As I mentioned earlier, I conducted a survey of my constituents and was pleased to receive over 1,500 responses. A good part of this survey dealt with the division of powers between the federal and provincial governments. I asked my constituents their views on who should provide social services in general and who should provide particular services, such as pensions and medicare.

My Calgary North constituents were fairly evenly divided on social issues generally, considering for the most part that they should be provided through shared jurisdictions. This applied to medicare. However, 75 per cent of them felt that pensions should be federally administered. Only 15 per cent saw medicare as a totally provincial responsibility and 22 per cent thought it should be an exclusive federal jurisdiction.

Immigration is an area in which a number of people expressed strong views. Some 70 per cent of respondents feel that there should be strong federal control in this area.

One of the most difficult areas that my questionnaire touched on was that of aboriginal rights. From the questionnaire, from written comments and from my public meetings it is clear that my constituents want this issue resolved fairly and justly. Most, some 85 per cent, believe that the aboriginal people should have some form of sovereignty or nationhood within Canada, be it in the form of municipal-like government or at the level of provinces or even more. This having been said, there is also an overwhelming sense that we must make a settlement and get on living together as equal citizens. My constituents want the aboriginal people to be full participants in Canadian society. They do not want them to be continually ghettoized on reserves or condemned to lives on the welfare rolls.

My constituents have also expressed themselves on natural resources and environmental jurisdictions. Not surprisingly 70 per cent believe the jurisdiction over natural resources should be mostly or exclusively provincial. On the other hand, most, some 75 per cent, believe that environment should either be a joint responsibility or it should be in the exclusive hands of the federal government. This is clearly an indication that my constituents in Calgary North, at least, want the federal and provincial governments to come to a clear understanding on the sharing of responsibility for the environment.

When it comes to agriculture, my constituents see that largely as a provincial responsibility. Some 86 per cent want to see agriculture as either an exclusive provincial responsibility or as a joint federal–provincial responsibility.

I also asked my constituents about the justice system. Although many of the comments did not relate to the constitutional issue but to the Young Offenders Act and extradition, I am pleased to report to my constituents that the Solicitor General and the Minister of Justice have already taken action on their concerns by proposing dramatic changes to the Extradition Act and significant improvements to the Young Offenders Act. In the constitutional area, my constituents were largely in favour of the status quo of shared responsibilities for the justice system and law enforcement.

On the all important issue of structural reform, that is reform of the Senate, my constituents are firm in their demand that all provinces be treated equally. They are aware that our constituency has 140,000 people and only one member of Parliament, compared to Prince Edward Island with some 100,000 people and four members of Parliament and four senators. While they may feel that members of Parliament should be distributed as nearly as possible on a population basis, they also feel strongly that each province must be equally represented in the Senate or at least have similar authority through other means such as the changes in the rules for passage of items through the Senate.

On the over–all issue of constitutional relationships some 70 per cent of my constituents really do not want to change things very much. They would like federal–provincial relationships to be left much the same as they are, or they want them to be moderately shifted toward either a more centralized or more decentralized system.

We like Canada the way it is. Only 9.5 per cent of my constituents want a federation of sovereign states and 12.5 per cent want a stronger or unitary state.

There is also a very real desire within the constituency to see the federal government continue to focus on streamlining its operations, to cut the cost of federal services, and by so doing contribute to the competitiveness of this country. This translates to support for economic union within Canada.

Calgary North is a constituency made up largely of families. This community, as do many communities in Canada, sees the family as a fundamental building block of society. It is the foundation of social structure and organization. It is in the family that values and traditions we as a nation hold dear are nurtured.

Given the significance of the family to my constituents, it is important that the family be recognized within the Constitution as an essential part of the make–up of our society. This recognition will ensure that future governments will consider and protect families in all their objectives and endeavours.

The over–all impression I get from the people of Calgary North is that they are Canadian first and foremost. They want all their fellow Canadians to celebrate with them the joy that they find in this great land. They want to live and let live and in this regard they do not mind if others of their fellow Canadians preserve and rejoice in other traditions, languages or cultures. Above all, they want a Canada in which every citizen feels at home and equal.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me to rise this evening to speak on this very great issue that we are talking about these last number of months.

Canadians face many challenges on many fronts today: the economy, the environment and the Constitution. At no time has the need for national unity and consensus on Canada's future been greater.

127 years ago the Fathers of Confederation gathered in Charlottetown to transform their shared values, ideas and dreams into a vision and that vision into the framework for a country, a country that is the envy of many nations throughout the world.

We now face a new challenge: that of reforming our Constitution to ensure the responsiveness of our institutions of government to the social, the economic and the political realities of Canada as we approach the 21st century. I feel it is important that we keep apprised of issues at hand and of the ideas advanced by our constituents in order to strengthen national unity through a framework of constitutional reform.

My constituents' vision for the future is inspired by a number of practical realities about the nature of Canada. They believe that all Canadians share a desire to live together in a federal state based on common values and principles. Let us not throw away those things that we have been able to achieve.

Let us continue to pay heed to the different languages and the ethnic groups in this country. My constituents have a strong attachment to the preservation and the strengthening of fundamental rights and freedoms. While remaining sensitive to the issue of collective rights, my constituents believe that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms must continue to have primacy over all federal and provincial legislation.

Constitutional amendments should not reduce the primacy of the charter. The people of Hillsborough believe that we must strengthen our economic union. It is essential to Canada's existence as a federal state that the full benefits of unrestricted mobility of people, goods and capital be assured by the basic laws governing the country.

We must continue to develop internationally competitive products, services, technologies and strategies responsive to the demands of globalization. I have heard repeatedly that we must achieve practical measures which fully integrate Canada's regions and the decision and policy making processes at the national level.

A reformed Senate which is elected, which is effective and has a more equitable distribution of seats is an essential element of constitutional reform and a mechanism to ensure that the aspirations of Atlantic Canada and of western Canada are given the fullest consideration.

Such a Senate could have the power to examine appointments to important federal institutions and agencies and it could protect the rights of minority language groups.

As we talk about the reform of the Senate, we must talk about the changes in it that we would like to see happen. I also believe that this Chamber, the House of Commons, is in need of reform. This institution, which is the highest court in the land, must play a vital role in all aspects of our society. I believe this institution must work, that every member of this Parliament must have a say in the way that legislation proceeds, in the way that legislation starts out and in the way that legislation ends up.

It is time that this institution becomes the institution that I envisaged many years ago, that we are law-makers and that the laws are not just passed down from the executive branch, but also come from this part of the Parliament as well. I believe there is room and it is needed in this day and age. I certainly believe that we must change this House so that it becomes a greater working institution. If it has to become more like the U.S. Congress then so be it, but this will make it a better institution for all Canadians.

Of course, constitutional renewal means a realignment of powers. The fundamental principle guiding the process of renewal must be that legislative powers reside with the level of government that can handle them best. We must adopt a functional approach. The essential focus must be an arrangement which best serves the needs not of governments, not of bureaucrats, not of politicians, but of the people. Any new arrangement must ensure the flexibility to meet the changing demands and the challenges of the future.

In many areas the federal and the provincial governments should be able to legislate in a complementary manner. For example, in the area of the environment the federal government should be able to pass framework legislation stipulating national standards, leaving it up to the provinces to adapt these national standards to regional and provincial realities, and a similar approach where the federal government enacts national framework legislation so that the provinces have operational and administrative flexibility. This could resolve current problems with manpower training and regional development.

This functional approach would significantly reduce duplication and would provide for efficient public administration.

There must also be restrictions on the use of federal spending power within the areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction.

The problem in the past has been how to reconcile the limitation of the spending power with the need for national standards. With a functional realignment of powers, it becomes possible to achieve a constitutional limitation of the federal spending power without compromising national standards.

With respect to immigration, an administrative agreement now exists between the two levels of government and that arrangement should now be constitutionalized.

As the Supreme Court of Canada is becoming increasingly a constitutional court of law, it is reasonable that the provinces have greater involvement in the appointment of judges to that court. We should be able to develop a mechanism to break deadlocks in the future.

Any framework for reform must address outstanding native issues. There is a broad consensus and understanding in Canada of the need to deal with the status, the rights and the claims of aboriginal peoples. The process for amending the Constitution must also be addressed.

An enshrined amending formula would enable Canada to get on with the problems with the economy and other issues affecting it. Furthermore, I strongly believe these proposals for constitutional changes must be brought to the Canadian people for their consent and approval.

For this purpose the Liberal Party proposes a national referendum comprising two questions. The first would be on the substantive elements of the constitutional reform package and the second would deal specifically with the amending formula.

In conclusion, my constituents feel that it is now incumbent upon the government to table a detailed and concrete proposal. They also feel this country is big enough for all Canadians and we look forward to the day this Constitution and the amendments become a reality.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this brief 10–minute time slot to set out on the public record what the majority of the people in the Lethbridge federal riding have told me concerning the constitutional resolution in Canada in general.

I am sorry it is only 10 minutes but after the government caucus and cabinet have put forward the final resolution for consideration in this House I hope to speak for a much longer period, setting out my personal views.

Like other members I have received many hundreds of letters and telephone calls and have spoken to many dozens of people concerning the issue that is before us today and has been for the past few months.

Prior to Christmas 1991 the Lethbridge Chamber of Commerce sponsored a public meeting in the city of Lethbridge and many people participated. I published before Christmas a full householder on the federal proposals and got many worth–while and useful replies. As well I have spoken to many groups: church groups, Kiwanis Clubs, Rotary clubs, and other service clubs throughout the riding.

What can I safely report? There is a a minority out there which tends to believe the myths and the half–truths that are fed to them by special interest groups and certain parts of the media in Alberta. Tonight I speak for the vast majority and they speak very loudly and clearly on a number of points.

First, they understand far more than we generally give them credit for and while many of them admitted they did not know all of the details about our history and details about complex issues that you and I deal with every day, I am satisfied that they know the effect of globalization. They understand the implications of Europe and its coming together. They understand the implications of Asia and its coming together. They understand the impact of the yearly deficit and the national debt. They understand clearly and are very much agitated by the continual tug of war between the federal level and the provincial level.

Second, Canadians are ready, willing and able to face the reality of our problems. They want, indeed they demand that we people in public office, whether municipal, provincial or federal, and that business and labour stop this stupid fighting that we get ourselves into, this tug of war for turf, and that we settle down to some very serious problem solving.

Third, they know very well that they together have created one of the most prosperous, peaceful, tolerant and stable nations in the entire world. We did this in spite of a very harsh climate, with an incredibly small, diverse population spread over 8,000 kilometres. They also know from talking to other people that others around the world see us as being an absolutely first rate model on which to base their own societies as they try to balance the cultural, historic, ethnic, and religious differences.

Fourth, they understand very well that as the world becomes more integrated and competitive we must speak with one clear voice or we will be lost among that host of small ineffectual nations in the world.

Fifth, they understand that Canada depends upon world trade more than almost any other industrialized nation. I have since learned from other reading that we are second to Germany in that respect, and that if we split up we will have no meaningful voice to promote sensible international rules and dispute resolution mechanisms.

They understand very well the law of the jungle and they do not want to have any part of it.

In the time remaining, I would like to read into our Hansard certain parts of an address given at the annual Royal Bank shareholders meeting by Mr. Allan R. Taylor, its chairman and CEO. His address is entitled" "March of Folly" in recognition of the eminent U.S. Historian, Barbara Tuchman.

On page 2 he states:

> Marches of folly are made possible by the existence of dangerous delusions. It is the delusion that a national break-up would involve only minimal costs that risks sending Canada down this road of irreversible folly.

And on page 3 he continues:

> Most lethal of all is the assumption that the departure of Quebec would resolve our difficulties. That it would solve the challenges facing Canada; that it would solve the problems of Quebec; that it would solve the problems of west; that it would redress the wrongs done to our First People.
> This is only one of the dangerous delusions that beckon Canadians down the march of historic folly.
> What Canadians should be asking themselves first and very explicitly, is whether disunity is the answer to the challenges we face.
> Do we really need to blow Canada apart to meet Quebec's historic concerns? Quebec is a unique cultural island of 6 million French-speaking people in an ocean of 270 million people working and living in English. Quebec is a distinct society. Do we really need to destroy Canada to recognize and protect that reality? I say no.
> Do we really need to blow Canada apart to understand and address a deep alienation in the west where many people believe that our national institutions are dominated by a deaf and unfeeling eastern majority? Do we really need to destroy Canada to recognize and correct that concern? I say no.
> Do we really need to blow Canada apart to meet the deep-felt concerns of people in Atlantic Canada? Do we have to destroy Canada to solve their very real structural economic problems? I say no.
> Do we really need to blow Canada apart to give the First Nations the powers to participate directly in determining their own destiny within Canada, rights they have been denied for too long? Again, I say no.
> Do we really need to blow Canada apart to address the vital need for greater harmonization of federal and provincial policies and cutting the wasteful duplication of costs?
> That separation would be relatively easy and without cost is not just a dangerous delusion; it is a real world impossibility.
> It is my estimation that, the costs of a break-up would be huge and long-term and paid by everyone in Canada, here in Quebec and in every other province and territory. No one would escape lightly; no one would fair well.

I could go on for many minutes on this, but I think just in closing I would say, again from Mr. Taylor, and I quote:

> In this anniversary year we should be celebrating our achievements. Canada which has so much promise is 125 years old. Montreal, a living example of how people of different cultures can live together in peace is 350 years old.
> Canada's accomplishments are widely recognized, at least by others.
> I point to the report of the UN Development Program and it rates countries in terms of economic prosperity, longevity, living standards, gender equality, racial equality, distribution of income and human freedom.
> In 1991 Canada ranked second from the top in the whole world on this global scale of the quality of life. That is what is threatened by separation.
> That is what we stand to lose by separation.

> Are we perfect on all of these? By no means. But we are so high on all that observers abroad can only shake their heads and ask: Do Canadians not realize what they are risking? What they could lose. If this Canada is not worth saving, what country is?

Well here is one Canadian, a son of Saskatchewan who cares passionately about keeping Canada together from British Columbia to Newfoundland, and Quebec is part of my Canada.

• (2030)

On a personal note, I would say with the brevity of a business leader he summarized exactly how I feel. As a third generation Albertan, I must say I agree with him 100 per cent.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to rise today to give this House a report of the discussions I have had with my constituents on the subject of the Constitution.

Throughout 1991 I was able to consult the residents of my riding on several occasions. The initial consultation involved a constitutional questionnaire which was distributed to each of the approximately 80,000 households in York North. I am pleased to table the results of that questionnaire in this House.

This was followed by town hall meetings held in Aurora, Richmond Hill, Oak Ridges, Maple, Woodbridge, Thornhill, Nobleton, Kleinburg and King City, all communities in my riding.

The Constitution was discussed during my visits to the homes of the constituents, and finally a special constitutional forum was held where the guest speaker was the Official Opposition constitutional critic, the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel. Throughout this process, whether it was in response to the questionnaire or at the different community meetings and town hall meetings, I found that the citizens of York North cared deeply about their nation and wanted to play a role in reforming their Constitution. The reaction at all levels was enthusiastic. If there is one fact that impressed me more than any other, it is that the people participated in such great numbers.

My constituents spoke out strongly on many different elements of the Constitution. Their views revealed a patriotic love for their country and a determination to preserve it for their children.

The picture painted by the results of my consultation with the people of Canada's most populous riding contains a number of striking characteristics, namely, a strong endorsement of our bilingual, culturally diverse and aboriginal heritages; a reformed, elected Senate; free economic trade between provinces and territories; and the preservation of a strong national government with shared powers for the provinces.

In discussions I held people came forward with strong opinions but also with open minds. That openness gave many of my constituents the chance to better understand the special needs of Quebec, the western provinces, aboriginal Canadians and other groups. As a result we all have a greater understanding of ou r Canadian reality.

The need for communication is ever present in the current debate. As the government's regional conferences on the Constitution have indicated, face to face exchanges between people from different regions is the most effective remedy for the ills of parochialism and stereotyping.

Throughout the constitutional consultation process, the residents of York North demonstrated that they are understanding and generous people, that then are willing to compromise to advance their principles but will never compromise their principles. They are guided by a set of high moral standards. For them, the eventual constitutional package must fairly reflect and address the concerns and preoccupations of Canadians from coast to coast to coast.

My constituents understand that to build a harmonious nation, we must all co-operate and subscribe to the politics of accommodation.

The residents of York North are excited by the possibility of a new constitutional contract and hope that we will be able to arrive at a meaningful and responsible accord in the very near future. I say in the very near future because there is no question in my mind that the people of York North, like most other Canadians, are suffering from constitutional fatigue. They want the constitutional issue resolved so that governments can turn their attention to other challenges which potentially threaten the long-term health of this nation.

The citizens of my riding realize that over the last decade the Constitution has occupied centre stage in this nation's political discourse. In that time our competitors around the world have been forging partnerships, developing markets for their goods, adopting visionary training policies, and investing in their infrastructure and the environment.

The people of York North understand how fast the world is changing and are ready to deal with that change. They realize that trade barriers are coming down all around the world and they expect Canada to follow suit. Support for the principle of free movement of people, goods and capital was, for all intents and purposes, unanimous. My constituents know that Canadians will not win any trade wars outside our borders until we stop fighting trade wars inside our borders.

When we finally complete our constitutional puzzle, we will have a lot of ground to make up. We must realize that we will only make it up through concrete action.

York North residents are eagerly awaiting the challenge. Through our discussions, we all agree that a constitution must be supported by a government with vision. What this nation needs now more than ever is a government that has a realistic plan for improving the quality of life for its citizens and the political will to carry it out.

In the end, a Constitution tells us what we can be. Only men and women with imagination and conviction can bring that ultimate goal to reality and to fruition.

York North residents realize that Canada was founded on compromise. In 125 years, that has always been the source of our greatest strength. Now more than ever it is important for Canadians everywhere to put the demands of their specific interest groups in proper perspective and think of the common good.

It is extremely important to defend the needs of women, aboriginals, visible minorities, the disabled, youth, and every single Canadian. We all realize that the ultimate interest group in this constitutional talk to which we all belong is Canada.

In the present debate, groups and individuals must realize that sometimes it is necessary to sacrifice a little in order to gain a lot. The preservation of this great nation is something worth fighting for.

In conclusion, I would like to say once again how pleased I am to stand here today and share the opinions of my constituents with this House. I, like them, am confident that we are approaching the long hoped for solution to the constitutional puzzle.

There is optimism in York North, and I know that Canadians everywhere are counting on this Parliament to come up with constitutional proposals that will reflect the aspirations of the nation. When we look at other nations, we cannot help but be grateful to live in this peaceful, prosperous country.

The realization that we are blessed teaches us to respect the opinions of others and to make allowances for the special needs. The land is strong, and its people have big hearts. Our history shows us that there is room for everyone here as long as everyone respects each other and gives each other a chance to prosper.

It is with that thought, it is with that progressiveness and fairness that I am convinced that we will guarantee the survival of this nation.

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I do not know how much longer we will have to keep talking to convince you that you have heard all of the arguments that are possible regarding the Constitution.

I want to take this time to thank the government for giving us this privilege over a series of evenings to talk about what has happened in our ridings. I want to report to you, Mr. Speaker, and to my colleagues a meeting we held in Woodstock in the constituency of Oxford two weeks ago tonight, February 3. My provincial counterpart, who belongs to a different political persuasion than I do, and I agreed that this was an issue that should be non-partisan and we agreed to work together on this. Kimble Sutherland, the local MPP for Oxford, and I approached the president of the Woodstock Chamber of Commerce, Mr. Robert White, a lawyer in Woodstock, who was very interested in recommending to his colleagues that they sponsor a public meeting where people from all across the riding could be heard. They in turn approached the recently arrived publisher of the Woodstock Daily Sentinel Review, the local daily newspaper, to see if he would chair the meeting. He agreed and did a superb job, bringing to it a kind of fellowship and jovialism that was very helpful in keeping people working together and on the subject.

Interestingly enough, he is a new Canadian, having achieved his Canadian citizenship in 1967. In his opening comments he said: "I think Canada is the number one place to be", which set the stage for the evening.

There were some general impressions which I would like to report to the House at this time. First of all, we thought we might get somewhere between 30, 40 or 50 people to that meeting. Instead we had a full house of somewhere over 130 people. There was standing room only in the room that we had acquired for that purpose. These people included students and senior citizens, business leaders, labour leaders, farmers, housewives, professionals, a cross-section of our society in our area.

I have to report also that there was an obvious sense of change in the mood, which we see across the country as well. People were softening from some of their hard positions. There was a willingness to compromise and to recognize the distinct nature of the Quebec society and so on. Without a doubt, the majority of those who were in attendance wanted to see Quebec stay in Confederation.

Just a word about who spoke and what they had to say at that meeting. Let me begin by repeating for you what Susan de Ryke, who was reporting for the Woodstock Daily Sentinel Review, said as she observed about how the meeting went. She said: "They spoke from prepared speeches, notes jotted down on envelopes and from the heart." That sort of gave you a good feeling of how people approached the subject.

Many issues were touched upon, a few of which were somewhat remote to the constitutional subject at hand, but one expected that to happen. Virtually everybody who attended that meeting was able to speak. In fact, 29 did speak and the meeting went on until nobody else indicated that they wanted to say a few words. The meeting went on for somewhere over two hours.

Bob White, whom I mentioned before, is the president of the Chamber of Commerce and also a lawyer. When he gave his remarks he said: "You fear what you do not know and we do not know Quebec". I think he expressed the views that we have come to realize, that when you do not know about something, you do not know about a people, you have reservations and apprehensions. I think those are beginning to break down as we hear each other talk more and more.

One gentleman who spoke was Mr. Earl Shea who was born in Quebec and married a French speaking girl whose history goes back to 1556 in Quebec. He is a local businessman in Woodstock. He is also the past president of the Woodstock Business Improvement Association and he is currently the president of the Rotary Club of Woodstock. He felt that there was a real need to keep Canada together, that there was a need to understand each other, and that those are some of the requirements of having the kind of unity that we want to have.

Another interesting speaker among the 29 was Mr. Les Cook, a retired postal worker and a former mayor of the city of Woodstock. He thought some of the malaise in the country with respect to the Constitution was probably due to the lack of confidence in both levels of government brought on by a weakening of some of our traditional values. He went on to say: "No one has the right to advocate break-up of their country".

Joan Denew, president of the National Council of Women in Canada, with a long history in this country, expressed some concern that Canadian women are worried about the fate of their social programs, and that was a comment we heard from two or three people.

A number of the witnesses wanted recognition of the rights of self-government for our aboriginal community. Matthew White who is a part-time student said: "I just don't think natives are getting a fair shake in Canada". He also agreed with the need to recognize the distinct society in Quebec.

A small number of people expressed concern about official bilingualism and the sign law. Within a large group we can expect to have a few that indicate those concerns as well.

With respect to the Senate there were a lot of views brought to the meeting regarding how the Senate should be changed, reforms in the Senate. The odd person wanted to have it abolished. Some wanted special seats for the aboriginals. Others wanted special seats for certain groups of people, sectors of society. I felt very sympathetic myself with David Irving of the town of Norwich who expressed the fact that we needed to have regional representation in the House. Personally I would support that.

Indeed I am a bit of a maverick. I would feel that we should keep the Senate the way it is now, only have it more regionally represented but by appointment so we have representation from all political parties that are governing in the provinces. At one time a few years back we had five different political parties in power in the provinces, only two of which were represented in the House of Commons.

We also heard from Graham Hart, a leader in the agricultural community. He expressed some disappointment in the fact that the Meech Lake Accord was not adopted. He wants to see us go ahead and not be side-tracked by too many other issues such as the social charter.

Toward the end of the two-hour session, a student by the name of Matt Brown offered a very interesting perspective on the national dilemma which we have here. I am quoting from his comments. He said: "Canada did not come together because it wanted to but because it needed to. The provinces came together to protect themselves from the states. If we keep bickering we will be all by ourselves again".

There were several others, including Peter Hayes, a high school student and president of the student council at the Huron Park Secondary School in Woodstock, who felt that too many minority groups were hoping to have their views carry the day, as it were, and suggested that those who yell the most sometimes are not the ones who come out to vote when the time comes for elections.

In summary, I say that there was an over-all plea for more awareness and a better understanding among all of us that was voiced at this meeting we had in Woodstock, something that I think we all need to heed.

We are having another meeting later this week in the town of Tillsonburg which will be the same. I will be interested to report to the committee following that meeting.

Just in conclusion may I say that I cannot sum up what happened at this meeting we had in my constituency of Oxford any better than was done by Cheryl Clark-Cowan from Woodstock who wrote in the Norwich Gazette, one of the weekly newspapers in the constituency. I am quoting her comments when she said:

> The end of the meeting brought a group hug of sorts from the capacity crowd. For as one speaker noted, although nothing concrete was accomplished from the two-hour session, it did bring those Canadians present a little bit closer together.

If there was one thing these meetings across the country have done, it is to bring Canadians closer together, help them to understand and be aware of other people's feelings. Hopefully that will lead to an understanding that will translate into the proposals that will be emanating from the government in the near future as far as our future Constitution is concerned.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There being no further members rising for debate, pursuant to order made Friday, February 14, 1992, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at ten o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

PRIVILEGE

PAEDOPHILIA

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of personal privilege.

I read an article in the January 27, 1992 issue of the Western Report on the subject of paedophilia and incest. In that article certain so-called academics offered their views that incest and paedophilia were perfectly acceptable.

Its contents so disturbed me that I felt compelled to bring it to the attention of members of Parliament and senators as I have done in the past in relation to other issues. The next day I wrote a short letter and attached a copy of the article in question. I asked members to read and reflect on its contents; no more, no less.

In the intervening days it has become apparent to me that my letter has been misinterpreted by some. Meanings have been attributed to the letter which I did not intend. I regret that I may have in some way offended some members and senators or members of the public. I am dismayed that I was not able to articulate myself in a manner which was clear to my fellow parliamentarians.

I did not state, I did not intend to state, nor did I intend to imply that homosexuals are child molesters. I do not equate paedophilia with homosexuality. There are heterosexual paedophiles and there are homosexual paedophiles. In fact the criminal mentioned in the article had assaulted children of both sexes.

In conclusion, let me say that I regret the pain any misunderstanding I may have caused any person in this Parliament or outside it. I feel for the plight of all of those in distress in our society.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for giving me this opportunity to make this statement.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 30 petitions.

PETITIONS

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and a privilege to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents of Blue River, Birch Island, Clearwater, Vavenby, Little Fort, as well as the rural areas of the North Thompson Valley. This is now the 67th petition I have presented in the House of Commons on this issue.

The petitioners pointed out that Multinational Resources, a company on the Vancouver Exchange, has announced its intentions to dam the North Thompson River at Valemount and divert part of the water into a number of trenches and canals in order to sell the water in the San Diego, California region.

They point out that this is one of the many proposals such as the Nowapa Plant to divert Canadian rivers into the United States and northern Mexico. They are asking that the Government of Canada state categorically that we will not permit our fresh water to be dammed and diverted into the U.S. and state very clearly to the United States authorities that Canadian rivers are not for sale.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, Question No. 194 will be answered today.

[Text]

Question No. 194—Mr. Saint-Julien:

Did Radio-Canada employees travel to Paris in November 1991 to attend the Sommet de la Francophonie and, if so, (a) how many employees went and who were they, (b) how much did lodging cost for each employee, (c) how much did air travel cost for each employee and what class did they travel on (First, Business, Economy), (d) how much did car rentals cost, (e) how much did food cost, (f) what was the cost in overtime, (g) what was the total cost of the event paid by Radio-Canada?

Hon. Henry Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): This matter has been brought to the attention of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (CBC). We are informed as follows:

CBC Société Radio-Canada covered the Sommet de la Francophonie in its entirety between November 16 and 23, 1991. Coverage of the Sommet included specials, radio and TV news reports, analyses and interviews with experts on current affairs programs. Furthermore, the material accumulated during the coverage was used to feed public affairs programs on televison and radio.

(a) The French radio network used six persons for all its programming (news and news specials, current and public affairs) namely:

The main host (anchorman) for special programs and journalist/presenter for major radio newscasts, a coordinator to look after sound material and report needs, a producer, a reporter in Ottawa, a parliamentary reporter form Quebec City and, finally, the host of Les Actualités.

The French televison network used 20 persons for specials and information programs. They were:

From Montreal: the host of Téléjournal, two producers, a production assistant, a journalist, a researcher, a technical director and a camera operator; from the London office: a producer, a correspondent, a camera operator, a sound person and an editor; from the national Ottawa office: a journalist, a camera operator, a sound operator and an editor; from Quebec City: a journalist; form Winnipeg: a producer and a technician.

(b) Parliament has not, as a matter of custom since the corporations's creation in 1936, required CBC to supply, in answering Parliamentary questions, certain details of its internal management and administration. Parliament has had two reasons for following this custom: first, the independence of the CBC as a Crown corporation, established for the purpose of producing and broadcasting, independently of political or commercial interference, programs for a national program service; and secondly, the competitive nature of many of CBC's activities.

The appropriateness of the CBC providing certain categories of information has been considered on many occasions by various parliamentary committees and when the CBC has suggested that such information should not be made a matter of public record, its views have been accepted by them. The names of employees and their functions in relation to specific programs, their salaries or expenses, the costs of individual programs, or business arrangements are examples of details which it has not been customary to require the CBC to supply. It is open to Parliament and its appropriate committees to discuss the policies and the CBC have followed in this regard.

(c) All these CBC/Société Radio-Canda employees travelled economy class, with the exception of two employees who travelled business class to Paris and returned economy class. Their departures, scheduled originally for November 13 and 15, respectively, were delayed until Saturday, November 16, because of the special program on the funeral of Cardinal Léger.

For travel costs, see response in (b) above.

(d) No cars were rented. However, the television crew rented a van with a driver for the duration of the Sommet.

For the rental costs, see response in (b) above.

Mr. Speaker: The question as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary has been answered.

Mr. Cooper: I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

ATLANTIC FISHERY

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I would like to request an emergency debate on the issue of the unfolding disaster in the Atlantic fishery. I make my request under Standing Order 52.

Your Honour will be aware that we are facing a crisis of unprecedented proportions with immense implications for jobs and so on. I hope you would find it possible to grant my request for a debate under Standing Order 52.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I have of course been paying attention to this matter. The hon. member has indicated to me, as he is required to do, that he wishes to raise this matter. There will be a debate on the issue tomorrow night commencing at eight o'clock p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

SPENDING CONTROL ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. John McDermid (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C–56, an act respecting the control of government expenditures, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee E.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak at second reading of Bill C–56, the spending control act.

The motion today is a very important one. As the Minister of Finance and I have pointed out on a number of recent occasions, the pre–budget consultations we had with organizations representing every sector of Canadian society have had one clear and consistent focus, that is the strong desire among Canadians for continued spending restraint by government, a lower deficit and greater assurance that taxes can be kept within bounds in the future. In those pre–budget consultations that is what came from every group from all walks of life. With this measure that we are debating today on second reading, we are responding to that firmly and clearly expressed desire by Canadians.

I would like to explain briefly what the spending control act will do and to place it in the context of the government's comprehensive plan for economic recovery. As hon. members are aware, the government announced its intention to introduce mandatory legislated spending limits in the February 1991 budget and draft legislation was released last summer.

The Standing Committee on Finance of this House conducted extensive public hearings on the draft bill and then its report came forward with a number of recommendations. I would like to take this occasion to thank hon. members of all parties for their useful consideration of the finance committee's study of the bill and to thank the many Canadians who appeared before that committee to offer their views and to give advice to the Government of Canada.

I might say as an editorial comment that it may be wise for the government and for the opposition parties to take a look at the possibility of pre–examining bills more often. It probably produces better legislation and much better debate in the House of Commons. This bill is an example of that, because we have made some changes as to the suggestions of the committee and witnesses who have appeared. We had an opportunity to air this bill before it was brought back to the House in its present form.

As I said earlier, the spending control act is a vital part of the government's commitment to build a stronger Canadian economy by controlling the deficit and the heavy burden of the public debt. The act will limit federal government program spending through to the year 1995–96, and this means all spending except for major self–financing programs and interest charges on the public debt to the levels set out in the fiscal plan brought forward in the February 1991 budget.

I want to emphasize that this is not a stand-alone measure. The spending control act will reinforce the government's expenditure control plan introduced in the 1990 budget and now being extended into the mid-1990s. It will work with the debt servicing and reduction account, which will receive all net revenues from the goods and services tax to ensure that our medium term deficit and debt reduction goals are achieved.

In my work in my riding and across this country I have heard from countless Canadians who have said that the debt servicing and reduction account is a very important thing, that the goods and services tax money must go into that fund, which it is by legislation, and be accounted for to the people of Canada. That is going to happen. Although people do not like the goods and services tax—no one likes taxes—they will feel somewhat better about it if they know that it is in fact going toward fighting the deficit.

All these measures will reinforce and be reinforced by another key initiative, that is the setting of low inflation targets that are helping to reduce inflation, and as a result bring interest rates down. This act will assure the fiscal restraint that is essential to keep our inflation targets in line. We are not only meeting our inflation targets but in fact doing much better than was projected. This in turn is the key to durably lower interest rates that will encourage investment, sustainable economic growth, and job creation.

I am pleased to note that the crucial importance of reducing the public debt as a share of our national income is supported by the Standing Committee on Finance.

In the 15 years before this government took office program spending had been increasing at an average annual rate of 13.8 per cent, or nearly 6 per cent after discounting for inflation. As a percentage of the economy, program spending rose from 14.8 per cent in 1968-69 to 19.6 per cent in 1984-85, a higher level than at any time since World War II.

We are now paying the price for these free-spending years. The increase in program spending during this period is the major factor behind the high annual deficits and the build up in the public debt that limits our room to manoeuvre today. That is why from the outset we have given first and continuing priority to spending restraint in controlling the deficit.

Between 1984-85 and 1990-91 program spending increased by only 3.6 per cent per year, well below the rate of inflation for that period of time at 4.4 percent. We have cut program spending in real terms. As a percentage of the economy, program spending is back down to 16 per cent, a level that we have not seen in 20 years.

This restraint in program spending has been the major factor that has allowed us to achieve a turn around in the government's operating balance from an operating deficit of $16 billion in 1984-85. In other words, we borrowed $16 billion just to pay for programs of that day in 1984-85. That has been turned around today so that we have a surplus of $11.9 billion in 1990-91. In other words, we are collecting almost $12 billion more than we are spending in program financing.

It is important to note that more than two-thirds of this improvement in the operating balance as a percentage of gross domestic product is due to restraint in program spending.

As a result of the turn around in the operating balance, every dollar of our current deficit simply goes to pay interest charges on the public debt. It is not lost on Canadians, I might say, that these are dollars that could otherwise be used to ease our recovery from the recession, to fund desirable programs or most important for Canadians, to reduce taxes.

Although some members of the finance committee seem to question the need for this legislation, the majority of witnesses supported the view that continuing firm control over expenditures is essential to ensure that the deficit is reduced and the public debt declines as a percentage of the economy.

The spending control act will give Canadians the assurance that Parliament shares this view and will demand continuing discipline from the government.

The act breaks new ground by providing an important new mechanism to reinforce and if necessary to enforce the kind of spending restraint that Canadians want.

The allowable limits will be the program spending projections in the February 1991 budget. With limited exceptions, overspending would have to be offset by a program of spending reductions. Neither increased borrowing nor tax increases would be allowed to make up for any excess spending.

If spending limits are exceeded, the Minister of Finance must announce before or in the next budget how the excess would be recovered. A budget that is not consistent with the spending control act could not be presented unless at the same time legislation is presented to amend the act.

Mr. Milliken: Exactly.

Mr. McDermid: I'm glad my friend from Kingston and the Islands agrees with that.

These provisions provide for considerably tighter control of spending than comparable legislation in the United States, either the 1990 Budget Enforcement Act or its predecessor, the Gramm–Rudman–Hollings act. I would like to now discuss our responses to the finance committee's recommendations. I think this is very important.

The committee recommended, for example, that the spending control act should be subject to suspension by a vote of Parliament during a period of economic downturn or recession, or on presentation by the Minister of Finance of a projection of a downturn or recession.

However, the government does not believe that such an amendment is necessary. Under our parliamentary system the proposed act does not and cannot override the supremacy of Parliament.

The spending control act may be amended at any time in whatever circumstances Parliament deems appropriate. I would add that history has taught us that governments cannot spend their way out of recessions. This certainly was the lesson of the early 1980s.

I must say once this act does take force and becomes legislation that any government that would come in and amend this act would have to have some pretty good reasons to do so in presenting it to the Canadian public. It would have to be able to explain very clearly why it would be amending this act.

The way to stimulate economic activity is to maintain tight spending controls. There is no question about that. The message we got from groups and individuals across this country was: "For heaven's sake maintain your spending up there. Maintain that tight control on spending". It will return the fiscal position to a better balance, allow interest rates to decline, and keep present and future tax burdens down.

In any event, the spending control act does not constrain the main economic stabilizer in our economy, the unemployment insurance account.

The committee also recommended that the government establish very strict criteria to define the concept of eligible self–financing programs under the act. We believe the definition of self–financing is well established and full accounting is already provided in the public accounts.

Nonetheless, to provide greater assurance we have decided to specifically limit the number of self–financing programs that will be exempt from the act to the four proposed in the draft legislation. They are the unemployment insurance account; our farm insurance programs; the agriculture commodity stabilization account and the crop reinsurance fund; and the Gross Revenue Insurance Program.

On the other hand, we cannot accept the committee's recommendation that the major transfer of programs to the provinces should similarly be exempt.

Taken together the three major transfer programs, Established Programs Financing, equalization, and the Canada Assistance Plan represent 20 per cent of program spending or $23.1 billion in 1991–92.

To exclude these transfers from the spending control limits would seriously undermine the credibility of the act itself and this we propose not to do.

It might be interesting to know that if we exempted the transfers to the provinces the bill would only cover 65 per cent of program spending when in fact with the provinces it covers 85 per cent of program spending.

In another area the draft bill provided that any overspending in one year could be made up in future years covered by the act.

The committee, however, felt that this was too open–ended and recommended that overspending in any one year be required to be made up in the following year.

While this may be desirable in theory, a one year catch-up rule could be quite disruptive for fiscal planning and operations management.

Instead, we have amended the act to require catching up within two years. This will ensure greater certainty without jeopardizing operational efficiencies and is a fair compromise to the committee's recommendation.

Another recommendation of the committee concerns the role of the Auditor General.

The committee recommended that he should specifically be given responsibility to monitor and report on the government's compliance with the act.

The committee suggested that this was all the more logical since the Auditor General had already been asked to audit and report on the proposed debt servicing and reduction account act.

To ensure consistency with the debt servicing and reduction account act, the government is prepared to clarify the role of the Auditor General in the case of the spending control act.

Accordingly, the revised bill will require that the government report on the act in the Public Accounts of Canada and to ask the Auditor General to report on the government's compliance with it.

Finally, there is the question of what happens after 1995-96 when the spending control act would normally expire.

As I have already indicated all overspending will need to be recovered under a two year catch-up rule. As a result if the government is in violation of the act in 1995-96, the government will have to indicate how this overspending will be recovered over the following two years.

In addition, the draft bill has been changed to require the Minister of Finance in the 1994 budget to recommend whether the act should be extended beyond the 1995-96 fiscal year.

As hon. members will see when they examine Bill C-56, we have also made a number of more technical changes in the draft bill to meet the finance committee's suggestions.

I am confident that the spending control act is a strong step forward that will help to put the Canadian economy back on the path to renewed and sustainable growth.

Mr. Milliken: It is a waste of time.

Mr. McDermid: I hear my friend from Kingston and the Islands saying that it is a waste of time. This is typical Liberal philosophy that controlling spending is a waste of time. That is exactly what the Liberal opposition is saying. That is what the NDP is saying, that it is a waste of time to control spending.

I want the record to show that because our government has done a pretty good job of controlling spending. This will assure that ministers of the government stay within the spending control limits set which are at the 3 per cent level. It is very, very important to get government spending under control.

That is what the Canadian people want. That is what they deserve and that is what they are going to get from this government.

Mr. Mills: They want to work.

Mr. McDermid: I hear my hon. colleague for Broadview—Greenwood saying that they do not want government spending controlled. This government is determined to control its spending. This bill will do it in conjunction with the deficit reduction and the debt removal act that we have in place. I think the hon. member supports that as well.

Living within the limits will require difficult choices among competing spending pressures. There is no question about that.

The ministers will have to make up their minds where the priorities are and they will have to within their responsibilities and within their limited budgets spend more wisely. That is very important.

Spending more on some things will mean spending less on others. Those are decisions that are going to have to be taken. Since coming to office the government has repeatedly faced and made these kinds of choices. It will continue to do so as an essential part of facing up to Canada's fiscal and economic challenges.

I urge that the House support the spending control act, Bill C-56, assure its speedy passage so that we can get on with controlling the spending of the government of Canada which is very important in our fiscal planning.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, one must ask is this really a bill to control government expenditures? Or, is it instead a measure intended to try to convince Canadians that this Conservative government is something it obviously is not and that is a good manager of its own and this country's affairs.

As I said when this measure was first outlined in a discussion paper last July, this proposal is really nothing more than cosmetic. It simply puts into legislative form what the government should be doing anyway. That is working to live within its own budgetary projections.

This is the government that boasted before the current recession began that it was deliberately inducing a slow-down. These were the very words of the Prime Minister. As the Conference Board of Canada confirmed, this government deliberately created our first made-in-Canada recession through high interest rate and high dollar policies.

This government gave us the GST hitting at consumer confidence and consumer spending. In doing so it has deepened and prolonged the recession. This government came into office pledging to reduce the public debt but it actually doubled to $400 billion since 1984 when this government was first elected.

The high interest rate policies of the Bank of Canada that this government supported and agreed with added billions to its own borrowing costs and therefore to this government's expenditures and made its debt and deficit problems worse and not better.

This government's cutbacks of its transfer payments to the provinces really transferred its deficit problems to them and this has been weakening our health, education and social welfare programs, programs essential to the well-being of Canadians and the well-being of the economy.

Now the government is saying it needs legislative authority to keep its spending to the cumulative total outlined in the legislation over the five-year period between fiscal 1991-92 and fiscal year 1995-96.

If the government was effectively running, effectively managing, its own administration, why does it need this legislation? Is it saying the cabinet ministers and their senior officials are not living within the expenditure framework set by the Minister of Finance in his budget? If that is the case, why does the Prime Minister not simply fire them? He obviously has the authority to do so.

We have a parliamentary system with a Prime Minister and cabinet, the government, being in office because it is supported by a majority of the members of the House of Commons. Without that majority no government in a parliamentary system can stay in office. There is not here the separation of the legislative and administrative branches of government with the possibility of conflict between them and the separate spending decisions by the legislative branch we see in the United States, a situation that led to the legislation in that country mentioned by the minister, and similar to what the government is proposing here.

The House of Commons finance committee visited Washington in the course of its study of the government's discussion paper that preceded this bill. The committee's report said, and I invite the House to look at paragraph 32 on page 7:

> Many of the Americans contacted by the committee wondered why it is necessary to impose budgetary controls in a parliamentary system of government. After all, if a government is powerful enough to enact such controls, it should be able to control its own fiscal policy and any future government would not be bound by such controls since the enabling legislation could easily be amended. Such commentators noted that under a congressional system it was opposing and immovable congressional interests which led to budgetary controls in the first place, in particular, it was the conflict between the Congress and the administration which caused the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Act and its successor, the Budget Enforcement Act, to be passed.

The committee report goes on in paragraph 35 to say:

> Budget control legislation is a distinctly American approach to problems arising in a quite unique legislative environment. Just because the American system might meet such controls does not imply that the Canadian parliamentary system would necessarily benefit from the same approach despite the fact that both countries face similar fiscal problems.

By the way, the report was supported, including these quotations, by the Conservative members of the committee, where they have the majority.

When one considers these paragraphs from the committee report, no wonder I say this bill is cosmetic. Under our parliamentary system, this bill could be amended not only by the subsequent government that replaces the current one, it could be amended by this current Conservative government itself.

By the way, a few weeks ago the Minister of Finance admitted he was out $1.5 billion in his projections for the government's deficit for this year alone and said he was freezing all discretionary spending for the balance of this year to March 31 in the amount of some $200 million. He did not say he wished to do this, but he lacked the authority. He said the government was doing it. No public servant and no member of the public affected by this decision will doubt that this discretionary spending is frozen and no legislation was necessary to accomplish this.

If this legislation before the House for second reading is intended by this government to be taken seriously, if it has a serious purpose, then what is behind it? What does the government really have in mind. It could well be an attempt by this discredited Conservative government to try to impose its equally discredited right wing agenda on a subsequent government after the next election.

It is hardly likely the Canadian people will elect this government again after what they have seen of it, especially since the election of 1988. They have seen the effects of the free trade deal, the GST, the government's high interest rate and high dollar policies, its cutbacks in health, education and research and development, its negative impact on the CBC, VIA Rail and Canada Post; the government's unravelling of the very fabric of this country.

This bill is to apply for five years starting in fiscal year 1991–92. This is well after the life of this Parliament, well after when there has to be an election.

Why should a new government elected by the people who, in doing so, reject the policies of this government, have to live within the exact fiscal framework created by this government to carry out its own discredited policies?

This government, in a desperate attempt to try to win back public support, could spend money beyond the limits for each year set out in the bill. The bill says the government has to make up such overspending in one year by cutting back over the following two years.

If this bill is intended to have real impact it would mean a new government, elected as I said by Canadians who have categorically rejected the current one, would be unable to proceed with the programs for which it was elected. It would be unable to move immediately to carry out those priorities. It would have to cut back to make up for the overspending by this government, carried out in an attempt to win back the support of Canadians in a run-up to the election.

Of course a new government could amend the legislation, but if this can be done let me ask again: What is the point of the legislation? What is the point of proposing this bill whose life goes beyond the life of this Parliament? As I have said, it covers a five year period. In presenting it, the government assumes its forecasts of government revenue, as well as its forecasts of the expenditures that would take place under its current programs, would be accurate. It also assumes that its forecasts of the state of the economy, as long as five years hence, would be accurate.

This government has shown a great deal of weakness when it comes to the accuracy of its economic forecasts, as demonstrated by the admission of the Minister of Finance in recent months and weeks how wrong he was about the level of unemployment and how wrong he was about the extent to which the economy would go into recession and the pace and timing of the recovery from that recession and the size of the government's deficit for the current fiscal year. If this government's forecasts are wrong, then the assumptions, the foundations on which the bill is based, will also be wrong and out of kilter and this bill could well harm the future growth and development of our economy.

The finance committee in its report on the proposed bill recognized this in one of its key recommendations. On page 25, the committee said, and I quote:

> The spending control act should be subject to being suspended by vote of Parliament during a period of economic downturn or recession or upon presentation by the Minister of Finance of a projection of such recession or downturn.

Nothing like this appears in the bill before us. In fact, this recommendation has been rejected by the government.

We note there are exclusions from the controls and spending limits set out in the bill. One is the management of the public debt and its expenditure to meet the cost of borrowing. Another involves four self-financingprograms, unemployment insurance and three others with regard to agricultural insurance, with the money being raised by special levies or taxes. Another exclusion refers to expenditures made as a direct result of an emergency.

The legislation does limit the government's ability to budget in a counter-cyclical way to offset through its expenditure and taxation programs the effects both of recession and of an overheated economy. The bill in fact would leave the operation of the unemployment insurance program as the government's chief counter-cyclical tool.

In the report I referred to earlier in my remarks, the committee quotes Professor Douglas Hartle of the University of Toronto as follows in paragraph 75:

> Professor Hartle, on the other hand, while recognizing the need for spending restraint, views the controls program as little more than a public relations exercise. He concludes that the federal government's forecasts for future deficits are contingent upon declining interest rates, more so than program spending controls.

The report goes on to say:

> According to Douglas Hartle, current tight fiscal and monetary policies have had perverse effects on the deficit by pushing up interest rates. This has increased the deficit directly and indirectly by hindering the recovery. Moreover, the proposed legislation does not guarantee lower deficits because such a result depends crucially on lower interest rates. These views are clearly in contrast to that of the federal government which sees fiscal and economic problems stemming mainly from the large federal deficit and debt by controlling that fiscal imbalance. Real interest rates should fall and economic activity expand.

We have seen interest rates falling over the past months, but so far we have seen little or no economic expansion. In fact, in spite of lower interest rates, the government's deficit is likely to increase this year due to lower government revenues and higher expenditures because of the recession this government's policies have helped create.

Another point is that this legislation does not exclude from its coverage, its restraints, its limitations, programs like the old age pension or the family allowance, unlike its American counterpart.

What happens under this bill if the government's forecasts about the amount required for the old age pension is wrong? What happens if more of the population becomes older and lives longer than forecast, creating greater need for expenditures under the Old Age Security program? Is the Conservative government saying in this bill it will cut back on the old age pension even if there are older Canadians who expect and need these payments? If it does not do this, what other programs will it cut back on instead? Air traffic control, inspection to ensure the safety of our food products, or exactly what?

The Leader of the Opposition in recent speeches set out five principles that would guide a future Liberal government. He spoke of restoring Canada's industrial strength, ensuring a fair tax system, creating comprehensive and creative adjustment policies, ensuring balanced economic growth and also being a truly fiscally responsible government.

In referring to figures from the Auditor General that from 1984 to 1991 the federal government mismanaged at least $23 billion, the Leader of the Opposition said a Liberal government, and I quote: "will scrutinize every single line item of spending. We will use it only to do the things which government can and should do".

Liberals are concerned about issues of government expenditure and deficits. However, as I said when I began these remarks, this proposal, this bill before the House, is really nothing more than cosmetic. It simply puts into legislative form what this government should be doing anyway, and that is working to live within its own budgetary projections.

I want to point out to those Canadians concerned about government expenditure and government activities that this bill does nothing to address those concerns, the concerns of Canadians about this government's waste, about this government's excessive taxes. In short, the government is proposing legislation to do what it already has the authority to do. The proposal is simply an attempt by this Conservative government to hoodwink Canadians into thinking that it is finally coming to grips with the negative effects of its own economic incompetence and mismanagement.

It is time for a government that is truly fiscally responsible, one that produces more than cosmetic measures, above all, one that does not slow down and damage the economy through its measures, one that takes into account the desire of Canadians for jobs, the fact that there are 1.5 million Canadians who are out of work. This government ignores these Canadians and the businesses that have shut down and want more than cosmetic measures from this government. They want a government that is concerned with the good management of itself and this country's affairs, one that helps rather than harms their basic existence.

It is time we had a government that, as the Leader of the Opposition put it, promotes growth and does not hold it down.

What about the effects of economic growth in reducing government expenditure for such things as welfare, and at the same time restoring government revenues without higher taxes from businesses whose earnings are restored and by having Canadians go back to work?

Canadians will look beyond the empty words of the minister today in proposing this bill and see the failure of this government to meet its own projections, and the failure of this government to help Canadians live better and more fulfilling lives.

More than this bill, Canadians want an election to give themselves a new and a better government. The best way to get a fiscally responsible government but at the same time a caring and compassionate one is not through this bill. It is to have an election to get rid of this very bad government.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, the bill which stands before us in the name of the Minister of Finance is a piece of proposed legislation which, if it had been properly put together and if the minister had listened to the unanimous report of the Standing Committee on Finance of this House, could have been a useful piece of legislation. It could have been a piece of legislation that in fact would respond to what many people across this country, many who talked to the finance committee during their hearings with respect to this bill, want to see.

Many Canadians across this country want to see a serious effort to deal with the deficit of this country. They want to see a serious effort to do that, and at the same time, to see that the expenditures which government makes and tax policy which government follows come together to provide us with a strategy to rebuild our economy, to re-establish jobs for Canadians, to get people back to work and to get them contributing taxes instead of accepting unemployment insurance. Thereby, they want the government to see to it that we deal with the deficit.

For this bill to have achieved some of the purposes which I have talked about, purposes of controlling the ridiculous level of deficits which both Liberal and Conservative governments have created in our country and, second, to expand the number of jobs for Canadians which exist across this country from the very high unemployment levels which have been reached in this Conservative recession and the very high levels which were reached in the Liberal recession in the early 1980s, it would have been necessary for this government to listen, to listen first to the very finance committee of this House to which this bill was referred. Second, it would have been necessary for this government to listen to the many Canadians who testified before that finance committee.

I could take you, Mr. Speaker, and I could take people listening to this debate through many of the pieces of testimony which we heard in the finance committee. We heard, for instance, from the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. It said to us: "Small business owners and Canadians generally have lost confidence in the government's ability to manage its own affairs, let alone manage the country".

The Canadian Federation of Independent Business said: "As a first step in establishing some measure of credibility on the fiscal front, the government must impose upon itself a binding mechanism to ensure adherence to a sound expenditure control and deficit reduction plan".

I could quote from the Vancouver Board of Trade which spoke to us. Again, it stressed that even this small reduction in the deficit could be defeated if the assumptions of economic growth and interest rates turn out to be optimistic. "We think", said the Vancouver Board of Trade, "the assumptions err on the optimistic side".

I could take you through the testimony of the Business Council on National Issues, the Chamber of Commerce, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. Business group after business group said: "The issue is dealing with the deficit". Yet, what do we have in front of us? We have a piece of legislation which does not, despite what I am sure you will hear from members on the government side, deal with the deficit.

The finance committee of this House of Commons unanimously—that is all parties, including the Conservatives, the Liberals, the New Democrats—said it is important to get a handle on the deficit. They said further that the only thing which will make it possible is if there is control of tax expenditures.

There are many ways to spend money. You can spend money that goes out in the form of cheques to various people across the country. You can spend money that goes out in the form of grants to various companies throughout this country. You can spend money, and this is crucial, by making a deliberate decision to reduce taxes for a specific purpose or for a specific group within the economy.

If you are concerned about the deficit, when you make a decision to reduce taxes you have to do something else to offset that decision. You either have to reduce expenditures, not just limit the increase in expenditures, in order to make up for that giveaway of taxes which you provided or else, if you are going to, for instance, give a $100,000 tax exemption for capital gains to the wealthiest people in this country, if you are going to give that kind of tax loophole as this government has done, you have to make a decision that you will raise taxes in other areas, that the tax decrease you give to the very wealthy will be made up for by a tax increase in other parts of the economy. That is what has to be done if you are serious about reducing the deficit.

