we do not have the free trade agreement, we do not have the dispute settlement mechanism. If we get a decision on the countervailing duty on the softwood lumber, that is it, there is no further appeal. With the free trade agreement we have that further appeal. We have the option to go to the dispute settlement mechanism as we did with the pork countervail action. We were successful there and we are going to be successful in the softwood lumber issue as well.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): The minister talks about dispute mechanisms around the softwood lumber issues. As he knows, we were involved in a dispute mechanism settlement with GATT from which this government withdrew in favour of the Canada–U.S. trade deal. Canadians want to know why this government has not shown one thing resulting from this Canada–U.S. trade deal other than high unemployment, a high dollar, a high interest rate for Canadians.

Will the government stand up for Canadians? Will the government stand up for fair trade, withdraw from the NAFTA talks and send a real message to the United States?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I heard two things from the member for Yukon. One, she is saying in 1986 we withdrew from a settlement. In 1986 we did not have the dispute settlement mechanism. We have that now so we now have some protection, protection that no other country has. The GATT does not provide the same sort of protection. The GATT is not a binding settlement mechanism.

I think I heard her say that we withdrew from the GATT. We did not withdraw from the GATT, but the GATT dispute settlement system does not provide us with anything like the protection that the dispute settlement mechanism does for Canada in the free trade agreement with the United States.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): The protection seems to be protection of the unemployed, if we talk to a million and a half Canadians and all of those people in manufacturing industries.

Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Yesterday, in referring to Mexico, the Prime Minister said that a trade agreement was a healthy way to develop a country. Today, however, it is reported that in areas where a free trade agreement already exists, such as the Maquiladora zone, many babies are born with serious defects as a result of environmental conditions.

How can the Deputy Prime Minister and his government believe this kind of horrific situation can contribute to the development of a country?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, together with the Prime Minister, I had a chance last week to meet the mayor of Mexico and also the minister responsible for the environment in Mexico. The Leader of the New Democratic Party should know that they have substantially increased spending in this area in recent years and that President Salinas' administration has been extraordinary in its efforts to catch up in terms of what they need in the way of environmental regulations and enforcement of these regulations.

What we must not forget here is that a country also has to trade with other countries if it wants a prosperous economy. I think we should avoid being paternalistic and giving the impression that if they do business with other developing countries, they will not be as effective as we are on environmental issues.

In fact, the opposite is true. Actually Mexicans feel rather insulted when we try to convince them that where the environment is concerned, their standards and concerns are not as impressive as our own, because that is not the case.

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade. By taking retaliatory action against the softwood lumber industry in Canada, the U.S. government is interfering in Canada's domestic affairs. This kind of provocation and attempt to undermine Canadian sovereignty cannot be allowed to go unanswered because next year the industry will lose about $430 million.

How does the minister intend to help plant owners who may have to close down and 1,000 employees who stand to lose their jobs?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, putting our trade in softwood lumber on a normal trade basis with the United States is the best thing we can do for the softwood lumber industry. That is precisely why we terminated the softwood lumber memorandum of understanding.

The United States has responded with this countervail action. We have demonstrated we are going to fight to the very best of our ability, using all the tools at our disposal, using the resources of the industry and the provinces as well as the federal government. As well we have friends in the United States who support the position of the Government of Canada.

That is the best thing we can do to maintain our rights as a sovereign nation, through the provinces with their forest management practices to maintain their sovereignty to manage those resources in the way they think best without having to deal with Washington.

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian lumber industry has and is being held hostage by American domestic politics of protectionism. Thousands of jobs have been lost and more will be lost later.

Given that it is going to take more than a year to settle the issue, does the minister have a financial plan since there is nothing in the new budget to provide help for the owners and the workers who have lost their jobs?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend and I are on the same wave length. We both disagree with the action the United States has taken and we are going to defend the interests of Canada as much as we possibly can, and that is going to help softwood lumber workers.

We also point out to the United States that it is shooting itself in the foot. On the one hand it is trying to get its housing industry going by taking measures to encourage people to buy houses. On the other hand it is encouraging the price of lumber to go up with this action on softwood lumber that is increasing the cost of a house. We are taking that message to the United States as well, as we continue the actions against the countervailing duty. We are going to win this and that is the best thing we can do for softwood lumber workers in Canada.

MONTREAL'S ECONOMY

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, since the Prime Minister is not here, I will direct my question to the Minister of Transport who is responsible for the Montreal region.

According to a document from the Quebec Department of Labour and Income Security, the Montreal region is in such decline that one adult in two does not work and the number of welfare recipients has almost doubled recently.

Will the minister ask the Prime Minister to personally look into this matter, before Montreal becomes another Schefferville?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, one thing Montrealers know is that this government will never behave like the Liberal government of the time and intervene in the middle of the night, through the Senate, to pass legislation preventing Montreal industries from expanding.

Since it was elected, this government has paid a lot more attention to the interests of Montrealers than the previous Liberal government did, and it has invested in industries of the future such as pharmaceuticals, aerospace and aviation. Those industries create the jobs of the future, whereas all the time the Liberal Party was in power there was even more unemployment than now in Montreal.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, greater Montreal provides almost half of the jobs in Quebec. When will the minister take his responsibilities seriously to truly give hope to Montreal and create jobs in that city before it becomes a ghost town?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, all the studies that were done on Montreal indicate absolutely that one thing must be provided in Montreal, that is more training and retraining for workers. Montrealers remember very well that the members opposite prevented large sums of money from being made available for those purposes by opposing Bill C-21, not only in the House of Commons but also in the Senate. That legislation now enables us to provide the necessary funds to address this fundamental problem of training and retraining workers.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

As the minister is aware, world-wide ozone depletion means increased cases of skin cancer, immune disorders and also cataracts. It also has terrifying effects on the marine food chain.

In light of European actions on this issue and President Bush's commitment to ban the production and consumption of CFCs by 1995, will the minister today announce that Canada will also implement a ban by 1995?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, we have already indicated several times that Canada has been ahead of the issue as far as ozone depletion is concerned.

In fact, we announced last August through the green plan that we were committing $25 million to the construction of new research facilities in northern Canada and accelerating our regulatory regime.

I will be meeting next week with the ministers of the provinces at the Canadian Council of the Ministers of the Environment. We will examine this issue and hope to make some announcements then.

I do want to point out that by 1995, 85 per cent of CFCs in this country will have been phased out. We are looking at doing whatever we can to be able to go faster.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

In light of those meetings next week, will the minister make some provision for recycling and recovery? In committee he has made some indication that his provincial counterparts were primarily responsible for that role.

Would he be prepared to indicate that in those discussions he will provide the funds to enable them to do that?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, there has been some work done for a national action plan for recovery, recycling and reclamation of chlorofluorocarbons.

This work has been prepared by a federal-provincial working group. We hope it will have completed its work on time so that it can report to the ministers next week. We can potentially make some announcements then.

I should also stress that it is not only in Canada where we have to concentrate our efforts in this area. I would like to remind the member that we contribute to 2 per cent of the problem, but we certainly seem to bear more than 2 per cent of the consequences. We also intend to be active on the international front on this issue.

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

In 1989 in a report on the Court Challenges Program, the Standing Committee on Human Rights said: "The virtually unanimous verdict of witnesses who appeared before the committee is that the reasons for continuation are not merely sufficient but compelling".

The report concluded: "The Court Challenges Program makes the critical difference between access to charter rights and no access".

I want to know why the government cancelled this vital program. Why will the minister not say today that he is prepared to reinstate this program immediately?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I think it is fair to say that over the years the government did finance the Court Challenges Program and participated in several very important law decisions.

We think that now is the time for other levels of government, the Canadian bar and other non-governmental bodies, to which most of the current court challenges pertain, to take a hand and participate in the funding of these matters.

• (1440)

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, nothing the government has done in cancelling this program is fair. This program costs $2 million. The government, this year alone, has increased the litigation budget of the Department of Justice by $16 million.

The government is saying: "It is fair for the government to defend its policies and defend itself, but disadvantaged Canadians have no right to access the charter to defend their rights".

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacLellan: Why is the government not prepared to use some objectivity and common sense and allow disadvantaged Canadians access to our justice system and reinstate this program?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate my hon. friend's concern in this particular matter. I can do no more than reiterate the comments I made.

The program, we feel, has come to an end as far as this level of government is concerned. It has served the purpose and we think it is up to other groups to come forward at this time to participate in the program.

CHILD POVERTY

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister responsible for children, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister.

This government's thwarted scheme to deindex seniors' pensions is still fresh in the minds of Canadians. Today the same hour-glass approach to cutting child benefits will push the poorest of Canadian children deeper into poverty and despair with each passing year.

I ask the minister why this government has betrayed Canadian children by allowing their futures to decay by 3 per cent every year?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, must I repeat for this House that we believe that children represent the future of our country and that through the budget which was tabled and on which we will vote tomorrow, we are helping families who need social and economic assistance, particularly one-parent families who need additional help.

Too often we forget to mention that this budget contains increased benefits for families and children and that day care services will be maintained through other programs and existing measures. We are working in that direction by way of the budget and of the last social measures.

[English]

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, Canadian children know the difference between trick and treat.

The net child benefits for an average income family are worth barely half of what they were seven years ago. These families are teaching their children to be aware of false promises and sacred trusts.

I ask the minister why her government has deprived Canada's children to hide the cost of Tory fiscal failure?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, when speaking about social measures we often tend to think in terms of winners and losers. I would simply like to say that low and middle income families will be winners, thanks to the social and fiscal programs we created for families. Single parents will also be winners.

I maintain it is by reducing the debt and the deficit we inherited in 1984 that we as a government and as a society will succeed in taking on that responsibility and in preparing the future within the context of a healthy economy.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works and it concerns the government policy of cross-border shopping.

The minister will know that Canadian customs uniforms are not purchased in Canada and that various government departments use postal services other than Canada Post. This practice has hit home in our own Parliament Buildings where a Canadian carpet supplier was actually excluded in favour of an American supplier.

Does the minister endorse this practice in the proposed $200 million renovation slated for the Parliament Buildings over the next 10 years? Will he ensure that whenever possible every nail, every litre of paint, every stick of furniture and every piece of carpet will be made in Canada? If we cannot protect our Canadian interests in our Parliament Buildings where can we protect them?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I agree with my colleague. Certainly I agree with the proposition he has put forward.

I understand from my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, that the uniforms to which he referred was an experimental or a pilot project. Basically the uniforms are purchased here in Canada.

He talked about a carpet. That was really the option of the contractor. It had nothing to do with the specifications from Public Works. I certainly endorse the policy he has put forward and I would be glad to work with him on it.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is also about cross-border shopping, and I guess it is appropriate to address this one to the minister of energy.

What is the government's reaction to the fact that Petro-Canada, the Canadian company, the company for Canadians, our company, the one with the big maple leaf normally on its trucks as its logo, has sneaked a truck across the border from Windsor to Detroit to buy cheap American gas to bring it back and sell it in Canada? What is the government's reaction to that kind of cross-border shopping?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member makes an interesting point. As I have told him before in the House, Petro-Canada markets in the marketplace as a company. I do not answer for it on every point. In fact even as a privatized company it has a board of directors that now makes that decision.

I say to the hon. member that I am sure he would not mind that gas coming across the border so he could use it in his car, which I understand was not made in this country either.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

DENISON MINES

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Tomorrow Denison Mines in Elliot Lake is shutting down its uranium mining operation there, which will result in the lay-off of almost 1,000 workers.

What new provisions is the minister prepared to make to provide employment for these workers? The budget seemed to provide very little in this regard. I want to know what he is prepared to do to provide jobs for this community that has lost almost 85 per cent of its mining jobs.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am ready to work with the community in question and make available to it all the benefits of the different programs that exist under Employment and Immigration.

I know this is a serious blow to that community. I am ready to work with the hon. member and officials of my department are ready to sit down with those people to see how we can help them adjust to the situation in question.

ATOMIC ENERGY CONTROL BOARD

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. A week ago the Atomic Energy Control Board announced that it would be shutting down its office in Elliot Lake, Ontario.

I want to ask the minister how this can be justified. We have an operating uranium mine. We have a uranium refinery. We have three mines which are to be safely decommissioned. How can the minister justify having the control board pull its office and its monitoring facilities out of that community at a time when they are desperately needed? How can he justify that? How can he justify having this control board, the regulatory agency, act so irresponsibly at this time?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's concern for his community and for Elliot Lake and the changes that have taken place there. He and I have discussed many times the downturn in the uranium industry in Elliot Lake and the Ontario Hydro purchases that were based on long-term contracts.

In respect to the AECB moving out, there were four people at the AECB office in Elliot Lake. The major work is in Saskatchewan and that is where I believe three of the four people will now be placed.

• (1450)

The second point on decommissioning and nuclear waste, that has not been done by AECB at offices such as that. It has always been done from the Ottawa office. It will be done from that office which is not different from what it was for Denison and Elliot Lake or any other decommissioning including places like Port Hope.

CANADIAN INSTITUTE FOR INTERNATIONAL PEACE AND SECURITY

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

In the recent budget cuts, Canadians will lose an invaluable source of independent thought on foreign policy, the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security. The finance minister says that the institute's mandate can be carried out by the Department of External Affairs.

I would like to ask the minister: How can the Department of External Affairs possibly carry out the work of the institute and still be able to maintain its independence?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as we were going through some of the things in our department that we felt were to some extent duplications of things that were going on, the Canadian Institute was one of them even though we recognize the high calibre of some of the work it has done.

First of all it will take some time to phase out the agency. As we do that, we will be discussing with them the kinds of things we can do inside the department and indeed the services we can buy from others as well. We did feel we did not need an entire permanent agency to do the kind of work it was doing.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

Being as a new world order is emerging, the international community is in a state of flux and many areas of the world are embroiled in conflict. Canada's security is always a top priority. How can the government justify the elimination of its only source of independent advice on foreign policy?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the institute is hardly our only source of independent advice. We do get advice from both inside the department and from a number of institutions in Canada and around the world.

We will continue to seek the broadest possible consultation in terms of developing our policies and the kinds of things that we should be doing within what is indeed, as the hon. member has said, quite a changed international environment.

I would hate to think that our capacity to develop foreign policy was based solely on one institute, because I do not think it is.

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Today an independent study of the government's proposed child benefit system points out that the benefits for all low income families will be reduced through inflation by 27 per cent over the next eight years. Over one million Canadian children are poor and will become even poorer with this government program.

Can the minister explain to the House how this honours the government's commitment to reduce child poverty by the year 2000, which it made in this House, and how it also honours Canada's international obligation to recognize the right of every child to an adequate standard of living?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, I think that it is important to repeat that the new benefit replaces a child benefit system that was already partly indexed. This means, I maintain, that with the new measure we brought in with the last budget, every parent who really needs help will come out ahead because we recognize, of course, the need to set up different models.

We had priorities to put in place. As a government we chose to help families in the greatest need, while maintaining our social programs for child care services.

NUCLEAR VESSELS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

KRBD-FM radio station from Ketchikan has publicly broadcast a notice to mariners during the past hour that a Los Angeles class nuclear attack submarine is about to enter Alaskan waters from Dixon Entrance, sovereign internal Canadian waters.

Would the minister explain why Canadian officials have known about the presence of the nuclear American submarine inside Canada since Sunday and have made no effort whatsoever to notify Canadian mariners?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows very well what is in place in order to protect Canadian fishing boats in what was an agreement that we signed with the Americans regarding their travel through Dixon Entrance. This is a genuine dispute. We regard the waters as ours. They regard them as theirs. He knows that.

We continue to maintain that as a result of our own sovereignty considerations we have a good deal with the Americans whereby we are provided with warning. The issue remains as it has in the past. We will continue to monitor what is happening with the American ships.

GROSS REVENUE INSURANCE PROGRAM

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister of Agriculture concerns the gross revenue insurance plan which has been effective, predictable and bankable: effective because it is based on individual and not regional considerations, predictable and bankable because support is calculated in the spring before seeding.

Given the fact that it is now March 10, given the fact that seeding is just around the corner, and given the fact that western producers need to know what their target revenue per hectare is, can the minister indicate when there will be an announcement as to what the price guarantees will be under the gross revenue insurance program?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asks an important question. As he said, farmers wanted predictability. They wanted individual coverage. They wanted to be bankable in the use of their GRIP.

A new government has been elected in the province of Saskatchewan. It is looking at changing the GRIP. It will not provide at the same level those aspects of predictability and bankability.

Although it is important to note that the national signatory committee recognized these changes as being significant, there would be need for an amendment to the national program. That can be done per formula. The Government of Canada would not stand in the way of the Government of Saskatchewan in attaining this.

HOUSING

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, two weeks ago in the budget the Minister of Finance announced a program to use RRSPs in the purchase of homes. It has been brought to my attention that because of regulations in RRSPs it may not be possible for people to access their funds before they close the purchase of their homes.

Is the minister aware of this particular problem, and are there some steps that can be taken to alleviate this problem?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for bringing this matter to my attention. I can advise him that the rules will allow RRSP withdrawals to take place for up to 30 days after the closing of a purchase of a home.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister in charge of FEDNOR. In 1987 this government recognized regional development with a program called FEDNOR. At the end of March of this year it comes to an end.

Can the minister tell this House and many constituents in northern Ontario whether or not this program will be brought back in as FEDNOR II?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. friend, the member for Timiskaming, who perhaps more than anybody in this House has worked for the amelioration of economic conditions in northern Ontario.

FEDNOR has created over 3,000 jobs. In the years since it has been established over 350 companies have been established. I think there is tremendous support for this program to be renewed. It is presently being examined by the government.

This House knows that I have received over 200 letters from reeves and mayors right across northern Ontario hoping this will be renewed. I am confident that it will be, but we are not ready to announce it yet.

ALTERNATIVE FUELS

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of energy. Last month's federal budget removed the federal excise tax on ethanol and methanol in blended gasolines and a meeting in Ottawa today of industry and agricultural leaders applauded that. But there is concern that alternative fuels imported from the United States sold here could get the same preferential tax treatment as Canadian made fuels.

What assurance can the minister give that this tax break will apply only to these alternative fuels which are produced in Canada to the benefit of Canadians?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the member has been meeting with a number of people who are interested in the ethanol business. I had an opportunity to meet with people in Williams Lake recently on using wood fibres, so I am pleased with the interest.

The words in the budget are very clear, and that is we want to build an indigenous Canadian ethanol industry. That is our purpose.

IMMIGRATION AND REFUGEE BOARD

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. During the past week we learned that the Immigration and Refugee Board was rife with mismanagement and scandal: unwarranted pressure applied to board members, gross misbehaviour by other board members, judgments prepared in advance before a case is heard.

• (1500)

Canadians are fed up with this situation and are requesting an independent public inquiry. I want to ask the Acting Prime Minister if he will do the right thing and order such an inquiry today.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will not comment on the objectives in the question of the hon. member. All I will say is that Canada's refugee determination system is well recognized as one of the fairest and most generous in the whole world.

As chairman of the Immigration and Refugee Board Mr. Fairweather is responsible for the board's operation. He has taken some actions of which I fully approve. I have talked to the gentleman. He has the situation well in hand. He is just as concerned about Canada's reputation of giving refuge to genuine claimants as the hon. member is.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, that is not enough. The public wants to know how deep and how extensive this mess is in the board. They want to know how many people have been unfairly treated by that board and how many cases must be reheard.

You are the minister responsible. I ask you once again—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows that his question became out of order before it was finished.

POINT OF ORDER

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I believe during Question Period one of our colleagues opposite, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, was given the opportunity to pose a question of a minister of the Crown. I believe this is in breach of the Standing Orders.

In bringing this to the attention of the Chair, I am wondering if the Chair will vigorously enforce the rules and not allow this to happen again, nor to allow this to be a precedent in the future.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond raises a matter which I hope would not occur again. It was an oversight. It has been well established in the House—

Some hon. members: No, no.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. parliamentary secretary seeking the floor?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I want to express a couple of thoughts on this. First of all, I think there is a long-standing tradition of the House that parliamentary secretaries do not ask questions of the minister or the ministry for which they have a responsibility.

However, if one looks at Beauchesne's there is clearly room for a parliamentary secretary from time to time to act as a member responsible for a particular constituency which he or she represents and therefore should have the opportunity from time to time to ask a question.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, clearly the hon. member opposite has it wrong. When one is appointed as a parliamentary secretary one takes an oath of secrecy for that department and also for all other agencies of the Government of Canada.

If the hon. member in question who is a diligent member of this House wishes to raise a particular concern affecting his constituency, he has the opportunity to do that in other avenues, whether that be in caucus or whether that be under the provisions of Standing Order 31.

However, I suggest the hon. member does not have the right as a parliamentary secretary to pose questions on the floor of the House of Commons to ministers of the Crown. That right is for members of the opposition and for members on the government side. We are seeing, all too frequently, too many members on the opposite sides given the opportunity to pose questions to the detriment of this side.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond has raised a point relating to a parliamentary secretary asking a question. The hon. parliamentary secretary, speaking for the government, says that there is authority in Beauchesne that would permit the parliamentary secretary to raise a question if it relates to his own particular riding. I will consider that and I will reply as soon as I can to the House.

The general rule though is set out in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, sixth edition, page 122, paragraph 413 under "Questions by Parliamentary Secretaries":

> 413. Those such as Parliamentary Secretaries who are clothed with the responsibility of answering for the Government ought not to use the time of the Question Period for the privilege of asking questions of the Government.

With respect to the matter raised by the hon. parliamentary secretary, I will consider it and I will return to the House.

I am now in some difficulty. I know that there are some points of order. We also have some questions of privilege which take precedence over them.

I think we should turn to a question of privilege of which I was given notice by the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I gave notice yesterday—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona is rising on a point of order. I thought I had suggested to the House that I should take the questions of privilege, which come before points of order. I wonder if the hon. member could wait until I can get to it.

Mr. Blaikie: On a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could give me some idea of what the point of order is. Is it something that should be dealt with before a question of privilege?

Mr. Blaikie: Is the Speaker intending to provide another opportunity for interventions to be made on the matter having to do—

Mr. Speaker: I have said that I am going to consider the matter and I will return to the House. I am not hearing any further argument on it. I will return to the House. There will be opportunity to argue it further at that time, when it is appropriate and convenient.

An hon. member: On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member is rising on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, that matter is going to be dealt with and I will return to the House.

If the hon. member is rising on another point of order, I would ask that he wait until I have finished with the questions of privilege.

PRIVILEGE

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, as you have previously indicated, I gave notice some time ago to the Chair through the Clerk's office that I had the intention of rising on a question of privilege today.

Very briefly, the question of privilege that I want to bring to your attention is in regard to actions on the part of the government which prevent me from doing my job as a member of Parliament.

You will know from pages 70 and 71 of Erskine May's 20th edition, parliamentary privilege is defined as being those privileges and rights that are absolutely necessary for the House to execute its power. The same privileges are enjoyed by members individually.

That is the point I want to bring to your attention very briefly.

Standing Order 39(4) of the House says that members can place up to four Order Paper questions at one time.

The point I want to make to you is that the government is systematically not answering questions that I place on the Order Paper. By not answering the questions that are there, I am unable to ask new questions.

In other words, once the Order Paper is plugged up with four questions, new questions cannot be asked.

• (1510)

I will give you an example. Question No. 113 was placed on the Order Paper on September 18 and was answered last week, the last days of February. There is another question on the Order Paper, No. 111, that dates back to September 16, 1991. There is an indication that all of these questions must be responded to within 45 days. It is now four months since that question was put on the Order Paper and the government refuses to answer it. If the government will not answer these questions, Mr. Speaker, I submit to you that I am unable to ask new questions and unable to ask more questions on behalf of my constituents who have sent me here.

If you deem that this is a prima facie point of privilege, I would move the appropriate motion to refer the matter to a parliamentary committee. I would hope, more than anything else, that the government would just obey the Standing Orders, respond to the questions within 45 days so that all of us as parliamentarians can do the job that the people of this country sent us here to do.

Mr. Nunziata: Let's hear your weak response now.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I do want to take a couple of moments to intervene on this point of privilege.

I want to begin by saying that the hon. member does not have a point of privilege. He may have a complaint. He may have some concerns. But I believe—

Ms. Copps: Are you the Speaker now? Make your submission; you are not the Speaker.

Mr. Cooper: No, I am not the Speaker but I believe I am entitled to express the opinion I have just expressed. I do not believe he has a point of privilege.

I do want to suggest that one of the difficulties that comes up from time to time in this House relating to questions is that we do have the 45-day limit. We understand that and certainly I can say from this side of the House that we try as much as possible to meet those deadlines.

However, from time to time there are questions that are very difficult to answer in that time frame. I am referring specifically to those information requests that seek information from all departments or agencies. It takes a great deal of time, money, energy and effort in order to achieve an answer within the 45-day period.

I understand the hon. member's frustration. That is why we put in place Standing Order 39(5)(a) and (5)(b) on recent changes to the rule. Standing Order 39(5)(a) says:

> A Member may request that the Ministry respond to a specified question within forty-five days by so indicating when filing his or her question.

That of course is what my hon. friend is referring to.

However, subsection (b) says:

> If such a question remains unanswered at the expiration of the said period of forty-five days, the Member who put the question may rise in the House under "Questions on Order Paper", and give notice that he or she intends to transfer the question and raise the subject-matter thereof on the adjournment of the House.

In other words, I understand the hon. member's frustration when he asked four questions which have plugged up his opportunity to put questions in place. He too has an option, a way that he can relieve that pressure by raising the issue, not shoving it under the carpet, at the latter part of the day and having that issue dealt with here in the House of Commons.

I understand his frustration. If my memory serves me right, I answered Question No. 110 this morning, which was another question that was put by the hon. member. It was a little late, I agree. We have tried as much as we could to meet the concerns of the hon. member and that is why that question was answered today.

In summary, I do not believe that the hon. member has a point of privilege. He has another option which is very clear under our Standing Orders. I would encourage him, when we are unable to meet the deadline, to feel free to transfer it for debate and we will be happy to co-operate.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, very quickly, I just want to indicate to you that it is true that a Standing Order is breached. That does not mean that it is a point of order. When a Standing Order is breached in such a way that it prevents me from doing my work as a member of Parliament, I submit that I do have a point of privilege.

Furthermore, the answer that the parliamentary secretary gave is that I had the option, when I did not get an answer after 45 days, of basically withdrawing the question, as the member for Hamilton East has said, with a seven-minute debate.

That is not the point. I am entitled to get an answer, and the rules do not provide a way for the government to weasel out or not to provide an answer. The rules are clear: the government must answer. Nothing in the rules say that the government has the option of not answering. It is not there. That is why it is important for us as parliamentarians to have this rule followed.

Here is the question I have been asking since September 16, just to give an example of how easy the question would be to answer within a period of time. I have asked for the hospitality budgets of each deputy minister. There are only 35 of them. How long could it possibly take to give that answer? It might take 15 minutes, it might take half an hour, but certainly not five months.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say that when this rule was brought in, the rule of the 45-day limit, the understanding was that in return for allowing only four questions to be on the Order Paper at any given time there would be this guarantee of an answer in 45 days.

The parliamentary secretary to the government House leader knows that and it is not enough to get up and give excuses. These questions are not being asked by anybody. These questions are being asked by members of Parliament who are elected to ask these questions and the government is bound by the Standing Orders to answer those questions within the prescribed time set in the Standing Orders.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that you should find that it is your responsibility and the House's responsibility to make the government follow the Standing Orders in this case, and no excuses allowed.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, having been part of the discussions in prior incarnations as a Whip and as a House leader of this party, I just want to recall an incident that I think is useful.

I think both parties are right. There is a request for the government to answer questions and there is a 45-day limit. By putting this in the late show or the adjournment debate we tried to find a solution to the problem because the problem is that we have no way of enforcing this request for the 45-day limit.

There is no sanction on the government if it does not answer the question. That is the problem. There is no way the opposition parties or any backbencher can force the government to answer the question, short of asking the government to be willingly co-operative in giving us an answer to the questions that are asked. If the government does not do that, of course we have no recourse; we have no way of forcing it to answer.

I say to hon. members that it is our responsibility, not the Speaker's responsibility, to put in those Standing Orders a sanction which would be applied to the government if it did not answer the questions. The 45-day limit plus the debate on the late show was some form of public acknowledgement that there was indeed an injustice being done here.

Mr. Speaker: I have listened very carefully to the point made by the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, also the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona, and frankly his intervention is helpful because it gives us some history of what led to the present situation.

I have listened carefully to the hon. parliamentary secretary as well as to the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, a member of some experience.

There is a problem clearly in the situation we face. It probably ought to be addressed, because as the parliamentary secretary for the government speaking on behalf of the government, has said, he can understand the frustration of an hon. member putting the question. The hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona said that it was the duty of members of Parliament to put these questions, and I must say I do not find too much difficulty being persuaded that the government "ought" to make the answers available.

On the other hand, the hon. parliamentary secretary has indicated that sometimes that could be difficult to do. As has been pointed out again by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, within the rules there is no sanction that either the Speaker is given to impose or that is available to the House.

I think it is a matter that clearly needs to be addressed. However, I think it is more a point of order than it is a question of privilege. I think it is a serious matter. I think the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell was certainly acting in a completely appropriate way in raising it for the consideration of the House.

• (1520)

I must move on to a question of privilege. The hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair has a question of privilege.

COMMENT DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, during Question Period I addressed a question to the minister of energy. What might be described as the substantive answer to the question, I am sure, will be judged by those who read Hansard and I think will be judged severely. However, that was not enough.

In responding to that question, the hon. minister uttered an untruth with such sanctimonious confidence that some are likely to believe it. I have therefore passed along to the minister of energy a copy of the registration of my vehicle which is a Thunderbird Super Coupe that goes from zero to 100 kilometres in 7.2 seconds. That is a North American characteristic. I had that car last year. I had a Thunderbird the year before that and a Thunderbird before that. I would only ask that the minister of energy inform himself better on the practices of Petro-Canada and his responsibilities and, if he has the curiosity to know it all, that he become better advised on the kinds of cars all members of this House might drive, including those on his side of the House.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is offended, I am willing to withdraw. I just know that one thing happens. I watch on the Hill and so often his colleagues get up in high dudgeon in this House and argue about cross-border shopping. When I take a look at what they drive, they are not helping their union brothers and sisters.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that those who are watching this on television are not going to be impressed with that kind of nonsense. I hope they are not. I posed a straightforward question to the minister which he could not answer. He was no more capable of answering that question than he was able to distinguish between fusion and fission. I wish that he would fuse something to his present knowledge so he will not engage in these kinds of sordid activities in the House and would, in the future, respond to questions reasonably.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. minister rising to add something to this exchange?

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, I do not mind this exchange one little bit. I simply say to the hon. member he is willing always to dish it out and expects it to be accepted and so—

Mr. McCurdy: Does that make it okay to be a liar?

Mr. Epp: So when we dish it back—

Mr. Speaker: I took what the minister said a few minutes ago to be a withdrawal of anything that may have offended the hon. member.

Mr. Epp: The House heard the exchange that the hon. member just made and I would ask him to withdraw it.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York South—Weston on this same point. I am wondering if there is any need for the hon. member to intervene. The minister has made it very clear he has withdrawn.

Mr. Epp: I was inaccurate. I withdrew it. The comment he just finished making is unparliamentary. A number of members in the House heard it and I ask him to withdraw it.

Mr. Speaker: The minister has just addressed the Chair and said that some remark which the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair made, not at the time when the hon. member was recognized but made it anyway, was unparliamentary and has asked that the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair withdraw the remark.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, what I said and what the minister heard was my question and only a question: "Is it okay to be a liar in Parliament?" Surely that is not—

Mr. Speaker: If the suggestion the hon. member is making by way of rhetorical question is that the hon. minister is lying, that is improper and the hon. member should withdraw it.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, as you will recall, the hon. minister said that we could not take it and if he cannot take it—

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. I am asking the hon. member to support the rules and conventions of the House. That kind of remark, whether it is in a preliminary, a preamble or in a question which leads to the only implication one could take is that it is being suggested that one member or another is lying, is improper. The hon. member knows that and I would ask him to support the conventions of the House and withdraw it.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, I abundantly support the conventions in this House. If you will recall, I will repeat, the minister said that we could not take it and I said: "Is it okay to be a liar as well?"

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. The hon. member has an option. The hon. member can stay in defiance of the request of the Chair to withdraw a statement which, in my opinion, went too far. The hon. member knows what his duty and obligation are. They are to withdraw it. If the hon. member wants to have a row somewhere else with the minister, then go somewhere else and have it.

In the meantime, the hon. member's obligation is to withdraw.

The Chair has asked the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair to withdraw the remark.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the question: "Is it okay to be a liar in this House", which the minister did not respond to.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I was trying to rise on this same point of privilege, but I understand it has now been concluded.

I also enter my own point of privilege. When I was trying to rise at an earlier time, you said you were going to come back to the House vis-a-vis the question of whether parliamentary secretaries can ask questions in this House.

The point of privilege I am rising on is that I tried to be recognized in conformity with the tradition in this House that before you set a matter aside, you hear from all three parties. I was rising to speak on behalf of my party as our deputy House leader to that point of order before you set it aside. I could not seem to get recognized and I would like to know if there has been a change in the policy of hearing from all three parties before you take matters under further consideration, because that is what I was trying to do.

Mr. Speaker: First of all I want to say to the hon. member that under no circumstances would the Chair deliberately preclude the hon. member from rising on a matter. I asked several times. The transcript may assist us in this but I do not think there is any need to go into it. I was having some difficulty understanding exactly on what point the hon. member was rising and I got divided versions on it. At least that was my interpretation.

I then said: Look, I have heard this issue. I am going to consider it. I am going to come back to the House. I thought I made it clear that I will hear further argument if it is appropriate to do so and, of course, I will. I would be very pleased to hear the hon. member at that time.

I have also a notice from the hon. member for Winnipeg—Transcona on a question of privilege. That is what I am trying to get to now.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, we are just not communicating today. My point of privilege is that you did not recognize me earlier when you should have.

Mr. Speaker: First of all, I am not at all sure that is a point of privilege. Second, that can sometimes happen to members in the House. We all know that. In any event, I am saying to the hon. member that he has not intentionally been precluded from addressing the Chair in any way, shape or form.

• (1530)

The hon. member does have, because I have it in writing, an application on a question of privilege which I received before this other matter came up, and I will now hear him.

Mr. Blaikie: I beg to correct you, Mr. Speaker. I sent this notice of a point of privilege after I could not get recognized on the point of order having to do with the parliamentary secretary. I have no other point of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: We may be able to move ahead quickly here. We have a point of order I gather arising out of Question Period. Perhaps the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre could assist the Chair.

POINT OF ORDER

COMMENT DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in response to a question yesterday, the Minister of State for Employment and Immigration, as recorded at page 7834 of Hansard, inadvertently left the impression that the deduction under day care had risen 400 per cent, from $1,000 to $5,000. In the budget speech on page 15 it is clearly indicated that it rose 25 per cent, from $4,000 to $5,000.

WAYS AND MEANS

TABLING OF NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 83(1), I wish to table a notice of a ways and means motion to amend the Excise Tax Act and other legislation respecting the implementation of the goods and services tax, and I ask that an Order of the Day be designated for consideration of the motion.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

SOFTWOOD INDUSTRY—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley again put an application for an emergency debate, this time exclusively with respect to the countervailing action by the United States with respect to softwood lumber.

I again listened carefully in the House and I think I should advise the hon. member that while it is an important matter, I am not prepared today to proceed with an emergency debate.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to suggest your ruling is incorrect in defining it as an emergency when requesting an emergency debate. I would like, through you, Mr. Speaker, to possibly direct a request to the government, through the parliamentary secretary to the House leader, in that this obviously is an issue of great interest to most people across Canada, to many people from all sides of this House, especially to our home province of British Columbia, and it is a critical issue to my riding, the people who live in Cariboo—Chilcotin.

I, through you Mr. Speaker, would sincerely request of the House leader that he take it under consideration in his discussions with other House leaders. I hope that we can find a way to set time aside in the near future, as early as possible, so that we can go through what I consider to be a very important debate.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I think it is fairly obvious that this issue is of concern to a number of members in the House. I have to include myself in that list, coming from a riding where forestry is a major issue.

I have had some discussions with the Department of Forestry. There may well be an interest in having a debate and providing some time for members of the House to do so. What I would like to suggest to the hon. member and to others who are concerned about the issue is that a House leaders meeting should be going on at this moment. I will be there in a few minutes. Perhaps we can discuss it there and come to an agreement that would provide time for all of us to look at this issue.

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, as forestry critic for the Liberal Party I fully support the motion that has been set forth by both the PCs and the NDP. We are ready and willing to participate in such a debate.

The recent decision by the Americans will have a tremendous impact on the industry and on my riding in particular.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I would certainly join on behalf of our party. I know our deputy House leader will be attending that meeting and we are certainly prepared on this side to work with all other parties in the House to try to arrange a debate as quickly as possible.

As I mentioned this morning in my appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, given the seriousness of this issue, and the government and the Prime Minister considering this, it is important that Canadians hear from the House on it.

I might say, just in conclusion, in previous debates and in particular on the issue around the whole problem with the fishery off Newfoundland and Labrador, that was an example of how a debate on an important resource issue went well. It gave an opportunity for all sides of the House to present their arguments. It is an important issue. I hope we can move quickly and expeditiously to have a debate on this matter.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I know that you are very responsive to the wishes of this House. There seems to be unanimity developing on this issue. As a matter of fact, I cannot find one single member in disagreement. I submit respectfully, that we as members from Quebec would like to take part in this debate which has far-reaching implications for us.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, since there is unanimity, maybe you would like to take it under advisement and say that by tomorrow you will give a decision. I do not expect that to be said at this time, but you would be disappointing the unanimity that is very rarely seen in this Chamber. It is not a question of partisanship. It is a very important issue which is only the beginning of many more to come.

We know that the election in the United States is in November. How many more of those will take place? Maybe the time is appropriate for us to put our views that will most likely be unanimous that this kind of action should not take place.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, as critic for energy, mines and resources for the opposition, you may not have been in Vancouver or the lower mainland, but I can tell you, Sir, that it has had the effect of a tidal wave in your province and in other provinces as well.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if I could say to my colleague that the Speaker is also a member of Parliament. I am in my riding and in my province on a very regular basis.

I can assure the hon. member that what he says is correct. I was there. I have heard it all, and I do not want anybody to think for a moment that when I am wrestling with the proper application of procedural rules on an issue like this, it is not dealt with by me on a most serious basis, indeed.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, given the sentiments of all sides of the House, you might wish after the House leaders meeting for them to come and meet with you in your chamber. Perhaps we could reconsider the matter of an emergency debate or have it now since there seems to be unanimity in the House.

Mr. Speaker: The position we are in is that for the second day and as a consequence of very close consideration of the matter, the hon. member has twice now applied. I have said that I was not disposed this afternoon to order an emergency debate. I made it very clear yesterday that it might not mean it would not be ordered at some other time.

However, we have an indication now from the House that there is probably a very real possibility of a discussion between House leaders. That is what the parliamentary secretary speaking for the government has indicated. Others have indicated their receptivity to that discussion.

I do not think it would be appropriate for the Speaker to intervene in that discussion at all. That discussion should take place and then we will see where we go from there.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government; and the amendment of Mr. Gray (Windsor West) (p.7631).

• (1540)

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak in the House today on the government's spending priorities and specifically on the amendment by the hon. member for Windsor West, seconded by our leader, which says that this House condemns the government for its budget's failure to provide realistic support for millions of Canadians who are jobless.

Canadians have a right to know what the government plans to do with the $160 billion of their hard earned dollars in this budget.

Obviously I feel the budget leaves a lot to be desired. At the very least I find it to be a major disappointment especially for the millions and millions, 2.5 million or whatever the figures are of Canadians who are out looking for work and who are trying to get back to work.

The government's decision to stay the course, so to speak, offers nothing to Canadians who are looking to get back to work. There is little in this spending to inspire business confidence in the government or in the country either.

There is no emphasis put on training or retraining, the ability to train Canadians to make them able to compete for these jobs when and if they do return. There are no adjustment programs for the rapidly increasing numbers of unemployed Canadians. There is no forward looking vision to help Canadians compete in this so–called changing global economic climate.

Some of those who are presently unemployed are part of the hundreds of thousands of Canadians who have lost their jobs because of the free trade deal. Yet government members boast that they are helping our job creating industries, while they still maintain relatively high interest rates and a high dollar policy. That is anti–competitive. This government has created a hostile business environment.

What about the incredibly important area of research and development? That is a must for any country that is going to compete globally. The budget has for all intents and purposes totally ignored training, research and development. The $230 million over five years for R and D do not make up for the dramatic cuts this government has made in these areas over the past five years.

The elimination of the Science Council is a real disappointment for all Canadians who had hoped for support in science and technology. The Science Council also provided, especially in rural areas, information for the agricultural sector. Once again the agricultural sector suffers.

How can we possibly take this government's commitment to competitiveness seriously when it has systematically dismantled our research and development?

Something I hear talked about a lot in my riding recently is taxes. In fact different tax coalitions have formed over the last year or so that are really keeping a watch on local and provincial governments. I am sure by next election they will be challenging Canada, all parties, as to why or where the parties stand in terms of spending tax dollars.

This government claims in this budget that there were no tax increases. We know that just two weeks before the budget was tabled a huge tax was put on all exported tobacco products, measuring about $8 per carton of cigarettes. Why was this tax not in the budget? Clearly it is a budget area on which to put taxes. Why was it not? Either the government wanted to fool Canadians into believing that there were no tax increases, or maybe it was a little bit too embarrassed to admit in a major public forum that it was taxing exports.

Not only will that tax be devastating to many of the tobacco farmers in my area, but it will also hurt the many thousands of jobs that depend on the tobacco industry.

Just ask the 5,000 people who have lost their jobs in this industry due to the government's outrageous taxation policies in the past. Just ask the thousands of farmers who have lost their farms, or the other 9,000 people including 1,200 growers who would lose their jobs if this industry is displaced and moved to the United States.

I, for one, would like to know how the government believes that jobs can be created in such an environment and at such a cost to Canadians.

If this government cares about rural Canada and cares about its farmers, why is it cutting $4 million from Agriculture Canada's grants and contributions preceded by previous budgetary cuts of somewhere around $48 million and $25 million in operating capital funds in the 1991–92 fiscal year? Is that a government that really cares about agriculture?

As has been said many times here, farmers and agriculture are the cornerstones of our economy. I know that probably every politician from a rural area in this House has said that before. But that does not mean very much if in fact a government that says that does not back it up with financial help.

In the past farmers have resolutely accepted the increasing losses of income with external optimism unmatched anywhere else in Canada. But recently this real hope has been diminished.

Farmers are desperate. Farm families who have been dedicated to providing clean and safe foods for Canadians and people around the world are really feeling the pinch today. They have given their savings, they have given their homes, and they have given their future to a country that they love and to a country that they hoped would be there for them in their time of need.

Rural Canada is suffering. When agriculture suffers, everyone suffers and the country suffers. We in rural Canada do not believe that this budget goes anywhere near to addressing the concerns of not only farmers but also of the rest of rural Canada.

What is wrong with the budget? Despite promises made in the last budget, unemployment has increased and is expected to remain at somewhere around 10 per cent for the next two years. In other words, nothing has been done to help these millions of Canadians out of work. Certainly nothing is being done in this budget to help get Canada working again.

The budget is silent on a national child care program. In fact in this budget the government has abandoned this promise.

Important institutions like the Economic Council of Canada and the Science Council of Canada have been eliminated. Why? Because the government is tired of living in fear of an independent review of its policies.

The Co-Operative Housing Program has been eliminated, which will affect thousands of people in need of homes throughout Canada.

The increased cuts to Agriculture Canada by means of grants and contributions, as well as the excise tax placed on exported tobacco, are indications of the systematic dismantling of agriculture across this country by this government.

Finally, in my last two minutes I would like to point out that just because the federal government has not raised or introduced new taxes does not mean that Canadians will not pay more taxes.

We all know that when spending cuts are introduced more pressure is put on the provincial treasuries. Consequently provincial taxes are raised. For the federal government to say that there are no new taxes or tax increases is misleading at the very least.

The government's fiscal and monetary policies as outlined in the last two budgets have done absolutely nothing to get the economy working again. Despite the introduction of regressive taxes and spending cuts that we have witnessed since the government took office, we still have a $31 billion yearly deficit.

In conclusion, I feel the government should just admit that its so-called fiscally responsible policies have failed and it is time for Canadians to call for an election.

• (1550)

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, I also enjoyed the opportunity to present my views on this year's budget. This is a budget without a human face. It is also a caretaker budget in the sense that it does not help nor hinder anybody.

We were not impressed by the finance minister's budget at all. There is no provision to help the 1.5 million Canadians who are out of work and the 2 million Canadians who are on welfare.

This is the eighth budget since the Conservatives took power in 1984. It strangely resembles the 1990-91 budget in that it does not provide any incentive to stimulate economic growth. The Minister of Finance is gambling that the economy will improve on its own. This is exactly what his predecessor did in 1991. I fail to understand the Tory logic. They created a recession with their high interest rate and high dollar policy. There are 1.5 million Canadians out of work, yet there is nothing in this budget to help the unemployed and bring Canada out of the recession.

I find it incredible that the Minister of Finance is predicting that unemployment will remain at 10.1 per cent in 1992, and drop to 9.5 per cent in 1993. The actual figure for unemployment is at 10.6 per cent. The minister admits these figures are high and he does nothing to address the issue. How high do the figures have to go before the minister takes action?

The student assistance plan will undergo some changes. From now on the Government of Canada would like the banks to assume some involvement as far as loans to students who wish to pursue post-secondary education are concerned.

The finance minister is currently dealing with the banks to try to negotiate a reasonable service fee for the student loans. I wish him success. Now that the banks will be taking the risks on those loans, the already financially burdened parents will have to co-sign for the loan. These are tough times for students and parents alike as prospects for jobs are very dim.

This government will be eliminating the present family allowance program in December 1992 and will replace it with the child benefit program which should benefit low income families. This is a good point of the budget. It sounds good, yet some 700,000 women will not receive their family allowance cheques any more and most middle income families will not qualify.

Since 1984 the government has increased income taxes on 33 different occasions. In this budget the government has now indicated that personal income tax will decrease by 1 per cent. What a fiscal break. Canadians should be made aware that this 1 per cent translates into $44 on their tax return if they earn between $30,000 and $40,000 and a measly $4 if they earn $15,000 or less. If the finance minister were sincere in his desire to assist Canadians, how could he for one minute think this 1 per cent decrease in personal income tax would help? If he had been sincere he would have lowered the infamous GST.

The budget has other hidden surprises for those who look a little closer at it. The loss of the $100,000 lifetime capital gains exemption could be a deterrent to anyone thinking of buying a second residence or a rental property in the future. Until this budget, all profits made on the sale of real estate, other than the principal residence which is exempt, had been tax-free up to $100,000. Now real estate will be liable to 70 per cent tax on profits from selling that property. So much for the little guy who tries to better himself.

The home buyers plan will only benefit those who have funds readily accessible in RRSPs. If the RRSP is locked in for two years or more, or if it automatically locks in at a specific date that does not coincide with your home purchase, the bank will not release the funds and the home buyer will not be able to take advantage of the plan.

I would like to take a few moments to speak on the national debt.

Just prior to the Conservatives taking power in September 1984, the debt was at $200 billion. Today it is in excess of $420 billion. This government has more than doubled the debt. The high interest rate policy supported by this government has helped boost the deficit. This year's deficit of $31.5 billion is the highest since 1985–86 and the fourth largest in Canadian history.

One really has to wonder how this government is managing our country's economy. There have been all kinds of opportunities to improve the economy. Despite years of strong revenue generating economic growth; despite repeated tax increases, 33 of them; despite widespread spending cuts in every area of government services, it still managed to double the debt and it could not even reduce the deficit.

The finance minister said that this year's forecast and next year's forecast for the deficit will not be met. It keeps going up and yet we have two million Canadians on welfare, including 700,000 children who stood in line at food banks in 1991. Those hungry children are indeed a black mark on Tory records. Today there are more food banks in Canada than there are McDonald's restaurants.

The budget is not doing much to inspire business confidence either. The minor tax changes the government is making are more than offset by increasing interest rates and the high dollar. How can we take this government seriously when last Friday the U.S. Commerce Department's international trade commission handed down yet another ruling declaring that Canadian softwood lumber exports to the U.S. were unfairly subsidized?

This ruling, which has resulted in a punitive action of 14.48 per cent duty on Canadian lumber imports, is totally unacceptable. The industry should not be held hostage for American domestic politics of protectionism. It stands to lose some $430 million during the next year as well as thousands and thousands of jobs. What does this budget do for our lumber industry? It contains no provisions whatsoever to help the Canadian lumber industry during its time of need while it is being harassed by the Americans.

In conclusion, despite golden opportunities to reduce the deficit between the years of 1985 to 1990, the government mismanaged public funds. This government has vowed to wrestle inflation to the ground and as a result has wrestled the economy to the ground. This budget does not address the longest recession we have ever seen. The people of Canada are looking to the government for some hope of relief from the poor state of our economy. The government has failed miserably to resolve the current economic situation.

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I did not hear all the hon. member's remarks, but there were a couple of elements in his remarks that I did hear and I would like some clarification.

I heard him refer to the government's home buyer's plan and the ability that taxpayers will have to withdraw up to $40,000 for a couple to purchase a home. I would like the member to clarify it for me. I thought I heard him say that if the funds could not be withdrawn from a financial institution because of the particular plan they may have invested in, the plan was useless because it would not allow funds to flow before the closing date.

My knowledge is that most financial institutions are very happy to open up fixed term investments such as GICs right now and let the money flow out of those fixed term investments because interest rates have been coming down. Most financial institutions have had these funds locked up at higher rates so they are more than happy to open them up and let the funds flow through. It is an ideal time now with a lower interest rate regime for this particular plan to work.

Second, I thought I heard the Minister of Finance say in Question Period today that there was a 30–day grace period.

• (1600)

If a home had to close there was this 30–day period where funds could still flow from an RRSP. I would like the member to address those two points.

The member talked as well about the government and its debt, and I think he used the phrase "this government has doubled the debt".

The Canadian debt as a whole has in fact doubled. I agree with that statement. I am wondering if the hon. member can address the fact that if the government had not been running an operating surplus last year and this year, the debt would be $25 billion higher today than it is now. The fact is that all of the additional debt is the result of the accrual of compound interest, and actually our debt would be a lot higher today without the government's actions.

Could he please address those two points?

Mr. Bélair: On the first point, the member made it a point to answer his own question. I guess there is no point in me trying to repeat everything he has just said.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): Do you agree?

Mr. Bélair: Certainly. On the national debt, it seems that the Tories do not want to accept the fact that since 1984 this debt has doubled under their management. All the time they say it is compound interest on the debt that was left to them by the previous government. I totally disagree with that. As I said in my speech, the government has increased taxes on 33 occasions. Personal income tax has increased by 22 per cent, and yet the deficit keeps going up all the time. This is despite some very good years economically, when there was less unemployment and more people paying taxes. The deficit has always been around $29 or $30 billion.

This is why my party and I really wonder what the government was doing during those golden years. I do agree today that it is difficult to reduce the deficit because of the recession. But it is a recession they have created themselves because of high interest rates and the high Canadian dollar.

Mr. Hughes: We created the recession in Europe too and all around the world.

Mr. Bélair: Maybe there are some clauses in the free trade agreement that we have not seen and that some members opposite have not seen either—the ones that say the Canadian dollar should remain high for a certain amount of time.

[Translation]

Mrs. Marie Gibeau (Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, last week's break gave members of the House a chance to keep in touch with what was going on in our ridings. Personally I welcomed this opportunity to go and meet with some of my constituents in Montreal North and talk about their present concerns. The latest budget was mentioned a number of times and I was pleased to see that many aspects of our proposal had met with their approval. No wonder, considering how carefully this government's budget was prepared.

Some of our constituents are under the impression that all decisions are made behind closed doors by a chosen few and finally disclosed to the population on the night the budget is tabled. Having bean involved in preparing two budgets, I can assure my fellow citizens that their comments to me and to their members did not fall on deaf ears. No wonder then that taxpayers can often recognize theirs suggestions in budgets tabled by governments.

Obviously not all of them can be included, because the realities government has to deal with and the balancing act it has to do to ensure that the available resources are commensurate with the needs expressed. All that makes it impossible to satisfy everybody. But when a government such as this one sets out to harmonize the prosperity of future generations with the quality of life for the present generation, choices have to be made.

Since the Conservatives have been in power, budgets reflect comments made to members by their constituents. The Quebec caucus, which set up a budget committee, submitted an impressive list of recommendations to the Minister of Finance. Of course members and constituents were delighted when they saw that the latest federal budget reflected those recommendations.

Ever since I was elected, my constituents have told me that economic problems require a realistic and durable response, not hasty, band-aid solutions. People want the assurance that our social programs will meet their needs. They want new reasons to have confidence in the future. But, above all, they want the federal government to reduce public spending as well as the deficit. Easier said than done. A government bureaucracy cannot turn on a dime. Tradition, history and precedent have helped develop a vast number of procedures and working methods, levels of management and regulations. In families, business and government, traditions accumulate over the years and often tend to smother creative thinking.

A subcommittee of the Quebec caucus, where I am a member of the executive, made a study of federal spending programs and submitted proposals to the finance minister for improvements in public spending. Its purpose was to bring a new perspective to the administration of government services.

The work done by MPs and senators from Quebec was very useful, if the latest federal budget is any indication. Several recommendations made by the budget committee of the Quebec Conservative caucus were adopted, especially those concerning spending cutbacks, but also recommendations on promoting social justice and responsibility, encouraging economic recovery, and promoting investment, initiative and employment.