That is precisely the point. I quote here from the unanimous report of the finance committee with respect to this legislation: "Any legislated reduction in total tax revenue which causes the federal government's fiscal targets not to be met", in other words a tax decrease, "must be accompanied by measures offsetting this decrease through other forms of revenue increase or expenditure reduction".

That is the very heart of the recommendations which the minister praised in his speech as coming from the finance committee of this House of Commons. Yet that is the crucial recommendation which has been ignored in this bill. That is why this bill is a total sham. It does absolutely nothing to guarantee to Canadians that there is some kind of legislated plan to reduce the deficit in this country.

The Minister of Finance can come in on budget day, which we hope is coming soon, and say to the people of Canada: "I plan to reduce taxes for upper income earners in this country. I plan to reduce the level of taxation for the highest income earners by getting rid of the 10 per cent income surcharge on those making over $60,000 a year in taxable income". There is absolutely nothing in this piece of legislation which will stop that from happening. The result will be a significant increase in the deficit of this country.

You may say: "How could the government be so foolish? How could it be so stupid as not to listen to the unanimous report of its own finance committee?" I remind you that the finance committee report was unanimous. The majority on that committee is made up of Conservatives, people who actually do want to see the deficit reduced, but the government did not listen to them. You have to ask yourself why. Was it foolishness? Was it stupidity? I think not. I do not think this government is serious about reducing the deficit. This government simply wants to go through the motions. It wants to persuade Canadians, through some kind of cosmetic gesture, that it is doing something about the deficit when in fact all it is doing is burying the reality of waste, of deficits, of inefficiency in government which we have had for seven and a half years of Conservatives and before that for four and a half years of Liberals.

It is a process of waste, a process of inefficiency in government which has created a deficit of $420 billion that has been accumulated in our national debt. Out of every dollar that every Canadian contributes in taxes, 35 cents has to go to pay off the waste, extravagance and failure to deal with the deficit that is there on the part of this Conservative government for the last seven and a half years and the Liberal government before it for the previous four and a half years.

The only governments in this country that are taking seriously the need to control our expenditures and to meet social objectives to put people back to work, to therefore choose priorities, to stop wasting money, to stop the extravagance in government, are the New Democrat governments at provincial and territorial levels throughout this country.

In Saskatchewan, British Columbia, Ontario and the Yukon Territory, we have governments which have made hard choices, which have said: "We cannot do everything, but what we will do will not be to the benefit of the rich, to the benefit of powerful corporations, but instead to the benefit of people who really need a tax break, to working people, to people with middle incomes who have been hammered so hard by this government and by the government before".

Just today figures have been released which indicate what has happened to the tax burden of people in 17 metropolitan areas across Canada which cover about 80 per cent of the population of Canada. If we go back to 1986, they paid just over 19 per cent of their incomes in taxes. Now they pay over 22 per cent of their incomes in taxes. That burden is not fair, it is not just, it has got to be dealt with. It is not being dealt with through this bogus piece of legislation. This bogus piece of legislation does not make the connection between expenditure control and reductions in the deficit. There is no connection between controlling expenditure and controlling a deficit.

Why? Because this government has rejected the unanimous report of the Standing Committee on Finance of this House. The only reason that we have to understand that rejection is that this government does not really want to deal with the extravagance and waste which it has created over the past seven and a half years of governing this country.

This bill has got to be beaten. This bill has got to be defeated. I hope Conservatives who are serious on the backbenches about deficit reduction in this country will stand up and defeat this legislation because it is a sham, a mockery that does not do what it sets out purportedly to do.

I urge this House to defeat this legislation because it is a cruel trick on Canadians across this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): I think it is really too bad that the hon. member for the New Democratic Party should be so anxious to sing the praises of the NDP government in Ontario and brag about its achievements because so far the results have not been outstanding. I think his comments are particularly unfortunate because they reflect his usual criticism of government legislation. He criticizes every single fiscal measure this government tables and has done so for seven and a half years.

The hon. member and his party have no positive contribution to make to this debate. They are always ready to criticize, but we have yet to hear any suggestion for dealing with the real problems facing this country.

When considering this bill, an act respecting the control of government expenditures, a bill that is absolutely relevant to the current situation in this country, we should remember that this measure was announced in the 1991 budget. There was thunderous applause in the riding of Trois-Rivières and there was a wholly positive response when we announced mandatory legislated spending limits for the next five years. My constituents were delighted and told me: You are doing an excellent job of running the country's finances. We have an enormous debt we inherited from the Liberal government, and you are steering the right course to ensure we get rid of this debt.

This morning I heard my NDP colleague criticize the bill. I think we should look at the facts. Between 1970 and 1984, program spending increased by an average of 13.8 per cent annually. In other words, we had an annual increase of 13.8 per cent in program spending. From 1985 to 1992, the average annual increase was 3.7 per cent. This means that since 1984, this government has acted responsibly and run this country the way it ought to be run, with an annual reduction in program spending of 10 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure that you and I would have preferred to give more to Canadians. However, we have a job to do. We have responsibilities, which include managing the finances of this country and stopping the endless handouts that were typical of the Liberal government, which had programs to paint fences, shovel snow and wash windows. There were programs for just about anything. They did not create permanent jobs. All they did was spend, spend, spend.

In 1984, their legacy to us was a tremendous deficit of $39 billion and a national debt of $200 billion. That was their legacy, in 1984. That is what we got. I see this woke them up on the other side. They are upset. Never mind, it will do them good.

In 1984, the annual operating deficit—this does not include the interest on the debt—was $16 billion, which means that annually the Liberal government spent $16 billion more than it received in revenue. Show me a family or business in this country that would spend $16 billion more than it earns. We cut spending and yes, we raised income tax and other taxes.

No one will deny we raised taxes. But in what proportion? That is what matters. The proportion is 70 per cent cuts in government spending to 30 per cent increases in income tax and other taxes. Thanks to this medicine, which was not the most palatable and still isn't in 1992, the Treasury receives $12 billion more than the government spends every year, always excluding interest charges.

It means that this government managed a $29 billion turnaround within seven years. Twenty-nine billion dollars in terms of expenditures means that tomorrow morning we can forget about the national debt. It has disappeared. We have a balanced budget and no more deficit. We have money in the bank. But we still have a deficit, because we have to pay interest on a debt that neither you nor I created, Mr. Speaker, a debt that the party opposite ran up when it was in power.

Figure it any way you want, the Canadian government's annual deficit since 1985 is equal to the amount of interest payable on the $200 billion we inherited. Let an accountant figure it out. Whether they are CA, CMA, RIA or CGA, they will all get the same answer.

Our annual deficit now is due to the interest on a debt we inherited. We are meeting our responsibilities. One thing we are doing to meet our responsibilities is a bill that will limit spending and would require a minister who wants to exceed his allowed budget to present a bill amending the legislation that we will enact.

I think that requiring a minister to introduce a bill if he wants to change his department's operating budget is the best safety device we Canadians can have for the financial future of this country.

People often say that the government spends too much: too much on salaries, too much on rent, too much on travel, too much on this and that. Unfortunately, that is a perception. Since 1984, the costs of government have risen only 1.2 per cent, which in real terms is a drop of about 20 per cent.

We often hear comments about what Canadians think, that the government spends too much, and too often in the wrong places. The amounts can at times seem enormous, some things that are done may seem inane, but let us take any company in any field of activity and look at its balance sheet, its financial statements. I am sure that all Canadian businesses and all Canadian families are at least 1 per cent off their budget. One per cent of the money that the company or the family spent was spent unintentionally. They did not catch it in time. One per cent is not a lot. I am sure we could find examples everywhere, in families and businesses throughout Canada.

I tell these people to allow the federal government which is now in charge the same 1 per cent. One per cent of a $140-billion budget is $1.4 billion. As an administrator, I am ready to accept blame for $1.4 billion or 1 per cent of what is spent, which should not have been spent or should have been spent differently. Throughout the federal government, with all that it does, I can accept blame for this 1 per cent, although I think that if we who run the country wanted to eliminate this 1 per cent overspending, it would cost more than would be saved. Members of Parliament—not only Conservatives but members of all parties—would have to work 24 hours a day, seven days a week, just to check every expenditure of the federal government in 40 departments.

I think that we have to swallow the pill and live with it. But we must also consider the positive things that have been done since 1984. Cuts have been made and that hurt. Taxes have increased and that hurt. As a country, as members of the Conservative Party, as administrators, we have no choice but to run the government's finances so as to balance the budget in terms of income and outgo, and that is what we have done. It is now in place.

We must also repay the huge debt that was left to us and on which interest is accumulating every day faster than we are paying it off. That too is our responsibility.

The bill before us must be seen in the global perspective of the financial responsibilities taken on by the Minister of Finance and by this government over the past seven years. That is what this bill is all about. I am convinced that opposition members will rise today and say that we should have spent more here, that we spent unwisely there. But judgment has to be exercised in dealing with reality here.

I am always prepared to discuss fully with my friends opposite the appropriateness of any government expenditure. But I am not prepared to discuss with them when they stand up every two minutes or so to ask for more money. They are asking for more money in every area of activity under the sun. They take a shot at everything they can without ever suggesting where the money should come from. Asking is easy—as Our Lord said: "Ask and you shall receive"—but this is Parliament, not the church. In that sense, I have nothing against the Opposition asking for money, but would they be so kind as to tell me at the same time where to find that money. In the taxpayers' pockets? Or should we cut a program and replace it? Where are we going to take the money they ask for?

That is the question I would like members opposite to ask themselves today before they rise in this House to speak against this bill—

An hon. member: There is no substance in this bill.

Mr. Vincent: I see that they are waking up. At least we managed to wake them up a bit.

Before they start criticizing this bill, they should ponder on this because it is important. Members can be partisan, and I generally do my share at that, but this bill we are considering this morning represents an important part of what this party and this Parliament want for our country tomorrow morning and the next day as well as five and ten years down the road. That is what we should bear in mind as we debate this bill, how it should be seen.

Can we afford to keep running this country on a full credit card, charging maximum interest rates when we can have another credit card? That is where we are at. That is the question we must ask ourselves when dealing with government finance in Canada in 1992: what can we afford to do to help the people of Canada while ensuring that our country will be in reasonably good financial health in the future? That is the question we must ask ourselves for very dollar that we spend.

In closing, I will raise a last point. In 1984, government operating costs represented 19.3 per cent of the total budget, compared to 16.6 per cent today. That is a 3 per cent reduction of operating costs over total government spending in 7 years. This means sound management in this House as well as in the government backrooms. It is important to emphasize this point because it shows that we have accomplished what we said we would do in 1984 and in 1988. It is important to emphasize this point because, as we are talking, Canadians need good news. They do not need a constantly pessimistic message like the one we hear from the opposition. Canadians need to see the light at the end of the tunnel. They need to see that their government takes action, that it makes decisions that are not necessarily popular, but that it knows what must be done for the country. Canadians definitely do not need to hear time after time, day after day, week after week, the members of the opposition talk about doom and gloom without ever giving a ray of hope as regards the economic and financial reality of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, you just informed me that my time is up. I hope that my colleagues will understand the underlying message of this bill, that they will support this legislation, that they will start to be positive and that they will bring to this House elements of solution and positive suggestions, instead of criticizing like they have now for seven years.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the parliamentary secretary. He talked with great pride about the ability of his government to reduce the deficit and to face inherent problems. The member said that the time had come to seize the opportunity. If the government has that ability—and I remind him that his government promised seven years ago to eliminate the deficit—why has his government postponed its attempts for so long? Even if those attempts were unsuccessful, why has the government waited so long after the promise it made during the 1984 election campaign?

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, I emphasized during my speech that this should not be a partisan debate. The question raised by my colleague is somewhat partisan. I will tell him again what I said earlier.

I said that when we were elected in 1984, the national debt stood at $200 billion. I said that if the member would look at the annual deficit under the Conservative government since 1984, the annual deficit for each year, and if the member would also look at the amount of interest to be paid on the debt that my hon. colleague created, since he was a member of the cabinet before 1984, if he would look at the interests on that debt, he would realize that, give or take $10 billion over an amount of $200 billion, which represents 5 per cent, it is exactly the same thing. This means that we have trouble paying the interest on the debt that we inherited. This is no secret; it is true and it is public knowledge. Yes, it is hard for us.

If we had not taken control of the affairs of the state and if we had not made all these cuts within the government and through tax increases, you can imagine what the debt would be right now. We would not even be able to write it on an 8 1/2 x 11 sheet, because there would be too many zeros. This is what I mean when I talk about sound management and finance control. Indeed, there is still a lot to be done, but a lot has also been done compared to what went on before 1984.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have two questions for the parliamentary secretary.

My first one is this: If it was such a good idea to table this bill, why didn't the government do this during the first year it was in power? Why wait until now?

My second question: The draft bill tabled before the finance committee contained a proposal for a 3 per cent annual increase in government spending. The government has changed the figures and proposes an annual increase of more than 3 per cent for every year covered by this bill. Why did the government raise these figures? Because it is unable to control spending? Why did the government do this?

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's first question was why the government did not table this bill in the first year after it was elected. I would like to point out to the hon. member that we live in a country and a society that are developing very fast. Every day legislation is amended and new legislation is tabled before the House.

It is that philosophy that is also reflected in the budget. It is a philosophy that relates to the economic, financial and fiscal aspects of our country. The hon. member seems to be saying the bill is a good one. If it is so good, what difference does it make when he votes for it, as long as he does? I have no problem with that. Let him admit that this government drafts legislation that is good for the country, not because it is good for the Progressive Conservative Party or the Liberal Party or the NDP, because that is not the purpose of our debate this morning. This is not an issue that should be dealt with in a partisan manner. This is a matter of substance that should be addressed with arguments on substance, not petty partisan arguments.

His second question concerned the 3 per cent increase in expenditures. I may point out to the hon. member that there are 48 different ways to calculate government spending. What the bill proposes is different from what was provided in the draft bill, but conversely, the various expenditures included in the draft bill have been removed. We cannot compare apples and oranges, because it just will not work. That is more or less what the hon. member's question amounts to. He asked me to compare two things that are not quite the same. Since a number of spending categories were added later on, they cannot be calculated the same way.

I think the hon. member, who is usually quite brilliant, will understand this position.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make a very short comment. I know the member would want to make sure that Canadians had a full understanding of the government's actions during the period of 1984 to 1992.

This deathbed conversion to expenditure control is really not going to wash. He failed in his address to mention that from 1984 until today the Conservative government has hit the people of Canada with over 32 tax increases, which amounted to just under $60 billion in additional revenue that the government had at its disposal. From 1985 to 1987 on the unemployment insurance draw there was close to $40 billion less than what we had from 1980 to 1984 because we were experiencing a recession. The member talked about having to service the debt. They had close to an extra $80 million to $90 billion of added funds that they could have used at their discretion.

I do not think the member can talk about having to service the debt they were left with without talking about the fact that they also took in an extra $80 billion in added revenue.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, I just want to tell my colleague that he is wrong in saying that I did not inform the public properly. I said very clearly just now that 70 per cent of the $29-billion difference between 1984 and 1992 was due to less government spending and that 30 per cent was from higher taxes. I said so clearly and I want to say it again to the hon. member. I did not try to say that we did not raise taxes. I said that we did, and I did not say that anyone liked it. I pointed out that 30 per cent of everything that the government had done came from tax increases and that 70 per cent was due to government spending cuts.

[English]

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I have just a few comments concerning this bill. The parliamentary secretary and the minister used the same words when they said: "Tell us where to find the money". "Tell me", he said, "where to find the money".

The ordinary person must think the Government of Canada has loads of money. After all, it just gave hundreds of millions of dollars to an oil company to get out of the Hibernia project. It was disclosed that the Government Canada was able to guarantee hundreds of millions of dollars for another oil company to develop an oilfield in Burma.

There are methods of granting large sums of money to people who do not really need it, especially if they are going to develop an oilfield in Siberia as is the case with Gulf Oil. It decided the other day to pull out of its commitment to an oilfield in Canada and to spend some money in Siberia. It was disclosed that it was receiving back every penny it spent in Siberia. It was also disclosed that Petro-Canada would be getting back every penny of what it spent in an oil development in Burma.

Ordinary Canadians look at that and say that the Government of Canada must have loads and loads of money. That money is granted through a mechanism in the all-party committee report to which the hon. member for Windsor West and an NDP member referred in their remarks. It is called tax expenditures. The concept of tax expenditures was introduced back in 1967 by the assistant secretary of tax policy for the United States. He said at that time that if somebody was given a $100 tax break, it was the same as giving the person a $100 cheque. That is okay, but it depends on whom the money is being given to.

The minister of energy stood in the House the other day when I asked him a question about why the Government of Canada would be giving every penny back to Gulf Canada, to be deducted from the income tax it owed in Canada for its development in Siberia. The minister of energy said: "Yes, that is true, 100 per cent".

Then he made a remark outside the House which was quoted in the press, saying that the company had taken advantage of other tax expenditures in the past. He made reference in the House to the Little Egypt Bump, which only tax experts, tax lawyers or tax accountants would know the meaning of.

Mr. Mills: And very few of them, too.

Mr. Baker: As the member for Broadview—Greenwood just mentioned, very few of them.

An hon. member: Oh.

Mr. Baker: An hon. member of the NDP just made a remark. He obviously does not realize that the law permitting Gulf Canada and Petro-Canada to deduct every penny from their income tax was amended in 1985 and 1988.

For your own edification, Mr. Speaker, the Little Egypt Bump takes its name from a belly-dancer, as I understand it, from Cairo who made quite a splash in Chicago at the turn of the century. Her name was Little Egypt and somehow the experts, this closed, tightly knit fraternity of people who make judgments, said: "Let's call this tax break the Little Egypt Bump because only the bare essentials of the transaction are exposed to the Department of National Revenue".

It was also called the Oldsmobile transaction. The reason why they called it the Oldsmobile transaction was that at that time General Motors put out an Oldsmobile 88 and an Oldsmobile 98. Those were the two sections of the Income Tax Act that were used to accomplish this tax break which enabled the company to inflate the value of a property which was then sold to a partnership—this is in its simplest form—and, as the law is written, you cannot then retrieve your tax from the partnership.

Where I disagree with the NDP in every reference its members make to that is that they blame the company. They blame, as did the hon. member who spoke a few moments ago, those rich companies. It is not the companies' fault.

An hon. member: I did not blame anybody.

Mr. Baker: I am speaking about the hon. member from the NDP who was here a few moments ago and delivered an address on the subject of tax expenditures.

It is not the companies' fault. It is not the fault of the Reichmanns that that break was there. Why, if Paul Reichmann did not take advantage of it, if he did not go to the Government of Canada and say "look, I want it in writing before I do it", if he did not do that, if he did not take advantage of what the law was that we passed here in this Chamber, why, he would not be very smart.

It is not his fault or the fault of his two brothers. The minister even brought up the transaction outside the House. It is the fault of the government in power. Come to think of it, it was not only Gulf. It was also Petrofina. It was also Syncrude. There was one other instance where that tax break was used.

To be able to take your money out of a company in Canada, an oil development, and to spend it in another nation, in another country and deduct every penny of your expenditure in that foreign nation over a 10 year period, and if you make any profits over there you can deduct it even faster, is not acceptable in this day and age in Canada. The U.S. does not have such a system.

We are left with an oil development. Yes, it will survive and it will go ahead, I am sure, in Hibernia. The minister and the parliamentary secretary a few moments ago said: "Tell us where to find the money". There appears to be loads of money available for the Government of Canada to pay out billions and billions and billions of dollars.

When you look at the documents of taxation analysing the returns of individuals for the 1989 taxation year and miscellaneous statistics, the most recent one, you are struck by a couple of things. The numbers of people making over a quarter of a million dollars a year paying no income tax at all has gone up.

The hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood advocates a flat tax.

An hon. member: A single tax.

Mr. Baker: A single tax. I am sorry, there is quite a difference. Those are the figures that he looks at. When you examine it even closer you see that certain people in the six figure bracket are claiming the child tax credit, the federal sales tax credit and now the GST rebate. When you look at at the rules and regulations for those, and I will put it on the record, it says that it will be paid to families with low and modest incomes. The application is made out by those with low and modest incomes.

The hon. parliamentary secretary and the minister ask: "Where are we going to get the money?" Through our taxation system we have allowed those types of breaks to take place, to have someone with a reported total income of $250,000 a year paying not one penny of income tax. It is there on the record.

That is not a complete story. You can have people making $30,000 a year in the statistics of income and they can actually make a half a million.

The hon. member asks where can he get the money. In December they changed the whole system. The hon. member a few moments ago talked about the capital gains tax that was brought into this country back in 1971, the capital gains tax of 50 per cent of normal taxation that was imposed after the termination of the estate tax.

The hon. member from the NDP was complaining about it. What he should have been complaining about was what the Government of Canada did. It did not affect small businessmen, the ordinary businessmen in Canada. We met with the Federation of Independent Business just yesterday. One of the gentlemen there gave a very thorough presentation on behalf of small business. He made this statement: "Well, you know, our small businessmen want to be able to make the deduction as it relates to inheritance".

What the hon. member for the NDP and the government were forgetting, what we raised questions about, was what the Government of Canada did in this House in December. It totally removed the 21-year rule. As you know, Mr. Speaker, when the capital gains tax was brought in in 1971, the loopholes had to be closed. You would normally pay your capital gains upon your death, but a trust does not die. We had the 21-year rule. At the end of the 21 years all capital gains owing from assets would become payable. Twenty-one plus 72 is 93. In 1993 all of those deferred taxes, if you want to call them that, would come due.

The Government of Canada in December changed the law. It claimed it was closing a loophole. I read its material. It certainly was not closing a loophole. It said: "We are going to put it off for another two generations". It has changed the law so that the deferred taxes for the past 21 years will now be paid with the death of the youngest member of the family. The government then turns around and says: "Tell us where to find the money". I am referring to people with vast fortunes, people who have incredible amounts of money, not your ordinary everyday millionaire. These are people who have tens of millions, hundreds of millions of dollars, who can tuck away millions and millions without even bothering with it because they would like to maintain control of it forever.

The government in this House changed the law in December, affecting what somebody can claim as entertainment. Talk about tax expenditures.

When you close a loophole, you should make sure you are closing it, that you are not opening it up for all kinds of things that should not be there. When a tax accountant or a tax lawyer sits down, some of the brightest minds we have in this country, their job is to try to see how they can save money for the person paying the bill. They are some of the brightest minds in Canada. They are good at it. The Government of Canada was asked: "How far can we go in claiming entertainment? We know that we can claim 80 per cent of the cost of a private box in the Montreal Stadium or at the ballpark in Toronto, the Skydome, $50,000 or $70,000, those nice cosy rooms that have these big mirrors that go up—"

An hon. member: That's a cheap one.

Mr. Baker: That's a cheap one? And there is service brought in, and so on. The hon. member says that is a cheap one. Well, it is paid for by the taxpayers of Canada. How about having a private box for those people on welfare? How about having a private box for people on unemployment insurance? What about it? They would love to have a cosy box with a mobile telephone when watching the baseball game. It is taxpayers' money. Then there are the very expensive meals, some of our best restaurants, compliments of the taxpayers of Canada, 80 per cent of it. There are other things that are claimed which are not as legitimate. The government changed the law last December. It told the accountants and tax lawyers two years ago: "We are going to change the law so that you will not have to ask us any more how far you can go. You could claim yachts back in 1977, but we closed that loophole".

You tell me I have got two minutes, so I had better get to what the government did in December. As the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood knows, the government changed section 67(5) of the act. It said that as long as something did not contravene the Criminal Code of Canada and as long as it was not listed as an exclusion in the act, it was permissible.

That makes all kinds of things legal. That has led to stories and interviews about masseuse services and escort services that are not against the Criminal Code and that are being claimed as a legitimate expense, compliments of the taxpayers of Canada. And the minister turned around a minute ago and said: "Tell me where to find the money". The parliamentary secretary stood up and said: "Tell me where to find the money".

The money should not be found on the backs of the poor of this country or on the backs of the ordinary persons in Canada. The money can be found because it is being wasted today in grants by the Government of Canada, disguised as tax expenditures. The minister says: "Tell me where to find the money". Billions and billions and billions and billions of dollars. The government should be thoroughly ashamed of itself.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): I have two questions I want to ask the hon. member. I made reference to the Little Egypt Bump. I might say to the hon. member that that is the first time I have heard it explained so clearly. He obviously has a lot of experience in this field.

I am not making an apology for this government because you just cannot make an apology for the way it has run the economy. I remember when I was energy critic of my party, the NDP, getting in evidence that the Liberal government of the day spent $13 billion, and these were dollars in the early 1980s, on petroleum incentive program grants, PIP grants, to oil companies. I personally think this is one of the reasons why we have a huge deficit today. Is it not in fact the Liberal government, which ran Canada most of my lifetime, that is really responsible for the big debt that we have federally in this country? Is it really not a hangover from mismanagement by Liberal governments? Did those same Liberal governments not really fashion the modern tax law with all those loopholes, including the research grant scandal, research write-offs, the Little Egypt Bump and those kinds of provisions of our tax law?

Further to that, he will recall these Liberal civil servants, people like Mickey Cohen, who fashioned the National Energy Program and who were wheeling and dealing with Petro-Canada when they took over Petro Fina and never really revealed, in spite of the Auditor General trying to get that information, what went on. These people just moved right out into the private sector, work for the Reichmanns and then take advantage of some of their own laws that they made when they worked for the Liberal government, ripping off the taxpayers in that way.

The taxpayer gets screwed, it seems to me, by the laws of the former Liberal government and some of the people who were involved with them, who, as soon as they go into the private sector, rip off the ordinary Canadian who must pay taxes.

Mr. Baker: Here the hon. member goes again, the NDP. He said: "They made their own laws. Mickey Cohen made the law," he said.

It was not Mickey Cohen who made the law, it was the government that made that decision. It was the cabinet that made that decision.

Granted the hon. member can say: "Well, he was the deputy minister at the time". He was the hired help. He was the one who had them pass judgment on the recommendations set up by the department. That is true. The hon. member is correct. But Mickey Cohen did not make the law. That recommendation concerning, as he put it, the Reichmann empire at the time was made by the Government of Canada, this Government of Canada right here.

The hon. member said: "The Liberals are at fault. They are the ones that drove up the deficit through PIP grants". The PIP grants were for oil development in Canada—in Canada.

What did the Tories do when they got in? They wiped out the PIP grants and the hon. member from the NDP was in agreement with it. They wiped them out for oil development in Canada and they propped up oil development in foreign nations.

An hon. member: Our security of supply.

Mr. Baker: The hon. member here will not criticize the Government of Canada encouraging expenditures in Siberia or Burma by Petro-Canada and the total tax write-off.

If the hon. member went back and really looked at the tax law that he referred to, far down on the corporate tax return it says "foreign exploration and development, oil and gas". A company is allowed to deduct 10 per cent a year until its total funds that it spent are recovered.

Well, I tell the hon. member that there were two amendments made to that provision in the Income Tax Act. They were made by this Government of Canada solidifying and enforcing a 100 per cent write-off for oil developments in foreign countries, while they turned around on the advice of the NDP and cut off the grants for oil companies exploring and developing oil in Canada. That is the truth of the matter.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have an opportunity to speak on this Bill C-56, the control of government expenditures.

As many members have said previously and also as our finance critic, the hon. member for Windsor West has stated so clearly, this bill is cosmetic. It is smoke and mirrors.

Do we really need a bill to send a signal to various parts of the Government of Canada that we want to control expenditures? This bill shows Canadians once again that this government does not have a legislative agenda.

When there are so many unemployed people in this nation and the government puts forward a piece of legislation that is nothing more than smoke and mirrors, then we know that its creative process has really dwindled to a state where I am sure most Canadians would find it frightening.

We should be debating in this House today ways in which we can put people back to work.

• (1210)

The government repeatedly asks us where are the ideas from this side of the House?

The hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls, whom we just listened to, has hit the nail on the head.

The people of this country are fed up with the tax designs that exist in this country. They are absolutely frustrated with the fact that politicians at all levels of government are not listening to the level of frustration that they feel toward the tax designs, especially the personal and corporate designs.

The member for Gander—Grand Falls has just given a beautiful illustration how the tax preferences, given through the tax act, really show that the basic tax act of this country is unfair.

This is so important in relation to job creation that we had better do something about it quickly. If we are going to be a competitive nation, if we are going to create more jobs in this country, if we are going to expand this economy—and that is the only way we are going to create the jobs—then we are going to have to create better products and better services at more competitive prices.

This government possesses one instrument that can effect a change in the productivity of this country. It is the tax act. Right now, the average men and women of this country feel the tax act is treating them unfairly. We know it is treating them unfairly. They want us to address this problem with a sense of urgency.

We are very close to a tax revolt in this country. We have situations in the municipalities of this country where people cannot pay their municipal taxes and municipalities are frightened. What are they going to do? They do not have the revenue. Do they want to take businesses out of business and create more unemployment?

The Government of Canada is not listening to the fact that the tax designs that exist in this country are not working. This is why we have a problem in terms of productivity.

If people are to produce a better product at a better price, they have to be treated fairly and this can begin with the tax designs. Bring fairness back into the tax system. Bring simplicity back into the system.

Last year, 80 per cent of the returns that were filed in this country were filled with errors. Consider the inefficiency that exists in the tax system of this country.

We have a situation right now, and the member for Gander—Grand Falls referred to it in his speech, where rules and regulations, and exceptions, and exceptions to exceptions right now are causing disunity in the country. It is wreaking havoc with the entrepreneurial spirit in this country and that is the spirit that we as a nation depend on to create the jobs.

What are we doing to that spirit? We are ignoring it.

When we have a crisis like this on our hands, we cannot ignore the voice of the entrepreneurial spirit in this country. It is saying: "Fix the tax act. On the personal side, fix it; on the corporate side, simplify it, clean it up, bring us some fairness".

If we did that we would have a motivated work force in this country which would create a better quality product at a better price, which ultimately expands the GNP of this country.

More people would be employed which would mean less draw on the unemployment insurance fund and less draw on the welfare fund.

When interest is calculated on $30 billion worth of disbursements just on UI and welfare, in 18 months we would not have a deficit.

The focus of this government is all wrong. It has a one-track mind. It has absolutely no creativity and it is cut, cut, cut. Now it comes in with this deathbed conversion bill, control on expenditures.

We know that there is waste in this government. There is waste in every institution in this country. There is waste in every family.

We do not need a bill to legislate expenditure control, especially a bill like this that has so many loopholes in it that if all of a sudden something comes along, an economic downturn or whatever, we ignore the bill anyway. What kind of hypocrisy is that?

This is the nation's boardroom. People in Canada are counting on us to put our energy and creativity into ways and means of putting people back to work.

One way to do that is to listen to the small businessmen of this country. As the Minister of State for Finance said yesterday, there are 1,700,000 businesses in this country. If we can mobilize and motivate that force, then we can eradicate unemployment in this country almost overnight.

The one issue that small business, the entrepreneurship of this country, keeps coming back to us on is tax reform. If we were to address that issue, then so many other things would fall into place.

The member for Gander—Grand Falls gave a beautiful example today when he talked about a legal tax preference written into the tax act of Canada which actually encourages a company to invest close to $1 billion offshore.

If we reform the tax act of this country, we could have those capital flows reversing the other way. If we reform the tax structure of this nation, we could have the capital flows, the investment coming this way.

The foreign investment in this country in the last 18 months is down close to 50 per cent.

There are many reasons for that. Many of those foreign investors will cite our tax designs as being one of the reasons they are frustrated or why they do not have that extra energy, that extra burst of enthusiasm to try and invest in this country.

If we were to change the tax act and get the capital investment flows back into this country, that would allow and create a situation again where the entrepreneurs would have the capital to buy new equipment and new technology. This would allow us to be even more efficient. All of that can be done through the tax act.

What have we done? The core problem, the fundamental problem, the problem that we hear of when we go door to door and store to store in our communities, and it does not matter what region of the country, it is every region where people tell us is that the tax designs are not working. What do we do instead of listening? We throw the GST at them, a paper burden, a disincentive to productivity, a disincentive to tourism. It is unbelievable.

I cannot believe the rumour I hear right now. Some groups are saying that we should cut the GST by 1 per cent and that will make things better. Cutting the GST by 1 per cent would be an insult to most Canadians. They want the GST scrapped. It must be scrapped. We must come up with an alternative.

My leader has said repeatedly that it will be scrapped. Make no mistake about that, and the press should not make any mistake about that. We are scrapping that GST, if it is the only thing we do. It is affecting the spirit and it is affecting the productive capacity of this country in every region.

Yes, it will be tough to reform the tax act of this country. That is the kind of legislative agenda that we should be taking on in this House rather than, as my colleague the critic for finance stated earlier, some piece of legislation that is only cosmetic.

I believe the people of Canada see through that smoke and mirrors, that cosmetic approach. They are not going to buy it. The time is now, because the situation is so desperate, that we do something about this issue. The government should reflect at the end of today's debate on this bill respecting control of government expenditure and realize that the nation does not want to hear about some little gimmick for controlling expenditures that has all kinds of loopholes and options for change whenever the government needs them.

This is the nation's legislature. Many people on that side of the House think that the cabinet runs this country. It is not the cabinet. This is the debating room on issues of concern to the people of Canada. It is not the cabinet. They can go back to their cabinet, take their decisions and be responsible for them. People are talking about unemployment, tax designs, and some of the desperate situations like that faced by the fishery in Atlantic Canada right now. They want them debated in this room, and not in the middle of the night. If it has to be the middle of the night, fine, but they want them put on the floor of the nation's boardroom. Today we have some little silly piece of legislation on expenditure control. There is absolutely no logic. It shows once again that the creative juices of this government have lapsed.

I support my colleague, the member from Windsor, our finance critic who said: "Let's go to the people and let them decide whether or not this government has the best policies for the people of Canada". The government keeps bragging about this fiscal comprehensive plan that is dismantling everything in this country. Let the people decide whether or not this program, this crazy journey that it brags about and has taken us on, is the right way to go. I support the approach of the member.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to rise to speak on this piece of legislation. This bill is entitled an act respecting the control of government expenditures. It is in the same vein and the same tone as voodoo financing that we have become accustomed to in British Columbia with the whole question of BS funds, budget stabilization funds, where moneys were moved back and forth on paper. They have now found out that they are not even in existence. It is based on the whole concept of what the government has said: "We are out of control. We have no ability to control our own expenditures. We are undisciplined. We are irrational and therefore we have a legislative framework that forces us to be disciplined, to be rational and to follow fiscal restraint".

When I was first out of university I worked in juvenile corrections, including juvenile courts and juvenile detention centres. In those centres it was very typical to have kids who were out of control, who acted impulsively, who acted irrationally, and who even acted not in their own best interests. They would do things while they were in the facility. They would pick unnecessary fights. They would damage property. They would do all kinds of things.

I remember one time somebody came along and said: "Look, all we really need is to make some rules for these guys. Let's make rules that you have to be nice to everybody. Let's make rules that you cannot pick fights with other people or with staff". They were all good intentions. People thought if they brought in these rules everything would be nice, but of course it did not work because the kids did not have the self-control, the self-discipline and the maturity to abide by those rules. That is why they were there.

That is what we have with this federal government. It is in fiscal difficulty because it does not have the fiscal maturity, the fiscal responsibility and the fiscal know-how or commitment to deal with its financial expenditures, mounting federal debt and the deficit.

What does it do? It says: "Let's bring in some nice rules that say we must be disciplined. If we are going to have expenditures, we have to find out where the revenues are. We have to offset them. We have to bring some order to our expenditure and revenue program".

It is so laughable it is like the juveniles in the detention centre. Rules are going to do nothing for this government, because if it is undisciplined and fiscally incompetent it is simply going to break those rules and there will be continued chaos.

I am beginning to be tremendously delighted about the way this government plays the shell game, particularly projecting and controlling expenditures in a period long after it is going to be defeated. Its members have no discipline themselves so now they are trying to say: "We will put in controls and project a discipline to the year 1995", knowing full well that they will not have to abide by this legislation because they are not going to be here.

If they called an election today they would be gone in six weeks. If they happen to limp along until the fall of 1992, they will be out of power then. It is like many of their expenditure announcements when they talk about spending $147 million on family violence and we find out it is only $15 million this year and a little under $20 million next year. The rest of it is often in Never Never Land. Voodoo economics, voodoo at least. Government members talk about bringing in discipline and an understanding of fiscal control. I have been an administrator for most of my life. I have controlled large budgets. I have handled base line budgeting methods, zero based budgeting methods and all sorts of fancy terminologies brought in by various governments and organizations in terms of fiscal control.

The reality is that none of them work unless there is a will and an understanding of fiscal restraint and accountability among the people involved in decision making, and we have not seen that in this government.

The government is quick to say it had to do something because it has this mounting debt problem. There is no doubt that we now have, thanks to Liberal and Conservative governments, a very difficult debt problem.

We know that an analysis has been done as to what has caused the debt problem. Statistics Canada pointed out that 44 per cent was caused by tax loopholes and tax concessions to large corporations, that 50 per cent was caused by high interest rates, and 6 per cent by program expenditures.

An hon. member: What about tax breaks?

Mr. Karpoff: Well, 44 per cent is caused by the reduction in moneys that should have been paid but were not paid, which means the average Canadian has had to pick up more.

The Liberals left a legacy of a $160 billion debt. I could speak a long time about the incompetence of the Liberals and that debt. Let me just go on. The government has blamed the Liberals consistently that the debt is simply a rollover starting from the $160 billion and is nothing but compound interest.

This government has had a high interest rate policy. There is absolutely no reason over the last number of years that interest rates have not been at least 4 per cent lower than they have been on average. If we had started off in 1984 and had our interest rates 4 per cent lower right across the board, the first year we would have saved something over $6 billion in interest rate payments. This year we would be saving something like $16 billion in interest rate payments.

They could have taken that $6 billion and reduced the deficit on an ongoing basis from 1984 until now. The Tories could have plugged those tax loopholes from day one, after they were elected. They could have brought in some fair taxation so that companies like Alcan, which in some years made $250 million or $230 million, would have paid taxes. The estimates vary a little. Some people say that the tax loopholes cost us $12 billion a year; other say $16 billion. The Tories agree that it is only $9 billion a year.

Let us take a round figure of $10 billion a year. If the Tories had plugged that loophole in 1984 and saved that $10 billion a year, plus the $4 billion a year in interest rates, and compounded it forward over the eight years they have now been in government and done nothing else, just those two things, we probably would have almost no deficit in this fiscal year. Somehow they can sit there and say: "We are not responsible because we were left with this legacy".

An hon. member: What do you think Bob Rae is saying now?

Mr. Karpoff: That he got left with this legacy. The government did get left with this legacy and a hell of a mess, the same type of Liberal mess that Bob Rae got stuck with in Ontario. The Liberal government said all the way through the election that there was a $23 million surplus. When the election was over, even before it resigned, it was forced to admit that there was no surplus, there was not even a $23 million deficit. The deficit was hundreds of millions of dollars that the Ontario NDP government was left to deal with.

This government has learned another trick from the B.C. Socred government and it is called "when we can't control ourselves, we'll off-load on somebody else". It is like that juvenile in the detention centre: When the government could not control its own behaviour, it quickly learned to blame somebody else or to make somebody else responsible for it, or make somebody else suffer the consequences of its behaviour.

In the last three to four years this government that cannot control its own expenditures decided it was going to off-load on to the provinces. It started off not only off-loading on to the provinces, but on to workers and small businesses, and it did it with changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act. It said that it was no longer going to put money from the Consolidated Revenue Fund into premiums; it was going to be financed 100 per cent by employees and employers.

It costs my municipality a million dollars a year and it costs the hospital a million dollars a year in increased UIC premiums. Therefore, they had to cut back on their expenditures. Health care institutions and municipalities are going to have to pay.

The government changed the waiting time and the length of time people can collect benefits, which has meant there have been dramatic increases in the demand for income assistance, particularly as we have gone into a recession.

I am beginning to realize that this government knew the recession was coming. It should have known, it was planning it; in fact, it engineered it. One of the first things it did was make itself recession proof: "We are not going to pick up the cost of the recession, so let's get out of UIC. We'll off-load that on to the provinces, we will off-load it on to the income assistance". Then somebody said to them: "Of course you know we have to pay 50 per cent of that income assistance". So the government said: "We will off-load that on to the provinces too".

The government brought in a ceiling for the three big provinces—Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta—in which income assistance is limited to a growth of 5 per cent, knowing full well, because of the changes to the UIC and to the recession that it had precipitated in this country, that the costs were going to go up dramatically. However, it had off-loaded those on to the provinces. You know, the cost to the provinces is going to be at least $5 billion over the period.

Then the government came to such things as the EPF, the Established Programs Financing, which is for post-secondary education. It talks a lot about the need for additional training and education, that that is our route to financial security and competitiveness. But of course it says: "We are not going to pick up the cost of that, we are going to off-load it on to the provinces". The cost to the provinces by the year 2000 will be $64 billion.

So this government simply says: "Look, we have no ability to control our own expenditures; we are out of control so we will simply off-load on to local governments and provinces".

There are other transfer payments that it has off-loaded. The government has simply said to the provinces: "You're going to have to pick up the cost". Some of these are programs which the government sanctimoniously speaks of the need to help. It has off-loaded farm income stabilization, crop insurance, economic development, reforestation, policing, social housing, correctional facilities.

The B.C. government has done an excellent analysis of the impact on the province of the off-loading of federal costs on to that province and the impact on that province. The total cost in this fiscal year is $1.1 billion, out of a total deficit of $1.7 billion. In other words, all that has happened is that the federal government has reduced its deficit by transferring it to the province.

Expenditure controls have not been cut back. The Canada Assistance Plan in British Columbia will have $160 million less this year, $1 billion over a five year period. The Established Programs Financing cutbacks are going to be $6.8 billion by 1995.

I think it is important to remember where these cutbacks started. They did not start only with the Tory government. They were started by the Liberal government in 1982. In fact, out of the total $6.8 billion loss of revenue for EPF between 1982 and 1985 for the province of British Columbia, $2.6 billion is because the six and five program was brought in in 1982.

Here we have the off-loading. When we start looking at it, we find out that really the Liberals not only left the Tories with a legacy of $160 billion debt, they left them with a program and plan of how they can off-load this stuff on to the provinces. They initiated it with block funding in 1977 and then the changes to the EPF formulas starting in 1982 and again in the six and five program. We now know the Tories learned many of these things, not from the Socreds, but from the Liberals.

The federal government is talking about fiscal restraint. The reality is that 20 per cent of its total expenditures amount to transfers to the provinces. In the last three years, over 50 per cent of the restraints have been in cutting back in transfer payments to the provinces. In other words, the bulk of its efforts to reduce its own expenditures have in fact not been reducing expenditures but have in fact been off-loading.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that you are signalling that I have another minute. I just want to—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I am sorry but your time has expired.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief question for the hon. member. I enjoyed his speech very much. I wonder if he could take the House into his confidence and tell us whether or not the New Democratic government in Ontario is going to introduce a bill along the same lines as this one. I noticed that government has taken to copying almost every move of the Conservative government in this House. When the Conservative government cuts back transfers to the provinces the NDP reduces transfers to the municipalities to 1 per cent. It does the same for school boards and for hospitals. Everybody gets 1 per cent now in NDP Ontario.

The NDP says the reason why it is doing that is because of the terrible deficit that was left by the Liberals, and of course the Conservatives in Ottawa, eight years later, are still saying: "The reason we are cutting back the transfers to the provinces is because of the terrible debt left by the Liberals". We all know that the story in both cases is pure hogwash. It is simply an unwillingness to accept responsibility for its own incompetence and the terrible recession that has been brought about by these two governments.

I want to know if the member can tell us, given the apparent willingness of the NDP to copy everything that the Conservatives do in Ottawa, if he thinks the New Democratic Party government in Ontario is going to bring in a bill like this.

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, the Ontario government has had to face a number of disastrous economic problems caused by free trade, the high dollar, the high interest rates and the legacy left by the Liberals. The Liberals increased the spending 10 per cent a year instead of trying to develop an economic base that could be diversified and stand some of the pressures around a recession.

Provinces have to pass along some of the cutbacks that this government is forcing on them, particularly through health care. That great Liberal bastion, Newfoundland, as a result of transfer payments had to lay off 10 per cent of all of its nursing staff last year. That is the way the Liberals did it.

An hon. member: That is what is going on in the hospitals in Ontario now.

Mr. Karpoff: They simply laid off 10 per cent because of the cutbacks, but one thinks that philosophically they are on the same wavelength. We now have the Liberal premiers, Wells, McKenna and Bourassa, talking about the introduction of user fees. All the Liberal premiers are advocating a two-tiered health care system, one for the rich and one for the poor, with the introduction of user fees. They say: "Well, that is because of the cutbacks from the federal government in terms of EPF".

I have some empathy with them in terms of the cutbacks from the federal government when they are talking about health care: $64 billion has been taken out of health care; another $32 billion has been taken out in post-secondary education. Provinces like Newfoundland are undergoing a crisis in employment. If Newfoundland's rate of unemployment was the same as Ontario is having right now, it would feel itself very lucky.

We now have a situation where the fisheries is caught between a rock and a hard place, where in order to conserve any of the fisheries for the future generations, hard realities of conservation are going to have to be brought in now. There are difficulties, but you do not see the NDP governments talking about introducing user fees for health care.

The Liberals in Newfoundland had to lay off 10 per cent of their staff and their solution is simply: "Let's bring in user fees. Let's make sure the poor and the middle income persons do not have access to an adequate health care system".

We have a situation now developing in this country where the New Democratic premiers, the four of them, are standing up and saying: "We will protect our national health care program in spite of this federal government and its cutbacks". Premiers Bourassa, McKenna and Wells are advocating the introduction of health care user fees.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, what a loss of time for this House to have to consider such a ridiculous bill today. It is indeed ridiculous. I fail to see why the government has introduced such legislation. Obviously, it did nothing to put an end to the disastrous economic policies it has been pursuing.

[English]

In looking at the reasons for this bill, I can only conclude that its purpose is to bamboozle Canadians into thinking that somehow the government has a grip on its expenditure programs. The speech by the Minister of State for Privatization this morning was further evidence of a complete and utter inability to deal with these issues in a rational and sensible way. It is clear evidence that the government has lost its grip.

While I am on my feet, might I suggest that Your Honour take the power to adjourn this House into your hands, since there is no minister here who is able to respond and listen to this debate on a government measure. It is the practice that ministers must be here for debates on government bills. I would ask you to take the matter into your hands and adjourn the House in the absence of any minister.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member has been in Parliament long enough to know that it is not our pratice to refer to the presence or the absence of fellow members. Although he is referring to an established tradition, the fact remains that it is not an absolute necessity for the debate to continue. I would therefore ask the hon. member to carry on.

[English]

Mr. Milliken: I think it shows a complete callous disregard for the importance of this Chamber that this is the case, but I will continue with my speech in spite of this lack of personnel.

I wanted to talk about the fact that the government itself in 1984 indicated how serious Canada's economic situation was. It is from this 1984 report, this 1984 statement if you like, that we learned how terrible it was that Canada had been governed by the Liberal Party for the previous many years. The government went to great lengths to point out that if the policies of the previous government were followed, certain economic consequences of great magnitude would befall Canadians, and somehow our country would simply go to pieces with the continuation of those policies.

Indeed, there was a great deal of trumpeting and fanfare by the then Minister of Finance that the changes he was about to announce were going to solve Canada's economic woes. Somehow by checking the policies of the previous administration, Canadians would be brought from the brink of disaster into a great new golden age.

Unfortunately the Minister of Finance was wrong then, and has been wrong with every pronouncement he has made ever since. The statement applies to both the former Minister of Finance and the current Minister of Finance. Both have failed Canadians and this government has failed Canadians. It has been a disaster for Canada. Canadians are just sitting waiting for an opportunity to throw this government out of office. We are waiting for an opportunity for an election and this bill is an attempt by the government to shore up its dwindling electoral opportunities and dwindling chances. I suggest it is an inappropriate effort. It is a silly ridiculous effort and it is a complete waste of time of this House to introduce a measure as stupid as this particular bill.

The government stated in 1984 that if the previous government's proposals or policies were not changed, then budgetary expenditures would increase by 55 per cent in those financial years between 1983–84, and 1990–91. Budgetary expenditures would go up 55 per cent if Liberal policies were followed. We keep hearing how Liberal policies were the root of all evil. Well, throughout that same period while the Minister of Finance was in office, budgetary expenditures in fact went up by 69 per cent, not 55 per cent as they would have done under the previous government.

Whose policies are to blame for the deficit today? If they had only gone up 55 per cent, think how much we would have saved. They went up 69 per cent because of this government's incompetent policies.

The government predicted that budgetary revenues would have to swell by 76 per cent if the previous government's policies were pursued. In fact they went up by 86 per cent largely because of the enormous additional burden of taxation levied by the government opposite to cover its lavish spending. There is no other reason for it.

It claimed that the deficit would be $37 billion in 1991. It did a little better there. Because it raised taxes so much, it got it down to $30.6 billion, which was barely lower than what was projected. Of course it is now rising and we will hear more about that I expect next week.

It also predicted that the net public debt by 1990–91 would be $407 billion. It was slightly off. It was only $388 billion, an increase of 131 per cent. That is the kind of increase this government brought in because of its disastrous policies of the last five years. Now it is trying to say on the one hand, the reason for the financial crisis in Canada is because of the Liberal debt we inherited. On the other hand, it says that it is now going to bring government expenditures under control.

If this bill is such a great idea today, why was it not brought in 1984 when the Minister of Finance made this famous statement in which he said that Canada was going down the tubes if it followed the policies of the previous government?

If government expenditure is so important today, why was it not even more important in 1984 when it claimed it was solving the problem of excessive government expenditure? It allowed it to increase by 69 per cent in a five-year period.

I will tell you why it is more important today. It is because this government wants to go to the people of Canada in an election campaign and say to the people that it has brought the government expenditures under control, and has passed some bill that somehow magically solves this problem.

This is so transparent and so fraudulent that it cannot bear any reasonable examination. One of the government's own supporters knows what is going on here. He knows that Canadians are being bamboozled by this process. I want to quote the hon. member for Mississauga South who knows more about finance, quite frankly, than the Minister of Finance or the previous Minister of Finance for that matter.

He has been chairman of the finance committee of this House and has a far better grip in my opinion on financial matters than any Minister of Finance this government has ever produced. What does he say? I quote from The Ottawa Citizen of July 29. I thank my colleague from Windsor West for his eagle eye in spotting this excellent quotation.

The article said: "The bill to limit annual increases in government spending to 3 per cent over the next five years is a charade" he said. He is especially critical of the exclusion of so-called tax expenditures or tax breaks from the CAP.

Here is an expert in this House on finance, someone who knows more about finance than the Minister of Finance ever did, who said that this bill is a charade. Why are more members on the government side not speaking to this bill? I will tell you why. They are humiliated and embarrassed to have to defend such a completely silly piece of legislation.

Mr. Ferguson: That is why there are no ministers in the House.

Mr. Milliken: They are hiding their faces in shame at the thought of this silly legislation being discussed in this House.

Let's look at the proposal the government put forward. Initially it sent a draft to the Standing Committee on Finance for pre-study. What did the draft say? It proposed 3 per cent per year for a five-year period, for I think a maximum of 15 per cent. It is compounded so we will allow for that. Now they have revised it.

The new bill before us has changed those figures to increase the amount slightly. Why did it increase them? Presumably because it felt it could not keep its expenditures at 3 per cent. In other words, it figured out exactly how much it was likely to increase expenditures and then allowed for the cap to accommodate all their spending plans.

One can only expect the reason for the increase in the level is because there is an election coming up, and it does not want to cut back too much. We hear that the inflation rate in Canada is going to 2 per cent.

We know the government is giving its employees one per cent this year and three per cent next year. Why are we having increases in excess of three per cent? Are those figures going to hold firm? Why are we going to have increases in government expenditure in excess of three per cent if the inflation rate in Canada drops below two as we expect it will according to the most recent newspaper account? I expect we will hear that from the minister shortly.

Why are we spending more? The government says it wants to control expenditures. Its desire to control is dictated only by a desire to appear to control for the purposes of an election campaign. It is not because it genuinely believes that control of expenditures is important. It had seven years to bring government expenditures under control and it has abysmally failed.

MACEDONIA

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, Canada should not recognize the republic of Macedonia unless it meets two very specific criteria.

This former component of Yugoslavia must renounce any direct claims it has to Greek territory or those implied by its misleading name.

This republic must drop the name Macedonia. To continue to promote this form of historical revisionism is to perpetrate cultural and historical fraud.

Macedonia is an intrinsic part of Greek culture and history that is of fundamental importance to thousands of my constituents.

Mr. Speaker, there is no connection between Josip Tito and Alexander the Great.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Mr. Speaker, abuse of cross-border shopping is draining the Canadian economy of an estimated $2 billion to $3 billion a year. Losses to New Brunswick are as high as $200 million.

The abusers of an already generous duty allowance are costing their fellow Canadians their jobs by the thousands. The additional financial burden put on the majority who do not abuse the system is unfair.

The abusers feel no compunction about letting other Canadians pay for their use of our medicare, old age security and all the other Canadian social safety nets.

They do not shop across the border when it comes time to go to the hospital, when they collect their unemployment insurance, when they might have to avail themselves of workmen's compensation.

Perhaps it is time that we devised a way of making these abusers of cross-border shopping even the playing field with the majority the next time they pay a visit to the doctor.

OLYMPIC GAMES

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, congratulations to Kerrin Lee-Gartner on her outstanding achievement in her gold medal win at the Olympic Games. We are also very proud of her technical coach of four years, Craig Spiess of Thunder Bay.

Other Olympic participants from Thunder Bay are David Walker in freestyle, Kevin Dahl in hockey, and Peter Robertson-Stovel in bobsledding.

While praising our Olympic champions we should not lose sight of the many thousands of Canadians who dedicate their lives to help develop our Olympic athletes. People like Craig's parents, Marilyn and Larry Spiess who operate and own Mount Baldy ski area in Thunder Bay. Their dedication and devotion to skiing, and the dedication and devotion of so many thousands of Canadians like Marilyn and Larry, is the glue that makes Olympic hopefuls into Olympic champions.

So today we salute the many thousands of Canadians like Marilyn and Larry who independently, without government assistance, bring our Canadian athletes to the threshold of greatness. This House salutes them all.

SPORTS FISHING

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): The federal government has demonstrated its inability to handle the east coast fishing industry and possibly will repeat this mismanagement in the Great Lakes.

The stocks of whitefish, trout and salmon are threatened by a predator, the lamprey eel, which unless controlled could destroy a thriving sports fishing industry.

Through an agreement signed by the U.S.A. and Canada, a funding arrangement of 69 per cent and 21 per cent respectively was signed in 1955.

Canada has continually dragged its feet in funding commitments. This year the U.S.A. has committed an 18 per cent increase and to this point Canada has not responded. A $3.5 million investment could preserve a $1.4 billion industry.

Our Canadian workers in the field have tremendous expertise but cannot respond appropriately because of funding constraints.

Why doesn't the much-heralded green plan respond with funding to deal with this problem?

President Bush, an avid angler, appreciates the importance of this issue. He has baited the hook and we ask the Prime Minister to bite.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Jean-Luc Joncas (Matapédia—Matane): Mr. Speaker, I have had the opportunity over the past few weeks to meet with several farmers' organizations in my riding. Dairy, beef, pork, poultry and egg producers, they are all concerned, and rightly so, about the ongoing GATT negotiations. Canadian farmers have developed a supply management system at the cutting edge which regulates their production and allow them to make a decent living by operating their farms.

Let me tell you, as a member representing a riding which mostly depends on farming and having been raised on a family farm, that I share the concerns of the rural community regarding the unclear positions the media reported government has been taking at the GATT negotiations. Our farmers need to be reassured about the position being put forward by the government of Canada in Geneva and to know that it will keep supporting vigorously the strengthening of article XI of GATT. Mr. Speaker, I urge government to stand firm and not to renege on its commitment to the farm community.

FISHERIES

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the headlines on slashed cod quotas bring home the meaning of sustainable development and illustrate dramatically what can happen to fishermen, to farmers, and to loggers when we fail collectively to manage our natural resources properly.

Why is there a cod crisis? It is because for years more cod have been harvested than could be naturally renewed. Consequently, our fishermen are bearing the brunt of past mistakes. The situation is made worse by foreign fleets overfishing outside the 200-mile limit.

If future generations are to have a chance to earn a living off the Grand Banks then Ottawa must unilaterally take over management of the fish stocks on the Grand Banks outside the 200-mile limit.

This is an emergency which calls for emergency conservation measures.

BREAST IMPLANTS

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the Minister of National Health and Welfare who recently announced the creation of an independent committee of experts to study silicone gel-filled breast implants.

This committee will travel to Washington, D.C. and review all current information on these implants. They will also have access to all documentation available to Health and Welfare Canada. They will make a preliminary recommendation to the minister before February 28.

This action clearly shows that the minister's priority is for the health and welfare of Canadian women.

FISHERIES

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond) Mr. Speaker, the situation in the Atlantic fisheries is of fundamental importance to our economy, to the social welfare of our citizens and to the Canadian environment.

I am appalled that the Government of Canada which has the sole responsibility both constitutional and otherwise to manage our fisheries has acted so negligently on this most important issue.

The question must be put. Who is managing our fisheries? Is it the Department of External Affairs? Is it the Department of Fisheries and Oceans? Or is it the foreign capitals in Spain and Portugal and other foreign countries?

The situation in Atlantic Canada is of paramount concern to all Canadians. They have seen by the demonstrable acts of this government the negligence that it has put forward in terms of managing our fisheries.

I urge the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to take heed of the advice he has been given by all members of this Chamber in order to change a very, very serious situation.

CANADIAN CHARTER OF RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, Canadians can have their house expropriated without a hearing to determine fair value. There are many legal opinions that there is no legal recourse.

Mr. David Stratas of a noted Toronto law firm said in a paper released recently that the charter does protect some interests which can be said to be proprietary in nature.

The absence of a specific provision enshrining the right against confiscation of property unless it is in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice means the arbitrary and irrational exercise of power. Mr. Stratas writes:

> There are reasons of varying strength which support putting property rights in the charter. These are:
> (a) The right to property is not unknown to our law;
> (b) The right to property is one of our oldest common law rights; and
> (c) The right to property plays an important role in furthering other important rights.

The right to property would have been useful in preventing government excesses in the past.

• (1410)

The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms should be amended to guarantee property rights.

ISABELLE AND PAUL DUCHESNAY

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, it is always frustrating not to be able to do what one wants. That is what Isabelle and Paul Duchesnay said after they participated in the Olympic Games in Albertville.

These two residents of my riding in Quebec represented France because they were not recognized by Canada. They said that they were very disappointed about the pressure put on them to change their whole program, not to mention that the lowest mark was given to them by the Canadian judge.

It seems that they are criticized for being innovative and wanting to outdo themselves. It seems that they are criticized for being distinct. What a funny coincidence, Mr. Speaker.

I want to extend hearty congratulations to Isabelle and Paul for representing us so well, with such determination and style.

On behalf of Quebecers, I want to give them a gold medal.

Hats off to Isabelle and Paul. Quebec is very proud of you both.

FORESTRY

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, from March 2 to March 4, members of Canada's forestry community will meet in Ottawa at the National Forest Congress sponsored by the Canadian Council of Forest Ministers and the Canadian Forestry Association.

They will discuss implementation of a new national forest strategy. The strategy entitled "Sustainable Forests: A Canadian Commitment" is important for several reasons.

It makes a series of commitments on behalf of decision makers and stakeholders in Canada's forests to adhere to meaningful codes and standards of forestry practices, to balance the differing values placed on forests by society, to enhance the role of Canada's aboriginal peoples in forest management, and to ensure Canada's work force is adequately trained to take advantage of new technology and new knowledge.

It will also ensure that forest industry practices are environmentally sound, that they protect significant forest eco-systems and that they ensure timber harvesting and forest regeneration are kept fully in balance.

This strategy is an example of the emerging spirit of co-operation and the willingness among all forest stakeholders to become partners in the next generation of forest management.

Literally, this strategy should become a Canada forest accord to serve all Canadians.

BREAST IMPLANTS

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of National Health and Welfare announced the establishment of an advisory committee to study silicone breast implants.

While it is difficult to condemn the minister for finally taking this action, it is, like all others taken by the minister, far short of what is needed.

This committee will not add to what is already known about the dangers of silicone implants. The information this committee will have access to is not new. It has been, or should have been known to the health protection branch for years.

What has been lacking is the commitment from successive Tory and Liberal ministers of health to safeguard Canadian women's health.

We have seen the scientific evidence. We have heard the anecdotal evidence of women and yet, the best the minister can offer is another review.

Where is the commitment to treatment and testing? Where is the commitment to proper counselling and information about implants and the dangers they possess?

Where is the commitment to listen to women and ban silicone implants and refuse to allow their future use until such time as their safety has been demonstrated?

Where is the commitment of the Minister of National Health and Welfare to Canadian women?

CANADIAN OLYMPIC ASSOCIATION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, further to statements made by journalist Réjean Tremblay in La Presse on February 13, 1992 concerning the benefits enjoyed by senior officials of the Canadian Olympic Association at the Albertville Olympic Games to the detriment of Canadian athletes, I would like to give a summary of the income of the Olympic Trust of Canada from 1989 to 1992: advertising, $12.3 million; donations, $2.5 million; endowment fund, $16.4 million; federal government, $2 million, a mere 6 per cent of the total budget of $33.2 million.

The Olympic Fund is not financed by the federal government; this fund covers the financial campaigns of the Canadian Olympic Association. The federal government's contribution is limited to expenses related to running the organization and to the travel and accommodation of the official team at the Games.

FISHERIES

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, the latest scientific evidence on the northern cod stocks has sent shock waves across Atlantic Canada, to the fishing communities across Newfoundland that depend on these stocks, and to communities in Nova Scotia, such as Canso and Port Bickerton whose fishermen ply these waters as well.

The findings confirm what several studies, including the Harris panel, and fishermen have been telling this government for more than a year.

These cod stocks are in trouble. The combined pressure by foreign overfishing, by a burgeoning and voracious seal population and, yes, by our own fishermen over the years is not sustainable. We cannot allow this vital resource to be decimated. This is not the time for finger pointing. It is the time for purposeful, decisive action.

This government must act immediately in concert with provincial governments and the industry to relieve the pressure on the northern cod. It must move, finally, to control the seal population and it must get tough with those countries, principally Spain and Portugal, that are blatantly overfishing these stocks. If they will not listen to reason, maybe it is time for stronger measures.

OLYMPIC GAMES

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec—Est): Mr. Speaker, I am proud to address the House again today in praise of all the Canadian athletes at the Albertville Olympic Games.

First off, I would like to mention the performance of Miss Kerrin Lee-Gartner from Calgary, Alberta, who won the first Olympic Gold Medal for Canada in the women's downhill.

I am particularly proud of our athletes' showing in acrobatic skiing and I would like to personally congratulate someone from my region, Mr. Philippe LaRoche, from Lac Beauport Quebec, who won first place in the jumps, as well as his teammate, Nicholas Fontaine, from Magog, Quebec, who came in second.

Even though acrobatic skiing is only a demonstration sport and their medals are not taken into account in the final classification, these two athletes gave an outstanding performance.

Let me also underline our best olympic performance in the men's biathlon 4 X 7.5-km race, where Steven Cyr, from Val-Cartier, Quebec came in tenth.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that you will join me in congratulating those athletes and in celebrating Team Canada's first victory over Germany just a few minutes ago, in overtime.

GUYANA

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, some time this year Guyana will hold a general election. Guyana has a history of flawed elections. While some changes have been made under President Desmond Hoyte to reform the political system, the Guyanese government still has a long way to go.

Canada and other countries have to urge the Guyanese government to implement strict election reforms. Free and fair elections in Guyana must become a reality.

I want to be sure that Canada takes measures to ensure that the election will run smoothly and democratically. Canadian observers must be on hand to guarantee the Guyanese people a free and fair election.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the acting Prime Minister.

For two years now, the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister have been telling Canadians that things are getting better. The Canadian people would like to believe them, but they keep hearing about new plant closures and lay offs every day on the news.

Just yesterday, Hyundai announced a three-day reduced work week for its plant in Bromont, Quebec. And today, Dominion Textiles announced it was closing its plants in Saint-Thimothée, Quebec, and Long Sault, in Ontario, with a total of 624 workers being laid off.

In his forthcoming budget, will the Minister of Finance forget about wrestling inflation and make sure that Canadians regain their dignity by getting back to work in well-paid jobs?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman opposite takes great pride in citing negative news. Perhaps he might be interested in some good news. Today the Financial Post reported that store sales show signs of life. Department store sales bring hope to sector. Housing sales are up in January. I think those are all good indicators.

We know very well that we are going through difficult times. It is very difficult in pulling out of the recession, but the fundamentals are right. I think Canada is well poised to take advantage of the encouraging signs that are clearly on the horizon.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, talking about somebody needing a bit of life, it is this government which should at this time do the right thing for Canadians.

• (1420)

I would like to ask another question of the Deputy Prime Minister or perhaps the Minister for International Trade.

The statement made by the Prime Minister in Peterborough talks about the NDP or the unemployed. It might be the same thing after the next election. I want to know if the Prime Minister—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chrétien: I am sorry, I wanted to be nice. I want to ask the minister if the statement made by the Prime Minister is true, and I hope it needs no correction, that the government has no intention of presenting a tariff list at the GATT by the end of this month concerning the products that should be excluded under the GATT list asked for by Mr. Dunkel.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I hate to answer this question and get in between in this lover's quarrel over here, but let me respond.

The Prime Minister and a number of ministers met earlier today with farm leaders and talked about the GATT negotiations, in particular their response to the Dunkel text and the need to put forward tariff positions for March 1.

We, as my hon. friend is very well aware, do not accept the Dunkel text as it relates to the supply managed product and our position, as put forward on March 1, will reflect that position. In other words, we will not put forward any tariffication numbers or anything such as is requested by the GATT Dunkel text.

FISHERIES

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am happy that there will be no list, but the problem remains the same in Canada. Because of the uncertainty created by this government, we see farmers being driven off the land everywhere in Canada. Now we see fishermen being driven off the sea.

Yesterday, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans got up in the House and spoke a lot of words. What has been the reaction in Atlantic Canada? It is despair for 2,000 fishermen who will lose their jobs because of the mismanagement of this government.

I ask the Minister of Finance if his government will do something to preserve the dignity of these hard workers of the sea.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, since there has been no decision made as yet with reference to the question of the total allowable catch of northern cod for this year or exactly what action will be taken in connection with the new advice from the CASSAC committee, no one can seriously estimate what the effect might be of any change to it until a change is made.

There will have to be changes and there will be an effect, but the statement that 2,000 fishermen will be out of work is very inaccurate. There will doubtless be some plant workers out of work and some trawlermen will certainly be affected, but I think the 2,000 fishermen figure is far too great an estimate.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, foreign overfishing is a matter of political will and would have stopped long ago if the Prime Minister had chosen to take it on.

The Minister of Fisheries' sin is not that he does not understand or has not spoken out on the issue, albeit belatedly. His sin is his continuing presence in a cabinet which by failing to act is ruthlessly trampling on the livelihoods of thousands and thousands of his own constituents.

Will the minister put the job security of those plant workers and those fishermen ahead of his own and tell the Prime Minister he can no longer aid and abet this cowardly bungling on the overfishing issue?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I am one of the few members of this House, if not the only member, who has ever resigned from a cabinet. I would be unafraid to resign from another cabinet if I felt it was not doing its duty for this country, but that is not the case. This government and this cabinet have done more with respect to the question of foreign overfishing and more to assist fishermen in Newfoundland and elsewhere in Atlantic Canada than any predecessor.

The problem of foreign overfishing is not a question of political will. It is a question of international law, that this country has no authority or jurisdiction whatsoever outside the 200 mile economic zone that was accepted by the world in 1977. That does not mean to say that our patience is inexhaustible. We have campaigns under way, I will not go into them now, for this year and we will be dealing with this matter in a forthright and an even more dedicated way than in the past during this calendar year.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, there he goes again. He continues as he has been doing to make some vague mutterings about what he might do a year or two down the road and in the same mouthful says he cannot do anything. Well, we do not have a year. What is the minister going to do, I ask him, now that his sweet talk has failed him and now that he has been abandoned by his political cronies over there. The only tool he has left is his integrity, and he has a lot of that. I ask him, will he put that on the line to light a fire under the Prime Minister to get this thing moving?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I do not have to put a match under the Prime Minister for him to do something. We are not in the kind of difficulty that the opposition party is in. The Prime Minister has already brought this subject up and pressed these points home in meetings with President Delors and other leaders of the European Community, and he is going to continue doing that.

I met with him last night to discuss and plan what our next moves will be. We have his full support and he will be an invaluable help in this cause during this year.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

There are thousands of Atlantic Canadians who could be within days of losing their jobs. Certainly we are all concerned about the consequences for the people of Atlantic Canada.

The government was warned of the situation in the fishing industry two years ago and did nothing. The government was warned many years ago about the cost of overfishing the Atlantic region and did nothing. The Minister of Finance just said that they are getting the fundamentals right in the economy. Well, they did not get the fundamentals right for Atlantic Canadians. They did not get the fundamentals right for those Atlantic fishermen.

I want to ask the government and the Deputy Prime Minister why two years were wasted and what the government plans to do for those Atlantic Canadians who would be put out of work because of this government's mismanagement.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, to say that the government was warned two years ago and did nothing may be fine as a piece of rhetoric, but it is certainly not factual.

Several years ago the government was told, not warned, by its scientific advisers that the advice given by them in the previous three years was inaccurate and they had to revise all of their forecasts. The government acted on that. The total allowable catch of northern cod has been reduced from 266,000 tonnes a year to 185,000 in the present year. That was action.

The Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program totalling $584 million was brought in to deal with the consequences. Is that nothing, or is the hon. lady opposite just practising political rhetorical excesses in an attempt to gain points?

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary for the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance said this government is getting the fundamentals right. I would suggest that the Minister of Finance talk to the 1,000 people who are out of work in Fishery Products International in Atlantic Canada, to those at Sears Canada where 800 jobs were lost in Atlantic Canada; Dominion Textiles where 330 jobs were lost; St. John's Shipbuilding where 250 jobs were lost, and so on.

I ask the minister, can Canadians expect to see some hope? Can Atlantic Canadians expect to see some hope in the budget which this government will bring forth and what is it going to do for those Canadians that its policies have put out of work?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, the people in Atlantic Canada can see all around them the tremendous efforts being made by this government to create employment in Atlantic Canada.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, noise is not going to drown out the truth, no matter how loudly the opposition shouts.

Just to give an example, in the last several years we have had an action program of ACOA. In the province of Newfoundland, 1,580 projects were assisted with $169 million, creating and maintaining over 17,000 jobs, not to mention the Hibernia project with a government commitment of $2.7 billion and hundreds of millions more committed to the fishery, just in one of the Atlantic provinces. That is a fine record, and one that I am proud to support.

• (1430)

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, Canadians have seen the fish go to Portugal, Spain and France. They have seen the jobs go to the United States and nothing for Atlantic Canadians.

Fishermen are in the same dreadful situation as farmers. Government has been warned. If it agrees to do away with marketing boards at the GATT negotiations, thousands of family farms will disappear and, with them, thousands of jobs. I ask the Deputy Prime Minister this: Is he prepared to sign that kind of agreement? If so, how will he make sure that all these farms will survive and all these jobs will not be lost?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister and several of my colleagues were meeting with farm leaders just minutes ago. First, the Prime Minister has reaffirmed that the Canadian position is unchanged and that we will continue to vigourously support our farm product marketing boards.

At the same time, we have invited our farm leaders to take part in a European mission to meet with their European counterparts, to call upon both the political and farm leaders of these countries for support. Our proposal has been relatively well accepted. As a matter of fact, we are planning to meet again in a few minutes, after Question Period, with a hundred or so Canadian farm leaders gathered in an Ottawa hotel to discuss this issue further. I am happy to see that farm leaders and government are finally realizing that we have but one position and that we need to stand united if the Canadian position is to be successfully endorsed.

[English]

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Ocean.

I want to put another perspective on this foreign overfishing. The year 1991 will go down on record, a 15-year record, for being the year with the worst catch for Atlantic fishermen and the best catch for foreigners fishing the same stock, the worst of times for Canadians and the best of times for foreigners. That contrast is shocking. The comparison is atrocious and shameful, and I think the conclusion is very clear. Something has to be done now.

I do not care what the minister says. It is a question of political will. When will this government have the political will to stop talking and start acting?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the hon. member represents a great many fishermen. I can understand his frustration. I hope he can understand my frustration.

If it were simply a question of political will, there is no one in this House that has any more political will than I have. It would not be a problem any longer if it were a question of political will. It is a very delicate and intricate question of international relations where this country has no rights beyond the 200-mile limit.

It is not that there has been no action. I have outlined for the House all kinds of actions that we have taken. If the European Community and the nations that make it up do not pay attention to the steps we are going to have to take in the next month or two and to the advice that we have received from our scientists then we will know there has to be a change in direction in what we are trying to do to persuade them to observe and exhibit some conscience about the waste they are making of the assets that belong to the whole world outside the 200-mile economic limit.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

I would suggest that the minister has a very short memory. On January 9 in St. John's on NTV, the minister was reported to have promised unilateral action if the European Community did not stop overfishing. Time has run out. They haven't. He hasn't. They won't. So when will he show the political will to take the unilateral action that he promised on January 9?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, if we looked at the transcript I think we would see that nothing was promised in the extreme terms the hon. gentleman mentioned.

The government has taken many unilateral actions to deal with this situation. As I pointed out in a speech in London earlier in January, if nothing further is accomplished this year, if the European Community and the nations that have vessels registered in Panama and otherwise do not heed the cries of humanity that they should practice sensible conservation methods in the northwest Atlantic then anything is possible.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

Two years ago in Black Tickle two million pounds of fish were landed. Last year not a single pound of fish was landed in Black Tickle. Whole communities on the Labrador coast face being wiped out completely. Whether the minister likes it or not, he is accountable.

What answers does he have today for fishermen who face losing their livelihoods and their homes? What answers does he have for them today?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, in my view, with the approaches that we have taken and we are taking, the fishery will come back and the northern cod fishery will flourish again. There is going to be a period when it is not flourishing.

With respect to Black Tickle, to take that particular instance, what did the government do? It brought in a nice compensation program that compensated every fishermen in Black Tickle who was prevented by ice from fishing. That compensation amounted altogether to $37 million.

Then the government brought in the Atlantic Catch Failure Program to help the fishermen of Black Tickle and other fishermen so that they became qualified for unemployment insurance. If the same terrible circumstance affects them again this year, similar kinds of assistance will come to them until they can properly fish again and catch as they were doing several years ago and as they are going to do again in the future.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, the people of Black Tickle on the Labrador coast do not want handouts.

They want jobs and they want to be able to fish. They do not want simply to be looked after by this government. They live closest to the resource. Many of them are native fishermen, and yet their catches go down and the catches of foreigners go up.

How does the minister explain that, and when is he going to stand up for Labrador fishermen?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the fishermen of Labrador understand that the minister of fisheries cannot create the fish and that this is a problem that has arisen over a long period of years.

It is not a problem that is going to be resolved quickly. It may be several years before it is resolved or there could be a good fishery this year. We will have to wait and see.

In the meantime, the fishermen of Labrador are receiving assistance from the government to maintain them while this environmental circumstance or whatever the circumstances are that are causing this are overcome. We will continue to support them. That is all any government can do. I cannot put fish in the sea.

We have followed the scientific advice of CAFSAC all of these years. This circumstance has arisen despite the fact that Canada has always been very cautious in the TACs that Canada has set.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

The Liberal premier of New Brunswick has now joined the Liberal premiers of Quebec and Newfoundland in seeking user fees for medicare which are strenuously opposed by the New Democratic Party.

In the words of Glen Clark, the B.C. Minister of Finance, "all four NDP administrations will be leading the attack on the federal government if Ottawa tries to water down the Canada Health Act to allow provinces to impose user fees".

Will the minister tell the Liberal premiers categorically that user fees will not be accepted in any disguise?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am trying to find the relationship between New Brunswick and British Columbia. Mr. Clark, Mr. McKenna and myself are having a little trouble because there is no relationship.

I already said to my friend and to all members of the House that I think it is legitimate for the premiers to look at the cost of the health care system.

My predecessors and myself have always said that we believe that we do not have to change the rules or the principles. It is not our intention to do so. I do not understand why my friend is getting nervous.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

The minister also knows that the cut to federal medicare contributions which will amount to $4 billion next year are prompting these threats to our national medicare system. Since the cuts are substantially eroding provincial health services, will the minister live up to the Canada Health Act guarantees and restore funding in the upcoming budget?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised the member does not know that all the provinces including those with NDP governments have already said that there was enough money in the system. This includes the member's NDP government in British Columbia.

In other words, 9 per cent of GNP in the country is enough to manage the health care system. At the same time, following the direction given by the Minister of Finance, we have to control the finances of the country. I believe what has been done was well done and moreover we do not believe, including his own friends, we have to put more money. We already do.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, my question was intended for the Prime Minister, but I will direct it to the minister responsible for agriculture in Quebec. Last Wednesday this House unanimously adopted a motion asking for the Prime Minister's personal involvement in the GATT talks, with President George Bush and the President of the European Community, Mr. Jacques Delors. Could the minister let us know whether tomorrow the Prime Minister will be able to give us a detailed report on his meetings with these very influential figures on protecting and safeguarding GATT article XI?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, we will do better than that. We won't do it tomorrow because the Prime Minister did it today. Only a few minutes ago he met with farm leaders, as I told the leader of the New Democratic Party.

The Prime Minister met President Delors for over three hours in Paris just a few weeks ago. He had conversations with the leaders of various countries, including Germany and the European Economic Community. He also had talks with the British Prime Minister. As he said this morning, he will be getting in touch with these leaders in the next few days to reaffirm Canada's position. As matters stand, we must feel we are supported by everyone here in Canada, and I would ask the hon. member to support farm producers and the government on the mission we will attempt once again when we go to Europe in the next few days to look for allies. I hope the hon. member will be with us to support us. That is what we need.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): I can assure you, Sir, that we stand behind our farmers, but I am not so sure the farmers believe you, and that is the problem.

The question is this. Last Wednesday, a motion was adopted by this House asking for the Prime Minister's personal involvement. That is what farmers expect to happen this week because they will be in Ottawa at one of their biggest gatherings. Can you give us the assurance the Prime Minister will make a personal commitment to these farmers?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, with respect, I will explain once more. The Prime Minister just spent two hours with Canadian farm leaders during which he unreservedly reaffirmed the Canadian position and our government's support for a position that we have been defending at GATT for two years. I realize this does not really suit the members of the Bloc Quebecois. They would rather see us miss the target, which would probably give them a boost at the national level. However, we intend to defend our position, no matter what. We stand behind our farm producers and we will continue to defend them.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade. The Prime Minister said in Peterborough last Friday that Canada would not be filing tariff schedules on March 1 as required in the GATT arrangements.

I want to ask the Minister for International Trade if this means that Canada, when it files its commitments for agriculture, will simply be providing that import controls for those supply managed products will be provided through a strengthened and clarified article XI. If that is the case, will the government be getting the support of the other five nations who support our position for a strengthened and clarified article XI?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, in response to a question from his colleague just a few minutes ago, I said that we would not be filing tariff schedules on the supply managed products. We will be filing tariff schedules on all other products so that we will be fully engaged in negotiation.

As my hon. friend is well aware, and I know he supports the position that we are taking, we are seeking a strengthening and clarification of article XI. We believe the approach that we are taking on March 1 is fully consistent with that.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I think we would be much more comfortable if the government would simply be filing with the GATT negotiations that we want to maintain our import controls through a strengthened and clarified article XI and that we would seek the support of the other five countries that support our position.

Last week the House of Commons passed a joint resolution calling on the Prime Minister to become personally involved in the GATT negotiations, to meet with the President of the United States and the President of the European Economic Community.

Farmers want to know what the government has accomplished in six years of negotiations. We have only five countries supporting our position. What has the government actually accomplished? When is he going to meet with the two presidents? When is he actually going to accomplish something to save these farmers and 100,000 Canadian jobs?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is very well aware that the Prime Minister has been very much engaged in this issue for a number of years now, going back before the 1986 summit.

The Prime Minister met with farm leaders, went straight to the Tokyo summit and put agricultural issues on the summit table for the first time. That has continued at every summit since then. It also continues at a number of other meetings that the Prime Minister is involved in, some of which are not related to agriculture but the Prime Minister brings those matters up at the meetings because of the seriousness with which he views these agricultural issues. He has raised this matter with other G-7 leaders.

THE BUDGET

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, the government has been involved in some very extensive consultations with numerous people, not only the first ministers in a very public meeting here in Ottawa, but through numerous other consultations. Even in this House the government gets lots of free advice on the budget.

I would like to ask the Minister of Finance if he has completed his consultation process and is he ready to announce the date of that budget?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I can advise my hon. colleague and the House that it is my intention to bring a budget down on Tuesday, February 25.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Agriculture and concerns the government's position on protecting marketing boards and article XI.

What we want to know from the government is not all the meetings that were held, the trips to Europe, the telephone calls with our European friends and how long the calls lasted. That is not what we want to know, Mr. Speaker. What we want to know, and I ask the minister, is whether he is prepared on behalf of the government to refuse to sign any agreement that would not maintain article XI and marketing boards.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly not compete with the hon. member for the number of times we have been to Europe. I know that he would win in that department.

However, I will not allow the member for Lac-Saint-Jean to play politics on the backs of Quebec farmers. Since 1990, when we tabled the Canadian position, it has not changed. It was restated today, and in a common effort, which I hope my colleague will support us in, we offered farm leaders a chance to go with a group of government ministers to Europe to restate the Canadian position once more. There is no difference, no division on the Canadian position. There is no division. Our position is clear. The Prime Minister reaffirmed it this morning. I think that should reassure the hon. member.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): What the minister is telling us, Mr. Speaker, is that he gave farm leaders an opportunity to go with him to Geneva to share the blame for this government's failure with him. The question is simple and I would ask the minister as well not to play politics. Here is a simple question that all farmers in Canada are now asking: Will the government sign an agreement rejecting article XI and marketing boards or will it not?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I believe that we have always said we would defend farmers' interests and the facts are there to prove it. But if my hon. colleague absolutely wants to frighten Quebec farmers, he should rather tell them about the risks of separation for a province and for Quebec farmers who produce 50 per cent of Canada's industrial milk. That danger is much greater. The risk that you would have Quebec farmers run is much greater and farmers will see their interest in staying in Canada to defend milk producers. There is no doubt about that in my mind.

FORESTRY

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Forestry.

About a year ago the forestry subcommittee submitted a report to this House in which it recommended a framework to attain the vision of sustainable development in Canada in concert with provincial jurisdiction for forest management.

In its response the government accepted the concept of a Canada forest accord as a beginning to achieve sustainable development in our forests throughout this nation.

I would like to ask the minister if the Canada forest accord will be signed at the forthcoming National Forestry Congress to be held here March 1.

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, as my friend has said, we are organizing a National Forestry Congress early in March under the auspices of the Canadian Council of Forest Ministers. This congress was preceded by the most extensive public consultation process possible; five regional conferences, the green plan, and of course the committee's report.

I am currently working with my provincial colleagues on the text of an accord, which hopefully all of us could sign, together with special interest groups that have a stake in forestry.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Last week the chairperson of the finance committee called for a 25 per cent reduction in UI benefits. Given that unemployed Canadians already suffer a 40 per cent reduction in income, and considering that a shorter benefit period will reduce the possibility of unemployed Canadians having access to training, I ask the minister to reject the cruel and ruthless comments made by his colleague last week.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, certainly I will not entertain a debate during Question Period on the merits of the UI program. But I do not want to leave untouched a statement that UI recipients will receive less money for training.

If the hon. member would care to look at the record, he will find that in 1992, instead of spending $600 million to train UI recipients, we will spend three times more, $1.8 billion.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, perhaps some training might be in order for the minister.

Many unemployed Canadians do not have access to training because their benefits run out before they are introduced to a program. Many unemployed Canadians do not have access to the training programs because of the severance pay restrictions. These people have a right to training.

Is the minister prepared to ensure that the situation is corrected and provide training opportunities for those unemployed Canadians?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): If the hon. member and the socialist party are concerned about training for Canadians, they should stand up, apologize to the unemployed people and support the principle of activating passive money under UI which they oppose every step of the way.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs and it concerns the Canadian hostage this government has been ignoring for seven years.

In October, the minister told this House they were doing everything they could to find the hostage, Henriette Haddad. She said they had conducted, and I quote: "exhaustive inquiries". She backtracked on that 10 days ago in this House.

Today, however, we read in Le Devoir that neither her sister-in-law nor her niece, the last two persons to have seen her immediately before she was abducted, were ever contacted by Canadian officials.

How does the minister explain this total failure in the discharge of her duties?

[English]

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have been through this case a number of times in this House. Both my officials and myself as the minister have explored all the possibilities we are aware of concerning Madam Haddad. We did the same thing through the United Nations. I raised it when I was at the United Nations in the fall.

Unfortunately, this story has not had a happy ending. Throughout this situation we have maintained close contact with Mrs. Haddad's family.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, not once, not twice, but several times the minister has insisted in this House that she has taken every opportunity available to try and find the only Canadian being held hostage in Lebanon. However, we learned today that the two family members, the last people to see Mrs. Haddad alive, were never contacted by the Canadian government.

How can the minister stand in the House and claim once again that she has done everything possible when she has not even talked to the last few people who saw Mrs. Haddad alive?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I responded to the first question which was the same as the supplementary question.

Let me just say that this has been an unfortunate and tragic situation for the Haddad family. The son of Mrs. Haddad was kind enough to send me a note thanking me for my efforts and those of my department in this case.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for employment.

Today, Dominions Textile announced the closing of its weaving mill in Long Sault, Ontario, and its finishing plant in Saint-Timothée, Quebec. This will mean a loss of job for over 600 Canadian men and women.

[English]

For two years we have been asking the government to implement an economic development program for eastern Ontario.

Given today's announcement by Dominion Textiles, will the minister undertake to provide eastern Ontario with special program status similar to northern Ontario and certain regions of Quebec as it relates to industrial programs?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly ready to look at the specific case which the hon. member raises. The people of eastern Ontario should get the attention they deserve and the programs of my department should be relevant to their needs.

I am ready to look at the situation. Any measures we can take to ease the situation of these workers, I will do.

• (1500)

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

Recognizing that the people working in the Dominion Textile plant at Long Sault need help now, would the minister, at the very least, give his commitment to instruct his officials immediately to provide industry adjustment services in conjunction with the economic development officer for Stormont, Dundas and Glengarry to assist these workers?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation at all in instructing officials of my department to look at this case immediately and provide whatever assistance is possible to these workers.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue.

The abusers of cross-border shopping are diverting billions of dollars out of the pot that pays for our social programs such as medicare, et cetera. Has the minister considered a plan which would deal specifically with abusers of cross-border shopping and their current right to access these programs?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, it is true that every dollar that goes south of the border is a dollar less for our superior social programs or a dollar that could go toward reducing the deficit or a dollar that could go toward reducing taxes.

We have been working on this matter on a regular basis. The announcements that were made by this government just last week go a long way toward creating a level playing field. If the provinces would move toward harmonization it would go even a step further.

Mr. Speaker: I will hear a single question from the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan, followed by a single question from the hon. member for Selkirk.

AIR DISASTER

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

On July 11, 1991, a Nationair DC-8 crashed at Jiddah, Saudi Arabia killing 261 people, including 14 Canadian crew members. Weekend reports in The Montreal Gazette and The Ottawa Citizen detail allegations of improper maintenance and pilot error.

Will the Minister of Transport immediately release the post accident safety review of Nationair, as well as any other inspections conducted by his staff between the accident and particularly after the time he promised this House an increase in surveillance of that airline?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform the hon. member that Nationair, since this unfortunate accident, has been subjected to a most severe inspection by the Department of Transport. Our inspectors have reported that this airline is following the inspection requirements of the Department of Transport.

As far as the inspection reports are concerned, we do not intend to make them public because it would not be in the best interests of the public. These inspections contain confidential information that people gave to us because these reports are kept confidential.

JUSTICE

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, I have a very brief question for the Acting Prime Minister.

In light of the decision made yesterday by the Federal Court of Appeal which allows inmates of federal and provincial prisons to vote in elections, is it the intention of the government to challenge this particular decision?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, officials of the Department of Justice are presently reviewing the decision to see whether or not an appeal is warranted. As well, there is a case in the Ontario Court of Appeal and we are awaiting the decision. The facts are very similar. There is also the recent report of the Electoral Reform Commission.

After reviewing all of these matters, the officials of the Department of Justice and the Minister of Justice will be in a position to consider whether or not to appeal.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankovski that Bill C-56, an act respecting the control of government expenditures, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee E.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When the sitting was suspended at one o'clock, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands had eight minutes left.

I shall therefore give him the floor.

[English]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned at 1 p.m. I was decrying the evils of the bill the government has introduced before the House. The bill itself does not have anything offensive in it. It is just a silly and ridiculous piece of legislation. Frankly as I have indicated before, it is a complete waste of the time of the House.

One of the principal reasons I put forward for the House's consideration as to why the bill is so ridiculous is the holes that it leaves, in what it claims to be its efforts to control government expenditure. There are two principal omissions from this legislation. First, the legislation does not control interest payments on the public debt. Those interest payments are allowed to go unchecked.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order please. I ask the collaboration of all members in this House. The public wants to listen to the intervention of the hon. member.

Mr. Milliken: Frankly, I am pleased that there are members here. At least there are some ministers here now. There were none this morning during my speech. I am delighted that they have re-appeared. Obviously my words have inspired them to greater efforts.

The interest payments on the public debt are excluded from the consideration of this bill. If the interest payments on the public debt go out of control because the government raises interest rates, they are not subject to the over-all government expenditure plan. The deficit could increase out of control every year if interest rates take off and the government is forced to pay more interest on the public debt, or if the government runs up the deficit as it has in the past and forces the interest amounts to increase.

It is fine to say the government has no responsibility for that. With great respect, it does have considerable responsibility for it. If the government was serious about putting a cap on government expenditures, surely it would include interest payments on the public debt, particularly when those interest payments constitute the largest single expense the government has. My recollection is that the government is paying out $38 billion a year. Perhaps my colleague for Sudbury can confirm that figure. I believe it is the interest figure being paid annually by the government at this stage.

Mr. Duhamel: $43 billion.

Mr. Milliken: My friend for St. Boniface suggests that maybe it is $43 billion. Whatever it is, it is a very substantial figure. Those amounts are not subject to any spending restraints under this bill.

This is for restraint of government expenditures but it only applies to certain expenditures. The biggest single one is excluded. The government says it cannot take any responsibility for that, although the responsibility is direct and four-square. It rests clearly on the shoulders of the government. It is charged with managing the Canadian economy, not the opposition, and yet it says it cannot be responsible for that and will exclude it from the bill.

That is the first serious weakness in the bill. It indicates how silly and ridiculous it is for the government to bring forward this kind of legislation in this House. I am glad to see my colleague from Willowdale agrees.

The second aspect of this bill which is so silly is the lack of control on tax expenditures. Members may ask what tax expenditures are. The government may give a tax break to a group in order to induce some particular aspect of the Canadian economy. For example a special writeoff may be given on the development of a gold mine. Those operating the gold mine will not have to pay taxes during a certain development period, and obviously the government will forgo revenue. That is called a tax expenditure. The government gives up its right to tax the gold mine and bring in revenue it might otherwise get.

By introducing its budget the government says that it will give a preferential tax break to certain people in order to induce them to spend their money in a particular way.

It may give a child tax credit, for example, to those who have children to either encourage them to have children, or to assist them in paying the costs of looking after the children.

The tax break is a tax expenditure. It is giving away or forgoing revenue in order to achieve a desired result. This is all perfectly proper, but if you have a cap on expenditures, why would you not also cap tax expenditures?

Yet the government has left itself a free hand to spend the tax dollars that it does not actually bring in. It is saying in this bill that it will limit the amount of tax dollars it spends on everything except the public debt, but will not in any way restrict its right to forgo tax dollars and not bring them into the pot.

In other words, give tax breaks to its wealthy friends, the Tory fat cats. They are the same people who got the tax break when this government took office and have been getting them all along ever since. That is what the government is proposing to do. It is saying it is not going to be hamstrung in any way by legislation in the House of Commons that restricts its ability to give those tax breaks, in other words to make tax expenditures.

If the government was serious about controlling government expenditures, surely it would deal with that issue in a straightforward and responsible way and include that in the bill. It has chosen not to do so.

The third argument against this silly legislation, this ridiculous bill, was made by the minister himself. The poor minister stood there, and really he must have been very embarrassed to have to introduce this kind of legislation in the House.

Yet his argument was that if any government wants to change this in future, when it introduces its budget making the change, it will have to introduce an amendment to this act as well. Imagine, what could be simpler?

If you do not like the restrictions in the bill, you introduce your budget proposing higher expenditures and in the budget you announce there will be changes to this bill. It happens every day in every budget.

The government announces that there will be tax changes. It announces the tax changes in the budget and then it introduces a bill to amend the Income Tax Act. That is all it is going to do with this bill. It is exactly the same thing.

This is nothing but a scam as the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood so ably says. This is ridiculous. It is silly and it should not be allowed.

The ministers of the Crown who have an obligation to be here and participate in debate absent themselves from this Chamber when government bills are under discussion. It is a national disgrace.

If they are going to bring in silly bills like this, the least they can do is sit here and listen to the debate. They choose to absent themselves in their entirety, 39 of them. It is wrong. They have an obligation as members of this House to sit here when government legislation is under consideration.

If they are going to propose something so stupid, the least they can do is listen to the debate.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I should just like to point out to the hon. member that the presence or absence of members is always a touchy issue and that his remark could apply to member on both sides of this House this morning. We shall now proceed to the question and comment period. The hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): I think you would have to agree that when we have close to 3 million people in this country out of work and the fishery plants are closing down in Atlantic Canada, it can be very frustrating when you get a sense that the government is not listening to anything we say on this side of the House.

To add insult to injury, the government brings in a bill today that obviously signals it has no legislative agenda. There is absolutely no prepared legislation on that side of the House that will enable us as national parliamentarians, to pass programs that will put people back to work.

The people of Canada should know what the government does because of this absence of a legislative agenda. They throw in some little smoke and mirrors bill, as my colleague from Kingston and the Islands has described so properly before. If he gets a little frustrated, it is only a mirror of the frustration of the people of Canada.

My question to my colleague from Kingston and The Islands has to do with the millions of people who are unemployed in this country who are looking to us as national politicians to address this issue. He is a man who has spent thousands of hours on the floor of this House, enabling legislation to pass quickly when it was constructive. Does he not feel that it would be a much more effective use of our time as parliamentarians to be debating issues and legislation that would put people back to work? Could he please address that in terms of how the process works and what we really could be doing in this House to address the number one problem this country faces?

Mr. Milliken: I thank my hon. colleague for his question. I quite agree with him that we would be far better off debating legislation that tries to assist in getting Canadians back to work.

In the course of his question, I pulled out my copy of the Order Paper to see if there was anything the government had on its list of bills that we could be discussing that dealt with this kind of subject. I looked in vain. I did not see anything that is proposed by the government at this stage that would create jobs for Canadians. I suspect this government has no idea what to do. I think it is paralyzed with fear. It is afraid of a defeat at the polls which it knows is imminent. It has no idea how to create jobs in this country. It was elected on the promise of jobs, jobs, jobs.

It claimed credit throughout the years the economy was growing so well as a result of the policies of the previous Liberal government which they did not change. In my earlier comments this morning, I pointed out how it said if it did not change them and get expenditures under control, government expenditures on programs would be up about 56 per cent, I think it was, by 1990–91. In fact it was up by 69 per cent because it did not change them. It augmented the programs of the previous government and there was prosperity for many years in Canada. The government did what Nero did—he fiddled while Rome burned—because the underlying problems in the economy were not being addressed. The underlying problems of the government debt were not being addressed in those boom years and now it comes into a time of financial crisis. It has worked itself into a state of apoplexy because it doubled the national debt and realized that the interest payments were becoming quite crippling. Then it said it had no more money to spend on job creation programs. So it sat and cut back on funding for job creation programs—

Mr. Mills: On training.

Mr. Milliken: And on training—a vital statement by my hon. colleague—at the very time when Canadians needed them most. It is a complete dereliction of responsibility and duty that the government has exhibited here. The training scam is exemplified—oh, a minister has come back, we can rejoice—by the fact that it has introduced this bill C–21 which cuts back benefits to the unemployed at a time when unemployment is going up. It cut back the availability of funding for training. Then it sticks the whole cost of training on to the shoulders of the private sector, the workers and their employers, instead of shouldering its own responsibilities which Liberal governments have taken as essential in this country, and with the support of the NDP I am glad to say.

Now we see this change in policy, these cuts, this slashing, at a time when the economy needs exactly the opposite kind of treatment. It is the wrong policy.

[Translation]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have three questions which I will try to answer. My first question is: What is the exact nature of this bill? My second: Why is it being tabled today? And my third: Are there alternatives to the solutions proposed by the government?

[English]

What is C–56? On the surface it states it will control the expenditures over five years to an average increase of 3 per cent. That is what the paper says. I find it really astonishing that it talks about the control of expenditures, and that is important, but it does not set any deficit or debt targets. With the deficit and the debt being as serious a problem as it is today and the fact that they talk about it often is something that I would have believed they would have attacked in this particular piece of legislation, that they would have tried to do something about it.

Why is the government introducing this particular piece of legislation, this control on expenditures? On paper it looks really good. Perhaps the government believes that the Canadian public will believe that this is really going to make a difference. Is it really a serious effort? If it is such a good idea, why was it not introduced sooner? The Conservatives have been in power for seven years or so. Or, is it nothing perhaps but smoke and mirrors, a lot of glitz, propaganda to try to make people believe that finally they have taken control of things? They have not taken control of things. They have not. The government is actually reaping what it has sowed. What has it sowed?

We know that there was a made-in-Canada recession. The Prime Minister indicated that. We know that there has been a continued high dollar. We know that interest rates have been extremely high. They have come down a bit, but the real interest rate, the difference between inflation and the actual interest rate, is still really significant. We know that this country has 5 million Canadians living at the level of poverty or below, most of whom are women, over 1 million of whom are children or young adolescents. We know that there are 2 million people as we speak who are on social assistance, that there will be 2 million Canadians who will be fed by food banks this year. We know that there are roughly 1.5 million unemployed Canadians right now, perhaps more, people who have given up, people who do not believe it is worth looking anymore. We know that a lot of these people, the majority, want to work. They desperately want a job to which they can make a commitment.

We know that the government's deficit this year is in the neighbourhood of $30 million, and will probably be in excess of that in spite of the fact that the interest rates came down. That should have saved it some money. We know that the debt is in excess of $400 billion. There is an interesting dialogue, debate, discussion about the interest rate.

I want to introduce into my address today a direct quote from an answer from the former minister of finance, the present Minister for International Trade, to my question as to what the debt really was at the end of the fiscal year that they came into power. I read for the fiscal year 1983–84 the figure for the national debt at the end of that year was $167.985 million. I want to read that into the record because of the debate as to what it really was. Some people like to exaggerate, to suggest that perhaps the fact that it is more than double is not nearly as serious a matter as a lot of people would like to pretend it is. It is a serious matter. It has more than doubled. It has more than doubled because the government underestimated the impact. Surely when you buy a company and it has a debt, you fold that into your planning. You make sure that you take that into consideration. You do not go forward and behave as if you had no debt. When the Conservatives took over government they should have done the same thing.

It is also interesting to note that Canada's debt is growing faster than all of the G–7 countries with the exception of Italy. That should be troubling for all of us who are really quite concerned. We should note as well that the debt service charges as a percentage of our gross domestic productivity has continually increased since this government took office.I think that is an accurate statement. I have checked it out and I am told that it is. Obviously that is a serious matter as well.

What is it that it has done to try to control expenditures besides bring in this piece of legislation today. You and I both know that it has been off–loading in a massive kind of way to the provinces. We have talked often about off–loading health, education and social assistance programs. In fact, just recently it was talking about a particular bill that dealt with the capping of social assistance to the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario.

I have mentioned time and time again in this House that between the years 1986 and 1995, almost a decade, there would be 30 billion fewer dollars transferred to provinces for health and education matters. I find that shocking in spite of these massive reductions, these cuts, the slashing that the deficit is still where it was for the last 6, 7, 8, 9, 10 years and the debt has more than doubled.

We have to take it in the context of the revenue as well. If you owe a certain amount of money, the next natural question is how much do you earn, what are your assets? It is rather interesting to note that the government's revenue since it came into power has increased by roughly $60 billion. It is not far from doubling its revenue. The obvious question is where has all Canadians' money, in the form of taxes, gone? In spite of these massive tax increases, 34 with the goods and services tax, an increase of $60 billion roughly in revenue, the deficit is roughly at the same position and the debt has more than doubled. We are losing ground in spite of the fact that we are paying more and more.

The government, in introducing this legislation, will cite the U.S. experience with similar types of legislation. I would like to draw attention to two or three points. First of all, we have different systems of government. Virtually everyone is aware of that. The legislation is significantly different. What is not well known, and what has not been repeated often, is that this U.S. legislation has not been terribly successful. The U.S. has had to go back and adjust its targets in order to make them fit its estimates, and so on.

To try and give people some reassurance is the thing to do when they are upset about the deficit and the debt. In terms of what it will actually accomplish, there are serious doubts in my mind and in the minds of many people who have studied this legislation, looked at the critiques and have thought about the legislation.

I repeat that the government's intention, at least on paper, is to control the expenditures. It may or may not do that. I am not trying to suggest that the government has simply done this and that in order to try to fool people, but there is an element of that. I am troubled by that.

This bill says nothing about the possibility of giving tax concessions to friends, and I say friends in the broadest sense of the term. It could create a number of loopholes that would still favour individuals, that would still contradict or counteract some of those expenditure controls that are in place. That is really unfortunate. I should point out that not only is this my criticism, but government members of the finance committee have raised this same point.

The government imposes limits on spending based upon certain assumptions being made right now, obviously. We see this in the control of spending over five years to an average of 3 per cent, as I indicated initially. It has to make assumptions about inflation, interest rates and unemployment rates. Those are three variables, and there are probably others.

If we were to go back and review the assumptions and the predictions that were made in previous exercises, we would find that the targets were way, way off. The targets did not resemble reality once that reality came to be. If that is correct, we need to ask a couple of other questions. What should give us confidence that those predictions, those assumptions that the government has to make will be better than those of the past? There is no evidence to that effect. If you build a model based on certain assumptions, how can you have confidence in that model? You really cannot.

Therefore, I am led to that great suspicion that this looks good, sounds good and is going to fool some people, but really will do nothing to attack the root problems of the deficit, the debt and the economic situation that is troubling Canadians today; a very serious one indeed.

I want to point out as well that there is a possibility, and I can assure you that others have thought about it, that the government could go on a spending binge. We are very close to an election, we all know that. It could be weeks, months or perhaps a year away. The government could make a number of promises, recognizing that if it were re-elected, it would have to deal with it and it would do so as best it could. It could make those promises, recognizing that it might not be re-elected, and really stick it to the party that forms the next government.

There are controls in place and those controls are obviously there as a result of decisions made by previous administrations. That makes me awfully nervous and I suspect it would make some other Canadians extremely nervous as well.

I say gently that the intent on the part of certain individuals is no doubt rather noble, but it is rather naive. It is simplistic. The problems are much more complex than this. This bill will probably end up being nothing but window dressing. It will look good but it will not do the job.

What do we do? The first thing we need to do is restore the confidence of the Canadian people in their politicians and in their political parties. As well, we need to ensure that we do not over-react to the deficit and debt. We need to take it seriously, responsibly, without losing our bearings. If we start reacting too strongly one way or the other, Canadians will not believe us. Therefore, we need to re-establish confidence in political parties and in politicians.

We need to state very honestly what needs to be done with the deficit and debt, and where we are going to get the funds to address the serious overspending. We need to address some of the serious economic and social problems of the nation. We need to be up front. Once we have done that we will have gone a long way in establishing the right kind of climate so that people can once again believe that we might get this situation under control.

We also need to get people back to work. If we were able to get people back to work, the debate in this country on a number of issues would calm down and would become much more rational. We would have people contributing much more than they are now to our country's future.

We need to get people off the unemployment insurance lists. While they are there they are costing us money. They are not there because they want to be, but because there is no choice, there are no alternatives. If they were able to get back to work, they would be contributing rather than being a drain on the treasury.

We need to get them off the social assistance programs because those are debilitating. They make you feel as if you do not belong, as if you are not important any more, as if you are not doing what you ought to be doing. It is a lose, lose and lose again situation.

The dollar really needs to be looked at. We know what would happen if there were a lower dollar. We need to ensure that the interest rates continue to come down. A lot of people are saying that they are really down quite a bit, and they are, but let us look at the difference between inflation and actual interest rates. Let us look at the difference between the interest rates in the U.S. and the interest rates in Canada. There is still a lot of work to be done.

I would like to remind my colleagues in this House that there have been some proposals made. I have made a few and I am going to refer to some proposals that have been made by my own party.

In his emergency plan for the economy proposed a few days ago, the Hon. Jean Chrétien, Leader of the Liberal Party, asked for an initial downpayment of 5 per cent on the purchase of a first home. He felt it was a way to stimulate the economy. He mentioned the possibility of people using an RRSP of $7,500 to purchase their first home, which would also help put people back to work, stimulate the economy, create jobs and restore the confidence of those who are now unemployed. He indicated the need for shared-cost programs to update community infrastructures. He talked about a number of projects that could be carried out in our cities, our towns, and the provinces in general, again to create employment and ensure that people can get back to work and start feeling a lot better than they feel now.

He also said that he wanted to intensify basic manpower training, because he realized that basic skills were not sufficiently developed. This was a way to ensure that in the near future people would be able to go back to work and contribute fully to our society.

Finally, in his fifth point he mentioned federal emergency assistance for food banks. At the beginning of my speech, I mentioned that two million Canadians would be fed by food banks this year. I think that is terribly sad. And 40 per cent of those Canadians will be children and teenagers.

Mr. Speaker, you will recall that a month ago, the leader of my party, the Hon. Jean Chrétien, proposed a long-term recovery program. I would like to remind my colleagues of these proposals:

Rebuild the industrial fabric of Canada by slowing disindustrialization; by bridging the gap between Canadian and American interest rates, in particular real interest rates, and by lowering the value of the Canadian dollar. We also asked for a fair fiscal policy.

Third, to implement effective retraining programs.

Fourth, to ensure a more balanced economic growth.

And, finally, to take on an important budgetary responsibility. I would like to conclude by discussing this last point. It seems to me that if we took on an important budgetary responsibility, we could reach the goal proposed here in a very flexible, honest, professional and effective way.

In concluding, I simply want to say that yes, on paper, the intent of Bill C-56 could be seen as being rather noble, and it might even look as though there is some need for that legislation. However, when you analyse this piece of legislation, when you look at it as a whole, you find some serious deficiencies. The government intends to tighten controls as regards expenses, and that is important, but there are all kinds of ways to thwart that intention. We are also very aware that what has occurred, that is the passing of the tax burden to provinces, will become an even more common occurrence. Then you realize that the tax burden of the provinces is already very heavy for some of them; in fact, it is extremely heavy.

So, if I look at all this, I firmly believe that some of my colleagues from the government think this is a good idea, that those are good intentions, and I accept that. However, I am well aware that some people have already spent enough time in a bureaucratic environment to know very well that this effort, this initiative, will look very good and that it might even fool some people and make them believe that this a substantial measure. Yet, in the end you will see that the achievement will be a rather small one.