We are particularly proud of the cut in income tax. Our constituents had told us many times that taxes were too high. As of July 1, 1992, the federal personal income surtax will drop from 5 per cent to 4 per cent, which means that as many as 4.7 million Quebecers will enjoy a drop in income tax. As of January 1, 1993, the surtax will drop by a further 1 per cent.

As for spending cuts, the recommendations of Quebec members will lead to a $1 billion reduction in expenditures in 1992–93 and more than $7 billion over five years. Among other things, as hon. members suggested, Department of National Defence spending will be cut by $2.2 billion over five years. Land and property belonging to National Defence and Public Works that are not required will be sold.

The Minister of Finance also accepted our proposal on revising travel practices. From now on, members of Parliament, senators and senior officials cannot travel first class.

One of our most important suggestions concerned reducing the number of senior managers in the government. This has resulted in the privatization, merger, deferral or outright abolition of 46 government agencies and advisory boards. Furthermore, departmental operating budgets, excluding salaries, will be cut 3 per cent.

The number of free publications distributed by the departments will be reduced. The facilities provided and renovations done by the Department of Public Works will also be greatly cut back.

Delegations sent abroad will be restricted.

In summary, those are the measures that were adopted among those proposed by Quebec members. But other equally important ones will be implemented to reduce taxes and stimulate the housing sector, to reduce the size of government and to improve services to Canadians.

The budget just tabled continues on the deficit cutting track. The deficit will be reduced to $27.5 billion next year and will continually decline after that.

Other important measures concerning the family will help restore the value of this institution which is at the heart of any healthy society.

• (1610)

For Canadian households, this marks the end of discrimination based on marital status. From now on married and common law couples will get the same tax treatment. We will eliminate the disadvantages that the traditional family unit had to put up with until now. Indeed, following our recommendations, the Minister of Finance decided to abolish the distinctions that made married couples pay more taxes than common law couples.

Family allowances for high income couples will be eliminated. Again Quebec members played an important role in promoting justice and social responsibility. A single monthly payment for children will replace all the benefits that are presently paid to families and will direct assistance to low and middle income families. This will translate into a $400 million increase in financial support for children, from $4.5 billion to $4.9 billion.

Those are only some of the measures taken, and of course there are others, to promote a strong recovery.

In conclusion, the budget cuts spending and thus enables us to lower taxes and promote recovery. It also ensures a substantial reduction of the deficit in 1992–93, as well as a constant reduction afterwards. We therefore have a budget that restores confidence in the Canadian economy while protecting our social programs.

The opposition may blame us for many things, but it certainly cannot accuse us of lacking consistency in the way we manage public funds.

The Conservative government is pursuing its plan. The 1992 budget seeks to stay the course toward a better future, renewed and lasting growth, job creation and deficit reduction. In the last seven years we have succeeded in stabilizing public finances as well as regaining control of our expenses.

If it were not for this $200 billion debt that we inherited from the previous government, we would have an operating surplus. In other words, the taxes that we collect from Canadians would more than pay for the services that we provide to them. In fact, the $25 billion operating surplus that we have generated since 1984–85 would have enabled us to improve our government programs even more. But this is only a matter of time. We first had to put order in the management of public affairs, and this task is almost completed. As early as 1994, we will no longer borrow to pay the interest on the accumulated debt and we will at last be able to start paying off this infamous debt. We have reasons to be pleased.

We remain committed to supporting the private sector by limiting state intervention as much as possible, while protecting individuals who need help. In other words, we continue to believe that the government must intervene only when necessary.

Members from Quebec have shown that responsible, sustained action does more to promote and protect Quebecers' interests in Ottawa than loud bragging and boasting.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the member that I listened attentively to her speech and for the most part I agreed with what she was saying. However I want to ask her a couple of questions.

She mentioned that last week she was in the riding and that was where we come into contact with reality. I share that. She also mentioned that the budget met with favour.

I think that there were some aspects of the budget that were okay, but I have heard on numerous occasions from the retailers in my riding. I have heard on numerous occasions from the people in the tourism sector. The restaurants in my riding are in some ways similar to those in many parts of Quebec. I have over 300 of the nicest restaurants in all of Canada located along the Danforth and along Gerrard in Broadview—Greenwood, especially Greek restaurants.

These restaurants that count on the tourist trade are saying that consumer confidence is low, that the GST is a disincentive to tourism operators or to tourists even though they get a rebate, and that this ultimately affects the reason why we have so much unemployment.

In the province of Quebec tourism is counted on probably more than in any other province in Canada. I am not trying to make noise here, but does the member not think that this budget really did little to stimulate confidence in the tourism sector and the retail sector, which ultimately affects the jobs in this country?

[Translation]

Mrs. Gibeau: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his questions.

I would like to start by putting into perspective the whole issue of the GST, the goods and services tax. Perhaps I may recall that for most of last year, before the GST came into effect, opposition members were blowing up this whole issue to ridiculous proportions and referring to the GST as a tax that would have a disastrous impact on inflation and the economy and would have all kinds of horrendous consequences.

I will admit this was not necessarily a popular measure, but even the opposition agreed that the whole federal tax system had to be revised. Furthermore, I may remind the hon. member, that one year after coming into force the GST has not really had an impact on inflation. In fact, inflation is now below 2 per cent, a record among the world's major industrial countries.

This, together with the fact that interest rates have also dropped very substantially, has created a degree of confidence in the business community, so that people will start investing again. I would like to refer to what was said by the president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, Mr. Richard Le Hir, who is not exactly a fan of all our policies. In any case, Mr. Le Hir said in Le Journal de Montréal on February 28, 1992, that three measures in the budget were important for stimulating the economy. The increase in the capital cost allowance rate for machinery, the reduction in the manufacturing tax, and the $230 million earmarked for research and development were three specific measures that were most welcome.

In terms of economic recovery, this budget—as I said earlier, it was impossible to please everyone—is one we can be proud of, in the circumstances.

[English]

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member for Bourassa a very brief question. It concerns the fact that I, along with many other members of Parliament, understand the fiscal reality of this nation. Having said that, there are certain choices that are easier to make than others.

I am just wondering why the government, in this particular budget, chose to ignore the plight of 400,000 young people in this country who are unemployed and many more thousands who are on the welfare rolls of this country.

They have once again failed to come up with a national training strategy that may address the problems that we have. Once again we have blocked the major artery to Canada's future.

• (1620)

I was just wondering whether the hon. member could address or explain to me why her government has chosen once again to deny the rightful opportunity that young people require.

[Translation]

Mrs. Gibeau: Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind my colleague that there are government programs and as for training—and when we talk about young people, we talk about education—education does not apply in the same way in all provinces. In some provinces, education is strictly a provincial matter and their jurisdiction must be respected.

Furthermore, we have a program called "School First", where we did everything to encourage young people to stay in school and gain skills so that they could fill jobs that are now available in Canada but for which some young people who chose to quit school will not qualify in the near future.

I encourage my colleague to support and encourage the young people in his riding, as I try to do in mine, and to tell them to stay in school so that they can acquire the skills and knowledge needed to fill the positions that are available and will soon be available.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, I thank my Whip who gave me the opportunity today to speak in this House. It was not planned, and I almost demanded it in a rather rough way.

It is very important because when you talk about finance and the Budget you talk about jobs. Jobs involve unions and unions do some things that are not quite right.

Since we are talking about jobs and finance today, in my region which is the north side of Laval we have an airport called Mirabel. This airport is the centre of much activity. Finance involves a lot of money and taxes. Today I must rise to speak, even though I asked my Whip for an emergency debate on this subject. I want to take this opportunity to talk about it.

I would like to put on the table some issues concerning Mirabel, Nationair, the lockout, unions, the public service unions, and the Montreal branch of the Quebec Federation of Labour. I will deal with them all together.

Like all Quebec members we were surprised to learn that many union members were locked out, unfortunately without work.

[English]

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. While I appreciate the importance of the matters that the hon. member wishes to discuss, they can hardly be considered relevant to the debate at hand.

We are here to discuss the federal budget, not a concern peculiar to his riding with regard to Mirabel airport.

Mr. Edmonston: I rise on the same point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is not a point of order. The hon. member can debate anything he wants on the budget. That is the standard rule of the House.

Hon. members may not have been here long enough to realize that you can go ahead and speak on things other than just the fiscal arrangements of the budget.

Mr. Edmonston: Mr. Speaker, I seek clarification because I do not know whether or not it is a question of not being here long enough. I know my colleague has been here far longer than I have and we both came to our feet on the same point of order.

I do not think, with all the respect I have for the House, that we should get involved in union bashing in as budget debate. I think it is really unseemly of this House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will just listen to the hon. member. I am sure he is going to be relevant a far as the budget is concerned.

[Translation]

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Speaker, I asked if I could say these things and my chief Whip assured me that I could talk about a case involving 2,200 jobs in my riding. If it upsets the Liberal and NDP members to hear me talk about my riding, let them leave the Chamber and go have a coffee, because where I come from 2,200 jobs are important, especially when certain NDP members frighten people by telling them not to take the plane because it is dangerous.

I am quite sure my colleague will go out for coffee. Mr. Speaker, 2,200 jobs. It is very important for us. It is appropriate to talk about it within the discussion on the budget.

[English]

Mr. Edmonston: Mr. Speaker, I rose earlier on a point of order and I appreciate the fact that you ruled against it. I believe now there is a definite point of order in the sense that we are not to make reference in this House at any time to the presence or absence of one of the members of this House. Am I right or am I wrong?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I never heard the hon. member make any reference to anybody in the House or outside the House. If he has, that is right. We are not allowed to do that but I have not heard that.

Mr. Edmonston: Yes, I am sorry you did not hear that but as I was leaving to make a phone call there was such a reference.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Members do that quite regularly. I regret that the hon. member should not do it. Get on with the debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Speaker, perhaps my hon. colleague could stop interrupting me. I will certainly not talk about him. I have more important subjects to discuss concerning my riding than to talk about the member for Chambly. I have things to say in this House. In the speeches on the budget we demand jobs, jobs, jobs, and those who have jobs want to destroy them. My job is to try to make people understand that each time we speak outside this House we displease the unions. Instead of dealing with the issue, instead of making offers to the unemployed, to the workers who are locked out, they say: "If Della Noce, the member, speaks too much, we will sue him." Well let them do so. I will go to jail simply because I want to save 2,000 jobs in my riding. If I must go to jail, I will do so and gladly.

We also have a problem in Quebec every time a company is successful. Take Nationair for example. I mention this one because it is in my region and it is of great interest to me. We keep looking for means to tear it down. Every time a company decides to move to Toronto we cry for a year before it leaves. I for one do care. There are 450 young men between the ages of 22 and 24 who work there. I certainly would not want them to lose their jobs because those are darned good jobs. When young people come to us looking for a job we tell them: "Try that place; they hire a lot of people." Now a union leader is saying: "So what if it shuts down".

I am not blaming all union leaders, mind you, Mr. Speaker. Two members of the shop committee resigned. This means that six union members caught the drift of their leaders and resigned. They did so because they did not like the idea of a union destroying jobs instead of preserving them. That is happening here and now. There are still very down to earth, mature union people who have chosen to resign rather than stay on and chitchat with an airline accused—of what—of not being safe. Apparently the staff would not be adequately trained. If there is one airline today which is safe it is Nationair. With all its safety inspections, it is quite impressive. There is no Canadian airline safer than Nationair.

The ad also reads that they are paid welfare wages at $17,000 or $15,000 per year. I agree that $17,000 is not great, but what the union failed to mention in the ad was that it was for 53 hours of work, not per week but per month. All of us in this House work at least that much in a single week. If $20,000 a year is not enough for 53 hours of work per month, work that many hours per week and you will make $88,000. Still, that is not an incredible amount by today's standards. I can assure you that many people in my riding would gladly take the job.

But why kill Nationair when the company pays $50 million in taxes to the federal government? Did you know this company pays all our salaries and those of the senators next door? Their taxes are the equivalent of what it takes to pay all our salaries, and people want to see this company go down. Fifty million dollars in taxes.

I heard the hon. member say: "Tax the rich and give a break to the poor". This guy started with a shoe-string. He was a poor immigrant who came into this country with $2,000 and created 2,000 jobs for pilots and mechanics. Today he has 11 planes including four 757s, five 747s and one DC-8, and he started with $2,000.

[English]

What do you call a man like that? He should be here. He should have a statue these days.

[Translation]

They are killing this company because the leader of the union is a guy from Toronto who works for Air Canada. He is high and dry in Toronto, so he could not care less what happens in Quebec. He will get re-elected and he will say: I told Quebec where to go.

I do not want him to tell Quebec where to go. Let him stay in Toronto and mind his own business. Mr. Speaker, I hope you will give me the floor again.

[English]

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I hope that you are monitoring the Irise comments by the hon. member carefully.

He is making some very unconstructive statements, especially in this most difficult period when we are talking about national unity and a new constitutional arrangement. For him to suggest there is some Toronto conspiracy to destroy a Quebec based company is pure and absolute nonsense.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is not what I get out of the conversation or out of the debate. Carry on. You have one minute left in your debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Speaker, I simply want to say that a good budget is one that keeps people working. The government is doing everything it can to create jobs in Quebec. I think it is just too bad that some organizations are sabotaging this effort. They do not care what happens, because it is not in their own backyard. I say let our own people run things. Union members should wake up and get cracking. Do not let other people tell you what to do. You can stand on your own two feet. Run your own show. I will help you. I will not let you down. We cannot afford to lose 2,200 jobs. We certainly cannot.

This is part of the budget. This is part of Canadian unity. Whether, we are talking about Ontario, Quebec or Nova Scotia, no one can afford to lose 2,200 jobs. Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I believe I made my point.

[English]

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, I listened quite attentively to the hon. member's speech.

I was just wondering if his speech was about the fact that perhaps his government has not been able to create, in the last seven and a half years, a healthy economic environment where labour, government and business can work together.

Mr. Della Noce: My government has done everything it can do in a responsible way. It has negotiated in this crisis. We have the best we have in Montreal. We have good relations with every union. We have a Minister of Labour who is doing his best to help me, particularly in this case that I know personally. The government is doing exactly what it has to do.

Mr. Bevilacqua: It's not a healthy environment.

Mr. Della Noce: I can tell my hon. member that even all the jobs we create may not be enough. I want to say that before we create the others, and if somebody can blame me in this House it could be my hon. colleague from Chambly, Toronto or York.

You can blame me as much as you want and you can blame the government. It is part of the game. We are the bad guys. Whatever happens in this country is always the Prime Minister's fault. We hear that, but there is one thing that is true.

Mr. Nunziata: Eleven per cent can't be wrong.

Mr. Della Noce: Yes, 11 per cent and 17 per cent. That means we are doing something right. If you are popular, you are doing something wrong in politics.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to reassure the member that no one on this side of the House or anyone in this House really has anything other than the highest of respect for the entrepreneurs of this country. They sometimes work seven days a week, 15 hours a day, fighting off bank managers, trying to meet payrolls and make a profit in a very difficult economic time. The hon. member should not cast aspersions over here that we are not sensitive to entrepreneurship because we are.

The question that I have to ask the member is a tough one in the sense that it might be sensitive for him. It seems to me that what this country needs right now is foreign investment. We need foreign capital coming into this country which will make sure that there are pools of capital there for entrepreneurs such as the one he describes, so he will not have undue pressures put on him. There will be some spending out there to put people back to work.

Does this member think that maybe one of the greatest reasons why our foreign investment has shrunk so dramatically in the last year and a half is because we are sending out a signal around the world that we may split as a country? Does this member not think that a more constructive approach for the government to adopt would be to communicate to the people of Quebec the federal presence that exists in that province? The federal presence exists through loans and grants and it exists in every province. Right now it seems that the people of Quebec and a lot of the entrepreneurs of Quebec think the national government is doing nothing for them.

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Speaker, I want to say to my hon. colleague that when I was speaking he was listening. He was not cutting me off. I have a lot of respect for that. When I mentioned some people, I did not mean him on the other side of the House.

My hon. colleague asks what the message is. Canada is not shrinking. This country is growing. There are too many people who try to play politics and I can only speak for Quebec because I am there every day. There was an article in the paper La Presse, lundi, 2 mars, page A7, where a girl said she only makes $15,000 or $16,000 a year, but she forgot to say it is for 52 hours a month and she got $69 a day to have lunch and four hours pay to visit. This does not help my enterprises and this is worse than the message you tried to tell me.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am extremely pleased to be able to be in the House today to address this budget.

Before I get into the substance of the budget I want to share with my colleagues a dream I had last night. When I went to bed I knew I would have to address the budget today. I fell asleep shortly thereafter and dreamed I was a much younger man from some small town, I believe it was in Alberta, and I needed a car. I needed a car because I had to go to another community and it was one of the only ways to get there. Once I was there I might be able to go to school.

I came to the first car lot and lo and behold there was another young man about my age, about half of what I am today, with a warm smile and an engaging handshake, who quickly took me aside and said he had exactly what I needed, a beautiful first-class used car. I followed him and there was a lovely newly painted blue car that looked almost as good as the day it rolled out of the factory.

I started to ask about the motor, the tires, the transmission, and the rear end. He said not to worry and that the car would take me where I wanted to go. He told me to trust him and not to be concerned.

Since I needed a car and he was so convincing, I decided to buy the vehicle. In this dream I started to that next town. The first thing I knew there was a knock in the motor and I could not go any further. I got that repaired. When I looked a little further into the car and had it looked at by a mechanic, we noticed that the transmission was about to go.

I want to tell you that there were a lot of similarities in the dream I had last night and this budget we are in the process of examining right now. There is, indeed, when you explore this budget. When you get right into it you find the problems. Let me not be partisan when I say that. I want to quote some independent sources who have looked at this budget.

For example, last week in Maclean's, with respect to the budget: "The result was an artful balance of minor tax breaks and mostly symbolic spending cuts that the minister assembled after weeks of consultation with special interest groups. In round number the budget contemplates $159.6 billion in federal spending, $132.1 billion in revenues, and a deficit that at $27.5 billion will be $2.5 billion higher than the one that Mazankowski's predecessor, Michael Wilson, predicted for 1992-93".

This is an analysis by Maclean's of what lies behind the numbers, and I note again the minister's rhetoric.

Let me go on to an article of today in The Globe and Mail and I quote: "Welfare and working poor families will fall deeper and deeper below the poverty line says the analysis by Ken Battle, President of the Caledon Institute of Social Policy. Mr. Battle says the new federal program is a blatant election year gimmick because it will provide a temporary enrichment in monthly cheques for low income families next year when an election is expected to be called".

The article goes on to say: "The federal proposals are designed to pretend to fight child poverty". Again, and I quote: "Potential benefits will be completely offset by the lack of indexing".

There is the similarity. The car that I dreamt about looked great, but as I looked into it I found the problems. When I look into this budget, I and others are finding the problems. It is an election budget. Some people have called it a pre-election budget. It skilfully pretends to do a lot and does very little.

Again I want to quote from some analysis that were done.

[Translation]

It reads: "Don Mazankowski's great tax break boils down to $2 for a couple with two dependent children and $15,000 total annual income and $15 for a couple with two dependent children and $30,000 annual income". Does the Minister of Finance really expect to be applauded for such ridiculous tax measures?

My colleague, the hon. member for Windsor West, says the minister is playing a game of smoke and mirrors.

Government says it will increase children benefits by $2.1 billion over the next five years. What it does not say is that it has cut these benefits by $3.5 million over the past five years.

Here is a quote from my colleague, the member for LaSalle—Émard, associate critic for finance. He said that the new budget does not generate much business confidence. Minor changes to the tax system do not carry much weight vis-à-vis high interest rates and a high dollar. He added that the budget basically ignored the two areas the economic future of Canada depends on: training and R and D.

[English]

As I indicated, this is a skilfully crafted budget but when it is looked into deeply one finds it has a lot of blemishes, a lot of imperfections. The verdict is still out on the minister with respect to his capabilities as a Minister of Finance. But as a salesperson, as someone who has been given a job, who has been charged with selling this budget, he has got off to reasonable start. In other words, he has not lost his touch.

All hon. members will recognize that virtually all the ministers have made all kinds of eloquent statements with respect to any number of issues in the economic sphere. In speeches from the throne, for example, there have been references to economic, regional and other kinds of development.

In this House of Commons there have been a number of eloquent statements as well, in addresses throughout the country and in its various public relations initiatives such as the prosperity secretariat. The government talks a good story about productivity, about competitiveness, about globalization, but I wonder if it really knows what it is talking about.

Let us look at the record. We know that taxes have gone up 33 or 34 times. People are angry that they are earning less today than they were a few years ago. We know that in spite of those 30-plus tax increases, the deficit is roughly where it was. We know that the debt has more than doubled and yes, the government has almost doubled the revenues since it came into power a little more than seven years ago.

There are still five million people who are living at the level of poverty or below. Roughly 1.5 million people are unemployed. Roughly two million people are on social assistance. People have suffered personal bankruptcies and business bankruptcies are higher than they have ever been before. Roughly two million people are being fed by food banks. Many of the casualties here are women. Many of the casualties are children and young Canadians, and that saddens me.

What is in this budget? The measure of a budget is to say what is in it for those who have very little, for those who are losing ground. What is there in this budget for the poor? Really, honestly, nothing. For the unemployed, nothing. For those on social assistance, nothing. For those that go to food banks, nothing. For those that have declared bankruptcy, nothing. For the farmers, nothing. For our Atlantic fishermen and women, nothing. For small businesses, nothing. For Manitoba, more heartache.

We know, as we look into this budget, and I use the analogy of a used car, once you start using it, once you start looking at it, you start finding out the problems. There are many problems which have not yet surfaced. I quoted a few. For example, there is the rearranging of responses to families. There is going to be a loss over time. There is going to be something now, but over time there is going to be a tremendous loss to families.

We also know that the government has cancelled the co-op housing program, that it has sliced the regular housing budget. On the other side, it has made house purchasing more easily obtained by certain people who have certain investments in their pension funds for the future. Let me quote an analysis that was done with respect to the slashes in housing.

[Translation]

And I quote: "By eliminating social housing and the co-operative housing program, this government also eliminated thousands of jobs in the construction and manufacturing sectors. The number of jobs that will be created in the construction sector following the implementation of the home buyers' plan will be more or less equal to the number of jobs that were lost following the cuts affecting housing starts".

[English]

The government is taking on one side, giving on the other, but in the balance there are no real net winners. We note that the family allowance is gone and again, if this budget is analysed one finds that over time families are net losers.

Look at the health sector. After the government had said "we will not touch the transfer formula, we will not touch it", what did it do in 1986? It was reduced by 2 per cent. It was reduced again by another per cent. Then it was frozen in the period from 1986 to 1995. What have we got? We have a reduction cut in transfers of roughly $30 billion for health and education. It is about a 2:1 ratio. So $10 billion less for education, $20 billion less for health, that is what is happening in the health field.

Let us look at what this budget does for students. I have already indicated that there is a cut to transfers that continues and remember that the cut between 1986 and 1995 is roughly $9 billion a year. In this year alone, it is roughly $250 billion for education. There is less for training and retraining, even though there is massive unemployment and social assistance numbers that have never been seen before.

The government says there is more for research and development because the figure is $240 million over five years. It is easy to say that, $240 million more for research and development over five years because the transfer payments have been reduced to education again by $250 million for one year. I would be a wealthy business person if I could increase my revenues that way, and that is exactly what the government has done.

There is also the destruction of key organizations such as the Economic Council of Canada and the Science Council of Canada. Those organizations were vital to planning, to seeing into the future, to making sure that we were doing to the extent that we can the right things to build this country, to get the economy going again, to put people back to work.

If we look at the students today we find that not only do they have fewer dollars transferred to colleges and universities, but they still have that goods and services tax on books and materials. I proposed that the goods and services tax be eliminated at least on books. Perhaps we should be generous and extend it to all reading materials.

There is another interesting feature in this budget. They talk about the 3 per cent administrative fee on student loans. We said a lot about that—and I see one of my colleagues whom I shall not name smiling. I know why he is smiling, because he knows full well that the elimination of that 3 per cent actually will save students on the one hand roughly $20 million. I have done a rapid calculation and I am pretty close. But the removal of the six-month grace period, no interest, will probably give the government $30 million. So you give relief of $20 million on one side and you take $30 million on the other and you say to the students: "Aren't we great guys and gals?" Sorry, folks, it does not work. I go back to my analogy of the used car. In my dream I drove that car and the motor went, the transmission went, the rear went, everything went finally. And when you get into the budget everything goes.

Here is another example of something that really looks good, looks great, a $20 million reprieve for students. But you sock it to them for $30 million on the other side. If that is not dishonest, the kindest I can be is that it is tremendously misleading and it is certainly not putting the goods on the table.

They talk about greater credits. Look at those credits. I think it is $20 a month. I do not want to insult the government, but nothing has changed for years and the cost of living has accelerated by quantum leaps. So you give a little bit, and that is appreciated, believe you me it is appreciated, but at the same time do not pretend that it is more than what it is. Because you are not fooling me and you are certainly not fooling the young people out there.

Look at the increases in tuition fees. By virtually any measure tuition fees have gone up just by leaps and bounds. They have gone way, way beyond the cost of accumulated inflation over time, and it has caused students serious difficulties. We talk often about tuition fees but we do not talk about incidental fees. Incidental fees are those other costs that students have. I have just begun an analysis of those fees and there are two observations that I want to share with my colleagues which may be helpful.

First of all, over all those fees are probably greater than tuition fees. In other words, they cost students more. Second, their increases I suspect—I have not completed the study—will probably be even higher over time than are tuition fees. So the students are getting it socked to them with tuition fee increases and with incidental fee increases, new fees and increased fees and what have you.

What has happened? Student debt is skyrocketing; it is going out of all proportion. I was talking to a student just within the last week who has a debt of close to $50,000. This is for not only undergraduate but graduate program. This is really very high. It is not unusual to find debts of $20,000 to $25,000. Can you imagine, when you and I were just graduating from university, having started out with that kind of carcan as we say en français on our backs, that load on our backs, with that kind of debt?

But let me make another point with respect to students. We are going to have a summer employment program. It has been advertised in the newspapers. The applications have gone out through the CEIC offices.

What I find really very interesting is that no budget has yet been announced. Why? Normally there is an announcement and it is said what we will have when the applications go out. Why no budget announcement with respect to that program?

Does it mean that there is a big battle in cabinet because there are some generous Conservatives who really want to increase it because they recognize the importance of student employment in terms of the financial support given to students and of broadening their horizons in terms of learning?

Is there another wing of the party that says: "You have to cut that down. We have to be concerned with the deficit in the budget". There is a big battle raging right now and here we are, I, my colleagues and the students out there, wondering just how much will be available. I ask the government to make that announcement very soon.

I would also ask the government to put the cards on the table, tell it the way it is. I have no objections to the government coming forward and saying: "This is what we are really doing. This is the real impact". What I object to is this smoothness, the packaging. It is a beautiful package in many ways with all kinds of neat little coloured ribbons and what have you. But it is deceiving. It is misleading. It does not tell the truth.

I cannot possibly imagine that the government would not want to tell the truth. It is really a PR budget. It is not a budget in the true sense of the word. My colleagues will say: "I am delighted that some of them will get up and I hope raise some questions". What would you do? I think we could start by calling it the way it is. That would really be appreciated. I know there is a temptation out there to exaggerate, to say that it has accomplished or done more than it really has. I suspect that there would be big dividends if the government really called it the way it was.

Many of you will know that even though interest rates have come down, and they still need to come down, there is still a significant gap between U.S. interest rates and our own. That needs to be looked at. The dollar is extremely high. The high dollar is causing real difficulty in selling our products overseas.

Most of you would recognize as well that we need to invest heavily in education, in training and retraining, research and development, science and technology. If we want to be leaders as opposed to followers, that is the path we need to follow.

We need to expand our markets. We need to go beyond the United States because even though the United States is a very important neighbour, a very important trading partner, it is like putting all our eggs in one basket. It is not good to have all of our eggs in one basket. It is not good at all.

Of course, we have to look to see whether or not it is an appropriate time now as we get it from the U.S. with respect to softwood lumber and other problems, to sit down with the United States and say: "This Canada–U.S. agreement has got to be renegotiated".

[Translation]

I was just warming up, but I realize my time is up.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate my hon. colleague for his speech. I listened to him very carefully. I must say that I agree with most of what he said. But at some point, he talked about the United States and used his figures. He will understand why I cannot agree 100 per cent with him. However, he did address an issue, about which even his own colleague asked: Is this country shrinking? No, this country is growing. But how can we get this economy going when in my area, about 30 kilometres from my office, we have a union that refused a 4.5 per cent increase at this time of the year?

It refused a 4.5 per cent increase on a contract left on the table when these people have, at the present time, up to $22.14 per hour and a guaranteed salary of 65 hours per month. If they work 52 hours they are paid for 62. Instead of $19.08 an hour they can go up to $22.14, if my calculation is right, give or take 1 or 2 per cent. If they would work like us, 60 hours per week, they would make $90,000. My question is very simple. How can we grow and ask this country to grow when there are people with signs on a couple of ropes around their necks who say: "The company is no good, but you are going to fly with us when the strike is over because we are not happy with 4.5 per cent increase when we make $22.14 per hour".

• (1700)

[Translation]

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague for his question, because it is a very serious question. I will try to be serious in providing an answer.

[English]

First of all, I do not think that you wanted to imply that all unions are the same as the one that you have identified. I think that is very important.

I think that you and I and others will acknowledge that whatever group we deal with, when it tastes power and perhaps sometimes when it has a great deal of power it does not always use it as sensitively as it might.

I cannot make an accusation with respect to that union because I do not know the details as you have recounted them to me. But we have to recognize that it does not matter if it is a union, a government, a political party, or a large business, some people are not always as sensitive or as gentle as they might be. They do not always see the world perhaps as they should. Perhaps sometimes they think of themselves first and the people they represent after and that is not fair.

The other point with respect to the rate per hour, it sounds pretty good, but we have to remember this. You and I work many hours and we get paid a reasonable salary for it. Certainly I am quite pleased. But some of those people may not be able to work the hours that we work even if they wanted to. We have to remember that. It is very important.

Also, even if they could work those number of hours, I suspect that the work is not always very interesting. That is not a reason for not working. I assure you that I have had a lot of jobs that have not been nearly as interesting as this one and I have spent a lot of hours at those jobs. But we have to acknowledge that for certain jobs, working more than 40 hours per week, 50, 60, 70 hours would be particularly difficult and hurtful to the individual.

I want to make a final point and it is an important one as well. Collectively we all have to be sensitive to the reality today. What happens, and again it is not a partisan shot, is that people see politicians living high off the hog. They do not see us tightening our belts nearly as much as they have to and they have less. We have to understand that if they do not see us setting that example then they will want more. I think un peu de douceur, un peu de gentillesse, we have to reach out and talk more. We have to understand that unless all of us put a little bit of water in our wine there are going to be extremely difficult times ahead, not only constitutionally but also economically and in a number of other ways as well.

[Translation]

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, while talking about the budget, my hon. colleague mentioned precisely the fact that we must spend some money in order to help students in different programs. I understand that; this is a normal thing to do. However, there is one thing that I have not heard, and that is we must set an example with specific cuts, because our government costs a lot of money.

When I say specific things—I hope the member for Laval-East will understand—I mean that we have to start making cuts that affect us. I want to ask a question of my hon. colleague. I would appreciate getting a specific answer, because I respect him a lot. We worked together on the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee and he did a tremendous job.

Today the House of Commons costs taxpayers approximately $236 million a year. In 1986-87 that cost was $187 million. This is an incredible increase. There are various programs whereby, for instance, members of the House can send newsletters to their constituents four times a year, and that costs some $4.7 million. Could we not come up with a better solution to cut expenses? Could we not simply put a few ads in the local newspapers? This would help those local newspapers, that need it, as you well know. Also, why not hold press conferences when there are announcements to be made? That is my first example.

I have a second example. The former Liberal Prime Minister now gets a pension of $81,000 a year, plus his salary as a member of the House. Since the former Prime Minister works as an hon. member, would it be not more appropriate to give him this pension once he retires? How can a former Liberal Prime Minister get two salaries and particularly a pension?

If it is true that we must set an example in this House, why not start right here? Does the hon. member agree? I know that he will have to show fortitude to say that he does agree.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague for his question and his nice words concerning my work with the constitutional committee.

There is a former Liberal Prime Minister who gets a pension, but there is also a former leader of that party who gets a pension while occupying an excellent position. I am referring to Mr. Broadbent whom I respect a lot. There are also former ministers of the government such as Mr. Nielsen who are getting generous pensions. I believe, he was a member for many years, as well as a minister.

Mr. Edmonston: Yes, but those people are no longer members of the House.

Mr. Duhamel: No, I know, but they hold a job. All this to say that there are members from each party—and I named a few—who have worked here and are getting a pension even though in some cases they have jobs elsewhere.

Mr. Edmonston: Yes, but they are no longer members of the House.

Mr. Duhamel: No, they are not, but let me go on. I would be willing to consider any measure to proceed with an in-depth review of the pension program.

A few months ago, myself and my colleague, member for Edmonton Southwest, followed up on a bill and talked about pensions. We were not harsh. We simply asked if there was a better way to proceed. I noted that at last the NPD leader recently started talking about this. All this is to say that I am willing to review this pension issue in an honest, in-depth and serious fashion. I even wrote an article on this topic, and I would be quite willing to show it to my colleague.

With regard to these newsletters, again I am willing to look at the issue of the cost of the four newsletters that are sent every year, but I believe it is also very important to keep our constituents informed about what goes on in the House of Commons and elsewhere in the country. That is very important.

I would prefer that we look at the budget used by the government to announce its forecasts and other projects. Indeed, it costs hundreds of times more than my four annual newsletters.

To be serious, we must look at major expenses. I fully agree with the principle that you mentioned, namely that it is important to tighten our belt, to set an example. If we do not set an example, why would those who watch us and who sometimes support us want to do that? It would be totally contradictory.

We must set an example and I am willing to do that. I am even prepared to participate and to make suggestions in a number of fields. I have already started doing that and I will be happy to continue to do so.

[English]

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, when this government was elected to office seven and a half years ago, the biggest challenges facing us was, first, to restore fiscal responsibility; second, to create a climate for a more dynamic, flexible, innovative and competitive economy; and, third, to create jobs.

An hon. member: What happened?

Mr. Reimer: If the member wants to know what happened he should listen to the rest of what I have to say.

The challenge was a large one, to say the least. The federal deficit and national debt were out of control. Between 1981 and 1984 the annual deficit escalated from $14.7 billion to more than $38.5 billion. The national debt had doubled and was growing at an average rate of 26 per cent per year. Likewise, government spending was out of control.

In the four years prior to our coming into office, government spending on programs had increased at an average annual rate of 14.6 per cent, far in excess of inflation and enough to double spending in about five years.

If this trend had been allowed to continue the result today would have been catastrophic. The cumulative effect on our national debt would be an extra $445 billion. That would mean that our debt today would be close to $900 billion, more than double what it is now, if all we had done was to continue the Liberal program before us.

• (1710)

Therefore, if we had continued to spend as the Liberals had, not only would our debt be more than double today, but this year's spending would be close to $289 billion. That is $129 billion more than the $160 billion we plan to spend this year.

In fact, in every single budget since the November 1984 economic statement, this government has cut government spending. In the 1984 economic statement we cut $4.2 billion in spending, followed by our first budget in May 1985 which reduced spending by another $2 billion. In this budget we will be cutting spending by another $1 billion this year and $7 billion over the next five years.

Knowing that Canadians did not want to leave their children and their grandchildren a legacy of crushing debt, it was crucial that this government act, and act we did. Since 1984 we have kept the average annual increase in program spending to 3.9 per cent, which was lower than the average inflation rate over that same seven-year period from 1984 to 1992 of 4.6 per cent. Contrast this 3.9 per cent average annual increase in program spending to the Liberal period from 1969 to 1984 with an average annual increase in spending of 13.8 per cent.

This budget also provides for a 5 per cent ministerial salary cut for the Prime Minister and all cabinet ministers. Added to that, the Prime Minister, the cabinet and all members of Parliament will not receive any salary increase this year. Further, and this is something very few Canadians know, the Prime Minister has since 1984 reimbursed the Government of Canada to a total of $55,155 for the purchase of food consumed by himself, his family and personal guests at 24 Sussex. No other Prime Minister has done that.

In 1985 the Prime Minister and cabinet ministers took a 15 per cent and a 10 per cent reduction in salary respectively and all members of Parliament had their pay cut by $1,000. I am sure if we canvassed the members of this House who were here then, we would learn not a single one of them ever received any positive comment for that.

Furthermore, it is important to remind everyone that a few months ago this government introduced a legislated ceiling on program spending of 3 per cent per year over each of the next five years. This further proves our commitment to control government spending.

No other public administration in Canada can boast of such a record. In fact, in Ontario, my own province, program spending under the provincial Liberal administration of David Peterson rose by an annual average of 10 per cent per year. Now the NDP socialist administration of Premier Bob Rae is spending over 13 per cent at an average annual increase per year.

Further, when comparing this government's record of our annual increase in program spending of 3.9 per cent over the last seven years to that of the Leader of the Opposition when he was Minister of Finance, it is interesting to note that he increased spending at 7.6 per cent or almost double our rate.

Perhaps more seriously, when the Leader of the Opposition was the President of the Treasury Board, the average annual increase in program spending then was 13.7 per cent. One need not take my word for this with respect to the Leader of the Opposition's tenure as President of the Treasury Board. Let me quote what the Auditor General of Canada had to say about his control of the government purse.

This is what the Auditor General of Canada said: "I am deeply concerned that Parliament, indeed the government, had lost or was close to losing effective control over the public purse". He went on to say: "Federal management and control in Government of Canada is grossly inadequate". That is what the Auditor General said when the Leader of the Opposition was in the position of President of the Treasury Board.

Let us also not forget that 10 years ago, inflation was running at over 10 per cent compared to 1.6 per cent as of January 1992. Ten years ago, interest rates were at 19.5 per cent compared to 8.25 per cent today.

That means for a one-year mortgage of $75,000 in February 1992 at a rate of 8.25 per cent, there is a monthly saving of $310 compared to the mortgage rate of 14.25 per cent as of May 1990. Imagine, however, the pain of having to renew one's mortgage 10 years ago when the Liberals were in power at 19.75 per cent compared to 8.25 per cent.

Contrary to prevalent misconceptions and myths propagated by the opposition, the number of Canadians living below the poverty line according to Statistics Canada has fallen by 570,000 since 1984, including 23,000 fewer children. After adjusting for inflation, after tax disposable income has increased by $1,263 per capita in constant 1986 dollars compared to 1984.

Rather than the doom and the gloom that we hear so much about, some of the things this government has been doing have been working very well indeed. The question then might be put: Why is the national debt continuing to grow? Why has it more than doubled, as the opposition takes such pleasure in reminding everyone during this present administration's stay in power?

Yes, the debt has doubled. In fact, the national debt has grown from $206 billion to $420 billion in the past seven years. Fully $239 billion of debt is due to compound interest on the original $206 billion of debt.

Since 1987 this administration has not contributed one single cent to the debt problem. In 1984 we ran a budgetary deficit of $16 billion. In year two it was a deficit of $9 billion, in year three a deficit of $4 billion. However, since then we have had a budgetary surplus every year.

This year that surplus is to be $12.7 billion and the surplus is projected to reach almost $36 billion by 1996, four years from now. Then the government will finally be able to begin paying down the national debt. Then the government will no longer need to borrow to pay interest on that debt but will in fact be able to pay both the interest charges on the debt and have money left over to actually pay that debt down.

Further, as a member of the Conservative caucus on family issues, one of the highlights of the budget was the new family and child benefit program. The child benefit announced in the budget is a great improvement in the way the federal government assists families. The child benefit targets those who need it most, the low and modest to middle income families.

It combines the family allowance and tax assistance into one benefit which will be paid monthly, usually to the mother for children under 18. It will be tax-free, instead of being taxable as is the present family allowance.

For instance, let us take a husband and wife with two children whose ages are one and four. The family income is $40,750. Under the old system, the mother would receive $69.76 per month and the husband would pay tax on those payments minus the child tax credit of $71 per child. The mother would receive a refundable child tax credit of $882 after filing her tax return. The total benefits would be $1,599. However, under the new system proposed in this budget the mother will receive a monthly cheque of $143.83 instead of $69.76. This cheque will not be taxed and the total benefit will be $1,762 for a net gain over the year of $163. Not only are the benefits greater, but the new system is much simpler.

• (1720)

Also, the child care expense deduction will be increased by $1,000 from $4,000 to $5,000 for children up to 7 years old and from $2,000 to $3,000 for children aged 7 to 14.

These changes will benefit low and middle income families and all families whose net income is less than approximately $68,000 per year.

Further, common law couples will no longer have a tax advantage over married couples. The government is supporting the traditional family by eliminating the existing tax disadvantages for married couples.

Some have argued that this budget does nothing to create hope or new jobs. However, I think that is completely wrong. I would like to explain why I think that allegation is wrong. I am going to use how this budget affects Ontario as the example and why I think that is wrong.

All seven million Ontario taxpayers will have their personal income taxes cut through a reduction in the surtax. It will go from 5 to 4 per cent this year and from 4 to 3 per cent the year after.

We will increase spending on research and development by $230 million to encourage productive investment in Ontario.

Our support for 4.2 million families and 3.4 million children in Ontario will be simplified, streamlined and substantially increased by $400 million per year nationally. Therefore, all these families will have more dollars to spend, thereby stimulating the economy and thereby creating jobs.

We will assist Ontario families to buy a home using their existing RRSPs up to a total of $20,000, thereby creating jobs in the construction industry and further spin-off jobs in other sectors dependent upon it.

The budget reduces the tax burden for approximately 18,000 manufacturers and processors in Ontario by 1 per cent on January 1993 and a further 1 per cent in January 1994.

We will increase the capital cost allowance rate from 25 to 30 per cent for manufacturing and processing equipment, thus creating a greater opportunity for expansion and more jobs. This is in addition to the increased capital cost allowance from 30 to 40 per cent for the trucking industry which we announced this past December.

We will provide new measures to assist Ontario's small businesses by increasing the loan limit to a small business by $100,000.

We will provide additional tax assistance to approximately 322,000 post-secondary students in Ontario, thereby creating a more highly trained labour force.

In summary I would like to say the following. Although none of these measures are dramatic in themselves, when they are all taken together they create new hope and jobs. That is not just my opinion. That is the opinion of people such as John Bulloch, president of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business who said: "I think we can be pretty hopeful that jobs will be more secure because of this budget".

Further, the president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association said: "I think the budget will help improve the investment climate in the country". The president of the Retail Council of Canada said: "The most important thing is the stimulus to consumer spending in this budget.

Therefore, the opinions of others and everything I have just listed would indicate that all of these put together will create more investment, greater consumer spending and, therefore, more jobs.

Over the last year much has been made concerning the effect of the GST on our economy. In response, I would like to quote from The Globe & Mail editorial of December 31, 1991.

> An inflationary tax? Wrong. Instead of double digital inflation predicted by the President of the Canadian Union of Public Employees, inflation has subsided to less than 2 per cent on an annualized basis since last spring.
> A tax grab? Wrong. This bears repeating. The GST is not a new tax. It replaced an old tax. The 74-year-old manufacturer's tax. An inefficient tax? Wrong. The GST treats manufacturing and services the same. Within the manufacturing sector, it applies evenly to all goods. It taxes imports and domestic goods in equal measure and exempts exports from tax. The GST's input credits ensure firms are not taxed for investing. As a consumption tax, it avoids taxing individuals for saving. It is thus more neutral in its effect on the economy than almost every other tax imaginable.

In January of this year I sent out a questionnaire to the manufacturers in my riding. I asked them about their experience with the GST after its first full year in operation. One unanimous comment from all of them is that they do not want to go back to the old manufacturers' sales tax of 13.5 per cent. These are other comments they made:

> The GST spreads the tax over a broader spectrum of business. It is a more fair system.

Another one said:

> I would recommend we stay with the GST as I feel it is a fairer tax to all.

Another one said:

> We can never go back to the old way. I believe 100 per cent in the concept of the GST. It was the best move this government has made by moving towards a fairer, broader and unhidden tax system.

That same manufacturer concluded by saying:

> All we ever hear is doom and gloom stuff. We are beginning to feel we missed something important somewhere. We never hear the good stuff that has come out of all of this.

It is clear from these comments that the GST is more fair than the old system. There is absolutely no evidence that it is inflationary and it clearly is not a tax grab.

Another myth is regarding the free trade agreement. The Leader of the NDP said yesterday that the free trade agreement has cost Canada 400,000 jobs and has devastated the manufacturing sector. Yes, we have lost many jobs in the manufacturing sector during the recession and while we had the free trade agreement. No one likes that. No one would take delight in that. However the Prime Minister, in response to her question, reminded her that in 1981–82, without the free trade agreement, we lost approximately twice that number of jobs. In fact with the free trade agreement the Prime Minister went on and said:

> Trade has increased, even though we have been in a recession. Trade with the United States has increased by $35 billion, approximately since 1988 and it is going the right way. Further, we have secured something that most other nations would give their eye teeth for. That is a dispute settlement mechanism in the trade involved with our greatest trading partner. This is a major acquisition.

We can see that we have problems in the free trade agreement today, with Honda and the softwood lumber, but just as we successfully were able to use the dispute settlement mechanism with regard to the pork issue and dispute, we will solve it now with that trade dispute mechanism.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have five questioners now. I will take them in this order: York North, Edmonton South East, York South—Weston, Etobicoke North and Chambly.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, I applaud the hon. member for his desperate attempt at trying to justify some irrational actions taken by his government both in economic and social terms. We must admit he did have the courage to stand to try to save his government from the embarrassment that 89 per cent of the Canadian people are certainly aware of.

• (1730)

I must say that I took note of the fact that the member speaks a lot about the past and very little about the future projections for this country. When we speak to the future, we on this side of the House understand the emerging global village and the global dynamics that are taking place, but we also understand that the emerging global marketplace requires and makes it necessary for a nation to prepare for it. This is exactly what this government has failed to do with this particular budget.

We have 400,000 young people in this country on the unemployment rolls and many more on the welfare rolls. At the same time we have jobs that cannot be filled. Obviously the government has failed at arriving at a national training strategy that will match people to jobs.

I am wondering why it is that this government on one hand speaks about global competitiveness and the prosperity agenda, and on the other does not understand that in order to compete globally we must educate and train young and old people.

We have entered into the free trade deal and there have been casualties. Why has this government failed to retrain those individuals so that we can once again compete?

The question is quite simple: Why does the member accept this budget, a budget with no vision for the future, and why does he stand to try to defend the indefensible?

Mr. Reimer: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the member was listening very well because I clearly said what three other people were saying, not what I was saying, in response to this budget and the future.

The Retail Council said: "This will stimulate consumer spending". Obviously the member was not listening. I also quoted from the Canadian Manufacturers' Association that said: "This will improve the investment climate in Canada". Obviously he was not listening. I also quoted from John Bulloch who said: "I think we can be pretty hopeful that jobs will be more secure". He went on to say: "I think there is more to be happy about than pessimistic".

That is what this budget is doing and what people think it will do into the future. If it truly does stimulate consumer spending, as I went on in other details that I offered, then that will in fact create more jobs, that will create more hope, and that will create more work for the younger people.

I also mentioned that it goes on to help people in post-secondary education and therefore that too would provide for a greater and more trained and educated labour force for the future. All of those speak to the future. Obviously the member was not listening.

We have to put all of these things together, and we will.

I will just quote one more. The International Monetary Fund predicts that Canada will have the strongest economic growth rate of the Group of Seven major industrialized nations in 1992: 3.8 per cent after inflation. That is the best of all of the Group of Seven. Similar predictions have been made by the OECD and by the Conference Board of Canada.

With regard to the future, it is not just my opinion but it is also the opinion of these three boards and the three people I quoted who all said there would be greater hope and therefore more jobs into the future.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I would like to focus on a bit of news that the member gave us. If my note was correct, he told us that the Prime Minister had donated—I think that was the term—$55,000 for food consumed at 24 Sussex for the past seven and a half years. My quick arithmetic indicates that is almost $7,000 a year or almost $600 a month that the Prime Minister is contributing toward his own food, drink or other things consumed at 24 Sussex.

Was the member trying to tell us that was the total amount the Prime Minister and his family were spending on groceries or that is what the Prime Minister thought would be a fair amount? Given his salary of I believe $165,000 a year, I think most Canadians would feel the Prime Minister might pay for all of his groceries. Would the member tell us just what exactly he was getting at with what he announced as a revelation for the House this afternoon?

Mr. Reimer: Mr. Speaker, let me respond to the question from the member for Edmonton Southeast. First it was not given back. It was a reimbursement, which was the word I used. It was for $55,115. If he wishes I could give him the exact amount for each year from April 15, 1985 of $4,000 through to June 19, 1991 of $4,566. I do not think I should take the time now to list what was given back in each of the other years.

In each of these years this was for the food consumed by himself and his family or his personal guests, not official guests who would go there. That would be a cost to the Government of Canada and the people of Canada. These were for his own personal costs.

I think the hon. member would agree that what is significant about that is: When have we seen that before from any other Prime Minister of Canada?

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to commend the hon. member for Kitchener on having the courage to defend the indefensible. Not only did he defend the GST, not only did he defend the free trade agreement, but he also went so far as to defend the Conservative government. For that he deserves credit. He also deserves credit for being one of the 11 per cent of Canadians who believe that this government is doing a good job.

My question for the hon. member is as follows. He knows that over 1.5 million Canadians are unemployed. No doubt he has the same experience that the rest of us have in our constituency offices day in day out, week in week out. Hundreds and thousands of people in our constituencies are unemployed. I would like to know what advice he gives to the unemployed in his particular constituency in the Kitchener area.

Does he comment as he commented today about what this government is doing, or does he give any other specific advice? Does he tell his constituents that they must have patience, that they need not worry about the rent or the mortgage payment or where the next food bill is coming from, that because these so-called fundamentals are in place perhaps his constituents might have a job in six months' or a year's time?

I would like to know specifically what advice he gives to the desperate unemployed in his riding who come to his office seeking help.

Mr. Reimer: Mr. Speaker, one of the greatest difficulties I think all of us as members face is when some of these people, particularly the older ones say in their mid-fifties to close to sixty, come to our offices. That is the group where I have the greatest difficulty in giving any advice. To that degree when the member asks his question, and I will take it as a serious question, there I have great difficulty answering that one. For many of those people retraining is very difficult, if not almost impossible, in various types of work. That is the group where I really have difficulty responding with specifics.

I try to do what I can. Sometimes I have been successful. We have an organization in Kitchener that is called 55 Plus which the government has assisted in the past through my interventions on its behalf. That has helped some of these people.

For many of the younger people, the answer has to be that they should get themselves better training.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. On debate, the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands.

The Budget

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to add my voice to the debate on the budget. I hope to inject some efficiency in this as I only have about five minutes before the bells start to ring.

• (1740)

The last budget was supposed to be offering some hope to Canadians. We have 1.5 million unemployed people in Canada and they were looking for direction from this government to give them some hope. Unfortunately, once again, those people were overlooked.

In my riding of Saanich—Gulf Islands there is a huge housing crisis. My community has the third most expensive housing prices in all of Canada after Toronto and Vancouver, and when you consider the salaries earned in my riding compared to those other centres, my riding has the most expensive housing in all of Canada.

What does the government do to respond to this? It eliminates co-op housing; it eliminates social housing. This is done with no consultation with the provincial government at all. Having just had the five-month grand tour on the constitutional issues and recommended that there not be a devolution of federal powers to the provinces without some consultation, it is tantamount to an abdication of federal responsibility.

What is the provincial government in British Columbia to do for those people who are desperate for housing, the young families, the older people, the native people, the disabled people?

The municipal affairs minister in British Columbia has pointed out that we are going to be losing over 900 units in the next two years. That is a $70 million loss in construction and 500 jobs. Is this the Tory way of creating jobs? I can see why they are at 11 per cent in the polls.

There are two projects in my riding that have fallen through the gaps. These are people who have nowhere to live, and this government once again fails them.

Another issue that is very important and on which I have had phone calls from my constituents is the elimination of the Court Challenges Program. I have before me a letter from former Supreme Court Justice Bertha Wilson in which she points out that on numerous occasions she has expressed the view that it is totally illusory to confer rights on people, the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, who do not have the means to enforce them.

That is what the Court Challenges Program did; it gave the wherewithal to those people who do not have the means to hire a high priced lawyer to do court challenges. She, of course, appreciates that governments are currently in a period of financial restraint, but she says that she has difficulty with a policy that places the burden of that restraint on those that can least afford it. That is what this government has done time and time again.

The final issue I want to point out is the environment. As an associate critic for the environment for my party, this is once again smoke and mirrors. What we have seen with the green plan, the big ticket item that was supposed to ensure the re-election of this government, is that the government added insult to injury once again by re-profiling another $150 million in this budget, $75 million in both 1992-93 and 1993-94.

I asked the Minister of the Environment today about a kind of business opportunities incentive regarding ozone depletion, CFCs, the extraction, the Vampire units. This is an opportunity not only to create jobs but to preserve the ozone layer of our country. There is no money for this.

When the minister meets with the environment ministers next week in Vancouver I do not know where he is going to find the money to be able to do that recycling program that he says is the responsibility of the provinces.

This is a shameful budget. It is a budget of despair. As New Democrats we do have alternatives. We have the vision. We have the commitment, not just to the rich but also to the unemployed and the low income families.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 5.45 p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 84(5), to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the amendment now before the House.

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will be please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment, which was negatived on the following division:

TERRY FOX ACHIEVEMENT AWARD

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the Terry Fox Achievement Award honours an individual or group that best exemplifies the spirit, dedication and determination for which Terry Fox will always be remembered.