Nevertheless, I wish the government luck. There is no denying that the control of the deficit and of the debt is a very important issue. Let us not forget the most important thing, which is to put Canadians back to work, to restore their confidence again in their country and in the political parties that try to govern our great and beautiful country. I thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment my colleague on his remarks. Once again we have heard from this side of the House that we do have ideas over here and we are putting them forward in a constructive way. Quite often we hear the government during this debate saying that we are not putting forward ideas. We are also respecting the concerns of the deficit and debt of this country.

My colleague from St. Boniface has had lots of experience, being a former deputy minister in the field of education in the province of Manitoba. My question to him has to do with training.

I have constituents coming into my office weekly saying to me that the government is always talking about training, retraining and more training and that people are putting funds into it. Time after time people come into my office with concerns about applying for these training courses. I had a specific example last Saturday in which a constituent of mine, Billy Turner from Wolfrey Avenue, came in with his file and said: "When I go to George Brown College, Humber College or York University they all tell me they have run out of money. There are no more funds. The cupboard is bare".

• (1540)

Last week the Minister of Employment and Immigration kept talking about money for training and retraining. The Minister of Industry, Science and Technology talked about it yesterday. Yet all I hear is that there is no money in these programs when people apply.

As an educator, and I ask my colleague specifically as a former leader in this field, does he not think that the government is being irresponsible by not finding the necessary funds to train and retrain these people, especially when they are in the ranks of the unemployed?

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood for a question that is extremely important.

There are several dimensions to his question that I want to respond to. The first one is, yes, we need to find money to respond to people's needs today because those individuals who are not being served cost the state money. They are on unemployment insurance, on social assistance, or on some other government program that does not help them very often to get back into the work force. It is a drain, and I do not say that in the pejorative sense. They are entitled to a quality of life, but at the same time the possibilities of significant quality are not great under the current circumstances for many of them. Yes, we need to respond.

What happens very often is that a certain number of dollars are put forward and people believe those dollars are going to respond to need. It is very difficult to predict how much is going to be required. We need to make predictions, but at the same time if we have underestimated or overestimated we need to respond in kind.

It is morally wrong for any man or woman who is willing to work, who is willing to take a retraining program, not to be accepted into a program immediately. One cannot wait six, nine or twenty–four months. It is not right. It is unfair. It does not resolve the problem. They are demoralized even more. They are made to believe that they cannot fit in. All of a sudden, once they have lost confidence, they could be on an assistance program for the rest of their lives.

The question the member raised is a fundamental one. The only thing I would like to point out is that we may need more models of delivery. That is not chastising the universities or the community colleges, but there is a variety of clientele out there. There are single parents. There are young workers and older workers. There are people who have been in the work force and who no longer have jobs and cannot move out of the community to another job. We need a number of models to respond to the needs of Canadians, particularly right now when we are talking about 1.5 million people on unemployment insurance and almost 2 million on social assistance programs.

To recapitulate, we need to make those funds available. Otherwise we are fooling ourselves. One can survive on eating a meal today, but for how long? Of course one does not have to respond fully, but for how long? Yes, we need to respond immediately.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I was wondering if the member and his party will be supporting the bill and the views expressed in it that the minister, when he presents his budget on Tuesday next, cannot present a budget showing a spending in excess of $1.9 billion. Will he be going over that expenditure program with his colleagues to make sure that no more than that much money is spent?

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for the question.

He can rest assured that I shall be studying this bill additionally, talking to my colleagues, and voting appropriately when the time comes. I am taking this matter very seriously. I indicated before that I think some people had good intentions with this bill. My concern is: Will it actually do the job?

I also indicated, I had to be fair, that while some of my colleagues on the government side no doubt thought this would do the job, there are others who were smart enough to know that it would not do the job but was going to con a lot of people.

I have not made up my mind yet as to whether or not I should or should not because I have mixed feelings.

I know that some people believe this is important. I also know that it is full of loopholes through which one could drive Mack trucks. That is one question.

The other one is with respect to the budget. My hon. friend can rest assured that I shall be looking at that budget line by line by line. I will even do more than that. I can guarantee that as well.

I shall continue to look at the budget in relationship to the expenditures that this government undertakes and in relationship to any loopholes it may take advantage of to get around the 3 per cent expenditure guideline. He has my word on that.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I find it somewhat strange that the former chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance is asking that question. He knows very well that if the will were there, the government would not need that bill, a bill respecting the control of government expenditures.

We have a parliamentary democracy and the majority carries. In 1984, I would like to remind the hon. member from Mississauga, the revenues of the government were $70 billion and the expenditures were $109 billion.

By 1989–90 the revenues had risen to $112 billion but the expenditures were $142 billion. There was an increase in taxes collected of over $40 billion. In 1984 the government had the mandate to cut expenditures but there was no will. As I said before it was spending like a drunken sailor.

Now suddenly, because it is the end of the second term, it has decided to fool the electorate. It is telling us that it is going to bring in a bill respecting government expenditures. I think the member from Mississauga knows very well that this can be done without legislation.

We are not living in the United States but in Canada where we have a parliamentary democracy.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his particular points. I would like to remind him that my figures suggest revenue increases by $60 billion, not $40 billion. I think my figures are correct.

My hon. colleague who asked the last question knows perfectly well that where there is a will there is a way.

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I hope Canadians who are watching and listening to this debate will have listened to the interjections of the last two members and have seen just how this issue of debt and deficit can be viewed in a black and white manner. Some members of this Chamber are accusing the government of having spent its way into massive problems, and other members are chastising the government for attempting to curb its own spending. I hope Canadians recognize very clearly that a lot of rhetoric goes on in this Chamber.

I would like to speak briefly to this bill. I start by reviewing for Canadians very briefly what it is we are debating, what this piece of legislation is intended to do. Essentially this bill will put a limit on federal program spending between fiscal year 1991–92 and fiscal year 1995-96. I am personally pleased to be able to speak to this bill. I am delighted that it is in this Chamber. I am delighted that the government accepted it and that it is on its way to becoming the law of the land. I say that because I personally lobbied the Minister of Finance in order to try to get legislation of exactly this nature.

As part of the budget of a year ago, this legislation was brought in to provide control on federal spending so that the deficit of the Government of Canada could be reduced and we could start tackling the level of debt that has been built up in this country. To make sure that spending is restrained, the budget proposed this bill which says that by law the Government of Canada has to restrain its spending. I think this is a very significant point. We are removing from my hands as a member of Parliament and the hands of my colleagues in the Chamber the opportunity, the possibility, the power to increase spending in a runaway fashion.

A draft version of the bill has been reviewed by the House. It went to committee where it was tightened up. A few changes were made, I think for the better. What the bill essentially says to Canadians now is: "Listen, you are going to get a guarantee on spending from this government, because the law says that higher taxes cannot be used to finance higher spending and that new programs will have to be funded within the total amount of money the government already has". That is pretty significant.

The budget that came down a year ago was essentially a budget with a guarantee. We have a guarantee in this bill that the government has limits placed on how much it can spend. We know exactly what those are going to be for the next five years. Taxpayers have a guarantee that the government is not going to revert to the bad old days of runaway spending.

Second, in that budget the government created the debt servicing and reduction fund which was a new national bank account. Consider it a national personal savings account.

The third guarantee was that all the extra revenue above what was collected and the taxes it replaced, all those extra GST revenues, were going to be placed into this new national bank account and used solely for the reduction of the federal deficit. It was a budget with a guarantee and it was something quite radical. We had not really seen that kind of budget before.

Over the past 20 years we saw the usual dance of finance ministers who came along and gave us a lot of projections and a lot of promises and there was nothing behind them. There was no teeth. There was no legislation. There was nothing forcing them to obtain their goals and targets. Nothing like this bill has come before this House before. It is radical and significant and different.

In order to maintain the integrity of Canada's social programs and to help people in need, there have to be some exemptions from restraint on spending and this bill is no exception to that. There will be exemptions for emergencies such as unexpected flooding. Self-financing programs like unemployment insurance are exempted because they are just that, self-funding.

The real kicker in this particular bill is the provision for overspending. Let's say that members of this House decide to defy the law. Let's say that we vote on legislation which pushes spending over. Let's say we approve a budget that the Minister of Finance brings in that violates the spirit of this. If overspending occurs, what happens then? We owe it to Canadian taxpayers to explore this. If the government spends more than it said it would, what is going to happen?

This bill will put into law that if spending exceeds the limit for any one year, the amount of that overspending has to be made up through spending cuts within two years. It is simple and straightforward, a very direct concept. If the government spends too much in one year and violates the law then in each of the other two years it has to cut. That only makes sense.

In terms of compliance, the finance minister would not be allowed to present a budget that is inconsistent with the act and the annual public accounts would contain a statement saying that they conform to the act.

As a third guarantee we get the Auditor General involved. The Auditor General reports to Parliament on whether or not the act has been complied with.

That is what we are debating. That is exactly what this legislation proposes, and I for one support it but not blindly. I would like to tell the House why I support it. I do not support it just because I am a member of the political party that is forming the government now. It is very close to some of the reasons I wanted to be in this place, why I wanted to be in Parliament. I believe the people are saying it is time they had more of an impact on the system. It is time some of the authority and power of politicians to spend their money as taxpayers was removed. It is time there was a constraint, a system, a structure, a mechanism, some form, guarantee, promise, or hope they will have as taxpayers, that the people who go to Ottawa and become members of Parliament do not waste money and overspend. I think the people are saying that. I have had some experience listening to them say that.

I remember a year and a half ago travelling to a small town in southern Ontario called Blenheim. The folks in Blenheim got fed up with property taxes that were going up for one reason or another. It was mostly because of the usual problems we have in this country with too many levels of government, too much overlap and duplication, too many governments trying to do the same thing with one set of taxpayers' pockets and five sets of taxes. We only need to look at two sets of school buses rumbling down the road to see that. We only need to look at the road grader that starts at one county garage and goes down to the town line, and the other country road grader comes up to meet it.

It is only common sense and the people in Blenheim saw that. They saw it there at highway 401 where there were four garages beside each other, one for the province, one for the county, one for the municipality and one for who knows what. They saw all that. They looked at their property tax bills which had gone up 200 per cent in some cases. They said that was enough. They withheld their taxes. It is a pretty radical thing to do. You can do it with property taxes but you cannot with other levels of taxation. People struck back.

I went to Blenheim and spent a day there at the high school auditorium. I met with people to try to find out why they did this. It was pretty radical stuff. What did they propose for other levels of government? What did they think ought to be the solutions? The people were eloquent, articulate and simple in their response. They said there were too many governments and too many sets of taxes. There was too much waste and inefficiency and the governments were without controls and mechanisms of accountability.

Do you know what? They were right. We do. That is why I can support this kind of legislation which gives us a structure, a ceiling, a roof on the kind of spending we are capable of doing.

That little experience in Blenheim, Ontario has been interesting, and I have been following it for several months. Out of it was created an organization called the Ontario Taxpayers Coalition. The last time I talked to the organizers several tens of thousands of people had joined. The interesting thing about the organization is that it is not composed of the usual kind of protesters we see out on the lawn of Parliament Hill. They are average middle class folks who are a little bit scared of what they are doing and not quite sure what to do next. They do not know much about mobilizing and do not have any organizers. They are generally plain, ordinary Canadian taxpayers who have come together to try to send a message to us, the politicians; the political leaders at the municipal, federal, provincial and regional levels.

Part of the message I think is concerned with this bill. I think they like this. I think the people want it. I think the people are asking for more of that. I have heard the same in my own riding at town hall meetings where people stood up night after night and asked why we don't have a balanced budget; why we don't have some sort of rules somewhere that say the government cannot go into debt; why we don't have something in the Constitution that says you shall have a balanced budget within a certain period of time.

My hon. friend across the way is hollering at me that this does not answer those questions. I will admit that. But what I see here is a very large and powerful step on that path. I really see a government attempt to try to move in that direction.

The questions are in my mail too. I get them when I travel and from the people I visit and talk to at town hall meetings. Let me read you a little bit of my mail. This is from William McGrath of Acton, Ontario: "We must cut programs to control spending. We have become a welfare state. Our children will pay for this folly".

Arthur Dixon in Cheltenham: "Reduce the deficit. I would pay my own share and that of my family in the shortest time if I believed we could really achieve it".

Harold Denny from Acton, Ontario: "Government should do the same as all private business is doing and tighten its belt until it really hurts. We have to cut our spending to the very bone and eliminate all frills, credit, etc. just to survive the recession. It will be a long, tough struggle. I know, because I started to work in the depression of the thirties, but it can be done".

Kevin Gray in Burlington: "The number one way in which everyone's future will look promising is to get the deficit under control, if not obliterated. It just isn't fair to the upcoming generation. Something eventually has to give".

Stan McNeice of Bolton, Ontario: "Living in the greatest and wealthiest country, Canada, can only be protected if our news media, newspapers, TV and radio people could be educated into the dangers of the debt and be given some happy thoughts instead of all the sad ones". That is an interesting suggestion.

Arnel Ranger from Acton, Ontario: "My future, my family's future, and Canada's future are all headed for a big fall. We have all lived beyond our means for too many years. It is now pay-back time. Greed, jealousy and envy have put us where we are today".

Catherine McDonald, Caledon East: "Eliminate some levels of government. Reduce the number of politicians at every level. Reduce the number of grants to "do good" agencies. We don't need to be coddled from the cradle to the grave. Reduce defence, reduce the deficit".

A. L. Campagnolo, Caledon East: "If things continue the way they are going, I see Canada becoming a third world country with all the consequences for my family. Unless the government starts governing the way it should; learning to say 'no'; stops spending the money it does not have; starts repaying the principal on the deficit, we shall not have a future to speak of. We need statesmen, not politicians, and we need them to make tough decisions which people will understand. Free trade may be one of them, but it is not the only one of them, certainly not in its present form".

Norman Klenman from Ganges, British Columbia: "There is simply no practical alternative. The Prime Minister, the cabinet and the caucus are doing manful work in terrible times. There is simply no money to spend on programs and initiatives which might earn popularity".

J. W. Cargill from Bolton, Ontario: "I will feel happier when Canada starts living within its means. We have nothing for that rainy day and are being forced to borrow more and more against the future. With close to half the national debt owing to foreigners, it's pretty scary".

Finally, from Betty Sherman in Terra Cotta, Ontario: "Until a way can be found to reinculcate such values as self-reliance, responsibility, pride of workmanship and recognition of individual merit in Canadian attitudes, I cannot find much real optimism about turning the country around. Prospects in Ontario under a socialist government are even especially more discouraging. A lessening of government intrusion in our lives might help to restore some incentive, if it is not already too late".

Those are a lot of different voices coming from a lot of different Canadians. They are all taxpayers, and all want the government to spend less and not more.

I might just quickly address the reasons some of my colleagues across the way do not want this bill to be put into place and state their opposition to it. This particular piece of legislation would restrict government spending and hold down the increases in government spending for five long years. Some of the people on the other side of this Chamber believe the government will change at the next election and they will be on this side. I don't pretend to know what is going to happen, but I do know that Canadians will finally have a guarantee that whatever happens to the government; whatever the complexion of this Parliament is after the next election; whatever bunch of people the taxpayers send to Ottawa to run Canada, spend Canada's money and put money in Canada's bank account; will have to live by a law that says they cannot overspend. That is pretty simple. That is what this bill says. We will have a law that says members of Parliament cannot overspend any more. If we had this law over the last 10 years we would not be in the situation we are in now. Whether deficits were run up in years past for good reasons or bad, whether the social causes were valid or frivolous does not matter. They were run up, they existed and the deficit got to where it was affecting our debt so much that today we are crippled with $40 billion of interest every year on the debt. If the law had been in place, we would not have the mess today. If this law is put into place, I am sure we will have fewer messes tomorrow and in the years that come.

Those people on the other side do not want the bill because, I gather, they do not want to be constrained and have limits put on the government's ability to spend; a government they feel they might form.

We are in changed times. We are in the 90s now. We are in a time where we face a whole new set of demands, pressures and challenges, quite unlike things that faced Canada before. We all know the world is becoming globalized in terms of trade and world economy. We know there is competition around the globe for capital. They sure need a lot of it in eastern Europe and Russia. They need a lot of it around the world. We need a lot of it. We need $40 billion a year to pay the interest on the debt. Globalization and the search for capital and competitiveness is very concerning. We must get more competitive and we will never become competitive while 30, 35 or 40 cents of every taxpayer's dollar is dissipated in interest payments on the debt.

The 90s demand something different and I think what they demand from a lot of us is what the 1860s demanded of a lot of Americans. I would like to end this with a few words of a man who was very hated within his time. But he was a great man and knew how to read what his country needed then. I think it is what our country needs today. This is what Abraham Lincoln said:

> You cannot bring about prosperity by discouraging thrift. You cannot strengthen the weak by weakening the strong. You cannot help little men by tearing down big men. You cannot help the wage earner by tearing down the wage payer. You cannot further brotherhood of man by encouraging class hatred. You cannot help the poor by destroying the rich. You cannot establish sound security on borrowed money. You cannot keep out of trouble by spending more than you earn. You cannot build character and courage by taking away man's initiative and independence and you cannot help men permanently by doing for them what they should, and could do for themselves.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): I would like to ask the hon. member a question. He seems very strong on this bill. I am not sure why because I think if he had listened to my speech, he would have realized the serious deficiencies in the legislation. He keeps claiming this bill is somehow going to solve Canada's deficit problems. All the letters from his constituents dealt with that, but the bill in fact, as he must recognize, does absolutely nothing to help the deficit since it can be changed at every opportunity.

I looked through the bill and it is quite a short one. I was looking for the enforcement mechanism. The hon. member says this bill will force governments to do this or to do that. Well, almost every bill I have seen has a provision in it that if there is a violation of the bill, if the provision is breached in any way, the offender is then brought before a court and either fined or imprisoned.

I looked in vain for any clause that would put the Minister of Finance in the slammer if he violated this bill. I wonder if the hon. member would be prepared to vote against the bill at second reading to ensure that an amendment was made to it providing that a Minister of Finance who operated in breach of the legislation would in fact suffer some penalty. Perhaps all the members of the cabinet could suffer some penalty, like resigning, because if we had such a provision in this bill when it was passed in 1984, this government would have been out long ago. We would probably have a better government in Canada today. Would he agree to an amendment like that to this bill?

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): Of course not. It is not criminal legislation. It is legislation which puts constraints on the spending limits of the government.

The bill, in declaring fairly categorically that if overspending occurred one year spending cuts would have to be made in the following two years to make up for that, is a pretty decent start.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): I was listening with interest to the hon. member when he was speaking. He was reading all those letters from his constituents telling him that we should cut spending.

The government of this day, the government that was elected in 1984, has spent more than any other government in Canadian history in the shortest period of time. The debt at that point in 1984 was $180 billion and now it is $400 billion.

What is very interesting is that the foreign debt was very low. But now 25 per cent of Canada's debt is owed to foreign banks, to the International Monetary Fund, to the World Bank and other bankers. So really our situation has deteriorated.

I am wondering why at the end of its second mandate suddenly the government side sees the light and says that it has to cut spending. It had the opportunity to have better managed the economy. It has not done so and now it brings us a bill that is full of loopholes. This bill does not mean anything.

I would like to ask the member just one question because he talked so much about the need for people to have input.

For instance, Switzerland has binding referendums on any legislation. Would he be in favour that in Canada we establish a binding referendum? If people were not happy they could have a referendum and say to the government that it is overspending or that it should do this or that. Is he in favour of such legislation?

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): In terms of the numbers my hon. friend quotes, I would just like to clarify what is the financial situation of the government.

In 1984, the government was spending $16 billion a year more on programs than it was taking in in taxes. That has been reduced through tax increases and financial management to the point where $16 billion in the hole for program spending has now been turned into a $12 billion surplus on program spending. From $16 billion in the hole, spending more than we took in, we now take in $12 billion more than we spend on programs.

Mrs. Marleau: How do you explain the deficit?

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): I will explain the deficit, so listen very carefully to this.

There is a $12 billion surplus this year, yet the interest on the debt is $42 billion. Take $42 billion on the debt interest, remove $12 billion of it because that is our operating surplus this year and we end up with net requirements of $30 billion which is roughly the deficit. We still have a deficit because our surplus is not yet big enough to pay all the interest on the debt.

So Canadians can ask: When is the government's surplus going to be enough to pay all the interest on the debt? That is the real question. When the government has enough surplus to pay the interest, we have no more deficit. When is that going to happen? We will find out next Tuesday in the budget.

But the projections at this point are that in fiscal year 1994–95 we have zero deficit because we have got enough in surplus tax revenues to be able to handle all the interest payments on the debt.

It is simple. It is like having a mortgage, not making enough money to make the mortgage payments, and going further into debt. That is the situation Canada has been in for years.

But when there is enough income and finally the mortgage payments can be paid, then you are not going into debt any more. That is where we are leading. That is the most important point and it is amazing how the members opposite lose interest once you start to explain it.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to that explanation with a lot of interest.

One thing that the hon. member would have to agree with is that that explanation and that answer is very different from the commitment that they made to the Canadian people in 1984.

They did not say they would reduce program expenditures below taxation. They did not give the kind of complicated explanations that he has just given now to justify patting himself and his Minister of Finance on the back.

They said that they would reduce the deficit. What Canadians understood from that was that the deficit would be lower as a result of electing a Conservative government than it had been before. It is higher.

The question I want to ask the hon. member is this. Suppose the government as the next election approaches comes up with a fancy new idea that will cost a lot of money and thinks will help it get re-elected.

This so-called limit I ask the member, is this not legislation of restraint? Is this not something that can be covered in one simple clause in an amending bill on day care or some other new program the government might decide to do?

Can it not do away with this so-called limitation it is imposing on itself just by having one small paragraph in that new piece of legislation? Like the unemployment insurance bill or the other programs which are exempted, it would say that this new spending program would be exempted. Can this bill not be circumvented by the government just as easily as that?

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, the short answer is no. Any overspending has to be made up by spending cuts within two years.

In error, I did not respond fully to my colleague across the way to the second part of his question which had to do with binding referenda.

He asked me whether I would support that or not. I have no problem with the concept of referenda. I do not think it would be particularly wise or economical to put every piece of legislation as he suggests to a vote by the Canadian people. Bear in mind the last federal election cost around $100 million.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before resuming debate, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for St. Boniface—Youth Programs; the hon. member for Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville—Pornography; the hon. member for Malpèque—Unemployment Insurance; the hon. member for Victoria—Nuclear Vessels; the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake—Western Grain Transportation Act.

[English]

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to participate in the debate on this bill because it brings once again into the forefront of Canadian politics some ideas, some concepts. It is interesting to spend a moment or two looking at their origins.

This particular concept came out of the United States of America. I suppose in these days of free trade and integrating our two societies and integrating the economics of the two societies an inevitable step will be some integration of the political processes and how they go about trying to resolve the problems of the day.

There have been a lot of good things that have come out of California: surf-boards, hula hoops, Frisbees, all kinds of things.

One of the political ideas that has come out of the state of California is an idea called proposition 13. The background is pretty straightforward.

In many American legislatures anybody can walk in off the street and start the legislative process rolling. This can be wonderful democratically. It is not the worst idea in the world, but it has some consequences. We ought to review that a bit.

Anyone can walk in to any state legislature in America and say: "I want to produce a piece of legislation which says stop spending money". It can be as simple and as bald as that. Essentially that is the meaning of proposition 13.

When that is taken out to the population at large, it is pretty attractive. It is like saying: "There will be no bills arriving at your house this week". So they like that.

What they do not like is when the furnace does not work, when their services are not provided, when there is no electricity, when there are no cops on the beat, when their house catches fire and there are no fire-people to come and put out that fire. Then they get a little unhappy.

Those of us in public life sometimes have to explain to people there are many sides to a coin. It is not just a one-way street. There is a reason if the streets are full of potholes. A suitable solution is not to put out barriers which say that the street cannot be used anymore, because sooner or later one might have to. Even those who do not anticipate using that street may have to.

This idea in California produced a lot of bad side-effects. Unfortunately, for those people who were proponents of it, they did not have to stick around and explain the consequences later. That is one of the small flaws in this kind of a proposal.

It had some initial reaction and of course it showed up in the American Congress. It became a bill and the American Congress tried to do much the same thing.

To understand this one must have some sense of how Americans and the American governments put together pieces of legislation. The first thing people should know is that they do not always have to pass a budget for example.

The President is often upset with Congress, that it will not pass the budget he wants. But at the end of the day if it does not, he will have to spend the money anyway. So Congress often goes through many consecutive years without actually passing a budget and it does not have to pass all the budget bills.

In fact, almost any bill in the American Congress consists of one congressman who wants to say: "Let's all turn left", and another one who says: "Let's all turn right", and another one who says: "Let's go straight ahead", and another one who says: "Let's back up". If it passes the bill, the small little things that we might think are incongruent do not seem to matter. Doing something seems to matter.

That is part of the flaw that is contained in this legislation. If it were, as some members have proposed, a bill which said: "Okay, if the Minister of Finance of Canada spends more money than he is supposed to under a projection which we put in here, we will cut off his head," then perhaps we might be able to say with some surety: "Boy, he sure won't spend any more money than we have allocated in this bill". The bill does not say that. The bill goes, in a very straightforward way, I might add, along one avenue. It explores the legislative side.

What could the Parliament of Canada do in a legislative way to control spending? For some, that is a very attractive proposition, but what people have to understand is that this is not the only way in which governments spend money. This is, if I might categorize it, the theoretical way in which governments initiate new programs, establish laws and then proceed to spend money. But it is certainly not the only way.

Members who have been in this Chamber for a while will be well aware that there are lots of other avenues by which governments spend money and by which they continue to spend.

Part of the problem with this one is by putting a rather simplistic notion in place that you can take a single solitary number put it in law and that that will apply. That is like saying: "The trough is overflowing so we will shut of the tap". Well that may work to some degree, but the trough will still overflow for a while and the trough may not feed those who need it.

One has to get really simplistic to accept that this kind of a law can be passed.

The Americans in many of their state legislatures or at their Congress have tried this routine for some time. It has not been particularly successful there. I do not believe it stands much of a chance to be successful here for perhaps some slightly different reasons. But underlying it all is this one simple reason: This is not a task that has one solution; this is a task that has many.

I noticed the member for Halton—Peel was talking about the reaction of ordinary citizens to one barn being operated by the municipality and one by the province, and one bus system run by one school system and one by another, almost as if that never happens on the Hill, almost as if there is no duplication here.

Well, to use his same example, let us all adjourn for a moment and go and stand on the front steps. We can watch the little green buses roll around, then we can watch the little grey buses roll around, then we can watch all the little black limousines roll around, then we can watch all the cabbies roll around. Is that duplication?

Do I hear a great outcry in the Chamber today that maybe one bus system would provide transportation to everybody who works on the Hill? Oh, it is missing. Its silence is deafening. Maybe among the population there would be just a touch more of those who would believe this kind of legislation if they had not had their eyes opened for a little while.

That is the wonderfulness about this approach to it all. This makes eminent sense if you have never seen a government operate because you can hold up a piece of paper—here it is—you can say, as the member just did: "Here is the law, and the law says you cannot spend more than this".

By a quantum leap of faith, some would probably say: "You've done it". Deficits in financing have crucified governments for 100 years. Why did somebody else not think of doing it this way? For 100 years we have had deficits, expenditures and problems with financing. Why did nobody in the first century of politics pass a law like this? This would sure solve all the problems.

The reason is it does not. People who have been in government for a while at any level know that it does not, and people who are members of this House know that it will not. Worse yet—here is something I think we should note—would be if every single member in this Chamber said: "Boy, this is it. I will stop every bill going through the door that exceeds the limit set in this bill".

Do you know what the end result would be for the people of Canada? Zip. The members in this Chamber, even I dare say the Minister of Finance and I will throw in the whole cabinet, are not the ones who spend the money. Sometimes they delude themselves into thinking that they do, always a dangerous practice. They are not the ones who run the day by day programs.

Even if they want to, even if they think they can, even if they get hard-nosed about it, they are small in number. There are thousands of people in our bureaucracy, in all different levels of government who are intelligent. There are smart people in control of programming who are saying every day: "You can pass any law you want. Give me 24 hours and I will provide you with the first run-through of how to get around that law. Provide me with the law that is the tightest law in the world and we will find a way to get around it".

If they are bright and particularly inventive some morning, they may even think up some new ways to get around the passage of laws like this. Rest assured, they will do it.

If a department head receives his or her status because of the number of people who are employed in the department, do you think that by having the same number of people in that department that you are going to stop expenditures? Even if the growth of that department was zero for a year, would the expenditures stay constant? Not on your life and you know that. That is part of the problem.

Some days I wish there was a law that would be passed which would get at the root of all this but I know better. That is the difficulty with putting this down on paper in quite this way. It is kind of like saying: "All you have to do is pass this bill and the problems are resolved". They are not and people know that. People in this Chamber even, busy folks that they are, know that.

More importantly, people across Canada know that. They have heard this song before. They have seen the dance. They know that governments that came into office pledging debt reduction did not do it. They did not commit hara-kiri the morning after the first budget was tabled either. They managed to find some reason to struggle on.

This is a government that, in many ways, said it would stop spending money, and in some ways, it has. In other ways, it has not. When it wants to find money to spend, no matter what the laws are, it will find it. We all know that.

To be honest and straightforward, there should be an appendix to this bill which says: "Wait a minute, there is some fine print that goes along with this. There are some ways that governments do spend money and can spend money which will change this mix".

At the very outset, it ought to carry out some of the work that was carried out in the finance committee where it addressed the problem. A change in revenues does kind of change things here. Governments are aware at this time, for example, that although the goods and services tax, that despicable tax, generates a lot of money, it is not going to generate a lot of money if people do not pay it. If there are no transactions, the Government of Canada cannot collect the goods and services tax, which makes it pretty hard to get the money into your hands.

The government is now beginning to address cross-border shopping. It has not begun to address in a substantive way the fact that there is an underground economy growing in this country. It has not really looked at that one yet, but I suspect it will have to because that underground economy is growing more and more each day.

More and more people are seeing that what the Government of Canada is proposing these days is not reasonable. It is not fair. I would propose that that is the test that the government faces. The test is not writing this kind of formula down in a bill and passing the bill. That is not a test at all. It is nice and those are good intentions. It sounds like a workable formula it has going, but people across this country are saying: "That is not what you do. You may say that, but that is not what you do". It does not have very much to do with whether or not there is the generation of economic wealth in this country.

For example, if the government wants to target a number, 3 per cent, 5 per cent, 10 per cent or whatever, what does one do in the middle of a recession? Does one say: "Well, that is too bad but all of these companies are going to go bankrupt" , all of these individuals are going to suffer hardship and we will not help them because we have passed a law that says we cannot help them.

This week the government is going to be visited by some people from the agricultural industry again. I suspect very strongly that it is going to have to respond to them in some way. If there is a different conclusion to the GATT negotiations than the government anticipates, I suspect it will have to respond to that.

If the Government of Canada decides it needs to go to war again, I suspect it will respond to that.

The only argument I am making is that this is a wonderfully simplistic, stupid notion. The attraction is that by some magic formula, members can dictate what will occur five years from now. I am arguing that it is not possible and that in a parliamentary system no one has ever pretended that it is. In a parliamentary system unlike a congressional system, the Minister of Finance gives his best guess.

I am an admirer of the congressional system. There are lot of things about it that I would like to see us do here in Canada. For example, I would like to see all of the numbers that are used in the preparation of the budget made available to the general public, not just to one minister of the Crown, so we could all make our judgments.

I noticed that in several legislatures across Canada and here to some extent, we are now beginning to accept that there is not a great deal of need for secrecy for this. Much of this can be on the public record and you do not have to turn to the Canadian public and say: "Trust us. We know you do not know". You could turn to the public record and say: "Here is what we know, compare that with what you know. Then you can compare my judgment as a Minister of Finance against yours as an individual taxpayer". That is reasonable.

I would like to see that information flow come into Canadian politics but it is not going to be accomplished by this bill.

Earlier on I asked that if there were penalty clauses here, would that suffice? It would answer one argument, the simple argument: Does this bill actually mean anything? Does this bill tell you something that you can take with some assurance? The bill lays out a formula that, to be as fair as I can, could be interpreted as the government's intentions in one avenue of financial matters over the next little while, but only one avenue. It lays out some restrictions that it intends to impose on itself if everything else remains normal.

Unfortunately in this world, everything else does not remain normal and one has to adjust. One did not anticipate a couple of years ago that we would be in a recession or depression such as we are in right now. People were spending money, governments were taking in revenue.

One would argue, and I suppose I would, that that is the time when government's ought to get really preoccupied with debt. When the revenues are really rolling in is a great time to start paying down your debts because you have the money to do it.

When times are hard is the time to put everything on hold for just a little while and think about other priorities, of municipalities and the things we need to do such as investing in the future of our children and of the infrastructure of our nation and trying to build those things. Those would be my priorities at that moment.

They are not mine in a personal sense. If you walk into any municipality in Canada tonight, they will give you a list of things that ought to be done in their municipality. They will tell you that if they are not done they do not have much hope of attracting new industry to their town and it is going to cost them more money in the long run if they do not do it. Therefore, this is not a secret and it is not my personal philosophy of life either. It is just reality.

There are some things I would recommend that the government consider. I notice that more and more people are starting to think about this. The government of Ontario today put the question to its own people, its own civil servants, explaining the the limits we are approaching and asking how we can do things and continue as normal and spend a little less money. We may have to be a little more creative in how we go about that.

I would think that members who have been here for a while would be the first to admit that there is virtually no incentive for any civil servant at any level of government, anywhere in Canada, to cut costs. Virtually none. That is a sad statement but I believe it to be true. There is no incentive for civil servants at any level to cut costs. They may get a gold star, they may get an award or they may have a free dinner when they receive that award but basically we have not set it up that way. We do not encourage our people to examine the programs in their own work place and we do not encourage those who would know them best on a day to day basis to examine them and begin that process.

In the private sector in many countries in the world they have begun to understand it is pretty important. People in the work place know what is going on. They can help us as executives, as managers, as governments, as corporations to examine what we are doing here. I would recommend that as being something that we ought to do.

I want to read one last section of this bill and I will close. This purports to be a straightforward bill, one which says there is the limit, if you spend over it, you have to take it from somewhere else. It is clause 11:

> Inconsistent laws
> In the event of any inconsistency between the provisions of this Act and the provisions of any other law, the provisions of this Act prevail unless that other law expressly states that it has effect notwithstanding this Act.

In a nutshell that is what we are dealing with this afternoon. That is why I would not support it.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that all bills try to control spending and keep a lid on it, whether that can be done or not. My friend from the New Democratic Party is quite right, there are huge pressures from the Public Service and in departments to spend, spend, spend. They are there. There are huge problems from people wanting more, more and more from government. They are always there.

It would seem that my friend is saying: "You've got all these problems and you're trying to do this, but it won't work. Therefore, I won't support it because I won't help you to try to stop the spending". If that was the case, if the New Democratic Party feels that since it is tough to control spending, no controls on spending should be contemplated.

Is that the position of the New Democratic Party? Is it the position of the New Democratic Party that a bill which specifically says that on Tuesday next week the Minister of Finance can only present a budget having spending on programs of $100.9 billion, that notwithstanding that the minister can go and spend whatever he wants. Is it his party's position that we should not try to control the Minister of Finance and the government spending?

Is it his party's position to have a government say that by 1995–96, which is four budgets from now, the amount will be $111.25 billion and that it is unrealistic to increase spending because of all of these inflationary costs by $10.35 billion is wrong? Is that the New Democratic Party's view, that you cannot do anything about it, so do not do anything about it. Any effort to do anything about it is bad and therefore any help to control costs is bad so why not spend, spend spend and then eventually something else will happen? Is that the New Democratic Party's view?

Mr. Breaugh: At the risk of getting his blood pressure even higher, let me try to answer some of his questions. What the hon. member said is the traditional Progressive Conservative dance on the matter, that they are so smart and such great managers that they will handle debt like you would not believe. Unfortunately, that is true. It is a directional problem. The people of Canada were somehow misled to think that they would bring the debt in this country down. I think he is right. I do not ever remember them saying they were going to bring it down. They said they were going to handle it. They forgot to tell us they were going to take it up. That is the problem. There is just a little fine print there.

We are smarter in our old age. We are beginning to read not only what they say, but read some of the fine print. Let me try to tackle the hon. member's wild, spurious accusation that we are not cost conscience. Here is a thought for him.

I saw a poll that said most Canadians could not name most of the members in the cabinet. That tells me something. Maybe we do not need them. Nobody knows who they are. The people of Canada are not sure what they are doing. Maybe we could just do away with them. We should try that one on them for size.

I read the report of the commission on election expenses and reform the other day. That volume, in English and in French, hit my desk, put a dint in the desk. It is a pretty substantial volume. The committee might have been able to get its message out with a little less, shall we say, public relations. It was a very good effort, but that is the style of government these days. I prefer to attack the style and the substance of how governments spend money in Canada.

I have been on this topic for 20 years. It is a tough sell, I admit it. Everybody in government is pretty comfortable and pretty insulated. I have noticed, though, that at many levels the government is starting to say: "When you wanted to talk cuts in government spending, we would call in all the department heads and they would write us a 20-page memo on how many workers outside ought to get laid off". I am impressed that some people are now saying: "Maybe we should sit down and do our job. Maybe the layoffs should not occur outside. Maybe they should occur inside. Maybe we should take a look at the top dogs and see if we should kick them off the porch for a day or two. Maybe that would be a unique thing".

These are kind of shocking revelations. I do not expect them to take hold right away, but when people talk to me about cuts in government spending, I am willing to talk about cuts in government spending, but all the way up and down the system let us have a long, thorough discussion about this. Do not tell me that you are going to solve the financial problems of Canada by keeping kids out of child care facilities. That is baloney and you know it.

Talk to me about the provision of services on a broad range and if we are going to get the broom out and sweep it and shake it, let us shake them all. That would be a different thing for us to do.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the member for Oshawa to return to a rather flip observation that he made against public servants because as I listened to it I found it kind of hard to take. He said that there was no one in the bureaucracy who had any incentive to reduce expenditures. I do not know how well he knows the bureaucracy, but I know it a little and I know it well enough to know that it is very responsive to the demands of the political system.

In the last decade there has been great pressure by the Canadian public put on its governments to try to control spending. I want to ask the member whether he would concede that a little of that filters through. When I say Public Service decision-makers I am not now talking about someone who supplies stationery at a counter when someone comes up and asks for it. I am talking now those who are entrusted and paid to carry out the will of the government inside the federal government. How can he say with such contempt that they have no incentive to reduce spending?

Mr. Breaugh: I note the word glib. I dislike that word because it is unfair to both the people who work for the Government of Canada and me. You can be unfair to me if you want, that is hardly of any concern to me, but to them it is unfair.

There are a number of people, for example, in the PS 2000 study who tried to make their voices heard. In the end, when they looked at the end result of that, they felt very strongly that they may have been consulted but nobody was prepared to listen. When I say sweeping from top to bottom, I mean that in the traditional sense from the top bureaucrat here on the Hill to the person who is looked at often on the bottom of the process out there. That is the person who may be able to give you the information you need to make the cuts that are sensible. Here is my cry. Why do you not listen to them once in a while? Do not feed them any more platitudes. Do not have any more conferences. Do not tell them what wonderful people they are. Forget the blue ribbons. Shut up and listen to what people across Canada, at all levels, have to say. That is a crime of which I myself am guilty because you have to learn that lesson first before you can hear their message.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): One of the things I would like to ask the member about is his understanding of the problem that this government has put itself in. Here it is passing legislation that is reportedly binding a future government on expenditures when last year it went to the Supreme Court and had it rule that no government can bind future governments on expenditures

That was on the Canada Assistance Plan in which there was a specific law that spelled out expenditures. It was this government that went all the way to the Supreme Court challenging that law. The Supreme Court ruled that one government cannot bind, in fiscal matters, a following government. How do you explain this whole bill which is based on this very premise that we are going to bind a government?

Mr. Breaugh: I think this bill might have had a chance of being accepted by the public at large if it had never heard of you or seen you or had any track record by which to judge the performance of this government. You might have been successful in convincing the public that you found the new wonder bread here that will feed the nation and solve all the problems. The problem is that the public has seen your act before. It has heard every song you have to sing. It knows that you have gone as far as the Supreme Court of Canada to retain the right to spend money as you see fit.

The public has seen you exercise billions of dollars in expenditures by means of Order in Council. It has seen every scheme that mankind has concocted during the course of this century for spending money pulled off by this government. To have you walk in with a bill like this in hand and try to plead that you are born again is just too much for all of us.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, after disagreeing with the member for Oshawa about his attack on the Public Service, I think I would like to begin by agreeing very much with the tenor of the remarks that he just made. As he was speaking I was thinking of the old American saying, which I know must also apply in Canada, that you can fool all of the people some of the time, and some of the people all of the time, but you cannot fool all the people all of the time.

It is not the goal of this government to fool all of the people all of the time. The question is, as the member for Oshawa suggested, can it fool enough of the people enough of the time to be re-elected with the kind of performance it has had on the promise it made about deficit control? That has been a big issue in this debate and it underlies the significance of this bill. I was a member of the government and I remember very well the precise promise that it made. It is easy to remember because it was so simple. It said it was going to bring down the deficit.

Now, when questions are raised in the House about whether it has managed to bring the deficit down, it is amazing how long it takes to answer that question: "We are bringing the deficit down but it is not exactly the deficit. We are not exactly reducing the cost of government but we are sort of reducing the cost of some programs of government. We are reducing the cost of our programs but we are not reducing the cost of the Liberal programs".

Although the deficit is going up, it is really going down if you look at it through the tortuous path that this government is using, the perspective it is offering the Canadian people, to try and get out of admitting failure on the promise it made in 1984 to reduce the deficit.

Some of the government members were serious when they made the promise. They came into office determined to reduce the deficit and they did not. Concerning the large deficit which they took over in 1984, which seemed to be large by historical standards of the time, they were busy reminding Canadians that we had increased the deficit more than ever since Confederation and we had been in office for 17 years or so. They proceeded in a short period of time to see that deficit doubled. They cannot go to the Canadian people again and say they are going to reduce the deficit again. They know a promise that they would make now would not be believed because of their abject failure to keep the promise they made in 1984.

If the government could not keep the promise that it made in 1984, not even some of the people, let alone enough of the people, would believe that in the next election it is going to be able to reduce the deficit.

I would like to say thanks to the policies of the Liberal finance ministers which had put us temporarily through some times which looked tough then, but which in perspective with the disastrous economic performance of this government are starting to look pretty good; even those years which we were not so proud of between 1980 and 1982. The government inherited an economy which began to boom. It presided over boom times.

I just heard the member, who is a former financial writer for The Toronto Sun, saying that it was going to take years of economic successes for the government to be able to reduce the deficit. Let us be realistic about it, he said. If this government is capable of reducing the deficit during boom times why did it not do it? Why did it have to pull out a slide rule and so much fine print to convince Canadians of the fact that it reduced the deficit since it took office in 1984? The government did not reduce it. It saw the deficit more than double in a much shorter period than the period of deficit increases under the Liberals.

In many of the years when we were increasing the deficit it was the right financial posture to be taking. I am not saying it was right every year, but I will say that the Conservatives inherited some good times. Even during the course of the election the indices of good times started to appear. If they were really going to reduce the deficit, if the Canadian people who took them at face value were going to be honoured by the performance of the Conservatives, they would have done what they said they were going to do. They could have reduced the deficit and they did not.

This time they will not fool all the people. They might fool some of the people, but they have to ask whether enough people are going to be fooled by this bill into believing that we do not just have to rely on this government and its record of failure and disaster to reduce the deficit; we are going to have this fancy piece of legislation that is going to do the job for us.

If you do not believe in the government, which most Canadians do not, at least believe in Parliament which has enacted a piece of legislation, the Conservatives will tell on the hustings in the next election, that will tie the hands of the Minister of Finance, who was not bound by the promises that the government made during the election, who did not perform, who did not reduce the deficit, but who now will be constrained by this major piece of legislation to keeping the deficit down.

That is the spirit in which this legislation has to be examined. Is this legislation going to force the government to honour a commitment to reduce the deficit? This piece of legislation is an insult to the Canadian people and it is an insult to Parliament. What the government is saying is that this piece of legislation is worth taking the time that it is asking the elected representatives to take to study it and to celebrate it because it is going to do the job that the Minister of Finance could not do when he had boom times and when he brought in deficit budget after deficit budget, more than doubling the national debt. Now, because we cannot trust him, here is a piece of legislation that will have the stamp of Parliament on it which we can trust.

This piece of legislation comes from an honourable tradition, a tradition which has no relevance at all to the Canadian budgetary process. It comes from the United States in which the president brings forward or proposes a budget. There are cabinet secretaries who are responsible for fighting for the budget.

However, the system in the United States is different from ours. The budget cannot just go through because the administration wants it. In our system, the administration would have to resign if its budget did not go through. In the United States system, the administration knows that its budget will not go through. It knows that it is going to have to change the budget a lot, that the power in the legislative wing of the American congressional government system is going to be heard and that programs will emerge from the legislature, budgetary programs of a sort that cannot even be introduced by members of the opposition in this country. We cannot bring forward a money bill here unless we get the government to approve of it.

In the United States where this idea comes from, anyone can introduce a money bill and the budget that results is a matter of a compromise. As I mentioned a moment ago, our system is so different that the suggestion that this bill somehow or other constrains a Minister of Finance or constrains the budgetary process really is an insult. I would hope in political science classes and government classes across the country this bill is going to be picked out as a demonstration project of how a government can try to fool enough of the people enough of the time to get re-elected.

In our system it is as easy for the Minister of Finance to change this bill after it is enacted as it is for him to violate it, if he chooses to do so. The same minister who brings forward the budget brought forward this bill. It is a bill that stands in the name of the Minister of Finance. If it suits the Minister of Finance to live with this bill, he can live with it. If he prefers changing it, he does not have to negotiate that with the opposition. In taking his budget through Parliament he does not have to obtain our approval. He does not have to compromise with the undoubted power in the Congress to bring forward money bills of equal weight, of equal authority, and sometimes more than the authority of the administration of the day in the United States. The Conservatives are hoping that when people see this bill they will remember what happened in the United States where bills like this really do constrain a government and that they will think the same situation applies in our country. That is the story of this bill.

We sent a delegation from this Chamber to the United States to pick up ideas. I am in favour of that. It is very useful for us to see what is happening in one of the world's great democracies, in the congress of a superpower. They looked at this very type of restraint and I want to quote what they had to say about it.

The Conservative members of the committee who went there recognized themselves that however valuable this type of bill is in the American system, it is meaningless in the Canadian system. It is without meaning, without the possibility of altering a determined Minister of Finance who wants to have whatever budget he brings forward approved, in whatever form he brings it forward.

By the way, if he is unsuccessful in getting that budget through he has to resign. That does not happen in the United States. In the United States if they do not get their budget through they change it. However, in our system the Minister of Finance must have control of the House for his budget, or we get a new government.

This is what a parliamentary delegation said, supported by Conservative, Liberal and NDP members, when it studied this type of American constraint on the budgetary process. I would like to quote them. They said: "Budget control legislation is a distinctly American approach to problems arising in a quite unique legislative environment. Just because the American system might need such controls does not imply that the Canadian parliamentary system would necessary benefit from the same approach despite the fact that both countries face similar fiscal problems".

They face similar fiscal problems but the responsibility for our deficits is the sole responsibility of the government of the day, not of the Parliament. It is the sole responsibility of the Minister of Finance of the Conservative government that it has failed to keep its promise to reduce the deficit that was there in 1984. It might have some explanation for what it did, which might have been terrific. The Conservatives think it was terrific, but it certainly was not a fulfilment of their promise to make the deficit less than when they found it; they made the deficit double what they found it.

The result of the economic performance of the government on the question of the deficit it will take to the Canadian people in the next election will be its deficit. It will not be the deficit of this Chamber. It will not be measures forced on it by the opposition in order to gain approval for its budget or for its programs. It cannot say any of that. It must take, in an accountable parliamentary system of government with a majority government, full responsibility for its economic performance. Every dollar of the deficit is one that is there only because it did or failed to do the measures that would have made it otherwise.

The Conservatives knew that back in 1982–83. They knew when they made the promise to reduce the deficit that people could accept it. The people knew that if they formed a majority government they would be able to have whatever deficit they decided to have. They blamed the Liberal government that preceded them for having the deficit that it had. We did not go around blaming the opposition for the deficit. We went around defending what we were spending the money on.

I have to remind people of something that is often forgotten, that is that many free, democratic countries like ours were also overspending in those years and were also putting off the worry about dealing with the deficit. I am not saying that dealing with the deficit was a top priority of ours. It was not. Delivering programs was a top priority of ours. We took account of the deficit but it was not our top priority.

However, it was the top priority of the Mulroney campaign team that made a promise to the Canadian people in 1984. We did not make it our top priority, but I am sure you may recall, Mr. Speaker, that they made it theirs. If they could not reduce the deficit in 1984, 1985, 1986, 1987, 1988 and 1989 when we had terrific economic performances in this country, they know that people will not believe it when they say they will will do it in the next mandate.

This fraudulent piece of legislation is brought forward to create the impression that somehow or other, if we do not believe the Minister of Finance it does not matter because he is stuck with this legislation.

As I indicated in the question I asked of the member from Mississauga, it is as easy to deal with this restraint as it is to bring in a new expensive spending program. All they have to do in their 11-clause bill or their 300-clause bill or whatever is stick in one little clause saying that this new expenditure program which may be a fully justifiable program—I am not saying it will not be; I would like to see it before condemning it—gets the same treatment as the unemployment insurance program, namely it is outside the restraints which would otherwise apply.

This bill is no restraint at all on the government of the day. It is an attempt to make Canadian people, who I expect know better, believe that our system is more like the American system than it really is and that somehow or other the opposition or Parliament plays a role in determining what the contents of the budget are when we do not. We are bound if the budget does not go through to have an election on it.

I would urge the government, rather than trying to pull the wool over the eyes of my constituents one more time, to do some things that would really reduce the deficit.

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, as one of the members of the finance committee that journeyed to Washington, I would like to pass some information on to the member for York Centre.

The member is suggesting that when Gramm-Rudman was first introduced in 1986 there were never any changes to it. In actual fact the finance committee learned that it had been changed three times because the fights among the president, the congress and the senate did not cause a smooth flow as the member would suggest.

When the bill came out in 1986 Gramm-Rudman suggested that the American deficit in 1992-1993 would be zero. They readjusted the targets two years later. In this fiscal year they are looking at a deficit of some $400 billion and getting worse because they have almost a $750 million loss in their savings and loans that they still have not figured out how they are going to pay for.

There were some problems with it. Gramm-Rudman allowed the politicians to adjust for inflation. If inflation went up 6 per cent their spending targets went up 6 per cent. That does not exist in the Canadian legislation.

The politicians made what I would say were conservative estimates on spending. When it came to projecting revenues they took a very liberal attitude and projected very high revenues. That made the deficit look smaller and at the end of the year when they tried to meet two moving targets it did not work. The minister here is trying to put it on the control side.

The Americans said: "You have a parliamentary system. You have one system. Maybe you do not need this type of legislation". Later on the report did say that this was probably good because it would focus on it. If indeed the Minister of Finance decides that he wants to change the targets, he has to come before Parliament and confess his sins as to why he might not meet these targets and where he is going to go. That would allow the opposition and all Canadians to understand.

It is quite clear that the government is not only setting targets but wants to establish targets. I do not know why the hon. member would be opposed to that.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, it is quite true that the Minister of Finance will have to appear before Parliament to amend this legislation if he wishes to present a budget that exceeds the spending limits in this bill or in any other legislation, but in any case, there is no such thing as a Minister of Finance who presents a budget and does not have the support of the majority of Parliament. It is not a matter of convincing the House but a simply a matter for the minister to decide. There is a difference.

I just read a book published in the United States, called Assembly of Whores, which describes the concessions and negotiations that are necessary in the United States for the administration to get its budget through Congress. Here, things are quite different. The government does not need us at all. In the past, the opposition's only right was the right to delay. During this Parliament, however, we even lost that right. We have no power except that of plying someone with questions for a certain time, condemning or criticizing, but everything is still up to the government. In our system, every cent of our deficit, every single cent is the responsibility of the government. Not in the United States.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): I am literally amazed that my friend would come to the House and say that the opposition cannot do anything about criticizing the government. It just does its own thing. Opposition members can go and talk on the street and make speeches, but really, they cannot change anything. The Minister of Finance has total control of everything.

You would almost wonder why they are here. The members have to realize here is a bill that specifically sets out that this Minister of Finance is going to produce a budget on Tuesday that will involve no more than $100.9 billion worth of expenditure on programs.

He does more than that. You have all sorts of targets. You can talk to the A-G. You can go after him day after day about the fact that he cannot run a country. He cannot be a minister. He cannot keep his promises. He cannot do this, that and the other. At least you have him pinned down.

Why would you not cheer this bill forward? I can criticize the bill. I am going to speak a moment or two, perhaps, if the Speaker recognizes me but surely the problem with the bill is that you hook the minister on the hook. Why would you not cheer that minister who decides to hang himself on his own petard here? Why would you not say this is wonderful? Now, we will get him.

[Translation]

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member asked the question. He asked why we want to be elected if we don't believe we can change the government's policy. I can inform the hon. member that we are not here to change the government's plans or to force it to change them. We do not have that power. We are here to provide the Canadians with an alternative. If the hon. member wants to give us a chance to show what that alternative is like, I would advise him to ask his colleagues to call an election, because that is what we are waiting for. We are not waiting for the government to do what we want it to do. We are waiting to have a chance to get rid of them.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Another question or comment? Resuming debate.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): I always felt it was the duty of all of us in Parliament to make productive comments and suggestions as to how we, representing our constituents, could help make Canada work better.

The member for York Centre has suggested that you really can only do that in an election. You never make a concrete proposal or a policy or a way of handling things except in an election. You are just here to sort of collect your pay and criticize and harp, but never to make a policy suggestion. That is just unacceptable to me.