Tonight this national award is being presented to Joey Saccary, a grade 12 student from Glace Bay High School, a victim of spina bifida.

Joey has been active at Glace Bay High with the Circle of Friends and is the founder of the Disability Awareness Group.

He is a volunteer with the IWK Telethon and a camp for disabled children. He was a member of the first Youth Focus Group sponsored by the Nova Scotia Youth Secretariat.

Joey has served on the University College of Cape Breton task force on problems pertaining to the disabled and has worked with the Department of Tourism in studying accessibility of buildings for those who are blind or wheelchair bound. He is a member of the Spina Bifida Society and The Wheelchair Sports Association.

Mr. Speaker, I want to express through you to him how proud I am of this courageous and determined young Canadian. Congratulations, Joey.

SALMON FISHERY

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and his colleague in Newfoundland for their responsible and forthright conservation decision announced last week to close commercial salmon fishing in Newfoundland.

This virtually completes the closure of commercial salmon harvesting throughout Atlantic Canada, except for Labrador, following earlier bans in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia over past years. This recent decision must be recognized as a particularly difficult one in view of the cod tragedy now being experienced in Newfoundland waters. Therefore, the accompanying joint government proposal to purchase salmon licences for permanent retirement is both a compassionate short-term measure to provide relief to the financial burdens of many fishermen, as well as a sound long-term investment in the conservation of the Atlantic salmon resource. Slowly but surely we all are learning the hard lessons about conservation in Canada. The Atlantic salmon will ever be an important symbol of our environmental mission. Let us ensure that we build that resource on the moves now made and that we permit no other challenge to impair its conservation.

CONSTITUTIONAL RENEWAL

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I was disappointed yesterday when I heard the Minister of National Defence criticize the three-party report on a renewed Canadian Constitution. The Prime Minister of Canada supported the report in Quebec, but where are the other 12 cabinet ministers from that province? Who speaks for a renewed Canada in Quebec? It is high time the other 12 spoke up as well.

[English]

It is important since we have 12 ministers from the province of Quebec who sit in this federal cabinet that they go to the province of Quebec and speak in favour of a renewed Canada. So far the only person who has done that from the government across the way has been the Prime Minister, who has gone out and said "yes" to the report of the three political parties. That is important, but it is important also that the other 12 ministers do the same.

I ask this question: Who speaks for Canada? Who speaks for a renewed Canada in the province of Quebec? It is important that the 12 ministers get out there and sell this idea of a renewed Canada that we talk about in our report to the people in the province of Quebec. It is important that they do so.

Mr. Speaker, I ask this: Who besides the Prime Minister is speaking for a renewed Canada in the province of Quebec?

SHABBAT ZACHOR

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, this Saturday marks Shabbat Zachor, a sabbath set aside by Jews around the world to remember the plight of all oppressed Jews.

I believe very strongly that we must remember the struggles of the people who face daily discrimination because they are Jewish. Syrian Jews are in this intolerable situation.

It was at this time in 1974 that four young Syrian women were caught trying to escape Syria into Lebanon. Their raped and mutilated bodies were dumped in sacks in front of their parents' Damascus homes.

Jewish students from across Canada will be on Parliament Hill tomorrow lobbying to make us aware of the terrible plight of Syrian Jews.

We must support them and work together to ensure that Syrian officials stop this persecution. Syrian Jews must no longer be denied important and basic human rights.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Finance announced the winding down of the Veterans Land Administration's recent budget, he caused a great deal of grief to the employees of this agency by the manner in which the elimination of the agency was announced. At the time no clear path was announced for the future of the agency or its employees. Other employees of the Department of Veterans Affairs are also wondering what the future holds for them.

I call on the Minister of Veterans Affairs to assure the employees, both of VLA and other sections of the Veterans Affairs portfolio, at the earliest possible time that there will be no staff cuts in this department.

I want the minister to also assure the House that he is not planning to shuffle departmental positions around the country to satisfy short-term political gain. The people in this department deserve to know what the future holds for them. The veterans of Canada also deserve to know that the high level of service to which they have become accustomed since the end of the wars will continue.

TRURO, NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, Chatelaine magazine recently chose Truro, Nova Scotia, as one of the 10 best communities in Canada in which to live. Truro was selected based on being one of the safest, most affordable, most neighbourly towns. I would like to add that Truro is also innovative, positive, generous and independent.

Currently Truro groups are working on economic development projects, environmental projects, and immigration projects that are unique for all of Canada.

During the application period for the Atlantic women's prison, Truro groups came together and developed a very comprehensive application involving many sectors of the community. Even now, after the decision to locate the prison in Truro has been made, the community is determined to make it the best in the country.

Chatelaine's endorsement of Truro was well earned and Truro and its people should be proud of their community.

CANADIAN CENTRE FOR OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH AND SAFETY

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, would you spend $8 million a year to help save $20 billion? Apparently this government will not. I am referring specifically to the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety.

The centre, as you know, is a model organization in that it exemplifies the spirit of co-operation that can exist between government, labour and business. All three share in its administration.

It has in its mandate the promotion of health and safety and disease control in the workplace. It is a Canadian success story that is world renowned for its objective research and it provides useful information to all segments of society.

• (1410)

Indeed, of its total sales, 43 per cent of them were to foreign markets. Yet this government is threatening to shut it down by calling off its funding.

This government likes to talk about productivity, competitiveness and the need for co-operation but does very little about it. Here we have a centre the work of which helps to prevent over $20 billion a year in lost productivity to the economy for a nominal cost of $8 million, and declining.

With the spiralling costs of health care, it makes sense to take preventive measures through education and information campaigns. If anything, perhaps the government could use the centre to help correct its short-sightedness.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw the attention of Quebecers to highlights of the 1992 federal budget. The reduction in the personal income surtax will benefit 4.7 million taxpayers in Quebec.

We are going to simplify, streamline and enhance federal support for 2.9 million families and 2.3 million children in Quebec.

The negative aspects of the present tax system for the average family will be eliminated.

We will make it easier for people to own their own homes by allowing families in Quebec to use funds invested in their RRSPS.

We will reduce the tax burden on 11,000 Quebec companies in the manufacturing and processing sectors; we will increase the capital cost allowance rate for machinery in those sectors; and further measures are planned to assist small businesses and farming operations in Quebec.

We will improve assistance for some 42,000 disabled persons in Quebec.

And finally, Mr. Speaker, we will provide additional assistance for about 170,000 students at the post-secondary level in the province.

ELLIOT LAKE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, today Denison Mines is shutting down its mining operations in Elliot Lake, Ontario, resulting in the loss of some 1,000 jobs.

The number of jobs lost during the last two years is over 3,400 or 85 per cent of the mining jobs in that community. One cannot exaggerate the adverse impact these lay-offs will have on the community in terms of loss of competence in the future and loss of hope that new employment can be found for these workers.

Making things even worse, the government has announced it is closing the Atomic Energy Control Board office in Elliot Lake at a time when it should be expanding its operation to ensure that the decommissioning of these uranium mines is done in a proper way to protect the long-term safety of the community.

I call on the Government of Canada to reverse its decision regarding the Atomic Energy Control Board office. I call on the Government of Canada to put in place new effective adjustment programs to assist workers who have lost their jobs and to take new initiatives to diversify the economy of Elliot Lake and the north shore communities.

S. O. 31

FEDNOR

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, since 1987, the federal government through a regional program called FEDNOR has created a total of 474 projects worth $127 million, with $36.2 million from the federal government, and created over 3,000 jobs.

In my hand today I have hundreds of letters endorsed by the Chamber of Commerce, town councils, residents and business people urging that this program continue.

I have yet to hear from the other side, from the member for Sudbury who has a regional office there, from the member for Thunder Bay who has an office there, or from the member for Sault Ste. Marie who has an office there, about whether or not they support FEDNOR.

It is a program that was brought together by northern Ontarians for northern Ontarians to develop the north. We need FEDNOR.

SHABBAT ZACHOR

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, this year's commemoration of Shabbat Zachor, the sabbath of remembrance and prayer for the Jewish community of Syria, will be held on March 14 in synagogues across Canada.

On that day, not only Jews but all Canadians are reminded of the oppressive treatment of 4,300 Syrian Jews, including surveillance by Syrian secret police, economic restrictions and denial of basic human rights such as the right to vote, freedom of assembly, freedom from arbitrated tension and the right to emigrate, in contravention of the UN Declaration of Human Rights.

The plight of two brothers, Selim and Eli Swed, serving six and a half year sentences after unfair trials, is particularly grave. Recently members of this House and the Senate from all parties joined to form the Canadian Parliamentary Friendship Group for Syrian Jewry.

As vice-chair of this group, I join with my colleagues in commemorating Shabbat Zachor, and in strongly urging the Syrian government to release the Swed brothers and ensure that at last there is full respect for the fundamental human rights of all Syrian Jews, including the right to emigrate.

REFORM PARTY

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, the Ides of March are not yet upon us, but I, like the soothsayer, want to warn all Canadian senior citizens that Preston Manning and his retreads want to benefit from you when you die. That's right folks. Just call up some Reform Party office and you will be given the name of an insurance agent who will assist in a peaceful way, especially if you are aged and ill. They will transfer your life insurance policy directly to the Reform Party instead of your loved ones.

Preston then will likely send you a beautiful letter stating that when the time comes you will be dearly missed but heaven is waiting. Signed with anticipation, Preston.

P.S. Have you any older relatives we could contact? God bless.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S WEEK

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, this is International Women's Week. We should be celebrating the advancement of women. Instead, this government is continuing its shameful record of contempt concerning Canadian women.

This week we have been debating a budget which tells working women they do not deserve retraining by cutting the Canadian Jobs Strategy by another $100 million; circumvents the Human Rights Tribunal and the Federal Court by reneging on a billion dollars of pay equity payments; reneges on the government's promise to promote equality rights by killing the Court Challenges Program; kills family allowances in favour of a targeted benefit which does nothing for families on social assistance, many of whom are headed by women; condemns more women and their children to homelessness by eliminating co-op housing. It has also reneged on its promise of child care.

This government signed the UN Convention on the elimination of discrimination against women. Canada should be implementing policies here at home which would serve as a model for the world. But no. What this government is saying to women is: "Wait a while longer".

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, it is reported that the CBC refuses to run a paid ad promoting Canadian unity. It says that it does not want to get political, it might offend someone.

This corporation, which does not want to get political, is quite happy giving publicity to Loretta Swit of MASH fame as she sits on an ice floe beside a seal.

Apparently it is not too political to give publicity to the affluent Hollywood star while giving short shift to the beleaguered Atlantic cod fishery.

Without a united Canada there will not be $1 billion in taxes to pay for the CBC. There will not be any need for a national network because there will not be a nation.

Without unity in Canada there will not be a need for the mother corporation. Perhaps the CBC should consider why it exists, who it exists for and spend a moment thinking about the "Canadian" in their name.

Without getting too political, I think the CBC should get its priorities straight.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

BEAUDOIN-DOBBIE REPORT

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

I have not always agreed with him in the past, and I still feel there are a number of major issues on which we disagree strongly. However, I do agree with the Prime Minister that we must use all the means at our disposal to achieve reconciliation and put together a set of proposals for this country that are acceptable to all Canadians. And that is why all members of the parliamentary committee voted for the Beaudoin-Dobbie report.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether the Minister of National Defence was speaking on behalf of the Canadian government when he attacked the Beaudoin-Dobbie report yesterday.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have the transcript of last night's broadcast of Le Point, where Mr. Masse was a guest. He said the following: "Looking at this from an historical perspective, I entirely agree with the Prime Minister that the Beaudoin-Dobbie report goes further than any other in terms of being open to the needs of Quebec and taking into account the particular situation in Quebec".

Mr. Masse confirms what I said on Mr. Cournoyer's radio show last week. I said that although Beaudoin-Dobbie was the product of a parliamentary committee and thus not necessarily government policy, it nevertheless remains a document that is very important as part of Canada's constitutional development and in my opinion, its approach to the provinces, to aboriginal people, to institutional reform—and here I am thinking of the Senate—and to the distribution of powers is the most generous and the most open approach this country has seen in 125 years.

The report and the parliamentarians from all political parties in this House, whose efforts and spirit of co-operation were exemplary, deserve our respect.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I like the statement of the Prime Minister, but I would like to ask him this question.

After 18 members of his caucus, plus members from this side of the House, the NDP and Liberals, signed the report and the Prime Minister and the minister in charge of the Constitution said last week it was a good report, is it not the obligation of every member of the government to defend what the Prime Minister calls "the best constitutional proposition since 1867"?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is a parliamentary report and it is not a question of government policy. We are examining it very carefully. As I have just indicated, I quite frankly am very impressed by the work of the committee.

The Minister of National Defence indicated last night on television—

• (1420)

[Translation]

"I entirely agree with the Prime Minister. This report goes further than any other in terms of being open to the needs of Quebec".

[English]

This is a substantial statement of agreement and an endorsement of the position of all of the people who worked so hard to put together the report. At an appropriate time, the House will be—

Mr. Lapierre: Come on.

Mr. Mulroney: The Bloc Quebecois does not agree. The poor Bloc Quebecois is trying to destroy a great country and it is going to be surprised when Quebecers are confronted with the real question and they say "We want to remain Canadians.".

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to know from the Prime Minister whether it would not be better for all Canadians if the members of his cabinet did what they had to do to be applauded by members of the Conservative Party, instead of being applauded by members of the Parti Quebecois, as was Mr. Masse.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I just said twice that the Minister of National Defence, on Le Point last night, fully endorsed the position I had defended on Jean Cournoyer's program. Now if my friend is complaining that there may be differences of opinion from time to time within a political party, I am sorry, but I would point out the huge difference between his position and that of the hon. member for Saint-Henri—Westmount.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: Yes, it happens in the best of families. It is not perfect. You do not have total solidarity yet. So those are things that happen. The Minister of National Defence said last night that he fully supported the Prime Minister's position, and I congratulate him on his good judgment.

TRADE

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, in 1988 the Prime Minister said that the dispute settlement mechanism in the free trade agreement was: "a genuine shield against new U.S. protectionism.". Yet in the case of softwood lumber and of Honda automobiles that shield against new U.S. protection is obviously not there.

When will this government recognize that the free trade agreement is not providing the secure access to the American market which was its original justification? What is this government going to do to ensure that such protectionist abuse is eliminated in trade between Canada and the United States?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, it is clear that under the free trade agreement, and I am sure my hon. friend would not have it any other way, each country has its own trade protective laws, laws to protect its own interests. We have applied ours in certain cases, the Americans applied theirs in other cases.

As I have said on many occasions, no other country in the world has a dispute settlement mechanism. We have it to ensure that the trade laws are applied in a fair, open and equitable way as far as both sides are concerned. That is what we have in the free trade agreement. That is a very important step forward with the free trade agreement, as we have seen most particularly with the pork decision not too long ago where Canadians interests were protected when they were under attack from protectionist forces in the United States.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the free trade agreement merely provides for the evaluation of the fair application of U.S. trade law. When the government signed the memorandum of understanding in 1986 on softwood lumber, it did so largely because there was no agreement between Canada and the United States on the question of what is a subsidy. There is still no such agreement today.

Without a clear definition of subsidies, how can there be an effective process for dispute settlement?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, one of the key things that we did not have in 1986 was a free trade agreement with a dispute settlement mechanism. Now we have that important balance, important factor in the free trade agreement that allows for these disputes to be settled in a fair and equitable fashion.

My hon. friend talks about a definition of subsidy. We provided in the agreement, because we could not get an agreement at that time as to what would constitute the subsidy, five years within which we would establish that.

Since that time we have been discussing this under the auspices of the GATT and the Uruguay round negotiations. As my hon. friend knows from reading the Dunkel proposals of December 20, we have made a very important step forward as to what constitutes a subsidy. There is still more work to be done, but it is a major step forward in establishing the definition of subsidy.

THE BUDGET

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. As the House knows, we are celebrating International Women's Week this week. Unfortunately the government's recent budget, with the total elimination of a national child care program and its refusal to honour the government's pay equity to the women in its employ, gives women little reason to celebrate.

The government has fought its female employees every step of the way, refusing to pay the $1 billion in pay equity that is owing to the women working for this government.

My question to the Prime Minister is this. Why is the government willing to give a $1 billion tax break so that corporate executives can have lunch with each other but it refuses to give the $1 billion to those women who have earned it?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think there would be general agreement in the House that the concept of equality for all Canadians, and particularly the one raised by my hon. friend, the advancement of the cause of equality for women, is a most important and very noble undertaking and the government and parliamentarians are committed to it.

I think in fairness my hon. friend should acknowledge that since this government came to office there has been an increase of over 100 per cent in the appointment of women to agencies, boards and commissions in decision-making positions.

When we became the government there were three women who were deputy ministers, there are now 21 at that level. There were two women who were ambassadors, there are now 16 or 17 heads of mission. We have added women to the Supreme Court and at the next cabinet meeting tomorrow—when we formed a government there were 37 women appointed to the federal bench across Canada—this government will be naming the one hundredth woman to fill a senior judicial position in Canada.

These are all very important advancements of women in our society into the decision-making process, making the decisions and exercising power where it really counts. That did not exist in the past. We have made very major steps forward but we have a long way to go.

I hope my hon. friend will bear these realities in mind and place them in context when she is asking her questions and commenting on the status of women in Canada.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the context is that business executives get a $1 billion tax break and women with lower incomes who work for this government do not get the pay equity that they deserve, that the courts have said that they deserve and that this government owes to these women. Those are the facts and noble intentions do not put bread on the table.

• (1430)

Because it also affects these lower income groups in our society, not only do women suffer from not having pay equity within the government and outside the government, but the government's tax changes that are announced in this budget also mean that lower income families are paying more taxes. The de-indexation of tax credits, which continues, means that more families are paying higher taxes in the lower income bracket, approximately $200 more in taxes.

I ask the Prime Minister a simple question: With this de-indexation of tax credits, why has the government continued a hidden tax on the poor and working Canadian families?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that conclusion is absolutely false. There are two parts to the question. The first part deals with pay equity.

I remind the hon. member that we have made adjustments to pay equity on a retroactive basis going back to, I believe, April 1, 1985 of in excess of $400 million. I do not believe that there is any other administration or government in Canada that has undertaken that.

In addition to that, we provide for an additional $81 million for future pay equity provisions. Again, there is no other administration in Canada that is as generous as that.

With regard to the second part of the question, the hon. member should take a look again at the child benefit program. This is clearly designed, together with the earned income supplement and the very generous offerings as a result of the consolidation of the family allowance, the child credit and the refundable tax credit, so that working poor families with children will certainly be a lot better off.

Furthermore, unlike the family allowance which is now taxed away, the payments of up to $144 per month will be provided to 3.1 million families without being taxable. That clearly indicates this is a generous program. It is focused and it is simple.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the truth remains that in this budget on which we will be voting today and on which this party will be voting against, not only is social housing cut back, not only is co-operative housing cut out, not only is pay equity not in it, the avenues that people have had to even challenge the government and to challenge those authorities is cut back.

[Translation]

Two years ago, the federal government said that it would continue to fund the Court Challenges Program, which helps the most disadvantaged.

The government explained that it wanted to reaffirm its commitment to promoting human rights.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question. This program was just cancelled in the budget. Does this mean that the government is no longer interested in promoting human rights in Canada?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it does not surprise me at all to learn that the New Democratic Party will be voting against tax cuts for 14.6 million Canadians.

It does not surprise me at all that the NDP will be voting against reducing deficits and reducing the size and scope of government. That does not surprise me at all.

The hon. member suggests that there are some programs that are being cut. Yes, indeed there are some programs that are being cut.

These are very difficult and tough decisions to make, but the fact of the matter is that Canadians do not want to see the deficit rise and they do not want to see their taxes rise. So the tough choices mean that you have to cut some programs. You cannot cut spending without cutting programs.

TRADE

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, the Honda syndrome will drive out not just automotive but all other manufacturing in Canada that is producing for the U.S. market.

In light of this, has the trade minister obtained the consent of the United States to binding arbitration of the Honda dispute? If not, why not?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the concern that my hon. friend is expressing about the Honda issue is precisely the same concern that we have as a government and that we are acting on in the activities that we have undertaken in dealing with this matter with the United States administration.

We have initiated discussions with them under chapter 18 of the free trade agreement. Those consultations continue in two senses. Once those consultations are completed we will decide whether or not it is appropriate to have some other form of consultation.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, the minister's idea of talking tough with the Americans is to beg on his knees and prostrate himself in Washington.

He still cannot get the Americans, as he admitted today, to agree to binding arbitration on the Honda dispute under chapter 18. Will the minister at least admit that his much lauded dispute settlement mechanism under chapter 18 of the free trade agreement just is not worth the paper it is written on?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the excessive rhetoric is totally inappropriate. There are three ways that we can have consultations with the United States administration.

One is through the normal operations of the U.S.-Canada Trade Commission which meets at least two times a year. The second is chapter 18—

Mr. Peterson: Which you are using, you said.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): If my hon. friend would be patient for a minute, I will give him the full answer.

Chapter 18 is the second basis on which we can have consultations which are not binding. Chapter 19 is a binding dispute mechanism that is the final stage.

My hon. friend should understand that prior to the free trade agreement we had none of those three means by which we could have this type of consultation. We now have a free trade agreement with these ways with which we can discuss these issues which are bound to come up in a trade relationship as broad and as deep as we have with the United States. That is the value of the free trade agreement in dealing with this type of dispute.

ATLANTIC FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, during Monday's Question Period, the Prime Minister indicated that he and the government are considering a number of options with respect to the foreign overfishing issue.

At that time he invited me to make some suggestions to him. I have one for him. Take immediate steps to extend functional jurisdiction over the nose and tail of the Grand Banks. There is my suggestion. Is is ready to act on it?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, this is indeed a unique suggestion. The hon. gentleman is going to take over functional jurisdiction of international fishing activities outside the 200 miles when there is no other nation in the world that has said it would agree to Canada or any other country taking that course of action.

That is an invitation to conflict. That is not reasonable or sensible. That is simply trying to make oneself appealing to those who would like to see direct action when this is a complicated world and direct actions are not always the kind of actions that one can take.

For example, we were down in New York pursuing this matter at the UNCED conference where we have a chance of getting the rest of the world to agree with us. The rest of the world is not going to agree with us if we simply go out making heroic gestures that the rest of the world is bound not to observe, including all of the powerful industrial countries of the world, all of whom believe in freedom of the high seas.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Yes, Mr. Speaker, he has been down in New York and last year he was over in Strasbourg. Last week, some of his colleagues were in Strasbourg. They have come back this week to tell him that our lobbying effort over there is absolutely non-existent or to the degree it exists, it is an absolute joke.

The best proof of that is the cockamamie stuff that the British MPs are saying these days about seals and sealing. The government has no lobby campaign. It is a joke.

I ask him, would he now return to his position of some weeks ago when his Prime Minister was not listening, when he was in Newfoundland and he said he was running out of patience. Has he run out of patience? Is he now prepared to do what I suggested just now and what he himself suggested in little groups back in Newfoundland?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member becomes more imaginative as he goes on.

We can adopt either an attitude of posturing or beating our chests. The hon. gentlemen reminds me of King Kong except he is not quite the same size. I am more in the Kong size myself. I see there is general agreement with my reply so I am sitting down.

• (1440)

HOUSING

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, there will be those who make claim that what you get now is Kong II.

I have a question for the Minister of Finance. On January 27, a mere four weeks before the budget killed the co-op housing program, the Minister of Finance wrote to the president of the Co-operative Housing Federation of Canada, indicating the program would continue for 1992-93 with a new funding commitment of $6.1 million.

On February 19, less than a week before the program's public execution, the Minister of Public Works wrote a similar letter to the president of the Conseil de la coopération du Québec.

Did the Minister of Finance truly not know the program would be eliminated when he wrote his January 27 letter? Had no one bothered to tell the minister responsible less than a week before the budget? If the two ministers did know, how can the wholly incorrect assurances contained in their letters possibly be explained?

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the cuts that were necessary in the budget reduced the social housing spending to 3 per cent. This is unfortunate but it was a move that had to be taken. People in this country understand that.

Obviously there are alternatives. We could take the money from the seniors and apply it. We could take money from other places. This government has decided not to do that. We feel this is the proper move for the proper time.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, that is a fascinating, if somewhat inadequate, answer but it completely ignores the question unfortunately, as did the minister to whom it was directed.

Might I ask the Minister of Finance whether he really believes that the depths of a protracted recession is the right time to cut funding for new social housing by half over the next two years? Does he not think this is both socially cruel and economically lunatic, especially when, in another part of the budget, strenuous efforts are undertaken to spur new housing construction? Or does he believe that the poor and those of moderate income characteristically have wads of cash stashed away in RRSPs?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows, I am sure, that the Government of Canada spends in excess of $2 billion annually on social housing and will continue to do that.

With respect to social housing, I think the hon. member would also know that 50 per cent of those living in co-op housing would not be eligible and, therefore, do not really qualify for social housing under the criteria established.

It is important to ensure that we channel scarce resources to those in most need. That is exactly what this budget does. That is exactly what is happening under the continuing support for the social housing which will increase this year by $70 million and $45 million every year thereafter. That creates an ongoing obligation for 35 years.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, no wonder this minister killed the co-op housing program. He does not even understand what it is all about and what need it fills for Canadians. One week ago—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps, the hon. member would want to put his question appropriately.

Mr. Fontana: Mr. Speaker, this government made a commitment and a guarantee to provide $6 million to the co-op housing program in 1992.

There are 164,000 Canadians on a waiting list for co-op housing. By eliminating the funding for co-op housing this government is abdicating its responsibility to those Canadians and, in fact, is causing 4,500 jobs to be lost in the construction industry.

My question is a very simple one. Will the minister honour the commitment to the co-op housing program for 1992. Can they keep one promise to this country?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the government will continue to support the 14,800 housing units that are in existence as a result of the co-op housing program and we will continue to support social housing to the tune of $2 billion a year.

When it comes to creating activity in the housing industry, the reduction in the CMHC down payment to 5 per cent and the RRSP initiative are clear initiatives that will support and stimulate housing in all parts of the country. I think the hon. member would welcome that.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, the $6 million promised for 1992 was for the additional 1,800 badly needed units in this country.

The minister surely knows that the Co-op Housing Program is cost efficient and that the program is well targeted to those people who cannot own a home.

In Montreal, Toronto and other centres the Co-op Housing Program provides support for single parents, the disabled, seniors, and groups that cannot find affordable housing.

Will the minister reinstate the funds for 1992? Will he reinstate this program that helps Canadians with affordable housing?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member may want to reconsider his comment when he suggests that the housing provided for under the Co-op Housing Program is well targeted.

Truly 50 per cent of those who occupy housing provided under this program would not qualify under the social housing criteria. I ask him then: How is it that it is well targeted when 50 per cent of those who occupy these units are not in effect qualified under the provisions of social housing?

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport in light of his announcement this morning concerning Pearson airport.

The timing of the minister's announcement of the privatization of terminals 1 and 2 has to be questionable at best, given the recession, the problems in the Canadian airline industry, the far from certain commercial success of terminal 3, and the ongoing environmental review of runway expansion.

Why is the minister rejecting the advice of the private sector, provincial and municipal officials, as well perhaps as some of his own officials, in going ahead with privatization now?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is rather amusing that members on the other side have been saying for weeks and months that this government should spend money to create jobs. Now we come forward with a project that is going to create 3,200 jobs for five years in well paying industries in the Toronto area and this member is complaining again. I do not know what he is doing.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, we will be interested to hear his explanation of those numbers in another forum, but I would like to know now not only about his timing but also about the process that he has introduced today.

The minister proposes to turn over Canada's most profitable airport to private developers and he is giving interested parties only 90 days to submit comprehensive proposals which contemplate two different environmental review results.

How can the minister seriously expect Canadians to believe that within 90 days this process is open to all possibly interested parties and that this action will produce the best possible result for travellers and for Canadian taxpayers who have already put a lot of money into terminal 2?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, obviously a development of this kind is not to provide for the needs of today but the needs of tomorrow.

In 1988 these were the same people who were complaining that the government had not exercised enough foresight in not making more space available to accommodate the traffic that was increasing. It created congestion that no one wants to go through again.

We have studies that indicate that the traffic in the airline industry has been increasing by 4.5 per cent a year for the past 10 years. Our present forecast of 3 per cent a year for the next years indicates that we will lack capacity in 1997–98 without the new runways. This is why we are proceeding at this time.

We indicated four years ago that we were going to transfer all airports in areas where people want it to local airport authorities. We are following the course that we implemented four years ago and it is working well.

BEAUDOIN–DOBBIE REPORT

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac–Saint–Jean): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Prime Minister a question.

What the Minister of National Defence said yesterday is that the Beaudoin–Dobbie report is unacceptable for Quebec.

• (1450)

He is not the only one to think so because right now members of the Quebec Liberal Party and the Parti Quebecois are voting unanimously on a motion which concludes that "the National Assembly disapproves of the Beaudoin–Dobbie committee report."

When will the Prime Minister stop pretending with the Leader of the Opposition, the leader of the Liberal Party of Canada, that something good can come of a report that English Canada considers too generous and Quebec considers not enough?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Perhaps it is the hon. member who should stop pretending. The Beaudoin–Dobbie report reflects the five conditions of the Meech Lake Accord, I repeat, the five conditions or proposals that he supported barely a year and a half ago.

Besides, the Beaudoin–Dobbie committee report contains a series of provisions, of new measures for the provinces, native people and institutional reform in Canada, including, for example, Senate reform. Mr. Dubuc, as well as Mr. Auger of the Journal de Montréal, think that these provisions are a very serious step forward for Quebec and the other provinces.

No one claimed that it was a final position. The House itself will be presented with the document and the House will decide in due course. But for someone, especially someone who already vigorously supported the five conditions of Meech, to now denounce a document as insufficient when it already contains much more than Meech is unprecedented hypocrisy in the House of Commons.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac–Saint–Jean): Mr. Speaker, whatever our allegiances, we will all agree that an essential element in this debate is truth and that if we had more respect for the truth, we would go further.

The one who most vigorously approved the Meech Lake Accord is one of its signers, Robert Bourassa. Today he says no to the Beaudoin–Dobbie committee report because it does not reflect the five conditions of Meech Lake.

When will we stop wasting time and money and frightening people in Quebec as in English Canada and when will this offer that is supposed to come finally be tabled?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think that no one in Canada or in Quebec would believe that we have anything to learn from that member when it comes to truth and loyalty.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: He has become a legend and we will talk about it for decades to come. He will always be mentioned as a model of truthfulness and loyalty for generations to come, I am sure.

As for the document and the position that the Parliament of Canada is to take, in due time, of course, Quebecers will be called upon to decide their future. In 1980, they were presented with a question. Perhaps there will be another one in 1992, to be decided on with proper reflection, in an unbiased, objective, serene way. Quebecers will be presented with a basic question. And if you allow me to speak now just as a Quebecer, a guy from the North Shore, if the question is "Do you prefer a renewed Canada or an independent Quebec?", Quebecers will choose a renewed Canada ten times out of ten.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

NATIONAL REVENUE

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister answering on behalf of the Minister of National Revenue.

Yesterday I gave the Minister of National Revenue a copy of the Reform Party mailout which explains how the political tax credit can be used to pay for insurance policies that benefit the Reform Party. At that time I asked the minister for an inquiry. I believe that the document, while it pretends to be a report of one person's generous gift to the Reform Party, is really a slick, sophisticated and sleazy step-by-step guide on how to abuse the tax system.

Will the government order an inquiry?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Revenue is in Newfoundland on government business today.

Upon the member presenting this to the minister, he immediately asked his deputy minister for taxation matters to review it. According to the evidence that has been presented so far, they find that this scheme the Reform Party has dreamed up does not qualify as a political tax credit.

It is perfectly legitimate for charities. It is perfectly legitimate for universities, hospitals, churches, for example, to do this type of thing, but for a political party it is not.

It is rather interesting that the Reform Party which advocates the abolition of political tax credits is using a method to raise funds that does not appear to be acceptable to Revenue Canada officials.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Just so that the minister is perfectly clear because many Canadians will want to know the answer, it is perfectly legal for individuals to give through their wills or through their insurance policies to universities, to political parties, to charities. It is the abuse of the political tax credit that is in question. Is that correct?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): That is correct, Mr. Speaker.

As a matter of fact the way the scheme works, as I understand it, is that they are encouraging their members to take out life insurance policies naming the Reform Party as the beneficiary and claiming a tax credit on the premiums paid on that policy.

To our way of thinking it is highly unethical and on first blush, on investigation, we find it totally illegal within the tax system of Canada.

ESTIMATES FOR THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the hon. member for Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis, as the representative of the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons. During the past week the media have been discussing the Estimates for the House of Commons for 1992-93, as they apply to members of this House. Could the representative of the Board of Internal Economy confirm when I will be able to receive a copy of this document, which is being held back by Parliament?

[English]

Hon. Bob Layton (Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis): Mr. Speaker, near the end of the last fiscal year the House management committee called the Speaker and his administrators as witnesses in its review and approval of the estimates for the House of Commons. Copies of the estimates were made available to members of Parliament upon request.

But a copy of this year's report entitled How the Budget is Spent—1992-93 has inadvertently or deliberately been released to the media prior to its being presented for review by the House management committee.

The matter of the unauthorized release of these estimates has been placed on the agenda of the Board of Internal Economy at its next meeting later this afternoon.

CHILDREN'S RIGHTS

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister responsible for children, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The Caledon Institute of Social Policy has revealed that since 1986 this government has snatched $3.5 billion from Canadian children by not fully indexing child benefits.

Meanwhile, last February 11 the Minister of Finance announced a new loophole for wealthy Canadians to avoid paying tax on their private trusts for another generation.

When will this government end its policies of depriving Canadian children to finance new loopholes for the richest Canadians?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to repeat that the new approach taken to our social programs in the latest budget stresses this government's commitment to setting a priority on families and children. We can say that starting with this budget and this recommendation, families will have an additional $2 billion to spend in the next five years, which means $500 million for the current year.

• (1500)

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, the new Tory ritual must be sacrificing children to the corporate gods.

The Budget Papers show that two-wage earner families with two children having a combined income of $30,000 will gratefully receive an extra $3.67 a month next year in child benefits. But, with inflation of just 3 per cent, this increase will vanish within the very next year.

I ask the minister if he will immediately move to index child benefits fully so that members on this side of the House will have one less thing to fix next year.

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, the measure we are proposing reflects the needs of Canadian children and was identified with the beneficiaries in the course of the usual consultations.

I maintain that the best way to protect the quality of our social programs is to keep inflation rates low and have a thriving economy, and that is what we are working on.

[English]

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister will know that his government's 12-page child benefit white paper dealing with close to $5 million of expenditure is the shortest white paper in parliamentary history. He also knows that this minister will be meeting behind closed doors with the provinces and that not one of the many dozen anti-poverty or children's rights groups has been contacted.

In the absence of the Minister of Health and Welfare, could the Prime Minister indicate how Canadians will be involved? Is this yet another public relations gimmick or is the government for once going to speak to Canadians seriously about the future of their children?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, we are not in the House for a public relations exercise. We are working very hard to improve the quality of life of Canadians, their families and their children.

MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY ACT

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport and it is regarding proposed amendments to the Motor Vehicle Safety Act which currently provides two standards for safety in Canada: one for U.S. vehicles and a stiffer one for Canadian vehicles.

Will the new amendments remove section 902 which allows for this double standard and give the Canadian industry a level playing field?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend knows, we will shortly be bringing forward some amendments to the Motor Vehicle Safety Act. The intention of this act, after it is adopted, is to consult the people on the new regulations. I am sure that through this consultation process we will be able to address the well intentioned concerns of the member.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I believe that you will find consent for the following motion:

That, notwithstanding any Standing Order of this House, on Wednesday, March 11, 1992 immediately after the final vote on ways and means Motion No. 11, the House shall proceed to a special debate on the situation now facing the softwood lumber industry;

That, for the sole purpose of this special debate the question before the House shall be that this House do now adjourn;

That, under the provisions of this order, no member shall be permitted to speak more than once;

That, the first three speakers be permitted to speak for 20 minutes and that all speeches thereafter be no longer than 10 minutes;

That, under the provisions of this order, the Speaker shall not entertain any dilatory or superseding motions or quorum calls; and

That, when no member rises to speak, but no later than 12 midnight, the Speaker shall adjourn the House until the next sitting day.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, there have been consultations with the various parties and we would concur with the motion.

Just to clarify, I am sure that the parliamentary secretary could indicate that the first speaker will be a Minister of the Crown representing the Government of Canada, followed by the Official Opposition and then the regular rotations.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that our lead-off speaker will be the Minister of State for Forestry.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to rise on behalf of the NDP caucus and give our consent to this motion and pay special tribute to the member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley who has been putting this issue before the House ever since we came back. This debate exists, in large part, due to his efforts.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a very important debate for us, since the Quebec softwood lumber industry is hit unjustly and for no reason. We agree with that motion, provided that a speaker from our group can express himself because in the last few days the situation has been very unfair. If there is not immediate agreement to allow us to have a speaker, namely the hon. member for Rosemont, we are not interested in simply giving an opportunity to others without being able to present a perspective from Quebec.

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I take the intervention of the hon. member quite seriously. I wish to indicate to him that the motion has been put with the best of intentions so that all members of this House will have an opportunity to debate a very important subject matter which affects certain regions more so than others. But to suggest that there ought to be preconditions before a consent motion would be approved, I do not know if that is in the best interest of the House.

I wish to say, through you, Mr. Speaker, to the hon. member that we would be more than willing to try to co-operate with all members of this House to give everyone an opportunity to speak. If need be, perhaps certain provisions of the Standing Orders could be looked at in order to give greater opportunity to members who might want to speak for a shorter period of time rather than the 10 minutes which has been indicated in the consent motion.

I would hope that my hon. colleague will want to look at the motion, the spirit in which it has been given by the parties and he as a representative of a particular group, that we would have no difficulty whatsoever in trying to accommodate all members of this House.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I do not think this should be a problem within the context of a debate that goes on all evening. There can be co-operation among all members of the House to ensure that all viewpoints are heard. I would certainly make that commitment to the member who raised the point.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I too would like to confirm that we were more than happy to accommodate the hon. member and that is the entire purpose of this debate. It is to give every member of this House an opportunity to participate in the debate if it is of interest to them and their constituents.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Angus: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am wondering, before we proceed to Government Orders, if you could seek the consent of the House to revert to tabling of reports from committees. One of the standing committees was not ready to table a report at the time you called it and we would like to get on with our press conference later this day.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has sought permission to revert to tabling of reports from committees.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

TRANSPORT

SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Standing Committee on Transport, I have the honour to present the second report of the Standing Committee on Transport which deals with the issue of high-speed rail.

We are pleased that we have a unanimous report on this important transportation issue and we appreciate the co-operation and support of all members of the committee.

I believe that the committee's findings and recommendations will make a valuable contribution to the ongoing debate on the feasibility of high-speed rail service in Canada.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND INTERNATIONAL TRADE

AUTHORIZATION FOR SUBCOMMITTEE TO TRAVEL

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I have a motion here that will require the consent of the House for one of our committees to travel. I move:

> That notwithstanding the order made on February 6, 1992, the subcommittee on arms export of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade be authorized to travel to Victoria, Vancouver and Winnipeg from Monday, March 30 to Wednesday April 1, 1992, and to Halifax and Montreal from Monday, April 6 to Tuesday, April 7, 1992.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the parliamentary secretary. Is there agreement?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not consent.

PETITIONS

STUDENT LOANS

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table 90 petitions representing over 2,000 students at the University of British Columbia which is located, as you know, in my riding of Vancouver Quadra, a good many of them living, I am sure, in your own riding, Mr. Speaker.

It was bad enough when students were hit with the GST on their textbooks and the 3 per cent surcharge on student loans. The government has made matters worse with its plans to increase the burden of the cancelled 3 per cent surcharge by eliminating the interest-free repayment period.

On behalf of all of these students, I urge the government to reconsider its position.

ARTICLE XI OF GATT

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour and the privilege to table petitions signed by hundreds of farmers from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell who, of course, ask the Canadian government to pursue the strengthening and preservation of article XI of the GATT. The petitioners certainly do not want the government from across to let this article be abolished in favour of tariffs.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased, on behalf of all my colleagues, to support this petition from constituents of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

[English]

DOMESTIC WORKERS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege of submitting to the House 61 signatures of residents of Manitoba who petition and request that Parliament immediately ask the government to reinstate the foreign domestic program that was introduced back in 1981.

As you will well recognize, Mr. Speaker, the change in the regulations affecting domestic workers is both discriminatory and unfair and will seriously affect the child care system of this country. These 61 petitioners ask this Parliament to make their voice strongly heard to change that very unfair regulation.

BILL C-230

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): While I am on my feet, I have 951 signatures, primarily from residents of Manitoba, but also from other parts of Canada where the petitioners humbly pray Parliament to give priority support to Bill C-230, an act to amend the Criminal Code of Canada, which provides for the appointment of an independent counsel to report to the Minister of Justice in cases where the minister receives an application for mercy.

If I might just say, we are all very aware of the daily newscasts of the proceedings in the David Milgaard case, the Nepoose case and certainly the Marshall case previously in Nova Scotia. It is quite clear that we need to reform the system whereby individuals who have been wrongly treated or in which their sentences and trials have not been to the proper standards of judicial rightness can make an appeal and not put the Minister of Justice in a position of having to deal with that, but have an independent counsel.

I humbly submit on behalf of these petitioners that request.

RAILWAY LEVEL CROSSINGS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my honour and privilege to table a petition from the people of Stewiacke, Nova Scotia, where they have experienced a history of level crossing accidents in their community.

This petition urges increased safety standards at level crossings and also makes specific recommendations to the Railway Safety Act.

UKRAINE

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure of presenting a petition which, when it was circulated, had to do with the desire on the part of the petitioners that the Canadian government immediately recognize Ukraine following the referendum on December 1, 1991.

Of course that has been done, but I am sure the people who signed this petition would want to send a new message to the government, having to do with the need for continuing Canadian support for the new nation of Ukraine and the newly formed government there.

FAMILY VIOLENCE

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I also have a petition which is signed by many residents of my riding and which arose out of the murder of a young woman there by the name of Marilyn Jensen.

These petitioners are concerned that whereas bail review provisions in the Criminal Code of Canada currently set out grounds for the release of accused offenders unless it can be proved that individual is a danger to society at large or it is likely that the accused person will not reappear in court; and whereas the problem of conjugal and family violence is a matter of grave concern for all Canadians, these petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to amend the Criminal Code of Canada to permit the courts to prevent the release of individuals where it is shown that there is a substantial likelihood of further conjugal or family violence being perpetrated.

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure of introducing in the House a petition signed by constituents of Ottawa, Gloucester, Nepean, Kanata and also from the constituents of Manotick, Cornwall, Carlsbad Springs and so on.

These constituents are upset because they are paying high prices for gasoline when compared with those in the rest of the province.

JUSTICE

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure of submitting for the attention of the government and the House of Commons the signatures of hundreds of petitioners who are constituents of York West.

These petitioners are urging the government to revise and amend the Narcotics Control Act so that all assets and cash seized as a result of drug convictions do not go back, as they do now, to general revenues in Ottawa but instead become shared with local police forces and local organizations. They are on the leading edge of combating drugs on our behalf and on behalf of families who unfortunately have fallen victim to the drug malaise, particularly our young.

FOOD IRRADIATION

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of petitions from residents of western Ontario.

The petitioners call on the House of Commons and Parliament of Canada assembled, requesting that food irradiation not become part of the food processing business in this country until we have unbiased, independent agencies and scientists do complete studies on the safety of consuming such food. They ask that the effects of long-term consumption and environmental dangers involved be studied as well.

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I have 94 signatures on a petition from people who are concerned with the continuing and increasing low-level flights over Labrador.

The petitioners ask us to join with the Assembly of First Nations, the Innu of Labrador and other aboriginal peoples of northern Canada in opposing the use of their lands for NATO-NORAD attack training.

They also demand that the government end all NORAD-NATO low-level flight training in Canada and redirect the funding of it to aboriginal uses and to protecting the environment of Canada.

REFUGEES

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I also have 164 signatures on petitions from people in quite a number of municipalities in Ontario, British Columbia and other parts of Canada.

The petitioners are concerned for the situation of the spouses and children of people who have been accepted in Canada as refugee claimants. They ask that the minister issue minister's permits to bring the spouses and dependant children of refugee candidates here when these people have been permitted to apply for landing rather than delaying perhaps several years until the landing has been effected. They ask that these families be allowed to be reunited now in Canada.

• (1520)

JUSTICE

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of presenting three petitions from people in the constituency of Durham who request that the Parliament of Canada recognize that crimes of violence against the person are serious and abhorrent to society, and they ask the government to amend the Criminal Code, the Bail Reform Act of 1972 and the Parole Act to reflect these societal attitudes.

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have here over 500 petitions on which there are well over 20,000 signatures. This is to add to the over 250,000 signatures that I have already presented to the Clerk of the House and the thousands that have been presented by other members in the House of Commons.

These petitioners feel that there are serious deficiencies in the criminal justice system in Canada. They ask that Parliament recognize that crimes of violence against the person are serious and abhorrent to society and they ask the government to amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act of 1972 and further amend the Parole Act.

HOUSING

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by numerous Canadians, including many who are resident in my own housing co-op of Sundance in Edmonton and many residents of a neighbouring co-op, the Art Space Co-op.

This petition was circulated before the budget and it calls on the House to recognize housing as a shared provincial-federal responsibility and to support the federal non-profit co-operative housing program and to maintain the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

I do hope the government takes the words of this petition to heart.

RURAL POST OFFICES

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, this government continues to systematically ravage rural Canada. One of the ways of doing that is with respect to rural post offices. The citizens of the community of Drake in Saskatchewan are very concerned about the future of the post office there. It is a very poorly kept secret that their post office is going to close imminently.

The petitioners call on this government to ensure that the Drake post office remains open and that in fact all rural post offices remain open. They want a place for their children to live and grow up in the future instead of ghost towns.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, it is also my pleasure to introduce a petition signed by several hundred of my constituents. These constituents are fighting back. They are fighting back to keep their post office and the postal service in Dysart, Saskatchewan. The petitioners are not just from Dysart but many of them are from communities such as Lipton, Fort Qu'Appelle, Lebret and many from Regina and other communities.

I should hope that the government will take heed of these petitioners and that they leave the postal service in Dysart the way it is.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 177 and 209.

[Text]

Question No. 177—Mr. Young (Acadie—Bathurst):

With respect to the Public Service, at March 31 of the year prior to the establishment of the Senior Management (SM) group, (a) what was the number of executive level positions (EX or SX) (b) deputy minister (DM) positions?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am informed by the Privy Council Office and the Treasury Board of Canada as follows:

(a) At March 31, 1981, the year prior to the establishment of the Senior Management (SM) Group, there were 1,272 SXs (conversion to EX did not begin until April of 1981).

(b) The number of Deputy Ministers (DM) as of March 31, 1981 was 98.

Question No. 209—Mr. Casey:

In the preparation of the bill to amend the Motor Vehicle Safety Act, is the government considering a requirement whereby importers would be required by regulation to demonstrate that a used vehicle has been converted to Canadian standards before a registration permit can be issued and the vehicle registered in a province?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Yes, consideration is being given to establishing authority under the Motor Vehicle Safety Act for regulations that would require importers to certify that used vehicles have been converted to meet all Canadian safety standards. The actual registration of a vehicle is wholly a provincial government responsibility.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, if Question No. 175 could be made an order for return, this return would be tabled immediately.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House that Question No. 175 be deemed to have been made an Order for Return?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Text]

Question No. 175—Mr. Young (Acadie—Bathurst):

With respect to the Public Service (a) in what year was the Senior Management (SM) group created (b) what was the number of senior SM personnel, by department, at March 31 of that year (c) at that same year end what was the number of (i) Executive level positions (EX) (ii) Deputy Minister (DM) positions?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mrs. Venne: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Saint-Hubert on a point of order.

Mrs. Venne: Mr. Speaker, I would like to know if you have asked that my notice of motion for the production of papers be reserved at the same time? Was that the issue a few moments ago?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Indeed, we are now dealing with notices of motion for production of papers, as the hon. member for Saint-Hubert rightly pointed out.

The hon. parliamentary secretary.

[English]

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Motion for the Production of Papers No. P-10, in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa West.

[Text]

P-10—Mrs. Catterall:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all studies, reports or other analysis of the financial implications of possible changes to the pension plans of the Public Service, Armed Services, Royal Canadian Mounted Police and of the changing demographics of the Public Service.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, on December 12, 1991, the government gave notice to table an act to amend certain acts in relation to pensions and to enact the Special Retirement Arrangements Act and the Pension Benefits Division Act. This pension bill (Bill C-55) was tabled in the House of Commons on February 14, 1992. Among other things, the bill addresses some long-standing fairness issues such as the division of pension credits on marriage breakdown, pension coverage for part-time employees and an early retirement program for Correctional Service officers. The financial implications of this bill will be made available during the legislative process.

The President of the Treasury Board has indicated that the government will review the fundamental elements of the federal public sector pension plans, such as the rate of return to be credited to the pension funds, future inflation protection arrangements and plan management. As part of that review, the financial and other implications of possible changes to the various pension plans would be assessed with all stakeholders.

The estimated costs of the existing plans and the demographics of their membership are contained in the actuarial valuations of the plans which are publicly available in the Library of Parliament.

I therefore ask the hon. member to withdraw her motion.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Since the hon. member for Ottawa West is not here, is the House willing to transfer this motion for debate?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Transferred for debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Saint-Hubert on a point of order.

Mrs. Venne: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the representative from the government when he intends to present the documents referred to in my motion P-13 concerning research contracts for the Royal Commission on New Reproductive Technologies?

I made this request and I would like to get an answer from the government as to when it intends to present these documents, or does it simply refuse to provide them?

[English]

Mr. Cooper: No, Mr. Speaker, we are not refusing to bring them forward. We will answer it soon.

[Translation]

Mrs. Venne: Mr. Speaker, I would really like to know what "soon" means. I have come to realize that when the word "soon" is used in this House, that may mean that it will take a long time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I believe the hon. member has made her message clear. We can now proceed with the order of business.

Mr. Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the Chair that in the first three days of debate on the budget, 41 main speakers have spoken, but no member of our group has yet been recognized. It seems clear to me that such a practice is both discriminatory and unacceptable. Mr. Speaker, I want to make sure that you will recognize—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I would ask the hon. member to be careful when he says that the Chair has acted in a discriminatory and unfair manner. I take note of the interest shown by the member and the Speaker will endeavour, throughout the afternoon, to recognize in a fair manner all those who want to participate in this debate.

• (1530)

Mrs. Marleau: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Sudbury on a point of order.

Mrs. Marleau: Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. members on my left, here in the back, that we have been debating the budget for three days already and only now does one of them rise to speak on the issue. If you wait that long to speak—

An hon. member: He was not here!

Mrs. Marleau: —and if you are not here, you miss your turn.

Mr. Gérin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On the same point of order, the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead.

Mr. Gérin: Mr. Speaker, first of all, I want to correct the record. We were here all along. In fact, notice has been given that the finance critic for the Bloc Quebecois wanted to speak. The problem is, and that is the point I wanted to make—incidentally we are not "members in the back", but full-fledged members of this House, actually elected with the same powers, duties and obligations as all other members.

Mr. Speaker, with all due recognition of the Chair's goodwill, though the Chair is different every day, there is a problem here. The list of speakers changes daily, the Bloc Quebecois having its turn every 13 or 14 speakers. That it is a bit late, because by then the day is over. The next day, there is a different Speaker or Acting Speaker in the Chair and we start all over again. Certainly this is done in good faith. I move that the hon. member for Rosemont be now heard.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair has taken good note of the comments made by the members representing the Bloc Quebecois and, as usual, will try to be fair. Now, let us proceed with the orders of the day.

Mr. Tremblay (Rosemont): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order, the hon. member for Rosemont.

Mr. Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, before anything else, I would ask the member for Sudbury to withdraw her statement. The Chair can testify that, at the beginning of every sitting dealing with the budget, I have approached the Chair to request permission to speak. Each time, my request has met an answer along the same line as this one. I want the member to withdraw her allegation to the effect that we were absent, since I did ask to speak.

I want to have the assurance that our right to speak—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I do not think that a retraction is necessary. Our Standing Orders are quite clear. We have no business indicating whether a member of this House is absent or present. I call upon the co-operation of all hon. members on this point. That being said, the orders of the day have not been called yet, and I can recognize no one until they have. Orders of the day.

Mr. Gérin: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead on a point of order.

Mr. Gérin: No, Mr. Speaker, I have a motion. I move that the hon. member for Rosemont be now heard.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I should not have to remind an outstanding lawyer like the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead that, until such time as the Orders of the Day have been read by the Clerk, they are deemed not to be before the House. Orders of the Day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Tuesday, March 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, at a time when Canadians across this country are yearning for a new spirit of co-operation and unity within Canada, this Conservative budget unfortunately divides and discriminates. It discriminates against the most vulnerable people in our society.

I would like to say that the impact of this budget on the people in my riding of Vancouver East and other ridings like it where there are many people unemployed and on low incomes is particularly devastating.

There is no job creation for the millions of unemployed Canadians and job development funds are cut by another $100 million in this budget.

There is no help for farmers, fishermen and forestry workers whose work is the backbone of this country.

The recession, we know and it is predicted, will continue with less research or retraining programs to help people who are the victims of restructuring in industries.

Last week I attended Vancouver Tech High School in my riding. The students asked me particularly to raise the matter that they are very concerned that student loans have been cut and they will not be able to continue on into post-secondary education.

Women have been slapped down once again and betrayed as pay equity is denied them, pay equity which is owing to women public servants who have been underpaid over the years. This was, of course, required by the courts and yet the government is refusing to pay this debt to women.

Funds for litigation of equality cases are terminated as well.

The federal co-operative housing program also is being terminated. This is one of the most important and successful means of developing decent affordable housing for low income people, but also for a mixed income range of people in healthy communities.

As a British Columbian I want to particularly mention to the government that the termination of co-op housing and social housing programs have been strongly condemned by Premier Mike Harcourt of British Columbia and by the mayor and city council of Vancouver.

We know that this program and also native housing programs are particularly important and essential to homeless people and to develop affordable housing for families, particularly in communities like Vancouver East where we have had a lot of good co-op housing developments.

The Conservative budget also pits families with middle incomes, the middle class if you like, against low income people.

The budget does away with family allowances, which have been a right to families in former years and replaces this with the child tax credit, which is very limited and unfair. This credit is targeted presumably to low income people, but we learn that it is only for working people, not for people on welfare.

The de-indexing of the child tax credit we learn also means that over the period of the next few years the value of the tax credit will decrease, and this means in effect that families will get less than they receive now. So any way you look at it this is an unsound public policy.

The credit is supposed to be an incentive for parents to move off welfare and into the work place, but where are the jobs for these people who are unemployed? Where is the training for people who have been locked into welfare, to get into the work force? And how can single mothers hope to work when the government has done nothing about helping to develop child care programs across this country? They also have capped the CAP for three provinces.

So this child tax credit which presumably is to help solve the problems of child poverty are typical Tory hypocrisy. Are poor kids on welfare less deserving than the children of working parents, I ask you?

The government gives lip service to the elimination of child poverty. However, I want to say that one in four of the children in Vancouver who are poor, and 60 per cent of these attend inner city schools in my riding, will not get help from this budget.

Federal cuts in transfer payments for health, education and social services also eliminate future opportunities for these families to break this poverty cycle.

If this government wants Canadians to feel better about Canada and about Conservatives, then this budget had better be scrapped right now.

As NDP spokesperson for multiculturalism and citizenship, I want to strongly protest the budget measures that are designed to stifle advocacy and advice, that terminate advisory groups to the government, that kills the Court Challenges Program, and that once again betrays Canadians of Japanese origin who were promised a race relations foundation as part of their redress settlement.

• (1540)

Ethnic communities were also promised a heritage language institute to partially compensate for the cuts that this government made to community language programs. They have also been betrayed since the implementation of the new Race Relations Institute which we passed in this house will also be indefinitely postponed.

I want to concentrate my remaining time on the question of the termination of the Court Challenges Program and the Race Relations Foundation. These two decisions show that this government has no real commitment to social justice and to human rights.

When times get tough the government chops the programs that are vital to implementing the goals of our charter. It makes a mockery of the present constitutional negotiations when the government can so readily ignore human rights and protections for minorities which should be defended under our Charter.

I have raised the question of our very serious concern about the termination of the Court Challenges Program on two occasions in this House. On February 27, the minister for multiculturalism replied to me: "There is now a solid base of jurisprudence and the remaining finer points are those of provincial jurisdiction." The federal government is not doing its job. It is going to presume to pass it along to the provinces.

This is not the opinion of the former justice of the Supreme Court, Bertha Wilson, an outstanding judge, who said the following in a recent letter to the Minister of Justice:

> —it is totally illusory to confer rights on people who do not have the means to enforce them and I assumed that the expansion of the Court Challenges Program following the advent of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms was an effort to address this problem.
> I saw for myself when I was a member of the Supreme Court how invaluable this program has been to minority groups and to the disadvantaged. It has clearly been well and efficiently administered and has resulted in an excellent input into many very significant "test" cases—the public has unquestionably received full value for its money on this particular program—may I respectfully add my voice to what I am sure is a chorus of disapproval of the cancellation of this very imaginative and worth-while program.

This is from Bertha Wilson, an outstanding former judge of the Supreme Court.

The Race Relations Foundation was a commitment by this government, as I said earlier, to the redress settlement for the Japanese-Canadian community. Art Miki, president of the National Association of Japanese Canadians says the following:

> Racism is a major concern for many Canadians, especially those from minority groups who are often the victims. There is a grave need for the foundation to facilitate the development, sharing and application of knowledge and expertise in order to achieve the elimination of racism and racial discrimination in Canada. This delay will have serious consequences in our efforts to fight racism.
> It is in these periods that racism becomes more prominent in our society.

He goes on again to appeal to the government to retain its promise and to implement the Race Relations Foundation.

In conclusion, I would like to say that this government's budget policies seem to be trying to out-reform the Reform Party, hoping perhaps to gain votes. A government which attacks the poorest people in society, which refuses to protect the rights of minorities and women, which reneges on its stated priority to fight racism and which continues to work only for the wealthy and privileged is not going to regain the respect and support of Canadians. It will be defeated and soon, we hope.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in the budget debate today. I would like to start by congratulating my colleague, the Minister of Finance, on his firm and clear emphasis in this, his first budget, on reducing the deficit, strengthening Canada's economy and building toward increased prosperity for all Canadians.

This budget reflects the ongoing commitment of a fiscally responsible government to an increasingly competitive Canadian industry within a global economy and a spirit of equity in all sectors of our society.

A number of government initiatives are aimed at expenditure reduction and enhancing competitiveness and prosperity. As Minister of Transport, I am proud to play a role in this respect.

As you know, the Minister of Finance announced a 3 per cent reduction in non-wage operating budgets for 1992-93. Transport Canada and the agencies for which I am responsible will contribute about $14 million, with $9 million directly from Transport Canada, $3.2 million from VIA and $1.6 from Marine Atlantic.

I am glad to say that VIA and Marine Atlantic will continue to reduce their dependence on federal subsidies.

[English]

I might note that reduced revenues from sources such as the air ticket tax in 1992-93, over $100 million, will result in an additional cut in departmental spending beyond the 3 per cent over-all cut.

In order to deal with this revenue shortfall, a combination of measures will be required to reduce or defer costs. As the economy improves, additional revenue will reduce the department's over-all requirement for government funds and permit more capital investment.

To streamline government, some 46 new government agencies, boards, commissions, corporations and advisory bodies will be eliminated, consolidated, deferred or privatized.

In Transport Canada, the ministerial task force on international air policy, the Marine Advisory Board on Research and Development and CN West Indies have been terminated.

Transport Canada will generate savings to management improvements and enhance the government and industry co-operation at the Motor Vehicle Test Centre at Blainville, Quebec. The government will be examining the feasibility of privatizing the centre.

As part of the rationalization of government assets, the government also will be speeding up the pace of surplus property disposal including surplus lands held by Transport Canada at Pickering, Ontario.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, transportation has a very important role to play in Canada's economic recovery. In fact, transportation is what helped build this great country of ours.

Railroads extend from coast to coast. Ships maintain our links with Europe and the countries of the Pacific Rim. Airports move people and goods quickly and efficiently.

As Canadians, we must carefully review our investment in this vital infrastructure.

The Government of Canada is working closely with provincial and territorial governments on ways to meet this very basic challenge.

At the last First Ministers meeting, a number of governments emphasized the importance of having an infrastructure in keeping with our need to be competitive.

As far as our national road network is concerned, a federal-provincial-territorial process has already begun. Transport ministers will be meeting in the fall to discuss various options for financing the improvements needed to bring the network up to contemporary standards. In its 1992 budget, the federal government indicated that we are prepared to work with the provinces on exploring ways to improve our national road network in a way that is financially responsible.

The dialogue on renewing transportation infrastructure in general is already well under way with the provinces. I am confident that our discussions will be useful and help us identify appropriate methods of funding, given the present financial environment; in that way, we might have the monetary resources required for the highway infrastructure that is essential to our country's economic prosperity.

Mr. Speaker, our government is actively committed to establishing a fixed link between New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, with private funding.

Transport Canada also works very closely with the private sector to develop airport facilities while reducing government spending.

At Pearson International Airport, the development and funding of terminal 3 by the private sector are an example of successful co-operation between the private and public sectors.

• (1550)

This very morning, Mr. Speaker, we launched an official request for proposals process, asking the private sector to finance the upgrading of Terminals 1 and 2 and to manage them under a lease.

We are also looking into the possibility of increasing the capacity of Vancouver International Airport, as part of a transfer of this airport to a local airport authority. The transfer agreement includes provisions concerning airside and landside expansions through a private source of funding.

In the coming days, we will proceed with the transfer of Dorval and Mirabel airports in Montreal and the Vancouver, Calgary and Edmonton airports to local airport authorities. Other cities such as Moncton, Quebec, Windsor, Thunder Bay, Winnipeg and Kamloops are also being carefully considered for similar transfers.

As the Minister of Finance said, Canadians know that sound social and economic policies must be complementary.

In this regard, the budget provides several important measures to help disabled Canadians. These measures are part of a national strategy officially launched last September by the Prime Minister, the Right Hon. Brian Mulroney, which provides $158 million to integrate the disabled.

This is a field which interests me greatly. An advisory committee on accessible transportation, representing several organizations of the disabled, is working within my department to advise me specifically on this very important area. Last fall, I was pleased to announce to that committee that Transport Canada, through the government's national strategy, would provide $24.6 million to the transport industry in order to improve accessibility for travellers.

Our involvement in this national strategy will encourage the industry to design and use material that will promote accessibility to transports. The commitment made by Transport Canada will complement the existing initiatives regarding accessibility and will give concrete results that handicapped people will benefit from.

Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that this budget is a responsible one, both from a social and financial perspective. The direction that we have taken is clearly a road toward economic recovery. Canadians can expect an enhanced competitiveness as well as growing prosperity. In spite of what some might say, we are on the road to unity and, together, we will recognize the benefits of a united Canada through co-operation, as well as the sum of all its parts. Prosperity is clearly the result of a concerted effort, not of some irresponsible action to divide the country.

It is together that we will be able to meet all the challenges of the future, and I urge all Canadiens to be united.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to the minister's remarks and I share some of his sentiments toward the Minister of Finance's first budget. I have the highest respect for him.

However, I have concern about the minister's department, transportation, and the effect this budget will have on it.

I want to be very specific. For me the Department of Transport has always been a great anchor for the Canadian presence in every region of our country. The airports and marine ports, all of those instruments which come under the responsibility of this minister, have always been instruments that the national government was able to use to promote tourism and welcome people here from all over the world. Now we are in the process of privatizing these instruments.

I refer specifically to the example the minister used in his remarks, terminals 1 and 2. For the life of me, I cannot understand why we are privatizing terminals 1 and 2 when we just finished spending $140 million of taxpayers' money on them. The market is depressed. I do not know how much money we are going to get for terminals 1 and 2. Terminal 3 right now, according to the owners, is a tremendous financial burden for them. It is not working out, there are law suits all over the place. But I do not want to get into the privatization aspect of this. We can debate it another day.

I need to ask the minister a very specific question. Does he not think that as we dismantle the Canadian presence in every part of this country that it is going to make it much more difficult to sell the idea of Canada as a whole, when all of those federal presence instruments are being ripped away from us or sold? Does he not think it is going to make his job as a federalist to sell Canada more difficult?

Mr. Corbeil: Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for his concern about the unity of this country and the job that we all share as members of this House and also as Canadians to assure that this country remains united. We have accomplished a lot over the last 125 years despite our diversity and our weaknesses in some respects and our strengths in other respects.

I think that Transport Canada, through its various institutions and facilities, has greatly contributed to the achievements that we have attained over the past 125 years.

I believe we are still very much involved in maintaining this very valuable relationship between all regions of Canada through the facilities of Transport Canada. However, at the same time, we have to face up to the reality that we have accumulated a very high national debt over the years and that we are living through a very difficult period where we are wrestling to reduce the enormous annual deficit. Because Canadians have indicated in many areas that they are not prepared to accept any more taxes, that they have reached their limit, we therefore have to find ways and methods of doing what we have to do with less financial resources.

Therefore, we have to be more inventive, more innovative. This is what we have been doing over the past few years. For instance, this idea of leasing the airports to local airport authorities is one way we can maintain our presence. Transport Canada is not going to abandon the airports, it will retain its responsibility for safety and security and will therefore maintain a very strong presence. But at the same time we will leave to the commercial enterprises what they do best, which is operating the commercial aspect of the airport.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I too want to pay tribute to the Minister of Finance on his first budget, not only because it is a budget which he gave in eminently fine style and content but also because he is the first westerner to present a budget to this House in almost living memory, as far as I can trace it back. In recent memory he is the first westerner to present a budget. I am proud to be associated with him and to say that he has done westerners proud in presenting it.

As I reflect on budget night, I would draw members' attention to the reality of the experience. It is a bit of theatre, a bit of a show outside the Chamber. We have scrum upon scrum, where television personalities and interviewers are interviewing all the interest groups that come to Ottawa on the evening when the budget is presented.

It seems as though our narcissistic society reads the budget, almost exclusively, almost entirely in the context of their own immediate sphere of self-interest.

• (1600)

If fishermen are not specifically mentioned in the budget then there is nothing in it for fishermen, even though the benefits of previous budgets are still continuing on to this day. If there is not something in it for this day, then there is nothing in it for fishermen. If it is not quite to the expectations of the business community, if the tax cuts are not quite as big or quite as broad as they would like, then it is not a good budget and it has to be roundly condemned. If labour sees it as not having enough input in the responses, then it is not a good budget and it is rejected holus bolus.

It is a bit of a tragedy that we are treated on that night with an instantaneous appraisal of a very complex document and it is supposed to be accepted or rejected on the spur of the moment on the basis of a person's own self-interest.

I recall watching it that evening. They are walking down the corridor to meet another businessman whose name I think all members here would recognize if I mentioned it. He is in an industry that is under a great deal of competitive pressure and is a very heavily taxed industry. As I say, people would recognize his name if I mentioned it.

So I said to him: "What do you think of the budget tonight?" Immediately he said: "Well, it is doing nothing for me but it is good for Canada". You can imagine my pleasure, the tonic it was for me, to have one businessman who could have justifiably looked for some kind of relief in this budget for his particular industry, yet he said it did nothing for him but it was good for Canada. Surely we can use a lot more of that in our country.

So I say this is refreshing. It is refreshing because he saw that this budget contained a reaffirmation of the values that have made Canada the great country that it is today, some very important values. First of all, let me quote from a report. Since most members would not want me to quote from a government document, I presume, I will quote Deloitte & Touche. There is a reaffirmation of values and it has to do with minimum intrusiveness. Listen to what the commentary says:

> Resisting the entreaties of the provinces and special interest groups for quick-fix spending to jolt the economy out of its lethargy, finance minister Donald Mazankowski has repeated the message of his predecessor, restrain costs, cut the deficit and some day soon a reduction in the government debt will be the result.

He goes on to say:

> Sound policies for times of economic uncertainties is one way of briefly describing finance minister Mazankowski's maiden budget speech. After last year's tough-minded budget with its extension of expenditure control to five years, tax increases and wage freezes, this year's speech seems like a relatively cheery affair. In essence though, it hides a frugal government's spending program behind fiscal goodies which sound expansive but which will not over-stimulate the economy.

The key sentence is this.

> Full marks to the minister for a politically astute budget with minimum intrusive effects on the economy.

All of us know that whenever a budget is brought down, you cannot avoid intrusiveness in the economy. The trick is to bring down a budget that minimizes that intrusiveness. That is something which I think the business community values and is very important.

The second value that is important is it is a budget to enhance competitiveness in our economy. Taxes are meant to increase revenue for the government to carry on its programs. That is the their purpose. I think that is a fairly accurate truism. But if the taxes become too high, they become a disincentive to business and the very purpose of those taxes is frustrated because the more taxes imposed on people, the more it creates a disincentive to function. Rather than increase the revenues it tends to decrease the revenues and makes businesses uncompetitive.

By reducing taxes, by improving the capital cost allowances to industry, by improving the benefits to industry if it carries on R and D and by reducing the surtax, the budget is increasing the competitiveness of the business community. Already we have heard the business community across Canada give approval to that. There is increased competitiveness and that is a value for Canadian society.

Third, there was an increase in consultation. It has been a pattern with our ministers of finance to carry on consultations across Canada with all interest groups that would be affected by a budget. Historically the Minister of Finance or his officials meet with one particular group. Whether it is a manufacturing sector, the agricultural sector, the labour sector or the social housing sector, they meet with them independently of each other and hear what their views are. This time they added a new process and put numbers of these together in a room. When one interest group was asking for one provision, it was balanced off with another interest group in the same room saying: "Wait a minute, guess what you will do to me if we introduce that provision".

There was not only an increase in the amount of consultation but an increase in the intensity of that consultation. It was a pre-budget consultation. It was a face-to-face consultation. It pitted one interest group against the other so that we would reduce it to what it ought to be. It was very important.

These are the values largely on the business side. Then there are those which are on the social side. We have heard it said many times that the purpose of a good economy is to spread the benefits to those who may have less advantage.

I would like to focus on the fact that this budget re-establishes and focuses on the integrity of the family unit. Already I have received mail from people who have said: "I am glad this Minister of Finance has recognized, for example, that previous budgets have been prejudiced against the traditional family unit".

Mr. Karygiannis: How many? One, two?

Mr. Friesen: I have received some. The public is slow in responding but it is responding. It is encouraging when people write and say: "You are recognizing the strong historic values and the place of the family in our society". This budget does that in addition to the fact that we carry on the child care programs.

Finally I want to mention that the next step is that provinces are now going to bring in their budgets. While there is slack which our Minister of Finance has introduced into the tax regime, such slack as reducing the surtax, I would urge or I would challenge provincial governments not to take up that slack and impose that extra tax by way of the provincial treasuries. I challenge my own province of British Columbia which is bringing down its budget in about two weeks' time to resist that temptation. Whereas the Minister of Finance here has relieved the tax burden on businesses and individuals, I urge the provincial Minister of Finance not to pick up that slack and impose from the provincial side a tax burden on our people.

I compliment the Minister of Finance on a budget that has been well received across Canada. I know it will be a stimulus to our economy and our people.

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, I could not help but listen to the member give us a great big speech about how he admires the budget that was brought down by the minister. I, on the other hand, did not see anything good about the budget.

I received hundreds of letters from my constituents. I received just as many telephones calls from my constituents. They are asking for one thing: get some sense back into the budget and, if not, why doesn't this government not resign or why doesn't it call an election?

One thing the hon. member did not talk about is something that is very sensitive to me as a member of Parliament from Toronto. I am referring to what was in the paper today: "Ottawa seeks private tenders on two Pearson terminals". We have seen what this government did when it came to power in 1984. It took CN Express which was losing money. Then it gave it away and privatized it. It was sold for $29 million. What did the people who inherited this white elephant do? They went to the bank and they said: "Mr. Banker, we want to borrow some money". The bank looked it over and said: "Don't worry about it. We are going to give you close to $200 million on the land and on the assets of the company".

• (1610)

What was the end result? These people who took over this institution which was in existence since 1930 drove it into bankruptcy. Hundreds of employees, some 3,700 employees, were let go. Their pension funds were dealt in and we saw charges by the RCMP.

I am questioning whether this will be the same situation. It states that 3,200 jobs would be created. Now I am questioning myself on how the privatization of two terminals would create 3,200 jobs. The real answer is that it is not going to create 3,200 jobs. The other thing is—

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Karygiannis: I have five minutes, five minutes for questions and comments.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Yes, but if you want an answer you will have to conclude your question.

Mr. Karygiannis: I will put my question. After Canadian taxpayers spent millions of dollars on renovations to terminal 1 and terminal 2, doesn't the member across the way agree with me that they are going to give the two terminals away to some consortium only to benefit themselves? They are going to give these two terminals away to some consortium that supported the Conservatives during their first and second election bids.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, in answer to your question to the member, no, he does not want an answer. He wants to make a speech. That is all right. I do not mind that.

The first part of his question dealt with the budget and spoke to the fact that I was so enthusiastic about it. I simply point out to him that I was talking to one of his own colleagues a day or two later. I met him in one of the buildings here. It was during Question Period and I said: "Listen, aren't you going to go down there and harangue the Minister of Finance on his budget?" He said: "No, I am not going to do that. That was a good budget". That was one of his own colleagues so he had better confer with his colleagues and maybe get a second opinion about the budget.

The second part was about the airport. He asked: "Are you going to privatize this and let individual people benefit from it?" Tell me, what is the market system all about? Is it a crime to make a profit? Is this the new philosophy of the Liberal Party, that if it is government owned people will not benefit, but if it is privately owned people will benefit? It seems to me that the beauty of the market system in North America is that everybody benefits if the market system works properly. Why would the member be against that?

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut]

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to speak in today's budget debate. The February 25 budget was really a "do–little" budget. After several years of big budget takes from taxpayers, the government's most recent budget gives a little but only a little. What it gives is so small the impact will be negligible, especially in my own constituency.

The budget provides some small assistance to mining companies, but the measures will, according to the Yukon Chamber of Mines, only benefit existing mines. There is no major boost to stimulate the exploration which is really needed in the north. Since the Canadian Exploration Incentive Program was cancelled by this current government in February 1990, mining exploration levels in the north have dropped substantially. The high Canadian dollar has also affected exploration levels.

In 1988, when the flow–through share incentive was in place, about $50 million in exploration was done in Yukon. Last year only $16 million was spent. This year the Chamber of Mines expects to see only about $5 million or $6 million spent in exploration.

In the Northwest Territories the outlook is similar. Small exploration companies could have used a break. For small business at least there are no tax increases.

There is a small increase in a lending program for small business, but it is really nothing significant. In the Northwest Territories there were 13 more bankruptcies in 1991 than there were in 1990. Now, 13 may not seem like a lot, but in the Northwest Territories one has to understand that there are not as many businesses as there would be down here.

Throughout Canada, and particularly in northern Canada, we were looking for a major commitment to infrastructure and we did not get it. In fact the federal Minister of Northern Affairs in media interviews following the release of the budget ruled out a major commitment to northern infrastructure because it would be too expensive. He said high costs in the north make it hard for the federal government to justify spending big amounts of money on northern transportation. That attitude merely demonstrates the shortsightedness of this current federal government.

Without the necessary basic infrastructure, the economies of the territories do not have a chance of becoming self-sufficient.

To paraphrase a former Conservative finance minister, the short-term pain of investing now in the north would bring long-term gain to all of Canada. High costs are a fact of life in northern Canada. The federal government must be prepared to deal with these costs so that northern Canada can be dealt into the Canadian economy as a contributing partner. The longer the federal government waits, the higher the infrastructure costs will become.

The north's infrastructure needs are not going to go away. They will only increase with time. By taking action now this government could reduce future costs.

I hope the government is not waiting for a northern megaproject in the belief that private enterprise will do what the government is not prepared to do for northerners. The north does not want a megaproject economy. It does not want a boom and bust economy. The north wants a community based, diversified economy, but it is getting no help from this federal government.

I hope the government is not waiting for the settlement of the TFN land claim in the hope that the settlement moneys will be used to address some of the needs it is currently ignoring. The land claim settlement is an obligation to Inuit over and above what the regular federal obligations are to all northerners.

When the leader of the Government of the Northwest Territories spoke at the First Ministers' conference on the economy last month, she pointed out that the employment rate in the Northwest Territories has dropped by 3 per cent since 1989. Spending in the NWT has fallen 15 per cent since 1989. She pointed out that a federal commitment to the north infrastructure would mean not only more jobs for northerners but jobs for people in southern Canada as well.

A Conference Board of Canada study has estimated that for every job created in the north another 1.7 jobs are created elsewhere to support it.

All Canadians would benefit from increased federal investment in the north.

Members of the government would have us believe there is a significant tax cut in this budget. That is hardly the case. First of all, the cut is to the federal surtax which is a tax the Conservative government imposed on top of the basic federal income tax. Basic federal income taxes are not cut in this budget. The surtax will be reduced by 1 per cent on July 1 and it will be reduced by a further 1 per cent on January 1, 1993. Over an 11-month period the surtax will be reduced from its current level of 5 per cent to 3 per cent.

We appreciate this tax relief even though it is minimal, but we have not forgotten that there was no surtax before the Conservatives came to power. The government wants people to be grateful that the surtax is being reduced from 5 per cent to 3 per cent. The people know that next January they will still be paying a federal surtax of 3 per cent, a tax they did not pay before this government was elected. They know that this tax is just one of a total of 33 tax increases, including the GST, imposed on them by the Conservatives since they came to power in 1984.

Look at the actual savings to taxpayers of the surtax reduction. A table on page 135 of the government's own budget papers sets out the impact of the surtax reduction. The biggest benefits go to those who earn the most.

For example, a single taxpayer earning $15,000 a year now pays $66 in surtax. That individual's surtax will be reduced by $7 in 1992 and $27 in 1993. A single taxpayer earning $75,000 now pays $966 in surtax. That individual's surtax will be reduced by $80 in 1992 and $318 in 1993.

A one-earner couple with two children earning $40,000 a year will have their surtax reduced by $27 in 1992 and $110 in 1993. A one-earner couple with two children earning $75,000 a year will have their surtax reduced by $74 in 1992 and $297 in 1993.

A $7 reduction for the single person earning $15,000 and a $27 reduction for a couple with two children earning $40,000 is peanuts in my constituency. Seven dollars is just slightly more than the price of a litre of milk in most communities in my riding. Seven dollars does not buy very much in the major cities of southern Canada, but it buys far, far less in remote northern communities.

My constituents pay twice and three times as much as southern Canadians for basic goods, including groceries. The surtax reduction is better than no reduction at all, but it is not as good as no surtax at all. Its impact on low income earners in general is minimal and its impact on low income earners in the north is next to nothing.

Working Canadians and their employers are also paying more this year in unemployment insurance premiums. On July 1, 1991 the employee rate was increased from $2.25 to $2.80 per $100 of insurable earnings.

In January of this year, the employee rate was further increased to $3 and the employer rate was set at $4.20. The increase in the premium rate amounts to an additional $1 per week for employees whose insurable earnings are $26,000. Such employees will actually pay more for their premiums this year than they will get back under the surtax reduction.

Potential home buyers now have the opportunity to use their RRSPs to purchase a home. This is basically a good idea, and it was suggested by the Leader of the Opposition long before the budget was tabled by the Minister of Finance. However there are problems with this proposal as well. This plan runs only for a year and only benefits those who have RRSPs. Only those people who are working are in a position to contemplate buying a home.

How many of the 1.5 million unemployed Canadians will this plan benefit? How many northerners will this plan benefit? This proposal will only benefit those who live in areas where there is a housing market. This may seem self-evident in southern Canada where housing markets are taken for granted, but throughout most of northern Canada there is no housing to buy.

A severe housing crisis exists in the north. Affordability is an issue, but availability is a major problem. With the exception of a few larger communities there is no private housing market. The housing shortage results in overcrowding. Houses in the NWT are more crowded than in the rest of Canada. They are more crowded in the eastern Arctic than in the rest of the NWT. Since private housing is not affordable or available, social housing is the only alternative for many people.

Two weeks ago the Inuit Tapirisat of Canada made an excellent submission to the House of Commons aboriginal affairs committee on the issue of housing. It pointed out that in the eastern Arctic social housing cost-shared by the federal government is the only option available to the 80 per cent of the population who do not have housing provided by an employer.

Housing conditions in the north are nowhere near housing conditions in southern Canada. Funding currently provided for housing in the north is not sufficient to bring northern housing to the level of southern housing. The social housing budget for the north must be increased.

Yet, in the federal budget, the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation was cut back. The growth in social housing expenditures will be limited to 3 per cent through to 1997. In 1990 $91 million was available for new units. The government has reduced that amount to $70 million in 1992-93 and to $45 million in subsequent years until 1996. This amounts to a cut of over 50 per cent in just three years.

In addition this government has eliminated the co-operative housing program. These cuts are occurring despite the fact that CMHC's social housing budget currently reaches only 6 per cent of Canadians and 15 per cent of Canadians, over one million people, are still in need of social housing.

The increase in the child care deduction will benefit some people, which is good. However, the deduction only benefits those who are paying income tax and the more someone earns the more value it has for them.

Women not currently working outside the home will not benefit from this and their opportunities to work outside the home were not increased by this budget.

The budget did nothing to alleviate the serious shortage in day care spaces throughout the north and the whole of Canada. A severe day care space shortage exists in the north. There are no measures in the budget to alleviate this shortage. Despite repeated promises by the current Conservative government to provide more child care spaces, this budget has proved that these promises are dead. There will be no national day care program. The Minister of Health and Welfare has confirmed this. Once again we have broken promises.

This budget provides no hope for the unemployed. There is no job creation and the budget itself projects that unemployment levels will remain high.

The Northwest Territories is currently in a financial squeeze. The NWT government is cutting back because the federal government has cut its transfers to the territorial government. Unemployment is rising and this budget provides no help. This budget provides no hope for the poor and the hungry.

A couple of weeks ago a 41-year old single mother from Baker Lake in my constituency took it upon herself to raise money for the poor and hungry of her community. Baker Lake has a population of about 1,200 and an unemployment rate of about 85 per cent. Susan Toolooktook walked 50 miles through freezing temperatures, minus 38 degrees, and endured a blizzard which turned her planned three day journey into a week's journey. She raised more than $2,000. Donations have apparently not only come from the residents of Baker Lake and other NWT communities but from Vancouver, Toronto, Saskatchewan and elsewhere.

She said that she did it for the less fortunate because the costs of basic necessities such as food and hunting supplies is often too high for most people. She said that she did it for the people who sometimes do not have any food to feed their children, for those who can never find jobs, and for those who are actually working but are finding it hard to buy the things they need to keep alive or the equipment necessary for hunting because they are too expensive.

In this community some children and their parents go to bed hungry. It saddens me to say it, but hunger is a fact of life for many children and people throughout the north.

I would like to quote a document that was adopted by the United Nations on November 20, 1989, entitled: "Your Rights as Children of the World". It says that one of those rights is the right to adequate nutrition, shelter and medical care. Our Prime Minister was one of the signatories of this document.

I want to recognize Susan Toolooktook for her courage and caring. I wish the federal government cared half as much as she does.

Just before Christmas the Prime Minister ratified the document I just quoted, the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of the Child. That declaration says that children should not go hungry. That declaration is being contravened in our very own country.

Canada must live up to its commitments in that declaration by eradicating the hunger and poverty in our midst.

• (1630)

The government's proposed new child benefits package could be a start in that direction. It is supposed to come into effect in January 1993. The Minister of National Health and Welfare will be discussing implementation of this benefit with his provincial and territorial counterparts and other interested parties. I will reserve judgment on the real value of this benefit until more details are available.

I do want to say that I regret that a national day care program was the government's price for this package. I am sorry the day care program was sacrificed because I believe that the children of Canada and their mothers need more child care support as well as increased child benefits. It is too bad the government made these issues into an either-or situation.

Major changes are needed to the formula financing transfer payments to the territorial governments. However, this budget did not announce any changes and that is rather disappointing. Two years ago the federal government imposed a new financing arrangement on the territories reducing funding to them and the consequences are unfair.

Under the formula, the Government of the Northwest Territories loses $1.20 for every dollar it raises. This is clearly regressive and the Government of the Northwest Territories is currently negotiating with the federal government seeking adjustments to the formula.

Recently the federal government announced increases to the transfer payments to the provinces. I urge this government to be as forthcoming with the territories.

Green plan funding has suffered another set-back in this budget. The original green plan program announced in December 1990 was funded by $3 billion over five years.

In last year's budget the government decided to spread that funding over six years instead of five. This year's budget reduces the green plan by $150 million over the next two years, although the government does say that it will spend that money later. Given this government's record of broken promises, why should we believe it? There are also cuts to the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs and other areas, such as education.

Mr. Speaker, I thank you for your indulgence in allowing me to say what I have to say.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment my colleague on his summary of the budget and his comments on those areas adversely affected in his region of the Northwest Territories, the eastern Arctic, Iqaluit.

The government is always challenging this side of the House saying that we only criticize and never put forward ideas about how to improve the situation or make it better. We are constantly putting forward ideas on this side of the House but it seems that they always fall on deaf ears. That can be the frustration of having ideas in opposition.

However, one of the areas that I think even the government would not refute is that of tourism. Tourism is one area that can galvanize this country. It is one area that can give us back the feeling of dignity and pride as Canadians that we need to have so desperately in this country. I do not care what region you are from, that is an essential requirement today because of the economic disaster that touches all of us and tends to depress us.

The area that my colleague comes from is one of the environmental heavens of the planet. It has a potential for environmental tourism beyond imagination. I would like to ask my colleague if he feels that the government was once again negligent in not paying attention to that potential to not only promote spirit and pride but also to generate more foreign exchange which would improve the quality of life for Canadians in the north and make us all feel proud of the nation as a whole.

I wonder if my colleague could comment on the environmental tourism potential which the government has ignored?

Mr. Anawak: I would just like to say one thing before I get on to explaining how we can benefit from a tourism marketing strategy by this government. That is, it does not really help us very much in our tourism potential when every day for two and one-half months we have 24 hours of sunlight and the Minister of the Environment is telling us that we should be telling our kids to stay inside. That basically tells us that we should stay inside our house for two and one-half months, during the best two and one-half months of the whole year.

In terms of potential for the north, it is there. We have national parks, bird sanctuaries, great fishing, sports hunting and specialized tours in the north. However, there have been some problems in the last three or four years where the tourism potential has been severely cut back because of measures that were introduced in terms of the GST and others and the high cost of travel in the north.

When you add whatever taxes have been added since the time this government has been in power, that travel has been severely restricted. I know, because before I got elected as a member of Parliament I used to operate a tourism company in my hometown of Rankin Inlet.

We used to have people coming up from southern Ontario. We had people from the Federation of Ontario Naturalists. We had people coming by VIA Rail from Winnipeg. We had people coming from Horizon Tours. We had people coming through Fiesta Holidays.

But in the last few few years we have not had that. People are not travelling as much because of the high cost of travel and because of the imposition of further taxes either on the fare itself or the increase in fare because of having to pay more for the services, gas, or whatever to operate the trains or planes and whatnot.

I thank my colleague for asking that question because the potential is there. I know it, he knows it and I am sure that most of my colleagues on this side of the House know it because we were in Iqaluit for a caucus meeting.

I invite any member of this House to come to Whitehorse next week for the Arctic winter games. I cannot remember the exact date, but I urge members from this side of the House and the other side to come to Whitehorse and see the Arctic winter games as well as to contribute to the economy of the north.

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to participate in the debate today on the federal budget for 1992. I am pleased with the concrete measures that were announced and with the realistic approach of this budget.

Allow me to congratulate the Minister of Finance. This budget shows once again that the minister listens to the people, is aware of the economic difficulties that Canadians must face and, above all, uses imagination and a realistic approach to come up with solutions which, in the short and medium term, will accelerate economic recovery and restore public confidence.

• (1640)

I also want to point out the excellent work done by the previous Minister of Finance. Indeed, starting in 1984, that minister took initiatives that now enable the government to take positive measures. Today, more than ever before, I am convinced that we were right in defending an economic recovery plan aimed at controlling government expenses and, therefore, the deficit once and for all.

Mr. Speaker, like any Canadian family, the government cannot use credit forever. It is easy to always borrow more; in fact it is a lot easier than to take unpopular measures.

But there comes a time when you have to pay your bills. That time came in 1984 when we formed the government. The situation in public finances was appalling. The federal government was simply living above its means.

However, thanks to very tight controls and sound management practices since 1984, our government was able to announce a tax reduction in this budget. This is certainly very good news for everybody. Moreover, this tax reduction is not reckless borrowing or passing on the debt to others, but rather a rigorous control of the government administration. Once again, we succeed by cutting government expenditures; the salaries for the Prime Minister and cabinet members were reduced by 5 per cent, those of all members of Parliament were frozen; we eliminated, consolidated, deferred or privatized a total of 46 government agencies; we cut operating costs in various departments, etc.

We are also tightening our belts and we require government services to do the same, making sure however that service to the public is not affected.

I now come to an important part of the budget, the family assistance programs. I am one of those who believes that families form the social fabric of our society and that we should do everything possible to help them.

I was among those who appealed to the Minister of Finance to take the necessary steps in order to do away with the injustice which prevailed for many years because married couples with children and unmarried couples with children were not subject to the same taxation.

In the present budget, the minister recognized our demand and corrected that situation. From now on, all couples, married or not, will be treated equally.

This certainly shows how high a priority we place on families from Quebec and from all over Canada. However, the commendable initiatives of the Minister of Finance did not stop there. He announced a complete restructuring of the family allowance and child tax credit systems so that parents will now receive a single non-taxable monthly benefit of up to $144.

This is certainly good news for low income families because it represents an increase of the annual amount they receive and furthermore, they will get their money monthly. They will no longer have to wait for weeks before they can use it and they can budget accordingly.

On that same subject, and in accordance with our government's policy regarding assistance to families, the child care expense deduction has been raised significantly.

This measure will help traditional families but will also greatly help the one parent families. In that area, there is a fact that no one can deny; most single parent families are headed by women. Many of them have the total responsibility for the education of the children and for all other parental activities. A study published in the papers on February 24 showed that poverty strikes hard at many one parent families that, in most, cases have a young woman at their head.

During the 1980s, the number of one parent families skyrocketed in Canada. At the last census, there were 252,680 single parent families in Quebec; that is 21 per cent of all families with children. What is most troubling is that in 1989, in Quebec, 40 per cent of the families headed by a woman were considered poor. Our government is very conscious of those social problems and the changes in fiscal deductions are certainly proof of that. Also, a great many families hope to buy their first house, again, it is often in order to find a better environment for bringing up children. The purchase of a home is, for the majority of people, the most important investment of their lives. Sometimes though, they need help if their dream is to come true. That is the purpose of our home buyer's plan which allows the owners of a RRSP to withdraw up to $20,000 from it in order to buy their first house.

This initiative certainly helps families, but it also fulfils another purpose, that is revive the home building industry. As they say in French—"Quand le bâtiment va, tout va". If we give those who own a RRSP the possibility to use it for that specific purpose, we will encourage job creation in a number of home-building related industries; we will stimulate the building industry itself and we will contribute to a quick and sustained recovery of the economy.

On budget night this announcement was welcomed enthusiastically by everyone. I am sure the results will be visible soon and will have a positive impact throughout the country.

Canadians want to work, but we cannot make it happen by creating a paper recovery, a recovery based on injecting borrowed money into the economy. What we need is a real recovery, not an artificial one, and I am very confident about the measures contained in this budget.

In addition to helping the construction industry and families, the government has also tabled proposals to help business. The capital cost allowance rate has been raised from 25 to 30 per cent, and $230 million in new money will be committed to research and development. The ceiling for loans under the Small Business Loans Act has been increased to $200,000, and business owners who are temporarily in financial difficulty will be able to obtain financing more easily.

To meet international competition as we enter the 21st century, businesses must be able to purchase the most technically advanced equipment available in order to produce high quality goods at the lowest possible cost.

Having been Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Science and Technology from 1987 to 1991, I can appreciate the importance of investing in more efficient machinery. This budget will make it possible to meet this fundamental requirement. The positive impact of these measures, Mr. Speaker, is a foregone conclusion. If small businesses improve their cash flow, sooner or later they will be able to expand and create new jobs. That is the recipe for genuine economic recovery—not a paper or artificial recovery but a genuine, sound and, above all, durable recovery.

This budget is realistic. While its ultimate goal remains reducing the deficit, which is undeniably the answer to all our problems, the budget has taken an innovative approach and proposes specific measures directed at all Canadians. We did not want to play favourites. We included everyone. This budget is fair to all Canadians. The Minister of Finance should take a bow. This is a serious and realistic budget and a perfect response to the challenges Canada must meet.

Mr. Speaker, I intend to vote for these budgetary measures, and I say so with great enthusiasm.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): When the member talks about this budget being a fair budget, and she went through a list of some of the things that this budget will do, we should be very careful not to mislead Canadians. Most of the budget measures the member talked about really do not kick in until 1993. I had some people come in to my constituency all excited about this family plan which by and large I think is pretty good. But you must tell them that it is not until 1993. You have to be careful that you are not creating a false expectation there.

• (1650)

My question has to do with the people who are unemployed, the 1.5 million who we still have recorded and the other two million who are on welfare or some other form of social assistance. The problem that I have when I listen to members of the government is they tend to pat the Minister of Finance on the back and pat themselves on the back for this great budget. There are parts of the budget that I think are responsible and I will give them that. But we keep forgetting in this House that we are not here to look out for those people who are advantaged. We are here to look out for those who are disadvantaged. I, for the life of me, cannot find what good or what specific program in this budget will help the three million people who are out of work.

I would like the hon. member to tell me what she says to her constituents who are unemployed, are on welfare or social assistance and how this budget will help them.

[Translation]

Mrs. Duplessis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this question from my hon. colleague opposite, the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood. I want to tell him that Canadians who are unemployed or on welfare can place great hopes in this budget because it provides strong foundations for recovery.

We have taken several initiatives since 1984, including an increased emphasis on training so that people are better qualified to take up new jobs, be it in high-tech areas or elsewhere. We have asked our industries to improve their productivity and facilitated their achievement of this goal. We have also facilitated the emergence of new high tech-businesses, supported the pharmaceutical sector as well as research and taken steps such as creating excellence centres to ensure the immediate communication of research results across the country.

We have taken all kinds of steps, including some regarding financial matters to facilitate a number of things, thus laying strong foundations on which to build the future so that, in the years ahead, Canadians can compete internationally and globally.

My colleague says that we pat ourselves on the back for this great budget. Personally, Mr. Speaker, I must say that I do find it excellent because we listened carefully to Canadians. We carried out public consultations and Canadians have asked for the following. They want realistic, lasting solutions to our economic problems, not quick fixes. They want us to cut the deficit. They want government streamlined and made less wasteful. They want opportunities to improve their skills. They want steps taken to ensure that our social programs meet their basic needs. Most of all, they want a renewed basis for confidence.

So here is what we have done. We have substantially reduced the deficit. We are cutting spending and taxes. We will restructure and streamline the operations of government. We will increase support for research and development. We will reduce the tax burden for the manufacturing and processing sectors. We will help small business. We will simplify and substantially enrich our support programs for families and children. We will assist Canadians with registered retirement savings plans to buy a home. We will increase our support for Canadians with disabilities.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry for interrupting, but the five minutes are up.

[English]

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, it is a real pleasure to participate in the debate here today on the budget and to speak on behalf of the people of Macleod.

It is an important debate on an important budget. This budget is consistent. It is realistic. It is sensible and, above all, it is fair.

I would like to touch on each of these points. I would also like to discuss how this budget affects the people in the province of Alberta and the people in the constituency of Macleod which I serve.

The first thing to note about the budget is its consistency. Perhaps this was the most difficult budget for this government since it was elected in 1984. We know some Canadians, we heard this from a small minority, called on the government to abandon its policy of fiscal restraint. They asked for higher government spending at the expense of a higher deficit. They wanted to shift greater costs on to the shoulders of our children.

They were a vocal and a sadly misguided minority. They did not speak for a majority of sensible Canadians. A majority of Canadians asked the government to maintain the fight against the deficit.

I met with many constituents in the months prior to the budget. They told me above anything else to continue the fight against the deficit. Certainly a majority of my constituents want the government to continue with its policy of fiscal restraint. In this way, the budget is fully consistent with the fiscal prudence of the seven previous Progressive Conservative national budgets.

Not only is the budget consistent, but it is also realistic. It does not offer the quick fix or shortcuts to prosperity that some would have us provide. Some would have us believe that is possible. History proves that just is not possible. It just does not work. The reality is that Canada's debt is over $400 billion. The reality is that the budget deficit will be down to $27.5 billion in 1992-93 and dropping year by year after that. The reality is that the Government of Canada should no longer need to borrow money after the mid-1990s. My constituents continue to encourage the government to look for ways to reduce spending. They know that increased spending means increased deficit and increased taxes. They find that to be unacceptable. They know that reduced spending means a reduced deficit. This budget responds to those concerns. A $1 billion cut in spending in this budget for 1992–93 is a realistic response to the needs of the country today.

The budget is also realistic because it is sensitive to Canada's current economic situation. It provides a framework for a lasting recovery.

The Minister of Finance had to deal with these realities in preparing this budget. In the face of very difficult economic times, he has done very well, just as those of us from Alberta would have expected.

The budget is sensible. It offers some sensible solutions to the problems that Canada faces today. For example, on the question of streamlining of government, small business people in my riding tell me, and I know from having been a business person before getting into public life, there is just too much red tape in the dealings with the federal government. I know that all other members in the House will have heard that as well. The sensible thing to do is to streamline. Cut duplication and make government more efficient and easier to deal with for business people. The budget takes those steps. Those are sensible steps.

It makes it easier for small business to deal with government. It makes it easier for small business people to stay in business and to contribute to creating new jobs, new economic opportunities and leading the way to economic recovery.

This is a fair budget. It gives taxpayers a break through a reduction in the income surtax. Every Canadian taxpayer benefits. Across the board cuts ensures that all Canadians are treated fairly.

The budget also addresses an area of fairness which I have been concerned with for some time, the treatment of families under the tax system. Many people in my riding of Macleod wanted this situation changed. They felt that it was unfair that the traditional family unit was being penalized by the tax systems.

• (1700)

Many other members of my caucus from Alberta also realize the unfairness of the situation. A caucus committee was formed and under the guidance of my colleague the member for Calgary North, a series of recommendations were made this past autumn. This is from the family caucus. The finance minister listened and made some of the recommendations aspects of the budget we are currently debating. Fairness has been restored in this area.

This is another good example. People often ask how one member of Parliament can have any positive impact on the Government of Canada. Well, here is a good example. Members of the Alberta caucus are effective representatives of our province and as chair of the Alberta caucus, I am proud of our contributions to this budget. I thank the Minister of Finance, who happens to come from Vegreville, for having listened to his colleagues from Alberta.

He has also listened to all Canadians. The budget is the product of consultation over a period of months. Albertans as well as Canadians from other provinces played a very important role in those consultations. The finance minister travelled across the country and he listened.

As well, I worked in my constituency listening to the people from Macleod. I heard many suggestions in phone calls and letters I received daily. As you might imagine, the people of Macleod are more than willing to offer useful advice, something that is true, I am sure, in all other constituencies. I took that advice and I passed it along to the minister. The minister listened and this is the result.

What did I hear? I have touched on some of the points already, but let me just hit the highlights. The people of Macleod told me that above all else, continue the fight against the deficit. They want this government to stand firm and not give in to pressure to increase spending at the cost of a higher deficit. They want realistic solutions. They realize there are no quick fixes, no shortcuts to facing the economic problems we have.

Albertans have asked for a leaner, more responsive federal government. In fact, it is true that they have asked for the same thing from provincial governments as well. The federal government is listening and we are working hard on that.

People want a government that does more with less. Small business people tell me there is too much red tape and duplication when dealing with the federal government. The budget responds to all of these concerns.

What are people saying about this? Here is one example. A businessman from Lundbreck, Alberta sent me a fax shortly after the budget came out. It read: "I am very pleased to see the budget highlights. It is exactly what we had hoped for in the direction it has taken. Keep up the good work".

The Calgary Chamber of Commerce issued a news release that read in part: "There are some good signs of leadership in today's budget, such as no tax increases. A decrease in the surtax, a child tax credit increase of $1,000, a capital cost allowance increase from 25 to 30 per cent for manufacturing and processing equipment and a $20,000 RRSP homeowner loan are all conducive to mildly stimulating spending. The 5 per cent rollback in minister's salaries, although modest in dollar terms, is also symbolically important".

Mr. Speaker, I know that my time here is quickly coming to a close, but I want to let you and all members of the House know that I stand firmly behind this budget. I believe it has come about as a result of thorough consultation with Canadians. It is contributing to a stronger economy. It is contributing to the recovery of the economy in Canada and it continues to supply the kind of leadership this country needs.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the member from Alberta who praised his fellow colleague, the finance minister, on his budget.

I have spoken several times during this budget debate and I have to say that I cannot praise it. I have been here a long time and the Minister of Finance has been in this House a long time. I heard him, when he sat on this side of the House, criticizing budgets.

I am sure he understands why we have to criticize this minister's budget. There is nothing in it for ordinary Canadians.

The ordinary Canadian today is looking at Parliament and asking what goes on here. Why is this not a flexible enough institution to deal with the every day problems that are afflicting ordinary Canadians' every day lives.

I say that because he talked about fairness. Where is the fairness to the unemployed? Where is the fairness to the small businesses that are going under daily across Canada? Where is the fairness in that there are no new incentives to create jobs?

There is no extra money to go into research and development and this country needs so much of that. We have all the expertise.

Let us look at fishing. We have over-capacity, we are told by the Minister of Fisheries, onshore and in the water. Yet we allow the foreigners to come in within our 200-mile limit when the jobs are there onshore to handle that fish.

There is nothing to put a new direction into the marketing of that fish. If the foreigners can come over here, catch the fish and eat it at home, why can we not catch it and sell it to them? It needs a bit of turnaround by this government to see the opportunity that is there for us.

I ask the hon. member this question. Where is the fairness from the government's side to the people in Canada who are homeless, hungry and who have been unemployed for the first time probably in all their working lives. Where is the fairness in this budget that the member is talking about?

Where is the creativeness that is needed which we are not seeing from this government? Where is the creativeness to get Canada going again?

Mr. Hughes: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to respond to the points made by the hon. member for South West Nova and I appreciate her intervention.

She should know that I would be a little bit out of my depth spending a lot of time talking about fishing, having not a great number of fishermen or people involved in the fishing industry in the riding of Macleod.

Let me deal with the question of fairness head on. The hon. member asks about fairness. What this government is providing is a fair economic climate that allows everybody the opportunity to take advantage of the opportunities that are there. Let us look at the interest rate policies that have brought us the lowest interest rates we have had in nearly two decades.

Let us take a look at the training programs that this government has put in place. I am sure they are taken advantage of in the hon. member's riding as they are in my riding. There are parts of my riding where there is chronic unemployment, and we have taken a creative look at the way in which training programs should work.

We have taken a creative look at the ways we should assist people in chronically underemployed areas and I must say that it has resulted in significant opportunities in the Crowsnest Pass area. In fact, what has resulted is the opening of a new plant, Strand Industries with a considerable amount of assistance from the Government of Canada.

These are Canadians who have faith in the opportunities that are there, that are marketing internationally, that are looking for things to do, that are looking out, that are not part of the doom and gloom that the CBC and my colleagues opposite would have us all believe is bringing us to the end of this country. These are the people who are taking the opportunities.

There are many other examples but I see I am getting the eye from the Speaker so I will sit down.

[Translation]

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able finally to take the floor as a full participant in this budget debate As finance critic of the Bloc Quebecois, I cannot help pointing out the democratic deficit in this House, which seems to me to be as chronic as the government's budget deficit.

• (1710)

Forty-one major statements have already been made during the first three days of the budget debate, not one of them by a member of our party. Parliamentary democracy in the House of Commons is practically as sick as the federal government's finances, Mr. Speaker.

In spite of that, I can assure you that I will continue to be present, to demand fair treatment and to defend Quebec's interests. We know the political legitimacy of our party in Quebec and we know that after the next election, there will be more than 60 of us to express Quebec's interests even more strongly.

Until that day comes, and I hope it is soon, let us look at the February 25 budget. All in all, this budget got a better reception than any of Michael Wilson's, at least for a few hours, while the Minister of Finance got an initial media reaction that was not too disastrous.

The day after, the rather moderate earlier comments were heard less often. Two days after, the Canadian dollar started another slide that the Bank of Canada is still trying to stop with a gradual increase in interest rates.

The Minister of Finance wanted to leave the public with a first impression of a government that had managed to reduce the deficit while lowering income taxes slightly. But this first impression gave way as analysts and ordinary citizens learned what was really in the budget.

The camouflage lasted only a day and the disenchantment will last all year. Why such disenchantment? First, because all agree that the budget's economic forecasts are too optimistic. This government has a habit of announcing that it sees light at the end of the tunnel. The problem is that the tunnel is getting longer every week, every month, every year.

Indeed, if this government's budget forecasts since it came to power had been realized, we would already have a budget surplus, although the projected deficit for next year is still $27.5 billion. We all know that this estimate will be exceeded.

Let us quickly compare the finance minister's forecasts with the data now available. In his budget of February 25, the minister expects business investment to grow by 0.5 per cent in 1992. However, on February 28, three days later, Statistics Canada published the results of its business survey and predicts that business investment will decline by 1.5 per cent.

Concerning the labour market, the budget predicts an increase of the work force, a higher number of jobs and a decrease in the unemployment rate, to 10.1 per cent. On March 6, 10 days after the budget, Statistics Canada announced for February a decrease of the work force, a decrease in jobs and a higher unemployment rate which rose to 10.6 per cent. In fact, there were 3,000 fewer jobs in February at the worst part of the recession.

The budget predicts for 1992 a continued decrease of interest rates, down to an average of 6.9 per cent for short term and 8.5 per cent for long term. During the last few weeks, we have seen the interset rates rise; they are now at 7.85 per cent for shot term and at 9.1 per cent for long term. The dollar is still going down and there is a chance the interest rates will keep increasing if the Governor of the Bank of Canada maintains his suicidal policy.

The budget predicts a vigorous recovery of residential investments with an 11.9 per cent increase. On March 9, two days ago, only 13 days after the budget, the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation announced that the market had not reacted at all to the lower interest rates of the last few months and that the slight increase in construction starts we observed in Febuary for the whole of Canada was due to the high number of social housing projects launched in Ontario thanks to the budget of the Ontario government so strongly criticized by the federal Minister of Finance.

According to me, it is useless to go on with this analysis of the minister's predictions. They are already outdated and, as always, the economy is worse than expected and the deficit will be higher than anticipated.