I would suggest that it should be unacceptable to all members and certainly to the public. Here we have a very senior member of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition saying that there is nothing the opposition can do. There is nothing the opposition would put forward and there is no policy the opposition would have. Call an election and we will tell you what we are going to do. Huh.

This is an unacceptable attitude. It means that we have half of Parliament, the entire opposition, taking the position that it is really not here to make things better for Canadians. It is merely here to politic, get power and that is all that really matters.

Surely to goodness we are elected to try to bend, alter, change, develop and improve the lot of our electorate. We are not here just to make political gains. Let me deal with this particular piece of legislation. I am critical of this legislation because it tends to tie the government's hands and it can do very serious damage to any Minister of Finance.

The bill limits with a whole series of clauses the government's total spending on programs from 1991-92 through to 1995-96, a total of five years. Essentially the bill goes back to the last budget. In the next four years this government has to keep its spending down in increases on programs to less than $10.35 billion. That is a pretty serious limitation on the increase in program costs.

I suppose if the government is capable of keeping within its inflation targets, if things do not get out of hand, it might be able to do that. But should inflation increase, the government is still stuck with that legislative limit on its spending. It is all very well to say the government could come forward with a bill and change that limit. Yes, it could. No government can bind another government and governments in this Parliament can always change laws. But think of the embarrassment, think of the problem, coming here as a government and saying that this is all you can spend and then saying at another time: "I'm sorry we couldn't keep within our targets. We could not manage as we said we could manage". What a terrible abject story of defeat.

Yet we have the opposition which does not want to see any controls on spending because they wants to spend, spend, spend. They never want to control spending. They want to spend. Therefore, they are opposed to this bill because it tries to limit spending.

They are very worried because they believe they might take over and then they would have to come to this Parliament and change the spending limits. They were not able to keep in track and keep spending in track.

Isn't that too bad. Let us find out when they vote on this bill how they vote. Are they prepared to limit spending? Are they prepared to say that all governments should spend? Are they prepared to say: "If you want to spend more on one program, then you will have to take the money out of another program?" Or are they prepared to carry on with their usual attitude: "We'll spend and we'll advocate more spending".

Day after day goes by. They stand up in Question Period and want this program or that program or this new add-on or benefit and they never control themselves. They do not want to see anybody control them. They want to be able without the criticism of the Auditor General to go ahead and spend without limit.

Sure there are some faults in the bill. Sure there are some exemptions in terms of an emergency where you could break the bill, but you would have to explain the emergency. In terms of farm relief you could break the bill, but you would have to show that was the cause. The fact is that the spending is set out in the blue book, hopefully filed next week by the President of the Treasury Board when he tables the estimates. The spending set out by the Minister of Finance in his budget for program expenditure will be $100.9 billion and no more. In fact, it will have to be less than that.

It cannot be more and you cannot ever organize yourself to spend every last penny of your limited amount of budget to be audited by the Auditor General.

Has our Minister of Finance ever put the handcuffs on himself. But surprisingly the spenders do not want any handcuffs at all. They do not want any control on spending.

• (1720)

They talk about deficits. They say that this terrible government took over and the deficit was $180 billion or whatever. Now it is nearly $400 billion. They know, we know, the country knows that not one penny of that national debt increase from $180 billion to $400 billion is caused by program expenditure. It is caused by compound interest built up by a debt created by Liberal governments that had no limit on its appetite. When we took over their deficit was to be $37.5 billion and turned out to be well over $40 billion. We managed to crank it down to $37 billion.

Yes, the economy was booming but you were spending $16 billion more a year on programs than we took in in taxes, in programs. You had to borrow all this money, $30 million or $31 billion, and on top of that you had to borrow more money just to pay the programs.

An hon. member: Why didn't you stop the borrowing in 1985?

Mr. Blenkarn: We did and if you had been here you would have seen that. You would have seen year after year program chops. What did we get? We got the crying, the weeping, the wailing, the gnashing of teeth of members of the Official Opposition saying, oh, you do not spend enough money.

Last week when speaking on the transfer program with respect to the CAP, my friend from Broadview—Greenwood—he is the spender. He is another spender. He is the guy who said that a 5 per cent increase in welfare and Canada Assistance Plan is not good enough, you have to have more, you have to have more. The inflation rate is down to 2 per cent but he thinks the 5 per cent increase is not good enough. Two and a half times inflation is not good enough for the member from Broadview—Greenwood. He wants to spend more and more. There is the kind of spender that you get in the Liberal Party. He does not want controls on spending, he wants the right to spend, spend, spend, spend and no controls.

Mr. Mills: I want to spend on retraining.

Mr. Blenkarn: There we are, we have now got the admission. Mr. Speaker, we now have the admission. He wants to spend but he does not say where he is going to get the money to spend. You know where he is going to get the money to spend? He will tax more or borrow more. Awful easy to borrow, not very good to tax. He wants to borrow more so really when it gets down to it these people have no desire to cut back on their appetites. They want to put this country in the hands of the IMF.

Let us not cry about deficits because you will never control deficits until you control spending. The minister has produced a bill and I can tell you I found a lot of imperfections in it. I think it should go to committee and perhaps be tightened up a bit.

Can you imagine an Official Opposition complaining about deficits but not prepared to do anything about spending even when the minister puts it in a bill? The minister says: "I will only spend $100.9 billion next year on programs and I am limited to that. If I spend more you have got me". Members opposite say: "We do not want to get you, Mr. Minister, we want you to spend more because every day in Question Period we are going to ask you to spend more. Every bill that comes along to cut spending we are going to want you to spend more. Oh, we do not want to say your hands are tied".

Yes, sir, we need a lean, mean machine in this country to make this country grow. We need to build a country and get rid of our debts and make sure we are competitive. We cannot stand any more Broadview—Greenwood giveaways.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, there is absolutely no way I could let my friend from Mississauga South get away with that. There is one thing that we say on this side of the House about the member from Mississauga South and it is that during the last election campaign, he had the courage to stand up and tell the people of Canada that the GST or the value added tax, as we were calling it at that time, was going to be a $10 billion gouge from Canadian taxpayers, when the then minister of finance from Etobicoke said that this GST was going to be revenue neutral.

I enjoy engaging in debate with the member from Mississauga South because he is on the mark many times. He was on the mark with his idea of capping interest rates on credit cards in his private member's bill which I supported in this House, but his government colleagues would not get behind him when everybody in the country was supporting him.

The problem with this bill is the fact that it is filled with loopholes. It is filled with opportunity for the government because if a reason for additional funding requirement comes along, it can always be referred to the emergency clause in this bill.

With all the best intentions of the member for Mississauga South, there is no way that the people of Canada are going to believe that this bill is anything other than smoke and mirrors and a diversion from the fact that the debt in this nation has doubled in the last few years and in spite of it doubling, we still have an economy where the people are in deep pain. We talk about retraining here, yet one cannot get retrained. We talk about hope. We are looking for it.

My question to the member is this. Does he not think that it is a bit cynical to say that we on this side of the House are not concerned about the deficit and debt, that we are just spenders when it was his government in the last five years that had 32 tax increases including the GST which he himself did not support during the last election.

Mr. Blenkarn: I do not want to disabuse of my friend. I spoke in favour of the goods and service tax or the value added tax in the election. I spoke in favour of it before the election and I want to tell him and his colleagues in the Liberal Party, on two occasions, unanimously in the House of Commons and in the finance committee endorsed that tax.

I have just been handed the financial results of the country for the first eight months of this year. If you want to take a look at spending, you will find that program spending as of the end of the first eight months was $71.24 billion. This bill means that for a 12-month period, the government will only be able to spend $97.2 billion. If you really want to put the feet of the Minister of Finance to the fire, you might find that the minister has only the right to spend about $28 billion in the next four months of this year ending March 31.

I suspect that the minister is going to have a very hard time complying with this bill. If the opposition had any intelligence at all—hard to find any over there sometimes— they would be voting wholeheartedly for this bill. They would want this bill in place and in force before the end of the fiscal year because immediately thereafter, they would be getting the financial figures from the Department of Finance and they could go after the Minister of Finance daily about his inability to manage. You and the opposition are afraid of spending control bills. This opposition is not bright enough to have any new ideas or any new ways of going at things or even new ways to be opposition. They are not even good at being opposition.

• (1730)

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I hesitate getting into an argument between my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood and my friend from Mississauga South.

Given the statements that we heard from the member for Mississauga South, I would advise him there is a reality in Canada that exists beyond that 50 square miles of what we know as the hub of Canada or the Toronto area. There are some people who have some reality outside of the city of Toronto.

What people outside the city of Toronto want to hear is the realities of where this country is going today. They are not concerned as to what we have heard in the last few moments about who did what in 1978, who did what in 1984 or what has been happening back and forth. They want to hear where this country is going to go from this time forward, regardless of the deficit and regardless of the debt, which is $400 billion. I spoke yesterday in this House about the immense problem of paying the interest on this debt, 37 cents out of every taxpayers' dollar that buys absolutely nothing for any citizen of Canada.

With that in mind, I would like to ask the member for Mississauga South: What about the rest of Canada? What do the people in the smaller communities in this country such as Winnipeg, Edmonton, Calgary, Thunder Bay, and on the eastern seaboard that we heard so much today about the fish industry and the distress that we find there? What does this bill do for the hope, the desire and the feelings that we, as Canadians, can look to from this government and future governments with respect to where this country is going?

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I think the member from Thunder Bay made a very important point. When we are spending 37 cents or 36 cents of every dollar we take in tax on interest, we have precious little money available for day care, senior citizens, training and all of the things that we would like to have. That seriously impairs the ability of this government and provincial governments to some extent that depend on our transfers and municipal governments that depend on transfers from their province to perform those things that Canadians want.

The most serious thing that we can do, and this House has that challenge, is to get our financial house in order, get our debts down and stop spending the money we are spending so that we will not have to borrow, so we will not have to pay that huge portion of the revenues of the country to the bond holders.

This is a bill designed to try to do that. It is not a perfect bill. It is a bill trying to force government to come to reality in terms of its spending. When we in this House vote money, we in effect authorize the spending of money. What we have to do is say: "Well, you can only tax so much. The only other way to get at your problem is eliminate or cut back on your spending".

I do not think we are very good at that. I think we make a mistake in committees of the House when we have the estimates before us in not cross-examining and cutting back on some of those estimates. I think we ought to be passing resolutions and cutting back estimates all the time. We have an obligation to do that. Surely we have an obligation to put some over-all controls on where we spend money. This is an attempt to do that and I would ask the opposition to support that attempt.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I have sat here for the last little while listening to some of the comments of my colleagues, especially my colleagues from across the way. I always have to remind them and anyone else who needs reminding that we do live in a parliamentary democracy.

Parliamentary democracy says that if a government wins the majority of votes that it is in control, that it can vote whatever amounts of money it needs. It can pass pretty well whatever laws it wishes. It need not listen to opposition if it does not want to and more often than not it does not. Therefore, it is in control. From the day it is elected, it is in control.

This bill says to me that this Conservative government is admitting to the people of Canada that it has failed. It has been totally incapable of controlling its own spending. Imagine. This is the government in power. It has its own finance minister, its own cabinet, its own meetings and all of the finance officials work for it. It is saying to the Canadian public: "We cannot control our program spending. We cannot do it. We have to pass a law". That must be the reason why it would bring forward a bill such as this. What other reason could there be?

There might be another reason. There just might be. I think it is another very valid reason. The government has realized that it is going to lose the next election. It is over folks. Too bad, it is gone. Therefore, it has decided that it will try and leave a legacy of conservatism, somewhere, somehow, by passing a bill trying to control what is going to happen next time around.

It may be a good idea, but I do not happen to agree with it. I happen to believe that the only way to control spending is by the will of the people, the will of the people who are elected and the will of the people who form the government.

If you have to pass laws which have absolutely no teeth, if your minister comes in on Tuesday with a budget that is over the limit that has been set here—this is not a bill yet—the answer will be: "Well, it is not an act of Parliament yet, so we really do not have to follow it". What measure is there to make the minister and the government follow this particular plan? There is none. Who is going to send the Minister of Finance or the cabinet to jail? What is going to happen? Can you do it? Can this bill do it? No, it cannot. So why bother, except to fool people.

This is the same group of people who got elected in 1984 by saying: "We are going to battle the deficit". In 1984 they said: "Imagine, if we continue spending the way the Liberals have been spending, by the year 1992 there will be a debt of over $400 billion". They said that in 1984. Imagine that. They have been in since 1984 and do you know where the debt is now? Over $400 billion. What happened to all these plans? They always have these fantastic projections and these great plans, but they cannot seem to follow through on any of them.

Let us stop playing games. This is another attempt at game-playing, at trying to pretend that: "Hey, we have now seen the light. Hallelujah".

When you look at this piece of legislation it says very clearly: "The minister may in a budget for a particular controlled fiscal year propose program spending for the particular year that exceeds the spending limit for that particular year". He can do that if he wants.

There is another one here that says: "The minister may present a budget for a control fiscal year that proposes program spending for any particular control fiscal year that exceeds the spending limit for that particular year". It goes on to say under what conditions and all the rest of it.

What no one has explained to me is why we pick 3.8 per cent. In the draft legislation that had been before the finance committee somebody had proposed 3 per cent. I guess it just sounded like a nice neat amount. Now it is 3.8 per cent. Why should it be 3.8 per cent? Why should it not be 0 per cent? Why should it not be a decrease? Why should it not be 2 per cent? You have limited the Public Service to no increase, but you are saying that now the magic number is 3.8 per cent. Let me see. The proposed limits would allow program spending increases of 3.8 per cent in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1993, 3.2 per cent in fiscal year 1994, 3.2 per cent in fiscal year 1995,; and 3.6 per cent in fiscal year 1996. It then goes on to give the actual dollar amount.

What kind of divine intervention has come into their minds to tell them that this is the number?. This is it. After all, the interventions that they have had in the past have not come through. They certainly have not followed what was in their proposals. We have heard for many years about how they were going to tackle the deficit, and it was going to be gone. We are still way over $30 billion in terms of the deficit.

I ask you again: Why that particular rate? Why not a lower rate? The worst thing with setting a limit is it becomes the number you aim for. I do not happen to believe that we should aim for this number. I think we have to do the best that we can with the moneys we have, and hopefully there could be no increases if necessary. If it were possible, would it not be a lot better than 3.8?

I ask the question. I do not happen to be one of the lucky ones who sits on that side of the House and has the moral authority to set the amount at whatever for whatever reason.

We have to remember one other thing. If you can recall, I say one of the reasons for bringing this bill forward is that this government realizes that it is finished, it is going to lose the next election, it is over, too bad. We are now into the last year of this government's mandate.

An hon. member: We hope.

Mrs. Marleau: Well, we know. Even it is admitting it with this bill. It is over and done with.

One of the things that is happening is that this bill would allow the government in a budget to propose spending that would exceed the limit for a particular year and then to say how in the next two years it is going to make it up. You tell me how a government which is not going to be here after the next election can propose this. On Tuesday the Minister of Finance can come in with all kinds of neat ideas and then afterward they can say: "Oh, oh, blame the party that came in and took over from us. It did not follow. We said it should spend this much less because we overspent this year". It does not make a lot of sense to me.

I am wondering, why now? If the government is that interested, why did it not bring in this kind of a bill in 1988, or in 1985? That was the time to start really paying down the deficit. It tried, but not very hard, I must say. It was not the biggest effort on the part of anyone. What I am saying is that the Conservative government lacks any kind of direction. It has a bottom line mentality—bottom line, bottom line, bottom line.

I have news for this Conservative government. We are not a business. We look after the interests of Canadians. Yes, it is good to have sound fiscal management, it is very good. But you must not forget that you are dealing with the lives of people. You may complain about what Liberal governments did in the past, but if you get right down to it, if it were possible to work the economic theories, in bad times governments spend and in good times governments create surpluses to pay back the times that were bad. If anyone had bothered to follow that principle from 1984–85 on, we should have no deficit at this time.

Oh, but no, we were a lot more interested in having a gay old time. We increased taxes in some of the most prosperous years that this country has ever known. We increased them in 1985, 1986 and 1987. What kind of fiscal policies did we bring in? Did we really try to battle the deficit?

We said we would, and it did come down somewhat but not enough. It did not come down enough when you consider the growth of the economy and the kind of prosperity that we had at that time.

Now when we are at a time of depression again, there are no moneys to help people. Now there are only spending restraints. Whose fault is it? You are very ready to blame past governments and I am now very ready to start blaming you for your mismanagement.

Perhaps if you had managed a little bit more wisely, we would not be in this position we are today. The idea behind all of this nonsense is to try to hoodwink Canadians into thinking that you are finally going to do something, like they do in the States.

Well, Gramm–Rudman in the States did not work. There are always ways around and it is still not working in the States. I like to think of the States as a tax increase waiting to happen. It has not faced its deficit problems. The laws that were passed and the amendments did not prevent it from running up huge deficits.

There are always emergencies. There are always wars or high unemployment. There is always something, so you have to look at everything. You cannot just set yourself some kind of a target. If you want to do that when you form the next government, if you ever do again, go right ahead.

There are many other things that are very loose about this bill and some of it is the tax expenditure loopholes. Obviously, there are times when the economy needs stimulating, and you can use a tax loophole. A tax discount can be given if you promise to invest in certain shares of certain companies. I can do all kinds of things. This does not stop that.

This does not say whether it is the right way or the wrong way. This just looks at $100 billion in year 1993. What happens if we expand the economy? Why $100 billion? Why not $80 billion that year?

I am just curious about who is the guru who came up with the magic figures and is trying to write a budget for the next five years. I have no idea who is the guru, and I am not particularly impressed with him by the way.

You talk about there being nobody on this side of the House who is fiscally responsible. I have news for you. Many of us are.

I was once a member of a municipal council, a regional council and we brought in some very different types of proposals. One of them was a pay-as-you-go proposal. I can honestly stand here today and tell you that some of the laws that we passed in 1982 which I had a great deal to do with have meant that today that regional municipality is out of debt, and so is the city.

Do not start insulting just everyone generally. Many of us are very fiscally responsible, whereas on your side you may pretend to be, but you are not. Which one of you has ever had that kind of a record? All you have is a deficit that doubles. You have to be very honest, this is a sham. This is a sham.

I will go back to to 1988 before the last election. That would have been a time to bring in tougher monetary policies. That would have been a time to start curbing inflation, but no, no. The people across the way were far more interested in winning elections, so they went on a wild spending spree.

What is to stop them from doing that now? What is to stop you from doing that now? Who knows? They will do it again. They will find a way around it. That is what they did in 1988. Not only that, but in 1988 they said to Canadians: "We are going to give you a tax break. We are going to give you a tax break". So they gave everybody a tax break.

It was great for getting re-elected. It did absolutely nothing for what was coming. They did not even get elected because of that. They got elected because of the free trade and the massive advertising by a third party that scared a number of people into voting and that is a very dangerous thing. I will not get into that one now.

If they had been a little bit more conscious of doing the right thing, they still might have won that election and we would not be in this—

Mr. Mills: Oh, don't say that.

Mrs. Marleau: Hopefully, they would not have, but they did. What I am saying is the free trade argument was there anyway at that time. If they had been a little bit more careful, and if they had done a little bit more of what they always go on about doing, then perhaps we would be in a better condition today and perhaps they would not need to bring in this nonsense-type of legislation. Who are we kidding?

Look around. Go around the country and ask people. One fellow here was reading letters from some of his constituents. Sure, people want us to control our spending. But do you know what? They want to get value for their money, not just to give jobs to their friends and generally pass it around to those who support them. They want to get value for their money and not just to be paid lip-service to by passing laws somewhere that really will not do a heck of a lot for anybody because there are too many loopholes around it.

The hon. member says it has been part of our system for years. Why should we not change the system? I am convinced that we can change the way we do things and get value for our money. Again, as I say, why does it have to be 3.8 per cent? Why not 3.2 per cent? Why not 2 per cent?

Mr. Epp: Keep on going another 10 minutes.

Mrs. Marleau: I am going to give the hon. member a chance to ask me questions and comments. He is enjoying this so much, I am so pleased. I would not want to stop the enjoyment he is having out of this. But he can enjoy now, he will not enjoy later. He will be quite happy if we bring in some more dollars for training because many of them are going to need retraining.

Mr. Blenkarn: Spend more money now.

Mrs. Marleau: In certain areas, why not? Who says that a certain program should not have more money spent? Who says that certain programs should not be cut off completely? Who says that? Who has said that all of these programs that are in place are the greatest and the best? There are many that we could change.

Mr. Dorin: Which one will you cut?

Mrs. Marleau: The refugee determination board is one of the great ones. This is where all the friends of Conservatives now have jobs. They have great, big high-paying jobs. They are not getting the backlog dealt with any faster. It would be a good way to start.

There are ways. Believe me there are ways. There are other areas where we should spend more money. Never mind, we will do a very good job, far better than they have been able to do in the last eight years. I have every confidence.

Seriously, we do have to look at managing our finances better. I will agree that it is not an easy answer. I want to get serious here. We all have to work at this together.

It is not by bringing in a piece of legislation that we are going to change it. We are only going to change it by each and every one of us working together, starting with us at the top. None of this imposing things.

We start with ourselves at the top and perhaps come out with a smaller, leaner cabinet. Think of the money we could save there. Think of the message that it would give to Canadians to have a much leaner type of operation.

If we think in terms of office space, every cabinet minister has to have an office in the ministry office and then he has to have an office on the Hill. Of course, he can never be at two offices at the same time so he also needs a chauffeur to keep him going between offices and between meetings. Just think about it, just the simple act of streamlining the cabinet what that could do. Then go on from there. You streamline your departments. With the way it works right now in departments, the more money you spend, the bigger you are, the more clout you have.

What about streamlining all these people into one group? There are ways of doing things very well. They are not easy. It is not a cap on spending such as this that is going make us do the kinds of things we have to do. We all have to do some serious thinking about what we are going to cut, not just say we should have an increase of 3.8 per cent or 3.2 per cent. I have said it before and I will repeat it—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to comment on the member's address and perhaps ask her a question.

She made a reference earlier in her speech to the fact that the government had raised the spending limits under the bill tabled last week from what they were under the proposed act. I would like to point out to her what in fact occurred. When the finance committee undertook to examine this bill it suggested that self-financing programs, those such as unemployment insurance where the premiums pay for the programs, should be very carefully defined so that there could not be a lot of exclusions such as adding a new tax to build new highways and calling that a self-financing program.

We called for a strict definition of self-financing programs. In response to that recommendation the government limited the number of self-financing programs to four, meaning that all those others were then added under the spending control act, making the bill tighter. That was a recommendation of the finance committee which was endorsed by the member's party. I am wondering why she would now oppose the fact that the government has done what was asked by the finance committee, even though the result has been that more spending has been brought under the spending control act. Why would she oppose what her own member has recommended and was quite strong in supporting during the committee process?

Mrs. Marleau: Mr. Speaker, my problem with the whole bill is that it is a big game. It is smoke and mirror thing. It does not really matter what kind of fancy footwork and what kind of fancy things are done with this bill. It is not going to do what they would like it to do.

To do that they need the will of everyone to work together and to spend the money in the wisest possible way, every dollar they have including the dollars needed to service the debt. They have to take advantage of every saving and they have to remember that they are dealing with people.

These are very difficult times. We hear about what is happening in the Atlantic provinces. We hear about what is happening to our farmers. We hear about what is happening in the resource sectors. We hear about what is happening in southern Ontario in terms of the manufacturing sector. All these problems cannot be dealt with by using a bottom line mentality. It just does not work.

They have to go over every dollar spent to make sure it is spent in areas where it is most needed. That is what is the most important. We do not need rhetoric about spending more in training being irresponsible. I do not think it is being irresponsible to help people retrain and prepare themselves for the future, prepare themselves to become very productive members of our Canadian society.

Investing in our future is not a waste of money, even if investing in that sector means we would have to go over the particular amount here. Maybe there is a payback and the payback would really help to bring down the deficit. How do you know that?

I like to believe that an expanding economy and expanding employment mean that more tax revenues come into the pot and therefore we are able to reduce the deficit, more so than by turning and cutting everybody off and saying: "Sorry about that. Don't get retrained. Don't do anything. We will keep you on welfare".

How does that make for a productive economy? How does that make for more taxes and for less deficit? I want to know because in my way of thinking it is only by working together and ensuring the people in our country get the best treatment possible that we can come out of this mess and be a much stronger, more united and more productive country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I wish to report that the first five hours of debate are now over. When this bill is again debated in the House, we will move to the period of 10-minute speeches without questions and comments.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

YOUTH PROGRAMS

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to be given the opportunity to attempt to seek more information on a couple of questions that I had raised previously.

Some of my colleagues will recall that I asked the Minister of State for Youth, when he announced his program for school dropouts, whether or not comprehensive evaluation programs had been undertaken, had been planned or were about to be initiated so that we could determine whether there would be more people working as a result of this initiative.

The minister gave an answer that was less than satisfying, and that is why I am here this evening. To be fair, the minister did supply some additional information, but it is not the kind of data that I require in order to be able to answer that basic question.

The other question that has never been answered is whether or not this school dropout initiative was actually new money or whether it was money that was taken from another program thereby reducing it. Frankly that is the government's prerogative, but it should tell us and tell Canadians whether or not that is so.

My colleagues will perhaps recall that there was a very similar supplementary question asked of the government's literacy initiative. I basically asked: "Do you have any hard facts to indicate whether or not there are more or fewer literate students today than when you began this initiative?" Lo and behold, it was a tough question because the minister responsible for that program did not happen to be in the House on that day and, to be fair there again, he supplied some additional information. Again it was not the right kind of information.

The question is a very simple one.

I will ask it in both official languages of Canada to be absolutely sure that I am understood. You began two projects. Good, no problem with that. Now, did you set up evaluation mechanisms so that we can know whether or not this extra spending means that fewer or more young people have been able to find work and whether fewer or more Canadians can do arithmetic, read and write more easily than they could before. That is what I wanted to know. That is what Canadians want to know.

[English]

When we talk about program initiatives in a period of tight money, where there is a recession, where every single dollar counts, where we are undertaking initiatives, I hope, to get people back to work, we have to be absolutely certain that we are getting our money's worth.

Therefore, I had questions on both the school dropout program and on the literacy program. I wanted to know: Is this new money for the school dropout program? Are there evaluative mechanisms in place that will tell us whether or not these young people, potential dropouts, have new jobs, better jobs and significant jobs? Is it working? Likewise with the literacy initiative. Are there fewer functionally illiterate Canadians as a result of this?

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of State for Youth, I am pleased to tell you about the plans to evaluate the government's initiative for fighting the school dropout problem.

It has been clearly established that a higher level of education leads to better jobs.

The government is preparing to evaluate the program part of "School First". "School First" is in three interrelated parts and is meant to reduce the school dropout rate, which is about 30 per cent in Canada.

First, the part to mobilize the various interest groups seeks to involve business people, unions, educators, social workers, non-government agencies, parents and young people themselves in helping to find solutions for the school dropout problem.

The public awareness part is intended to provide the public with information on the school dropout situation in Canada and its harmful effects on our economic prosperity.

Finally, the program and services component is to support direct and indirect approaches to encourage young people at risk to remain in school.

The government is working with the provinces to develop common methods to determine to what extent the dropout rate is reduced by our initiatives together with those of the provinces.

PORNOGRAPHY

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, tonight I want to discuss a crucial issue that is having a major impact on Canadian society. The issue is hard core pornography and the degradation and violence inflicted on women and children.

Many violent crimes, including wife battering and the sexual abuse of women and young children, can be traced to readily available hard core pornography.

Studies on the effects of hard core pornography have been consistent in their findings. The studies conclude over and over again that pornography affects men's attitudes about sexual aggression toward women.

Hard core pornography is dangerous. It exploits innocent children and women. I was shocked to learn that children are one of the primary consumers of pornography. A national survey recently showed that 38 per cent of male and female children between 11 and 17 years old reported watching pornography at least once a month.

A later survey of grade 9 students by Professor Check showed that 80 per cent of them had watched pornography. The average age of first exposure to pornography was 12.

The pornography industry is powerful, aggressive and committed to the exploitation and subordination of women and children.

Detective Sergeant Gary Colangelo heads up the morality branch for the York Regional Police Force. Pornography is one issue his branch investigates.

The one adult-only video store in Markham, which opened fairly recently, had copies of two videos that members of the morality branch decided were pornographic. The two videos have since been removed from the shelf.

A Criminal Code provision currently makes production, distribution and possession for distribution of obscene publications a crime. There is presently no legal definition of pornography. Instead, offensive materials are defined by the imprecise term "obscene", making it difficult for Canadian police officers to enforce.

Police officers insist they can make little headway in reducing the widespread incidence of hard core pornography if the federal government does not introduce effective and forceful legislation.

Several months ago I wrote to over 40 ministers and rabbis in the riding about the problem of hard core pornography. I explained my plans and invited members of their congregation to have friends and neighbours sign a special petition I prepared to call on the government to eliminate the production and distribution of hard core pornography.

Members of several churches participated, including St. Andrew Presbyterian Church, Unionville Alliance Church, Thornhill Presbyterian and Gormley Missionary Church.

In conclusion, I am calling on the Minister of Justice to introduce a strong bill to curb pornography. Its implementation is crucial to our nation's already fragile moral fabric.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville has asked the government to address the issue of hard core pornography by bringing in strong legislative measures to conquer this problem.

This is a matter of great concern to the hon. member and I would like to point out to the House that the hon. member has been one of the champions of this cause, I believe, ever since his entry into federal politics in 1984.

• (1810)

He is aware, I am sure, that many Canadians share his view that the availability of such materials is a contributing factor to violent crimes, including incidents of family violence and the sexual abuse of children and women.

The question of pornography, especially violent pornography, and whether it is associated with crimes against women has been the subject of numerous studies.

As well, the hon. member is aware that in the last few years the federal government has made several unsuccessful attempts to amend the criminal legislation regulating pornography. The most recent attempt to change the law was Bill C–54, which died on the Order Paper in 1988. Bill C–54 was contentious and was condemned by a number of groups, including literary and arts communities, libraries and civil liberties associations. However, despite this controversy, I believe there is unanimous support for stronger legislation regarding pornography involving children and violent pornography.

As has been stated previously in this House, the government intends to introduce legislation during this session of Parliament directed at prohibiting child pornography to prevent the sexual exploitation of children and to protect them from harm. I know that will receive the support of the honourable member and of all members of the House.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, in a recent statement to the House, I called on the federal government to listen to the pleas of small business people. I called on the government to reduce the barriers to economic recovery that this government has put in place and that are preventing small businesses from leading us out of the recession. I called on the government to abandon its high tax policies such as increases in unemployment insurance, policies which are crippling our small business.

Small business growth was a major contributor to our last economic recovery in the 1980s. Unfortunately, small business, along with all Canadians, has lost total confidence in the ability of this government to handle this recession. The symptoms of this lack of confidence are obvious. There is simply a lack of consumer spending. We have an unemployment rate of 10.4 per cent. Our bankruptcy rate continues to increase; it is up 37 per cent from 1990. Canadians are reluctant to spend due to the uncertainty of their job status.

In my province the unemployment rate remains high, at 16.9 per cent. There is little sense of recovery at this moment in my province of Prince Edward Island. The unemployment rate continues to increase every month. The bankruptcy rate increases. Potato farmers have suffered some of their toughest times in our history. Our dairy, poultry and egg farmers are watching nervously as this government appears to be weakening its commitment to strengthen article XI and preserve our supply management system. Free trade and world restructuring appear to be leaving Canada behind.

Look at the recent layoffs in Atlantic Canada. New announcements have included Hibernia, Sears, Stone Consolidated, pulp and paper mills, Dominion Textiles, Rio Algom, Saint John Shipbuilding, Maple Leaf Mills, Coca-Cola, Iron Ore of Canada, Imperial Oil. The list goes on and on. That is a list of recent announcements in Atlantic Canada and it alone represents over 4000 jobs.

The Canadian Federation of Independent Business said in a recent brief: "The missing link is a resurgence of business and consumer confidence, both of which are powerfully affected by the actions of government".

The Atlantic Provinces Economic Council is calling for direct stimulus from the government in the form of increased spending on infrastructure projects. Many of the provincial premiers have called on the federal government to take action to stimulate a rebound in consumer confidence.

Our leader has outlined an economic plan that would help speed up the recovery. I would like to note that the plan of my party does not call for a wholesale increase in the deficit. In fact, the plan defines where the funding will come from to implement the proposals.

It is time for a concerted effort to get the economy moving again. Next Tuesday's budget must provide the needed boost in confidence to get consumer spending moving again and to put Canadians back to work.

Next Tuesday, Canadians will be looking to the budget for hope. For the sake of all of us, I certainly hope that this budget—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend in her question to the minister and in her comments tonight indicated that the unemployment rate is very high in her province of Prince Edward Island.

Indeed, unemployment is too high in Canada from coast to coast. We all recognize that. For her to go on and indicate that this is a made-in-Canada recession that we have come through—and signs are coming forward that we are coming out of the recession, we know that—is totally misleading to the House.

One of the things that I would like to point out is that if my hon. friend was to read the headlines of newspapers from the United States, from Germany, from France, from Holland and from Great Britain, if she did not know which newspaper she was looking at, she would find that the headlines and comments are basically the same in all of those countries.

The thing I am trying to point out is that this is a world-wide recession that we are going through and Canada is coming out. Canada cannot come out of this recession as my hon. friend has suggested and wholesale intervene in the economy. What we have to do is get our deficit and debt under control.

As soon as we are able to do that, then the world investor confidence creates the inflow of capital into this country that is so desperately needed to create the kinds of jobs that my hon. friend is talking about.

Once international confidence has been restored in the Canadian economy—and we have seen that in the past and we will see it more after the budget—and once that happens, then we will see consumer confidence also take hold. When that happens, jobs will be created in this country and we will be on the road to prosperity the way we should be.

NUCLEAR VESSELS

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, on November 6 I raised a number of questions in the House about the three Orders in Council which the government introduced in the past and announced publicly on October 30, 1991.

The Orders in Council consented to the transit through Canadian waters of U.S. and British nuclear-propelled vessels, consented to U.S. and British vessels that are capable of carrying nuclear weapons to pass through Canadian waters and visit Canadian ports, and consented as well for U.S. nuclear-propelled submarines to pass submerged through Canadian waters at the Dixon entrance. The answers given by the Associate Minister of National Defence were, I submit, completely unsatisfactory.

In 1991, the Department of National Defence proposed that Orders in Council be used to consent to these various visits and passages through Canadian waters. Under the federal EARP guidelines, this request went to Environment Canada and a memorandum was prepared dated August 28, 1991 by David Barnes of FEARO, the government office that is responsible for reviewing these proposals.

In the course of the memorandum, which was approved by the director general of operations at FEARO, he said: "National Defence's reluctance to conduct an initial assessment under the EARP needs to be questioned. It has come to our attention that the United States conducted an environmental review with extensive public involvement of an acoustic testing facility for nuclear submarines to be located at Behm Canal, Alaska, notwithstanding the obvious defence-related sensitivity of that facility. If such public consultation was possible for the United States in that situation, should it not be possible for Canada to do the same in this case before National Defence takes its decision?"

The recommendation of FEARO was that EARP applies to the decision to authorize the port visits and that National Defence is the initiating department. In the view of FEARO the process should be followed.

The decision of this government to go by way of Order in Council avoids a public process which is essential to the confidence that the people in my constituency of Victoria have in the visit into our waters of nuclear powered vessels and vessels which are capable of carrying nuclear arms.

If any other member of this House contemplated the building of a nuclear power plant in his or her constituency without a single public inquiry into the event, there would be hell to pay. That is precisely what this government has consented to in this case.

It is this which the people of Victoria and the people of our region object to. As a result of the government action, a lawsuit has been launched to challenge the government's opinion. It is totally inappropriate when the government has the kind of advice it has from FEARO that it should put citizens in this country through the requirement of testing these positions in court.

I call on the government to say today that it is willing to have a public review of the environmental consequences. The government says there are no problems here as a result of 20 years of looking at this. I say the time has come for the government to come out publicly and present its case and to give the people of Victoria and of our region an opportunity to speak on it.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the member for Victoria raises a very significant and sensitive issue, the passage of nuclear propelled submarines through Canadians waters. The Canadian government policy is very clear. It is founded on two principles: first, the preservation of Canadian sovereignty and second, the security of our environment.

I do not accept the interpretation that the member for Victoria is placing with such vehemence that the government is refusing to have any hearings into this whole issue because pursuant to the June 1990 cabinet agreement on the environmental assessment on policies to which he has referred, National Defence conducted a review of the potential environmental impact of the policy to allow these visits that he is referring to on our west coast.

Environment Canada reviewed the assessment at the request of National Defence and External Affairs. Environment Canada was satisfied with the conclusion that environmental impacts of these visits would be insignificant. Moreover, the results of those inquiries are public and the documentation to which the member refers, as if it was some document he had obtained in an amazing fashion, are public documents.

This is something that I can certainly say as a parliamentarian, and as a member of this government, we want to have the public involved in. We want the Canadian people to be satisfied that the risks that are potentially there are being addressed. That is why for 20 years since the previous Liberal government initiated this policy in 1967 about port visits, we have done these things.

We have monitored. In fact it is the monitoring program that has brought to our attention just last Tuesday the collision of a U.S. submarine allegedly in Russian waters with a Russian submarine. These things are significant. We are keeping a close watch on it. The public interest is certainly being served as it must continue to be.

WESTERN GRAIN TRANSPORTATION ACT

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, on February 11, just a couple of days ago, I rose in this House to ask the government a question relating to the Western Grain Transportation Act, the decision of the Supreme Court on the Oldman case and the opportunity that it gave to the federal government to be involved in an environmental impact assessment of possible changes to the Western Grain Transportation Act.

I was looking for a response from the government that would indicate that it was going to take its previous statements and the decision of the court seriously and announce that an environmental impact study would be announced. I am quite concerned that if past practices are anything to be concerned about, then Canadians have to worry about the future of grain transportation in Canada and the impact that changes like that would have on our environment.

The question was posed to the Minister of Transport and the supplementary to the Minister of the Environment because, according to the Supreme Court decision, the Minister of Transport would be primarily the minister of responsibility here, given that any changes to the act would be initiated through the Minister of Transport.

My concern stems from the fact that the Minister of Agriculture has begun a process of public meetings throughout western Canada in which farmers and interested community individuals can discuss the future of grain transportation in Canada and possible options for change to the Western Grain Transportation Act.

Obviously, if there are options on the table for change, then there must be consideration being given by the government to make some changes. The majority of producers on the prairies who have attended those meetings have indicated that they want no change; the Western Grain Transportation Act, the Crow benefit, the status quo, must be maintained in order to facilitate the orderly transporting of grain to port from the elevators. They have called for some efficiencies in the system, such as ensuring that the lowest possible cost from the farm gate to the port be considered.

They have expressed some concern about the environment. Recently in the green plan the government indicated that policy decisions of government such as changes in legislation should be subjected to an environmental assessment. Most recently, on January 23 of this year, the Supreme Court of Canada indicated that an environmental assessment is a planning tool that is now regarded as an integral part of sound decision making. The earliest part in the process should be the environmental impact assessment.

I want the government to carefully consider the environmental consequences of changing the Western Grain Transportation Act before it takes steps to change the act. That would be the sound decision-making process. I feel that perhaps the opposite circumstance is being followed, that the decision to change the act has been made and later an environmental impact assessment would be followed.

I do not know the impact on the environment as a result of changes to the Western Grain Transportation Act, but I am concerned because grain moving by truck instead of on the rail would be a significant environment detriment.

I ask for clarification, and more important, I ask that the environmental impact assessment be done.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake has raised an important issue here relating to an issue that goes back through the whole development of the Canadian west, and that is the movement of grain.

When I was a newspaper reporter in his constituency, back in 1966 at the News Optimist in North Battleford, I learned a lot about the history of grain handling in the west. I hear him say, although he is a member of the New Democratic Party, that he is standing four square to maintain the status quo. I also hear him saying that he is concerned that public meetings are being held in western Canada relating to this issue. I would have thought, and it is certainly the view of the government, that consulting with the people is a very appropriate thing to do for any government looking at the long term interests of Canadian wheat producers and, moreover, other industries and activity that should be developing in western Canada such as greater milling and activity relating to the agricultural products in the west rather than having them shipped to my constituency where there are a lot of milling operations, bakeries, and so on.

The maintenance of the status quo is not necessarily in the best interests. That is why this government is looking at and set up in 1990 the transportation committee on agrifood policy. That review has looked at changes to the Western Grain Transportation Act on land use, land values, transportation, and the environment as well. The green plan applies here. That is why this environmental impact is being looked at and remains a cornerstone of this current review. No decision is going to be made until this process of discussion, these meetings, are concluded. I want to reassure the hon. member from The Battlefords of that.

Certainly it is not beyond the capacity of the people in this country to meet and discuss these problems, to look at the environment, the issue that lies behind that, which is maintenance of the status quo, and in this case perhaps even using the environmental argument as a means of maintaining the status quo. There are big issues at play here. That is why the government is taking a leadership role in seeing that they are addressed in conjunction with the producers and the citizens of western Canada.

REFUGEES

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, on December 11, 1991, the Prime Minister signed the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child on behalf of all Canadians. Article 9:1 reads:

> States Parties shall ensure that a child shall not be separated from his or her parents against their will, except when competent authorities subject to judicial review determine, in accordance with applicable law and procedures, that such separation is necessary for the best interest of the child.

As Canadians we all agree with the United Nations that the family is the fundamental group of society and the natural environment for the growth and well-being of all its members, and particularly children.

I therefore urge members of this House to support my Motion No. 634 and petition to the Minister of Employment and Immigration and urge the minister to change his policy to allow spouses and children of refugees to be reunited in Canada as do the United States and France.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my support for the dairy, poultry, and egg farmers of Canada in their efforts to impress upon this government the extreme importance of protecting and strengthening article XI and preserving our supply management system.

There are approximately 700 farmers and farm families in Prince Edward Island who will be at risk. It is estimated that as many as 6,250 jobs in Atlantic Canada could be lost. If the farm quota restrictions are devalued, what will happen to the balance sheets and the net worth of our farmers?

No area will be harder hit than Prince Edward Island. Island farmers hold a greater proportion of the nation's butter fat quota.

Since Island farms tend to be smaller than the national average, the Prince Edward Island dairy industry will be more vulnerable to United States competition.

Supply management products play a proportionally larger part in the economy of Prince Edward Island. Supply management must be preserved.

IMMIGRATION AND REFUGEE BOARD

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, the Immigration and Refugee Board has done it again. Two Ahmadi brothers from Pakistan claimed religious persecution—identical cases, one was accepted, and one was rejected; two different tribunals and two difference decisions on the same evidence. Amnesty International reports:

> Members of the minority Ahmadiyya community in Pakistan continue to be charged and condemned to prison terms for the peaceful exercise of their religious beliefs.

There is no consistency in the decisions of these IRB tribunals.

I therefore join with refugee coalition groups and the churches in calling for an independent inquiry into the decision-making process of the IRB, the increase of negative decisions, the use of prefabricated, fill-in-the-blanks prepared decisions on the negative, and the outrageous conduct of some members when hearing cases.

I also call on the minister to review the case of the 23-year old Ahmadi and allow him to remain in Canada, as is his authority to do, on humanitarian and compassionate grounds.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I sat in this House in amazement, listening to a partisan New Democrat painting his party as the champion of medicare. His holier-than-thou rhetoric failed to mention that all first ministers of all political stripes and the Prime Minister agreed to discuss user fees at their meeting last week.

It was not until three days after the conference ended that the B.C. NDP took a stand on the issue, long after my leader and myself again stood in this House and challenged the first ministers.

Let it be known that the current Canada Health Act was introduced as a Liberal initiative in this Parliament in 1984.

It has since guaranteed that Canadians would not need to go first to the bank before they go to the hospital.

The message is clear. The federal government shall not be allowed to renege on its financial and moral commitment to the provinces to ensure the continued survival of medicare.

MYRIAM BÉDARD

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I would like to draw the attention of the House to another Canadian athlete who won a medal in Albertville today.

I want to congratulate Myriam Bédard of Neufchatel, Quebec, who won a bronze medal in the women's 15-kilometre biathlon. She displayed all the technical skills and endurance required in this demanding Olympic sport. This is the first Winter Olympics in which women officially participate in the biathlon.

Canadians feel joy and pride over such an Olympic performance, which is also very motivating for all athletes in Canada.

SIT-RITE PRODUCTS LTD.

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, a recent edition of The Financial Times explained the circumstances of yet another plant closure.

Sit-Rite Products Ltd., a manufacturer of ergonomic office and industrial work place furnishings, closed a 48,000 square foot facility in Atlanta, Georgia, in order to expand its facility in Mississauga.

On the basis of consistent quality, delivery, and service performance, Sit-Rite management found that products out of the Mississauga plant were superior to those from Atlanta.

Though Canadian employees earned higher wages, other factors such as lower employee turnover rates, access to skilled tradespeople, and better supplier reliability favoured the Mississauga plant.

The benefits of Sit-Rite's consolidation efforts are showing as the company reported a 30 per cent improvement in sales in 1990 to approximately $15 million.

Who says Canada cannot compete?

BLACK HISTORY MONTH

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, February is Black History Month in Nova Scotia.

This month has been set aside to recognize the outstanding contributions of black Nova Scotians, who have played a vital role in the history of my province since the early 17th century.

As a Nova Scotian, I take great pride in celebrating Black History Month, but I find this pride is overshadowed by the continued existence of hate literature.

Almost three months have passed since I asked the Minister of Justice to initiate investigations and, indeed, actions against the distribution of a racist piece of literature entitled Stop Apologizing.

Literature such as this only furthers the problems minority Canadians face on a day-to-day basis. Yet three full months later all the minister has done is write to me to say the issue really is not her responsibility and maybe I should contact the Ontario Attorney General.

I find this non-action not only unacceptable but offensive. Each day the minister did not act was another day this deplorable hate literature sat on Canadian bookshelves.

As a sign of respect for Black History Month in Nova Scotia, I call on the Minister of Justice to take the necessary action today to stop passing the buck and to use the weight and influence of her office to stamp out this and other examples of bigotry and racism in Canada.

PRESIDENT OF QUEBEC'S UPA

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil—Papineau): Mr. Speaker, on Monday I met farmers in my riding, in Lachute. Yesterday, the Prime Minister of Canada met Canadian farm leaders to reassure them about our position in GATT.

Except for Mr. Proulx, the president of the UPA in Quebec, they all said that they were very satisfied with this meeting and confident that the Canadian delegation, which leaves for Geneva tonight, will garner significant support from the hundred other GATT member countries.

• (1410)

What was Mr. Proulx doing yesterday morning when he met the leader of the Bloc Québécois several hours before his meeting with the Prime Minister? It is easy to understand that the strategy developed by these two leaders who are dedicated to Quebec separation is clear, and they especially do not want Canada to succeed and prevail on the subject of article XI.

Many farmers think that Mr. Proulx has no choice but to resign, and I agree with them, because he showed yesterday that his political interests take precedence over Quebec agriculture.

LIBERAL PARTY CONVENTION

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, a welcome is in order for the many Liberals who are in the national capital region for the Liberal convention.

But this welcome should also be accompanied by a warning to those actual and potential Liberals who are opposed to the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement or free trade with Mexico and want to see these agreements abrogated: You are at the wrong convention.

To those actual and potential Liberals who are opposed to the GST and proposing tax loopholes for the rich, you are at the wrong convention.

To those who wish to preserve medicare over and against the wishes of many Liberal premiers, you are at the wrong convention.

You are welcome to attend the next NDP convention where you will find a party that is not funded like the Liberal Party is, by the same people who fund the Tories.

PRESIDENT OF QUEBEC'S UPA

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, I have a message for our farm producers in Quebec.

Yesterday, Jacques Proulx, president of the Union des producteurs agricoles, decided to support the policies of the leader of the Bloc Quebecois whom he had met that morning. Mr. Proulx decided that, to him, Quebec's separation was more important than what happens to all farm producers in Quebec.

I want to say to all our farm producers that, together with Canadian producers and with the support of Quebec's genuine farm producers, our national delegation will be leaving this evening for Geneva to support their cause. We are convinced that despite the withdrawal of Jacques Proulx all farm producers are with us all the way.

GASOLINE ADDITIVES

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the Department of National Health and Welfare continues to disregard the perils to the health of Canadians.

For the fourth time, the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency has disallowed MMT as an additive in American fuel. Studies have indicated it causes an increase in hydrocarbon emissions.

A main component of MMT, manganese, has also been linked to such disorders as Parkinson's disease and Alzheimer's disease.

MMT has been added to Canadian gasoline since the early 1970s. If the government were serious about protecting our environment and removing risks to our health, it would take immediate steps to ban the use of this additive in Canada.

There is a clean and readily available alternative. Ethanol could be used, significantly reducing the damage to our environment and potentially to our health.

At the same time Canadian farmers could sell their grain for the production of this clean burning and safe additive.

When will this government act to support Canadian farmers and consumers?

PRESIDENT OF QUEBEC'S UPA

Mr. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to express my complete disapproval of the attitude of the president of the UPA of Quebec. Mr. Proulx, after a meeting attended by our Prime Minister, decided not to join the Canadian delegation that is going to Europe to defend our agricultural policies.

All this makes me wonder about his sincerity, since it seems to me that as a leader he should be on the firing line to defend his troops. That firing line happens to be in Europe at the present time. I fail to understand why, and I am also very sorry that a constituent from my riding who is also president of the UPA has refused to join this delegation.

The game is not over until it is over. The third man at bat still has a chance to hit a home run. I therefore urge UPA delegates to call their president and insist that he go to Europe.

MEMBER FOR LASALLE—ÉMARD

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, I was glad to read in the Toronto Star the other day that the member for LaSalle—Émard supports funding for the retraining of unemployed workers, eliminating violence against women, and cleaning up the environment.

That is exactly what this government has been doing in that $1.8 billion has been earmarked for retraining unemployed workers.

In partnership with industry and local school-boards we kick-started Skills Canada which emphasizes skills training at the high school level. As promised in the throne speech, a non-partisan panel of women is working to find ways of eliminating violence against women.

Since its inception, the green plan has been increasingly effective in helping Canadians feel they can make a difference in helping to clean up their environment, as well as attacking environmental problems at the industrial level.

If imitation is the sincerest form of flattery, I think this government should feel flattered by the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, yesterday we heard that Dominion Textiles was closing its plant in Valleyfield, Quebec. This means a loss of 225 jobs in a region where the unemployment rate is already 15 per cent. Thirty jobs were also lost in Montreal. This marks the end of the textile industry in the region. Furthermore, Bell Helicopter has announced 80 lay-offs at Mirabel. In Quebec, the unemployment rate is now 13 per cent. Is that supposed to be cost-effective federalism?

Quebec's unemployment rate has always been higher than the Canadian average due to federal policies that tend to overlook Quebec in terms of industrial investment and research and development. The government's next budget will do nothing for Quebec. This government is ignoring millions of Quebecers who are unemployed or living on welfare. Quebec has no choice but to go its own way.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

Yesterday the Minister of Finance said that his budget will take into consideration the realities of the day. The reality today is that 1.5 million Canadians are unemployed. The reality today is that 2.5 million Canadians are on welfare. The reality today is that Canadians are suffering. They are desperate.

My question to the Prime Minister is this: Does his government's definition of reality take into account the human suffering? Does his definition of reality take into consideration that millions of Canadians do not know how they are going to pay the rent or do not know how they are going to pay the mortgage? They do not know how they are going to feed their kids.

How does the Prime Minister propose to alleviate the fear, the pain, and the suffering, the problems and the reality today?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance announced yesterday that next Tuesday, February 25, at 4.30 p.m. he will be delivering his realistic budget. I would suggest that between now and then the opposition and many of the media will be writing that budget for him, but I would ask them to have patience till next Tuesday afternoon when the Minister of Finance will bring down what I believe will be a budget that will be widely supported by Canadians.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is again for the Prime Minister.

The casualties of this government's economic policies are mounting and all the Prime Minister can offer Canadians in terms of an economic plan is more of the same. This government's policies are laying waste to our industrial capability, especially in southwestern Ontario. The human costs are staggering: 3,600 jobs lost at Ford, 3,600 jobs at Imperial Oil, 2,000 at IBM, 1,450 at Dofasco, 1,300 at Dylex, and the list goes on and on and on.

Why are the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance not prepared to employ creative solutions to immediately kick-start the Canadian economy? Canadians cannot wait until next year. They cannot wait until next month. They need help and they need it today. That is the reality of today.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I think we should draw to the attention of the House that most of the statistics that the hon. member rhymed off today are companies that are making these adjustments, not only in Canada but around the world. This is a restructuring that is going on today in the world. This is the realistic structure that we have to face here in Canada. As a matter of fact, there is a report out today from the Royal Bank of Canada which says that Canada has been behind in keeping up with what is going in the world today in the restructuring and that we have some catching up to do.

I want to quote from that report. The report applauded federal government efforts to control inflation, curtail spending, and reduce budget deficits. Some of its recommendations are to remove national and interprovincial trade and investment barriers. That is exactly what this government is doing.

• (1420)

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, my third question is directed to the Prime Minister, and I hope he will reply.

In the province of Quebec, 400,000 people are unemployed and 650,000 people are on welfare. Last year 10 per cent of Quebec's forestry workers lost their jobs.

My question to the Prime Minister is this: What kind of realistic solutions does the Prime Minister intend to include in next Tuesday's budget to give Quebec's economy a boost and put Quebec's workers back to work?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will tell you what we will not do. We will not pursue policies at the national level that would have the effect of raising interest rates to 21.75 per cent, where they were when my hon. friend's party was in power. Yes, 21.75, while today interest rates are around 7.5 per cent.

This morning the inflation rate was at 3.8 per cent, but when my hon. friend was in power it was 12.9 per cent. I agree the unemployment rate is too high and we are trying to get it down, but today it is 10.4 per cent and when the Liberals were in power it was 12.8 per cent.

I can assure you that we will pursue policies but not yours.