Why such a disastrous outlook, Mr. Speaker? Because the government rejects the most powerful tool it could use to stimulate the economy: the monetary policy. Even though there is no convincing sign of economic recovery, the governor of the Bank of Canada is sticking to a policy of high interest rates, an ultra-conservative and suicidal behaviour in the present circumstances. The fight against inflation has been over for months and the Canadian dollar must come down to a level where the Canadian economy can be really competitive. Economists seem to agree that such a level should be between 75 and 80 U.S. cents.

The financial sector has already nicknamed the governor of the Bank of Canada Rambo because of his merciless fight against inflation which has resulted in 1.5 million unemployed in Canada. Even Rambo stops when the war is over, but not Mr. Crow. To him, high interest rates and a high dollar are a religion. The financial sector had to find a new name to describe his suicidal blend of religion and monetary policy. He is now known as the Bank of Canada's ayatollah.

Mr. Speaker, nothing in the finance minister's speech leads us to believe that he will exercise his statutory responsibilities and put an end to this policy which is a disaster for our economy. On the contrary, he has only praise for his monetary policy's ayatollah. They practise the same ultra-conservative religion, convinced that they are right and everybody else is wrong.

With the inflation rate at 1.6 per cent, the real interest rates in Canada are 3 to 5 points above those in the United States, a level totally unbearable for the Canadian economy. When we talk about a lower deficit, Mr. Speaker, we must also look at recovery. When interest rates go down 1 per cent, the government can save more than $4 billion on the cost of servicing our enormous national debt. When there is a recovery and the unemployment rate goes down 1 per cent, the additional revenue for the Treasury as a result of this 1 per cent drop in unemployment totals $5 billion. We have to look at the impact on economic recovery, not just the cutbacks.

Are there more disappointments in this budget? Of course. Private citizens and businesses initially believed there would be a modest tax cut, as announced in the budget, but they were soon disillusioned. First of all, cutbacks in transfer payments to the provinces for health care and post-secondary education will make it practically impossible for provincial and municipal budgets to avoid tax increases.

For Quebec alone, the potential loss is nearly $2 billion for the coming year, while municipal taxes payable in April, which is quite soon, are substantially higher as a result of last year's cuts. Furthermore, the unemployment insurance account's deficit is expected to lead to another increase in employee and employer contributions in 1992, after a 32 per cent increase in 1991, since the government has withdrawn altogether from financing the unemployment insurance fund.

The prospects for tax relief have faded and will disappear altogether when provincial budgets are tabled at the end of April and in early May.

Once we analyse the few concrete measures in this budget, our disillusionment will be complete. First of all, we see the government abandoning its commitment to a genuine family policy, which it did without any consultation with the provinces, although we all know perfectly well that family policy is a fundamental issue, at least for Quebec. The family allowances system has been replaced by an income support plan for low-income families. This decision points to a significant change in values and a new concept of the role of the state in society, especially with respect to the family, a concept that reflects an ultraconservative about-face, while there was no opportunity for a real debate on this issue.

The government is doing gradually and in a roundabout manner what voters would never tolerate if they knew exactly what was at stake. In the short term, families whose income is the equivalent of the average family income will receive a benefit on a level with benefits under the present system. However, since income levels will not be indexed, there will be a gradual erosion of the amounts available to families. As is the case for other measures already implemented by this government, the negative impact will be felt only gradually.

The changes involving unemployment insurance and the jobs strategy announced three years ago are a case in point.

• (1720)

When it tabled Bill C-21 on unemployment insurance reform, the Canadian government made a big promotional drive concerning its employment strategy with funds of $1.8 billion. On numerous occasions, the government promised that the unemployment insurance reform would not affect the funds targetted for the employment strategy.

The Minister of Finance remained silent on this issue in his speech. We had to wait for the tabling of the Estimates by the President of the Treasury Board two days later to find out that the funds for the strategy had been reduced to $1.3 billion. That represents a cut of $350 million compared to last year and $475 million compared to the original commitment.

The government is trying to make us believe that these cuts are compensated by supplementary funds for job training under the unemployment insurance program. In fact, the funds provided under the unemployment insurance program are only for those who are eligible to unemployment insurance benefits, which excludes all the workers who have been unemployed for a long time, as well as those already on welfare. Thus, the cuts in the funds for the employment strategy directly affect the programs for the have-nots that wanted to join the labour market again and were hoping to improve their lot.

From now on, this responsibility will increasingly have to be borne by the provinces and municipalities, even though they do not have the necessary tax base to provide such help. This is a good example of the gradual consequences of the new programs implemented by this ultraconservative government. It is not the only example of unfulfilled promises. The fate of the co-op housing program is just as eloquent.

That program, which was originally at the experimental stage for five years, was the subject of an in-depth study in 1990 and, given its social usefulness and economic efficiency, eventually became a permanent program. The co-op groups, which were reassured as to the future of the program, undertook to submit concrete projects. Last December 17, the minister responsible for housing confirmed that the program was now permanent and he even announced a slight budget increase for 1992. Yet, in the budget speech, the Minister of Finance announced unequivocally the elimination of that program in order to make annual savings of $5 million, an amount which is 30 times less than the increase in the national defence budget. This is a brutal violation of a commitment renewed on the very eve of the budget. It is no wonder that people no longer any confidence in this government.

For Quebecers, there is another way of evaluating the performance of this government, and that is to see how it fulfils its responsibility regarding regional development. How is Quebec treated compared to other regions? Without considering the billions for western farmers and the hundreds of millions for fishermen who are in particular difficulty—I am only considering the regular budget funding to fight the imbalance in regional development in 1992, the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency receives $447 million, the Western Economic Diversification Department $301 million and Quebec $191 million. The Atlantic region gets 25.2 per cent more, the west 3 per cent more, while Quebec gets 18.3 per cent less.

Where were the defenders of Quebec's interests in this government when this budget was being prepared? According to any criteria of fairness, Mr. Speaker, Quebec is literally being robbed when it comes to regional development. For Quebec industries, especially those that do research and development, this budget continues to penalize them seriously. At the recent first ministers' conference, the Quebec finance minister asked the federal government to harmonize its taxation of research and development with Quebec's. Why? Because now, the federal government taxes back 39 per cent of Quebec government funding for companies that do research and development in Quebec.

How can that encourage Quebec's long-term economic development, when we know very well that the federal government's spending on research and development is concentrated very heavily in Ontario?

We Quebecers have only one consolation. In view of such a situation, the referendum on Quebec sovereignty in the fall of 1992 will finally give us a chance to get out of this madhouse, to take back all our taxes and to assume all our responsibilities.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to express my views on the budget that was brought down about a week ago, if I am not mistaken.

[English]

I have the privilege and honour to speak partly on behalf of the citizens and constituents in the Mount Royal riding as well as those people which one has the privilege and pleasure of meeting across this country in the role of member of Parliament. It is important for all of us to address this budget and to do it in a way that is somewhat analytical while at the same time perhaps a little philosophical.

We must be made aware of the fact that this budget we are addressing is clearly designed as a short-term budget. It is not based on the reality of the lifestyle and living conditions we find in our country, which is faced with an incredibly high rate of unemployment and is very unstable in terms of its sense of belonging, its sense of self and its place in an evolving society. The political interests of this government have never been so blatant as they are in this particular budget.

Serving that particular political interest is a great disservice to the long-term social, economic and cultural interests of this country. Let us be reminded of the fact that this government has constantly said that it is going to reduce the deficit. It has done little of that. This government has said that it is going to create jobs, jobs, jobs, and we know it has done very little of that.

This budget is deadly silent and puts nothing in place to prepare our society, our population, our workers to deal with the newly evolved society in which we find ourselves. The international world today is a globalized market, it is a post-industrial market, it is a high- tech world. We have not organized and have no industrial strategy to properly help our workers make the kinds of adjustments that are needed.

There are no adjustment measures in here. There are cuts in research and development. There are no mechanisms to aid the transition from old jobs to new, no training for the 1.5 million unemployed, let alone an attempt to address the problems facing the over two million Canadians now forced to live on welfare and the thousands of Canadians joining them every single week because there just are not jobs out there. Our economy is falling flat on its face.

This critique of what the government has done and has failed to do is just a short snapshot.

This government often says that the Official Opposition does very little except criticize, that it puts forward no new ideas or new projects. That is really not the role of an Official Opposition in this House. It is here to analyze what the government is doing and to make constructive observations on what the government is doing. In this case our party chose to make some very constructive suggestions as to what we should do just before the budget came up. As a matter of fact, at the end of January the Leader of the Official Opposition and the Liberal Party put before this government an emergency economic plan for its consideration in the creation of the budget.

It was thought about very carefully with the thought of addressing the deficit so that we would not add to the deficit in any significant way while at the same time put the country back to work. That economic and social balance is required.

As the Canadian economy was mired in the worst economic crisis since the great depression and we had not heard any specific plans or goals on the economy, to get the economy kick-started again, we put forward a plan of action in these tough economic times, in which it is so much harder for first-time home buyers to afford a down payment on a home, to help the weak housing market move forward and stop the negative spin-offs affecting the whole economy.

We also said that there were hundreds of towns and cities across Canada with infrastructure projects waiting only for adequate funding. We need a good, solid, healthy infrastructure if we want industry to come in and grow around that infrastructure and get the best of modern service. What is the point of high technology if we cannot move it after we have made the widget?

Many workers have lost their jobs permanently and lack the necessary skills to be competitive in the marketplace. This House will recognize the fact that 40 per cent of Canadians have difficulty with basic reading, writing and arithmetic and the illiteracy in our population must be addressed if we want to face that global competition and have a new prosperity, that famous new word this government loves to use.

There were two million Canadians and more 700,000 children relying on food banks in 1991. Someone has said that we have more food banks than we have McDonald's restaurants across this country right at the moment. We came up with a program, the elements of the one-year emergency plan I am going to outline as they were submitted by the Leader of the Official Opposition.

First, a 5 per cent minimum down payment for first-time homeowners. Lowering the required down payment from 10 per cent to 5 per cent would help boost the beleaguered housing industry and open up ownership to those who have never before had a chance to own their own home. The direct cost of that program to the taxpayers is zero.

Second, allow the use of RRSPs to finance first-time homes. I was a little bit leery when I first heard that but then I looked at how the RRSP was to be used. It was not the same as this government's approach which allows $20,000 each to buy any kind of home at any price. That is highly irresponsible, but our approach was very responsible. Our plan would help to stimulate the housing market, and it was endorsed by the Canadian Real Estate Association. In our plan the maximum allowable withdrawal would be limited to $7,500 which would go along with the 5 per cent down payment. The direct cost of this program to taxpayers was zero.

Third, a shared cost infrastructure program. Funding for these projects would be shared one-third each, which is only fair and logical, between the three levels of government. The federal share would be $1 billion, and there would be a provincial and a municipal share. Half to two-thirds of the jobs created in these projects would be in construction and in manufacturing and 90 per cent of the materials required are manufactured in Canada.

Studies have shown that the net cost to the federal government, after considering increased tax revenues and decreased unemployment insurance payments and welfare payments, would be about $300 million. That $1 billion upfront cost would be funded through reduced debt service payments which would have resulted from lower than expected interest rates.

Fourth, intensified training initiatives. Canada is still one of the lowest per capita investors in training among the OECD countries. Then in this budget we went and cut anything that would lead to research and development or training.

The government must increase the scope and availability of basic skills programs and find new ways to get Canadian companies to invest in their workers. It just makes good sense to invest in one's workers. This $150 million program would be funded through the existing training programs cancelling the $20 million prosperity initiatives along the way—that road show is totally unnecessary—and reduced debt service payments. It was a very good initiative.

Fifth, emergency federal funding for food banks. In 1990 the federal government spent $67 million on advertising and millions and millions of dollars more on polling. If we redirected merely $25 million of this money to food banks we could help to provide immediate short-term relief to thousands of suffering Canadians. The direct additional cost of this program to taxpayers would also be zero. I would suggest that those were very positive suggestions. It is just regrettable that this government chose to ignore every single solitary one of them.

What did the government choose to do instead? There are many, but I just picked a few for your own information, Mr. Speaker, and for the information of my constituents.

The government chose to kill off some key agencies like the Economic Council of Canada, the Science Council, the Law Reform Commission, the Canadian Institute for Peace and Security.

All those organizations and commissions that had generated national discussion, invited independent thought, gave different perspectives than that which came forth from the government, gave helpful ideas and helpful opinions from top researchers and top thinkers in this world and not only in Canada.

The ideas that came forward, the research that was embarked upon perhaps at times seemed to sting and to bite the government. Perhaps it felt that the hand that was feeding it got bitten too often.

Therefore, the government decided it did not like the advice it was getting. It did not like the direction in which these organizations and councils were heading. So it decided to silence the voices of dissent and took a very dangerous step in cutting out those particular councils and commissions. I would suggest that that was a very dangerous thing for the government to have undertaken.

One of the other things that was cancelled was that of the charter challenge program. Cutting out the charter challenge program is fundamentally showing lack of respect for the poorest and the most vulnerable in our society.

That charter challenge program was to ensure that we would build a body of information of jurisprudence that would enable us to have a base from which we could judge the equality of individuals, and fairness and equity in our society. To cut out the charter challenge program is an extraordinarily cynical move.

To prove that the cynicism was well-founded in the budget documents, we also found it passing strange to note that this government decided to renege on its obligation as directed by a court decision and is refusing to pay the $1 billion which it owes its female employees, its own employees. I would like to know what organization or what business could get away with not paying its own employees.

The government seems to feel very comfortable. Most of those workers were women. In fact, all of them were women because it was a charter case, and the government is refusing to pay them half of the salary that they deserve. Because it did not like where it came from, it closed down the dissent. It closed down the charter challenge fund. I would say that it just indicates the kind of thinking that went into this budget.

I was curious to know how the government was planning to look after the people of this country. I indicated all the things that the government has cut and many of the things that it did not put into place, the adjustment programs which were supposed to be put into place for free trade.

We know that the free trade agreement, because of its poor negotiations, because of its bad application, has had serious negative effects on Honda, on many major sectors like magnesium and softwood lumber.

Quebec is suffering greatly under these particular challenges as is British Columbia and other parts of this country.

We need for these workforces that are being challenged and for the thousands of manufacturing jobs and the thousands of bankruptcies that have taken place—just look at the clothing industry, look at the clothing stores across this land. We need to have some kind of retraining program, some innovative programs.

I remember in my riding when the Conservatives were running against me they kept talking about the incubator programs that they were going to put in. I said: "Good, do it. I don't care. Just do something to help the people in my riding". I have so many thousands of people in my riding who are on welfare, who are on unemployment insurance. If this government were to do something that would help them, I would be the first to compliment it.

• (1740)

Did the government do that? No. It did not reduce the GST. It let interest rates go up one point which over the course of a year will cost about $1.8 billion in added debt costs instead of targeting—I think I am right. I have my gurus over here and they will correct me if I am wrong.

The government could have taken that $1.8 billion that will add to the debt and if it felt comfortable in doing that by raising the interest rates, why did it not use that money in a more creative way?

Why could it not have used it for social housing and co-op housing? In my riding social housing and co-op housing have been responsible for incredible changes.

Yet I have some of the oldest housing stock in the city of Montreal and it is in serious need of repair.

There are low income people. The black community tells me it has close to 45 per cent unemployment in the category of young people between the ages of 18 and 24. The multicultural community and the other visible minorities tell me they have an unemployment rate of close to 27 per cent.

I know, and the members of this House know and I do not like to say the Maslow's hierarchy of needs, but the primary needs of a family are decent housing and decent food as bottom line minimums and we are not responding to them. When we cut out social housing and co–op housing, we are cutting out one of the fundamentals in needs.

So the co–op got chopped, social housing got cut and we still have 360,000 housing units needed in Quebec. In my riding, I want co–op housing to fix up the apartment buildings and make them usable for people today.

I talk to you about unemployment which is staggering. I talk to you about the fact that because there is this recession and because many of the unemployed in my riding are visible minorities who suffer from discrimination—unfortunately, we have not evolved enough to see people with their ability and their competence, not the colour of their skin or their disability—these people need help and this budget does nothing.

This budget is a masterpiece of workmanship done by creative bookkeepers and program packagers. But if you take a look at what is inside that box, as pretty as the design might be, there is nothing of quality, there is nothing of any value that can be used in today's society.

In this House the government has talked about the new child benefits program. I am sorry I have only two minutes left, I could go on now for hours. Gee whiz.

This new child program—I cannot believe this minister decided to say, and he stood up here and he said it and then he tried to apologize for his language. I remember his language around deranger, now I remember his language about killing VIA Rail and now he is killing child care. Let me tell you that a building block to become integrated and fully acceptable on a footing of equality in this society is a family and particularly for women is proper national child care.

Now, the government chose not to do that just to increase the interest rates. Then it has the gall to put forward a child benefit package. It rolled together family allowance and the refundable child tax credit and it said to everybody that it was going to give them something that is great, something that is new.

The government is going to deliver a new program to their door. They are going to get a cheque that they are going to love. Sure it is the same $1,020 dollars it was before, divided into 12 parts.

But the one thing that this government did not mention is a little nasty undertaking it has put into every social program, into every tax benefit program.

Ask the seniors who know what I am talking about when they got a 75 cent increase on their cheques last month. Ask them how much that purchased for them. It is called deindexation over 3 per cent. It is called a deindexation bug that this government has put into everything that is worth while which indicates that it really does not care for the kinds of social programs that we need in this society.

If we want a decent society, we need to balance the economic with the social and I would add the cultural, because in the sense of the dynamics in which we are living, the cultural is as political as the politics in the whole question of the Constitution.

I find this budget very disturbing. I find it full of trickery and flim flam. I would like to say that with the smoke and mirrors used now, do not worry, the Liberals are coming in and we will change things, I promise you that. Poor people will be the target for us too, better than the government is doing.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for Mount Royal for her summary of all of the deficiencies of this budget, especially the charter challenge program.

In my riding I have heard so many complaints and concerns from legitimate groups and organizations that are concerned about this particular aspect of the budget that was cut out. I thank her for bringing this to the nation's attention.

My question has to do with her area of responsibility in the national Liberal Party of Canada and that is culture and communications. Everyone in this House would agree that she has done a fantastic job in supporting that vital sector of our economy.

It seems to me that this government tends to want to diminish the federal presence in this country. It tends to want to shove off responsibility. In its cutting it is not only eliminating things but it is also pushing responsibility on to the provinces.

I want to ask my colleague, does she not think that this diminished Canadian presence by not really supporting arts and culture in this budget that we have lost one of the most vital instruments this country has ever had in galvanizing us as a nation?

Mrs. Finestone: I thank you for your warm comments. Yes, I would like to make a comment. I was planning to do the speech on the estimates in this light.

I tried to indicate that the constitutional perturbations that we are going through right now are as much cultural as they are political.

When I read the budget report I realized that there was a $55 million cut in one area, another $35 million cut in another area, and a third $21.5 million cut. These are all in the cultural field. The government seems to have something stuck in its head about 3 per cent. The cuts in each one of the agencies adds up to a total of over $6.5 million annually over five years, which is about another $35 million. It is even more than that actually.

The interesting thing is that this government does not seem to appreciate that many of the institutions which our government put into place and promoted were in the interests of developing the artistic expression in all fields of expression.

It is the individual artist, through his freedom of expression, through his creative and intellectual thought who enriches the whole population. Individually a collective is formed which then becomes this highly diversified and unique heterogeneous multicultural society that is Canada and that is so enriched by all these talents being added in.

The government does not seem to feel that is a good idea. It put forward policies that do absolutely nothing to enrich this country in that regard. Just have a look at the film policy it put in that was terrible and that did not go through. The book publishing policy of which it is very proud ended up being a 10 cent on the dollar investment.

I would say that the indications all along the way are although it wishes to maintain the national institutions and although there is definitely a recognition on everyone's part that culture is not just the high arts, it is everyday living and everything else, from the couch potato through to whatever else one wants to do—go to the hockey game. There is a role for the municipalities, there is a role for the provinces and there is a role for the federal government. The over-arching goal of the federal government is to enable us to know, understand and appreciate each other from coast to coast to coast. The role of the provinces is to enable the institutions and organisms that are within that province to flourish and grow, particularly museums, libraries, local arts festivals and things of that nature. Artists, by the very nature of their independence must, should and shall maintain the right to knock on every door, federal, provincial, municipal and private sector.

• (1750)

I hope that in a sense I have answered the question. I can only say that the $2.6 billion that we spend on arts and culture in this country, which includes the CBC, is certainly not enough. We must improve in that area. Allan Gotlieb told us that we need $47 million as a beginner in Canada Council alone if we want to do anything. What does the government do? It cuts the Canada Council I think by $260 million.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to be able to participate in this budget debate and to share this time slot with my hon. friend from Sarnia.

I would like to address this budget from the perspective of someone representing an agricultural riding in the west. I want to especially stress the concerns of people in that area, not just as they relate to agriculture but to the economy generally, their concern about the family, about fairness and taxation, wanting to see a reduction in the duplication and waste in government agencies.

At the outset it has been suggested by some in opposition that this budget does nothing for agriculture. Of course that is a complete falsehood. Not only do we have support for agriculture in terms of policies leading to lower interest rates—these not just for agriculture but for all Canadians—but we have a revised child tax benefit which is targeted to those who need it. We have a continuation of agricultural policies which we are delivering to the grains and oilseed sector this year, something in the order of $4 billion.

It is true that in the minds of some and indeed for some producers that is not enough to sustain them. In the minds of many taxpayers it is far too much. The problem lies beyond our borders. We all know that the difficulties in agriculture are caused by this disastrous trade war that has been going on between the United States and the European Community. That problem lies beyond our borders and indeed in many ways the solution will be found there as well through multilateral negotiation, hopefully through a GATT deal.

Another concern for people in my area of Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia is western diversification. Part and parcel of the concern that we have with agriculture, with our over-dependence on the export of grain, is the search for other things to do for diversification in an area which basically lends itself very much to the growing of grain for export.

In that regard we have the continuing support of the Department of Western Economic Diversification which is a $1.2 billion revolving fund that was established some years ago by this government with the express view of trying to stimulate, as it names implies, diversification in the west so that loans are made to individual and corporate entrepreneurs for new market, new product, new technology, import replacement, innovation and job creation. That program, I am happy to say, has been extremely successful in my area and many people continue to be enormously supportive of it. So support continues for agriculture and it continues for diversification.

Having said that, I want to touch on some of the highlights of this budget document as I believe people in my constituency see them. First and foremost is the taxation of families. There is an element of fairness in this because finally married couples are going to be treated the same way as those who choose to live common law. Unfortunately over the years a number of elements have entered into the taxation system which have combined to place a much greater tax burden on married couples compared to those who choose to live together. I point to the GST credit, the child tax credit, principal residence, attribution rules, the equivalent to married exemption and so on.

As was pointed out by a number of my colleagues in the Conservative caucus, I want to pay tribute to my colleague, the member for Calgary North, for chairing that caucus which has brought forward a number of very useful suggestions.

Based on those recommendations, we do have these measures in the budget which I think will find considerable favour, not just in my constituency but across the country. Why should there be a bias away from the traditional married couple?

The second element in the taxation of families which I think is extremely important is the child care deduction. The maximum available has been increased. I will not go into the details of it, as it is contained within those documents.

The third area is the enriching of benefits for families with children. In that regard, we have a major reform of the existing system in that one monthly child tax benefit will replace the current patchwork of assistance. The family allowance, the child tax credit and the refundable child credit will be amalgamated and the single monthly payment will make the system simpler and more responsive to family needs by targeting more fairly the low and middle income families.

Child benefits will increase by $400 million a year in a cumulative way. There will be a maximum of $144 a month per child for low and middle income families and a new earned income supplement of up to $500 for the working poor as well as the increases in child care deductions which I referred to earlier.

I believe this will find favour with my constituents who have questioned for a number of years the point of continuing to pay family allowances to well-off Canadians. They will applaud the idea of taking these moneys and instead targeting them for those who are most in need.

Other areas that my constituents have indicated concern about and which I believe this budget addresses are the streamlining of government and expenditure restraint. In regard to the streamlining of government, I am happy to point out that in this budget there will be eliminated, consolidated or deferred about 46 government agencies, many of which have been referred to in this debate and contained in the documents. They are agencies such as the Petroleum Monitoring Agency, the Pay Research Bureau, the Law Reform Commission, Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security, the Economic Council of Canada and so on. As well, there will be a consolidation of a number of departments and agencies in order to save overhead and to focus resources.

I have just one example. Right now, there is the Patent Appeal Board, the Trade Marks Opposition Board and the Copyright Board. These will be merged into a new intellectual property tribunal. A number of advisory councils are going to be terminated. There will be 160 fewer government appointments, 500 fewer employees and savings of $22 million a year.

The government is going to continue to privatize those Crown corporations which are not serving an essential public purpose. It is going to sell surplus land at various places and properties abroad that are no longer needed. I believe these are initiatives which reflect the wishes of Canadians as expressed to members of Parliament.

In regard to the restraint of expenditures, the Expenditure Control Plan which was announced in the budget in 1990 and enlarged last year will be carried forward. As a result of the defence review and taking into account the conditions, the startling events, especially in the former Soviet Union and eastern Europe, we will be able to reduce the commitment to the armed forces and defence spending will be cut by over $2 billion over the next five years.

As well, the non-wage operating budgets of government departments will be cut by 3 per cent which will save $150 million next year and $800 million over a five-year period. This is on top of the wage restraint measures which are well known to Canadians. All in all, these are measures which answer the public need.

As well, listed in the budget are a number of actions for investment initiatives and jobs. The manufacturing and processing sectors have been hard hit. A fifth of the Canadian economy and jobs depend on this area. As a result of globalization, as a result of intensive international competition and world-wide recession there have been difficulties. The world economy is profoundly changing. The barriers to movement of goods, services, capital and information are coming down everywhere. Industry all around the world is restructuring to take advantage of new opportunities. The Canadian work place, like others elsewhere, is being transformed.

• (1800)

Mr. Speaker, I realize the time restraints. I simply want to point out that the manufacturing and processing sector is one which is in intense competition with the rest of the world. We owe it to that sector to modestly reduce the income tax rate applying to it from 23 per cent to 21 per cent, to increase the rate of depreciation on processing and manufacturing equipment from 25 per cent to 30 per cent. This will put the manufacturing and processing sectors of Canada in a better position to compete, along with the imposition of the GST, which will relieve those sectors of the unfair burden of paying sales tax input costs.

These measures together will help to ensure the competitiveness of our manufacturing and processing sectors compared to those in other nations which have similar tax regimes.

I believe this is a very realistic budget for the times. It is, I think, an answer to the requests of Canadians who want to see restraint on the part of government, who do not want to see new taxes and who want to see moneys that are put out universally, targeted instead toward those who most need them.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to stand in the House and speak today on the budget. I am very pleased to have this opportunity because the budget can have a very special and positive impact on the business opportunities that could come to my riding.

I want to applaud the Minister of Finance on the measures he announced in this budget. As has been noted by most everyone throughout this country, it is very positive. The general tone and direction that it takes is right. It proposes realistic, long-lasting solutions to our country's economic problems. It does not propose quick fixes, which is something that is very important to Canadians, and they have responded positively to that. It also represents a commitment by our government to adjust to the same economic realities which Canadian households and businesses face each day. That is why so many people can relate to this budget.

Of course it means belt tightening, responsible management, not simply carefree, wanton spending. It responds to the desire to have a more expansive economy and a less expensive and more efficient government. We must constantly and continually work to that end.

Canadians across the land are telling us that they want a more efficient government. They want a less expensive government and they want an expansive economy that has some long-term structure to it.

In my mind the budget delivers on a number of fronts. It delivers on what Canadians have told us in our consultations across the country, including the residents of my riding. I have received letters from organizations and people in my riding of Sarnia—Lambton thanking me for taking their thoughts forward because their suggestions ended up in the budget.

The equation to help boost our economic recovery is really simple in this budget. The federal government is cutting spending to cut taxes. I think it was a real surprise to the opposition that we were cutting taxes. Sometimes they have a little bit of trouble responding to that but it is what Canadians are looking for and certainly we have given them a very strong message that we are doing that.

Local residents are concerned also about the spending and the size of government, as I said, and we are responding to that.

The budget outlines measures to restructure, to streamline and to improve the operations of government. The budget proposes to cut spending, just the opposite of what really has gone on in the past. It will be cut by $1 billion this year and by over $7 billion in the next five years. It is very important to Canadians to see that. It seems to me it is quite the opposite in some of the submissions I have heard from across the way today. They are saying that we should be spending more money on this or we should be spending more money on that. That is not what Canadians are saying.

Turning to defence spending, we are going to take advantage of the peace dividend for Canada. There will be a substantial peace dividend for all of us and we will be able to cut the spending in defence. That is very important.

Residents in my riding like all Canadians are concerned about taxes. They do not want to pay more taxes. They are concerned about the taxes that they are paying and they understand that that comes from this increased and ever-increasing spending of government.

As I noted earlier, personal income taxes will be cut. Over 14 million individual taxpayers will enjoy higher disposable income as a result of this budget. Having higher income means there is more disposable dollars. Those disposable dollars help the economy because people have to buy if we are going to stimulate manufacturing. These reductions will put $500 million back into the hands of the taxpayers this coming fiscal year. That is very important. The total benefit will increase to almost $1.2 billion in subsequent years. That kind of injection of money back into the economy certainly will help.

My constituents looked also for a cut in the deficit. The government has made a commitment to address the deficit. Despite the economic slowdown, the government had held the deficit and will reduce it by up to $4 billion this coming year. Certainly we are moving on the right track. Canadians are saying they want this done, and we are responding.

I am particularly encouraged by the assistance to the local petrochemical and refining industry which is certainly a very important industry in my area of Sarnia—Lambton. It is a major industry there. It is a very capital intensive industry. It costs a lot of money to build those plants.

In this budget the federal government has moved to reduce the tax burden for the manufacturing and processing sectors which will include the petrochemical and refining industry. The budget proposes these important changes. The basic corporate income tax on manufacturing and processing will be reduced from 23 per cent to 22 per cent on January 1, 1993. It will also go down to 21 per cent on January 1, 1994.

There is another very important one, the capital cost allowance rate. That is the opportunity for companies to write off this major investment that they make, especially in the petrochemical industry. To build a world scale petrochemical plant today costs up to three-quarters of a billion dollars and takes up to two years. Certainly they have a very heavy capital investment and they want to be able to have the capital cost allowance. They did want it changed.

I had representation made to me by constituents who represent the companies in my area. They said to me: "If we are going to have new world scale plants built in the Sarnia—Lambton area to produce world scale production for North America then the after tax situation needs to be changed. We would like to see some change in the capital cost allowance".

I want to let my constituents know, and also you, Mr. Speaker, and my colleagues in this House, that I took their representations. I took representations from Canadian chemical producers and I made my representation to the Minister of Finance. I indicated that this was the kind of change we needed to attract investment, to have the write-off. I indicated that the capital cost allowance had to be changed to a higher rate. The Minister of Finance listened and responded by including this in the budget. I want to thank him for listening and responding. That is as tremendously important as it is for a lot of other areas too, but especially in the high capital intensive industries like we have in Sarnia—Lambton.

Additionally a couple of other important areas were added to help with the building of new world scale plants in my area. There is a reduction in the tax rate that will help us, but also we have the reduction of the withholding tax rate on direct dividends to 5 per cent. This will also encourage investment.

A day or so before the budget was announced the government was to reverse the order of the credit currently provided for large corporations tax especially in part VI, the tax on financial institutions, the corporate surtax and income tax. That is another complicated tax. Those four areas will mean substantive changes to after tax situations for investments by multinationals in the petrochemical and refining industry.

We also need the provincial government to assist us in this area. We are saying that we have made these substantive changes. We are asking the province of Ontario not to move into that tax room. We are also saying: "Hey, you come on board and give us a hand. Make some changes now in the after tax situation". I think Premier Rae is hopefully interested in working for this. Then Sarnia—Lambton and other areas—of course I am particularly interested in Sarnia—Lambton—will attract new world scale petrochemical plants to be built there. There is a major plant in the offering and we are competing with Texas for this plant.

A combination of the kinds of changes we have made and the after tax changes that hopefully the province of Ontario can make will provide with us a greater opportunity to have investment, which means a world scale plant, which means jobs in Sarnia—Lambton, jobs for Canadians.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I certainly wanted the debate to go forward until I heard the member suggest that Bob Rae should lend the government a hand when in fact the federal government slaps the provincial government. The member would know that over the course of three years the transfer payments will be reduced by $10 billion. How does he anticipate lending a helping hand when that kind of reaction from the federal government to the provincial government is in place and has been in place with the cap on CAP and the cap on transfer payments?

He would know because I am sure it is happening in his riding as well as mine that hospital beds and hospitals services are being reduced. Teaching staffs are being hit right across the board. How can he possibly suggest that the provincial government should lend a hand to the federal government when the federal government is battering provincial governments?

Mr. James: Mr. Speaker, I am very surprised by that statement. I do not think Premier Rae is reacting in that manner. Certainly my provincial colleague in Sarnia who is a member of the NDP is not. We are acting as a partnership in moving ahead to do the kinds of things to attract investment. The member may want to be partisan, but my colleague and partner, the MPP for Sarnia, is not reacting in that way. He is working very hard, as I think the province of Ontario will be, not to change and move into the tax room but to look at ways they can be helpful in working with the federal government to attract the major kind of build we are talking about in Sarnia. They are some very major builds that will provide jobs.

The province of Ontario is as interested as the federal government in providing jobs. I would think the member, though I suppose late in the day, might want to get into some partisan rhetoric. Knowing him personally I am surprised at that statement. He can make it, but I do not think he is speaking for the Government of Ontario because I would think that its thinking is somewhat different from that.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, today I welcome the opportunity to speak on the budget introduced by the Minister of Finance in this Chamber on February 25, some 15 days ago.

We have now had ample time to review, to analyse and to discuss the provisions in that budget and what it means to us and to our constituencies.

I have heard during the debate in this House and in conversations I have had in my constituency that the response to the budget is not very good. The message from northwest Saskatchewan which I represent is very simple and I can relate it very quickly to members of this House.

The government must be aware that regional resource based economies like ours in Saskatchewan require greater attention than that which it is receiving at this time. The problems in the national economy have a greater impact on the west and therefore the root causes of the national problems, that is the GST and the free trade agreement, must be addressed and they have not been addressed in this budget.

If we scrap the GST and get out of the FTA we will all be better off. That is a message that comes from my constituents in The Battlefords—Meadow Lake. I have to mention that the government opposite had better prepare for greater agricultural support during 1992–93. I am glad that the Minister of Agriculture has indicated to me his desire to listen to my words today.

As I have already said in this House, this budget does not address the financial problems faced by agricultural producers on the prairies. The uncertainties that exist in the countryside and in the world marketplace will lead to further calls for agricultural assistance during 1992. The government is foolish to think that it can avoid programs like the interest-free cash advance and deficiency assistance programs this year.

Earlier this week, in fact on Monday, I made a brief statement in the House of Commons concerning one small provision in the budget, that is the provision relating to the removal of the excise tax on the ethanol portion of blended fuels. I want to take half a minute to expand on the comments I made on Monday, elaborate a little on the statement I made, and indicate my support to the Minister of Agriculture and others on the government side for the moves that have been made on ethanol.

I want to do this because I am quite impressed with what I see as the future for ethanol in Canada. It is a future that can help provide for a cleaner environment and greater economic benefits for smaller, rural based communities like those that make up my constituency.

After the introduction of the budget I had great pleasure to tour the Poundmaker ethanol plant and feed lot at Lanigan, Saskatchewan with a group of people from Big River and Debden, Saskatchewan, two communities in my constituency. During that tour we learned a lot and recognized that with the right economic climate similar plants could be located in numerous communities in Saskatchewan and across Canada.

The advantages are almost too numerous to mention but in a moment I will try to outline a number. Ethanol is not a new product. It has a number of useful purposes, but what we are most interested in at this time is its use as an automotive fuel enhancer.

Some members in the House today may recall that when Henry Ford designed the Model T he had expected it to be powered by ethanol, a fuel made from renewable biological materials. However gasoline powered engines took over and ethanol has been an industry trying to get off the ground ever since. Its time has come and I think it is time we all recognize that Canada would be well advised to get into the act of producing ethanol immediately or risk losing the opportunities to the Americans.

Already dozens of ethanol producing plants have sprung up in the United States. Some state legislatures have even passed bills making ethanol blended fuels mandatory. As a result ethanol blended gasoline now accounts for about 9 per cent of total U.S. gas consumption.

The use of ethanol blended gasoline fuel has been actively encouraged in the United States because it helps to reduce U.S. dependence on oil imports, that is a 10 per cent blend acts as a gas extender. Ten per cent ethanol means that there is 10 per cent fuel oil left over for use elsewhere. It addresses a number of environmental concerns including, first, emissions and, second, it lessens the environmental hazards of fossil fuel exploration, extraction and transportation. Also, the U.S. is actively encouraging ethanol production because it provides a market opportunity for surplus agricultural crops.

The Poundmaker plant that I visited, for example, uses a starch heavy, not protein heavy, grain as its stock, while other plants in Canada will use corn instead of wheat for its feedstocks.

The value of ethanol as a fuel increases every day because of the world's concern for the environment, the health of this planet, its people and its wildlife, and the need to seek alternatives to the megaproject mentality that has limited job opportunities for people in this country for too long. This means there are sound economics as well as sound environmental reasons to get into ethanol production. As I see it, there could be six basic economic reasons to support a change to ethanol.

First, the high octane-blending value of ethanol makes it an excellent replacement for the octane enhancers with known or suspected health concerns, now widely used in Canadian gasoline following the removal of tetra-ethyl lead by legislation here in Canada. Ethanol can substitute for aromatic hydrocarbons, which includes MMT, a compound containing manganese which, like lead, is a potential neurotoxin and accumulates over time in the environment. MMT already is banned in the United States.

Second, the Government of Canada projects that by the mid-1990s Canada will be importing about 550,000 barrels of light crude oil per day by tankers to meet transportation fuel needs. This is even with the added supply to be created by the new megaproject developments. This importation will cost about $5.5 billion a year, assuming a global crude oil price of about $27 a barrel due to increasing dependence on OPEC imports.

Third, the cost, financial and environmental, of megaprojects is too great for enhancing Canadian domestic supplies of light crude oil. Fuel ethanol compares favourably, in both capital and operating costs of production, to Hibernia and the tar sands projects, which can only proceed with a lot of government assistance.

Fourth, the abundant supply of Canadian grain is available for fuel ethanol production and is renewable, endlessly renewable.

Fifth, the by-product of ethanol production from grain, which is a high-protein livestock feed ingredient, could be used to replace Canadian imports of high-protein feeds.

Sixth, and last, the effect of ethanol additions to gasoline on environmental quality is incredible. Its potential to reduce net carbon dioxide emissions into the atmosphere is considerable.

There is great concern about global warming in the country. Among the greatest contributors to the problem of the greenhouse effect is the burning of fossil fuels. By adding ethanol to those fossil fuels burned in automobiles, the amount of carbon released into the atmosphere is reduced substantially.

I am a member of the environment committee's subcommittee on acid rain. Because we are looking at air qualities and emission problems, I will be recommending that our committee take a look at ethanol production and its use during its work over the coming year.

I know you are signalling me that my time is almost up. I want to add in closing that the budget's removal of the excise tax is a step in the right direction but the journey is far from complete. There has to be a further federal commitment to the ethanol industry, and that includes a commitment to promote the product as well as to legislate in the product development.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, the obvious question to the member is simply this: After listening to him, I have come to the realization that he does not have a whole lot of criticism of the budget introduced February 25. Is the member willing to support our budget based on his observations, particularly in his own riding? Obviously there are some positives in this budget for his riding, his part of the country. That is the question.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, in order to address the budget adequately, I need about an hour and a half of the House's time to discuss all of the things that I find wrong with the budget.

What is very important to me are the two lines the government put in an otherwise very long and difficult budget. Two lines indicate a desire to move in the right direction as far as energy and the environment is concerned and relating to the production of ethanol.

If I can take one moment of the House's time to add that I do believe that the government should be actively involved in the legislative process regarding ethanol. A mandatory 10 per cent blend is part of a legislative process in the United States. I believe this government must take the same steps here in Canada. In fact, we should see the government legislating mandatory blends for Canadian ethanol production here in Canada. We would see the potential of creating up to 3 billion litres a year of ethanol if we were to ask for 10 per cent of the 30 billion litres of fuel oil consumed in this country per year.

I will be actively asking the government to consider moves in this direction.

The government's budgetary moves were a signal to the industry that the government wants to take steps in this direction, a signal to the industry and the country that ethanol is a product that should be supported. I want the government to understand that if it takes steps to assist the communities involved in ethanol development, and the industry itself, it will have support from this corner.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to ask the member a question in light of the very positive comments he made about the benefit to his riding of this tax or of this budget and the clear benefits that will occur to many of the members from Ontario who are part of his party that represent automotive ridings.

There is a reduction in the income tax for automotive companies, a reduction in the capital gains or capital cost allowances, the reduction in the dividend withholding tax, all of which are very good employment creation ideas for NDP-held ridings in Ontario. I wonder if in light of the fact that it is good for his riding in Western Canada and in Saskatchewan and it is good for all his colleagues' ridings in Ontario if he is now going to rise when the occasion happens to vote on the budget to support the budget as he should, based on all of the good things that are in it?

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I cannot give the hon. member the answer which he so desperately wants to hear.

I am signalling support for a small measure within the budget that I otherwise find distasteful and most difficult for us to accept. I indicated there will have to be measures taken like the interest free cash advance again this year for farm producers in Saskatchewan and elsewhere. I have indicated in my response on this ethanol matter that community-based assistance is the type of economic development assistance that the government must be involved in. When producers on the prairies or in Ontario get together to form co-operatives to develop ethanol plants, the government should be there to help them with the start-up costs to ensure that the benefits from such production come back to the communities and support community employment activities.

These are the kinds of things the government should be moving on to further the development it has started in those couple of lines in this budget.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I want to congratulate my colleague for the excellent lesson on ethanol.

• (1830)

Obviously he has a tremendous amount of expertise that he wants to share with the members opposite. I think his philosophy is that if you have nothing positive to say about something do not say it.

I would like to follow his philosophy but I did have a few negatives written down so I may have to be slightly negative as my time wears on. I do want to start by being positive. I am going to quote several excerpts from a speech given about a month before the budget came out. I must admit that I am going to quote out of context.

"We must have a short-term plan to address our immediate needs and heat up the economy. We need a long-term plan to keep the combustion going and to guarantee our place in the world economy". Skip a paragraph. "Further, for the untold number of hard-working, responsible workers and businessmen and women who have been forced to go without needed bank loans—" I will talk about banks later on— "the banking credit crunch must end. I have directed cabinet departments and federal agencies to speed up pro-growth expenditures as quickly as possible. This should put an extra $10 million into the economy in the next six months and our transportation bill provides more than $150 million for construction and maintenance projects that are vital to our growth and well-being. That means jobs building roads, jobs building bridges and jobs building railways. I said my plan has two parts and it does, and the second part is the heart of the matter for it is not enough to get an immediate burst. We need long-term improvement in our economic position".

These are excerpts from a speech made by President Bush. I only wish that the Prime Minister and the finance minister had used some of the content from the President's speech as they so often do. They are wont to follow the President on a very regular basis. This is one time they did not and perhaps they should have.

To continue in a positive way. This is not a bad budget. It is not a bad budget in good times, but these are bad times, terrible times. The "R" word is almost a "D" word. It is a budget that has a little bit of something for just about everybody. I call it a tinkering budget. You tinker here with the system, help somebody over here and take away over here. However, the system and the country need an overhaul. There are 1.5 million people unemployed, personal and business bankruptcies are at record levels, welfare case loads were up 32 per cent in Ontario in January 1992 compared to 1991, 32 per cent. The number of individuals collecting UI in November 1991 was 486,000, up 23 per cent over November 1990. The number of individuals who have exhausted their UI is 32,500—this is just in Ontario—up 111 per cent over November of the previous year. One and three-quarter million people ate at food banks in this country in one year.

How could one continue to be positive? I salute the member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake. He avoided the budget because it was so difficult to proceed in anything positive. What will this budget do for those people I have cited? Absolutely nothing. The transfer payments from the federal government to the province of Ontario, one of the so-called have provinces, the cap on CAP and the EPF transfer payments will result in a $10.5 billion reduction over three years.

It is a pass the buck budget but there are no bucks being passed. There was nothing passed to the provinces. What do the provinces have to do? They cannot pass the buck to the municipalities. The finance minister has the gall to lecture Premier Rae saying: "I hope he follows our path". What does he suggest we do? Close the hospitals completely, cut out the education system? He is saying: "We are practising restraint and we want you to follow our lead". Does he want to practise what John Engler has done in Michigan? He basically cut the welfare system and said: "People get out on the streets. Live in tents. It is not a problem".

Even one of those folks who is a supporter of John Engler, the governor of Michigan, says: "Well, pulling the safety net probably will not be a money saver". He pulls out a study from a brief case and throws it on the table. He points out research that says: "Five per cent of those cut off welfare, if they end up in prison and another 5 per cent end up in mental institutions, the state will pay out more than it saves in welfare payments". In fact, says Hollister, an aide of John Engler, in a steady voice: "Cutting people off welfare was not an economic decision, it was an ideological decision. It was an abandonment of the social contract". Because the federal government abandons the social contract it then says to the premier of Ontario: "Do the same thing. It does not matter about these people, allow them to live in tents. Cut back medical services in your community".

I am sure that all of our communities are suffering those medical cutbacks. Staff is being cut in hospitals and schools right across the country. Is that acceptable? I think not. That is what Canadians in my constituency are telling me. The Prime Minister and the finance minister have passed that buck but they have not passed the money. They have soured federal-provincial relations, federal-Ontario relations when they should not be doing so. They should be begging to co-operate. The government should be promoting a spirit of co-operation rather than saying: "Follow our lead, look what we have done, look at the wondrous things we have done".

I suspect that the provincial government will not follow the federal government. The federal government is crossing this country as it is wont to do every month or so with a prosperity agenda. The committee came to my city, and I believe there were 12 people there. It described how to become more competitive: "You know, all we have to do is retrain our people. We have to retrain them. That will make us more competitive". What did the government do in the budget? It said that we have to reduce job training by $100 million. Now that will make us more competitive. It should have taken a positive step because nearly everyone in this country—and if its members are indeed consulting those in their constituency the government would have invested in the infrastructure of this country.

Several years ago the price tag was $15 billion. It is now $20 billion. I hope we do become prosperous again—and I suspect we will. I long for those days and I am sure all Canadians long for those days. If we do not have the infrastructure to support a prosperous economic situation—will our infrastructure be able to support it? Is it possible? A hundred and some communities are still pouring raw sewage into the waterways of this country, is that acceptable? If we did not do it in good times we are not going to do it in bad times. When are we going to do it? There was a great belief that this was the time to do it, everybody was onside and prepared to participate. The only non-participant was the federal government.

This budget is a maze. I think it is too positive to say that it is smoke and mirrors. It is a maze that leads from one spot to another. On one hand the government will do something for you and on the other hand it will take it away. It has increased the education tuition credit for students and parents from $60 to $80 a month and in the same breath it removed the 60-day grace period to pay back student loans which existed prior to the budget. Give with one hand, take with another.

Disability credits have been increased for those who are disabled in this country. Give with that hand. With the other hand cut out co-op housing to house disabled people. The family allowance has been removed. The government says: "We are going to increase your child tax credit". If you work it out, and it has been worked out by Mr. Shiffrin, The Toronto Star social affairs writer, the amount that is given will amount to the very same amount. Those most in need of it will get less. It is the working poor who will be helped and we praise that, but again it is an attack on universality.

I want to speak for the last 30 seconds on banks. The government has done something for small business, that is again a positive. However the banks in this country have a tight money policy. George Bush says they have it in the United States but the banks in Canada make the banks in the United States appear like Mary Poppins. They are squeezing the small businesses in this country.

• (1840)

If any member goes out in their constituency and asks, that is exactly what small businesses will tell you. Banks are not only squeezing, the small businesses say: "I will not talk to my banker because I am afraid". The budget is terrible. I rest my case.

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, I have a very short question to ask the member.

Will he not agree with me that this government is going across the globe spendthrifting? It is going across the globe saying to everybody: "We will give you this, we will give you that". The Prime Minister is acting like he is a wondrous human being. He went to Paris and he let them have a drawing for $1 million. Will the member not agree with me that charity starts at home and this is where we should look after our children, today and not tomorrow?

Mr. Butland: Mr. Speaker, it may have begun as a simple question but the answer could be very complex. I think that all of us in here believe that charity does begin at home, but we cannot ignore charity overseas.

For instance, if the banks forgive loans to Third World countries we can be assured that they have already received the principal on those loans. They may be forgiving the interest. Do not worry, the banks have gotten their share. Also, they are able to sell off this Third World debt.

I suspect I could go on for a long time with that answer. It started out simple but the answer is complex.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to comment on the member's reaction to the transfers to the provinces.

I would like to debate that point and that point only in relation to the figures. He represents one of the richest provinces in Canada, that being Ontario. I want to examine the figures in the last number of years of the transfers from the Government of Canada to the province of Ontario.

It is interesting to note that the average annual increase from 1984–85 to 1992–93 in growth of those transfer dollars to Ontario has been an annualized one of 6.2 per cent. We are looking at a total increase from 1984–85 to 1992–93 of $3.7 billion.

On a per capita basis it is a transfer of approximately $283. I cannot see the logic in his argument. I know he is projecting ahead to what they might or might not get, but those are merely projections. The truth is that we are going to continue to increase our support to the provinces.

I hope the member will address that.

Mr. Butland: Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to address the problem.

I think the member is, as we all do, using statistics to his own advantage. I suspect I may be guilty of that at times too. However he has to get real. Everyone keeps saying that Ontario is a wealthy province.

Any members from Ontario will tell you just the opposite. Sault Ste. Marie is one community that is desperately hard hit. He throws statistics at me but the number of people who have exhausted their UI in the past year, just over the past 12 months, is up 110 per cent. That is a staggering statistic.

He throws these global figures at me and asks: "How do you react to these hundreds of millions of dollars in increases?" That may very well be true, but it does not begin to address the real problem. That is the problem with the members opposite. They are in some imaginary world saying: "We are listening to our people. Do you know what they are telling us? We are doing a great job".

That cannot possibly be true. I know the member is a very sincere individual but I think he is trying to deceive the House. I retract that, Mr. Speaker.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to convey my sympathies to the Minister of Finance on this recent budget. I can only imagine what a horrendous job it must have been trying to repair an economy that unfortunately his own government has virtually destroyed. No doubt the minister has done his best in trying to produce an effective budget. I cannot fault him for that. But as the Canadian Chamber of Commerce has said: "The budget falls short; it is simply not good enough". The chamber could not be more correct in its analysis.

This budget attempts to be all things to all people and in so doing does nothing for anyone. In short, this budget is a non–event, there is no significant attempt to either reduce spending or stimulate the economy.

In a recent Maclean's article the Minister of Finance has said: "If the Reform Party supports the budget that is fine. I guess the important thing is that we (meaning the Conservative government) are here and we are able to implement these things".

First let me say unequivocally that the Reform Party cannot support this budget. Second, I would like to ask the minister what he means by being able to implement these things. What things? Is he talking about implementing the so–called spending cuts mentioned in the budget speech?

Are Canadians supposed to be impressed that the government has cut spending increases only, not actual spending? Canadians are looking for real reductions in government spending, not simply a reduction in the percentage increase. In fact, the government's program expenditures are forecast to rise by 4.7 per cent in fiscal 1992–93, well in excess of the 2.7 per cent inflation rate we are experiencing now. This represents a real increase in spending, not a reduction as the government would have Canadians believe.

It would be unparliamentary, of course, that I cast aspersions and say that the government, perhaps, is lying to Canadians about spending reductions. So I could not and would not say that. But how can Canadians have any confidence that this government is serious about deficit reduction when spending is actually on the rise. This government's projection for 1992–93 expenditures represents a real increase of $4.1 billion or 2.6 per cent.

The 1991–92 deficit is nearly a billion dollars higher than previously forecast and the 1992–93 deficit, now forecast at $27.5 billion, is also significantly higher than had been predicted in earlier budgets. What we have in effect is a government that every year paints a picture of declining deficits and every year fails to deliver on this promise.

How much longer can Canadians tolerate the failure of this government to actually reduce the annual deficit? Not much longer, I would argue, especially when the accumulated total debt is approaching half a trillion dollars. That is right, Mr. Speaker, half a trillion dollars, edging in on $500 billion that we are in debt. It is time for the government to take action on this economic crisis before it is too late. The government's tired excuse of "we will get the deficit down next year" simply will not cut it with Canadians any longer.

Part of the rationale for the government's deficit reduction projection is its overly optimistic economic forecast. While I have every confidence in the entrepreneurial spirit and work ethic of Canadians, I have serious reservations about the government's forecast of real GDP–GNP growth achieving 4.5 per cent, as we have seen in the budget papers for 1993.

This is a rather bold prediction and Canadians can, therefore, only hope the government is accurate in its analysis. If the government has over–estimated this GDP figure, inevitably it has also over–estimated its ability to reduce the deficit. Moreover the minister has built his budget on the foundations of a very low inflation rate. If he is wrong, if the inflation rate increases and if high interest rates follow, the foundations will give way and the whole structure will collapse.

The government expects this phenomenal growth to be led by a strong increase in residential construction and consumer spending in response to lower interest rates. But what has the government done to encourage construction and consumer spending? The short answer is very little.

Under pressure from the Liberal Party to accept its one and only idea to stimulate the economy, the minister threw in a token homebuyer's plan that would allow Canadians to use existing funds from their registered retirement savings plans to buy a principal residence. Under this plan, individuals may withdraw up to $20,000 to buy a home and would have to repay this amount within 15 years. Is this the best the government could do? Or should I say is this the best the Liberal Party could come up with to encourage growth in the economy? Perhaps it is just a bad joke.

I do not want to condemn the government for absolutely everything that it has done. There were some positive moves in this. But one does have to answer the question, does anyone in his or her right mind think that this plan is going to pull our economy out of the recession. I cannot think of anyone who has been putting money into their RRSP in anticipation of a magnanimous gesture by the government.

It would also seem to me that anyone who has $20,000 in their RRSP fund more than likely already has a principal residence. The converse of that is true as well, that young families that want to buy a house and are prepared to do so do not have a lot of savings in their RRSP. I wonder where this great infusion of capital into the housing sector is supposed to come from.

The most disturbing element of this proposal, however, is that the government is telling people to use their retirement income to buy a home in what is already a very uncertain market. The government has already mortgaged the future of Canadians through the public debt and now it is asking them to mortgage their future privately as well through their RRSP plans.

There is absolutely no guarantee over this 15 year payback period of what interest rates will be and I think people are very nervous about taking that money which was safe in their RRSP fund out to put toward a mortgage.

Perhaps the government believes that consumer spending will increase because of an insignificant symbolic personal income tax cut. The Canadian Chamber of Commerce has concluded, and I quote: "That small personal tax reduction and the provisions to encourage business would be too small to have a meaningful impact in stimulating growth, yet large enough to call into question the real strength of the government's commitment to deficit and debt reduction."

According to the government's own figures, a single taxpayer earning $30,000 will receive a tax reduction of $76 in 1993. I wonder if this single taxpayer is going to be terribly excited in receiving this generous tax break after having been hit by the GST last year.

What the government is effectively saying through this measure is that the GST is making them so much money that a tax reduction of such minuscule proportions will not adversely affect revenues. The government is taking a dollar from every Canadian in the form of the GST and then handing them back a penny saying: "Here is your tax reduction".

The government has also neglected to mention the fact that personal income taxes as a percentage of total federal spending have increased from 41.2 per cent in 1984–85 when this government took office to 47.7 per cent in 1992–93. This indicates that more and more the government has been shifting the burden of federal spending on to the backs of the middle class.

This so–called tax break is much like the government's attempt at spending reduction. These policies are designed to have Canadians believe that taxes and spending are actually being reduced but in reality both taxes and spending are actually increasing.

To be entirely fair to the government, however, as my colleagues have been saying, there are some good things in this budget for which we need to give them credit. One of the areas that I would like to give the government credit for is adopting the new child benefit. This new benefit finally targets child supplements more fairly to low and middle income families. The government must have been reading our Reform Party policy book where it states: "The Reform Party supports greater focusing of social policy benefits. We prefer to target benefits on those who need the help and do so in a rational and compassionate manner."

It is about time the government woke up to the need for this type of efficient method of providing for social benefits rather than clinging to the NDP dogma that allowed high income earners to receive family allowance cheques regardless of their need. Sometimes I wonder if the New Democrats really mean what they say about helping the poor. Why do we not target benefits to the poor rather than having those of us who are very comfortable in our income bracket still collecting government money when it is totally unnecessary?

At any rate, the government is certainly moving in the right direction with this new consolidated child benefit.

My only question is this. If this new benefit is to be streamlined and more effectively focused as the government says it is, why will it cost taxpayers an additional $400 million per year? I thought the government said it was reducing expenditures, not increasing them.

Besides this new child benefit, the government has also attempted to appropriate other Reform Party policies in this budget and nobody says it more clearly than the press because they know what is going on and it is very interesting to read what some of their articles say. I say attempted because the government has not really done the things that it says it actually has. Take, for example, this budget's privatization initiative or streamlining as it is referred to in the budget speech. The government is obviously gearing up for an election so that when the time comes it can go to the Canadian public and say: "Oh look, the Reform Party has nothing on us. In this last budget, we wound up, deferred, merged and privatized 46 government agencies, boards, commissions, corporations and advisory boards."

This all sounds very good on the surface, but when you look a little closer at what they are talking about, you really begin to see how insignificant many of these agencies actually are. CN (West Indies) Steamship Limited is a good example. Apparently it hardly exists except on paper. I ask then, how can the government "wind up" something that actually wound up a long time ago and then go back to the Canadian people and tell them about the government's great efforts toward privatization.

The real question should be this, why is CN (West Indies) Steamship Limited still on the books in the first place? Are Canadians supposed to be impressed that after seven and one–half years the government has finally awakened to this fact. I think not. I am quite sure Canadians see through this transparent budget and the veil of responsiveness to the Canadian people, but unfortunately, a veil only.

To conclude, let me say this. The government has promised spending reductions. In reality, we have seen spending increases. The national debt is now approaching half a trillion dollars, as I mentioned, and this budget does almost nothing to deal with it. The government says: "We are cutting $1 billion.".

Neither has this government done anything to actually stimulate the economy. The best it could come up with unfortunately is a half–baked scheme for a limited number of people to use their RRSP money for buying a house.

Unfortunately, this budget provides no leadership whatsoever and that is what Canadians are crying out for more than anything else. Perhaps the government would now consider seriously stepping aside so that real leadership may be gained and the people of Canada given a budget that they can actually live with and be given some optimism as we move towards the 21st century.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I note my hon. colleague's suggestion that leadership should be given. I listened intently through the whole 10 minutes of my colleague's address. I did not hear one suggestion where reductions should take place.

I did not hear a criticism in specifics to the increase in government expenditures in agriculture. I know her party's policy is an over–all reduction of 15 per cent of all government expenditures instead of an increase in agriculture and instead of an increase in child benefits of some $400 million, which she criticized. I would like to ask her what she would have cut to address that $400 million. What would she would have reduced beyond the 15 per cent to have an increase in agriculture, an increase in the other expenditures to make up for the reduction in government income with lowering taxes. That has to be a benefit to the people of Canada.

The other thing I would ask the hon. member is if she could identify what her party would have cut and what her party would have put forward if it had the opportunity to lead.

I know her leader has turned down six invitations to appear before the Standing Committee of Finance to explain this presto magic that he is prepared to work for the Canadian public. I will sit down now, Madam Speaker, and allow the member ample time to explain the cuts that the Reform Party would put in place in old age pensions, old age security and assistance to agriculture and other economic forces in the country.

Miss Grey: Madam Speaker, without sounding facetious, I think as we look through these budget papers, I would recommend probably that the very first place the hon. Minister of Agriculture could make a very significant cut, not simply a 5 per cent cut, would be to his ministerial salary. That is to take place on April 1.

The budget also said that the government would cancel all first class travel seats for members of Parliament and senators. I understand from some of the airline companies that most of those first class seats are actually being taken out on all domestic flights.

I think that is probably a good place to start. I am not sure whether there are first class seats any more on flights back and forth to Saskatchewan. I have not seen any for a very long time on aeroplanes moving in and out of Alberta at any rate.

Those are the types of things that people in the Canadian public are looking at. He asked me about specific places where we can cut. There will be nothing in our blue book that will say there will be 15 per cent cuts across the board. This minister unfortunately is going around the country saying: "There we are. The Reform Party is going to take grocery money away of seniors. It is going to cut hospital beds" Nothing is further from the truth.

• (1900)

In areas especially with agriculture that this minister asks specifically about, we believe agricultural input costs must be lowered. We are talking about lower interest rates. I give this government credit that it has gone down somewhat. There is still a fair spread. We are looking at somehow coming up with negotiations with the GATT that we do not necessarily need to be talking about domestic agricultural policies when we are at the GATT negotiations. We are looking forward to seeing what this government is really going to do at the GATT negotiations rather than flying from Mexico over to Europe and saying: "This is how we are going to address this problem".

We believe that this federal government also specifically could get rid of many Crown corporations. Again, this has been a start in this budget. When we are still running a $27.5 billion debt in this country, it is simply not good enough.

The Canadian public wants equality of sacrifice across the country in the agricultural sector as well as in the public sector, as well as people in the private sector. I am a teacher by trade and I know that many teachers whom I speak with would stand up in this Chamber if they were here with me and say: "I would take a cut across the board if I knew that every single Canadian, if every sector in Canada were to say that they are serious enough about this debt situation".

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Miss Grey: These people may laugh, but I belong to a teaching union. Unfortunately here we are having a problem, but I believe that every sector if they were hit could write on note paper: "We are willing to take a cut right across the board so that there would be equality of sacrifice in every sector of Canadian society". Those are some specifics. I know that the agricultural community needs to deal with this.

We are looking forward in the long term. Farmers are not keen about subsidies. They do not want government handouts. What we do want to make sure is that we are able to see equality of sacrifice in every sector in society. It is unfortunate that I hear the hoopla from the agriculture minister. It sends a very sad signal to every community across the country that really cannot afford to be laughed at any longer.

We are running $30 billion deficits every year. Even teachers are not pleased with that. They understand how important it is to get this debt situation under control. They are teaching the young people who are going to be burdened with such an incredible debt load as we move toward the next century. I do not think anybody would have that.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, I listened to that exchange with some interest. Of course, here in Ottawa the secondary school teachers are about to strike, looking for 11 per cent over the next two years. Perhaps the trustees ought to contact some teachers in Alberta and ask them to come down.

I am distressed because the Reform Party does present itself as a different kind of political movement. I listened to a very clear question on what the Reform Party intends to cut and I heard a very long answer containing nothing. There was no explanation of where these cuts are going to fall. Of course, that is the easiest way of avoiding a question known to humankind.

I would be very interested in hearing whether the member for Beaver River would answer two very simple, very clear questions. What government spending specifically does the Reform Party intend to cut and, second, what does the Reform Party say about the supply management systems in Canada, in particular the marketing board system that exists in dairy and poultry in this country? Are they for it or would they dismantle it, yes or no?

Miss Grey: Madam Speaker, I am always interested. I have a great deal of respect for my colleague from Ottawa South and in his critic's position he will be interested as they are riding rather highly in the polls right now. What is going to happen if he were for instance to become the next Minister of Finance? He would stand up in his place right now and say: "I can't tell you specifics until I look at the books". That is most interesting. That is exactly what has happened as they have been sitting in opposition for so many years now. He gets very tired listening to the government carry on about "you Liberals left us with this incredible debt", and so on and on it goes.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Miss Grey: Madam Speaker, we are hearing great shrieks across the way again. I have already said that I think that supply management is an area that is domestic agricultural policy and we are looking at international disputes right now. I believe that many people in the supply management industry would say in all honesty right now that we do not want unfair subsidies. We are looking for very comfortable methods of making a living. People who are continuing to fight against this whole idea of supply management are seeing people at a level who are saying: "We are really looking after you". People in the supply managed industries are saying: "We want a fair shake and we do not want unfair government subsidies". Therefore, I think it would be very interesting.

As I spoke with people who came here for the great rally a couple of weeks ago, they gave very good representations. I think when we look at all agricultural industries, moving down the road, not next Thursday afternoon but down the road, to eliminating and working out subsidies so that we would be on a more fairer playing field with other countries, that is what is important.

I also have to say that a Liberal colleague was dying to get his speech in here tonight and asked me if I would take a shorter amount of time. I certainly was prepared to do that but I have to apologize to my friend in the front bench here if he does not get a chance to speak.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There are 45 seconds left for questions.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Madam Speaker, I will make mine very quick, because I know the member has been a member of Parliament for about the same period of time I have, all but for a few months. We have the lowest deficit that we have experienced since we have been in Parliament together.

In her three years of experience, we have identified 45 agencies we are closing which is going to cost 500 people their jobs and affect 2,000 in total. Has the member in her three years of diligent work on behalf of her constituents found other agencies she would like to recommend to us today that she would be prepared to see us close down?

Miss Grey: Madam Speaker, I am certainly not prepared to give names of agencies. If this is in fact a serious question, there are many, many areas. I could take the hon. member on a 10 minute walk from Parliament Hill and identify—

Mr. McKnight: Which one? Name them.

Miss Grey: Name one agency. I will do more than that. I will name every federal cabinet minister in this. I would say the best agency we could cut a lot of spending in is trimming this over-bloated federal cabinet from 40 down to at least 25 members. I think that would be a wonderful start.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The time has expired.

[Translation]

Resuming debate. The minister will take 10 minutes?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Yes, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Very well. The minister has the floor.

Mr. Blais: Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to support the budget brought down by my hon. colleague. Incidentally, I think it is rather interesting to see how skilfully members of the Reform Party avoid taking a stand on the supply management issue.

People who are listening should realize that the Reform Party both objects to and agrees with the Dunkel report on tariffication. According to them, we should abandon Canada's historic position. That is the Reform Party's position, because there was a question about it just now. Unfortunately, we could not get a specific answer. However, Canadian farmers from all over Quebec and especially from Ontario, where the Reform Party— This party is not interested in Quebec, for reasons which escape me, or perhaps I should say its interest in Quebec is limited to getting up on the same table with the leader of the Bloc Quebecois. Both leaders want two Canadas. They agree on that score, but when it comes to telling us how we should run the country, they are not as forthcoming.

Under previous governments, Canadians were often misled by people who promised them proper control of public spending, which was seldom successful because of all the spending they did. We inherited a $38 billion deficit in 1984, which had gotten completely out of control. It is too bad the hon. member for the Reform Party can't hear me, Madam Speaker. It is too bad, but I will mail her a copy of the text.

Since 1984, we have been involved in a fierce struggle to control the deficit. We reduced the size of government bureaucracy and the number of government employees. We made the bureaucracy "lean and mean". I think we have made its operations more effective and, above all, we realized the danger of letting deficits escalate freely. However, we decided against leaving this sinister legacy to the next generation. As the latest attempt to stop the spiralling deficit, this year's budget is a model of restraint, a document that maintains the programs Canadians hold dear while taking the fat out of the government bureaucracy and controlling the deficit.

Thanks to the 1992 budget, Canada will seek to achieve sustainable growth, and we will have laid the foundations for the prosperity of future generations, Madam Speaker.

The budget brought down by the Minister of Finance in this House elicited an unusual reaction from the media: nothing but praise and approval. In the newspapers, on television, observers throughout the country have approved of the direction taken by the federal government. Business reacted positively to the lower tax burden on manufacturing and processing and also, to the stronger support measures for research and development. In a difficult fiscal situation, finding more money for research and development is an objective in itself and that we did it deserves praise.

Consumers also reacted favorably to the reduction this year and next of individual income tax. The financial community was glad to see the deficit limited to $31 billion, even in this recession year. We made a mistake, it is true; we predicted $30 billion and got $31 billion. That is 0.7 per cent of a $150 billion budget. Compare that to the Ontario government, which is $5 billion out on a $50 billion budget, or 10 per cent. I think that our projections are much better and the results are there to prove it.

As a result of the finance minister's prudence and wisdom, when the markets opened the day after the budget speech, the Canadian dollar made substantial gains on the world's currency markets. Madam Speaker, given such a vote of confidence, does one need more evidence that our government's budget, albeit imperfect, is surely a step in the right direction?

Admittedly the reaction was not unanimous. Some people, including the hon. Leader of the Opposition, said that they were very disappointed with our budget. I dare say, Madam Speaker, that if our government were able to walk on water, I think that the Liberal leader would say that it was because we could not swim. When they see others try to innovate, some people can only criticize and rarely, as we just saw, suggest concrete solutions to help the country improve the situation.

As Destouches said, criticism is easy, art is difficult.

[English]

Apparently a contemporary of Destouches, Voltaire, told us as well: "Common sense is not so common". This is particularly true in the Commons. How else can we explain the reaction of the hon. leader of the NDP on the budget. Undaunted by either common sense or economic reason, my hon. friend opposite declared the 1992 budget a massive failure.

It seems that the New Democratic Party would be satisfied only with a veritable explosion of spending following the inspiring example of her friend, the Premier of Ontario. Presumably she is concerned that the resulting bloated deficit would likely mean that Canada's future fiscal policies would be dictated by the International Monetary Fund. Fortunately, however, they are in the minuscule minority. To say that their reactions run contrary to the mainstream would be an understatement.

The merits of this year's budget are clear. It provides real benefits to Canadians through programs for business as well as through measures that help taxpayers where it counts most, their pay cheques. It is a tribute to the skill of the Minister of Finance that at the same time as he has held down the deficit, he has managed to give Canadians a break on taxes.

Taxpayers' after-tax income will increase by $500 million in 1992-93 and by more than $1.2 billion in the following year. Some 14.6 million Canadians will benefit by this cut in personal income taxes. Most important, these tax cuts will not increase the deficit. They are funded by reducing government spending.

[Translation]

That was the secret, Madam Speaker. Raising the deficit, borrowing money at the expense of our children who will come after us to maintain Canadians' standard of living and the level of programs is not a solution. It was tried in the past and did not work.

We had to reduce our spending. That may be why we have been unpopular for a year or two, because we said no. People who were used to being told yes for one or almost two decades suddenly were told no by a government that wanted more reasonable spending in line with what the country could afford.

At the same time that the Minister of Finance gave Canadian taxpayers some necessary tax breaks, he resolutely attacked the cost of government. Since no government can ask citizens to tighten their belts without setting an example itself, the Prime Minister and all the ministers in his cabinet have taken a cut, as was just mentioned.

Since my time is going very quickly, Madam Speaker, I would conclude by stressing an important point in the budget.

We have been criticized for attacking the sacrosanct principle of universality, as was mentioned several times. I think that we must approach this question in the most open-minded way. Indeed, we used money that went to the wealthiest in society and use it now for those in greatest need. I believe that it was necessary. We did it. It will give $500 million more to the neediest families and workers. This reform of family benefits is an outstanding success.

Madam Speaker, I still have a very long list of the benefits of this budget. In closing, I think that we must all applaud the Minister of Finance and support him most warmly.

Mr. Gaby Larrivée (Joliette): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to participate in the debate on the budget tabled by our government for the 1992–93 fiscal year.

First, I want to thank my colleague, the Minister of Finance, for a budget that takes into account the concerns of the population of Joliette and of all of Canada.

Last January, during the Christmas recess, I had the opportunity to meet several of my constituents. These people told me about their main concern, namely the economy. They told me that the government should reduce its expenses and learn to live according to its means. They also told me that they felt overburdened with taxes. Today I can tell my constituents that the government listened to them.

Madam Speaker, we cannot review this budget without taking a quick look at the way the previous federal government managed public moneys in the last 20 years.

• (1920)

The deficit that Canadians have to live with did not simply appear. This deficit is the result of bad management that started in the mid-seventies and went on until the mid-eighties. From 1975–76 to the 1984–85 fiscal year, Canadians watched their government incur operating deficits that increased year after year, going from $2.25 billion to more than $16 billion within 10 years.

It was not easy for the Conservative government that was elected in 1984. When it came to power, the accumulated deficit stood at approximately $206 billion. The budget deficit was $38 billion, that is an operating deficit of $16 billion and $22 billion in interest payments on the debt.

As early as September 1984, the Conservative government put some order in the management of public funds. It gradually reduced the operating deficit and eventually converted it into an operating surplus in 1987. Since then, the federal government has not had any operating deficit.

This good management of public funds was not enough to keep the accumulated deficit that stood at $206 billion in 1984 from climbing to $420 billion in 1991. To understand that, we must look at what is this accumulated deficit for 1991–92. This deficit includes an amount of $206 billion which represents the national debt that we inherited. If you add to this debt compounded interest of $239 billion and subtract our government's operating surpluses, which total $25 billion, you arrive at that national debt of $420 billion.

Madam Speaker, this government has come a long way since it tabled its first budget and it was no small task. We had to reduce our spending while continuing to provide Canadians with the services they are entitled to. That is what this government has been striving to do since 1984. As was so well put in an article by Georges Angers in Le Soleil, "the economic and financial situation the Conservatives inherited in 1984 necessitated the drastic procedure carried out by the fine surgeon that Michael Wilson has been."

Madam Speaker, had our government allowed revenue and program expenditures to remain at their 1984–85 level relative to the Gross National Product, in 1991–92, the deficit would have been $83 billion instead of $30.5 billion and the accumulated debt would have risen to $728 billion.

In the public interest, some difficult decisions had to be made by this government. As could be expected, a number of these were not very popular, quite the contrary. But we were not elected to win popularity contests. We were elected to provide sound government.

Some would probably have liked us to settle for solutions of the past, such as increased spending to boost the economy. But government can no longer afford to spend and spend and spend. At any rate, economic recovery does not proceed from greater government action but rather from an appropriate climate in the domestic economy.

The government made the wisest choice in deciding to cut spending which Canadians had been requesting for months.

These cuts will enable us not only to reduce the deficit and to cut taxes, but also to pay a social dividend to Canadians and Canadian families.

Madam Speaker, following the last Speech from the Throne, the Conservative caucus committee on family issues, chaired by Al Johnson, set out to find ways of providing support for families. What the committee recommended was simple enough. Government was to make the tax system simpler and fairer in order to respond to the needs of families.

The work of our caucus committee was not in vain. The Minister of Finance did take its recommendations into account. In fact, several very major proposals regarding the family are included in the budget.

For one thing, it makes the tax system fairer for married couples. Starting in 1993, common law couples will be treated the same as married couples for the purposes of the tax system, thus eliminating any past discrimination against married couples.

Then the budget proposes a major reform of the present family benefit system to make it simpler, better targeted and more generous toward lower income families.

This does not put an end to the universality of social services, rather it focuses our efforts on families most in need. This is a question of fairness and social justice.

With his budget, the Minister of Finance clearly shows that our government is responding to the needs of Canadian families. I also see in this budget, Madam Speaker, a package which will allow the economy to reach cruising speed again. A government can no longer artificially prime the economy by throwing money right and left. This was tried by the previous government, in the early 80s, with the catastrophic results we now know.

A responsible government can no longer afford such measures. Economic success cannot come from expedients leading nowhere and too often tried by others.

The citizens of Joliette and Canadians in general know that an increase in spending would mean a larger debt, and that a larger debt would lead to tax increases. This is not the way my constituents want the government to follow.

The 1992 budget reflects the good suggestions received from Canadians by the government during pre-budgetary consultations. This budget provides Canadians and Canadian businesses with the means to achieve a strong and sound economic recovery.

Personal income taxes will be cut. The reduction in the general surtax will affect more than 14 million taxpayers who will enjoy increased purchasing power.

The Home Buyers Plan will allow Canadians to use their RRSPs to buy or build a home, which will make it easier for people to own their own homes and at the same time stimulate the construction industry.

The budget also contains a number of measures to encourage initiative and productive investment. These measures will encourage the development of the private sector which, after all, is the sole real source of economic growth and job creation.

Small business is included in this budget as well. First of all, the Small Business Financing Program will help small businesses in financial difficulty. In addition, the ceiling for loans to individual small businesses under the Small Business Loans Act will be increased to $200,000.

Madam Speaker, the federal budget was well received by the business community. The president of the Quebec Chamber of Commerce, Mr. Denis Mercier, said the budget was very good, while the ex-president and now administrator of the Conseil du patronat du Québec, Mr. Sébastien Allard, said the budget was responsible, considering the current economic and financial situation.

In concluding, I would like to comment briefly on the role of the budget committee of the Quebec Conservative caucus in preparations for the federal budget. In recent months, the committee I had the honour to co-chair with Senator Bolduc examined the government's spending programs.

In a report submitted to the Minister of Finance, we suggested ways to bring public spending into line. Upon reading the budget, I was delighted to see that the Minister of Finance included several of our recommendations, and by the way, we fully intend to submit another report some time next year.

Finally, I believe this budget is a step in the right direction and that it will accelerate economic recovery. However, more has to be done, and I think we will have to continue our policy of strict controls on public spending if we are to introduce programs that respond to the new needs of our society and especially programs that will help us prepare the future of generations to come.

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Joliette talked about the government spending cuts announced in the last budget. I also heard him mention a social dividend. I know that many small- and medium-sized businesses are established in the area he comes from, and that this budget contains measures for those experiencing hardships as a result of the recession.

The budget provides for measures such as the Small Business Financing Program that would allow businesses to benefit from substantially lower interest rates, the revenue from the amounts loaned to them being considered as dividends on the part of the lending institutions. I would like some clarification on that point.

• (1930)

The budget also provides for an increased capital cost allowance rate on small business equipment acquisitions, which will actually differ or reduce the amount of tax that would otherwise have to be paid.

Furthermore, I believe a reduced tax rate for small business was also announced in this budget. This reduction is important because besides Canadian investors, some foreign investors do also invest in small businesses in our ridings and these foreign investors can figure out the cost of settling here as opposed to settling in the U.S. for instance. Hence the importance of reducing tax rates in the budget.

Finally, the budget also contains a measure providing that the withholding tax rate on dividends payable to foreign concerns be eventually reduced to five per cent, again, to attract and promote foreign investment in Canada. The question I ask the member for Joliette is this: during the weekends he spends in his riding, what comments did he hear from his constituents on these fiscal and economic government measures to improve and accelerate the growth of small business?

Mr. Larrivée: Madam Speaker, let me reply to the member for Lévis. As I mentioned in my presentation, there are numerous measures bringing relief to small businesses and, as he very well said, there are mostly small businesses in my riding.

We all know that small businesses create most of the jobs. That is why government adopted those measures, to help them.

As my colleague mentioned, numerous measures were adopted. I believe our small businesses have been requesting for quite some time now that we modify, that we increase the government guaranteed loans. We multiplied by two the limit, bringing it up to $200,000. That limit was modified not only because the needs had increased so much but also because, in the present situation, small businesses needed more help of that nature.

It is all very well to help them, to allow for easier borrowing, but it is even better to offer them an acceptable interest rate. And just now the minister responsible for small businesses announced that they will have the opportunity to borrow at a rate below the prime. That, I think, is really helping small businesses.

We will also be able to help by increasing the capital cost allowance rate for machinery. I feel that this is another very important measure. We know that manufacturers must modernize, buy new equipment. These programs will help them acquire more sophisticated machinery, equipment better adapted to today's markets. Manufacturers will then be allowed to depreciate their equipment at a higher rate and that is an incentive to modernize.

Madam Speaker, you are signalling me my time is over. Of course there are more measures concerning our small businesses; I thank my colleague for raising that question.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, with 1.5 million unemployed Canadians, many of whom are running out of benefits and many of whom are being placed on the welfare rolls, no wonder there is a sense of anxiety and even a sense of anguish across this country. Those who are working are worried about their future. What we find is that Canadians have lost confidence in their future. They have lost confidence in this government, as revealed in poll after poll. In other words, Canadians are now counting the days until the next election.

It is legitimate to ask how come we have reached this point in the evolution of our history. Evidently there are good reasons. This is the government which has gutted co-operative and social housing programs. This is the government which has deindexed family allowances. This is the government which has reneged on child care programs.

This is the government which has dismantled or is planning to dismantle through this budget the Science Council of Canada, the Economic Council, the Environmental Advisory Council, the Law Reform Commission, the Ocean Institute, and the Institute on International Peace and Security, to name a few. This is the government which has dismantled the energy division of the National Research Council, Canertech, Petro-Canada International.

This is the government which has given away the publicly owned Telesat, Petro-Canada, Air Canada, and de Havilland. This is the government which has weakened the national fibre through cuts to the CBC, through cuts to VIA Rail, and through cuts to the National Research Council.

This is the government which has cut services to the public. It has cut services in a way that it has deteriorated the quality of postal services, in a way which has prolonged the waiting period for those who apply for Canadian citizenship, for those who want to apply for immigration services, for those who depend on unemployment insurance offices.

This is the government which cut air traffic controller training, resulting now in costly delays both to travellers and to our national air carriers flying into and out of Pearson International.

This is the government which signed a bad trade agreement with the United States, an agreement which does not give Canadians any special access to United States markets, which gives the United States a greater advantage over us, which causes unemployment in Canada, which commits to the United States Canadian energy resources whether we like it or not.

This is the government which wastes money on a prosperity committee at $24 million a year; for one year $20 million to hold seminars, to travel, to advertise to pay fat per diems. This amount of $24 million a year would more than cover the cost of all the advisory councils which are being killed and would cover the cost several times of the Court Challenges Program which has been demolished.

This is the government which tolerates 10.5 per cent unemployment, having promised jobs and campaigned during an election promising jobs, jobs, jobs.

This is the government which promised in 1984 to cut the deficit by more than half. The deficit today has hardly been reduced while this same government has managed to double the debt since coming to office.

This is the government which blames everybody else where things go wrong. When an ex-ambassador, Ambassador Al-Mashat, is allowed to come into Canada under special measures, it blames an official in the Department of External Affairs.

For the length of this recession this government blames the consumers. For high interest rates it blames the Ontario economy. For the failure of the environmental green plan it blames individual Canadians. For the fishery crisis this government blames scientists and seals.

This is the government which increased taxes at least 33 times since coming into office, consistently punishing low and middle income Canadians.

• (1940)

This is the government which promised to double research and development spending in 1984. Instead it has starved post-secondary education, research and development, the National Research Council, and other governmental scientific programs.

This is the government which has weakened Confederation by freezing payments to the provinces, thus forcing budget cuts for hospitals, universities, social programs, you name it. The dismantling of Canada has started here in Ottawa by starving transfer payments to the provinces.

This is the government which through the present Minister of National Defence, the former Minister of communications and culture, removed from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation the mandate of promoting national unity. This is the reason why the CBC today cannot accept advertisements that promote national unity.

This is the government which gave Canadians the GST which taxes books, which discourages consumers, which prostrates retailers, which slows down the economy, which encourages cross-border shopping, which taxes indiscriminately, which imposes a regressive tax and taxes indiscriminately products whether friendly or unfriendly in environmental terms.

This is the government which jeopardizes Canada's unity by reopening the constitutional file, producing the ill-fated Meech Lake proposals, and recreating now a crisis atmosphere with unrealistic timetables. Once again the Prime Minister of Canada will likely roll the dice.

These are part of the answer. They are just a few of the many reasons why Canadians have lost confidence. This government has broken faith with the electorate of Canada. This government no longer enjoys public support as demonstrated poll after poll.

The sooner an election is called, the better for Canada and for Canadians. This is a very brief assessment of the quality of the budget that has been put forward lately by the Minister of Finance.

Canada is in a very sad shape. The sooner we get rid of this government, the better it will be for the country.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the comments of my very distinguished colleague from Davenport who has just set straight the record of the government across the way. Seldom have more eloquent words been stated in this House than by the hon. member for Davenport who has just spoken.

I want to raise a number of issues with the member for Davenport and ask him to respond at this time so that Canadians can understand the depth of knowledge of my colleague, especially compared with the government across the way.

In the budget the government announced this Registered Retirement Savings Plan to "create more housing". However at the same time it cancelled the co-op housing program, thereby cancelling out housing construction that would have otherwise been created by that program. If I understand it correctly, there is a net loss if we take the gains of one program and the loss of the other.

Given that the MP comes from the city where there is a tremendous housing shortage, namely Toronto, I want him to indicate more fully to our colleagues across the way just how wrong-headed the government's cancellation of the co-operative program is.

Mr. Caccia: In thanking the hon. member for his question I would like to stress the fact, as he has already done, that the co-op housing program and the social housing programs across Canada have done a lot of good for Canadians who have taken very good advantage of them. The co-op housing is a very profound tradition that has been established in the country over the decades. The social housing provides for a population mix which has proven to be one of the greatest successes not only in Canada but, by comparison, with other parts of the world.

By cancelling these programs the government has shown a callousness and a sense of indifference to social needs that is unthinkable, that is unbelievable. It is one example of many as to why Canadians have lost confidence in this government.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being 7.45 p.m., it is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 84(6) to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith the question necessary to dispose of the main motion now before the House.

[English]

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

Softwood Lumber

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion carried. Pursuant to the order passed earlier today, the House will now proceed to the special debate on the situation that is now facing the softwood lumber industry.

SPECIAL DEBATE

Madam Deputy Speaker: For the purposes of this special debate the question before the House is the following one:

That this House do now adjourn.

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, as we are all aware by now, the United States department of commerce has made a preliminary determination that prices charged by Canada's provincial governments for the timber used in softwood lumber production provide countervailable subsidies to their products.

The U.S. department of commerce determined that log export restrictions in British Columbia as well provide countervailable subsidies to British Columbia lumber products.

It estimated the net subsidy at a rate of 14.48 per cent of the final value of all lumber shipments from Canada excluding, of course, the Atlantic provinces.

Permit me to put the problem in a bit of a historical perspective.

The first dispute we had with the United States over our lumber trade was back in 1892. Throughout the intervening years there have been disputes. In fact, in some cases the Americans complained that we were deliberately curtailing shipments to the United States, thus retarding their ability to build homes.

Let me quickly come to the more recent round of disputes in our lumber trade with the United States which really takes us to the 1980s.

It was in 1982 that the first action of the kind we are dealing with was launched. At that time the coalition of lumber producers in the United States, particularly led by the Pacific northwest producers, laid claims that we were subsidizing our lumber through procedures of collecting economic rent through the stumpage procedure.

Now one would quickly ask what brought on the action in 1982. Well, the action was brought on in the main because of a recession in 1982, a recession of the same kind we are suffering right now.

That recession put extra pressure on the producers in the United States who would have preferred to bring about an increase in the price of lumber and increase the demand which would have created and saved the jobs that were being lost.

At that particular time we launched the same kind of appeals and actions that we launched at this particular time. The findings at that time by the tribunal that was set up determined that our stumpage rates do not provide a subsidy in the sense that they are not specifically targeted at one industry or specifically targeted at one company.

That ended the issue at the time but it was reinitiated in 1986 and again we asked ourselves what the reason for that would be because nothing had changed. The stumpage rates stayed the same, the way we allocate economic rent stayed the same and in the main, we carried on in the same fashion.

• (2020)

What did change, however, was an increase in our market share in the United States from roughly 28 per cent to 33 per cent. Of course, there was a very, very significant change in the exchange rate. You will recall that in 1985, the Canadian dollar in comparison to the U.S. dollar was at 73 cents which of course gave our industry an advantage which in turn made it more competitive in the U.S. market. In turn that resulted in an increase in our market share.

That brought on the countervail action in 1986. It was not that there was a new light shed on the subsidy question. Everybody remembered 1983. There was no subsidy. But it was because our industry had carved itself out a larger market share.

At that particular time after the preliminary determination of injury and subsidy, it was determined that there was a 15 per cent advantage to Canadian companies.

The process was launched to impose a duty on our lumber entering the United States which, in turn, to make a long story short, ended up in the MOU. That was really quite an innovative way for us to protect our provinces and our industry from this haemorrhage of losing the 15 per cent to the treasury of the United States.

What we did instead was impose an export tax on our lumber and kept the 15 per cent subsidy in our own treasury. That is, the federal government collected it and quickly turned it over to the provinces.

The MOU also made provision that for any province that wished to bring about offset measures either in increased stumpage rates or in a greater imposition of silviculture costs to the company, that over time or as these off-set measures were implemented, the export tax would be reduced.

In fact, a lot happened since 1987 in that area. Looking at British Columbia, for instance, a year after the tax was imposed, it did restructure its whole stumpage arrangement, increasing its economic rent from the industry from between $600 million and $700 million a year. It went far beyond what it had to do in offsetting the 15 per cent.

In addition to that, it imposed on the industry which was proper and right to do, the entire responsibility for the renewal of our forests, a cost of between $4.5 to $6 a cubic metre which also should have been, could have been, and was considered as an offset.

In fact, immediately after that happened, British Columbia no longer paid the 15 per cent. The offsets were sufficient.

About the same situation occurred in the province of Quebec. In 1987, that province brought in a totally restructured stumpage appraisal system, and again passed on to the industry certain responsibility for the management of the forests.

All in all, the offsets in Quebec reduced the 15 per cent perceived subsidy tax down to 3.1 per cent. That was really the situation which we found ourselves in now.

Incidentally Alberta as well made some changes in its forestry act which could also have been considered as an offset, but it never applied for it.

All in all, 92 per cent of all the shipments to the United States were really affected by the initiatives taken by the provinces of Quebec, British Columbia and Alberta. We were merely dealing with 8 per cent of the shipments which came from Alberta in the main, and the prairie provinces.

That is not all. That is not the only thing that happened between 1987 and 1992. What also happened is that our dollar increased from 73 cents or 75 cents to a high of 88 cents which of course created a serious problem for our industry. All of us are painfully aware of that.

As well, as a result of this currency exchange rate change, our market share dropped again from 33 per cent, which it had been at the height in 1987, to 27 per cent.

In other words, from an American perspective the MOU had served its purpose. We were down to our traditional market share of 27 per cent—incidentally it was 28 per cent in 1980—and our industry had imposed upon it much higher economic rent and a much greater imposition in terms of management costs.

It was for that reason that we sent a signal to the United States that it was our intention to implement or exercise our right under the MOU to terminate the MOU. We sent that message on September 3, 1991, and the termination came into effect on October 4 of the same year.

Let me give a sense of the magnitude of this particular trade with the United States. In 1990, that is one and one-half years ago, we shipped to the United States 11.8 billion board feet of lumber. To put this in another perspective, that amounted to $3.2 billion. That is just in the softwood lumber trade, not considering all the other trade in forest products that we do with the United States. Incidentally that is 52 per cent of the total Canadian production of softwood lumber.

To give an idea of the importance of the solid wood sector in Canada, there are roughly 1,000 firms right across Canada, from Vancouver Island to Newfoundland. They pay $2 billion in salaries to 75,000 people who directly work in the industry. They have roughly $9.5 billion to $10 billion in sales. It is a very critical, a very important industry in terms of our dependence on it for our economic well-being.

What triggered this new round of countervail action? As I said earlier, the main reason is the recession. We are now back in the same boat that we were in 1982. It is a serious recession. It is very stubborn in the United States.

Because of the fact that it just so happens that our solid wood producing sector is a lot more efficient than that in the United States, we do have a bit of an advantage despite the fact that our dollar from the perspective of the wood converting industry is at an exceptionally high level.

There is another factor that has entered the equation. That is all the environmental pressures that have put a real serious pressure on the log supply situation. There are timber supply shortages everywhere in the United States caused by this, the set asides, the spotted owl and all those great debates creating real problems for the United States industry, problems for which it is looking for a scapegoat to blame.

Really what the industry in the United States needs is a massive increase in lumber prices. What it needs is a massive increase in log prices.

It works particularly well for companies like Georgia Pacific which have large tracts of privately owned land. Every time log prices go up, the price of the property goes up. It is the consortium Georgia Pacific in the south that is pushing and that created the problem this time in the United States. It is not the Pacific northwest producers because they know what their problems are.

There are some people in the United States who have a great incentive to bring about this action, despite the fact that this action will also result in an increase of between $1,000 to $3,000 for every home that is going to be built in the United States.

The cost of this imposition, this tax, has to be passed through to the consumer of the United States. It cannot be any other way. Our industry cannot absorb it. It will either shut down and create new demand or else the price will go up and the result will be the same.

What the Americans want is a level playing field, they tell us. How can that be? How can there be a level playing field? It is not possible. We have 90 per cent public ownership in our country. It is up to provincial and federal governments to establish the economic rent that we want for this natural resource. Public ownership in the United States is roughly 26 per cent. It has mostly a privately owned resource. There is a profound difference.

In our country we have roughly 453 million hectares of forest land. A quarter of that is under timber management. We have horrific problems in our country living up to the very serious international obligations we have as custodians of 10 per cent of the planet's forests. We do not just manage our forests for timber. We manage them for the ecology in terms of the environmental equations and in terms of all the other measures that are there. So there cannot be a level playing field between Canada and the United States.

As I said, we also have a much different view of our obligations to manage. We have agreed in the green plan to set aside 12 per cent of our entire space, huge areas of forest land that have never been accessed with roads and other infrastructure.

To put it bluntly, we do not intend to allow our good neighbours to the south to manage our forests and to tell us what our obligations are not just to our neighbours but to the rest of the people of the world.

Some say, and we will hear it tonight, that we should not have got ourselves into this mess in the first place or that perhaps we should not have terminated the MOU when we did. Some will say that the free trade deal is at fault too. I have heard that said by some of our opposition colleagues.

Let me remind them that when the situation was dealt with in 1986 we did not have a free trade deal. If they would have mounted the effort we are mounting now in 1986, there would have been a great risk and the provinces did not want to take the risk.

In the first eight months of the 15 per cent MOU tax we collected and sent back to the province of British Columbia over $300 million. This was money that would have accrued to the treasury of the United States. We did not have a dispute settlement mechanism. We did not have a tribunal to go to as we have now. We are in a much different situation. Thank God for the free trade deal because we now have access to doing these kinds of things. Now we have a dispute settlement mechanism at the end of this current process.

How does this current process work? It is important that we put that into its proper perspective. There are four steps to it as there were the last time. There is a preliminary round which determines first of all injury. It has to be proven by the proponents in the United States. Then there is a preliminary subsidy determination.

That is the stage at which we are now. We have had now a preliminary subsidy determination which imposes a tax of roughly 15 per cent on top of what we have already had before.

One could argue that in the case of British Columbia and Quebec we would have been better off not to offset the previous determination and paid a tax over the years and perhaps we would have escaped the new finding. It is grossly unfair because B.C. and Alberta will have a new imposition of the same amount as the other provinces have that did not offset. I am not entirely sure that this is not a cynical design to break the solidarity of the Canadian coalition of the provinces, the industry and the federal government.

There are two other steps, the final determination of injury and subsidy. The whole process will be complete in July of this year. We are appealing at every step of the way. We are sending armies of lawyers and mountains of paper to the United States. It is not a foregone conclusion that this process will result in what everybody expects it will result in, although I have to confess that considering the political interference in this process I do not have very much faith in it. When all is said and done we fully intend to fight this proposition tribunal under chapter nineteen of the free trade agreement. It is an independent judicial process. It is a joint Canadian–American process. There will be Canadian judges and adjudicators sitting together with the Americans to look not at politics, not at exchange rates, not at any other factor, but at the facts that are before them. And the facts will bear out that we should be vindicated.

As well we have already launched an appeal with GATT. A panel has been established and that panel will report in June. Again I am confident that it has to rule in our favour because the facts are so overwhelming.

But all of that does not relieve all of us here, particularly the industry, of our anger and our disgust with this process, this behaviour of our friends. This is scandalous, to say the least. We are mad about it and they should know that we are.

The commerce department in fact initiated this latest round. It was not initiated by a lumber coalition as it was the last time. It was the department of commerce, middle management officials in the United States who initiated it themselves.

There is the bonding requirement which is illegal under GATT and any other tribunal. The log export component is hypocritical, because there is a ban on the export of logs from the United States from federal lands. Why should they throw that into the equation? But, worst of all, they are hurting their own people. As I said, the result has to be an increase in prices of lumber for their own people.

Why would they do these things? I can only conclude that it is perhaps for the same reason that our opposition colleagues here tonight will attempt to lay blame entirely on the federal government for this particular situation, instead of giving recognition to the fact that the world has changed. We have to consider our trade prospects in a global context. We live in a different world today. The Americans had better learn, and learn fast, or else they will be left behind for good, to get out of the situation they are in, mired in their dreams of past glories when they could always have their own way. The world has changed. They are no longer top dog in every area.

No doubt we have benefited immensely from living so close to the most potent and powerful market in the world. So have the Americans benefited from living close to us and from having us as good friends. They must re-learn who their friends are in the world and start playing by the rules that are now written for a new world.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Madam Speaker, we have heard the minister's defence of the government's mishandling of what is a fundamental issue for Canadians: the question of how we trade with our principal trading partner, the United States.

The issue before us manifests a problem with the free trade agreement that is not only reflected in the specific issue of softwood lumber but of course is also reflected in the automobile problems that have arisen in the last weeks, and further the question of the treatment of magnesium exports from the province of Quebec to the United States. I speak in effect of the whole issue of how Canada and the United States regulate their trade under the free trade agreement.

Let me first say a word about the specific question of softwood lumber exports from Canada to the United States, the specific issue that is before us this evening, before I turn to the broader question of the inadequacies and shortcomings of the free trade agreement as a method of providing a framework for Canada–U.S. trade.

We have seen in these last days the response of the United States to the decision of Canada, the belated decision of Canada in October, to terminate the 15 per cent export tax on softwood lumber exports to the United States. I say "belated" because in our view the government should never have accepted the practice of imposing an export tax on our exports of softwood lumber to the United States. There was—and the minister touched on but did not elaborate on the government's reasons for rejecting the alternative—the alternative of the GATT. It might have been a solution to the problems we are encountering today if the government had had the courage to pursue the GATT alternative back in the years when this issue first arose.

All Canadians have had reason to regret the absence of the commitment to the GATT that the government exhibited on the occasion of its acceptance of an export tax to deter Canadian softwood exports to the United States. Why it chose that route instead of the GATT route can only be a matter for speculation, at least on our side of the House, but I would have to think that the fact the decision to impose the export tax came at the same time as the final negotiations were going forward on the free trade agreement itself may not have been entirely coincidental.

In retaliation for the Canadian government's cancellation of the memorandum of understanding on softwood lumber including the 15 per cent export tax, the United States department of commerce—and I want to stress that it is the United States department of commerce itself, the United States government—has acted to impose by coincidence a 14.48 per cent duty on Canadian softwood lumber.

This obviously is going to require immediate response from Canada, from Canadian producers and Canadian exporters, in the sense of posting bonds immediately on shipment of softwood lumber to the United States. That alone is a major burden for the Canadian exporters to assume. We export currently about $3 billion worth of softwood lumber to the United States annually and the duty now imposed could cost Canadian exporters almost $500 million in annual duties. That is clearly a major deterrent to the effective continuation of our exports to the United States.

Time and again during the free trade debate of not many years ago, the Conservative government promised Canadians that the free trade agreement would secure access in the United States market. Well, what have we today? We have the exact opposite.

I mentioned a moment ago the evidence that is accumulating of barriers that are being placed in the way of Canadian exports to the United States market despite the existence of the free trade agreement. We have seen the issue of Canadian pork being hindered from entering the United States market. The resolution of that issue was a matter of almost two years, during which time the interests of Canada were adversely affected. We need not only look at the question of pork. The instance of automobiles is before us all. We are conscious of the obstacles that have now been placed through the United States customs service on the export of Canadian built automobiles into the U.S. market. We have seen more recently still the question of Quebec Hydro and magnesium exports to the United States. In the free trade agreement we obviously did not win secure access to the United States market, and that was the whole justification for the free trade agreement.

The Conservative government should certainly not have signed the memorandum of agreement even though the free trade agreement was not then in place. The government says that in effect it had no real option because it did not have a free trade agreement at that time. It was under intense pressure from the United States to restrict exports of softwood lumber to the United States and it caved in to American pressures and imposed our own export tax on Canadian exporters.

Having finally recognized the folly of its own ways and also having recognized that as the Canadian dollar has increased in value one of the principal complaints of the United States has evaporated, the government finally got the courage to remove the export tax.

In so doing it has brought about substantial damage to the future prospects of Canadian exporters because it immediately invoked in the United States the import duty which will have a particularly severe effect on the provinces of British Columbia and Quebec.

The Leader of the Opposition in the province of British Columbia has consistently drawn attention to the importance of softwood exports to the United States. He has also drawn attention to the fact that the situation today is that B.C. and Quebec exporters are not only paying higher stumpage fees as a result of the actions of the provincial government but are now faced with the additional 15 per cent duty imposed by the United States. As a result the cost of doing business has effectively doubled.

I want to stress that this action was taken by the United States government itself, which is rare in trade between our two countries. It is not in response to a complaint by the U.S. industry but is rather an action taken by the United States government, which is in effect acting as the investigator, the prosecutor and the judge in this case. There is no way in which the free trade agreement can be offered as an adequate answer to that particular practice of the United States. It has rendered the Canadian exporters of softwood lumber more and more vulnerable to American pressures.

I want to quote the Minister for International Trade. He said: "We have argued strenuously that Canadian stumpage practices and log export restrictions do not constitute subsidies. We will continue making that argument to the U.S. department of commerce and, if necessary, to an impartial, bi-national panel provided for under the free trade agreement".

The minister says "—if necessary to an impartial, bi-national panel". However, the fact is that the existence of the free trade agreement and the so-called impartial, bi-national panel has not acted as an obstacle or a hindrance to the United States in pursuing its protectionist commitments in the case of softwood lumber, or in the case of automobiles as I mentioned a moment ago.

We have in the free trade agreement a dispute settlement mechanism that is seriously flawed. The purpose of the dispute settlement mechanism was to provide a way in which trade disputes between our two countries could be settled amicably and by common understanding. In fact, that is not the case at all.

• (2050)

The agreement which instituted the bi-national panel merely provided for a panel to consider whether U.S. trade law is fairly applied. It is not to decide whether some objective, third party standard is met but whether U.S. trade law itself is being fairly applied. The decisions of the panel, even in that limited area, are not binding unless the two governments have a prior agreement that the decision of the panel should be binding. The result is that we have a dispute settlement mechanism that is both biased and flawed.

In the specific case of softwood lumber we will very likely see a decision to resort to the bi-national panel. However, that decision will be made only after a further process is completed within the United States itself.

A moment ago the minister drew attention to the fact that in this process we are only at the second of four stages. It will be several months yet before reference could be made to a bi-national panel. At which time the bi-national panel will take some time to complete its consideration of the Canadian case against the U.S. import duty.

What does this mean in practice? It means that in the provinces of British Columbia and Quebec, and the western provinces generally, it will be necessary to pay the U.S. penalties in the meantime. What is this government prepared to do? It got itself into this situation in which Canadian exporters are being penalized. It has got itself into a situation in which the Canadian softwood lumber industry is going to be adversely impacted, adversely affected by the agreement. Will this government offer the industry some assistance in seeing it through what is obviously a very difficult interim period until, as we all hope, a satisfactory resolution is reached?

What is the Canadian government's commitment to help companies with bonding requirements? What is the Canadian government's commitment to assist the workers, employees and companies with the assistance they may need during this period of review of the arbitrary U.S. decision?

One of my colleagues in the course of our discussions in the last days has drawn attention to the Employment Support Act of 1971. Does the government choose to employ that opportunity to direct assistance to an industry, and I quote: "whose exports are subject to unfair duties and harassment by foreign countries?" The Prime Minister has described this issue and the automobile issue as vexatious harassment of Canadian industries. By saying that the industries are being harassed by the American government is the government saying that it will assist the industries through this period of adjustment?

Let me turn for a moment to the more fundamental question. I will touch for an instant on the question of the effectiveness of the dispute settlement mechanism within the free trade agreement. I noted its flaws and I noted its ineffectiveness. I want to pursue that point.

The government chose that route. It accepted an inadequate response to the U.S. demand that it retain within itself its own sovereignty in the question of dispute settlement in foreign trade matters.

The United States was not prepared to concede to any tribunal or third party the opportunity to pass judgment on U.S. trade practices. The basic reason the United States government chose to make that a condition of the completion of the free trade agreement was that it would not subject its own subsidy practices to the surveillance or consideration of any third party or any impartial tribunal. The major flaw in the free trade agreement is that there is no provision in the agreement for the definition of subsidies or for the treatment of subsidies in an impartial tribunal considering whether there should be penalties for such subsidies.

That is the basic flaw in the case of the softwood lumber question we are considering this evening. It is equally the basic problem in the question of the export of the North American content of Canadian-built automobiles being exported to the United States.

The government chose in its wisdom or in its folly to complete an agreement which was in effect incomplete. The government said: "We will not pursue the matter of subsidies with the United States. We'll leave that question aside, recognizing of course that it is a major question, but we will leave it aside hoping that somehow the GATT will reach agreement and offer to the United States and Canada a definition of subsidies which we can later insert into the free trade agreement".

That theory may be fine. It may be a good idea but unfortunately the world goes on. Questions arise on subsidies in the meantime. Questions arise on countervail. Questions arise on penalties for subsidies. We see that inadequacy of the free trade agreement increasingly today. We see it in the issues of softwood lumber, we see it in the issue of automobiles. It is a result of the failure of this government to reach an agreement on subsidies and how those disputes on subsidies should be settled through an impartial panel with binding powers.

The result is that the government has chosen to use a bi-national panel which has no binding powers unless the two governments choose to recognize a binding requirement. The further result is that Canadian exports are subjected to harassment and unfair trading practices without any immediate appeal to those practices. The result is that Canada is at a severe disadvantage in the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

I ask the minister, who has spoken this evening, and the government generally: What does it intend to do? What does it intend to do to counter the ineffectiveness of the free trade agreement as has been so clearly demonstrated in the case of softwood lumber today, and last week in the case of automobiles manufactured in Canada?

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate tonight. I want to thank all members in the House for agreeing to this debate. I called on Monday and Tuesday for a debate similar to this so that members of Parliament could send an important message to all Canadians, in particular those Canadians in over 300 forest communities in this country who are dependent on the forest industry for their livelihood and are being affected dramatically by this recent trade decision by Washington, and the U.S. commerce department.

It is important tonight as well to make sure that we do send that message to Washington, D.C. so that they understand our concerns and the representations we make on behalf of our constituents.

Third, I see as a very real and important part of tonight's debate that we must keep pressure on our own federal government to ensure that we do not get into the situation we were in in 1986 when it sold out Canada, and sold out Canada's forests, by signing the memorandum of understanding with the United States.

Tonight, after a weekend of cabinet meetings to discuss this issue, with sabre rattling from the Prime Minister and claims by the trade minister that they are going to fight all the way, I am disappointed. We did not get a clear game plan tonight, a line of action from the minister.

Canadians and people concerned about this issue must be able to see clearly that the Government of Canada, with the provinces and the industry and in particular the people who work in the forest industry, know that as partners in this debate we are there to make sure that we fight for Canada's interests. That is important because the debates we have had in this House in just the past week or so have been about our resource industries.

They have been about our farms, the fishing industry and now our forest industry and forest workers.

It is clear that the decision by the U.S. commerce department on Friday is unfair and is unjustified. The decision by the U.S. commerce department is going to add almost 15 per cent to the cost of our lumber exports to the United States. This imposition of the tariff across all of the provinces in Canada, but Saskatchewan and the Atlantic provinces in particular, will have a dramatic impact on the forest industry and the workers in that industry.