TAXATION

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

Statistics Canada reports that Canadian families are paying far more of their wages in personal income taxes than they did in 1986. Since then this government has chosen to shift the tax burden away from corporations and onto the backs of ordinary children. The personal share of tax revenue has risen 11 per cent, while the corporate share has dropped by nearly 14 per cent.

When will the Prime Minister admit that his government is engineering a massive transfer of wealth from ordinary workers to the shareholders of large corporations?

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): No, that is not true at all, and I think the facts point that out. Our tax rates in Canada for corporations and small businesses must be comparable to those of our competitors. We cannot tax our industries and our businesses a higher rate than our competitors or we will lose all our businesses in this country, so that is not accurate.

As far as increases in taxes are concerned, there has been some increase in income taxes in this country. I must remind the hon. member that it was done in a period of time when there was tremendous growth in this country, when house prices where rising at 15 to 20 per cent a year, income taxes at 2.5 per cent a year, and salaries were increasing at 6 and 7 per cent a year. Compared with the other prices that were increasing in our economy, the income taxes rose at a very low rate. I might add that most of the savings, over two-thirds, that we have realized in this government has come from cost cutting.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): The minister's words are small comfort to the families that are struggling to make ends meet. This government's big business, small grocery basket agenda is particularly appreciated by foreign shareholders. While Canadian families were hit with stiffer tax bills, foreign shareholders made off with 38 per cent more interest and dividends in 1990 than in 1989, double the increase I might add that Canadian shareholders were able to bring home from abroad. When will the minister put an end to his government's policy of exporting Canadian jobs and wealth?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is saying that people have invested here in Canada, that they are creating employment here in Canada and jobs for Canadians, that they are realizing a return on their investment and they should not have that. This country needs foreign investment if we are to grow and expand. I am not sure what the hon. member is getting at, but if the policy of the Liberal Party is no more foreign investment, let her say so.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The finance minister spoke yesterday of a realistic budget. The reality for 1.5 million Canadians is that they have no jobs and their families have little hope. The reality is that we have an income tax system which lets the wealthy off the hook. It favours wealthy Canadians. The reality is that this government would rather close hospital beds than close tax loopholes. The reality is that unemployment in this country is costing Canadians $30 billion a year.

I want to ask the Prime Minister this: By " realistic", does his government mean that it will bring in a budget that will create jobs for Canadians or just do more of the same that has put Canadians out of work?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has raised a very legitimate point, one that concerns us all, namely unemployment and how we can get it down. In the first term we brought it down from 11.7 down to 7.3. It is up to 10.4 and we hope to bring it down again by following programs that will reduce interest rates, keep inflation down, and invite foreign investment to join with national investment to create new and productive and durable jobs. I am surprised at the rhetoric of my hon. friend. All of her prefatory remarks are gratuitous and quite offensive because they bear no resemblance to any degree of reality.

I would have thought that since the NDP presented its last budget last May in Ontario my hon. friend would have realized how difficult it is for an NDP government or any government to bring in a budget.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are looking for a government that cares about them. Canadians are looking for a government that understands what unemployment means to Canadian families, is willing to look at it seriously and do something about it.

One thing that can be done is to look at our tax system. Statistics Canada shows that between 1982 and 1990 under both Liberal and Conservative governments the income taxes of lowest income Canadians have gone up 600 per cent. That is six times the increase incurred by the wealthiest Canadians. This does not count the GST and other sales taxes.

My question to the Prime Minister is this: Is this a realistic tax policy? Is the Prime Minister prepared for his government to bring in a realistic tax policy? Will he make the tax system fairer so that everyone pays their fair share?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think it is generally recognized that any tax system can be improved and successive governments seek to do that. One of the facts is that the Minister for International Trade, in his previous incarnation as Minister of Finance, closed more tax loopholes for the wealthy than any Minister of Finance in Canada's recent history. He did an excellent job of closing these unfair loopholes.

My hon. friend says, in regard to this: do something about it. Her position is always the same. When asked and pressed what do something about it means, her view of doing something about it was to spend more borrowed money. That we will not do. We have a policy of bringing down interest rates, of bringing down the inflation rate to just about a 20-year low, and of creating in the process new, durable and competitive jobs. That is a little less glamorous and a little more difficult than spending borrowed money, our children's and grandchildren's money, and throwing it at the problem.

We will not do that. We are on a course that will restore Canada to a sensible degree of economic growth and durable prosperity.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, it will come with great astonishment to the Canadian people that a government that doubled the deficit during its term can lecture Canadian people on how to manage the economy.

I have a suggestion for the Prime Minister that could save him $2 billion. Will he just cancel the capital gains exemptions? In that way, he would no longer need to cut back his programs. Will he cancel the capital gains exemptions and thus recover $2 billion in taxes?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance will announce his intentions on tax measures on Tuesday night. That is the tradition and we will respect tradition.

Second, and I quote, the New Democratic leader just said: that the government doubled its deficit during its term. It is an absolute falsehood. The deficit went from $38.9 billion down to $31.5 billion. That was false.

Now my hon. friends are yelling they made a mistake; they are talking about the debt. The debt did indeed increase from $206 billion to $420 billion, every nickel of which was compound interest on the debt we inherited from the Liberals, every single one.

FISHERIES

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, this government has agreed in 1992 to give fish quotas inside our 200-mile zone to Cuba, Japan, Norway, Poland, and Russia for redfish, witch, capelin, and squid. In fact the Russians have been allocated a quota of 1,600 tonnes of cod in a zone 50 miles east of the riding of the minister of fisheries.

Will the government now cancel all of these foreign quotas inside the 200-mile zone? We need the fish. Are we going to tell our own people to sit at home while they watch as these licences are issued to foreign nations that have quotas inside our 200-mile zone?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, as always, we need to listen carefully to each word of the hon. gentleman so that we can understand what facts are being obscured.

The situation is that NAFO paid international quotas to the U.S.S.R., Cuba, and other places mentioned for 1992. We can, if we wish, agree to them fishing for some of these quotas inside our 200-mile limit. We usually do agree with respect to the former U.S.S.R. and Cuba because they are firm supporters of ours in NAFO in establishing quotas and observing the moratorium on cod catches outside 200 miles in 2J-3K-L. But, if we allow them to fish inside our 200-mile limit to catch these international quotas of redfish, witch, or whatever then they pay us licence fees in the thousands of dollars. They also have our observers onboard so we know exactly what they are doing and control exactly what we are doing.

This is a very intelligent application of policy by Canada to regulate the fishery. The hon. gentleman should be celebrating it, not attempting to denigrate it in this House.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, those are the quotas for foreign nations inside our 200-mile zone.

This year the government, against the advice of every scientist in this country, in Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, and Ottawa in the federal Department of Fisheries and Oceans, has agreed to the reopening of the cod fishery on one of the chief spawning grounds outside the 200-mile zone, on the Flemish Cap where there has been a moratorium for years on the fishing of cod.

Why did this government decide to reopen the fishery in 1991 with quotas for 1992 to the EEC, Denmark, Russia, Norway, Poland, Cuba, 12,800 tonnes, and Canada, 100 tonnes? Why is this government party to the destruction of this major cod spawning ground?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, let us just examine again what the hon. gentleman is proposing.

This is the Flemish Cap which is well outside the 200-mile limit and it is a fishery that is governed by the NAFO, the international organization.

At one time there was a moratorium in connection with the catching of cod on the Flemish Cap. Canada does not have a cod fishery there. That is why our quota is so small, 100 tonnes, and no one bothers to catch it.

Denmark and Norway, two of our staunch supporters in NAFO, asked in 1990 that the moratorium be lifted because certain countries were cheating and not observing it. They who depend upon this particular area and the fish there thought it was better to have no moratorium than to have a moratorium that was not being observed by countries such as Spain and Portugal.

We supported it. We abstained from voting. In return, Denmark, Norway and other countries supported us in our bid to get aerial surveillance accepted for surveillance enforcement outside 200 miles. They supported us in getting the hail system instituted. That is why we abstained.

The hon. gentleman should be able to see, if he cares, how sensible this is. We have to co-operate with other countries if we want them to co-operate with us, which is exactly what they did and we did. There are certain countries that are not co-operating, but not the ones gaining by our abstaining in that moratorium.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, co-operation is a two-way street, and so far Canada has not seen much co-operation from the nations that have overfished our waters.

The senior scientific adviser to the minister of fisheries has told the minister, and indeed has told members on this side of the House, that the collapse of the northern cod stock is so severe that a period of up to five years of deep quota cuts, deep restrictions on the right of Canadian fishermen to fish in their own waters, may be required to allow those now fragile cod stocks to rebuild, to regenerate to a healthy and stable level.

I want to ask the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans: Why should one pound of fish be taken in Canadian waters by foreign vessels during the next five years when Canadian vessels and Canadian fishermen must tie up and stay at home?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, that certainly sounds very patriotic and sensible until one examines it again.

First, the northern cod stock is not in as bad a state as the hon. gentleman suggests. In December the scientists advised me that the biomass was 1,130,000 tonnes. Seven weeks later they revised it downward to 780,000 tonnes. That is the difficulty we are dealing with. As they say, their scientific calculation of stock could be 25 per cent off one way or the other. That is what creates the difficulty in management.

With respect to foreign vessels, they are not allowed to fish inside our 200-mile zone for any fish or any stock that Canadians are interested in. If they fish inside then it is because we are observing the Law of the Sea convention or they are catching fish for Canadians to be processed on shore.

Does the hon. gentleman want to close Canso? Does he want to close Burgeo? Does he want to close dozens of other plants that get fish landed by foreign vessels because we do not have the technology and vessels to land the stocks at those particular plants? Is he out to do Canso and Burgeo in?

Finally, with respect to our campaign, the ambassador from South Korea was in to see me today and South Korea has already agreed to withdraw a vessel from this fishing area this year and another one in the first half of next year to start the process of withdrawing its operations in the northwest Atlantic. That is the effect of our efforts, the Prime Minister's efforts, and the efforts of the Minister for International Trade. That is the kind of effect we are having. We are getting some progress.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, the minister of fisheries has asked if we want to close Canso, if we want to close Burgeo, if we want to close Canadian fish plants and shut down Canadian vessels. No, we do not. We want to close the 200-mile limit to foreign exploitation and overfishing. We want this minister to show some backbone and some guts and understand that the fishery of Atlantic Canada is not a little regional issue; it is a national issue, a matter of national pride and national interest. It is time this government stood up for the people of Atlantic Canada.

I ask Canada's Prime Minister, the Prime Minister of all of Canada: Will he now stand up for those Canadians who have been abandoned by his minister in the region of Atlantic Canada?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, when we listen to this effusion what does it all come down to? It comes down to zilch.

While the hon. gentleman is effusing, what are we doing to help the situation? We have approved 575 projects in fisheries alternatives, $41.9 million in assistance, and 1,547 new jobs in alternatives to the fishery. In alternatives, $19 million was spent to create jobs outside the fishery. We helped Canso and Burgeo to reopen. Grand Bank is reopening this February with 225 jobs because of our assistance, and on and on I could go.

That is the kind of quiet, effective work we are doing when all we hear is false hysteria and play-acting by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister or the Minister for International Trade.

Yesterday we heard the Prime Minister addressing farm groups, reiterating what some of his agriculture ministers have been saying, namely that Canada has presented a balanced approach at the GATT negotiations. It has attempted to protect supply management by working for a clarified and strengthened article XI.

Canada's initial presentation to the negotiating group on agriculture, presented October 20, 1987, outlined our definitive stance on agricultural negotiations. Given that it did not mention anything about article XI, could the minister or the Prime Minister tell us at what point that became part of the official negotiations? When did we enter a strengthened and clarified article XI into the negotiations?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend is very well aware—I cannot tell him precisely when that happened; I was not in the portfolio at the time—of the strong position that this government has taken for some period of time, led by the Prime Minister, in support of the supply managed sector and in support of strengthening and clarifying article XI.

This has consistently been a part of our negotiating position and it is why my colleagues and I, along with farm leaders, will be leaving this afternoon to visit Bonn, Brussels, and Geneva in support of that position.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Along with farmers, I have believed that this was our negotiating position because this is what I heard in the House and throughout Canada, but I cannot find any evidence that that was the position in the negotiations.

When did we present in writing a position that clarified what it was we were looking for? It does not show up in the documents. When did we do this and what documentation can we be provided with?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member is looking for answers in a realistic way.

The reason he has had some difficulty looking back in 1986 is that the position Canada has been continually presenting since we laid documents in 1990 in front of the GATT negotiating council has been the position for clarification and strengthening of article XI. The position was developed with the industry in light of other findings that article XI was not going to be able to give them the supply and the border control to continue supply management.

The hon. member will recall a finding by GATT on ice-cream and yogurt. That is where the position of the supply managed groups, the provinces, and the Government of Canada came from.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture regarding the GATT talks and Ontario soybean growers.

He knows Ontario soybeans are the third largest crop with direct gross sales of $650 million. They could be wiped out by the GATT plan of a 20 per cent subsidy reduction.

What will the minister do to save the 25,000 soybean producers in Canada?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows the Dunkel text has been used as a basis for negotiations.

It has been brought to the negotiator's attention through the SAGIT, through the representatives of Ontario corn growers who have represented soybean growers in a very strong fashion. Our negotiators are aware of it. We are looking at how that 20 per cent domestic reduction could be handled. There are opportunities for internal support for agriculture producers in the Dunkel text that could be placed in a green box. We will continue the discussions with the soybean producers in Ontario.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. When farmers, implement dealers, feed dealers, and other representatives of rural Canada assemble here on Friday, what is the Minister of Agriculture going to offer other than what he has already offered by saying "Look, farmers, we are sorry. What happens over at GATT is entirely out of our hands".

What can the farmers attending on Friday expect from that rally? Can they expect to hear some new news, good news, positive news, something that they can return with to their communities and look positively on themselves and on their profession, the noble profession of farming in Canada?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): I think, Mr. Speaker, the very important fact is that yesterday cabinet ministers and the Prime Minister met with the farmers representing the balanced position of the Government of Canada. That is a very important step. The initiatives that were taken from that meeting, as my colleague, the minister of trade has mentioned, are that we will continue in tandem with our partners, the farmers, to present the position that Canada believes is important.

The other thing that is very important is that I have not heard from any of the farm leaders that the rally that will be held here on Friday is anything but a rally in support of the position that the Government of Canada is representing on their behalf in the international community.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, further to the minister's answer, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Farmers are united and stand together. Their objectives are clear and precise, to save their family farms. For several days now, Canadian farmers have been asking their Prime Minister whether he intends to join them in the rally this Friday. Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister join the farmers on Friday or not?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I spent several hours yesterday with the leaders of Canadian farm unions and farmers: I spent two hours with them at noon today and an hour or two yesterday afternoon from 4.30. I am about to leave the House to speak to President Delors, President Mitterrand, and Chancellor Kohl in order to facilitate the work of the special mission which leaves for Europe this afternoon to defend the interests of farmers in Canada and in Quebec. It is too bad that some have decided to play partisan politics instead of participating in a major international initiative in support of the true position of Canadian farmers. My work for farmers is sustained and ongoing.

[English]

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, yesterday farm leaders from across Canada met here in Ottawa. Supported by their counterparts from Japan, Switzerland, and the United States, their common cause was to support the orderly marketing systems here in Canada and their opposition to tariffication at the GATT.

I ask this government this. In view of the increasing opposition from Canadian farmers and those of other nations, will it place the needs of Canadians ahead of the greedy aspirations of trans–national corporations which will be the real benefactors if tariffication is accepted?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the negotiators of the Government of Canada are negotiating on behalf of the agricultural sector, the agricultural economy, a very important sector of our economy. We are not negotiating on behalf of trans–nationals and the hon. member knows that.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Saint–Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. The Prime Minister was frank and forthright with our farmers yesterday afternoon. Jacques Proulx is afraid of flying, but we all know that you, Sir, have no fear of facing GATT. As the minister responsible for agriculture, how do you intend to ensure, on your trip, that Quebec and Canadian farmers will be able to get their message across to those who do not believe in the importance of article XI?

• (1450)

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister said earlier, we were disappointed when the president of the Quebec farm producers turned down the offer made by the Prime Minister.

However, I can inform the House that only a few minutes ago the Quebec Minister of Agriculture offered to take his place to defend the interests of Quebec.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, in these situations I think it is important that producers across Canada, the provincial government, and the federal government all work together to defend the ultimate interests of farm producers and refrain from seeking any partisan or other advantage.

It is now time to make an effort, and it will be quite a considerable one, to meet other countries and put forward Canada's position which is to reinforce article XI.

ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA LIMITED

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It concerns some very questionable practices of AECL, the federal Crown corporation in Saskatchewan.

Most notably, AECL has been distributing letters praising nuclear power to spectators at high school sports activities, purchasing ads in high school publications, and is now blatantly attempting to brainwash children by offering them free tickets to plays and chances to win bicycles if they accept AECL propaganda.

AECL receives $162 million annually from the federal government. I would like to ask the minister if he sees brainwashing children as an appropriate way of spending public money?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No, Mr. Speaker, I would not accept brainwashing as being valid. I would just hope that the hon. member would start getting his facts straight.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, the facts are quite clear. That is exactly what AECL is doing and presumably the minister is condoning that activity. It is time the minister stopped this activity and started a fair debate on this issue.

I have a further point with regard to AECL. It plans by its agreement, which the minister signed with the provincial government before the last election, to develop technology within Saskatchewan so that Saskatchewan could become the waste disposal site for Candu reactors across the world, placing in jeopardy Saskatchewan children, the children that the Prime Minister said he has fought so hard to help.

Will the minister now apologize to the people of Saskatchewan, apologize to Saskatchewan children for putting the financial viability of AECL above their interests?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I said in my first answer that I expect the hon. member to follow the facts of the issue. First of all, there is nothing in that agreement which says that Saskatchewan would become the dumping ground for nuclear waste. That is patently false. He can say what he wants and take all the liberties he wants in opposition but what he said is untrue and he knows it.

Second, he should know that Saskatchewan is a province where approximately 1,100 jobs are related to the uranium industry. He can close those up. Go ahead do it, try it and then come back to this House and complain you do not have jobs.

CITIZENSHIP

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship. I think we would all agree in this House that the spirit of citizenship is a priority in Canada to be kindled and nurtured in every possible way. Several months ago we discussed the concept of promoting the rights and responsibilities of citizenship for all Canadians, as we do so well for new Canadians.

In this 125th year of our Confederation would it be possible, for example, to launch a program to present certificates of citizenship to all Canadian students who are leaving grade six public school levels, and would that not be a reasonable way to initiate a long-term program at tolerable cost?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, this is a very excellent idea and an exciting project that we have been studying very carefully. It is very important for us to do all we can to rejoice in our citizenship and recognize the proud achievements and accomplishments that we have carried forward together.

In the very near future I will be announcing a program that will certainly encompass the ideas that are reflected in the member's thoughts today.

IMMIGRATION

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, again given the urgency of this situation, I have given notice to the Prime Minister's office of my intention to ask this question. On Monday the Prime Minister undertook to look very carefully into the imminent deportation of a Polish couple and their seven-month old Canadian baby.

I ask the Prime Minister, has he personally reviewed this case and will he let this family stay in Canada?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has conveyed his interest and concern in this case to me. He has also forwarded to me the letter sent to him by the hon. member and he has instructed me to review this case fully to make sure that every aspect of it is considered in fairness. I am doing that. I am reviewing the case right now. I know that time is of the essence and I hope to be able to complete my review in the very near future and advise the hon. member as soon as I can.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is again for the Prime Minister. I thank the minister for his answer, but again time is running out on little Agatha and her right to stay in Canada and be brought up where she was born.

The deportation hearing is tomorrow. I ask the minister why no action has been taken yet to tell this family they can stay in Canada. Will some action be taken to ensure that the threat hanging over their heads is at least delayed.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): The hon. member says there has been no action. I could pretend to review the case or really review it. The member has raised points which I have to fully consider. That is what I am doing.

I have indicated that as soon as I can complete this I shall advise her of the results.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pose a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

For the past several weeks, volunteer, private Canadian citizens, particularly in the provinces of Ontario and Manitoba, have collected over 200 tonnes of food and medicine to give to the people of the former republics of the Soviet Union, yet this government department refuses to provide any assistance in the transport of this very generous gift by individual Canadians.

I want to ask the minister why the government and her department are so indifferent to the generosity of Canadians. Will the minister not reconsider and have the Department of External Affairs help in the transport of this generous offer of Canadians to their counterparts in those poor republics?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, I have conveyed the fact that I think it is important that Canadians express their support for what the government is doing in the former Soviet republics.

We have been very active in providing assistance to the former Soviet republics. We have been doing it through multilateral international agencies for a reason—through agencies like the Red Cross, the Salvation Army and so on—to ensure that it is the right kind of aid and that it goes to the right places with as little loss as possible through what we know is a very questionable distribution system.

We have encouraged Canadians who wish to participate to do the same thing through multilateral organizations. I certainly do commend people for their generosity, but we do think that in order to provide the best kind of aid we should stick with those international organizations.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the guidelines issued by the minister specifically discourage Canadians from offering donations of goods or services. Not every Canadian has a big cheque book they can sign. Many want to express themselves through the donation of gifts and services.

Why is it possible for Canadian Armed Forces planes to airlift powdered milk from Europe, which was donated to republics in the former Soviet Union, but we cannot offer the same assistance and the same kind of aid provided by Canadians.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, any aid and any products for which we have provided transport are products that have been specifically requested or specifically identified as products that are desperately needed in particular areas of the republics. We have been very careful to manage this in such a way that the tax dollars of Canadians are being used to get the best value because we are giving the best possible assistance.

I would encourage Canadians to participate in a way that is the most effective.

Mr. Speaker: There will be a single question from the hon. member for Comox—Alberni, followed by a single question from the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, 25 years ago the Davis Inlet Innu people were forcibly removed from their traditional homeland on the Labrador mainland to a remote island. After the move, promised improvements in the living standards never materialized and 25 years later the 500-member community has no running water, no fire services, inadequate housing and no sewage treatment.

The deplorable living conditions of the Davis Inlet people received national attention last week after a tragic fire took the lives of six young children.

My two-part question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is this. Has the minister now committed his department to relocating the Davis Inlet people back to the mainland of Labrador as soon as possible and to providing them with adequate housing and community facilities?

Second, has the minister agreed with the president of the Innu nation to do a detailed inquiry into the root causes of the social deterioration at the Davis Inlet community and to have the term—

Mr. Speaker: I did ask the hon. member to put a single question, keeping in mind the time.

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all hon. members of this House share the deep regret and heartfelt sympathy for the loss of six children in a tragic fire early last Saturday morning at Davis Inlet in Labrador.

The relocation of the Innu to Davis Inlet on a small island, which the hon. member speaks of, was determined by the Government of Newfoundland at that time when the population of the community amounted to about 150 persons. Since that time there has been a significant growth in population. We agree that there is a need to examine the possibility of relocating that community to a more appropriate area, and I have made such an undertaking to the community.

FISHERIES

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister ought to be aware that last year the Government of Canada issued 100 factory freezer trawler licences to foreign nations to fish within Canada's 200-mile limit.

The Prime Minister ought to know, as I am sure the minister of fisheries knows, each of those particular licences represents a floating fish plant.

I want to ask the Prime Minister if he would explain to people in my district and throughout the rest of Atlantic Canada the fairness of asking Canadians to stop fishing in their own waters and, on the other hand, allowing foreign nations to fish at will.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, that is simply another misstatement of the situation.

There is no foreign fishing vessel permitted to fish within the Canadian 200-mile economic zone unless all Canadians who are interested in the fishery or even not interested in the fishery have had a chance first to say they want the fish stocks or indicated they do not want the fish.

If we have stocks that are surplus and cannot use, such as the grenadier and others it is not economic for us to fish, then foreign countries have to be offered the opportunity to catch them. We offer that opportunity to countries that support us in NAFO, that play the game in conservation, that support us when we need their support, like the former U.S.S.R., Cuba and so on.

We do not offer them to any other country that is out there despoiling fish stocks like Spain and Portugal. We allow foreign vessels in if Canadians beg and plead with us to do it for the over the side sales. The fishermen can sell the fish they cannot otherwise sell. We also allow them in if Canadian processing plants need them to catch fish that we cannot catch and land them at Canadian plants where Canadian workers process them. They are the only things keeping Canso going and Burgeo going.

Now let us face up to it and be honest. There can be opposition but there can be honesty as well. Just face up to it. This is a sensible policy.

POINTS OF ORDER

CLARIFICATION OF ANSWER IN QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would just like to briefly clarify my answer of yesterday to a question from the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan.

In my response I indicated that the accident reports would not be made public and I would now like to be more specific.

The post accident safety review conducted by Transport Canada and referred to by the member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan will not be released because of its confidentiality under the Access to Information Act. But the final accident report by the Saudi Arabian authorities will, of course, be a public report.

TRAVEL BY MPS

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, this morning's Ottawa Citizen reports "Sponsored travel by MPs since 1988 Election". It reports that I took a free trip to Italy and I would like to correct that because it is not true. When I went to Italy I paid for my own trip. As a matter of fact, I sent you a letter on January 9, 1990 just to give you notice. I did not know if it was a good or bad thing to do, but I did mention I was going to Italy on a very special matter which was le dossier a l'Italia. We lost our airline after 32 years. I went to Italy to help solve that problem, and finally after 26 months we did solve the problem.

I went to Italy and I paid for my ticket. I informed my office, the Assistant Deputy Registrar General of Canada,and the letter was sent to me on June 18, 1990 saying that I respected all the rules.

All I can say, is that when I went to Italy, I went to clear up a problem. Unlike some of my colleagues, I did not come back with a suitcase bulging with catalogues. I came back with 80 jobs for Montreal, and we were able to bring back the airline.

On January 19 this year, there was an official departure from Montreal, and I was invited once again. I went to the airport to say hello and pose for the official photograph, but I did not get on the plane to drink champagne.

I wanted to make this quite clear, Mr. Speaker. The reporter did not even call me to check his information. My trip to Italy, like the 22 others I have made during the past 30 years, was paid for out of my own pocket.

PENSION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-335, an act to amend the Pension Act (prisoners of war).

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Robinson: The purpose of tis bill is to ensure that there is discretion in the case of Canada prisoners of ward to award pensions and benefits to those individuals if they were imprisoned for fewer than 90 days. This matter was first brought to my attention by a constituent who was a prisoner of ward for 89 days and as a result of the very harsh and strict requirements in the present law was denied a pension. I would hope the House would agree there hsould be discretion to ensure therei s some flexibility in the case of those where were prisoners of ward for fewer than 90 days.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Robinson moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

REFUGEES

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): It gives me great pleasure to stand today and introduce a petition on behalf of many of my constituents who are quite upset about the process of dealing with refugees who are trapped in the system, particularly those who are trapped in the backlog of the system. Those refugees are suffering from personal and economic hardship and their future is undecided as they await the slow process.

In light of the latest scenario of trying to deport a family to Poland along with their child, those refugees are—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member was getting into debate. The hon. member for South Shore.

HOUSING

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): I have the honour, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition signed by 216 residents of Shelburne County, Nova Scotia. These people feel that the rural and native housing program and the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program have been very beneficial. They are concerned that in the current constitutional talks that these programs may be undermined.

The petitioners therefore humbly pray and call upon Parliament to recognize housing as a shared provincial–federal responsibility, to support all housing programs presented by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and to maintain the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): I am pleased to rise to present a petition today signed by numerous residents of the Ottawa area. I note that the petition is on recycled paper. I am sure these petitioners would be delighted, since their petition deals with gasoline prices, if MMT were taken out of gasoline, and ethanol used to replace it to burn more cleanly. They are for the environment since they have clearly signed an environmentally—

Madam Deputy Speaker: May I ask the hon. member if this is what the petition is talking about?

Mr. Milliken: Yes, I was just coming to that.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member will come to it very quickly.

Mr. Milliken: The petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the government to correct the injustice being done to Ottawa area motorists by excessively high gasoline prices in this region. I would hope that their petition would soon be answered by the government.

JUSTICE

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present six petitions containing approximately 1,275 signatures of citizens of Burlington, Hamilton, Stoney Creek, Dundas, Mississauga, Oakville, Scarborough, Guelph, Kitchener, Toronto, and all over southwestern Ontario.

The petition urges the government to stiffen the penalties for violent crime and points in particular to the death of Miss Nina de Villiers who was brutally murdered on August 9, 1991. The petitioners ask the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General to continue to review all legislation that deals with public safety and negotiate where necessary with the provincial authorities to ensure that the laws are amended to reflect the concerns expressed by the petitioners on public safety.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by hundreds of Canadians from across the country, in particular by a number of executive members, field workers, and staff workers of the Canadian Federation of Students.

They point out that in October 1985 the subcommittee on equality rights for the justice committee submitted a unanimous report to the House of Commons recommending that the Canadian Human Rights Act be amended to prohibit discrimination based on sexual orientation in all areas of federal jurisdiction. They point out that even though the government promised in 1986 to implement this recommendation no action has been taken on it since that time, despite the fact that a number of jurisdictions—including Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Yukon, and Nova Scotia—have included this protection.

Therefore they call upon Parliament to ensure the government act to immediately bring forward an amendment to add sexual orientation to the Canadian Human Rights Act as a prohibited ground of discrimination.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I have three petitions which I will present very quickly. First is a petition from Franco-Manitobans.

It mentions the globalization of the economy, the constant evolution of Canada's economy, the 3 per cent administrative charge on student loans, the $485 million cut in transfer payments to universities and colleges, and of course universal access to post-secondary education, a principle that is very dear to all Canadians, and asks the government to review its policies and change its decisions as soon as possible.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): The second petition which I have the honour to present concerns the goods and services tax on reading materials. The petitioners point out that there has been no tax on these materials since the beginning of Confederation and point out that reading is a cornerstone of democracy, that productivity and literacy should not be taxed. They ask that this tax be removed, and I would concur.

TAXATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Finally, the petitioners have two other points. They point out that certain Canadians get more tax-free benefits when they have receipted child care. They feel that has limited choices.

They also point out that common law relationships enjoy certain tax benefits and tax concessions that married relationships do not. They would like to see this reversed. They would like to see it changed in a positive manner.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition along the same lines as the petition introduced by my friend for Burnaby—Kingsway dealing with the requirement and need to add sexual orientation to the Canadian Human Rights Act as a prohibited ground of discrimination.

[Translation]

As I said, the petition asks Parliament to ensure that the government and Parliament immediately present a legislative amendment to add sexual orientation to the prohibited grounds for discrimination.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to present to the House some duly signed petitions presented to me by my constituents who continue to oppose the goods and services tax.

They demand that the government go back to the drawing board and review all other options for tax reform in this country including the single tax.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition similar to the one presented by my colleague for Burnaby—Kingsway, signed by members of several communities in Canada: Edmonton, Vancouver, Windsor, and Saskatoon.

They call upon the government and Parliament to immediately bring forward an amendment to add sexual orientation to the Canadian Human Rights Act as a prohibited ground of discrimination. They do so on the basis that in 1985 this House mandated the Standing Committee of Justice and Legal Affairs to look into the matter of equality and rights in Canada. In the same year a subcommittee indicated that sexual orientation should not be grounds for discrimination. The government itself accepted that report in 1986 but has not acted upon it.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to present a petition signed by hundreds of Canadians, including some from the community of Thunder Bay which I have the honour to represent.

The petitioners point out that the Government of Canada has failed to respond to a report produced in 1985 calling for the Human Rights Act to be amended to prevent discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation in all areas of federal jurisdiction.

They call upon Parliament to ensure that the government and Parliament act to immediately bring forward an amendment to add sexual orientation to the Canadian Human Rights Act as a prohibited ground of discrimination.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I suggest that all questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commonms): Madam Speaker, I ask that all notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall all notices of motions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

SPENDING CONTROL ACT

The House resumed, from Tuesday, February 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-56, an act respecting the control of government expenditures, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee E.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity today to speak to Bill C-56. With this legislation the federal government intends to control government expenditures. The bill arises from the conclusions of a federal finance committee which in 1991 decided there should be some control of government spending.

I rise in the House today to speak to this bill because it is an absurd piece of legislation. After looking at this government bill, it becomes clear that the government does not really intend to control its spending. That is a serious matter because today spending is out of control. We are faced with a total debt of more than $420 billion, more than twice what our debt was when the Tory government came to power in 1984.

The bill proposes to set a 3 per cent spending limit on government expenditures. However, and this is the absurd part, if they fail to keep a 3 per cent limit on spending they will try to save on other items. If the minister decides for some reason to spend 15 per cent more than last year, which means 12 per cent more than would be allowed under this bill, the government can go to another department and make enough cuts in its programs to make up the difference. The problem is that there is no way to check whether the government actually made the cuts in other areas, which would justify proposed increases in another department. What we have here is an elaborate smoke screen, because there is no way of knowing how much the government has cut back on its spending.

There is another major drawback to this bill. Let us say that two years ago the government increased spending in certain departments by 15 per cent—as in my former example—to recover the difference of 12 per cent. There is a spending limit of 3 per cent per year, which means the government may spend up to 3 per cent but not more. Two years ago when the government was looking for ways to cut spending it adjusted its budget to correct the 12 per cent overspending. This is incredible! And we cannot check what the government did to make up the difference over a period of two years. It will be extremely difficult and extremely complicated, and I think it will be impossible to verify.

Now this government may be incompetent, and it may have betrayed its sacred trust, but it certainly is not stupid. This is a very smart bill. It can camouflage all kinds of expenditures and even provide for all kinds of spending up till the next election, because if we are talking about two years, it means that two years from now. In fact, we know perfectly well the government will call an election a year and a half from now, at the latest.

This bill is an excellent opportunity for the government to spend money left and right, to give political handouts, and to create other Hibernias with the billions of dollars it will spend in it attempt to buy another election.

Although Bill C–56 seems intended to control spending, the real story is quite different. The government is not really trying to control spending; it is mostly trying to hide what it spends until the next election, so that it can buy the next election. I can tell you that will not work because the people, the voters, know that it is a sham, that this government is unable to cut its spending. That is clear.

We can talk about cuts the government has made to date, but do not look for statistics or figures. Take the presentation made to the Beaudoin–Dobbie committee by the Quebec City Chamber of Commerce, which talked about the federal government wasting $15 billion a year because of overlapping provincial and federal jurisdiction. Fifteen billion a year, Madam Speaker, is a lot of money. This bill does not deal with that at all.

Neither does this bill deal with the GST. I must tell you that 96 per cent of the population oppose the GST, and rightly so. Why? Because it is a bad tax at the wrong time. It is not visible, despite what the federal government promised us. It is a hidden tax. Worse than that, as the late journalist Marjorie Nichols wrote in an excellent report in which she had all the figures on the GST, this tax produced about $18 or $19 billion. She said that was not right because it cost between $18 and $19 billion to set up and administer this whole system. In other words, they spent $18 or $19 billion to make $18 or $19 billion. We were no further ahead than before the GST came into effect.

Madam Speaker, I can tell you right away about five consequences of this GST. First, the price of consumer goods has risen about 2.6 per cent. Retail sales for all retailers, small and large, are off from 5.3 to 5.6 per cent in Canada. Exports to the United States have declined by 2.9 per cent while imports to Canada have increased 5 per cent. The icing on the cake, Madam Speaker, is that Canadians, frustrated with the GST, do up to 10 per cent of their shopping for consumer goods across the border. That amounts to nearly $2.5 billion a year.

Madam Speaker, the government is not serious with this Bill C–56. We urgently need to cut the GST now. The federal government should also cut its spending because people in Quebec and elsewhere are fed up with seeing you throw money out the window.

[English]

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to join this debate on Bill C–56, an act respecting the control of government expenditures.

Immediately, even with the title of the bill, we can see an admission on the part of this government that it has been unable to manage our fiscal and monetary policies. It is clear that this bill—excuse me, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I apologize if the hon. member was disturbed. I was simply trying to answer a question which was asked by another member and I was using my fingers. I apologize and I will make sure that the time is added at the end of the hon. member's interruption.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Thank you, Madam Speaker.

As I was saying, this bill is an admission of guilt on the part of this government that over the last few years it has failed to govern, that it has failed Canadians. Why do we say that? If we start from the document, the proposed spending control act, produced by the Standing Committee on Finance last November, a committee of this House that was controlled by the majority government members, we notice immediately that even in this proposed bill, some of the excellent recommendations, and I will only mention two, that the committee proposed are not included. I refer to the definition of emergency, for example. The use of this provision must be clarified and must be subject to parliamentary approval. Without that clarification and clear delineation, I question the forthrightness of this government.

Moreover, a second proposal by this committee, that a strict definition of good management initiatives should be included in this proposed act, is missing from this piece of legislation.

Right from the beginning I questioned the forthrightness of this government and why this bill was being introduced. Page 5 of the bill, clause 4(1) states:

> The President of the Treasury Board may certify that a proposed increase in the expenditures for a specific program for a controlled fiscal year is justified by reason of good management—

Does that mean that the budget may be spent even if it does not fulfil good management? Does it mean that good management ought to be a criterion only when we have to increase the expenditure over the controlled fiscal proposal that is being made in this bill?

Let me tell you why there is a basis to believe that. Good management is not the intent of this government. I will cite a few of the facts and figures available to me at this point. From 1984 to 1990, according to the Auditor General's report, about $23 billion has been mismanaged and wasted by this government.

Let me cite a few recent examples. In 1988 a payment to a shipbuilder in advance of need resulted in the shipbuilder investing in certain securities for a loss of $4.25 million in interest payments and an estimated further loss of $1.8 million by the time of completion.

Second, in the same year it took Revenue Canada until May 27 to deposit all taxes paid, resulting in a loss of $3.4 million. This was improved later but by no means corrected.

Third, $14.3 million was spent for a bypass highway and $2.1 million was spent between 1985 and 1987 to build two bridges unrelated to offshore oil and gas and not yet connected to any road.

The International Centre for Human Rights, which is an institution I support, was established in September 1988. A cheque for $1 million was paid to the centre even though there was no one available to receive it since no employees had been hired as of July 31, 1989.

In 1990, CIDA provided $2.3 million to finance a coal washing plant in Pakistan which had achieved less than 1 per cent of capacity over 10 years. No feasibility study was completed when the project was approved.

We would like to fund useful projects. We would like to fund good initiatives, but it has to be done through proper and good management. Since 1984 who has had control over government expenditures? The answer is clear: this government. Who has doubled the national debt? The answer is clear: this government.

When you look at this so-called spending control bill, it is clear that this is a sham, a cosmetic make-up, and a camouflage, to say the least. Really, what is at issue here is not to stop spending arbitrarily but to institute good management and avoid waste and extravagance.

Earlier today in this House we heard of the many realities facing Canadians. We have 1.6 million Canadians unemployed and there are no jobs to be found. We have over 2 million on welfare and they want to work. We have seniors who remain unemployed and poor, as indicated recently by the Canadian Human Rights Commission. That is a reality.

We also have the reality that over the last many years under this government taxes have been increased several hundredfold. We also have the reality that the middle class has continued to be squeezed.

Of course I have alluded to the reality of waste, mismanagement and the scandals of this government. We have equally one reality and it is that this government has cut essential, not frivolous, cash transfer payments to the provinces. They are essential because these are payments for education of our youth and for the health of all Canadians.

Madam Speaker, if you can tell me that this government can justify letting Canadians be ill and unattended under the so-called umbrella of controlled spending, that we will not invest in our youth because we have to control spending, then I tell this government that it does not know how to manage. My leader has indicated five principles that will guide the future Liberal government. We would ensure a truly fiscally responsible government that will create an industrial strength for Canada, ensure a fair tax system, develop comprehensive and creative adjustment policies, and thereby ensure a balanced economic growth. When that happens, we can assure Canadians we will restore Canada's national purpose, to serve Canadians.

I believe, and I am sure you and the government will believe with me, that Canadians would rather be working than on welfare. They would rather be paid for jobs than handed unemployment insurance cheques. They would rather be able to buy clothes for their children and bread for the table than succumb to deprivation and hunger. They would rather pay their utility bills, rents, and mortgages than be frozen in their homes or evicted from them. The issue before us is not this bill, camouflaged with cosmetic make-up in preparation for an election, telling Canadians that this government wants to be serious. It has never been serious at all.

What we need is sound public policy and that means the government must exercise discretion and not delude Canadians as to its purpose. It must be sensitive to the needs of Canadians and not create a sham experiment with this bill. It must be caring and not arbitrarily control expenditures. This bill hides incompetence, extravagance, and insensitivity on the part of this government, and is an, attempt once more to delude Canadians. I say that Canadians have learned. In conclusion, I would not like this government to find an excuse to renege on its moral and financial commitment to the provinces and to Canadians with this bill.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, I would like to take part in this debate on the motion by the Minister of Finance for second reading and referral to Legislative Committee E of Bill C-56, the Spending Control Act.

I must tell you that I have trouble understanding all the reasoning behind such a bill. Until today I thought that the government had full authority to run the country using the budget, the budget estimates, and all the other means at its disposal to reduce and control spending. I wonder why such a bill is necessary, especially at this time.

Canadians are cynical about politicians, and I think that the debate in this House on this bill at this time is something of a joke. I think that the time has come for the government, if it is serious and responsible, to present the nation's financial situation to the people. We must change our accounting rules. The Income Tax Act requires all Canadians to report their financial activities to the government on an accrual basis, but the government continues to run the country on a cash basis; that is, it subtracts expenditures from receipts to come up with a deficit that is added to the total debt. We do not have a balance sheet showing our assets and liabilities. As soon as a project is financed and paid for, it is shown as an expense in that year. Once the project is complete we do not have a record of costs to show exactly what major capital projects the government has carried out across the country, for example airports or any other large-scale capital project.

If we had a better perception, a balance sheet of all these activities, I think it would be easier for Canadians to understand what the government does with the money it collects in taxes and perhaps there would be a better understanding of our situation, because Canadians are very concerned now about the deficit, about the debt that has doubled in seven years. They wonder how this can be, since taxes have increased enormously at the same time. This morning we read in the papers about the result of a study showing that between 1986 and 1990, taxes on family income rose by more than 4 per cent, which is huge. Every weekend when we go to our ridings, Canadians tell us enough is enough. They have had it. They do not want to be taxed any more.

I do not know what is in the budget that will be tabled next week. The Minister of Finance knows and will tell us on February 25. But I think it is time to have a responsible accounting system so that we can report to our people who pay the taxes and they can know what is done with their money. Maybe all together—governments, elected officials, public servants—we could be more accountable to the citizenry in a way that every year they would have a realistic statement of the situation that they could understand.

I remember the previous Parliament from 1984 to 1988. At one point the Minister of Finance was not able to meet his deficit target. To increase his revenues, he announced to us in early January that deductions at source which were paid once a month, before the 15th of the following month, would from then on have to be paid twice a month. This enabled him to receive two more deductions at source by the end of the fiscal year on March 31 and he thus came up with $2 billion more to meet his budget forecasts. In actual fact nothing changed because the $2 billion gained in that fiscal year did not appear in the next fiscal year. All he did was shift the amount around.

We have the same problem with the freeze that the government has imposed on all departments, ministers, agencies, and Crown corporations until March 31 on account of the deficit. In most cases, the expense will be postponed until April 1. That is not how we should administer our affairs. I wonder why a government would need a bill to control its spending. Why? It is as if I went to see a lawyer or a notary to draw up a contract stipulating that I could not spend more than $100 a week. Why would I need such a contract? This shows that Canadians have reason to be cynical about us. The government has the power; of course it can cut spending. It is the government's prerogative. If it cannot do it, it should let someone else take over.

I remember that the former Auditor General worked with the Auditor General of the United States on a proposed financial statement to change the system, that is, the way we report to the people on the activities of the Government of Canada. That was in 1985, when I was a member of the public accounts committee. With the Auditor General of Canada, we even met the Auditor General of the United States when we went to Washington to discuss the system. It is now 1992, and nothing has changed. The government has tabled a bill which I think is useless, so useless that it is hard to find reasons why I will vote against the bill. It is a big nothing, a bill that should never have been tabled. How can anyone vote in favour of a bill that does not do a thing? Today I think we are wasting our time and taxpayers' money by debating a government bill to legislate spending limits.

I see here in the House the former President of the Treasury Board. He had the power, and his successor has the power now, to cut spending. They do not need a bill to control expenditures. What they need is the political will and the courage to do so. What is the point of this bill? It will just encourage Canadians to be even more cynical about politicians, because we are wasting time trying to give the impression we want to control spending. We do not need this bill.

I am sorry to say so, but the government is incompetent. I see the Minister of Immigration who is laughing. It was his department, Madam Speaker, that appointed commissioners—I am not sure of their exact title—to control refugee claims. They earn a salary of about $92,000, and to do what? We could have dealt with these problems differently. It would have cost very little and we would have this tremendous backlog of people who have been waiting for two or three years and meanwhile have started a family here and are obliged. Today we have people who do not know from one day to the next whether they will have to go back to their country of origin or will be allowed to remain in Canada.

We should not spend time debating a bill that will not solve a thing. After all the government has the power, as it did before and will have in the future, to spend or not to spend. It just takes enough political will to decide. I hope the minister of immigration will be able to help reduce spending and will look at the whole refugee system, because despite the millions of dollars that have been spent we still have the same problem we had in 1985–86 when the legislation was passed.

Madam Speaker, you are signalling that my time is up. I wish to thank you for your patience.

[English]

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I would just like to participate for a few minutes in the closing portions of this part of the House's consideration of this bill.

The bill deals with the government's proposals for so-called ceilings and restraints on government spending.

I would like to suggest, as others have done, that the bill is simply window-dressing. It is government electioneering a year and one-half ahead of a likely election.

The bill does not come to the heart of the problem. I would like to illustrate that by looking at two points.

Clearly the issue of government spending is an important one for all Canadians who pay taxes. We want to see that our taxes are well spent and efficiently spent.

Therefore, the government needs constantly to be managing the Public Service and the government services as efficiently and effectively as it can.

To that extent there exists Treasury Board, Auditor General, and committees of Parliament designed to keep an eye on public spending.

My own personal experience is that in many respects most government departments operate very efficiently and very well.

Clearly, in anything the size of the federal government, there is room for improvement and there constantly can be more. This bill really does not address that issue. It is window-dressing.

The bill fails to address the real problem in terms of the government's pushing of public spending as an issue in its response to the Reform Party agenda on this issue.

Government spending should properly be understood in most cases to be spending on needed public services. The issue of so-called overspending by government is invariably a right-wing Conservative agenda designed to reduce, as far as possible, the public sector in this country at the expense of the private sector. We have seen over and over again, in terms of tax policy, how successive Liberal and Conservative governments have begun the shift from the corporate sector to individuals, to lighten the burden on those who can most afford to pay and pass the burden on to those who cannot. They also do it by constantly cutting back on public services of various kinds. They once said you do not need a bake sale to buy a tank or a submarine. But you do have to have bake sales for so many public services in this country. It is a question of priorities, and this government and its predecessor Liberal government, have constantly given the social sector in this country the most difficult time squeezing out any kind of money at all for very needed social services, often at the long-run expense to the public treasury.

Over and over again those who look at the issue of crime prevention have come up with the point that if money was spent at the beginning to prevent crime you would not have to spend so much on penitentiaries. That same analogy could be used on all kinds of public expenditures in this country.

As the public considers this bill it is important for it to understand the underlying hypocrisy of the government's position in suggesting that it is promoting control of public spending, when in fact over and over again it fails to put a reasonable priority on public spending and to rein in unnecessary and valueless private spending.

In the debate we constantly hear the attack on public spending and yet if we look at over-spending around our society, we see that over and over again there is unnecessary private consumption compared to the requirements of so many in our country and around the world.

Let me complete my contribution by focusing the House's attention on one other area. This government and its predecessors have failed to challenge the very assumptions of their own policies. While the government looks in the corner to try to save a nickel, it is still spending billions of dollars over here without challenging the assumptions of that spending. I refer in particular to spending in the area of defence.

For over 40 years both the Liberal and Conservative governments of Canada have spent billions and billions of Canadian taxpayers' dollars in maintaining forces in Europe. Now in the early days those expenditures were entirely necessary and valuable and were supported on all sides of the House. But as early as the sixties the government and the defence people had come to the conclusion that spending was no longer necessary for military or defence purposes. It is now well recorded that the government of the day seriously proposed withdrawing our Canadian forces from Europe back in the early seventies, but backed off because the American government did not want them to.

That issue has come up over and over again, but as early as the 1980s and certainly by 1985, according to all intelligence reports, it was very clear that if there had ever been a Soviet threat to western Europe that threat was withdrawn and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics had changed its defence strategy into a defensive one. That was clearly documented and recorded by at least 1985. There is a lot of writing in the field that suggests there never was such a threat, but clearly by 1985 that was established. By 1988 and 1989 there could be no more doubt about it whatever; the threat had disappeared.

Yet this government continued to spend over a billion dollars a year in maintaining Canadian forces in Europe. That assumption was never challenged by the government. Only last year did the government finally make a decision to make a significant cut in our forces in Europe, and that cut is not to take effect until 1994 and 1995.

Even so, the government persists in maintaining 1,100 troops in Europe beyond 1995. The defence committee was recently in Europe and the evidence we received from our own military people was that 1,100 troops could not provide any useful, constructive military presence in Europe. Eleven hundred is simply a meaningless number.

They have no support, no logistics. There is no place for them. There is no strategy for them and they will obviously have no military role. Yet, the government even now persists in spending the taxpayers' money in that way.

I suggest that the government should realize that the real overspending is in its own programs and its failure to critically analyze the assumptions that underlie its policy. Its Pavlovian reaction to anything the Americans say should happen and its support of NATO over recent years, despite the fact that circumstances have clearly changed, suggest that this government's priorities are all wrong.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to participate briefly in the debate on Bill C–56.

I listened with great care to my hon. friend from Victoria. It seems to me that the NDP talking about spending control has all the credibility of an arsonist talking about fire control. I nevertheless listened with great interest to his remarks.

I think this spending control act is very important. It is not only a constriction on government spending but is a very important signal to the people of Canada that this government is serious about bringing the finances of this nation, and hence the economy of this nation, under control.

This act was part of the plan for economic recovery enunciated in the 1991 budget. It is there to make sure that spending is restrained and that the budget announced annual program spending would be limited by law.

Last summer, on the day the Minister of Finance announced this program, I had the privilege of representing him at a meeting in Halifax, Nova Scotia, attended by 80 to 100 business people, the people who are involved in creating employment in this country, small business people for the most part.

They were very pleased to see that the government was putting its money where its mouth is, that it was going to put the constraints on itself in such a way that it was not just up to the government to maybe do what it says or maybe not.

We will do what we say. We have done what we have said. Now we are legislating it so that there will be no doubt whatsoever where this government stands.

That legislation was presented in draft form on that day in July. It was then, in this draft version, brought forward to the House of Commons finance committee for review in the hope that it might be able to make some improvements to the bill. Indeed, the bill now before Parliament reflects that review. The committee tightened and reviewed the legislation.

I want to tell my hon. friends opposite that Canadians are unequivocally telling governments to keep spending under control. My friends in the NDP might remind their colleagues in Ontario of that. This new law provides assurance that higher taxes cannot be used to pay for higher spending. New programs will have to be funded within the total legislated ceiling.

There have been suggestions by some members in this debate that the spending limits in this bill are different than the ones announced by the minister. I want to assure the House that is not the case. The minister accepted the advice of the Standing Committee on Finance.

It recommended that we restrict the number of self–financing programs and do not exclude any incremental funding for the self–financing programs, incremental funding to what was included in the February 1991 budget, but exclude all spending related to those self–financing programs. This has been done.

The limited number of self–financing programs has been reduced from 11 to four: Unemployment Insurance programs, the Crop Reinsurance Program, the Agricultural Stabilization Account and the Gross Revenue Insurance Program.

By excluding the February 1991 budget projections for these programs from total program spending subject to the spending limits we have reduced the over-all limits. We have not increased the limits. These revisions do not change the substance of the draft legislation. The same level of program spending is being controlled now as before. In addition, the new provision to offset any overspending through reductions over the next two fiscal years makes this bill even tighter than the previous one.

Some programs were exempted simply because it did not make sense to the government to put spending control limits on things that could not really be controlled: things like interest on the national debt; urgent and critical emergencies to which the government had to respond but for which it could not properly budget; self-financing programs such as UI and the farm income protection act; and incremental funding for management initiatives that in fact are put in place to reduce the deficit.

Therefore, the government is putting itself on the line with this bill. If spending exceeds the limit in any one year the amount of overspending must be made up through cuts in following years.

The Minister of Finance is not allowed to present a budget that is inconsistent with this act. The annual public accounts will contain a statement by the Minister of Finance indicating compliance with this act and the Auditor General will report to Parliament on whether or not the act has been complied with.

Indeed, the Minister of Finance will be required in the 1994 budget to recommend whether or not the act should be extended beyond the end of 1995-96 fiscal year.

There is a very clear signal going out to Canadians with his piece of legislation: This government is serious about spending control and this government intends to make the most effective use of every tax dollar raised for the benefit of the taxpayers.

In conclusion, I would like to say that there have been discussions with the various representatives of the parties. I believe you will find that I have unanimous consent for the following motion:

> That the motion for the second reading of Bill C-56, an Act respecting the control of government expenditures be amended by having the bill referred to the Standing Committee on Finance rather than Legislative Committee E.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the House to put the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to see that Bill C-56 will be referred to the finance committee, because the latter has already examined this issue and even travelled to the United States to see how things work down there. You will remember that the committee tabled in this House a report to which I will refer in my comments.

One must seriously question if it is really necessary for a government in a British parliamentary system to propose in this House a measure to control public spendings. One wonders, or at least takes a critical view of the proposal and is somewhat sceptical.

You may ask yourself whether the Conservative government is trying to make Canadians believe that it manages the affairs of the country in a sound manner. It is obviously not the case because we have been in a terrible recession for over two years, we have a great number of Canadian workers who are unemployed. We have had high interest rates that have caused tremendous problems. On top of that recession, the government brought in some 33 new taxes. The last one was the GST which is among consumers the source of tremendous problems both at the family and regional levels.

The present government bragged, when it was elected in 1984, that it would put order in the financial affairs and the administration of the country. If this were already the government's stated goal in 1984, a goal which it repeated on numerous occasions, I wonder why it did not come up four, five or six years ago with a bill that would have put before Canadians the measures proposed in Bill C-56. Why did the government wait for so long? Why did the government hesitate until almost the end of its mandate to present a bill which, in my opinion is not very clear and has no policy statement telling us where we are going with this legislation. Therefore, it will be very difficult to interpret this bill, and the wording of some of its sections leaves something to be desired.

That is the reason why I said earlier that I am pleased that the Standing Committee on Finance will be able to look at this bill, because I trust those people. With the approach that they will take, the members of the Committee will be able to examine the proposal with an open mind and possibly come back to us with proposals for amendments.

It is easy to table this bill because all those who know the workings of a parliamentary system are well aware that we have here a government, with a Prime Minister and a cabinet elected by the people, which has the power to do exactly what Bill C-56, an act respecting the control of government's expenditures, allows them to do. The system is built like that. It is not an American system; it is not the Congress. It is a system based on a parliamentary majority where the government is empowered, and even has the right, to limit expenditures or to inform the Canadian population of the reasons it may want to bring in some budgetary restraints.

In the United States the legislative power and the administration are rather clearly separated. There have been problems. On occasion, it has been necessary to use legislation to solve conflicts; I am thinking of the Gramm-Rudman—Hollings Act and the one that came after, the Budget Enforcement Act, on the implementation of budgetary measures. The Americans wanted to solve a dispute between the administration of the country on the one hand, which is for the most part controlled by non-elected people appointed by the President and the legislative power on the other hand, which is controlled by elected people. Such pieces of legislation were necessary to solve the problem. But it is not our problem in Canada and I wonder why this government must force upon us a measure which is almost American and which, according to me Madam Speaker, is irrelevant in a Canadian environment.

Let me refer to the report prepared by the finance committee after a visit to Washington during its study of the government working paper before the tabling of this bill; I read from paragraph 35.

Budget control legislation is a distinctly American approach to problems arising in a quite unique legislative environment. Just because the American system might need such controls does not imply that the Canadian parliamentary system would necessarily benefit from the same approach, despite the fact that both countries face similar fiscal problems.

In other words, the American solution is not necessarily the good one for Canada. I don't understand why we are losing our time studying a bill which is useless since, in our British parliamentary system, government can do exactly what is suggested in Bill C-56.

We only have to recall for example that not so long ago the Minister of Finance announced that it would be impossible to respect, presented, last year's estimates. There will be a 1.5 billion shortfall. The minister did not have to consult the House or anybody else, before making the decision to announce this shortfall, this accumulated deficit. No, he had the right to do it and he did.

The Minister of Finance has decided to freeze all discretionary expenditures until March 31, a saving of $200 million apparently. Did he come and explain to the House that he was doing this to comply with a bill introduced to control government expenditures? Not at all. He decided on his own authority, probably after consulting with cabinet, that he was going to do that. So they did. They did not need a law to do it. They had the power to do so.

If government is serious about controlling its expenditures, we should know what is really in its mind. It should tell us why it is introducing a bill such as this one. I do not understand it. I have read it. I have gone over it and found things that are absolutely unacceptable. I shall come to that immediately because I am running out of time.

Section 8 of the bill says, and I will quote because it is relevant to the annual report the Auditor General of Canada is about to table in this House. It actually creates the obligation for him to do certain things. Here is what section 8 says, and I will tell you my concern as part of my comments:

8. In reporting to Parliament in respect of the accounts of the government for a controlled fiscal year, the Auditor General of Canada shall express an opinion as to

(a) whether this Act has been complied with in respect of that year; and

(b) whether the statement referred to in subsection 6(1) fairly presents information in accordance with stated government accounting policies.

From this wording it is obvious that this whole thing is pretty unclear. The Auditor General will express an opinion on the government's accounting methods, but this provision does not provide for what we call a continuity factor. Who can give the Auditor General the assurance that the accounting methods used that year are at least the same from one year to the next? Nobody.

We compare bananas, cucumbers, carrots, and tomatoes. The same problem comes up every year with one exception and that was last year or the one before that when the Auditor General did not comment on or express reservations about the government's accounting procedures. It is the job of the Auditor General to come out every year and say that the government does not keep its books in accordance with recognized accounting methods widely used by experts in the industry, in the private sector as well as in the public sector, by governments. Something about continuity should be included in section 8 to ensure we are talking about the same thing.

[English]

It says here: "whether the statement referred to in subsection 6.(1) fairly presents information in accordance with stated government accounting policies".

We have had disagreements before between the public accounts committee and the government on the accounting methods that are used. This year it used $2 billion to reduce its deficit. We are not saying that it was correct or incorrect. We are just saying we have great difficulty understanding the facts as they are given to us in politics and given to the people of Canada and assessing those facts in a credible manner so we understand where we are going.

This government is doing things which are not correct in terms of accounting procedures and practices. It should correct them and that should be an amendment to this bill. Article 8 would see a continuity factor put into this and that the accounting methods used are at least the same from one year to the next.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I am happy today to be able to contribute to this debate on Bill C–56, an act respecting the control of government expenditures.

I am prompted to rise to my feet today because of the simple fact that I believe Canadians are being led down the garden path, so to speak, by the government on this bill. There is no doubt throughout my constituency and in other parts of Canada as well that Canadians are frustrated, angry, and cynical. All these emotions are aimed at the present government and stem from the fact that their income security, personal security about the future, and confidence in the future of Canada have reached an all–time low.

The people of Canada I have talked to in my constituency and elsewhere have indicated a very strong desire to see something happen that will give them confidence in the future. They want confidence to believe what governments tell them. We now have a population that is very cynical about the way governments operate. They do not want to believe the things governments say to them. They have been given every reason not to believe the things they have been told. Frustration, anger, and cynicism flow out of individuals whenever they are together in coffee shops and in other places where people gather to discuss matters of interest and concern to them.

This bill talks about controlling government expenditures. In fact, that is something that many people in my constituency talk about. They talk about the government controlling expenditures because they see the media reports about the government spending money on things that have no relationship whatsoever to the ability of the individual within my constituency and elsewhere to live a better life, to have a stronger quality of life. They see the government spending money in ways that are not directly affecting them personally, when they are losing their farms, their jobs, and the opportunity to send their children to school. They are losing control of their own lives. It is that loss of individual control that has led to directing those energies against the government.

Obviously, as I read it, this bill is an attempt to convince the Canadian population this government is serious about taking actions that will not cause them any more difficulties. There is an awful lot more at stake here. When we talk about the ability of governments to give the population of the country a quality of life and a confidence in their future, there is more to it than simply controlling government expenditures. There are two sides to every coin and governments can raise money and they can spend money. If they control spending it is one thing; if they allow revenues to disappear that is another matter. I could elaborate to some degree about the way this government has allowed revenues to slip away and how it has taken other revenues out of the economy, the GST for example, that could be utilized for other purposes and applied them to its own purposes within government.

The hon. member who spoke earlier from the government's side, from Nova Scotia, talked about New Democrats as being big spenders. I think we have to look at history to be able to understand what has happened in this country with spending.

We recall that Tommy Douglas was a sound and strong premier in the province of Saskatchewan. He inherited a very large debt and managed a government that left office without a debt in the province of Saskatchewan. Allan Blakeney, another New Democratic Party premier, managed the province of Saskatchewan for 11 years with 11 straight balanced budgets. When he left office in 1982, the province of Saskatchewan had a surplus of close to $200 million at a time when the economy was strong and continued to remain strong.

For nine subsequent years the Conservative government in the province of Saskatchewan managed to take that surplus through some good times and later some poor times and turned it into an almost $5 billion debt in a province where the annual revenues add up to less than $5 billion. In fact, the revenues available to the province of Saskatchewan equal just $4.5 billion. Obviously a $5 billion debt is beyond the ability of the people of that province to finance adequately.

In this last year we have seen the people of the provinces of Canada turn to the New Democratic Party to get them out of messes that have been created by others. As I mentioned, in the province of Saskatchewan the people left a mismanaged economy, a debt created by the Conservatives, and turned to the New Democrats to get them out of the mess.

In Ontario, the people, frustrated by Liberal deficit, turned to the NDP to manage that province properly.

In British Columbia, the people turned away from a Social Credit managed government and a Social Credit developed deficit and asked the New Democratic Party to clean up the mess.

I think that it will not be too long in the future that the fiscal mess created by this government will also be one that the people ask the New Democratic Party to clean up. I have every confidence that the New Democratic Party will be able to solve many of the problems that have been created by the present government.

When we talk about specific priorities, there is one in my own constituency that I have to talk about one more time. I have raised it in this House on numerous occasions. It is one which I have to raise again under this bill. It is the northern tax allowance program. This program recognized the inability of people who lived in northern and remote communities to have the same access to government services and resources that people in the more urban communities had access to.

In my own constituency a large number of people have asked for and received in the past the northern tax benefit. In some of those communities they received it for one year and then had it taken away from them by this government, after being told that they qualified and made the applications, people in the rural municipality of Beaver River, the rural municipality of Loon Lake, the towns of Loon Lake and Makwa.

A very unfair thing has happened to the people in those communities, people who deserve to have a benefit because of their so-called isolation from the other parts of Canada.

We recognize that everyone in Canada pays taxes. Anyone who has an income in this country above a certain level will pay taxes. We recognize that in return for those taxes the government provides a certain amount of service and a certain expectation about service. The people in communities such as Beaver River, et cetera, have an expectation about government services that can be supplied to them. They have recognized that because they do not have the same access to those programs that people in Saskatoon and Regina have the government has an obligation not to charge the same tax that is charged to the people in Saskatoon and Regina.

What the northern tax program did was provide some of that funding to those people in recognition of the fact that they were not as close to the services and to the quality of life that governments can provide. Mind you, they do have access to many government services and that is why they continue to pay the taxes they do.

No one is saying that they should not be paying taxes, but there has to be recognition that the taxes that are paid by northern residents should be somewhat less than are paid by other residents of Canada.

I am asking for a fair program to be instituted once again by this government, a fair program that understands and recognizes the needs of the people in these communities. At no time does a program which is going to deal with expenditures and not revenues deal with the matters affecting the constituents who live inside the boundaries of my constituency. These are people who are frustrated, angry, and cynical about the actions of this government. They have every reason to remain so as long as this government continues to take steps that do not deal with the problems directly affecting them. Farmers see the government providing funds to them, but the funding is inadequate because they continue to lose their farms and move off their farms into larger communities.

While this bill is attempting to address matters of concern to people of Canada it is missing the point entirely. If this government were serious about dealing with the fiscal problems, it would deal with the revenue side and it would deal with the other problems Canadians are experiencing.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to have an opportunity to speak on Bill C-56 respecting the control of government expenditures. As a member of the House of Commons finance committee I spent many hours with other members of the committee hearing testimony concerning this bill when it was in the form of proposed legislation. Our committee went to Washington in a very worth-while endeavour to examine the experience the United States has had with spending control legislation.

The work of that committee on this proposed legislation was an example of how parliamentarians can work together in a very non-partisan way, despite the differences among us on the fundamental principle of whether such a bill should be enacted in the Canadian parliamentary system. We studied how it worked in the United States under their system and we looked very carefully at the proposals before us in coming up with a set of unanimous recommendations on how the bill could be made to work better in Canada.

I want to emphasize, particularly for those watching, that this report I am referring to was not a Liberal Party report or a New Democratic Party report but a report of the House of Commons finance committee unanimously agreed to by all members of that committee, a majority of which were from the Conservative Party. Despite the fact that an all-party committee made unanimous recommendations on this report the government chose to adopt very few of them, and none of the most important ones.

First, I would like to express my concerns about whether this has any place at all in a parliamentary system. This is where we ran into the contradictions between our system and the U.S. system. Let it be understood that similar legislation in the United States, although it may have a place in its congressional system, has not worked.

The original attempt at deficit control legislation in the United States, the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Act, projected a balanced budget for the current fiscal year. The President recently brought down his proposed budget for the coming year and it projects a U.S. budgetary deficit of $399 billion for one year alone. That figure is just a little bit shy of what our total accumulated debt is and somewhat more than 10 times our projected deficit at the federal level in Canada.

If spending control legislation works the United States is not an example of it because it has failed to work there. Experts we met in Washington described the most recent version of it, the spending control act of 1990, as the incumbent re-election act. They regarded it very cynically as merely a means to take the pressure off incumbents by allowing them to go home to their districts in their system and say: "Sorry, we can't get you the new spending project you're looking for because of the spending control act". Nevertheless, the deficit in the United States continues to mount.

So we in our committee first of all acknowledged that the debt that the Government of Canada faces is a significant problem, and there was all-party agreement on that.

What we said was that what needs to be attempted is to achieve an objective of reducing our debt as a ratio of our national income.

Focusing merely on the size of the deficit is really quite misleading. It is like any family that needs to be concerned about the level of their household debt; it is only a problem if their income is insufficient to pay their debts as they become due. And so the committee focused on that point.

On the assumption that the government was intent on bringing this legislation in, which clearly was quite accurate an assumption, we then looked at how the legislation could be improved.

The first point we focused on was the fact that there cannot be an attempt to achieve a reduction in the debt as a ratio of our national income if only government spending is looked at. Instead, one has to look not only at spending, but also at revenue.

This proposed bill has a loophole that you could drive a truck through. This bill permits the government at any time to reduce taxes, reduce the amount of revenue that it brings in, even on the eve of an election without in any way infringing the provisions of the Act.

At least in the U.S. system any proposed tax reduction that any member of Congress wants to make must be offset by a reduction in spending somewhere else in the plan.

This government has brought forward a bill that enables it, just before the next election campaign, to introduce spending cuts without in any way affecting this proposed Bill C-56.

Our committee unanimously recommended that tax expenditures be included in the control plan.

The second thing we suggested is that Parliament should be able to suspend this bill in the event of an economic downturn upon the presentation to Parliament of a report by the Minister of Finance indicating that a downturn or recession is about to occur.

In other words, if things are going really badly in the economy it may well be necessary to increase spending for a short term in order to respond to that. All that we suggested, again unanimously, was that Parliament be consulted and enabled to lift the provisions of the act.

Another recommendation we made was that this Act be tightened. One of the things that we suggested—I know I am running out of time, but I want this to be clearly understood—we suggested that cash transfers to the provinces be removed from the base which this act controls.

Now let me explain the implications of that. This bill provides for certain controls on total government spending. Included in those amounts being spent is the amount that is transferred to provincial governments under programs for the federal assistance in post-secondary education and health.

Over the past few years we have had experience of governments reducing the amount of these transfer payments, and that has been very controversial in the House of Commons.

By leaving transfer payments in the spending control base, the government can increase spending in other areas while reducing transfer payments to the provinces and still meet the requirements of the spending control act.

In other words, the government could fail to address its underlying deficit problem by transferring the problem to the provinces by cutting back what is available to them under the EPF arrangements and still not have offended Bill C-56. This to us constituted a very important loophole. There are many other loopholes. We discussed some of them with the Auditor General and his staff when he appeared.

Let me give one further example to indicate why I have concerns about controlled spending for five years. The effect of it is only to control spending some time after the Auditor General's report for a previous year is received. In the last years of the controlled spending program a report will necessarily be received too late for anything to be done because it will be outside the statutory period.

My reaction to this bill is that it may have good intent but is of questionable pertinence to the parliamentary system and so riddled with loopholes as to be laughable even to those who would want to support it.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, I too am very pleased to stand in the House today to speak to Bill C-56, an act respecting control of government expenditure.

Here we have a government that is scrambling by producing a bill that is nothing short of smoke and mirrors. It is nothing more than another effort by this government to confuse Canadians into thinking it is really a government of good fiscal managers.

Are not governments really supposed to be in control of expenditures? Do they really have to pass a bill to convince themselves and others? Is this not something they should already be doing? Canada is in and has been in a recessionary period for almost a year.

First the government refused to use that famous "R" word and once members did learn how it was difficult for them to imagine that their own high interest rates at that time and high dollar policy helped create this made-in-Canada recession. Since then the government hit Canadians with the GST a year ago. Consumer spending and consumer confidence was shattered and that prolonged the recession.

Since this government came to power a tremendous cynicism has shrouded Canadians. It took over $160 billion in debt in 1984 and increased that debt to more than $400 billion today, in 1992. It has collaborated with the policies of the Bank of Canada to keep interest rates high and our dollar at a high level, only reducing them recently.

The high Canadian dollar is discouraging exports from Canada. One wonders what deal this government made with the U.S. government to keep our dollar rate so high.

We have seen cutbacks in transfer payments to the provinces, especially with the cap on the CAP for the provinces of Ontario, British Columbia, and Alberta. Does the government not realize how many jobs have been lost, particularly here in Ontario?

Does the government not know that in Toronto alone the jobless rate and the number of people on welfare is at an all-time high, the highest in the history of that city? Does the government not know that if we in Canada are to continue to compete in the global market we must maintain a high education standard and must ensure that retraining programs are in place for those who lost their jobs?

Here we have a government whose policies have decimated our fishing industry by callously ignoring its own people and giving preference to foreign fishermen.

Where in the world is the heart and the soul of this government?

Our Canadian farming industry is on its knees begging: "Let supply management remain in place, let this government defend its farmers at the GATT".

Now this government wants to pass legislation which would confine ministerial spending to the cumulative amount.

In other words this government cannot control its own ministers to live within its own budgets. It has to pass legislation to make sure they do.

These ministers have been shown to be incompetent. We know that on this side of the House. The Prime Minister knows they are incompetent. This begs the question as to why the Prime Minister allows them to stay. I say get rid of them. If you do not have trust in your frontline cabinet officials and if you have no trustworthy persons to replace them with, then for goodness sake let us call an election.

The Prime Minister presents a bill to legislate his ministers to keep them in line. In our parliamentary system of governing, budgetary controls are enacted. One would think that if a system of government is powerful enough to control its own fiscal policy, it could control its own spending.

This bill is nothing more than another sneaky measure to fool the people into thinking government members are responsible people.

It is hardly likely the Canadian people will elect this government again after what they have seen of it, especially since the election of 1988. They have seen the effects of the free trade deal; the GST; the government interest rates; its high dollar rate; its cutbacks in health and education and research and development; its negative impact on the CBC, VIA Rail, and Canada Post; the government's unravelling of the very fabric of this country; the closing of air bases in parts of Canada that were simply decimated by it.

This bill is to apply for five years starting in the fiscal year 1991–92. It is so desperate that it is an attempt to try to win back public support. This bill could cause the government to spend beyond the limits for each year set out in the bill. If this bill is intended to have a real impact, it would mean a new government elected would be unable to proceed with the programs for which it was elected. It would be unable to move immediately to carry out those priorities.

Of course a new government could amend legislation. But if this can be done, let me ask again: What is the point of the legislation in the first place? What is the point of proposing this bill if its life does not go beyond that of this Parliament?

This legislation does not exclude from its coverage its restraints and its limitations, programs like the old age pension and family allowances. What happens under this bill if the government's forecasts about the amount required for the old age pension is wrong? What happens if more of the population becomes older and lives longer than forecasted, creating greater need for expenditures under the old age security system? Is the Conservative government saying in this bill that it will cut back on the old age pension, even if there are older Canadians who expect and need these payments?

Liberals are concerned about issues of government expenditures and deficits. I want to make this abundantly clear. However as I have said at the outset, this proposal, this bill before the House is really nothing more than cosmetic. It simply puts into legislative form what this government has been doing anyway and that is working to live within its own budgetary projections.

I want to point out to those Canadians concerned about government expenditures and government activities that this bill does nothing to address their concerns, the concerns of Canadians about this government's ways and excessive taxes. In short this government is proposing legislation to do what it already has the authority to do. The proposal is simply an attempt by the Conservative government to hoodwink Canadians into thinking they are a great bunch of guys and gals on the other side of the House. They are finally coming to grips with the negative effects of their own economic incompetence and mismanagement.

This government ignores Canadians. It ignores the businesses that have shut down and want more than cosmetic measures from this government. They want a government that is concerned with the good management of itself and this country's affairs, one that helps rather than harms their basic confidence. More than this bill, Canadians want an election to give themselves a new and better government.

I am sure all Canadians, and not just my colleagues in the House and I, are continually distressed with the measures and the actions this government is taking, especially this bill which is nothing more than an attempt to deceive Canadian taxpayers into thinking that the government is a good fiscal manager and that it is concerned about the economy and budgetary controls.

I am pleased to speak against this bill on behalf of the constituency of Nepean.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Madam Speaker, thank you for giving me this opportunity to say a few words about Bill C–56 on behalf of the constituents of Scarborough West.

When I look at bills the very first thing I do is try to analyse what is going to affect the people of Scarborough West. I try to read the bill as objectively a way as I can and try to determine how to explain the contents and the decision making that went into putting forward a bill like Bill C–56.

I like to put myself in the position of the people in the coffee shop discussing this piece of legislation. When I do so—and I am trying to be fair—it conjures up an image to me. The image this entire bill conjures up is somebody in front of a low table on which there is a pea and the halves of three walnut shells. That person wants you to watch where the pea is, watch it be moved around and then decide under what shell the pea should be. That is called the old shell game. Another name for it is the con game.

Why would that kind of an image be conjured up in my mind when I look at Bill C–56? Let's start with what it is supposed to do. It is called: "an act respecting the control of government expenditures". If we look inside we see that the very first section says:

> This Act may be cited as the Spending Control Act.

They are three very simple words that I think most Canadians would probably interpret in the following way. Spending means paying out money; control means controlling the amount of spending being done. I would think that most constituents of Scarborough West when looking at the spending control act would say: "My goodness, we have finally got an act that is going to get government spending under control and ensure that spending is done in a controlled fashion".

When the Minister of Finance was responding to recommendations of the Standing Committee on Finance in December 1991, he referred directly to one of the comments made in recommendation No. 1 of the finance committee, which was specifically that "all members were not in agreement that a spending control act was either necessary or desirable".

What did the Minister of Finance say to that criticism? What he said is very relevant, I feel, in discussing the methodology of Bill C–56. He said quite clearly: "The government and most of the witnesses appearing before the committee strongly feel that continuing to exert firm control over expenditures is essential to ensure that the deficit is reduced and that public debt as a percentage of the economy declines".

Here is the interesting portion: "The spending control act will provide assurance to Canadians that Parliament shares this view and will demand discipline from government". I stress those words: "will demand discipline from government".

When we look at this bill we ask: Does it in fact demand discipline from any particular government? We do not have to go very far before we begin to see what is really happening and where the shell game begins. We see the spending limits, and most Canadians will be happy to know that the spending limit for the 1991–92 fiscal year is a mere $97.2 billion. The following year it will be just $100.9 billion. The year after that it will be $104 billion. It is increasing each year. The year after that, 1994–95, it will be $107.4 billion. After that, it will be $111.25 billion. Constant increases. Do not forget, this is called the Spending Control Act. Yet, the spending is going up.

Section 3 addresses what will happen if we underspend. Presumably most Canadians are hoping that if this is the Spending Control Act spending will be controlled and that amount will not be met in the spending of the government.

The act provides that where the minister announces that it appears the spending limit for the preceding year will exceed the program spending for the preceding year the minister may allocate all or part of that excess to the particular year. The spending limit for the particular year shall be increased by the amount so allocated. We have to read that about 10 times before we can make any sense of it. We are moving the shells around and trying to figure out where the pea is.

What happens if spending is going to be increased and we go beyond the limit, because this spending control bill allows the government to spend beyond the limits it has set? It says, and I am sort of compressing it because the wording is unbelievable, the minister may propose program spending for the particular year that exceeds the spending limit for the particular year, if the minister allocates the excess to the two next following controlled fiscal years in such proportions as the minister shall determine.

The spending limit for the year 1992–93 happens to be $100.9 billion. Should the minister decide that expenses will be beyond $100.9 billion he will simply advise us that it is the case and the increase, whatever it may be, will be carried forward into the upcoming two years.

Where is the spending control the spending control act is talking about here? Is it doing anything more than moving the pea around underneath the shell on the table? The answer is no. The minister can do what I have just read anyway. One would presume that any responsible Minister of Finance would want to ensure that he gets the best value for every dollar spent. Naturally, if the minister can get the same services for less money, that is to his or her credit. I would hope that would be one of the things the Minister of Finance would be striving for.

Should it happen that the minister does come in under budget lo and behold we have a little extra money. Hopefully that would be used to pay down the debt or for whatever else we Canadians think the money should be used for.

If it should happen that the minister is wrong and he or she has to spend more money than was originally allocated the minister can take that into account in any future budget. The minister can already do what the so-called spending control act is putting into words.

What is the purpose? Why have another act? Why take up the time of the House of Commons? Why take up the time of committees to examine an act which is merely putting into words what the minister can already do, as any good finance minister should do, as any reasonable person in their own home does?

You have a certain amount of money. If you manage to buy the things you wish to buy and have a few dollars left over you can apply it to the Visa bill, put it into the bank, or do what you want with it. On the other hand, if you have made a miscalculation and end up spending a little bit more money, then you adjust for that the next month.

On a huge scale the Minister of Finance is doing what we in our homes do each and every month. We do not need a piece of legislation to tell us what we need to do. We need some common sense. Common sense is something that is very prevalent in the riding of Scarborough West. The constituents of Scarborough West ask, through me: "Why do we need a bill that already tells us what the minister can do?"

It is for cosmetic purposes, as our critic the hon. member for Windsor West has already said. We are just putting a little make-up on the government to make it look good. We are going into an election year. Things do not look very good for the government right now. It is going to try to put a happy face on disastrous policies. That happy face will say: "We're going to control spending". We do not have to go beyond the third section of the so-called spending control act to see that it is nothing. It is a shell game. If the government overspends, it will overspend. If it underspends it will do what it wants anyway.

For that reason the people of Scarborough West, using their common sense, know they cannot support this legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member's time has expired. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING AGENCIES ACT

Hon. Charles Mayer (for the Minister of Agriculture) moved that Bill C-54, an act to amend the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act and other acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee D.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill C-54 before us amends the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

We all know that we face difficulties in the agricultural industry on many fronts but we do have a pretty efficient and a well-recognized industry, not only at home but internationally. We feed ourselves with a smaller percentage of disposable income than any country in the world. We produce in surplus for export markets and when we do sell into those markets our reputation is very good.

When we look around at what is likely to be the situation in the future, we find we will have to be more and more adaptable as time goes on. We think, and a lot of producers and producer organizations agree, that one of the ways to best accomplish this is to have the wherewithal, where it is possible, and to some extent the decision making for how we adapt, in the hands of the producers that are involved.

The government said in the throne speech:

> We guarantee our future not by running from global competition, but by meeting it head on by equipping ourselves to compete with the best.

In many ways that is what this bill is designed to do. It is enabling legislation. It is designed to provide the opportunity for producers to put in place what has come to be known as a check off, to use the money for research and promotion, for things like the advertising that we see on a regular basis. The Beef Information Centre in Toronto that advertises beef is an example. The money will be used for consumer education, domestic and foreign marketing efforts, as well as research into production of a product, processing of a product, distribution, and marketing.

There are many examples of why we should do that. Essentially we are taking what has come to be known as the Farm Products Marketing Act and changing its name because it will have a broader scope. The new title will be the Farm Products Agencies Act. The bill changes the name from the Farm Products Marketing Council to simply the Farm Products Council. At the same time we will be putting a new section 3 in the bill that will provide for the establishment of levies or check-offs so that they can be set up nationally, as I said, for promotion and research into various products.

There is pretty wide support for this, Mr. Speaker. The Canadian Cattlemen's Association, the Canadian Horticultural Council, the Canadian Pork Council, the Canadian Fruit Wholesalers Association, the Fresh for Flavour Foundation, the Western Grain Research Foundation, the Canadian Honey Council, and the Canadian Nursery Trade Association all support this. All of these groups have expressed interest in a national check-off system.

These groups have indicated that they would spend a portion of the funds on primary production research projects. This type of national check-off is consistent with pillars in the agrifood strategy that came out in the paper two years ago called "Growing Together", one of them asking the industry to be more self-reliant and more market oriented.

In saying that, I want to emphasize that this in no way indicates the government has any intention of backing away from support for the industry, either in some of the things we have been doing directly or in the kind of money that has been spent in the past on research. I want to knock that one in the head as quickly as I can. Anybody who wants to look at this as a signal that the government is intending to back away and use this legislation as a way of doing so, that is simply not the case at all. Quite the contrary. What you will find is if you can raise some producer money yourself, either from the private side or governments or a combination thereof, you can use it, as it has come to be known, to lever additional money.

I would also suggest that if you are a barley producer and have the ability to raise funds for research and advertising and do it at a very basic level, and you want to get involved with a check-off, to spend a little bit of money on each tonne or each bushel that is marketed in this type of a way, you are going to have a pretty good feel for what in fact this money should be spent on.

On that basis I would suggest that you are going to get pretty good use of the money as opposed to collecting and running it through various sets of committees and bureaucracy, not to mention the fact that they all cost money to run. You will have less diffusion of objectives coming from the producer if it is done by a system of raising money directly from producers themselves.

Some of the activities that could be supported by check-offs include market research, new product development, consumer education, advertising, and promotion. There are examples of that already in place. The Canadian Cattlemen's Association, as I mentioned, has for a number of years through their provincial associations, sponsored and run the Beef Information Centre out of Toronto. We see those ads on a reasonably regular basis on television. That is the kind of thing that would be envisioned. The Canadian Horticultural Council and the Canadian Produce Marketing Association through the Fresh for Flavour Foundation promote fresh fruits and vegetables but they find, I am told, that funding is not always adequate.

The Americans have a check-off in place for their cattle industry. Some of us have followed this. They have had, I think, two national referendums to get one in place. It has been established now for a number of years and their estimate is that for every dollar they spend on advertising they get a $4 return. It is not to say that is always the case but there is pretty good evidence that the money spent in this way is useful in promoting what we have in this country, which is some very healthy and wholesome food.

I believe that we have, for several reasons, some of the best conditions for growing wholesome food that is very pure. We find this all the time in our grain markets, for instance, where our customers recognize Canada as one of the prime areas in the world for producing food in a very wholesome way.

Just as an example, I had a chance in the last couple of years to talk to people from Europe who had visited the Peace River country and found that in some cases they could not believe what they were seeing, an area very rich in soil, in climatic conditions and in environment, which had not been farmed very long and therefore not had a chance to be polluted by pesticides or chemicals. Because of that they thought there was an opportunity to market products out of that area in an environmental way simply because of the purity of the environment the food is produced in. But to do that we have to get our message out and this is the type of legislation that could be used.

As I said, it is enabling legislation. It can provide for either a mandatory check-off or what would be a mandatory check-off with the ability to have money refunded. It will be run and looked after by the National Farm Products Council, as it will be known when this legislation is passed.

In summary, this is legislation that has been asked for by farmers themselves. It is, as I said, enabling legislation. There is nothing compulsory about it. Producers would be able to organize themselves and ask the government through the National Farm Products Council to put this type of legislation in place. They would, at the same time, need the concurrence of their various provinces.

There is evidence from what we have been doing up to now that this kind of check-off system works. There is evidence internationally that it works as well. There are new products that are available now to satisfy consumers' needs. Food is no longer simply a means of sustenance. It has become in many cases a way of life that involves many other things than just the product itself. By providing producers with an opportunity to become directly involved in spending some of their own money to support themselves in some of these areas is very useful and I look forward to the support of the House in this matter.

In conclusion I want to move an amendment, pursuant to Standing Order 73(3). I move:

> That the motion for second reading of Bill C-54 be amended by having the bill referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture rather than the Legislative Committee.

Mr. Foster: The minister is simply moving that the legislation be referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture rather than to a legislative committee. We have no objection to that on our side.

Mr. Althouse: Yes, this has been discussed in the Standing Committee on Agriculture and we are expecting the bill. We have no objection to it going there, Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Taylor: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am wondering if there are questions and comments on the minister's statement.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Not for the first two speakers. There will be when you get up.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, we would have been glad to hear from the hon. member but I guess if the rules are being strictly enforced we will have to accept your direction in that regard.

Bill C-54 provides amendments to the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act and essentially changes this act by adding a new section to it which provides legislative authority to have check-offs for agencies established by the government, by an Order in Council, for national check-offs. These check-offs involve interprovincial groups, as well as check-offs for crops being marketed from the international realm into the Canadian marketplace. It is legislation that is very similar to some legislation now in place at the provincial level which establishes agencies, that are very different from the agencies provided for National Farm Products Marketing Agencies.

The bill changes the other legislation to remove the word "marketing" and puts in "National Farm Products Agencies Act". It is legislation that a number of organizations, including the beef producers, honey organizations, and the Horticultural Council of Canada, have supported.

It has one very special feature to it and that is that these check-offs would not only apply to producers within Canada but to products coming into Canada. In some commodities where we do not import it would not be a very big feature.

For commodities such as fruits and vegetables which we do not produce in this country, perishable fruits in the wintertime, and so on, it would make provisions for a check-off. Those check-offs could be used for promotion of that product or they could be used for research.

I think the number of agencies asking for this indicates that they want it.

In sending this legislation to the standing committee we have to be sure of a number of things.

One is that the government is not planning to off-load their responsibility for research in this country onto the producers of the commodity, whether it is the beef producers, horticulture crop producers or whatever. The federal government historically has had a national responsibility for basic research, for fundamental research, for research that is transmitted and made available to producers.

Clearly, in the discussions which will take place in the standing committee, we will want to have those kinds of assurances. Perhaps they could be written into the legislation or perhaps there is some other mechanism to ensure that those safeguards are there.

We do not want this government which has drastically reduced the amount of support for research, I believe some $40 million between 1989 and 1990, to shirk its duty in that responsibility. We do not want it to off-load it on to the producers or the provinces, as it did with some of the safety net legislation. They have a responsibility to carry out that research.

The promotion itself is something that is up to producers. Clearly, there have to be mechanisms in the legislation to make sure that the majority of producers want this and that there are adequate safeguards to ensure that there is a referendum in the provinces that produce the commodity, or on a national basis to ensure that whatever is being done a majority and a good solid majority of the producers support that promotion.

It is my understanding that this legislation can be used by the existing supply management groups if they want to have check-offs. I believe they now have mechanisms where certain types of check-offs or funds come out of their national organization for promotion but I do not think it is used for research very often. So that adds another provision for those groups.

A number of organizations have indicated their support for this legislation, I understand the Canadian Cattlemen's Association, the Canadian Pork Council, the Canadian Horticultural Council, the Canadian Fruit Wholesalers Association, the Fresh for Flavour Foundation, the Western Grains Research Foundation, the Canadian Honey Council and the Canadian Nursery Trade Association. Clearly, there are those groups that support the legislation.

As I understand the legislation, there would be provision in it for co-operation between provincial and national organizations running check-offs.

It is interesting that a number of these organizations that are supporting this legislation really have been very reluctant ever to become involved in a national farm products marketing agencies act under the existing legislation which provides for supply management and cost of production and all the rest of it.

This bill before the House today needs to go to the standing committee to make sure that there are safeguards with regard to how it will be used.

Clearly, some groups like the National Farmers Union have expressed concern that they want to be able to appear before the standing committee.

They see it as a regressive tax on farm production because the majority of those producers of a commodity would be able to vote and have a levy which could be used for promoting that product nationally or internationally.

They are concerned that the government will off-load its research responsibility.

Those are legitimate concerns which need to be aired and examined.

The Canadian Pork Council is concerned that the check-off system would result in a costly additional bureaucracy and institutional arrangements.

It seems to me that those are the kinds of concerns that need to be explored and analyzed. We need to see if there are amendments that can be made to the legislation to ensure that those kinds of problems do not exist with this check-off legislation.

Clearly we would want to see that this legislation would be supported by the majority of producers. We should examine whether there is some way that the vast majority of the producers would support the legislation. The check-off could be very arbitrary and harmful to low income producers or smaller producers. I think we need to look at that aspect in the committee when it is being examined.

It is my understanding that this legislation can be used for the supply management sectors. They do have some provision, of course, for this kind of promotion under existing legislation but here they would be able to impose levies which could be used for the research project.

Those are a number of concerns that we have about Bill C-54.

It is my understanding that this legislation can be implemented on a basis in which it would be mandatory or could be refundable. That is another aspect that has to be clearly identified. There are voluntary check-offs now for beef producers and on some other commodities. We would like to know just how the legislation would operate in that regard.

Those are a number of the factors which we think need to be considered when we look at this legislation in the standing committee.

I want to say a word or two about the original legislation, the act that we are amending here today, the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act.

That legislation was set up in 1971 by the Parliament of Canada. A number of national farm products marketing agencies have been established: the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency, the Canadian Turkey Marketing Agency, the Canadian Chicken Marketing Agency, and the Canadian Broiler Hatching Egg Marketing Agency.

At the present time, there has been a report and an examination. I understand that there will be a vote next spring on the support that exists across the country for establishing a national apple marketing agency.

• (1730)

The reason I raise this is because that legislation was established some 20 years ago. It is really companion legislation to what was done under the Canadian Dairy Commission. It is under attack in the report that was issued by Arthur Dunkel, the secretary general of GATT in mid-December of last year.

That legislation has brought order out of chaos in several pieces of legislation in many farm sectors where farmers are able to produce and market a commodity and have some idea what the price will be.

It really was revolutionary legislation because in our country and in most of the western world the farmers' bargaining power is very little. In most commodities there are large international trading corporations which practically control the price of the commodities.

The National Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act, which was brought in in the early 1970s, gave producers the power to bargain in the marketplace with those large powerful retailing agencies, the international commodity companies.

Out of that has grown a very vibrant, progressive, effective farm supply management system where our poultry, egg, and dairy products are marketed on the basis of the cost of production, the average cost of production of the most efficient two-thirds.

It is amazing, as we look around the world, how much more efficient those producers have become. I do not have the exact figures in my head but the ones I remember are that Canadian dairy producers have become, during that 20-year period, about 70 per cent more efficient. For American producers it is about 42 per cent and for Great Britain it is around 25 per cent. We have a healthy, vibrant, rural agriculture.

There was great concern expressed during the free trade debate back in 1987-88 as to whether those supply management marketing agencies could survive the free trade agreement. Clearly they are very much under the gun today because of that.

I recall one meeting we had in Fredericton, N.B., where various groups, the local co-operative, the dairy farmers, the poultry producers, the egg producers came before our committee and said: "If you want to see what the market economy can do for agriculture in New Brunswick, just go across the border in Maine where you will find practically no agriculture".

Most of their poultry and egg commodities are being produced in Georgia and Alabama and in southern states where there are no energy costs. Most of their milk is being produced in New Jersey or farther south.

We have in Atlantic Canada, in Quebec, in Ontario, and in parts of Manitoba and British Columbia a very vibrant, healthy, rural economy. It is something we have put in place. It is unique in the world. We produce the commodities that we need. We do not flood the international market. We continue to provide for the amount of access that historically has been the case from other countries such as the United States for poultry, turkey, eggs, or whatever was in place.

This system has meant prosperity, a continuous supply of farm commodities to the consumers at reasonable prices. Historically it has not increased any more than the Consumer Price Index and has increased at a price lower than those for commodities not produced under supply management. This is a legacy the Parliament of Canada has put in place under the legislation we propose to amend today.

There have been two very serious challenges to the whole system of marketing by the free trade agreement. When the government negotiated the free trade agreement it did not get any import controls for dairy commodities. The United States had an historical protection called a waiver which it got from the GATT negotiations back in 1954. It gave it complete control of imports.

As Minister of Agriculture John Wise stood in the House and said that the free trade deal did not threaten the supply management marketing boards of this country. I do not know whether he did not know or whether he did not want to face the reality of it, but clearly the FTA did so. There was no provision in there for import controls for processed dairy products like yogurt and ice-cream or any of the other processed dairy products. The historical arrangement under article XI of GATT provided for fresh farm produce but certainly did not provide for processed dairy products.

Mr. Wise made the pronouncement in January 1988 that there would be no problem for our dairy and poultry industries; he would simply put these dairy products on the import control list. He was immediately challenged by Senator Lloyd Benson from Texas who said there was no provision in the free trade agreement to regulate import controls and if the government did it the United States government would immediately challenge it.

About 11 months later the government put ice-cream, yogurt and a number of cheeses, butters, powders and so on on the import control list as of January 1, 1989. Immediately the United States challenged it and a GATT panel was struck. Nine months later, in September 1989, lo and behold the member of the senate finance committee of the United States was right that there were no import controls under the FTA and the decision of the government to place ice-cream and yogurt on the import control list was struck down by a GATT panel. Three months later, in early December 1989, the government agreed to the decision of the GATT panel.

That was when we got into the GATT provisions and that is why when the government went to the GATT it asked for not just the maintenance of article XI but the strengthening and clarification of article XI. The strengthening was to make it apply not only to fresh raw farm commodities like milk, chicken, and eggs but to any commodity that contained more than 51 per cent of that fresh raw farm commodity. That is where we are today. The government has been at the GATT table since 1986, the Uruguay round which could well have been the Vancouver round. The Prime Minister was determined that the meeting had to be in Montreal in 1986 so the decision was that it would be the Uruguay round because he would not support the Vancouver round approach.

During the last five years we have to look at what progress the government has made in pursuing its position to strengthen and clarify article XI of the GATT. The government should get busy in the next eight weeks and persuade the United States Congress and President Bush to accept our position. Let us be frank about this: very few countries oppose our position. Perhaps Holland and Britain, but most European countries are not very upset with the strengthening and clarifying of article XI. Most of the Cairns group apart from perhaps New Zealand is opposed to our position.

The government says in the House that 102 countries are opposing our position. That is probably not right. Probably a few oppose it, but our main problem is with the United States that wants access to our dairy and poultry products market in Canada because its industry, especially the dairy industry, is in total disarray. Literally thousands of dairy producers go broke daily or weekly or monthly because they have a system that simply does not provide them with an adequate return.

The final eight weeks of the GATT negotiations are critical. In my view there is one window where the Prime Minister should get busy and persuade the European countries to support his position. Most of all he should persuade George Bush to support his position. If that happens we will continue to have a supply management system.

What happens if the GATT negotiations break down totally? We go back to what is left from the FTA which is a disaster because the Americans already have access to our ice-cream and yogurt market. One more reference by the United States to a GATT panel for butter, cheese and powder, the major dairy commodities, would probably render the same solution. That would be extremely disastrous for our supply management system. Once a precedent were set for dairy products it would probably apply to poultry products and eggs as well.

The second alternative is if the government at the end of the day agrees to the tariffication system or there is agreement and the tariffication system becomes the order of the day. There are so many unknowns in that regard, but clearly none of the supply management groups believe the tariffication system will allow for the long-term operation of the supply management system.

We have increased access. We have the violent fluctuations of 100 per cent and 200 per cent in the value of commodities, and the value of commodities we would be referenced to would be United States commodities. In no time the tremendous capacity of United States producers to flood our market and put producers out of business would be evident.

We have an excellent system. The legislation that provides for this system is the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act and the Canadian Dairy Commission which operates in a very similar kind of way. We are going to see 25,000 people on the Hill on Friday of this week, and they are not just farmers. They are the rural suppliers, people from the co-ops, people from the fuel companies, farm equipment suppliers, all kinds of groups.

Yesterday a representative from the Chamber of Commerce—I think he was in the Fraser Valley—stood up and told the Prime Minister: "This is not just an issue for the dairy and poultry industries of Fraser Valley. It is for our entire community".

These are the people who keep the economy of rural Canada going. You take them away and get less successful, or less prosperous industries. Their buying power, their impact on the community is lower. They gave the figure that for every $1 million worth of supply management commodity that is marketed in this country, some 14 jobs are created. There are 38,000 supply management producers, farmers, and farming businesses across this country. They employ some 22,000 people directly.

If you go into the processing industry, the processors of milk, the processors of dairy commodities, novelties, ice cream, yogurt, and all these products, or if you go into the poultry sector, the processing of those, you are talking about over 95,000 jobs in this country. These are not jobs that are all in downtown Toronto. These are jobs that are spread out through rural Canada, through Ontario, Manitoba, certainly in the prairies as well, in B.C., and the maritimes. This is an important sector of our economy. It would be impossible to exaggerate the impact that the Dunkel report would have on rural Canada. It really deals with the food security of our country.

The time will come, in my view, when most of the countries of the world, like the United States, will have vast vertically integrated food production systems. There are producers of eggs for instance in the United States who produce as many eggs as our whole production in Canada. They are usually located in the southern states where they do not have high energy costs and they have very low labour costs.

We do not want that system. We want a system that meets our needs and creates jobs, where we have a better environmental arrangement. When we go into factory operations we have all kinds of environmental and health problems. We want to maintain that kind of system.

The basic legislation which we are amending today to provide for check-offs and for research is that basic legislation which has provided that very secure, stable, progressive, and efficient production of agricultural commodities. It is a pity that all sectors could not have it. We simply cannot operate on that basis with major export commodities because you have to operate at a world price. Even at that we do have orderly marketing for wheat and barley by having the Canadian Wheat Board and similar kinds of marketing agencies for wheat and commodities in eastern Canada.

The genius of the National Farm Products Marketing Act which we are amending in this legislation today to provide a whole new section has been that it provides a very stable, secure system for food production in this country. This system can become more efficient and provide employment, food security, a vibrant rural life in Canada.

We have seen a devastation of our manufacturing sector in this past two or three years. In my constituency there have been literally thousands of jobs lost in the manufacturing sector. We certainly do not want to see that happen as a result of our downgrading the supply management system for dairy and poultry farmers.

If the Dunkel report was adopted, as has been proposed, every one of those sectors claim they would not survive the six years. In the case of poultry, they talked about going from 2,400 poultry producers to some 32 massive, vertically integrated production units, probably located in central Canada with the western part of our country and the vast rural areas of Atlantic Canada completely shut out.

The motion that was put by my party last week when we had the special debate on the GATT negotiations and on supply management called on the Prime Minister to personally get involved in those negotiations. We do not believe that the negotiators, regardless of how good they are, and I believe that they are capable people, have had much success. They have been there for five years in the Uruguay round in Geneva.

When the Dunkel report came out it did not mention the strengthening and clarifying of our supply management, article XI. Therefore, it is up to the Prime Minister to use the power and prestige of his office, as the motion that was unanimously adopted by this House asks, and that the Prime Minister become personally involved, that he garner the support of the other countries that favour our position: Japan, Israel, Norway, Switzerland, and Korea. I believe he should be getting a joint declaration.

There was a declaration by the negotiators which they took to Mr. Dunkel, Secretary-General of GATT, back in mid-December. That motion by those negotiators does not have the same prestige it would have had if the Prime Minister sat down with the Prime Minister of Japan and Israel and the other countries involved and they issued a joint declaration.

We are a major trading country. Japan is a major trading country. Korea is becoming an important trading country. Israel has a lot of influence in the world.

"This is our bottom line. This is what we want. We do not expect to be able to flood the world with cheap surplus food. We are net importers of these commodities. We are willing to provide an increased access of 3 or 5 per cent", I believe was the government's negotiating position. We are willing to reduce any subsidies. There is very little subsidy involved anyway. But this was the position put forward but we want to have a strengthened and clarified article XI.

If the Prime Minister would take that action and then arrange to meet jointly, as a motion of the House calls on him to do, supported by the prime ministers of these other countries who are just as adamant as we are, saying that this is our position, this is what we want to achieve out of the GATT round because the GATT round does make some changes with regard to export subsidies, for instance to the United States Export Enhancement Program, the European subsidies and so on, which will be beneficial to the grain and oilseeds sector.

If we sat down with the leadership of Europe, with the President of the United States and said: "This is what we have to have in order to maintain rural Canada, the family farm, the basis, the most secure and stable sector of our agriculture," I believe that we could be successful. I see that as a very narrow window to have a strengthened and clarified article XI.

If we go back to what has been left over, the ice cream and yogurt decision from the free trade deal, that is very, very dangerous. The U.S. could move in easily on us. The tariffication proposal also is unacceptable for maintaining these marketing boards which were established under the original Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act.

We want to see the amendments go to committee for consideration, discussion, and examination of the concerns that have been expressed by some producers, although a great many of the agencies have expressed their support. I hope that the Prime Minister and the government will act now because the time is late for maintaining those agencies which are provided for under this original legislation. It would be impossible to exaggerate the importance to rural Canada of maintaining those agencies, those producers, those jobs and that processing industry. It is very important to Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Under Standing Order 74, the hon. member now has 20 minutes plus 10 minutes questions and comments.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I realize that my remarks have to be limited.

The bill that we have before us, C-54, is a proposal to amend the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act and other acts of consequence thereof. We will also be amending the Customs and Tariffs Act, the Access to Information Act, the Privacy Act and the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

The legislation that we are amending has been around almost 20 years and was an attempt, and I think a fair attempt, at providing farmers with the marketing tools they need to become self-reliant and market oriented individuals in a world market.

I am not particularly happy with the amendments that are being proposed today. What we have is equivalent to offering a student a pencil, with these amendments when we know computers are available. That is essentially what the government is doing with this bill. It is understandable knowing where the government came from.

Members of the government opposed the implementation of this act 20 years ago. They fought it as long and as hard as they could and you will remember, Mr. Speaker, that in those days it was possible for private members to hold up bills for a long, long time. You could speak forever instead of being limited to 20 minutes, as I am now. You could continue the debate ad nauseam. As long as any member wanted to make a speech it could be made. Now this debate can be limited to two days and it then goes off to committee. In other words, in the old democratic House, this legislation had a terrible time getting through.

As a result of democracy having more sway or full sway relative to today's circumstances, the opponents to the government's proposal were able to make considerable changes. We have quite a few pages in the existing National Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act which are due to interventions on behalf of the Cattlemen's Association by the Conservative Party of Canada.

Essentially the upshot of it was that the national products marketing legislation that we have is very limiting. It is so limiting that same Cattlemen's Association has had to come to the government to get it to make amendments to the act so that it can do a few minor things it would like to do, namely raise funds for promotion of products and for some research.

I point out that those marketing agencies and marketing boards that have been established under the act have both of those rights within the existing act. They can in fact raise levies for marketing and during the course of that marketing they can do promotion and market research. I understand some of what is being proposed in this act would extend the terminology, the definition of research, beyond that used for market research to actual production research.

This act has functioned in Canadian Confederation because there are similar acts in each of the provinces which permit the establishment of marketing agencies or marketing boards within each province. This particular marketing agencies act permitted those agencies to come together under a federal umbrella and act for all of the producers of that particular commodity across all of Canada.

The government is proposing here today to set up a companion section in the act which would permit the establishment under very similar terms of agencies whose job would be simply to take funds from producers by way of a check-off and to permit the producer group to administer those funds for what they call promotion of the product. I think that is a rather inefficient way to do it.

I hear of trips by the cattlemen's commission in Alberta, for instance, which has done this on a provincial basis overseas. I hear of some of the other commodity groups making similar trips. They are very good junkets for the board of directors and perhaps some of the management people who have been hired by the agencies, but they do not really do a very effective job of promoting the Canadian product.

Put yourself in the position of a would-be-buyer. You are approached by a bunch of Canadian beef producers who give you a very good spiel on the benefits of Canadian beef. It is clean. It is raised in a proper environment, free of all sorts of agents that might exist from more industrialized countries. You are all set to buy and when you tell them so, they say: "Well, gee, we do not have any beef. We do not really get into that business. We produce it and we promote it, but golly, we cannot give you any because we are not in that part of the business. You will have to deal with one of our packing plants".

They will say: "When we get home to Canada, we will tell this packing plant that you are interested in Canadian beef". They will report to their farmers and their ranchers that they have done a great job of having promoted Canadian beef in another foreign country, but no sales have been made and nothing has been completed. Those agencies that are established as marketing boards, however, do have the option and the opportunity to complete the sale. When one of the pork boards or combined force of the pork boards goes overseas to talk about the benefits of Canadian pork they can complete the sale and have it within their power and their ability to deliver a product to the people with whom they have created an interest.

In terms of straight efficiency and furtherance of a market oriented approach, the government has missed the boat quite badly with the kind of amendments it has put here by forcing a second tier in this particular legislation. If it had wanted to be helpful to producers, it would have taken away the prohibition on the establishment of such marketing agencies as exists now for poultry, eggs, turkeys, and hatching eggs, by lifting the requirement that when a producer group forms marketing agencies across the country in each of the provinces it has to work very hard to get itself together, put a plan together, then picket or lobby the House of Commons and the government to force the government to open up the National Products Marketing Agencies Act in order to include its particular product.

Apple producers are in that position now. Seven or eight years ago we had the tobacco people in here. Unfortunately, the tobacco people had expended so much time, money and effort just getting their little one word amendment to the act that they had no more energy or money to pursue the process after they succeeded in getting what they wanted.

There are some problems with only going as far as the government is proposing to go with these promotion agencies. As I said in the beginning, it is like offering people a pencil when you know there are computers. It is not very a high-tech solution to providing farmers with the necessary tools they need to do a good job of marketing and promotion. But this is all the government proposes to offer.

There are some questions as to what the effect will be, given this limited offer that has been proposed. The Minister for Grains and Oilseeds opened the debate for the government. He said: "For instance, barley producers could use this legislation if they want to promote barley". The minister and I had a little discussion after and he admits that is not really quite true right across the country. That might apply to parts of Ontario that lie east of Thunder Bay and, perhaps, Quebec and Atlantic Canada, but it does not apply in the Wheat Board area which is from Thunder Bay west.

Those producers of wheat and barley fall under the Canadian Wheat Board Act and the proposals we have before us explicitly take them out of the authority of this particular act. If they want to provide for such check-offs, they would have to apply under the Canadian Wheat Board Act. In fact, the Canadian Wheat Board does an excellent job of market promotion and research and funds them from the moneys it has available as the sole marketer of Canadian wheat and barley for export.

Likewise, those people who are in the pork business have the ability to raise funds for market promotion and research under the various provincial marketing boards that now exist. That is not a restraint on the abilities of that particular commodity group to function.

With the proposal we have here perhaps we will see the pork council succeed in convincing the minister who is really the only one who needs to be convinced in these matters. With the approval of the marketing council, they should be able to institute a national check-off over and above the check-off that the provincial pork marketing boards have at that time. These check-offs would either be mandatory or voluntary, at the choice of the initiating group. If it is decided to be mandatory then all producers who sell or import that particular commodity would be subject to the levy. In order to catch the imports, the Customs Act is being opened up. The agency that is struck for promotion would have the ability to go to the customs officials and ask for documentation to see whether the voluntary reporting by an importer complies and fits with the actual amount of the affected good that was imported.