In fact it is going to hurt Americans. It will add some $1,500 to the price of a home that Americans want to purchase and will mean that President Bush's game plan to try to get home starts going in the United States will falter as his election campaign is.

In particular, the singling out of the British Columbia log export policies is hypocritical and ridiculous. As has been pointed out, both Washington and Oregon states control log exports. Washington, D.C. approves it and its move to include the log export policy from British Columbia is, and I underline it, a hypocritical policy. It is one that I am certainly pleased the new government in British Columbia, forest minister Dan Miller and Premier Harcourt, have already discussed. They have made their voices clear and loud about how they view this issue.

It is an important issue to us. This country exports over $3 billion in lumber exports to the United States. It is clear just how dramatic and important this issue is when it is in dollars alone.

We have to take a brief step back in history to see just where we are and to set the stage for where we are now. Members know, of course, that these lumber disputes go back a long time. We had one in recent time, in 1982, when Canada actually won the case.

As has been pointed out, the issue resurfaced in 1986, provoked by U.S. lumber interests through the memorandum of understanding, the infamous memorandum of understanding. I say "infamous" because of the dramatic impact that agreement had and how we ended up in the mess that we are in today.

If our governments of the day had dealt with the issue at that time, no one is to say we would not have another dispute but we certainly would not have yet another cloud over the heads of our industry and the workers in the forest industry.

At the time, you will recall the now Prime Minister said it was a good deal for Canada. In interviews later on, the current forest minister said that the MOU was not a major worry for the forest industry, but we take issue with those views. We do not believe they are an accurate reflection of just what the situation is in the forest industry or in the whole matter of the trade disputes surrounding this issue.

We even had the most unfortunate situation where the former Socred government of British Columbia actually sided more with the Americans than it did with Canada. There have been published reports, astounding reports, which stated that when a Canadian team was negotiating and working out its strategy, the then premier and his forest minister in those meetings would later that night call the Americans to tell them what the Canadian strategy was.

That is an appalling approach for the premier of a province to take. I for one would say thank goodness that government is gone and that we now have a government in British Columbia that is prepared to fight and to defend the interest and the forests of our province.

Those who were deeply involved in the negotiations of the memorandum of understanding and the free trade agreement will tell you that the pressure from Washington at the time on Ottawa and the provinces was tremendous. The federal government and the provinces basically sold out our forest industry in order to get a very flawed free trade agreement.

Information we have obtained through the access to information legislation shows that the American commerce department would use the memorandum of understanding to challenge virtually anything that they considered to be a subsidy to our industry.

When Canadian National Railways and B.C. Railway decided to encourage more freight traffic, the Americans challenged the right of our railroads to reduce freight rates. They alleged that it was yet another subsidy. At that time our government told the Americans to shove off, it was none of their business. We supported them for that because it is just ridiculous given the mess we got into with this memorandum of understanding.

We supported the government as well when last fall it gave notice to the United States that the memorandum of understanding should be cancelled. We should never have been in that situation in the first place but the decision to scrap the MOU came too late and cost thousands of jobs. In the case of British Columbia, estimates from B.C. ministry of forests are that over 7,000 jobs were lost in British Columbia alone.

The accelerating integration of mills, that is bigger mills swallowing up smaller operators is a dramatic change in policy in British Columbia and particularly in my area. Our industry was hit by dramatic changes within the province from which it is still reeling.

In northern Ontario exports to the United States are down by 45 per cent. The memorandum of understanding was a big mistake and was the forerunner to the problems we are in now with the United States.

We supported the decision of the government to scrap the MOU because clearly it is a question of sovereignty and our right to be able to manage our forests the way we want to and not to be dictated to by Washington, D.C.

I know the message Canadians are telling their members of Parliament. It is clear the free trade agreement is failing Canada. It seems we have more disputes now under free trade than we ever had. They are either ongoing or have been dealt with. We have had disputes over salmon on the west coast, magnesium, lobster, aluminum, beer, pork, plywood, automobiles and now of course, we are dealing with perhaps the trade issue between Canada and the United States and it is softwood lumber. If we take a look at the record and the facts in this particular softwood lumber case, it is a particular concern just exactly how vexatious, to use the words of the Prime Minister, that the Americans are being on this particular issue.

I would like to quote an article in the March 6 edition of The Wall Street Journal, written by Mr. Gordon Ritchie, who was formerly the Canadian ambassador to the U.S. and deputy chief negotiator of the free trade agreement. Let us take a look at what he says:

> In a further example of the kind of treatment that has astonished America's Canadian friends, the Commerce Department summarily refuse to consider 323 of 334 routine applications for duty exclusions filed by Canadian companies unconnected with any program being investigated in the softwood lumber case. The Commerce Department said it did not have the time or the resources to consider the applications.

They have certainly had the time and resources to start a trade war with Canada over softwood lumber. Further, quoting from the same article: "Still not satisfied, the administration—"

It is not just the functionaries that the Prime Minister is talking about. If it is just the functionaries, who is running the government of the United States? It is the Prime Minister's friends obviously. President Bush clearly has to call some functionaries into his office to straighten them out and tell them who his big friend is up north in Canada and to just to lay off a little bit.

Let me quote:

> Still not satisfied, the administration invoked the draconian provisions of section 301 of the Omnibus Trade Act of 1988—often brandished but never used against either Japan or Europe—to impose customs liabilities on Canadian lumber, even before any preliminary determinations of injury or subsidy were made. This action clearly violates American obligations under the General Agreements on Tariffs and Trade and the Free Trade Agreement.

These are our great friends to the south, our great trading partners. They are making these kind of decisions prior to any determination from their own commerce department. It is a pretty clear indication from the government of the United States just how it treats the free trade agreement and how much care it really gives to the Canadian government and its views on this whole particular issue.

The Conservatives say do not worry, free trade will save us. Of course we have had some time for the cabinet to consider this particular issue. It has had months. It has had weeks, knowing that this decision was impending, but there is a sense of the quiet before the dawn. Do not worry, this whole thing will not happen. We have the free trade agreement. That is going to save us because we have the dispute settlement mechanism and that is going to solve all of our problems.

The government did not use the time, it would seem, to build bridges with the homebuilders' associations in the United States that are now working on our side to make the point to their own lumber interests and their own commerce department. It was not this government, it was the government of British Columbia and Premier Harcourt who made overtures to the governor of the state of Washington on the log export policy. On that one we have a clear position. It has been the government of British Columbia that is leading that fight, not this government because it has its free trade blinders on to any particular issue like this.

Domestically, while the Conservatives talk the good fight, talk about how they are going to take this to the wall, what does the government do? It continues to encourage a domestic policy of a high dollar that is killing our exports to the United States and is adding to the problems. The government would appear to be putting all of its eggs in the free trade basket. It is pretty clear that is what it is hinging this whole thing on, and let us hope so. For all those people who are dependent on the jobs in the forest industry, we are going to have to hope and pray for something a lot more than what this government has been able to offer so far. Let us take a look at a couple of the concerns and at some of the opportunities that could have been used or should be used. I refer members to an article in the March 8 edition of The Toronto Star that reviewed the concerns over the dispute settlement mechanism and some of the advantages. In this case Mr. David Crane argued why we could use an existing mechanism and why it would be better. With regard to the dispute settlement mechanism he wrote about the scope of the panel, if it is ever established. Not to be an alarmist, an article by Mr. Ritchie makes reference to U.S. officials suggesting that they may refuse to be bound by the decision of the bi-national panel. As one person suggested, it is like having an ugly, vicious dog just sitting there and waiting. They are saying: "If you do not do what we say, come to the table and sell out to us like you did in 1986, we are going to sick this ugly dog on you and you are never going to get your so-called favourite dispute settlement mechanism and resolve this problem".

The scope of the dispute settlement mechanism has been mentioned before. The concern is that the main purpose of the panel would be to determine whether the United States has properly applied its own trade law against Canada. It would not conduct a new investigation. Under GATT it is talking about a faster and quicker decision, one that judges disputes on the basis of the rights and obligations of member countries under the GATT system, not on the basis of any one country's law.

We have to continue our fight at GATT. Our leader has already said that the message to the United States should be that we are out of the NAFTA talks. We have to give a message to Washington, D.C. that we are not going to roll over and play dead on this particular issue.

Through debates in Parliament we have to keep pressure on our own government so that it does not repeat the sellout of 1986. Our forest communities and workers depend on it. People who work in communities like Prince George, Robson Valley, Fort St. James, Burns Lake, Fraser Lake and Houston want the government to fight it all the way. They do not want fine words. They want a government that is going to stand up for Canada, that is going to fight for the interests of our forests, and keep up the fight for the sovereignty of our forests.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak on behalf of the government tonight in this very important debate. I would like first of all, if I could, to extend my congratulations to the Minister of Forestry and the member for Prince George—Peace River for his masterful summary of what has taken us to this situation, his analysis of it, and his explanation of our options and of our strategy. The masterful address he gave should be printed and sent to all these Americans who are harassing us, as well as sent to the members of the opposition who should read it carefully because in there are the kind of facts that the opposition would benefit from reading.

I am speaking on behalf of the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade tonight because of the importance of this program from the point of view of our over-all industrial structure and indeed our trade performance.

I want to make a couple of preliminary comments and just centre my remarks primarily on a key facet of the American complaint, that is their objection to our lack of exports of raw logs. This apparently is a large part of what they call their countervailable case, and I want to centre my comments on it.

Before I get to it I really should remind the House, especially when I listened to the Liberal Party talking a few minutes ago, that when the MOU was signed in 1986 we brought in a process whereby we would collect the tax and we would turn it back to the provinces for them to put into the forestry industry, and guess what happened? In the province of Ontario, under the Peterson government, the Liberal government collected—I have a letter here that calculates this—$63 million of revenue since the memorandum of understanding was signed in December 1986 until October 26, 1989. This is a letter to the member of Parliament from Timiskaming. Of the $63 million in revenue, $18 million only, $18 million, that is all, was returned to the forestry industry by that Liberal government.

• (2120)

So when Liberals stand up and tell you how concerned they are about the forestry industry, remember that ratio: they collect $63 million and put a very small amount of it back into the industry.

The hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley from the New Democratic Party made a couple of points that I want to make a couple of responses to.

He asked a very interesting question. He asked: "Why are we having all these troubles with the Americans, all these cases—hogs, raspberries, strawberries, Hondas—when we have the free trade agreement?" He is giving the impression that somehow the free trade agreement creates these problems. In fact we have had, I think the last time I looked, 18 different bi-national panels established to deal with problems with the Americans. One might ask: Is this because of the free trade agreement? Well, of course only someone who knows nothing about the American political and social and economic problems today would say it had anything to do with the free trade agreement. What it has to do with is the mounting fever of protectionism in the United States.

Virtually every part of the American economy is going through a convulsion of protectionism. We foresaw that. We foresaw that this would be the case increasingly in the late eighties and the early nineties. This is why we were determined to put in place a framework that would give us something new to deal with it. The free trade agreement did that by putting in place the bi-national panel.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell you a little story about the bi-national panel. I remember having a luncheon meeting with the Japanese Minister of Trade about a year and a half ago. He said: "Tell me something. How does this bi-national panel work when you have a trade dispute with the United States?" I said: "Well, you have one American judge, we have a Canadian judge, we have a neutral chairman and they decide". He said: "Does it take forever for them to decide?" I said: "No. It must be decided within 315 days".

The Japanese minister said to me: "Now, let me just get this straight: You have equality with the Americans when you have a dispute? But they are 10 times the size of Canada." I said: "You've got it right, they are 10 times bigger than we are but we have equality now when we have a dispute". As a result, the minister said to me: "That's a pretty good deal; we would certainly like to have something like that".

That is the reality and that is the power of what the free trade agreement has given us in the middle of this fever of protectionism that we are facing from the United States.

One other comment. The NDP made a complaint that we are putting all of our strategy here on this matter into what he calls the "free trade basket". He completely overlooks the fact that we have a GATT panel that has been struck for this. It is going to be pronouncing in June, or July at the latest. We have used our GATT options. Then he complained "but the problem with the free trade bi-national panel is that it is not binding". Well, just a minute. I have heard, by the way, the Liberal Party say and Mr. Crain said this in the Toronto Star the other day: "The problem is we should let GATT do all this, not the free trade agreement". The problem with GATT, and anybody who has dealt with GATT knows, is that GATT is not binding. GATT is a very powerful piece of moral suasion when they come up with a decision, but it is just that, it is not binding.

The free trade agreement bi-national panels are binding.

We are not putting our strategy all in the free trade basket. We are putting it into the GATT basket, we are putting it in the free trade basket, plus we will be revealing our strategy as the weeks and months unfold. What I really wanted to address in terms of substance and put on the record is the particular absurdity of one part of the American complaint with regard to this matter. It is really quite astonishing and I would like the House to be aware of just how absurd it is. The preliminary countervailing duty on softwood lumber was determined by the Department of Commerce, as the Minister of Forestry said, at 14.48 per cent. Of this, 8.23 per cent or 57 per cent of this whole countervail amount was determined to be the result of what? Of what they call an indirect subsidy to producers as a result of logged export restrictions in British Columbia.

Now, what is this? The Americans are saying to us: "You won't ship raw logs to the U.S. or Japan or wherever. You restrict them and, as a result, you should be countervailed". We are shocked that the United States would allege this. We find it ridiculous. They say that the subsidy is alleged to result from the following: By not shipping raw logs you depress domestic log prices as a result of artificially reduced demand. That is their argument.

The fact is that both Canada and the United States have restricted the export of logs from public lands for decades. This is not something new. We have done it for decades. We do not do it alone, the Americans do it. As a matter of fact, they do it for conservation reasons. They have got the spotted owl for example that they want to protect and they do not allow the export of raw logs in certain areas because of that. These restrictions have never been a problem up until now. In fact, log export restrictions were explicitly acknowledged and accepted as part of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

Why do we not export raw logs? The reasons are that we want to conserve a valuable natural resource to meet multiple uses that the public increasingly demands of our forests such as wilderness for hunting, tourism and timber supply. In fact, sawmilling interests in the Pacific northwest want increased controls on log exports. They recognize that the United States' actions against Canada could undermine any efforts to strengthen domestic controls.

In conclusion, in this part 57 per cent of their whole case is based on an absolutely ridiculous contention. We are absolutely positive we are going to win this. It is ridiculous that the Americans have taken this to the stage they have taken it. I am confident that we may not even have to reach a bi-national panel because of the strength of our position.

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, I too welcome the opportunity to say a few words on this very important issue not only for northern Ontario but also for northern B.C. and Quebec where the industry holds a very special place.

Before going any further, I would just like to bring a correction to what the forestry minister said in his opening remarks. He said that in 1982 the Coalition of Lumbermen's Associations in Canada was centred and came mostly from B.C. He forgot to mention that the Ontario Lumbermen's Association was directly and very actively involved in this action in Washington as well as La fédération des manufacturiers de bois du Québec.

Just to give you a little background, the issue and the problem go back to 1982 where the industry fended off by itself an attempt by the American lumber producers to have a duty put on Canadian lumber. It should be mentioned that at that time the industry spent some $7 million and won its case. The government did not help. In 1986, the Americans started again and this time the government negotiated, on behalf of the industry, the softwood lumber agreement where it bowed to American pressure instead of letting the Americans impose the duty on Canadian softwood lumber and go immediately to GATT. Then the second error had not been made yet. The memorandum of understanding was grandfathered into the free trade agreement. Like other speakers have said, the free trade agreement was there to abolish tariffs and barriers, not to increase them.

Of course, there have been serious consequences to this memorandum of understanding. In my riding alone six sawmills have been closed and 2,500 jobs have been lost. Exports to the U.S. plunged from a high of 88 per cent in 1986 to a mere 5 per cent in 1991. The remaining sawmills are operating at half capacity, not only because of the recession, but primarily because of the 15 per cent export surtax.

At the national level, from 1988 to 1991 Canadian exports have declined steadily, 12 per cent between 1988 and 1991 and 5 per cent in 1991 alone. The share of the U.S. market has dropped from 33 per cent in 1987 to 26 per cent in 1981. When one considers that lumber exports to the United States account for $4 billion a year, 7 per cent is the equivalent of $280 million a year less that the industry is making. This explains the thousands and thousands of jobs that have been lost to date and the risk of losing more in the very near future.

Today the province of British Columbia is mostly affected by this countervailing duty. It has some 333 sawmills and 700 small ones, which employ a total of 28,000 people in normal conditions and a further 25,000 are employed in the logging industry.

I would just like to remind the government that on top of the increases in stumpage fees that the B.C. industry was already paying, some $650 million had been paid since the inception of the memorandum of understanding and which then bottomed down to a zero per cent surtax because of the increase in the stumpage fees. Today they are back at 14.48 per cent.

An hon. member: A double tax.

Mr. Bélair: Many northern Ontario mills and B.C. mills, as well as Quebec mills, will feel the crunch. There will be thousands and thousands of lay-offs across the country. Who should be liable? Who should be responsible for those? This government should be responsible.

During Question Period yesterday I asked the Minister for International Trade what his government was prepared to do for both the industry and the workers. He avoided the question and now those people are left to fend for themselves and wait for a ruling which we are not all so confident will be in our favour.

This countervailing duty was initiated by the U.S. commerce department and the U.S. in this case, as in all other cases, is at the same time the judge, the prosecutor and the jury.

Given that my time is quickly running out, I would just like to make a few proposals of possible actions or remedies that could be taken by this government. There could be some rigorous inspection of American products crossing our border. What comes to mind readily is fruit and vegetables. There could be rigorous inspections to the point where the transport trucks would back up right down to the the Napa Valley in California. Talking about California, why not impose an import tax on California wines that are in direct competition with Canadian wines? Then the largest state in the United States would receive the same medicine that the U.S. commerce department is serving to us today.

Second, Canada should embark on an aggressive promotional campaign of our softwood lumber and other forestry products in the United States. It should stress the quality of our paper and our fibre and it should underline the impact on home construction to Americans.

To this effect I received a press release today from the National Association of Home Builders, put out by its president, Mr. Robert Buchert and I quote him: "In the last two months we have seen prices soar over 30 per cent" and "As a result of the countervailing duty, home buyers will have to pay as much as $1,000 more on an average priced new home". Then he calls the countervailing duty a protectionist measure.

Therefore, there is a possibility here that we could have the American public on our side.

Just to conclude, I still strongly believe that this is an unjustified provocation. It is an unfair trade practice which is totally contrary to the spirit of the free trade agreement. The Americans are interfering in our politics and we also differ very much on the interpretation of the words "free trade" as both definitions are not compatible at all. For the Americans it is a one way street leading straight to the United States.

To conclude, I would just like to say that this countervailing action, this harassment strikes directly at the core of rural Canada, which is all of northern Canada.

It directly affects the quality of life of 100,000 Canadians. These Canadians are only asking for job security. They want to earn a decent living in a dignified manner.

The least this government could do, with our support of course, is fight until we have used our last ounce of energy in order for ordinary Americans to benefit from the high quality of Canadian softwood lumber.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate this evening. I rise not only as minister, but more importantly as the member for the constituency of Bellechasse, which I have the honour to represent and in which there are hundreds and even thousands of jobs related to the forest industry which, over the years, has experienced some prosperity but which is now undergoing an important restructuring for various reasons. That restructuring, especially following the decision that we are dealing with now, could jeopardize many companies whose main operations are in my constituency as well as in other ones, such as Abitibi—Témiscamingue, and could also put many jobs at risk.

Mr. Speaker, the real issue has to do with the differences of opinions concerning the ability of the Canadian industry to gain a fair share of the market for public forest resources. Our American neighbours seemed to be of the opinion that if our system does not exactly reflect theirs, then it has operating problems.

• (2140)

In fact, Mr. Speaker, the leasing and pricing systems of the Canadian provinces have evolved over time to reflect the unique perspective and social reality of Canada. Those systems work for Canada. The approach of our American neighbours as regards forest management is simply difficult to accept for our government and for Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a few minutes to review the basic management initiatives that were taken, among others, by the Canadian provinces, and compare those to the American way of doing things.

The systems of forestry management in Canada and in the United States may differ, but they pursue the same objectives, namely to draw revenues from public forest lands, to promote the stable and non-speculative development of forest resources and investments in the infrastructure, and to elaborate profitable but also environmentally acceptable practices to protect the numerous uses of forests for future generations.

Mr. Speaker, both systems are aimed at achieving those objectives, but the Canadian system has enabled us to avoid many of the problems experienced in the United States. Let me give a few examples. The revenues from the sale of softwood lumber from most of the American national forests are lower than the administrative costs for each of those forests. Canada is much more successful in achieving its objective, which is to make a profitable venture of the forests that belong to the state and that we call public lands.

In the short term, the American system of cutting lends itself to speculation cycles. At the end of the 70s, American timber companies engaged in a war of speculative submissions to obtain the cutting rights on public lands. That war drove the cost of those rights well over their estimated value at the time. On the other hand, our system of forest management relies more on programs requiring companies to make investments based on long-term commitments and not on short-term forecasts as is often the case with our American neighbours.

The Canadian system prevents the type of short-sightedness and short term speculation that forced the American government to provide massive aid to timber companies. It is the American government that pays for the regeneration of most American national forests that have been cut, as well as for most of the access roads.

In Canada, the provinces have passed most of the costs on to industry. This has been done gradually, in a rational way so that these costs can be borne in the long term. For example, Quebec changed its forestry policy so that Canadian industry must now pay more for wood. On December 19, 1986 the Quebec National Assembly passed a new forestry law which took effect on April 1, 1987. It led to a thorough review of forestry policy and of cutting rights in the province. The charges for wood harvested on public lands are now based on prices in the private sector.

Implementation of this new rate system resulted in a 300 per cent increase in the price of wood. Furthermore, the new Quebec rate structure is based solely on the market price. Quebec producers have also had to pay higher costs for protection against insects and diseases and had to meet stricter environmental standards that increased operating costs.

The American system, however, makes it difficult to enforce environmental standards because the American government long ago transferred most public forest lands to private companies. For its part, Canada maintained control over public forest lands. The Canadian provinces have chosen to maintain most of their forest lands in the public sector, so that the resource can be managed in the long-term public interest.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the provincial governments can more easily supervise forests to ensure that companies apply the appropriate cutting practices and honour their forest management obligations. The American system promotes over-exploitation because it is based on short-term contracts. It is less interesting for companies to delay harvesting or to manage their cutting programs so as to make subsequent cutting activities easier and less costly.

On the other hand, the Canadian system promotes a sustained yield over the long term because Canadian provinces require most forestry companies to plan their cutting and silviculture activities on public lands over much longer periods of time. In fact, it is in the interest of those companies to maintain the long-term productivity of the forest that they exploit. This is very simple and the fact that they have reached that level has precisely made Canadians and managers of Canadian forests, both public and private, more aware of the long-term problems of that industry, and it has led them to take measures to preserve that renewable resource.

Not only is the Canadian system of forestry management better than the American model, but it also gets no subsidizing and this is what Canada intends to demonstrate by every possible means. Fortunately, thanks to the Free Trade Agreement, we now have an independent panel for dispute settlement. Canada is the number one ally and commercial partner of the United States. Our two countries have signed the most comprehensive Free Trade Accord in the world. It is not surprising that the way the inquiry is being conducted gives rise to more and more concerns since Canada is being treated like an enemy rather than an ally.

Mr. Speaker, honest trade is based on abiding by equitable, coherent and similarly applied rules. Since my time is running out, I will conclude by saying that again today I received representations from forestry companies in my riding. I want to tell them, on behalf of my government, that with the help of my hon. colleague, the Minister of Forestry, we will take every possible action to protect the interests of Canada and of the provinces. The Free Trade Agreement will precisely enable us—

An hon. member: You should have done it earlier.

Mr. Blais: The hon. member says I should have done it earlier. I have been working on this for five years now. I have even worked with the hon. member in the past and he had seemed quite pleased with my involvement with the U.S. government, especially considering that we won. We won then, and we will win again this time because I am confident in the minister and in this government. Perhaps it is about time for us to bang on the table with our fist. If need be we will do it and we will get the Americans to play fair, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, we are here tonight to discuss the dismal state of perhaps the most important industry in our country, that being forestry, and the actions and really the inactions of this government.

It is no secret that the policies that this government has been pursuing have crippled this most vital sector of our Canadian economy. All one has to do is really to read the headlines in newspapers from all across the country to get the flavour of what has been happening.

All this has happened with a government that pays lip service to the need for international competitiveness, while at the same time throwing hundreds of thousands of people out of work with its high interest and high dollar policies. Now it wants us to believe that the recession is over.

Somehow I do not think that the 1.5 million Canadians out of work are going to take stock in the government's claims. Moreover, I do not think that the many mills that have closed all across the country from B.C. to Quebec and the tens of thousands of forestry workers who find themselves with no jobs are going to believe this either.

This government has single-handedly destroyed our forestry industry. And just how important is the forestry industry to Canada? Well, over 900,000 direct and indirect jobs are provided by this industry and over 350 communities across Canada depend on forestry for their survival.

This is a critical industry for us, but tonight I would like to focus on a more specific aspect which is why we called for this debate tonight, namely the softwood lumber industry, an industry that has been ravaged by the federal government.

Why did this government bend to U.S. pressure? They used the old the devil made me do it excuse, explaining that the Americans would have levied the tax anyway and that it would be better for Canada to collect the money instead.

• (2150)

Let me assure you that this is little consolation for our forestry industry. Why did it accept the allegation of subsidy at face value without challenging it after it had vowed to fight? Can you imagine what would have happened if the government did not fight? No doubt our forestry policy would be coming out of Washington.

In trying to answer these questions the only answer that comes to mind is that the government wanted to smooth the progress of the free trade talks which were on the Canada–U.S. agenda at the time. It did this by taking a two by four to our forestry industry.

At the time most trade experts felt that Canada would have won this lumber dispute if it had taken it to the GATT, the body governing world trade, for a ruling. Even people like Adam Zimmerman, who is president of Noranda Forest, publicly stated that we should have taken our chances at the GATT.

What has the MOU done for Canada? It has caused countless mill closings and tens of thousands of people to be thrown out of work. It has seen Canadian market share of softwood lumber in the U.S. decline from 33 to 25 per cent, its lowest level in 13 years. But wait, just when you think its bad, it gets worse.

The most important aspect of the MOU and its most dire consequence is that Canada's sovereignty has been directly threatened. Under the terms of the MOU the 15 per cent duty called for could be reduced or rescinded only with American approval. This effectively meant that a piece of Canadian tax legislation reflecting Parliament's sovereign right to levy taxes could only be amended with the consent of a foreign power, in this case the United States.

Somehow in its drive for free trade this government managed to set the most disturbing and dangerous precedent in Canadian history. Big Brother to the south is alive and well and he is watching very closely after all.

There can be little doubt that provincial forestry practices have changed significantly over the five years. Our industry is picking up a greater share of the cost. For example, British Columbia has increased its stumpage fees by 156 per cent. Thank goodness that the leader of the Liberal Party in B.C. has been pushing the government toward action while we still have a softwood lumber industry to rely on. It concerns me that in an effort to move to a more market-based pricing system for timber it is the Americans dictating the pace and our practices. When their practices do not suit them they change them unilaterally. However, it seems we do not have the same luxury.

U.S. companies bid for their timber rights in three to five year contracts. If they guess wrong on what the price of timber will be in the future, and they quite often do, it can be very costly for them. Consequently, in 1984 the Timber Contract Modification Act came into being in the United States to give lumber producers some relief. I wonder if this will be considered a subsidy.

On September 3 of last year the Conservative government formally notified the U.S. administration that it was cancelling the MOU. It took the government five years, after bleeding our softwood industry for almost one billion dollars in additional taxes, to find the spine to cancel an agreement that should never have been in place. All of a sudden, out of the blue our government was talking tough.

On the other hand, the Americans wasted no time in taking action against Canada in response to this decision. They wasted no time in playing domestic politics with international trade. The day that the memorandum of understanding was scheduled to be terminated the Bush administration announced that it would impose provisional countervailing duties on the provinces of Ontario and Quebec and the prairies. After all, the U.S. administration had to be seen to be tough on trade issues if it were to gain the necessary approval to enter into the North American free trade talks with Canada and Mexico. With its latest decision, which slaps on duties of 14.48 per cent, the U.S. administration has reaffirmed that it is more important for it to pander to special interest groups than to honour international trade agreements.

Unfortunately, these acts of political bravado were taken at Canada's expense by giving our already battered forest industry a black eye.

In good times the U.S. is the world's free trade crusader. However, in economic downturns and in election years it seems to suffer from PMS, protection mood swings.

The latest American action effectively undermines our ability to make decisions affecting our resources. The U.S. has sent us a clear message that we need its approval and must play by its rules before establishing our own policies. What is our government doing? How is it responding to the Americans to protect our interests? You had better buckle up, Mr. Speaker, because we have taken the bold initiative of asking the GATT to rule on whether or not stumpage is a countervailable subsidy. To put it another way, the government has asked an organization that the United States has openly shown disdain for and whose rulings the U.S. never abides by to tell us that the way we value our natural resources is okay, even if it displeases the Americans.

To give members an idea of exactly how ridiculous are the claims of the Americans, consider the following. They are now saying that because we have in place a policy that restricts exports of raw logs, this amounts to an unfair subsidy to our industry. This is the next stage of the battle. The argument is that by limiting the amount of raw logs to export markets, more are available to our companies and this keeps the price artificially low.

In other words, we should be penalized for being blessed with an abundance of natural resources and for wanting to develop our economy as opposed to shipping everything out and buying back the finished product. This claim is so unreasonable that the American Coalition of Fair Lumber Imports is split on the issue. The states in the Pacific northwest have similar laws in place because they are facing severe lumber shortages. Indeed, just last December a Portland, Oregon newspaper published an editorial which actually supported Canada's side of this issue.

Not long ago I stood in this House to question the government on another trade threat by the U.S. concerning plywood exports. The government's answer to this was to tell me to stop trembling every time the Americans threatened us on a trade issue. When Congress was threatening an omnibus trade protectionist bill, this government trembled so much that it gave us a free trade agreement where the only thing free was the ability of the Americans to challenge and change any programs we had as a country.

After all is said and done, the fact remains that we are stuck with a free trade agreement with the U.S., an agreement that was supposed to give us free and secure access to the U.S. market. Clearly this has not been the case, as we were promised, and the softwood dispute only serves to illustrate the point. Our government told us when it gave notice to cancel the MOU that it was on solid footing. If that is the case, why has it not responded in a more forceful manner to this latest attempt of harassment by the U.S.?

Finally, the time has come for all members of this House to stand together and deliver a message to the Americans. We must let them know in no uncertain terms exactly what we think of their actions. Nobody wants a trade war because no one wins in one, but perhaps it is time that we started protecting our interests and living up to the spirit of the free trade agreement in the same way that they have. Today it is our softwood industry that is being insulted. Tomorrow, who knows what it will be?

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to participate this evening in this debate on what the Prime Minister in his speech rightly called the U.S. high-handed approach towards our Canadian wood producers. It is always most disturbing to see a country which claims to be a leader in international trade, in the elimination of subsidies distorting the export markets and an advocate of so called fair play rules, resort to an absolutely arbitrary and discriminatory 14.48 per cent duty on Canadian softwood lumber.

Mr. Speaker, one cannot help but really wonder about what the Americans think of their trade partner—in this case Canada—in such situations. Their move is almost inexplicable, especially considering its protectionist nature and the fact that it might accentuate distortions on international export markets. It is also a roundabout way by which the Americans do not trade fairly.

• (2200)

This softwood lumber saga is nothing new. The 14.48 per cent duty imposed by the U.S. is not their first attempt at destabilizing our economy. It all started in 1982. In 1986 we had a MOU, and today we have this infamous 14.48 per cent provisional duty which, according to what we hear, should become permanent later this year.

In 1986, when we put into place the MOU, the Memorandum of Understanding with the United States, it was a shared responsibility with the provinces for, as you know, forest management like all resource management is under exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces. Of course, under the Constitution, the federal government can enter into international treaties or negotiate international agreements, which is what it did when it accepted the MOU with the consent of the provinces.

Americans were claiming then that we were giving unfair subsidies to the industry, which had the effect of distorting the American market. This was discussed with the provinces and we came to the conclusion that by imposing a 15 per cent export tax, we could keep the proceeds on this side of the border. This was a compromise, since the Americans were requesting a 30 per cent tax. We managed to bring it down to 15 per cent. In every Canadian province new structures were put in place, including extensive changes to the way this natural resource was managed, the way the forest was developed. I am thinking about Quebec in particular which passed a new law on stumpage fees in public forests. Stumpage fees charged to companies were increased. Much stricter measures were put in place with positive results. We managed to reduce the 15 per cent tax imposed at the start to 3 per cent.

The government decided to terminate that agreement at a certain point in time because it then believed, and it still believes, that Canada's way of managing its forests did not create any trade distortion and that free market could now give way to competition, to the delivery of Canadian wood on the American market. In any case, the Americans are not doing us any favour when they buy Canadian wood, they need it. They are not being neighbourly, they are buying our wood because it is of high quality, because we can offer it in good enough quantities and because their building industry has needed it at a rate of between 25 and 30 per cent over the last few years.

The Americans are saying we are damaging their industry, so they impose that new 14.48 per cent tariff. A look at our exports show they have decreased in recent years. How much of a "distortion" can we create on the local American market when in fact our exports to the U.S. are decreasing? Mr. Speaker, I think this excuse makes no sense, it does not stand analysis, it can only be explained by narrow partisanship, by the fact that there is an election campaign going on in the States. If one practices excessive protectionism, Mr. Speaker, one reaches a point where the situation becomes extremely paradoxical.

I am thinking of course of all those Americans who will want to build a house during the coming year. By decreasing substantially their importation of Canadian lumber, by adding a 14.48 per cent tariff to the cost of the product, the United States is creating a situation where the onus will be on the consumer, he will have to foot the bill. It will not be only Canadian consumers or Canadian workers, but also American consumers.

You know, Mr. Speaker, that in the United States the economic development or recovery is as bad as ours, if not worse. I think that the Americans took totally arbitrary decisions. I maintain my position. I also agree with what the Prime Minister said, that this is not the way to treat an ally, a friendly country which has signed a free trade deal, the most comprehensive one that exists and that is a model in the present GATT negotiations. You do not treat that way an ally who supported the Americans in several issues these past few years. You do not act that way by giving the excuse that, for a few moments, for a few months, a neighbouring country will develop a higher protectionnist measure than is within the norm in order to satisfy political interests.

Mr. Speaker, the presidential election will come and go, but there will always be people who will have to work with other countries. At the GATT, we also sit with other countries. We know that when Americans decide to be virtuous, as they enjoy explaining it to us at the GATT, we can remind them that it's fine to speak of virtue, but it's another thing to practice it, particularly when they try to impose on us a preposterous 14.48 per cent duty.

I can give examples, because it is possible to say that we, on the Canadian side, are not 100 per cent objective, but rather biased. Take for example companies in Quebec—for the province is greatly affected by this American decision—and think about what Americans have done last March 6. You can state the criterium approximately as follows to apply this 14.48 measure: "are exempted from the countervailing duty all businesses which get their lumber supply exclusively from the U.S., or from private woodlots situated in Quebec, or partly from public forests in Quebec, but in quantities such that the financial advantages of these purchases, according to the American method of calculation, are minimal or insignificant, representing what is known as the de minimis rule in the international trade jargon". This minimal advantage equals 1/2 of 1 per cent.

Let's take for example a company from the riding of the hon. minister, Mr. Blais. For the reference period used in the study made by the U.S. department of commerce, between April 1, 1990 and March 31, 1991, here is how the volume of wood supplies for the Malbèque company was distributed: from the United States, 87.2 per cent, from private woodlots in Quebec, 9.9 per cent, from public forests in Quebec, 2.9 per cent. The so-called financial benefits from such a distribution are only 0.11 per cent, well under the 0.50 per cent tolerated by the department of commerce.

Mr. Speaker, this is another striking example of why, in the government, in the House of Commons, why all three parties have agreed to take part in this important debate on softwood lumber and on the way we have been treated. That is why we will join forces to fight this battle.

We have appealed to a GATT panel. We know that the bi-national panel established under the free trade agreement will go into action as soon as the Americans make a final decision on the countervailing duties, which they should do in late May or in June. At that point, Mr. Speaker, we will fight tooth and nail, we will continue to make sure Quebec and Canada forest industries win their case, which will enable them to continue to export first quality products in the United States according to honest and fair international trade regulations regarding softwood lumber. We will then be able to keep our jobs in this country and allow our families to earn a living with dignity.

[English]

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, we have heard the Minister of Forestry outline the history of the softwood lumber tariff. He gave us a virtual chronology of events; not an analysis of the problem, not a clear plan for a resolution of the problem, but a chronology of events.

We have heard the minister for science and technology outline a story about equality at the table: a Canadian judge, an American judge and an independent chair. "We are equal", he said. We are equal all right, equal under American law. It does not take a minister of rocket science to figure out just how equal that means we are.

The softwood memo of understanding has been grandfathered into the free trade agreement, and the minister said: "Thank God for the free trade deal because there is a dispute mechanism".

• (2210)

Let me remind the minister that Simon Reisman, our negotiator in the free trade negotiations, was never able to get Peter Murphy to agree to a common set of rules to govern our trade deal. The rules are based on American laws and the U.S. interpretation of those laws. The dispute settlement mechanism that the minister spoke of, that the minister is relying on to protect our lumber producers, was Canada's fallback position and fall back we did.

Simon Reisman conceded, in Linda McQuaig's book The Quick and The Dead:

> —if he had known at the outset that the Americans would not agree to a common set of rules, he would never have gone through the whole exercise. "If they had said (at the beginning), 'There's no way we are going to do that', I'd have thrown in the cards. I'd have gone to the Prime Minister and said, 'Get yourself another boy'."

The Americans won at the table and we find ourselves today in an emergency debate about a new tariff on Canadian softwood lumber.

I would like to thank my colleague, the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley, for his perseverance and hard work in achieving tonight's emergency debate. I noted with interest the Minister of Forestry who represents a riding in British Columbia, a very softwood dependent riding, did not mention the impact the tariff would have on the beleaguered forest industry in his riding. Worse still, he did not even mention the tremendous burden this tariff would have on the workers in his riding or the small businesses dependent on their incomes.

I would like to ask the minister: What about the workers in Chetwynd and Dawson Creek? More than 7,000 workers in the industry have lost their jobs because of the MOU before this tariff in British Columbia.

I would like to speak to the impact of this tariff in my riding of Mission—Coquitlam. This 14.5 per cent tariff translates into $75 per $1,000. Many people wonder just what is softwood lumber. There may be some people really wondering that. What we are discussing here is 2x4s and other home construction woods.

Some B.C. employers in the industry have said they can absorb some of the extra cost of this tariff, but what will the cost be to the workers? While the industry has said that if it has to pick up the extra costs there will have to be a reduction in production, that means jobs lost.

In my riding in the Fraser Valley lumber mills run from Mission to Coquitlam along the Fraser River. One mill is operating at full production. That mill is Hammond Cedar and it is operating full tilt because B.C. cedar is second to none as a decorative lumber. Every other mill in my riding, the White Wood Mills, the ones that produce housing material, are on half production.

When I spoke today to Dave Tones, president of the IWA Local in my riding, he told me that 40 per cent of his membership is laid off; 40 per cent laid off before the tariff last Friday. He said that every woodworker understands who got them into this mess. They know that the way to turn the industry around is to reduce interest rates, to lower the Canadian dollar, and to get rid of this unfair tariff.

Peter Murphy, the American negotiator in our Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement, has been heard to say that he does not think Canada will be successful in fighting this tariff under the dispute mechanism. That is interesting because Canadian lumber does not injure the U.S. The countervailing duty investigation, self–initiated by the Department of Commerce, is not about economic injury caused by Canadian imports but about retaliation against Canada for its lawful termination of the memorandum of understanding on softwood lumber.

The allegations that imports of lumber from Canada cause injury to the U.S. lumber industry are derived from five basic myths. The first myth is that Canadian imports are growing during a period of weakening demand in the U.S.

The fact is that during the past three years, Canada's export volume to the U.S. has declined steadily, falling nearly 12 per cent between 1988 and 1990 and an additional 5 per cent this year.

The second myth is that the U.S. lumber producers are facing a cost price squeeze caused by imports from Canada as log costs rise faster than lumber prices.

The fact is these cost price pressures exist in certain regions of the United States but not because of imports from Canada. They result from a withdrawal of harvest lands for environmental reasons and substantial exports of U.S. logs to Japan.

The third myth is that U.S. lumber prices are falling. The fact is both U.S. and Canadian prices have increased more than 8 per cent since 1988 and were near their peak level in the third quarter of 1991.

The fourth myth is that Canada's alleged subsidies caused Canada to overproduce. The fact is over the last decade Canada's lumber production as a share of total North American lumber production has remained constant.

The fifth myth is that B.C. and Quebec will undo the replacement measures implemented under the memorandum of understanding and reduce the over–all cost to Canadian industry. The fact is that changes in stumpage and forestry measures have been introduced in several Canadian provinces since 1986 for compelling domestic reasons and have become law. There is no reason to expect any changes, nor is there an increased economic incentive to undo replacement measures.

The workers in the forest industry in British Columbia were just offered zero per cent in the first year, zero per cent in the second year, and 85 cents on the base rate in the third year of a three–year agreement. That 85 cents translates to 4.9 per cent on the base rate in the third year of a three–year agreement.

This is clearly private sector industry on the ropes. These are workers and whole communities that are on their knees. They are depending on this minister and the government to defend them. My colleague from Prince George—Bulkley Valley said that we have to keep up the fight at GATT and we have to stand up for Canada, the forest industry, small communities and businesses, and forest industry workers. I concur with that.

We have this government to hold accountable for this serious problem. We will continue to pressure this government to do the proper and right thing, to take the measures that are required and to ensure that this industry does not go the way of the dodo bird because this government is incompetent and incapable of leading this industry out of this problem.

[Translation]

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in this emergency debate on softwood lumber, an extremely important issue for many workers in Canada and in Quebec as well, especially in the eastern townships and Beauce, which are my particular concern.

I fail to understand why the government did not agree to an emergency debate on such an urgent matter when it was first requested. The opposition parties, including the Bloc Quebecois and a few government members, actually had to get together and tell the government this didn't make sense, that we had to react, that there was a serious problem and that we needed an emergency debate. The government resisted and postponed the debate. Today the debate is on. Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, when the Mulroney government gets together with the Group of Seven, it pretends Canada is a really important country, but when we are talking about GATT, all of a sudden Canada is only a very small country, one of 108.

This goes to show how little the government is concerned about the damage it is doing to this country's workers. Well, in any case, we got this emergency debate, a bit late, but we are having it today. This reminds me of what the Minister of State for Agriculture said earlier: Now we are going to act. Yes, but it's too late! Now we are going to act, when the deed is done. And this is more or less what the government is doing all the time. Now we are going to act. Well, it's pretty late to do anything at all, isn't it?

I suggest that members with sawmills in their ridings go and explain to those workers who are going to lose their jobs why this government did too little, too late. Thousands of jobs in Quebec are at stake.

• (2220)

Tonight I want to tell you how off-hand this government has acted with the interests of those workers on this whole matter of softwood lumber. I don't understand this behaviour. I don't understand why they acted this way. Does it have hidden interests? Does it have something it wants to deal under the table, giving up in the process an industry employing thousands of people in Quebec? Because Quebec is a bigger loser in this whole matter of softwood lumber than any other province. Quebec could have dealt with this problem without any help from the Government of Canada and would have done much better.

Today a sawmill sent a closing down notice to the Quebec labour minister; 55 jobs are lost. They had just received this notice about a 14.48 per cent tax, and I will talk to you about it. I can tell you also that I have some ideas about what the Government of Canada should do to try to pick up the pieces.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this government's off-hand way of dealing with the problem of course has been denounced by the Quebec Lumber Manufacturer's Association. Prior to the American action, the association told the Canadian government: Do not give away the 3.1 per cent tax agreement we have with the Americans. Do not do that, you would make a serious mistake. The government ignored it. The Canadian Forest Industries Council had told the government: Do not give away this 3.1 per cent tax agreement we have with the Americans. It's just what we need. If you remove it, we will have a serious problem. And you know our Finance Minister who has more than doubled the national debt, when he had said in his first budget speech that there would be no more deficit in 1990–1991.

That same person, the lord from Toronto, without paying any attention to the Quebec government or to the association representing dozens of sawmills in Quebec, decided unilaterally to terminate the agreement that we had with the Americans at 3.1 per cent. The Prime Minister, decided to do that unilaterally. He said, and so did his minister, that they took political precautions. He had met Mr. Bush who had not given him any answer. As they say today in most American newspapers, maybe he did what Mr. Bush had told voters to do a few years ago, "Read my lips", but he did not read much. One thing is sure, either President Bush is a liar or Prime Minister Mulroney was completely mistaken. But one of them has gone wrong somewhere, and I think he is on this side of the border because, after the American government decided to impose a 14.48 per cent duty on all softwood lumber exports to the United States, the Canadian Prime Minister said that it was the doing of some bureaucrat. Well, the director of the Quebec association told me that more than 65 American senators had signed the petition circulated by the American organization asking for a countervailing duty on softwood lumber.

If 65 American senators are just bureaucrats, I wonder what kind of political image the government of Canada and its Prime Minister have of the United States, our trading partner. Based on all the information that we had, the American government had agreed that the countervailing duty be imposed province by province. It had even decided what that rate would be. For the government of Quebec, the province of Quebec, the sawmills of Quebec, the sawmills in my constituency, the sawmill Paul Vallée Inc., the sawmill A.D. Bernier, the sawmill Beau Chêne, which all employ some 50 people, it was 3.78 per cent.

The difference between 3.78 per cent and 14.48 per cent means survival for our sawmills. That is the way it is in the constituency of Témiscouata and Bellechasse. The Minister says: From now on, we will act.

An hon. member: It is a bit late.

Mr. Gérin: Where I come from we would use terms that are very close to the word "stupid".

Mr. Speaker, the government of Quebec was not consulted. It complains that it was not consulted and it had an agreement with the Canadian government. So I ask you who is to blame?

The problem for sawmills in Quebec is not the same one as for sawmills in British Columbia and it must not be treated in the same fashion. Gordon Ritchie was the Canadian negotiator for the agreement, among others, on softwood lumber and the GATT. When asked by officials of the Quebec Association: "If there is a countervailing duty, will it be at least a duty imposed by province rather than a national tariff?", Mr. Ritchie replied: "It will be a national tariff because the unity of the country is at stake." Well, Mr. Speaker, national unity just cost 55 jobs at Paul Vallée Inc.. National unity also cost 50 jobs at Beau Chêne and it will soon cost a hundred jobs or so at A.D. Bernier. That situation is not unique to my constituency and I might add that there are 75 constituencies in Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, is it worth it in the name of national unity, for something that could have been done differently, to waste so many jobs and to affect regional development so much? I tell you that it is not worth it. Mr. Wilson claims that Canada is too small to do normal business with the United States. I tell him that Quebec would have been able to do a lot better.

I will conclude by urging the minister to immediately tell Americans that Quebec has jurisdiction over its forests, that Quebec is capable of negotiating an agreement for its own province, that Quebec agrees with the 3.8 per cent rate, and to immediately restore the exemptions for those who import their lumber from the United States to give it an added value in Canada and then export it back to the United States. I am talking about the sawmills from the eastern townships and the Beauce region that are close to the border. I realize that my time is up.

Mr. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, like my colleagues who have already spoken, I believe we all share the same indignation, the same disappointment over the event which many consider very serious. According to them, this issue originates from Mr. Bush or, at least, certain of his supporters. So I share this indignation with all my colleagues. In a free trade agreement, where there is a partnership, where the exchange should be fair, it is inconceivable that one partner would take advantage of the other, often in an all too obvious manner.

To all my colleagues, Mr. Speaker, to the government, to the Prime Minister and to those who have spoken before me, I express my disappointment and my indignation.

I must say, however, to clarify the circumstances, that this decision was taken in a particular context. I can imagine, as is the case in some businesses, that you have shareholders who have a more or less twisted way of thinking, who have hidden, circumstantial, or electoral interests, and who have, momentarily maybe, goals which are not those of their companies, but their own. And I understand that in certain political circumstances, one can suspect, since there is a lot going on in the United States at the present time, that there were, in my opinion, attitudes, decisions and strategies which led to this. Nevertheless, this must not stop us from being against and denounce everything the United States have done in this matter.

• (2230)

I would like however, Mr. Speaker, to recall how all this happened. Everything started on December 30, 1986. The United States and Canada signed, that day, a memorandum of understanding on softwood lumber by which Canada accepted to impose a 15 per cent duty on Canadian softwood exports to the United States. That duty could be reduced or eliminated, and I stress this point, if the provinces applied replacement measures having the effect of increasing stumpage fees or other fees charged to softwood lumber producers.

Consequently, there were, along the way, two measures which were taken, but which would take too long to explain. So when we cancelled the memorandum of understanding, most Canadian exports of softwood lumber to the United States, indeed more than 92 per cent, were subject to much higher stumpage fees and other related taxes. On September 3, 1991, Canada exercised its right under the terms of the MOU to denounce the agreement and it consequently advised the United States that the MOU would be terminated on October 4, 1991.

Before coming to this decision, Canada went as far as using the American accounting method in order to compare the cost of forestry for the provinces to the revenues produced, and this for the four main softwood lumber producing provinces. That analysis, Mr. Speaker, demonstrated indeed that in all those provinces stumpage revenues far exceeded their forestry costs, a situation which gave our government the reasons it needed to pull out of the agreement.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that this decision of the United States has enormous consequences for our industry. The two provinces most affected are British Columbia and Quebec. I share with my colleagues from these two provinces, but also from the rest of Canada, a sense of indignation when faced with the very negative impact of this measure. We will not stand still.

The previous speaker feels free to speak now that he has left the government party, but he might have expressed a few years earlier the concerns voiced by producers that he has just mentioned. It is a shame that, a few year later, a Bloc Quebecois member would come and denounce a policy when he already knew the arrangements we had made with our U.S. trade partner.

I agree with him about the harm done to Canadian businesses, particularly in the eastern Townships and the Beauce area which I know well. To show you how much I share his outrage, I must point out that the Americans seem to be peddling a number of myths to excuse, defend or justify such a move. One of these myths, Mr. Speaker, is to claim that a decrease in the demand in the United States produces an increase in Canadian imports, which could indeed justify the move by the United States to block or slow the flow of exports from Canada into the U.S.

But that is not the case. Quite the contrary. I have a breakdown here of the softwood lumber production and consumption in the United States versus their imports. Let us start with the American production in relation to their consumption. Over a 10 year period, the volume of softwood lumber produced in the United States, in thousands of board feet—that is the measure I have—has gone up from 24.7 to 35.8, an 11 per cent increase in production. We can assume the demand reached at least that level. What about the consumption or the demand in the United States? At the same time, within 10 years, the demand went from 32 billion board feet to 45 billion.

If you remember, Mr. Speaker, I was talking earlier about a domestic-only production of 38 billion, with a simultaneous domestic demand of 45 billion. As you see, there was a surplus in demand. Hence, in 1990, the United States had to find a supplier. They turned to Canada, and to two provinces in particular. But let's look at what we produced and exported to the United States. Within that 10-year period, we increased our production only by 0.3 billion board feet. If you add it all up, the demand in 1990 was of 45 compared to a production of 35. That is a difference of 10, and we only increased our production by 3. So, Mr. Speaker, the United States have absolutely no reason to make such a drastic and unjustifiable decision.

But then, I come back to my initial argument. We can assume, and that will be my final point, that this decision, this initiative, is not justified since the figures and the table I quoted earlier show that, with a demand in the United States in excess of the American domestic production, Americans had every reason to import Canadian softwood lumber. And I want to insist on that in order to correct the mistakes made by my hon. colleague from the Bloc, who seems to have a totally different vision, which he could have, of course, compared to figures he was, however, very careful not to quote.

We all recognize that something went wrong along the way, and that we have to put things right. Let me assure you that this government, our government and our Prime Minister will see to it.

[English]

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, thank you for the opportunity to add my comments to this debate presently before the House.

As we all know, the forestry industry is Canada's largest single industry. It employs over 8,000 people throughout this country. It contributes over $40 billion a year to our national revenue. Of that $40 billion a year, $20 billion of it is in the transfer of payments and comes into Canada as a balance of payments into our account. Not only that, the forestry industry in this country has 8,000 companies, businesses both small and large, that are a direct result of all the products of the forestry industry.

Since my colleagues and I have been in this House of Commons we have pretty well defined the forestry industry into four major areas: the pulp and paper business, the fine paper business in which we are attempting to increase our sales at this time, the speciality paper business like corrugated boxes and so on that are produced by specialty plants in every province in this country, and softwood lumber.

The softwood lumber business and the industry is the reason for this very special and important debate that we are holding tonight on behalf of every sawmill worker and every sawmill from the province of British Columbia, from the shores of Victoria to the province of Newfoundland. It is vital to the future. It is the artery of our economy. If that stops, the economy of Canada stops. We must pledge ourselves in an absolutely non-political way this evening to do whatever we can in order to ensure that the softwood lumber business in this country continues to be viable and strong.

We have heard in the debate tonight how we got into this terrible situation at this time in the history of Canada. My comments are not going to be a dispute on we should not have done this or we should not have done that.

• (2240)

I agree with the minister when he said that the problem we face today is not a direct result of the trade agreement entered into approximately a year and two months ago. By way of historical background we had a very good softwood lumber industry with our friends in the United States, and with other countries. If there was any dispute it was settled by GATT and through normal negotiating processes between the countries with which there could have been some problem, particularly the United States.

That operated for over a hundred years in a very fine manner. If there was a dispute it went to GATT and we presented our case, the United States presented their case, GATT heard the case, there was a ruling and both countries decided to live with that ruling.

Prior to 1986 there were three disputes in which the Americans claimed, your friends in the United States, that there was an unfair subsidy to our forestry industry because of stumpage. Those disputes went to the dispute resolution mechanism in the GATT process. Each time, and after many hundreds of thousands of dollars, those disputes were found in favour of Canada. There was no unfair subsidy in British Columbia, there was no unfair subsidy in Alberta, there was no unfair subsidy in Ontario and all the other provinces in this country. We won that argument. We won that fight on three different occasions before 1986.

Then what do we do? We take a memorandum of understanding entered into prior to the trade agreement being entered into, that caused us some concern, that said that they wanted to go through a fourth hearing before GATT because the United States still felt that there was an unfair subsidy. We chose at that time not to fight it and enter into a memorandum of understanding. This is the folly of where we find ourselves today. The folly of this memorandum of understanding is that it was incorporated into the free trade agreement. By incorporating it into the free trade agreement we lost that wonderful mechanism in which we had been successful on three previous occasions. We now are forced to go through the dispute resolution mechanism under section 18 of the free trade agreement.

That is how we find ourselves in this position today. All we have heard from the other side of the House throughout this entire debate and for the last two years is what we have gained in this free trade agreement. What we have gained in the trade agreement as it relates to the softwood lumber industry, to our sawmills and to our employees in the sawmills in this country, is simply a method of settling disputes which we had before the trade agreement. We were successful in negotiating those agreements under GATT, very successful, prior to the trade agreement.

That is where we stand today. We did not make any gain. It is a smoke screen when we say that this dispute settling mechanism that we did not have before is what we gained. That is sheer folly. We did have a very adequate dispute settling mechanism that worked to the benefit of all countries.

In my research for this little talk I discovered that there is only one country in the world that has ever brought a countervail against Canada, only one country in the world. That country is our friend the United States of America. In the entire history of the GATT only one country in the world has imposed a countervail duty on Canada and that is the United States of America.

The issue we have before us is supposed to be the softwood lumber industry. Before the memorandum of understanding the United States imposed a 15 per cent surtax on all the lumber we produced in Canada and exported to the United States. By their own admission—and we said on so many occasions that the 15 per cent surtax was an unfair one. We thought it should have been zero. We were quite willing to fight that dispute and take it through the GATT process, but that was now prevented because of the trade agreement. In its new calculation we see how it arrived at 14.48 per cent.

Although I am very concerned about northern Ontario and all the sawmills there, the province that is truly being hurt by this agreement today is British Columbia. In its calculations its stumpage is 6.88 per cent. With that 6.88 per cent and the real issue being logs, what happened is we refused to ship our raw products to the United States for manufacturing so it can then ship them back to us. The dispute is truly centred around the logs.

Having said that, I want to offer this to the House and I do it with a certain amount of respect. I wish they would understand. There is only one thing we can do at the present moment in Canada to get us out of this terrible situation we find ourselves in. I want to end my speech on a positive note. This is not the first time things like this have happened.

In 1971 when the Americans imposed a surtax of 10 per cent on all exports from Canada to the United States, under Jean Luc Pepin we passed a law in this very House of Commons called the Employment Support Act. It had to do with raw materials that were converted as well as manufactured goods. It is a simple act. It is only five pages.

The act is administered by the Minister of Industry. It states what happens if we convert raw materials into another product for export. The purpose of the act is to provide a means by which to support levels of employment in Canadian industry when other countries impose—in this instance being the United States of America—temporary import surtaxes or take other actions having a like effect that adversely affect employment in Canadian industry.

I say that they should set up a board as the act calls for. I wish there were as many people looking into this program in the sawmill industry.

I will just take another minute, Mr. Speaker. Just let me read this section. "Upon application therefore to the board by a manufacturer who establishes that the workforce at his plant is or is likely to be significantly reduced through layoffs during a specified period by reason of the application of measures taken by other countries, that they can make an application and their application will be heard".

I implore this government to take immediate action to employ the Employment Support Act.

[Translation]

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, it is with great interest that I join in this emergency debate tonight. I must say though that it is not with great pleasure, because it is the third time in about 10 years that this debate has come up in our country. I must tell you that, on October 21, 1986, I made a statement here, in this House, about a preliminary decision by the United States to impose a countervailing duty on softwood lumber exports from Canada.

So my intervention today is nothing new since, in 1986, when the United States acted the same way with regard to our softwood lumber exports, I rose in this House to express the concern of the forest industry and of workers from my area. I said at that time, on October 21, 1986, that the decision made by the Americans was unjustified and unacceptable and that the government, along with the industry, the unions and the provinces, had to express its dissatisfaction and even threaten to take political and trade measures to retaliate against the Americans if they did not reconsider their decision.

So, Mr. Speaker, I would never have thought at the time that, six years later, on March 11, 1992, we would have yet another debate on that dispute with our American friends.

• (2250)

Since the U.S. commerce department imposed this new 14.5 per cent tax on all exports from Canada, the Prime Minister, the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and the Minister for International Trade have reacted angrily to the U.S. decision to spring this tax on an industry that is so important to a riding like mine.

Mr. Speaker, if you happened to be a worker in the resource industry in Abitibi—Témiscamingue, you would be living in very anxious times.

When I look at our farmers and what they have to go through with the GATT talks and article XI—it is pretty obvious there is a lot of concern among our farmers. They told us all about it, and they know that the government will stand by its position and will continue to fight for clarification of article XI, so our farmers can have some peace of mind.

But now we have another crisis involving the forestry sector. God knows we didn't need that in a recession that has had a severe impact on remote areas. I know how worried they are. I would like to give them the assurance—people have been saying this since the beginning of this dispute a few weeks ago—that we will not back down and that we are going to win, just as we won in 1982 and with the memorandum that was signed in 1986. We will argue our case again, because we know that we are not engaged in unfair competition with the Americans as far as our softwood exports are concerned, and we will prove it.

The problem is that there is always a delay, and every day or week that goes by is one too many when exports are your living, and especially when you have a sawmill that employs 15, 20 or 25 workers. Big companies, although it isn't easy for them either, are in a better position to absorb this kind of tax, especially since we know that in the end it will be refunded because we will win our case.

The situation is quite different for the smaller sawmills which are getting very nervous because they are starting to wonder whether they are strong enough financially to deal with this incredible decision by the Americans. And I think that is where we should start, Mr. Speaker, because we heard several times this evening that this is the third time in 10 years we are having the same kind of debate all over again. Unfortunately, our American friends didn't realize they don't have a good case and that we do.

What are the alternatives, what should we do to try to put an end to this type of harassment by our American neighbours, who as we know are tough business people to deal with? That is why we put in place a framework, like the free trade agreement, with at least some kind of mechanisms to make sure we would have in the future a tribunal to examine any litigation or trade dispute we might have with the United States.

But how can we, at this point in time, help our businesses and our workers, specially the most vulnerable? I think there may be a way. As you know, Mr. Speaker, companies and businesses now have to pay a 14.5 per cent bond, which many small businesses are unable to afford.

Since small businesses in Quebec and in my own riding do not have the financial means to come up with that money, why not ask the government to keep a close eye on this issue? Why do we not ask the government to help pay the bond of those companies, especially since we are sure to win? It is not a big risk for the government to take, but what sense of security would it bring to small and medium businesses which cannot afford to pay that bond. So the government, through the Department of Finance, could help these businesses.

I think that has been said earlier, but it is important to repeat it, nobody wins in that war. In Canada, jobs are at stake, industries which have difficulty making ends meet are affected, but on the American side consumers are the ones who are affected. It is they who, ultimately, will have to pay this 14.5 per cent duty. In this regard, I wonder, if our government should not undertake a huge lobbying and advertising campaign directed at American consumer groups, send delegations to the United States and pay for full pages, if need be, in the New York Times, in order to warn American consumers that, ultimately, they are the hostages of that duty. I think that the government should also get involved in this advertising or marketing campaign to warn American consumers that, ultimately, they will be the losers. We should bring them to understand, and they know it, that Canadian lumber is of higher quality. That is why people want our lumber and why we have a good record, Mr. Speaker.

I ask the government to look at these possibilities, helping small companies pay their security bonds while at the same time flooding our American friends with massive advertising aimed at consumers. We should remember, however, that the findings are only preliminary and we should not give up, we should continue to do what the Prime Minister and other ministers have done over the last few days, voice our dissatisfaction, our bitterness and our anger toward the Americans so that they stop this inquiry immediately and not wait till July for the four steps to be completed.

I think we can make them withdraw that decision and it is up to us, as parliamentarians, in co-operation with the industry and the provinces, to let the United States know that it is acting wrongly, that it is not in its interest, nor ours, and that it should review that decision unfortunately taken irresponsibly, without knowing precisely what was involved.

I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that we will be vindicated as we were in 1982 and again in 1986. As I said earlier, each passing day or week is one too many for our workers to bear. I ask the government to continue putting pressure on the United States administration and commerce department to cease immediately this unwarranted harassment.

[English]

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, this issue that is before us tonight is one that is very, very important to many small and large communities across this country.

In retaliation to Canada's October 4, 1991 decision to terminate the 15 per cent export tax on softwood lumber exports to the United States, the memorandum of understanding, the U.S. department of commerce immediately initiated a countervailing duty investigation.

The investigation has resulted in a 14.48 per cent American duty on Canadian softwood lumber exports to the United States. The department of commerce is also demanding that Canadian exporters in all but the four Atlantic provinces start posting bonds immediately on shipments to the United States. They call it the good neighbour policy.

Time and time again, during the free trade debate in this House, the Conservative government promised Canadians that the free trade agreement would secure our access to the U.S. markets.

Look at the reality. Canadian pork producers, steel producers and in the past week Honda automobiles and now our softwood lumber producers are being subjected to this harassment. Obviously we did not get secure access to the U.S. market.

We also mention the non-tariff duties that the Americans are suddenly implementing at the American border for Canadian products going into the United States.

I bring up the case again of a company in my own riding, Eddy Match of Pembroke whose product was stopped at the U.S. border because the "Made in Canada" logo was not in the right place.

• (2300)

That affects many lines of industry in this country. This is the third time the U.S. has induced a countervailing duty challenge against Canadian softwood lumber, and also the third different methodology used in a decade of hassle and harassment of Canadian lumber exports. We were far better off when we had the GATT because at least we could take it to GATT for a ruling.

The Mulroney government should never have signed the memorandum of understanding in 1986. It never even let the case come to a decision. It hurried and signed the memorandum of understanding. We won the softwood lumber dispute before and we probably would have won it again. Undoubtedly we would have.

The federal government's position was motivated by a desire to avoid any action that might jeopardize the free trade negotiations. This government sold the soul of Canada in order to get a free trade agreement. It said it was going to give us great access to the American markets and it was going to be the greatest thing since sliced bread.

Look at the shape the country is in today. Look how many industries are crossing the border into the United States. This country has to stand up on its own feet and fight in a united way.

We cannot be harassed every time the Americans have an election. I say to them that if they have not any more originality than to bring forward an election campaign in the form of policies, then as the leading democracy in this world, it is time they were looking at their inner souls instead of picking on their next door neighbour in the manner in which they are.

Although Liberals in the forest industry argued for the elimination of the memorandum of understanding on softwood lumber, which should never have been signed by the government for a number of years, given that this is a presidential election period, the timing of the termination could not have been worse.

We have been demanding that this memorandum of understanding be cancelled ever since it came into operation on the first day of 1987. The government waited until election year, and now it is tied up in the domestic politics of the United States. That is bad timing.

The U.S. department of commerce has absolutely no grounds for this decision which is politically motivated and seriously undermines the spirit of the free trade agreement. Some people say: "You should not talk about the spirit of the free trade agreement. You should not talk about the problems surrounding it." Why should we not? It is here. It is reality. We have to talk about it.

In response to this unfair ruling the Canadian ambassador to the United States, Derek Burney, accused U.S. officials of a tortured attempt to manipulate the facts in order to maintain a pre-ordained result.

The Prime Minister himself went into a lashing of the United States on it and then ended up by saying he was aiming at lower officials and not the President. Give me a break. Who is leading the United States?

This is getting so silly. Here we are in a serious situation in our trade negotiations, in our trade relations with the United States and we are blaming junior officials.

Just last Friday, Stone Consolidated, head office in Chicago, announced the closure of its mill at Braeside in my riding in the Ottawa valley. Ironically, when was that announcement made? The announcement of the closure of the mill at Braeside was made at three o'clock last Friday afternoon.

When did the Americans announce the 14.48 per cent duty on Canadian softwood lumber? It was at 12 o'clock noon. The timing leaves a big question mark in my mind as to what is going on and who knows what is going on around here ahead of time. The U.S. commerce department came forward with that announcement and put 140 people out of work, but that is only part of it.

Our members from northern Ontario have spoken here tonight. I know what they have been going through. I have crossed northern Ontario with them. I have seen those one industry towns.

I have seen in my own riding in a village of 1,200 or 1,400 people, the welfare rolls increased by 2,000 per cent in one year. Why? Because the lumber industry was the real base of the economy of that community. When it went down, the community was left without work for its people. As a result, through time their unemployment insurance runs out. Where do they go? They go to the municipalities for welfare.

The issue before us tonight on trading relations with the United States is affecting far more governments in this country than this government. The problem has been inflicted on the provinces because the provinces have to look after the municipalities. The problem of unemployment in the forest industry across this country has been inflicted on the municipalities and the taxpayers in those communities. It is unfair. It shows how ill-conceived moves can disrupt the entire lives of tens and hundreds of thousands of people across this country.

The small communities in my riding, such as Barry's Bay, Wilno, Madawaska, Cumbermere, Golden Lake, Killaloe, Braeside and Calabogie are all affected by this. The forest workers are willing to drive for miles if necessary to get a job. They are workers. But even now when they become unemployed there is very little place for them to go. It is a serious business.

Forestry's contribution to the economy cannot be over-emphasized. It employs almost a million Canadians both directly and indirectly. For example, in 1989 the forest industry provided for 348,000 direct jobs and 540,000 indirect jobs or roughly 1 in 14. I could go on and give other statistics but it is not necessary.

Three key things have affected the forest industry. There is the 15 per cent export tax that was put on under the memorandum of understanding at the end of 1986 and the Canadian high dollar. Another thing that has really hurt has been Mr. Crow's contribution from the Bank of Canada, the high interest rates. The combination of these events and these factors has taken a tremendous toll on jobs and the economy of communities all across Canada and to a degree is the end, temporarily at least, of a very productive way of life. We were better off when we worked under the GATT.

I want to end with this. We talk about the disputes panel under the free trade agreement. That panel will make its decision based on U.S. law. It will be a question of how U.S. law is interpreted. If the U.S. law is not interpreted right, then the American Congress can simply change that law and come back at us again. We were much better under the GATT for decisions like this.

I suggest it is time that the United States, as the biggest democracy in the world, started having a heart with its neighbours. If it cannot run a presidential election without running it on the backs of the international community, then it is time for it to show a little originality in its thoughts.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, it has been very interesting for me tonight to be listening to my colleagues from right across the country speaking from the heart for the people who they represent, the industries that are in their ridings and the impact that it has on them.

Most Canadians realize the softwood lumber industry has a huge impact on all of us because it is in fact truly the most important, the major industry in the country. It was for this reason that I joined with a number of others in asking the House leader to have discussions with the other parties in hopes that we would be able to reach agreement on having a debate such as we are having tonight. So it really is my pleasure, Mr. Speaker, to be here.

Why is it of such interest to me? There are a couple of reasons. It is where I am from, British Columbia and my riding of Cariboo—Chilcotin. It is common knowledge that 75 per cent of the softwood lumber that is shipped into the United States that is at issue in this dispute comes from British Columbia.

• (2310)

Most people think of the lumber coming from British Columbia as coming from the huge trees they see on the coast of Vancouver Island or the coastal mainland. That is far from the truth. In fact more than 80 per cent of the softwood that leaves British Columbia comes from the interior and the north of the province. My riding alone, one riding out of just under 295 in Canada, is responsible for shipping over 10 per cent of the softwood lumber that goes into the United States.

It is an issue that is critical to my province. It is an issue that is critical to my riding. My constituents all work either in the mills or the economy of the communities in which they live are dependent on the mills. They have not had an easy time of it of late. This continuing trade dispute is having a devastating impact on them and we must get it resolved.

There is another reason why I have such a key interest in this issue. To my knowledge I am the only person in the House who was actually involved for most of this dispute from within the forest industry. I was one of the senior management people within a company. I watched, observed and suffered through the dispute in 1982 in which it was found through the U.S. panel that there was not abuse of the system. We were not subsidizing and that dispute passed on into history.

As several people have talked about today, I was also sitting at the association boardroom tables as we wrestled with the terrible problem in 1986. We knew that we had right on our side. We knew that we should win. We were not subsidizing. Canada does not subsidize its forest industry. We were faced with a dilemma. It was the same dilemma that the provinces were faced with as well as the federal government. We realized that we were in a kangaroo court in the United States, that politically we could not win. We had to make a choice as to whether we negotiated the memorandum or faced what appeared to be imminent loss of that dispute. Unfortunately, and with great reluctance, the industry, the provinces and the country had to settle for the memorandum.

Since 1988, as a member of Parliament involved with the forestry committee and along with some of my colleagues and other people in the House who have pushed hard to have this memorandum resolved, we have been able to observe the offsetting systems that have been imposed in different parts of the country in different ways. Of course in every part of our country we do operate the industry differently.

Last Monday when I returned to the House in anger, I must admit, I tried to express the outrage I think all Canadians including my constituents felt. At the time I said that the decision had little to do with facts and reality and had everything to do with politics based on the greed and hypocrisy of a few large U.S. lumber companies. I still maintain that is the case.

I am not going to try to substantiate all the data. There have been tons of it delivered down to the U.S. in the last few months, but it is well known that in Canada we do not subsidize the industry. If we did, since 1986 we have more than offset that subsidy. One of the leading officials in the U.S. department of commerce submitted evidence just a year ago that if we had been abusing it in 1986 there had been more than enough offsetting mechanisms put into our system so that we were no longer abusing it, if we ever had been.

I would like to just use a document that actually infuriated me. I will not read it all, of course, but it was put out by a coalition for what it calls fair lumber imports into the United States.

It addresses the house costs. It realizes of course that the U.S. consumer is the one who ultimately pays a big part of this price and it discussed that. It said: "Well really it is not $1,000 or more like people are saying, it is probably more like $200 or $300." But obviously it concedes that it is going to go up by at least the $200 or $300.

Of course what the coalition is not saying is that if it does not go up the full $1,000 then it is the people in my community and in all communities across Canada who are going to be suffering the impact. Somebody has to pay the price for that. It is either the consumers of the United States or our communities.

This coalition from the U.S. goes on to state that it believes that this of course is a very small price to pay and a viable alternative to the serious threat Canadian imports pose to the 15,000 U.S. lumber jobs that were created while the offsetting measures of the MOU were in force. It is indicating how much they have actually taken advantage of the memorandum when it was put in. So while we were losing jobs in Canada, they have been gaining 15,000.

It claims that those are again threatened, but all of the measures that were put in under the memorandum of understanding are still in place and they will remain in place. If anything, they are increasing in nature, not decreasing.

The coalition then goes on to say that putting Americans out of work while importing subsidized lumber will not lead the United States out of a recession. What it is saying is that they are prepared to do it on our backs. This is not a fair representation being made. It is something to suit some of their major industries. It will not be tolerated here in Canada. I am sure it will not be tolerated long even in the United States.

I would like to close by asking whether we will win. Yes, we will. As I said, I agonized through the decision in 1986. We would have won then if we had had the dispute settlement mechanism that we have won now through the free trade agreement.

Over the last few days, I have heard many people say that that is not enough for the free trade agreement to give us, that dispute settlement mechanism. But I can tell you, coming from the forest industry, when I heard initially about the terms of the free trade agreement, I can assure you that in my mind, as well as in the minds of most of the leaders in the industry, it was recognized that the free trade agreement with the dispute settlement mechanism was the best protection we had from those in the United States who would try to take advantage of those of us in Canada.

I say it is unfortunate the United States had to pick on us in Canada, their closest neighbour, their closest ally and friend throughout the world, and yet they chose to pick on us. It will not be soon forgotten by those of us in Canada.

Mr. Bélair: Mr. Speaker, considering how late it is, I believe you would find unanimous consent in order to free the pages.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unaninous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, this is a very serious discussion we are having this evening, rather than a debate as it was characterized by several of the previous speakers.

It is very serious for Canada as a whole, but particularly serious I would suggest for the province of British Columbia.

In the last 10 years at the most, perhaps even a little shorter period, some 40 per cent of the 30,000 IWA members who were working in the woods of British Columbia and in the sawmills have lost their jobs.

• (2320)

Part of it was due to technological change and part of it was due to the depressed markets we are experiencing right now. Who knows where it is going to end?

We do not need this MOU dispute right now. We do not need this dispute with the Americans about selling our lumber to the States. I can recall attending a tourism presentation in the community of Ladysmith in my riding a year ago last summer. When the representative of the tourist department was introduced, she said: "Tourism is increasing to the extent that one day tourism will take over as the most important economic activity in British Columbia". When it came my turn to speak, I said: "I hope that day never comes because if the forest industry sinks so low that anything overtakes it in British Columbia then we are in real serious trouble".

The same thing applies to the whole of Canada. It is by far the greatest generator of foreign exchange that we have. Grains and oilseeds come second but a poor second. It is the products from our forests that we must keep producing if we are to be able to maintain the standard of living we have in Canada, if we are to maintain the level of economic activity we have in this great country.

There have been several disputes and the government is relying totally on the dispute resolving panels, the dispute settling panels, and saying that when it goes there we are bound to win.

I can recall the first one. It had to do with west coast fisheries. Of course we were confident there too. We knew right was on our side. We knew we had to have control of that resource if we were going to be able to husband it properly.

We did not win. We lost partially. We lost control of 20 per cent of the fish, and the American response through their trade representative was to the effect: "Well, that is all right for now, but we are not going to rest until we remove those restrictions entirely so that we have access to all of the fish being caught in British Columbia".

They do not mind us husbanding the resource. They do not mind us managing it and spending the money on it, but they want access to it for processing. They want the jobs that go with the processing industry. It was the processing industry representatives themselves who made that argument in Ottawa as well as in British Columbia. They know what is happening. They know that the Americans want those jobs down in the States.

During the free trade debate before it became law in this country or in the States, the arguments being put forward were to the effect that what was really at stake, or what the issue really was, was the tremendous trade imbalance between Canada and the U.S. The U.S. wanted to correct that imbalance from its point of view. It wanted to reduce the imports from Canada and increase the exports to Canada. To do that it has to make sure that we more than ever before become simply hewers of wood and drawers of water; let them do all the processing and let them send the processed goods back to Canada.

I fear this is what the Americans have in mind with respect to our softwoods because they have said that one of things bothering them is the fact that we control the export of round logs. They are doing the same thing but that does not matter. What they are doing is okay, but for us to do it is wrong because it does not give them the access that they want to our raw material. It goes not give them the right to manage our forests in the way they want, in the way they want to look after the fish to their own best advantage.

I am afraid that is where we are heading: to the point where the U.S. will once again win this battle for control of our sovereignty, take control out of our hands of the way in which we manage our forests.

The government has a responsibility and I know it is going to fight this. It keeps telling us it will fight it. Let us turn to the history of the dispute so far. We have lost with the west coast salmon. We lost with the east coast lobster. We won on the pork temporarily, but we have been told over and over by American trade representatives that the battle is not yet finished because they have not yet won. It is not over until they win. That is their attitude.

The beer issue is not totally resolved yet but so far they are winning. They are winning on the Honda cars. They are winning on magnesium and aluminum and they are winning on steel. They are winning every dispute. The only one they have lost, as I say, they are taking to be just an interim matter until they can have another go at it and win eventually. They are determined to win on all of these issues. There is little doubt about it.

The Americans are going to come to us and want our lumber in the not too distant future. This recession/depression will come to an end. Things will improve. They are going to need more houses. If they are going to build more houses, they cannot produce their own lumber fast enough to do it. They are going to need some of ours.

In the meantime, we are slaughtering our forests, in some cases high-grading in order to ship lumber out at a minimum loss, not at a profit. None of the companies in British Columbia, none of the large ones at least, are making anything out of their logging and sawmilling these days. It is just a matter of trying to recover not all but some of their fixed costs while they keep operating and hoping for a turnaround.

There are jobs to be done. There is a tremendous job of reforestation still to be done in the province of British Columbia. There is a lot of work that could be done to improve the productivity of our forests all over the province of British Columbia and, I would suggest, all over Canada. The government, in its budget that came down just a couple of weeks ago, went through a process of foregoing some $1.5 billion in tax money. It cut taxes that are really not going to help anybody very much. It is cutting income tax to the extent of half a billion in one year, $1.2 billion in the second year. It does not put much into the pockets of those of us who are spending the money. We will not really notice the difference. It is putting money into the pockets of the manufacturing and processing industries which are profitable enough to be paying taxes. The ones that are not making any profits do not get any help. It is just the ones that are paying taxes, those profitable enough.

If all that $1.5 billion it is going to forego in the one year from these items, as well as the cuts in National Defence, were put into a project to rebuild the forest, to make the forest more productive throughout Canada using the same workers who are out of work, using the same companies which are suffering right now with their administration, we could be building our forests up to the point where, when the market turns, when the demand is there and when the prices make it worth while cutting these trees and making this lumber and shipping it out, we will be able to do it to much better advantage than we are doing right now.

That takes planning. It takes a government with confidence in the future of Canada, some confidence in the workers of Canada, some confidence in the industry of Canada. It could be done; the money is there. We need not have given it back to people who are not going to notice the difference. We could have put it to good use, as I say, rebuilding our most important renewable natural resource that we have in this country, apart from the people.

It takes planning, it takes determination, it takes intestinal fortitude. Unfortunately, I see little evidence that this government has any of those things sufficient to do the kind of job that has to be done to save our forest industry, to save our forest workers and even to save the forest industry itself.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the region of Abitibi-Témiscamingue—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Saint-Julien: I appreciate the applause from my friends, the Canadian foresters.

Mr. Speaker, the region of Abitibi-Témiscamingue is one of the largest forest areas of Quebec and Canada. Following the shameful decision taken by the Americans against the Canadian forest industry workers, I would like, for all economic stakeholders and workers of my region, to explain how the American forestry management system works.

Quebecers know very well how the system works in their province, but many do not know how the American system. The Canadian and American forestry management systems may differ, but they aim at the same thing: make money with public forests; encourage a stable and non-speculative development of forestry resources and investments in infrastructures; and elaborate viable and environmentally rational practices which preserve a multiform use of forests for future generations. Both systems try to achieve all this. However, the Canadian system has avoided many of the problems which its American counterpart ran into.

Canada provides for the needs of the United States. In the last 40 years, the United States have used more lumber than they have produced. The American forests simply cannot supply the current and future domestic needs. The homebuilders and other American users of lumber products are considering Canada as a second source of supply. Canada has maintained for a long time its share of the American market, and succeeded in keeping it quite steady, since the United States have to import softwood lumber. Its share has been around 30 per cent for 10 years.

Mr. Speaker, the American revenues from softwood lumber sales do not exceed costs. The revenues from the sale of lumber coming from most national American forests are lower than the management cost of each of these forests. A study commissioned by a sub-committee of the House of Representatives concluded that $5.6 billion U.S. had been wasted in the last 10 years by the American Forest Service as part of the wood selling program, mostly because of its expensive and heavy bureaucracy.

The study also concluded that according to the Forest Service's accounting system, only 18 out of the 120 public forests have covered their expenses in 1990. As for the 102 remaining forests, the american government actually lost over $365 millions U.S.

With the American system, it is hard to control the respect of environmental standards. The American government transferred long ago most public forest lands to private companies. As most of these lands are no longer supervised by the American government, it is much more difficult to enforce environmental regulations in the U.S.

The American system invites over-development because the system is based on short-term stumpage contracts. Companies have less incentive to delay harvesting or to manage their cutting program in such a way that the following cuts require less effort and less cost.

In the U.S., the bidding system furthers speculation and instability. In the short term, their cutting system lends itself to speculation cycles. At the end of the 1970, American forest companies started a war of speculative bidding to obtain cutting rights on public lands, which pushed up their price well above their approximate value. In 1984, the U.S. Congress had to buy back $2.8 billion worth of these purchase contracts at a net cost exceeding U.S. $400 million to the taxpayer.

Under the American countervail legislation, the total amount of $2.8 billion would be considered a subsidy. The U.S. government assumes a higher share of the forest management and development costs. The U.S. government pays for most of the regeneration cost of its national forests. It also pays for most of the access roads, which is a major cost as this 360,000 mile system are nearly eight times the length of the interstate highway system and would go 14 times around the world. In 1989, the U.S. spent $97 million on access roads.

In summary, softwood lumber imports from Canada have not hurt the American industry, and nothing subtantiates the allegations concerning Canadian subsidies. Every year since 1988, on average the American softwood industry has been performing better than other industries in the construction sector.

Mr. Speaker, two factors can account for the difficulties of the American industry, especially the softwood lumber industry: the diminishing demand, which was aggravated by the economic recession, and the shortage of softwood lumber supplied to the western states.

In conclusion, the United States apply a very simple standard to locally produced softwood lumber. When their softwood lumber industry needs a subsidy, it gets it. When it needs export controls on raw logs, it gets them, but it applies a different standard to softwood lumber imported from Canada. What is fair trade one day can become unfair trade the next.

Testimony given under oath to the American Congress in February about the absence of subsidy was the excuse for instituting an inquiry for the purpose of establishing a countervailing duty in October.

Canada is the first ally and main trading partner of the United States. Both countries have signed the most encompassing Free Trade Agreement that exists in the world. It is not surprising therefore that the way it conducts this inquiry would worry Canadians since Canada is considered more a foe than friend.

Loyal trade implies a respect for equivalent and uniform rules applied equally to everyone.

Mr. Speaker, we must ensure the survival of the forest industry in Abitibi, in Quebec and in Canada. We must fight this American measure which is a disgrace; we must fight it all the way and win the case for the lumber producers of Quebec and Canada.

[English]

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, let me stress for a moment how important forestry is to many Canadians. In Alberta alone there are 66 forestry manufacturing companies. A spokesman for the B.C. Council of Forest Industries today told me that there are 333 larger softwood sawmills in the province and hundreds more smaller ones. In normal conditions the B.C. mills employ about 28,000 persons directly and another 25,000 in logging operations.

The viability of all sectors of our forestry industry must be preserved at all costs because there are about 350 Canadian communities which are forestry dependent. The total forested area of our four western provinces alone equals the combined land area of France, West Germany, Spain, Austria and Hungary.

It is, of course, a vital industry in Ontario and Quebec and the Atlantic provinces as well.

As of this week, Canadian mills outside Atlantic Canada shipping softwood products to U.S. consumers must pay an import bond equivalent to 14.5 per cent of the shipment's value. Competitors in the U.S. thus reap an overnight price advantage of whatever tariff amount is eventually decreed to apply. Keep in mind, sir, that in the case of, say, B.C. the provincial stumpage fees have gone up about 15 per cent as a result of the infamous Washington–Ottawa memo of understanding of 1986. Keep in mind also that the B.C. mills have seen their revenues on U.S. exports drop by an estimated one–fifth since 1986 as a result of the rise in the exchange rate of the Canadian dollar.

A mining engineer friend of mine puts the point here quite well, and I quote: "Those running the Government of Canada are now dumping about 300,000 ounces of the Bank of Canada's gold reserves monthly in an effort to keep the dollar above 84 cents U.S. The high dollar has wrecked our manufacturing exports and is now doing the same thing to our natural resource exports." The situation which has now developed could result in the closing of B.C. and other softwood mills across Canada.

At the end of the Tokyo round of GATT I am told that approximately 90 per cent of the lumber products entered the United States duty free. In 1983 U.S. lumber producers instigated a countervail action against our products but the U.S. commerce department held that the exports at issue were not subsidized by the stumpage arrangements of the provincial governments in place. I am told by Mel Clark, who has been professionally involved in trade issues for successive Canadian governments for three decades, that one reason for the favourable ruling was because the American officials worried that the Canadian government of the day could have won the issue before the GATT tribunal. That GATT tribunal had previously held that stumpage is not an export subsidy.

In 1989 the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement of course began to apply, thus taking us out of GATT for purposes of countervail. Under the FTA if Canadians have a complaint about U.S. countervail, article 1902 of the FTA provides that panels must decide the legality of U.S. countervailing duties on the basis of U.S. law. They are limited to deciding whether the U.S. government has correctly applied American law. Under GATT, the legality of U.S. countervail duties are judged on the basis of GATT law.

In addition, FTA article 1902.2 permits the U.S. to change its countervailing duty without Canada's agreement. In contrast, again, GATT rights and obligations can only be changed by agreement among the countries that negotiated, of which of course Canada is one.

I understand that section 409 of the FTA establishes a new track for U.S. industry to petition for non-tariff measures to gain an advantage over Canadian exports.

• (2340)

This can be used to nullify Canada's GATT rights relating to subsidies and countervail duties and is unique in that it applies only to Canada. The adverse implications for Canada can be illustrated by two examples.

First, section 409 nullifies the GATT injury tests and establishes a much softer alternative criteria for action against perceived subsidized Canadian exports. Second, GATT limits counter-subsidy action to a countervailing duty equal to the subsidy, but section 409 permits the use of a range of non-tariff measures that could provide much more protection than the duty equal to the subsidy.

In short, under the FTA, Canadian exporters, including softwood lumber producers, are much more vulnerable to U.S. harassment and restriction that they were under GATT. The longer term consequences to U.S. countervail laws could be very detrimental to Canada-U.S. trading relations.

We have heard much huffing and puffing from the Mulroney cabinet about going to the binational dispute panel under the FTA. They do not mention that other remedies must be exhausted first. More important, they do not say that the binational panel can only say if the U.S. applied its own law correctly.

If the U.S. loses the case as it did on the pork case, it can under section 409 of the U.S. implementing legislation simply change its law. It is worth noting here that it was the U.S. federal government itself that began the countervail action against our softwood lumbers last week, a very rare occurrence.

In short, Canadians should be very skeptical about our chances of winning before a binational panel four, five, six months from now or longer. Similarly, concerning the retaliation bluster against the U.S. from various cabinet ministers, do they know that under the FTA we can only have retaliation if we have a legal right to do so?

There is no right to do so until the binational panel first renders a decision, likely as I indicated, many months away. If Canada retaliates without a legal basis for doing so, the Americans can invoke other provisions of the free trade agreement against us. In short, they get the right to retaliate against us. As we all know, they have lots of guns in their arsenal.

It is very late, almost twelve o'clock. I understand that you will by unanimous agreement not be seeing the clock until all speakers have spoken. I understand that is the case.

In conclusion, the United States department of commerce has absolutely no grounds for its decision which is politically motivated, unjustified and hypocritical. It also seriously undermines the U.S. government's commitment to the raison d'être of the present Canada-U.S. free trade agreement.

I could not agree more with the words of our present Ambassador to the United States who has accused U.S. officials "of a tortured attempt to manipulate facts in order to obtain the pre-ordained result". I hope that our friends and trading partners south of the border will come to their senses before they wreak absolute havoc among literally hundreds of thousands of Canadian families.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry rises on a point of order.

Mr. Champagne (Champlain): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Given the importance of the debate tonight and following discussions with my honorable colleagues from the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party, if anyone wishes to rise after the scheduled time, I think there is unaninmous consent to allow this.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The honorable members have heard the honorable member's suggestion. Is there unanimous consent to go on past midnight, which was the time mentioned in the motion passed earlier in the day?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the United States is the bastion of free enterprise, right?

Mr. Angus: What century?

Mr. Friesen: It all depends on how you define free enterprise in American terms. We have seen plenty of examples on how they modified the definition of free enterprise in the United States.

In the agricultural industry, if they are short of water, they bring in the army corps of engineers. They level the land, they bring in the water and it is free to the farmers. Of course, that is not a subsidy, the Americans have the power to do that without billing the farmer.

Then they can produce cheaper products and ship them into Canada. However, that is not a subsidy, it is free enterprise. I have seen it all too often. They impose non-tariff barriers at the border and simply allow trucks to sit there for a while while the customers wait for the product. The merchant in Canada is waiting for a product and finally cannot wait any longer and gets a different supplier. However, they believe in free enterprise.

There are land banks in the United States which reduce the amount of acreage which they put into crop and therefore create an artificial supply. They pay the farmer to keep that land in a land bank. They create that artificial shortage and thereby keep the price up. However, that is not a subsidy, no, no. That is free enterprise in the United States. Who says that they are fair traders?

For them, might makes right. They think they can get away with it. Many times they do and it encourages them to do it some more.

The background to this particular issue, the countervail on softwood lumber in Canada which probably hits my province the hardest, is not the last few years. The U.S. department itself agreed that this is not a subsidy. It goes back several years to the practices of the U.S. forest industry. U.S. forestry companies bid on the price of the woodlots which supply their logs. In the late 1970s the U.S. timber companies engaged in a speculative bidding war for stumpage on U.S. forest lands. That drove the cost of these cutting rights far above their appraised values because there was a short supply.

They have fear in their free enterprise system. They were afraid that they would have a shortage of logs and therefore the price went up.

In the intervening years between the end of the seventies and the beginning of the eighties there was a slump in the market and they had bid far too high for their timber rights, for their logs, for their supply. They could not sell, the market was depressed and the timber companies were in trouble. In 1984 the U.S. Congress had to buy out $2.8 billion worth of these purchases at a net cost to the taxpayer of over $400 million. Of course, that is not a subsidy. When the U.S. timber companies are in trouble and are bailed out by the U.S. taxpayer, that is not a subsidy. However, a stumpage based on fair price is a subsidy.

Somehow there was a redefinition of the free market system and free enterprise by the Americans. The trouble goes back to the mid-seventies when they were bidding too high and they could not afford to pay those prices in a depressed market in the early 1980s.

That continues to the present day. One of the issues is the supply of timber for the American companies. Oddly enough, they refuse to export logs outside their states or outside their country because they need them all. I do not blame them. They need them all for their industry.

However, the same provision holds true for Canada and that is deemed to be unfair. They need our logs to keep their mills going. There is a shortage of supply. One of the reasons is because of the spotted owl decision in the United States which resulted in thousands of square miles of land being taken out of production. The U.S. court system took it out of production and the timber companies cannot get at it. Therefore they need timber. If they cannot get at theirs they want to get at ours. If they do not export logs, that is okay. However if we do not export logs, that is wrong.

The problem with the American free enterprise system is that if they cannot beat their competitor they beat up their competitor.

• (2350)

We have seen it with the Japanese and the semiconductor problem where the Japanese created an incredibly efficient industry in Japan and were shipping products into the United States. The American industry could not compete any more. So what did they do? They dumped on the Japanese as though it were the Japanese who were wrong.

We saw it a few years ago in Detroit when the American car industry was no longer competing with the import industry because the import industry from Japan was very smart. The Americans were still building gas guzzlers and nobody wanted to buy them.

What did they do? The American workers bought a brand new Toyota. It was parked outside the plant and then the workers paid one dollar each to smash the Toyota as a symbol of their anger against Japan for competing against their inferior product.

Their system is if you cannot beat the competitor, beat up the competitor. That is what they are doing to the lumber industry in Canada today.

We have a very efficient industry. As my friend from Nanaimo—Cowichan mentioned, there has been a reduction in the workforce many times over since I worked in it years ago. When I worked in it at the turn of the century, about 1950—

An hon. member: Which century?

Mr. Friesen: Which century. There was a workforce of 75,000 to 100,000 in British Columbia. Today it is down to 30,000 or 25,000 partly because of restructuring the industry, partly because of ersatz materials, but it is creating a problem for our workforce.

We have a very competitive industry, a high-tech industry in Canada. If the Americans cannot compete, that is their problem as long as there is a level playing field. But what is fair to them is not necessarily fair to any other outsider who was watching the way they carry on.

For all that has been said about the free trade agreement, we would be in terrible shape today if there was no opportunity to go to a higher court of appeal. There we can take part and be part of the dispute settlement mechanism itself. We can have our people on the panel so that there is a fair election of the chairman of that panel and we become part of the decision-making process to make sure that it is fair and honest, with objective criteria, rather than the way they have functioned.

So I say that we have to carry on and be united in this country in our opposition to the American tactics. We cannot let their artificial shortage of logs allow them to create an excuse to destroy our industry. We cannot allow them to smash us just because they cannot compete any longer.

I appreciate the kind of debate that has been going on here tonight. Members from all sides of the House have banded together in a show of unity that we cannot allow the Americans to do this to us.

We are united in our concern for the employees, the workers, the companies, the payrolls, the products of our country. We stand together to make sure that we win this battle against the United States.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, before starting I would like to say to the hon. member who just finished that the speech he gave was an excellent speech. It is one of the better ones I have heard from that side of the House in a long time. I was very pleased to hear it.

[Translation]

Before getting into details about the way the United States treat our softwood lumber exports, I would like to say a few words about the forest industry in Canada and its importance to our economy.

You will agree, Mr. Speaker, that this will be the canvas that will allow us to better illustrate what is at stake in the matter we are debating tonight in this House. So when considering the importance of the forest industry, it is important to realize that our country was built partly on that industry. In fact, for a long time, it was the pillar of our economy. It still remains today one of the main building blocks of our country.

The importance of the forest industry to the Canadian economy is undeniable. Canada has 4.36 million square kilometres of forest. That represents about 176 square metres for each of the 25 million Canadians. Our wooded territory covers more than twice the area of the European Economic Community, nearly twice the area of Mexico and accounts for 15 per cent of the world's forests.

The forest industry provides employment for nearly 300,000 people directly and 750,000 indirectly. In 1988, more than $30 billion of forest products were exported. One seventh of manufacturing income is forest-related and forests contribute more than $17 billion to Canada's net balance of trade—more than agriculture, fishing and mining combined.

Forestry is a bigger industry than automobiles and oil. Canada has the second largest supply of softwood in the world, after the former Soviet Union, and is the leading exporter of softwood lumber. By the way, this fact reminds us of the importance of what we are debating tonight.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, Canada produces one third of pulp exports and 63 per cent of all newsprint.

Canada produces about 16 per cent of all the world's softwood lumber and should continue to do so during the next decade. In addition, Canada accounts for about 40 per cent of all the international trade in this product, since it exports 70 per cent of its production.

In 1989, Canadian production of softwood lumber amounted to some 59 million cubic metres, compared to 45 million in 1980. Scattered across the country, most sawmills are small and employ fewer than 100 people. British Columbia provides 61 per cent of the softwood lumber produced in Canada, followed by Quebec, with 18 per cent; Ontario, with 10 per cent; Alberta, with 7 per cent; and New Brunswick, with 2 per cent.

Nearly three quarters of British Columbia's production is exported, compared to half of the production in other provinces.

What is most troublesome about our present trade situation with regard to forest products remains its vulnerability.

This weakness is evidenced, to some extent, by the limited number of markets and even more so by the concentration of production around just a few products. Besides, since wood is a commodity which is becoming increasingly scarce, thus bringing closer the cost and the price of products of a lesser value, there might be a possibility for improving our exports by eventually resorting to products with a higher added value.

Moreover, the industry should decide to diversify its products and markets by using new technologies in order to be protected from economic fluctuations.

The future of this industry is at stake and Canada has resolutely entered into a transitional period of forest ressources management and development. So the pace of this transition—in this case, the change from essentially extracting forest products to adopting a more cultural approach—must be accelerated without forgetting however the importance of adhering to the principles of integrated management for the entire Canadian forest ressources.

Mr. Speaker, you and others may wonder why a member from Atlantic Canada would stick around here all night to speak on this issue since it does not affect Atlantic Canada. I must say that I have a very strong interest in forestry. My riding is very intensely based on the forestry industry. Also, as a Canadian member of Parliament I have an interest in Canada. This a national issue. It is not just because British Columbia, Alberta, Ontario or Quebec is having a problem. It is an issue that all Canadians must address.

I think that we have to look at it also as an issue of sovereignty, an issue where we must protect what we have. I do not mean by following some of the ideology that the Americans are using at the present moment. I am saying that we must not look at it in an anti-American movement. We must start looking at a pro-Canadian movement. If other countries are going to harm our industries then we have to start taking some action.

With regard to British Columbia, I want to speak in a little more detail. I know that the Liberal leader in the province of British Columbia, Mr. Gordon Wilson, has expressed his very deep concern with the state of affairs. The Liberal critic for the forestry sector in the province of British Columbia also issued a press release recently. I would like to quickly quote his statement. He says: "Lumber manufacturing operators in B.C. will be devastated by the new tariff on softwood lumber". That in itself is reason for me to stick around this evening to say something about it and try to convince our neighbours to the south that what they are doing is completely wrong and immoral.

I would also like to commend the members of the House who have spoken so far in trying to build a unified type of approach to the issue here. Maybe government members could go back to their ministers and say that it is a very national and very important issue, as it evidently is as we are all here this evening debating it so late, and that we should take some lobbying action in the United States and internationally.

My colleague from Cochrane—Superior put it very well earlier this evening when he mentioned that we must start looking at some type of retaliation, whether it is on fruit and vegetables that are coming in from California, whether we must start enforcing Canadian standards on American forest products that are coming in, whether we must just take that advertising campaign with regard to advising the Americans that their home costs are going to escalate because of their own tactics. I think it is important that we take some very definite steps.

I congratulate all members from all parties for the positions that have been taken here tonight. It has been very responsible and it is very refreshing to hear some of the comments this evening.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I believe it is important that I take the opportunity this morning to add my perspective to the decision made by the officials in the United States this week with regard to softwood lumber exports from Canada to the U.S. In doing so, I want to go back in time a bit.

I have been in this House since 1984. Early in my tenure here I remember my colleague from Skeena who, quite frankly, was a voice in the wilderness warning all of us, not just the government of the day but our own caucus and the Official Opposition, about the potential threat from the American Congress, the American administration and the American lumber lobby as they agitated toward an attack on Canada's softwood lumber producers. The member for Skeena was very persistent. Regretfully, everything that he warned us about has come to pass.

When he said back in the mid-1980s that we had to fight to the end the attacks by the American lumber industry, he was right. The Conservative government caved in. Instead of going through with the existing, dare I call it, dispute settlement mechanism in the States, the government caved in and imposed our own 15 per cent softwood lumber tax. It has been suggested that part of that caving in was because of pressure from the Government of British Columbia, the then Social Credit government that saw a windfall profit for itself because eventually the money from the 15 per cent tax would come to it.

My colleague, the member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley, has taken on the mantle from the member from Skeena. He has done a remarkable job in terms of keeping the issue alive and of making sure we were on top not only of the issue and not only of American politics, but of the wheeling and dealing among Canadian provinces and the federal government. It was he who raised the fact that Bill Vander Zalm and the Socred Minister of Forestry were keeping the Americans in touch with the negotiating strategy of the Canadian provinces and the Canadian government. In other words, they were selling us out as fast as we could make a tactical decision as to how the American pressure could be dealt with.

My colleague from Skeena—and this is in response to the member from the Liberal caucus who just spoke—pointed out the fact that years ago, before the imposition of the 15 per cent surtax, one of the ways in which we could have defeated the American pressure was to launch a massive government funded advertising campaign in the United States to point out to American consumers what they are now being reminded of, the fact that it is now going to add $1,000 or $1,500 or whatever it is to the price of a home because of the decision by the American government.

We wanted to do that back then to help make our case, but the government of the day, the same government there is today, said: "No, that is not the way to go".

I come from northwestern Ontario where after the fur industry, lumber became the next most appropriate means of creating wealth. We use our forests for both primary and secondary industries, so softwood lumber is extremely important to us. All of us in the northwest have sawmills in our ridings. All of us in the northwest have logging operations. All of us have pulp and paper manufacturing facilities. They are all inter-related. Even though we are talking today about softwood lumber which is really the sawmill operations, there is an inter-relationship because the chips and the waste products go off to the pulp and paper industry to assist it in its viability. Every sector is affected by the American decision.

In the riding I have the honour of representing I have a range of forest based industries. I want to use as an example one community, Atikokan, and more particularly Suphowie, a neighbourhood settlement where Atikokan Forest Products has its base. Not too long ago that sawmill was in real danger of disappearing, in large part because of the original 15 per cent softwood lumber tax. As part of an economic impact analysis and as part of an attempt, a very successful attempt, I might add, thanks to the Bob Rae government in Ontario, we were able to ensure that mill and a neighbouring mill were going to survive. We looked at the economic impact of that one sawmill. It was not a very large sawmill, it had 160 full-time workers commuting from Atikokan about 30 miles out. The economic impact was quite incredible.

• (0010)

Let me just deal with the Treasury of Ontario and the Treasury of Canada. If Atikokan Forest Products was allowed to close the province of Ontario would lose $7.9 million in 1991. In the following years it would lose $9.1 million. That is a combination of a loss of income taxes and whatever corporate taxes there are and an increase in the outputs in terms of UI and social assistance.

The cost to the federal government would be $11.4 million in the first year and $5.6 million thereafter. These are very serious economic impacts on a very tiny community.

If we extend that across all of northwestern Ontario, with all of our sawmill communities, we can begin to get a sense of the impact on the Treasury, let alone the impact on the economy of the community the sawmill is located in or near and the regional economy. It is extensive.

The Government of Canada has no choice. It has to fight this latest attack by the Government of the United States. Quite frankly, I do not accept the argument that this decision was made by low-level functionaries who were not following the tune of their master. This is an election year in the United States. George Bush is being hammered by right wing Republicans and by the Democrats. People are looking for "Buy America" and "America First" and he is quite prepared to sacrifice his buddy, the Prime Minister of this country.

The importance of the debate tonight is to say to the Government of Canada that there are thousands and thousands of people out there who want this government to be on their side. This House has a responsibility to ensure that is the case. We in my caucus will continue to put the pressure on the Conservative government to make sure that it starts to speak for Canadians and fight for Canadians, rather than saying yes to George Bush and his buddies.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, it is with sadness that I stand in this House this evening. The softwood lumber industry in this country is in a sad mess because the Americans have imposed a 14.48 per cent tariff on our lumber. This will be devastating to the lumber industry and it appears that it violates this disastrous supposed free trade agreement.

We were all told that the deal would secure our markets with the United States. It is certainly obvious tonight that it has not secured anything and it has left this country, specifically the lumber industry and many other industries, in a sad situation.

It is very important to note that we probably had 90 per cent free access to the American market in the lumber industry before the free trade agreement was signed. It is very difficult to call this a free trade deal because in free trade everything moves back and forth freely.

It is quite obvious that this is not exactly how it is. It is only what the Americans choose to take from us. If they choose not to raise the size of the lobster and if they decide there is nothing wrong with the potato then they slap a tariff on the lumber.

When this government put a 15 per cent export tax on Canadian lumber we did so because the Americans said our stumpage fees were too low and this was a subsidy. Since that deal, provincial governments have increased their stumpage fees and the Americans turn around and impose a 14 per cent tariff.

If Canadians eliminate the problem, why are Americans doing this to us now? I say they are doing this because they can get away with it under this deal. The dispute settlement mechanism is so full of holes one could drive a car through it.

The dispute settlement mechanism can only say if the American law is correctly applied, not if the law was fair. As well, it says the Americans can change their laws, and that is just what the Americans did. The U.S. changed its laws about subsidies and used the charges against us. A deal like that is no good at all.

We are subject to American import laws, which as an exporting nation puts us in a sad situation. I well remember during the last election, during the numerous debates in my district of Cardigan, Prince Edward Island, we were talking about supply management and free trade. Things were going to be protected. Well today the dairy industry, the poultry industry and the egg industry are on the verge of financial difficulties.

I can assure you that it looks very obvious that the free trade agreement again is not going to be of any help, if not harmful. As I stated during the election campaign, free trade and supply management are two opposites.

Free trade, or what free trade should be, is the removal of tariffs and controls. But it is quite obvious tonight that it is not the removal of tariffs, only when the Americans decide to remove them, and to put them back in place when the Americans so desire.

Why I spoke so strongly for supply management was because I felt they were two opposites. Supply management meant that you could put protection in place to control the importation of certain products into the country. No, we were told, this was going to be protected. But, here again we could lose or jeopardize our dairy, egg and poultry industries.

It looks to me that supply management, along with softwood lumber and many other industries in this country, has come to a crashing halt because of this notorious trade deal this government got us into.

During the election we were told that with the trade deal the Americans would become our partners in international trade. This is simply not the case.

Look at GATT. Our problems there over supply management are caused by the Americans who want to destroy our system of supply management. It was the U.S. that challenged us on ice cream and yoghurt. It was the U.S. that challenged us on the B.C. salmon processing. Now it is the Americans who are imposing tariffs on our softwood lumber.

The province most affected by this government's spineless attitude in dealing with the United States over softwood lumber is British Columbia.

But the people in the softwood lumber industry in British Columbia have a powerful ally in Gordon Wilson, the leader of the Liberal Party and leader of the opposition. Gordon Wilson has stood firm in his opposition to these protectionist measures and he stands proudly with the primary producers in demanding this government take action.

The Prime Minister must stop being the lap-dog of the United States President and start defending the interests of those Canadians who work in this vital industry.

The Americans are only interested in protecting themselves. The U.S. is not going to look after Canadian interests. The sad thing is that this government is not looking after our interests either.

The government has signed a deal that is unlikely to provide a favourable decision in this lumber dispute and until this government is willing to defend Canadian interests, I am afraid we will suffer.

Before the trade deal was signed, trade seemed to be going reasonably well between Canada and the United States. Today we have great problems with the Honda issue, the furniture industry, the manufacturing industry, and for sure with supply management. And it looks like the lumber industry is in a disastrous situation.

So I ask the government to stand and defend the lumber industry in this country.