The whole inclusion of imported product also raises some questions. If we are going to be extolling the virtues for instance of Canadian beef, and we are doing so, can we in fact do that honestly if we are also including the beef that is imported and collecting a levy from it? We do not identify that now. If it goes through a Canadian processor, it wears a Canadian grade and is viewed by consumers as being Canadian beef whether it originated here or not.

If we talk about Canadian beef, will that be GATTable or will we have to describe it as generic beef? I know that producers are going to be putting up most of the money for this, but there was some mention in the minister's speech about matching funds, which raises the whole question of where those other funds will come from. I presume that some of it could come from a provincial or the federal government, in which case it would be GATTable.

The whole question of the effectiveness of beef producers raising money to promote beef, while poultry producers raise money to promote poultry, while hog producers raise money to promote pork, and the turkey producers are doing the same thing, raises in my mind the whole question of how effective is all this advertising in promoting an increase in the size of the stomachs of Canadian consumers.

It seems to me that the chief beneficiaries of a lot of these programs are advertising agencies and the various media that carries the message.

Those are some questions that we have to try to find answers for in committee. Another unanswered area of questioning is the whole area of the use of these funds for research.

The minister made it quite clear that he was not talking just about market research, that he was talking about production research as well. While there may be pet projects that producers might be happy to be financing, generally speaking, the publicly sponsored research in this country has done a terrific job for consumers. The kind of research that has been put forward by both provincial and federal governments has tended to reduce consumer costs at a much higher rate than the cost to the consumer through their taxpaying pocket. In other words, it has been a very good deal for consumers because the benefits they get from each research dollar far exceeds the cost of that dollar.

Production research virtually always ends up in showing producers new ways to produce more.

I have made many speeches in this House discussing the problem "producing more" causes in food production. It is very natural for producers to want to produce the very most they can, to achieve the highest yield and the fastest growth rates. However, achieving that forces the price down because market economies do not treat food as anything particularly special, they simply look at what the farmers produce as a surplus. The value of all the products then goes down to the surplus value, which is usually very low.

To be using, even more directly, financing the assurance that we are going to have lower prices is not a prospect that most farmers look to with obvious glee. I think there will be some people we may get an opportunity to hear when we take this to committee who will have done some more research on that. They could perhaps give some advice to the committee and to the government.

The range of this legislation might be restricted to market research because the original intent of this legislation was to aid and assist with marketing so that farmers could connect themselves more directly to consumers through marketing.

It provides the necessary tools to set up agencies like marketing boards. It could provide the product, get it efficiently and quickly to market, and make certain that it was processed in a way the consumer could utilize it. It could also provide the agencies with enough flexibility to do market promotion and basic research on new markets.

That establishes the product outside the current countries in which we now market the product. Marketing boards can be an excellent method of market development. My main regret about opening up this legislation is that the government did not open it up in a way that would allow all commodities to have fairly ready access to it as a marketing tool.

The extension of the new sections being proposed to put forward promotion and research agencies needs a lot more study. I am quite dubious about the overall effect of this. It may be quite justifiably viewed by a lot of producers as something about as efficient as another GST because it will be a tax on their production.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I listened quite closely to the New Democratic member from Saskatchewan. I would like to ask him a question.

I would like to know if there are consumers on the National Farm Marketing Council and if he feels they are an effective voice? The increase in income to the primary producers has been very modest and stable over the years while retail prices have increased dramatically. Would the member not agree that consumers should be on the boards of directors of the major food chains?

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any impediment to consumers being on the National Farm Products Marketing Council.

One or two are named to that council. It is the prerogative of the government in power at any particular time. One of the functions of that council is to ensure that the consumer interest is protected along with the farmer interest. Both sides have to be represented on the council.

The hon. member asked whether I thought it would be a good idea to have consumers represented on the boards of directors of the chain stores. I would say certainly, but that is not something we have any power over in this Parliament. That is something determined by the rules and regulations of each corporation. I would think that as we move into the 1990s more corporations would structure their boards so that specific consumer representatives will show up on their boards of directors.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the member for Mackenzie for a very fine speech. In his usual inimitable way he has done a good job of analysing the situation and the question before us.

I am rather intrigued by the differentiation between production research and marketing research. It is certainly an aspect of the whole field that had not occurred to me before. He emphasized marketing research for the obvious reason that production research could almost be self-destructive. I am probably expressing his opinion a little too strongly.

The marketing research side conjures up very intriguing and, what one would hope would be, original television commercials as we have seen in the marketing of dairy products, particularly those wonderful ads we see of the asparagus and the butter and so on. I am looking forward to the marketing research people producing innovative commercials.

I would like to ask the member if he could comment on possible conflicts between what is GATTable and what is not GATTable. It sounds like he might get into some sort of biblical genealogy but I am sure it is not.

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, we only run into the problem of GATTable promotion assistance when we get into the question of sharing the cost to which the minister alluded in his speech.

He mentioned that having promotion funds available to a group made it much easier for them to find matching grants and matching funds. Under the proposed GATT rules those matching funds and matching grants will be more acceptable if industry was helping to finance them rather than the government.

There could be some difficulties which would cause governments to place more of the load for promotion and market development on producers. There is hesitance among a lot of farmers and producers to get into this type of self-taxation because as soon as we have the ability to raise funds to do various things we have a fairly high suspicion that government will let us and get out. This would end up being a further tax on ourselves benefiting all Canadians, particularly in the area of production research. The benefits fall almost entirely on consumers in Canada rather than on the farm producers.

Therefore it is a much more justifiable expenditure for the Government of Canada, on behalf of those consumers, to have paid for the initial basic research to begin with.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the comments by the hon. member for Mackenzie because he is a very active member of the agriculture committee and this bill obviously opens up a number of avenues of concern.

There are a number of areas which we have to be concerned about. One is that the government is essentially putting in place a mechanism to off-load its research projects onto the producers of farm commodities.

The other is what provisions or safeguards will there be for the small producer who really is not in the mainstream but maybe has a small plot or a small operation and has a very local market. So that is a matter of concern.

It seems to me that we are going through much hardship in many sectors of agriculture. I cannot remember in the 22 or 23 years I have been a member here that we have gone through such anguish as we have in the last six months.

Clearly, with the dramatic downturn in farm incomes in 1990-91 and now the tremendous uncertainty with the supply managed sector and the outcome of the GATT negotiations we really have to have better mechanisms of informing and advising people of the overall benefit of agriculture in terms of jobs, rural economy, food supply, and long-term benefits to the country.

Perhaps that is one sector on which agricultural producer need to be working in unison across the whole spectrum of agriculture. Producers perhaps should work with governments as well to try to communicate to urban Canada which represents probably 96 per cent of the population even though I believe that the 4 per cent who per cent who are directly involved in agriculture their influence involves maybe 10 times less.

Remember there needs to be a better means of communication whether it is through a check-off or whether it is through marketing agencies or government to communicate the rural message to Canadians generally.

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, I think if governments were really interested in having a better voice coming from the rural community, something that would be a fairly unified voice, a long time ago they would have provided for an ability to permit farmers right across the country to organize along the lines that the Quebec farmers were permitted to do.

There they simply permitted farmers to comply with the Rand formula. As soon as 50 per cent plus one of the population who were farming signed up to become members of the over-all organization, they could then automatically pay dues for all of the others. It would make life much easier for governments and for urban Canada to hear the true voice of farming.

Because we have failed to do that and government is not anxious to hear one single voice for farmers, we will continue to hear a wide variety of voices and opinions. Governments live very well with this system.

If they get advice they do not like from one major group they can always go out and create another group with three or four farmers who will tell them exactly what they want to hear.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, thank you very much, I am pleased to be able to join in this debate this evening on Bill C-54, an act to amend the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act.

One of the first things that we have to find out is what this bill does. It changes the name of the act to the Farm Products Agencies Act. It removes the word marketing.

Now we have to understand that it really does not prohibit any of the former activity or enabling portion of the previous act but it broadens the act out so that it can play an increased and different role in the agricultural industry.

As we know, the bill as enacted is going to allow the formation of agencies within the commodity groups and with the agricultural community.

Those agencies will have the power, once they are formed and after they are requested, to collect levies from the production of the particular commodity or product they are involved in as producers.

They will be able to use those moneys that are collected to promote the marketing of the product, the consumption of the product, the benefits of the product and education regarding the product.

The moneys could be used for research and development with regard to the growing, the processing, the marketing and all of the other benefits of it. That is being done in different provinces by different groups at the present time to quite an extent within Canada.

The benefit I see of this bill—I will get to some concerns about the bill in a few minutes—is that it allows those levies also to be collected on those products that are imported into the country. We do not have that now, and that is a problem the industry has.

It is not a new concept in agriculture. Other countries have it. The United States has it and uses it very effectively. I guess if I were an American producer, I would be very pleased that it was there. We are not on a level playing field until we get a similar situation here.

For example, we all know in the last two or three years, the American concern and the countervail that the American pork producers have been effectively placing on Canadian pork exported into the United States.

At the very same time that that product was being exported into the United States, the United States was collecting a levy on the Canadian product going in there. It was collecting that levy and using those Canadian dollars to work against the Canadian producers. They do that on beef as well.

I guess what I am saying is that we import from other countries. We import particular cuts of pork from the United States as well. We eat a lot of bacon and we do not have enough bacon in Canada. The particular portion of the pig that that comes from, pork belly, we have to import from the United States.

I guess what I am saying is that this will put us in a better position. What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. If other countries are going to charge us levies on products that we ship in there and use those moneys to promote their own product, then we should be in the same position.

There are considerable benefits. The question might be raised from this: What will this do? This act, as we know, allowed a number of years ago the putting in place of the Canadian milk supply management system, the egg, the chicken, the turkey and the broiler hatching egg marketing agencies, the supply managed ones.

This will not affect them, but I will tell the House and I will tell those who are watching that unless the Prime Minister is able to deliver on what he has said to the producers as recently as yesterday as far as the strengthening and clarifying of article XI of the GATT in the Uruguay round, unfortunately, I think there may very well be greater volumes of dairy, egg and poultry products coming into Canada from outside.

It is very clear that a system of tariffication will not give Canadian producers, consumers, and processors the protection or the food security that we have at the present time.

Even though all of those boards at the present time are collecting levies, they are using them I think primarily for promotion at this stage, but also for some research. I asked the dairy farmers this afternoon if the levy taken off their milk production was used for research at the present time, and they said that some of it was.

If that very unfortunate situation takes place that this government agrees to sign a GATT agreement that has a tariffication clause in it as the producers have been telling Canadians so clearly in the last number of weeks and months, those levels of imports will rise.

I will tell you we had better be able to have a check-off on them if that unfortunate situation happens.

As I said, this legislation will not have any great effect on the present act, other than strengthening it and enabling it to do a bit more.

The biggest benefit is the level of levies and the fact that levies can be applied to imports coming in. Research and promotion organizations or agencies would be funded by these levies and they would be run by producer groups.

The legislation is so worded that the Governor in Council could ask for a referendum among the producers of a certain product. If there was a majority of producers and importers together, each importer and each producer would have one vote, then the agency could be set up and they could go about their business and decide how they wanted to do it.

I must stress that this does not put any of these agencies in place. It is like so much of the legislation that we pass in this place. It is enabling legislation.

As I point out very clearly to constituents in my riding and to people when I am talking to them at different places, it is another piece of legislation where I, as a member of Parliament, would like to see the regulations to a greater extent than we do before the legislation becomes law.

We pass enabling legislation. We think that yes, it is a good idea, and then it goes into the hands of others who are not elected to this place and they write the rules. They write the rule book. It can be interpreted in a different manner from what we think it should be or may be when we see the legislation. That is one of the grave dangers of this place.

I know it is another subject, but I certainly would like to see this place improved somehow so that once enabling legislation was passed and before that legislation went into place the regulations come back before us as members of Parliament.

We are the ones who take the phone calls, we are the ones who take the flack. Every once in a while, if we are lucky, we are the ones who take the praise for legislation that has been passed.

But it is not very often we hear the praise because someone will put a specific little nitty-gritty clause in there because that is the way he or she particularly interprets it. It can be difficult to enforce and it may very well not be realistic as well.

I just want to give some examples of where this could be of some benefit to the industry out there. For a number of years I was a director on different boards in the province of Ontario when I was actively farming.

At that time one of the boards I was on was the Ontario Vegetable Growers Marketing Board and we had a check-off. It was allowed through provincial legislation. We had a check-off. And herein lies one of the dangers, and it has been raised by my colleague from Algoma and by the critic on agriculture from the New Democratic Party as well.

The danger of this type of legislation is that it allows a government to say to a particular producer group, if it requests and lobbies and pressures for more research or development into the production methods or marketing methods or processing of its product: "Well, you have the power, the power is there for you to put a collection agency—if you want to call it that—in place, and you draw that money out of your own producers, because we are not going to use any of the taxpayers' money to provide that or to do that for you".

We must recognize that it does put in place an opportunity for governments to withdraw funding from research and development, promotion, or marketing, or whatever roles that governments have played in the past.

We do not need any more of this in the agricultural industry. The agricultural industry is one of the major ones in the handful of wealth creators that we have in this country or that any country has.

I get very upset when I look at the expenditures and I see that the present government, for example, in the fiscal year 1989-90 withdrew $40 million from agricultural research and development. That is not the way we should go if we are to sustain and promote that industry.

I will give another example. At the present time Ontario apple growers are conducting a program called "Orchard Crisp". They are marketing and promoting Ontario apples under that program and it has been very effective. We also know that six out of ten apples eaten in Canada are imported.

I will just back up a little. At the present time, when Canadian producers decide to promote a product, they can only get support from their own growers, from a provincial check-off or maybe some provincial and federal funding, if they are lucky, to assist them in that regard. If they are promoting apples, for example, the consumers cannot, even though it is on the label, easily distinguish between apples coming in from the United States or somewhere other than Canada. So a promotion to eat apples assists everybody, whether or not they are Canadian apple growers, and it is paid for by Canadian producers.

This legislation would allow for a check-off for imported apples. Therefore we would have a situation when they are promoting apples where all apples eaten in Canada would have contributed to that check-off and the production would have contributed to that check-off. That is a benefit.

Ontario berry growers, the producers themselves, have a similar program. I would hazard a guess that 50 per cent of the strawberries we eat in Canada in a year, in a 12-month period, are likely imported. However, when Ontario berry growers or other Canadian berry growers promote strawberries and encourage people to make desserts and jams and jellies, they do it at different times of the year other than the peak of three, four or five weeks in June and July. The imported berries they buy have not contributed to that and I think our producers pay an unfair share. We would be on an equal basis with other countries in this regard because other countries do the same with what we export to them.

For the most part, farm production organizations and boards are in favour of this legislation. They have raised some concerns. I have raised a couple of them, but I also have a couple of other questions. I am pleased the bill is going to the Standing Committee on Agriculture. There are some things we have to clarify there.

The term GATTable has been mentioned by previous speakers. We hear that term or the words acceptable at the GATT a lot right now. Could an agency established under this legislation for a particular product be accepted because of what it does with those moneys? Would it be accepted at the GATT by other countries?

Another concern we have to clarify in committee is: Could a research and promotion agency be established for a particular product in one region of Canada, or would it have to be a commodity specific at either the provincial or national level?

Another question we have to clarify is: If an agency were regional specific, would it be possible for other Canadian regions to benefit from the research paid from the levies on that small producer group? Those are a couple of the concerns I have.

Another concern I have is: If a sector of the agriculture commodity after a vote or a plebiscite or whatever agreed to have a check-off, how would it affect smaller producers? I know the logistics of this could be and would be addressed in regulations, but I am thinking in particular of a very complicated industry such as the horticultural industry where there are large producers and small producers. How would the size be established at which we began to have a check-off? Many horticultural production units are only one, two, or three acres in size. They do not sound like very large operations in Canada compared to some of our other types of farming, but they may very well produce a sizeable amount of fruit or vegetables. The logistics would be checked off.

A good example, and the minister raised it earlier, of how this type of thing can work is the National Beef Information Centre. I just want to touch on that because I am pleased and proud to have a family owned facility in Wellington, Ontario, in my riding Prince Edward—Hastings in Prince Edward county that has worked with the National Beef Information Centre to get the Canadian patents for a new product called beef fingers.

I know all of us in the House realize that cows do not have fingers, but we also have to remember that we have eaten a lot of chicken fingers and chickens do not have fingers either. I guess we can see what research has done: the National Beef Information Centre and these entrepreneurs in my riding have developed fingers on cattle.

It is an excellent product. I had an opportunity back in August to sample some. I am pleased to say that it is going to be a success story. There are investors coming forward wanting to get involved. Strips of pure lean Canadian beef are going to be used for that.

This is a case where a check-off has helped and can help. It is a good example because a lot of promotion has been done and will be done in the future.

I thought I would take a minute as well to talk about marketing boards. Being one that has been involved in different types of marketing boards, I thought it might be worth while to explain to the House and to explain to the Canadian people a bit about the different types of marketing boards.

Quite frankly we all have to admit unfortunately that too many consumers out there do not realize the importance of farm boards. When they hear the words "marketing boards" too often the dollar sign flashes in front of their eyes and they say: "Yes, they cost me money". I want to make very clear that they do not cost producers money. For the most part they do not cost the taxpayer a very great amount of money at all. However, they do provide the farming community—and when I say "the farming community", I mean the whole agrifood community: the producers, the suppliers, the processors and the trucking industry—with a tremendous service.

There are different types. Yes, we do have the supply management boards where we say to the rest of world that we will not provide surpluses, produce surpluses and ship them into their markets. Therefore we feel we have the right to limit the amount that they ship into the Canadian market. We also have other types of marketing agencies. There are the ones that I refer to as the pooling types. A good example of that is the Ontario Wheat Producers Marketing Board where producers of wheat in Ontario deliver their wheat to an elevator and the price is pooled. There is no price set. Whatever the price is over a 12-month period, it is pooled and every producers gets the same amount per tonne of grain. There is no pre-set price. The world sets the price and the market sets the price.

There is another type of board where the product is assembled for sale. They simply have producers of such things as hogs take them to an assembly yard where they are marketed and offered for sale.

I am pleased that this bill is going to the Standing Committee on Agriculture. There are some questions I think we need to clarify for Canadian producers and Canadian consumers. I look forward to that discussion and debate in committee.

• (1850)

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has discussed some of the commodities that have been using marketing boards. He mentioned that he is a pork producer, or has been a pork producer. I wonder if he would care to comment on the problems some of the commodity groups have had with the concept of this kind of marketing legislation which we are amending here today.

Would he be comfortable freeing up this legislation, while we have it open already, to permit the establishment of national marketing boards for other commodities, without each of them having to come to the House to convince the government it should be a named commodity and should be included in the legislation? Is he comfortable with that approach?

I ask this question because I understand from watching the proceedings back in the 1970s that the Canadian cattlemen seemed to be almost paranoid about any legislation on the books which would permit 50 or 60 per cent of the producers to opt to use a marketing agency for the marketing of their commodities. For some reason they were absolutely afraid of what might transpire if democracy prevailed and 50 or 60 per cent of producers decided that they wanted to operate under this kind of legislation.

I am wondering if he could give us his opinion as to whether this legislation could be expanded, while we have it open, specifically the requirement that the government must name the product before producers can set up an agency under the marketing side of this act.

Mr. Vanclief: Mr. Speaker, the member raises a good point.

We have to recognize what has gone on and what is going on in the Canadian agrifood industry at the present time. The production sectors have given any economic viability to the agrifood industry over the last number of years. Those production groups have been dairy, eggs, and poultry. They are the five that are there at the present time.

My first response to the request by the apple producers in Canada was that it was a very realistic and very mature request. I do not know how anyone can oppose that. They are saying to the Canadian consumer that they do not want to corner 100 per cent of the apple market. At the present time there is a level of importation into Canada. They are prepared to live with that. They do not want to roll it back.

I used to produce a number of hogs per year. It was extremely difficult for me to do any budgeting. Four or five years ago I can remember the day when I was happy if the price of pork for the producer hit $2.20 per kilogram or $1 per pound. This is on a dressed weight basis.

Six weeks ago it hit $1.02. If you are working in a factory, have your own plant, or are working in an office, how would you react as an employee or a producer of anything, whether or not it is connected with agriculture, if that fluctuation was there?

The reasonable level of profit this type of legislation has allowed to the dairy, egg and poultry sectors has also allowed those sectors of agriculture to play a very major role. They have been able to be environmentally sustainable. With that reasonable level of profit—and it is not an exorbitant profit, by any stretch of the imagination—because of the security of their income they have been able to budget, to practise proper soil conservation, land conservation, and to buy the pieces of equipment which allow them to do that.

We do not have to say it very often in this House because we know it: Two-dollar wheat does not allow the Saskatchewan farmer to farm the way he or she knows they should farm because they simply cannot afford to do it.

This type of legislation allows that to happen. It allows the proper agencies to be put in place to improve not only the lot of the Canadian farmer and all of the spin-offs to related industries but also benefits the Canadian consumers in the long run because it allows us to keep a Canadian food security policy in place.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, two quick comments and a short question for the member for Prince Edward—Hastings who spoke very well.

First, I would like to inform you, Mr. Speaker, that I have an interest in speaking on this bill. Judging by the time tonight my chance to speak on this bill will likely be another day. I am looking forward to speaking on this bill and participating in the debate on this interesting and important issue.

Second, and I want to make this point because I have not had an opportunity today to raise this matter. On the day the Prime Minister and the Minister for International Trade are travelling to Europe to discuss the supply management sector at the GATT I want to say on public record that I very much support the strengthening of article XI. I hope that the government will take all the steps it can to protect the supply managed sectors of our farm economy and ensure that when the negotiators return and the GATT talks are over the thousands of producers of poultry, eggs, turkey, and other supply managed products have a secure future in Canada and can operate as they have in the past.

My question to the member for Prince Edward—Hastings relates to this legislation, specifically because he mentioned the National Beef Information Centre. I am very much aware of the activities some of the breed organizations are involved in. For example, in my corner of the province of Saskatchewan the Hereford breeders are very active in their work and are very anxious to promote the Hereford product as opposed to other beef products. I am aware that there is tremendous competition amongst the breeders of the various breeds of cattle.

I am wondering if the hon. member has looked at this legislation closely enough to be able to tell me if there are opportunities for breed action in terms of the check-off or if the money for check-off all go to beef, whoever that happens to be?

Mr. Vanclief: Mr. Speaker, the member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake has raised a good point.

My interpretation of the legislation at the present time is that it would be the Cattlemen's Association or the Beef Producers Association and this legislation would not allow it to break down to an individual breed organization promoting a breed. It may very well be but it is a valid point and we should clarify that in the committee. I am sure we will when it goes to the standing committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being seven o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 36 the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PHARMACEUTICAL INDUSTRY

ESTABLISHMENT OF ROYAL COMMISSION INTO PRICING PRACTICES

The House resumed from Monday, February 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. Caccia. (p. 6615)

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased with and interested in the proposal that has been put forth by the hon. member for Davenport, that a royal commission study be initiated to study the pricing of pharmaceuticals in Canada.

Clearly, Canadians need and deserve a system in which pharmaceuticals are available at a price that is not going to cripple the ability of the provinces to provide services and not going to cripple the consumers as well. The Minister of National Health and Welfare has stated many times here in this House that he is committed to work with the provinces to make sure that we do maintain and keep reasonable prices for consumers.

Drug pricing in Canada is a complex issue and it covers many jurisdictions. Federal jurisdiction is confined to the factory gate prices of patented medicines. The provinces have jurisdiction over retail prices and dispensing fees for patented and non-patented medicines.

I am really concerned that a royal commission into drug pricing would become bogged in jurisdictional disputes on what belongs in the federal responsibility versus what belongs to the provincial responsibility. No one in this House wants to derail a process of looking at the prices of drugs within this country. That could be the effect of a royal commission.

Perhaps all of our efforts here in the House would be better used to study drug pricing and direct them toward the areas where the Government of Canada has sole jurisdiction. One such area is in the regulatory system that tests new drugs before they are made available to the public. Canada has a regulatory system that ensures safety, efficacy, and the quality of drugs that are marketed here in Canada. Our system is one of the most stringent and demanding in the world and it has been in place for some 30 years. There is a price that Canadians pay for maintaining, as I said, one of the most stringent and demanding regulatory regimes. It often takes our drugs a lot longer to reach the marketplace than in other countries. Regulatory processes also add to the costs of government. They add to the costs of doing business and they add to the price of the pharmaceutical products.

There are many questions that can be raised about the Canadian drug regulatory system, questions that clearly fall in our jurisdiction, the federal jurisdiction. How does our system, Canada's system, compare to those of other national regulatory agencies? What can be done? What can be done to create an international system where testing procedures in one country will be recognized in another country? With one of the most exacting and demanding systems for drug approval in all the world, could Canada become a leading international centre for clinical testing? Other countries could then recognize Canada and recognize our approval, only if it meets their own standards. In fact, since 1986 Health and Welfare has conducted a lot of certifications of World Health Organization vaccines for measles, polio, diphtheria, and in the last couples of years has extended that to include tuberculosis and tetanus. Drugs would be in the hands of consumers more readily if we had one system for qualifying and making sure that they were safe all around the world.

One of the questions we have to ask is on the optimum level of international harmonization. I know that sounds difficult. I think as the global community gets smaller and smaller, we are going to see various agencies from one country start to harmonize with an agency of another country. Let us see how Canada could contribute here.

Last October, we hosted the Sixth International Conference on Drug Regulatory Authorities. In 1989, we hosted the International Symposium on Drug Safety. We have joined the European Free Trade Association scheme for the evaluation of pharmaceutical reports. We support the expansion of the World Health Organization certification scheme and are committed to ensuring that drug exports from Canada are authorized for sale in Canada and that they conform to the good manufacturing practices scheme of the World Health Organization. We already are harmonizing with meeting standards of many countries around the world.

What is our role in the international marketplace for medicines? Does the current regulatory regime add to public health intelligence? Can we adopt a system for categorization, for drug evaluation that would be based on a level of risk? Maybe this is the route we should go.

What elements of the regulatory program can be transferred from government level to industry or to health care professionals without compromising the safety or quality? These are all questions. They all fall under our jurisdiction.

A royal commission is not necessary to answer these questions. The Government of Canada has already embarked upon a review that is going to answer a lot of questions about the regulatory system here in Canada.

Last month the Minister of National Health and Welfare announced an external review of the Canadian drug approval system. It is going to be undertaken by Dr. Denis J. Gagnon who is vice rector of research at Laval University. The review will advise the minister on the regulatory model and drug approval processes that will best serve the Canadian public and that will take us into the next century.

It is going to review and look at the recommendations for the regulatory system released in 1985 by the Nielsen task force report. Valuable information can also be gleaned from Auditor General's reports and the report of the Stein working group on drug submission review. There are many pieces of information out there. In fact, when we look at the amount of information that is currently available here in Canada, we can conclude that a royal commission would really be duplicating the information that is available and adding a severe cost that is really not necessary.

Therefore, it is not necessary for this commission to travel across the country. All we have to do is review the information that is available right here.

Also, we have asked Dr. Gagnon to look at the policies and practices of national regulatory agencies in other parts of the world and the level and extent of international harmonization and how we can make it work and what would be appropriate for Canada and what would be an appropriate role that this government might play.

He is expected to submit his report to the minister later this year. I know it is going to provide practical and specific recommendations to continue to assure the safety, the efficacy, and the quality of drugs. It is also going to minimize the regulatory burden.

We have to minimize it, absolutely. This is where a lot of our costs come from. But we cannot compromise our standards and we cannot compromise safety to protect the consumers. There is no need for this royal commission. Most of them, Mr. Speaker as you well know, run in the area of $15 million to $20 million, if not $25 million. That information, as I have already stated, is available here.

I feel very confident, and I know the minister will look forward to Dr. Gagnon's report.

Perhaps, as I said, the time has come for each country to take a look at harmonizing. If we recognize the standards and the safety factors of other countries, we do not need the burdens and regulatory agencies. Canada is one of the best and one of the most stringent, and indeed other countries could recognize us. A lot of the clinical testing could be done here.

I would like to conclude by saying that there is absolutely no need for royal commission at this particular point in time. I would hope the House would support the government's effort to review the whole drug regulatory system. We look forward to the results of Dr. Gagnon's report.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin in discussing this motion with the remarks of the parliamentary secretary who preceded me.

She said that this commission was unnecessary. If I understood her correctly, she really referred to two reasons. One is essentially that the information that would be sought by it is already available through the efforts, first of all, of the Gagnon committee, and second, it is available through the ongoing work of the Patented Medicines Prices Review Board.

I would like to take issue with those points in this way. First of all, the Gagnon commission is intended, as she rightly pointed out, to study the process that we have in Canada for certifying the suitability of medicines for distribution to the public.

What this motion by my colleague from Davenport attempts to get at is not precisely that point itself at all, although such a commission would consider the cost at the manufacturers level, which in large part, of course, is affected by the timeliness of the ability of a drug manufacturer to distribute to the public.

That is only part of the story. In essence, what we are getting at with this motion is an effort to study the costs of medicines throughout the distribution chain, not only at the manufacturers level. Likewise, her comment with respect to the Patented Medicines Prices Review Board similarly misses the mark in terms of what the motion attempts to accomplish.

The mandate of the review board itself is limited to two things. First of all, it is limited to reviewing the price at which the manufacturer sells to the wholesaler so that that board has no authority to review the final retail price or mark-ups between the factory door and the store shelf.

Second, the review board's mandate extends to reviewing the annual price increases of patented drugs so that at present, the board reviews the prices of about 3 per cent of the drug products approved for sale in Canada. There is a very wide margin in the amount of information available compared to what we would find by such a commission as is proposed by this motion.

What we have learned from representatives of the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers' Association of Canada is this. In general terms it seems that the mark-ups by the manufacturers range from 15 to 60 per cent; by the wholesaler in the drug distribution chain, 7 to 10 per cent; and by the pharmacist, 30 to 50 per cent. In addition, the pharmacist will charge a dispensing fee of 6 to 11 per cent per prescription. Now on request to determine how accurate these levels are, the research officers in the Library of Parliament who are very capable at finding information, came to this conclusion, and I am quoting from the Library of Parliament report: "The financial reward in dispensing a drug depends on both the dispensing fee and the difference between the buying and selling price for the drug. Some of the prescriptions will be filled under provincial drug reimbursement plans with negotiated fees and costs. The provinces will make these fees and costs public. The degree of compliance by pharmacists with the program is unknown. Some provinces allow the pharmacist to levy a surcharge on the drug costs. Others allow the pharmacist to keep the difference between the actual drug cost and the formulary price.

"In addition, there are the private and the employee drug plans for which there are not readily available public data. The extent of a free market for the remaining prescriptions differs among provinces as has been described earlier. To summarize, there are not uniformly reliable data on the financial reward to dispensing drugs".

What would be an appropriate question, on the basis of that quotation, is what should be the concern of the Government of Canada with respect to this issue, given that the market exists? We do not do investigations into the prices of everything, and I think that is quite simple. The issue is simply based upon the fact that a very large proportion of our publicly funded health costs are incurred in the acquisition of medicines required by patients. Those costs are paid out of the public purse.

As we have seen from the research that we have been able to do, nobody really has a handle on how all of these costs are arrived at. We cannot pin down what the level of mark-up is stage by stage in the process. There is some question as to how competitive the acquisitions are. It seems eminently reasonable, therefore, in the face of that, that we should be supporting the idea of a commission undertaking or embarking upon a study into these prices.

I want to make clear that what we are dealing with here is not the issue of innovative drug manufacturers versus generic drug manufacturers; that issue is entirely separate from this particular issue. In either case, we need to deal with the level of mark-up that occurs through the system.

What can certainly be said in general terms is that if an imperfect market exists, prices will not always be reasonable in relation to costs. What we have in this case is a very imperfect market where the consumers of medicines are often unconcerned with the cost because they, in person, do not incur the costs and where the provinces have the difficulty of trying to either compensate users or force them to pay premiums over the costs of their drugs.

To refer to the Gagnon study relating to when drugs can be put on the market or to refer to the Patented Medicines Prices Review Board as providing the information that such a royal commission could obtain and make available as part of the over-all study that must be ongoing continually at both the federal and provincial levels with respect to health care costs, is fundamentally to miss the point.

I would like to conclude by saying that the proposals that the member for Davenport has made in his motion, that the House urge the government to launch a royal commission to look at the level of mark-ups throughout the distribution chain in the pharmaceutical industry, is an entirely reasonable one and one that I am pleased to support.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, this motion which I wish to support is, I believe, a very simple motion and I am surprised that we do not have the support of the Conservative side of this House. I heard the hon. member from the Conservative side saying that this is not necessary.

I just want to go back to the Liberal motion so that we understand what we are talking about. It is absolutely necessary to support it.

The motion says:

> That this House urges the government to launch a royal commission into pricing practices in the pharmaceutical industry to determine the rate of mark-ups in price at each transaction, from manufacturer to wholesaler or distributor, from wholesaler or distributor to retailer, and from retailer to the public, in order to determine how such mark-ups affect the Canadian consumer.

That means we want to know whether the Canadian public is getting fleeced, is getting ripped off. I would like to see this royal commission because I have my own opinion and my opinion comes from the people I represent in my riding of Chambly. The senior citizens group from St. Mathias told me about the high price of their medication, as did the senior citizens groups from St. Bruno in the town of Chambly and St. Basile le Grande. If there is one thing these people tell me, it is that they are getting ripped off on the price of pharmaceuticals. The problem is that they cannot get a 10 or 15 per cent raise in their pension income because it is not there.

We are talking about the fact that pharmaceuticals are costing so much nowadays, but that is okay because the province is paying for them. They are free. I am sure my friends on the other side would say: "There is no such thing as a free lunch". Well there is no such thing as a free pill. The province is paying for it, which means I am paying for it and that you are paying for it.

I must say that as a consumer advocate I have seen certain patterns emerge among businesses. I do not think the pharmaceutical business is that much different. They get their foot in the door, get a monopoly on a product, and then they make sure that nobody else gets in.

That is why I welcome this motion. It is a Liberal motion but I think it is a motion that everyone can identify with. I do not think there is any question of partisanship here. It is a motion which gets down to the nitty-gritty. Are we being ripped off or not in pharmaceuticals?

We must take a look at the cost of medication nowadays, particularly in view of patent legislation where I believe we have been sold down the river by this government as far as increasing patent protection and shutting out the generic companies is concerned.

I am sure the members on the other side will say: "No, that is not the case. By making sure that generic drugs which are cheaper do not get into the marketplace too soon, we are creating more investment. We are getting more money in R and D". I looked at that. Do you know what? The R and D represents about $200 million a year, maybe $250 million. Some companies in Quebec said: "Well, we may invest this year or maybe not. We are waiting for the Constitution to settle down". But it represents about $250 million per year or let us say $300 million. I will try to be as factually correct as I can.

Mr. Speaker, if you take a look at just one province, the province of Ontario, it has said that the patent protection changes will represent increases of approximately how much? This is not a quiz, but I see that my colleagues on the other side are silent. Well, let me help you. It is not $200 million. No, it will cost more than that. It is not $300 million to equal the R and D, but 450 million bucks. That is why we are going to pay more.

As I said, there is no free lunch and there is no free pill. In reality, it is not the provincial government that is paying, it is the taxpayers who are paying. That is what is scandalous about this whole deal.

An hon. member: Where do you want the drugs made?

Mr. Edmonston: Where would I like the drugs made? I do not care where the drugs are made necessarily as long as we are not paying more than our fair share for them.

I do not know what members on the other side know about drugs but I was a medic in the U.S. army and I remember the difference and cost of different drugs, generic versus the regular drugs. I will give you an example, Diazapan. Do you know what Diazapan is? It is Valium. You buy it as Diazapan it costs you pennies, you buy it as Valium which is the trade name and it costs you about 25 times more. It has been on the market for decades and they are still ripping off the public as far as the amount of money they are getting under the Valium label.

Let me talk to you about tetracycline hydro-chloride. Do you know what that is? It is an antibiotic and it is called Terramycin. The same rule applies. Do you want me to tell you about aspirin? Aspirin is not generic, Aspirin is actually a trade name. That is why if we mention Aspirin outside this House the drug companies are going to say: "Whoa, make sure that you say aspirin is a registered trade mark" because they do not want to lose their trade mark. Aspirin is acetysalicylic acid and it costs pennies but when it is Aspirin or Bufferin or Bayer—I could talk to you about all the Aspirin wars in the 1920s, 1930s, and 1940s but I will not waste your time—when it gets into that trade name then you are going to pay a lot more for the same product.

I would not care. I would not be up here speaking about this if this drug monopoly and drug pricing were not affecting the most vulnerable people in our society, but it is, and you know it when you go down and see your people who are in the senior citizens groups. You know darn well that is the case. It is not just pricing.

One of the first cases I had when I was elected here about two years ago was one dealing with a medication which used to control angina and they found out that it had an arthritic affect. So they took that same medication, renamed it and they boosted the price five times. I had to go on Market Place. I had to complain. I had to make a big issue of it until a drug company said: "Oh, yes, you are right; it is the same product". Well let us bring it down to a reasonable price.

I believe fundamentally we are getting cheated. I believe fundamentally there is a need for this type of royal commission. When we talk about the $25 million it might cost, I just bring you back to the Auditor General's report against this government that complains that this government has wasted over $20 billion in not investing properly our pension funds, which it has. So do not talk to me about $20 million to $25 million. I want to make sure that we stop fleecing senior citizens on the cost of medication in this country.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to rise on this motion because it gives me a chance to tell some of the members who were elected in 1988 and who are new here, as well as any Canadians who might happen to be watching, my particular perspective on the history of this whole drug issue.

Needless to say, I am opposed to the royal commission because in a sense the Prices Review Board is an ongoing royal commission looking at the prices of drugs charged in Canada all the time and it puts the companies to very strict examinations and presentation of information as to what they are charging. It is an ongoing body, very professional, and has had a dramatic impact on the price of drugs in this country.

As well, there are parliamentary committees and we have standing committees that can take up, any issue we want. So if the members of the opposition truly believe and can make a prima face case that there that there is a rip-off, there is absolutely no doubt that the standing committee on health can take up the topic and follow up on it. We do not need to hire maybe 10 people at $800 or $900 a day on a royal commission to do this type of a study.

What I am more astounded about is the continued opposition and the continued hatred displayed by the members of the opposition toward public corporations in this country because that is really the underlying current that they are getting at.

If a company becomes public and large, they are inherently opposed to it. They are particularly opposed to manufacturing companies.

Look at all the decades that the Liberal-NDP coalition carried on that manufacturers sales tax, all the while knowing that every other country in the whole world had abolished manufacturers sales taxes against their manufacturing firms.

Canada was the only country in the whole world that continued that anomalous manufacturers sales tax. This is primarily because manufacturers are big companies and they just do not like them. The fact of the matter is, they do not like them.

What they are also getting at when they are opposed to those companies and those companies surviving is that they are attacking the research and development.

They are attacking our universities and the training of basic scientists who have to work there. I will talk about that further, particularly with respect to drugs.

There is no doubt that during the latter parts of the 1950s and 1960s that drug companies were charging a lot for their drugs. The rate of increase was higher than it ought to have been, but that was occurring around the globe.

So governments reacted. In virtually every other country of the world where they acted at all on it, a prices review board was brought in with the power to call the companies in, to subpoena their records, to examine the research and development they were doing and the cost of developing these drugs. That is very expensive; $200 million or $300 million is nothing to develop a new drug and it then takes from 9 to 12 years to even get it on the market.

Most other countries came up with a prices review board. Not Canada, not the Liberal-NDP coalition that ran this country for many years together, always hand in glove.

Oh, they would have a lover's tiff from time, to time, particularly around election time, to make sure the NDP could get a few elected, but when they got right down to it they were always sticking together just like that.

I sat back here a couple of rows in 1979 when they brought down the Clark government and there has been a continuing history of that.

What did they do? They abolished patent protection. There was no prices review board. They took away the patent rights.

So what did the companies do? If you want to invest in a drug company, are you going to start your company in Canada and make drugs, hire Canadian university graduates, our chemists, our physicists, our scientists, to develop these drugs when you could go to Switzerland, to Britain, to France, to the United States, anywhere around the world but Canada?

Of course, they did not come here; they went to these other countries. So research and development got smaller and smaller in Canada. It did not mean we were using less drugs. It meant that the drugs our people had to buy were manufactured by young people, workers and scientists in other countries.

It did not save us one cotton-picking cent, but what it did cost us was tens of thousands of slots in universities and science positions in universities where Canada could have been developing the drug so that everyone else in the world would be paying a small royalty to us. And it could have been self-sustaining.

Because of the Liberals and the New Democratic Party, the country that developed insulin, that should have been a leader right into the next century went into a Third World status in terms of drugs. That is what we inherited in 1984.

It was exactly the same with respect to plant breeders rights. They opposed it. The NDP is on record as having opposed it for years and years. The combination of the NDP and the many organized church groups who were totally off-base in their opposition meant that new varieties and new grain types were being developed around the world, but not in Canada.

By the time we come along and get the modest patent protection for drugs through, we are 10 to 15 years behind.

The same with plant breeders rights. By the time we got that through this House, our scientists, who for the first time could get some patent protection and therefore develop varieties and get a royalty, are 15 years behind.

In high technology companies, when you are one year behind you are a dinosaur. If you are 10 or 15 years behind, you have an absolutely huge burden to get over.

That is exactly what the Liberal Party left this country. Fortunately in terms of the third bill that involved patents they learned, and I must give them credit, by the time we came along to the Integrated Circuits Topography Act. I know that because I was the parliamentary secretary and ran it through.

They are these little chips. They are really like an apartment building. There is layer after layer of silicon with wires going between them, or some other connection. It is like an apartment building.

We have 25 companies in this country that build these integrated circuits. It is an enormous job creation place for our talented young people. It is a bit like an architect designing how the pipes will go up through apartments.

With no patent protection of course companies were not going to do it here. So we got a bill through the House, and I must say that both the Official Opposition and the New Democratic Party voted for that bill. Finally, they realized that in this country we have to do research and development. To get research and development we have to have patent protection. That is really a step ahead.

Let us not forget our history. This resolution is just a return to that typical attitude that they have that they are against anyone who is doing corporate work or anyone who is doing R and D.

Was it successful? Yes. The drugs in this country only take 6 per cent of total health care costs. The R and D being done in 1986 was less than $100 million. This past year it was $300 million.

Think of the young people who are working today, our scientists who are working who were not working even four years ago. They are going to use the drugs anyway. Finally, they can use drugs that were developed and manufactured in this country.

I am looking at a chart which shows that every other country offers many more years, almost twice to three times the patent protection that we do. It is very important that this resolution not be passed because it will reduce a very substantial and healthy business in this country.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to stand here in support of the motion of my colleague from Davenport:

> —urge the government to launch a Royal Commission into pricing practices in the pharmaceutical industry to determine the rate of mark-ups in price at each transaction from manufacturer to wholesaler or distributor, from wholesaler or distributor to retailer, and from retailer to the public, in order to determine how such mark-ups affect the Canadian consumer.

I guess I have been somewhat shocked at the previous speaker's comments. I would like to say why I can support this motion.

The pharmaceutical industry in Canada is a substantial business. Its activities amount to $4.5 billion every year.

For certain products called patent drugs, the industry enjoys a substantial monopoly situation which could be strengthened and amplified if the present negotiations at GATT are successful.

The whole question of mark-ups in the price of pharmaceutical products affects the consumer. Mark-ups in this industry also affect the taxpayer and the public purse.

Why is this a public issue? It is a public issue in two respects. This is an industry that is federally regulated. The cost of prescription drugs is covered by provincial health care plans with public funds.

It is so simplistic. As a result of this brief overview I find it very difficult to understand the previous speaker from the government side of the House. This affects the public purse.

We as Canadians have been very proud of our health care system that ensures that all Canadians receive complete and thorough medical treatment regardless of income or economic standing. But an important part of the picture is missing, a part that perhaps we should be less proud of.

Every Canadian can go to a doctor and every Canadian can get a prescription for whatever drugs are needed to heal the symptoms of illness. For some Canadians they can even go to the pharmacist and get those drugs free. But for many, depending upon a variety of factors including where they live, they cannot afford to get the drugs they need at all.

As I said earlier, drugs are a major industry. The annual revenue is $4.5 billion. This revenue is divided between a number of sources: the manufacturer, the wholesaler, the pharmacist. At each stage the price of the drug gets higher and higher.

Estimates place the mark-ups at between 15 per cent and 60 per cent by the manufacturer; 7 per cent to 10 per cent by the wholesaler; and another 30 per cent to 50 per cent by the pharmacist.

For seniors and for people on low incomes, these drug mark-ups can incur a considerable hardship. The people who most often need drugs will be the ones who are least able to afford them.

At the moment there is one check to the seemingly uncontrollable increase in the price of drugs which is the generic drug industry in Canada. It is strong and it is Canadian owned.

The generic drug industry has been able to flourish in Canada because the patent protection period on new drug products is much shorter than it is in some other countries.

Now the catch on the government side is that the government now wants to extend the patent protection on drug products to 20 years. It says this will be an incentive to the industry to invest in research and development. Will this move be a good one for Canada?

At the moment, 92 per cent of the pharmaceutical industry is foreign owned. It is not even Canadian owned. There are even monopolies in the system.

The two largest Canadian manufacturers are Novo Pharm and Apotex, both producers of generic drugs. By extending patent protection on name brand drugs for 20 years this government will severely impair the current efforts of these two firms to expand, two Canadian companies I might add.

The foreign companies that control the brand name drugs will have plenty of money for R and D that they can take back home with them, while the Canadian companies will be forced to cut back. And of course this will mean loss of Canadian jobs and more people on unemployment insurance than we already have in this country.

Statistics show that those on low income, due to a number of factors, are the ones most in need of drugs. What a vicious circle this government is creating.

As one constituent of mine has said, and I am sure she will not mind my quoting her. Her name is Gwenda Noad and she says:

> For many Canadians, the purchase of essential medications is the major item in their health care costs. It certainly is for me. The ability to obtain generic drugs provides substantial relief and I find it difficult to understand why this action is being taken which will in future years erode our ability to obtain low cost drugs.

Mrs. Noad, I also find it difficult to understand. It is simply an uncaring, unsympathetic government.

This motion is so obviously necessary that I am surprised it has not received unanimous consent in this House of Commons. All this motion asks is that we keep tabs on the pharmaceutical industry.

As my colleague from Davenport has said, the waters are so murky here that he was not even able to discover how far-reaching this problem is or how many Canadians it is affecting.

This government has said that there is already a system in place to monitor the drug industry. Bill C-22 created the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board, but the mandate of that board is so limited that it renders the board ineffective.

It deals only with the mark-up between the manufacturer and the wholesaler. In any case, all it can do is review the prices. If this board thinks the prices are too high it is powerless to act.

Another argument against federal intervention is that this area of price mark-up falls too much under provincial jurisdiction.

I repeat here what I have said before, that I am proud as a Canadian of our universal health care system and I think most Canadians are too.

If one senior or one child in this country, anywhere from Vancouver Island to Newfoundland to Whitehorse, dies because that person cannot afford to buy drugs that he or she needs then that is one death too many.

This motion is simply saying: "Let's force the players to put their cards on the table. Let's let Canadians know what the mark-up is on these products that they do not buy for choice, they do not buy for enjoyment". People buy drugs because they need them to stop pain, to ease discomfort, and to make it through a difficult day.

Drugs are not a luxury item. If we really believe that universal medicare is important—and I for one am proud that Canada provides health care for all its citizens—then let us make sure that all Canadians, rich or poor, have access to drugs and medication that they need.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

[English]

FISHERIES

SITUATION IN ATLANTIC CANADA

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being eight o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of a motion to adjourn the House under the provisions of Standing Order 52 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely the situation in the Atlantic fishery.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's) moved:

That this House do now adjourn.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is an important debate. It is about fish; more to the point, it is about people. I am grateful to the Speaker for entertaining my request and allowing this debate this evening. I have no illusions. This debate will not solve the problem which we face. What it will do, I trust, is focus some national attention on a national industry in distress and on a treasured way of life that is under unwarranted and vicious attack.

The debate this evening must also focus some minds and get the attention of at least some of those who are most responsible, and who must bear the lion's share of the responsibility for allowing a once proud industry to come so precariously near to oblivion. At the same time we must get the attention of those same people who happen to be in a position to do something to correct this situation.

I do not exaggerate; I do not overstate the case. The Newfoundland fishing industry is at a watershed. A way of life which has nurtured Newfoundland's sons and daughters for five centuries is slipping relentlessly beyond our grasp. If that is permitted to happen, Canada will certainly be the loser; all of Canada will be diminished by it because that will be nothing less than cultural genocide.

Chief among those who stand indicted of this double-barrelled wilful act of destroying both a precious marine resource and a proud maritime people, is the Prime Minister of this country.

You see, this is all about political will or the lack of it. The factor which is most in play here is foreign overfishing, and I will have something more to say about that in a moment. The senseless, suicidal ravaging of the fish stocks off Newfoundland would have stopped long ago if the Prime Minister had taken on the issue.

As you know, this Prime Minister has a well-earned reputation of being a man who can grab hold of an issue and see it through to the result he wants. Take for example the free trade agreement and the GST. He wanted these and he got them against all odds. Now many of us are suffering as a result, but that is for another debate. The point here is that the Prime Minister's commitment to a cause usually produces some results. His commitment and his agenda often prevail, and therein lies the crux of the problem in the present case. Foreign overfishing is not on the Prime Minister's agenda. He is not seized with the issue. Until that changes, the pillaging of Newfoundland's fish stocks by the Spanish and Portuguese will continue unabated and indeed will accelerate.

This year for example, foreign overfishing is up by 100 per cent while the local Newfoundland fish catches are down by 50 per cent. Do we need any more proof than those two statistics? Unless the Prime Minister focuses his mind on this matter, thousands of fishermen in my riding and elsewhere will sit idly on the wharf this summer and for a lot of summers to come. Plant workers will be forced to turn to welfare handouts. Fish plants by the dozens will close their doors forever and community after community after community will vanish off the map altogether.

Every single Newfoundland MP is on deck for this debate tonight. My friend and colleague from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception is here. My friend and colleague from Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte is here. My friend and colleague from Labrador is here. My friend and colleague from Gander—Grand falls is here. They are here because they, like me, want to tell you something of the misery being inflicted on their constituents by this tragedy.

They are here because like me they want to inform you and the people of Canada of the situation. They are here because they want to implore this government to act while there is yet time to act.

I am certain my friend from St. John's East will also want to bring his concerns to this debate, and I look forward to hearing from him. I am especially pleased to see my good friend from St. John's West, the Minister of Fisheries in his place tonight. I understand that he will follow me in this debate. That is entirely as it ought to be because he is the Newfoundland MP among the seven of us who we want to hear from most on this issue.

Many Newfoundlanders are watching these proceedings on television this evening to hear from the minister of fisheries. As our sole representative in the cabinet he can do most to get the ball rolling to the immense benefit of his constituents and mine and all the others who have the privilege of sitting here representing the people of Newfoundland.

Therefore may I appeal to him not to miss the golden opportunity that is his this evening.

I saw him writing frantically a moment ago and I am sure that steel trap mind of his is working overtime this evening.

Is it too much to ask of him that when he rises to speak he resists the understandable temptation to score some easy debating points about lily white Tories and big bad Liberals? Newfoundlanders know that he is a first-class debater. He will know that the debate this evening is not about who can deliver the slickest line. It is not about one-upmanship.

As my friend from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception said yesterday, it is about the worst of times in the cornerstone of the Newfoundland economy. It is about foreigners laughing all the way to the bank. As I have said it is about a way of life, his way of life and mine, and it is about cultural genocide.

What is the minister prepared to do to help stop it and pull us back from the brink? That is what I want to hear this evening. I believe that is what every Newfoundlander who is watching and listening wants to hear from our friend from St. John's West.

I do not want to suggest for a moment that the minister is out to lunch on this one. Far from it. It is true he sat on his hands for about four years from the beginning of the 1985 fishing season when the overfishing began until the end of 1988 before he opened his mouth to even acknowledge there was a problem, let alone protest it. But true to form, when he got in gear he took on the file with a vengeance and that is to his credit. We lost four valuable years but we cannot retrieve that now.

Indeed it occurs to me in reflecting on my friend from St. John's West that in some respects he may be seen more as a victim than a villain or culprit in this whole sorry mess. After all, he is the one who has been left dangling by the Prime Minister on this issue. After all, he is the one who wages what must be a very lonely battle in cabinet.

Part of my purpose here this evening is to try to make his battle just a little less lonely. Unless that minister can change the mind-set in cabinet, I have to wonder why he even bothers to hang in there. Having said that, I must admit there is a part of me that prays he will, but another part of me is prepared to admit to him that I would completely understand if he does not.

I said a moment ago that this is an industry of national proportions. It is that. We often think of the auto industry as a great national industry and it is. Let me do a quick comparison. The auto industry, principally in Ontario but somewhat in Quebec, represents in total, in terms of the auto plants and the auto parts plants, about 117,000 jobs at the moment. That is almost precisely the number of jobs represented by the Atlantic fishery in terms of men and women in the boats and the plants in the four Atlantic provinces.

To put it differently, in Ontario terms the auto industry represents just over 2 per cent of the jobs. In Newfoundland the fishing industry represents 21 per cent of the jobs. It is at once a very important contributor to the regional economy, but in terms of absolute size it is right up there in national job numbers with the auto industry. I am sure most Canadians would identify it as being one of our great national industries.

Newfoundland means fish. It has always meant fish from the time that Giovanni Caboto, John Cabot, shouted in his native Italian buona vista which is where we get Bonavista, the town of a proud name in the riding of my colleague, Bonavista—Trinity—Conception. It has meant fish from the time he was moved to report to the King of England that the waters around Newfoundland were "teaming in codfish". From that moment on Newfoundland came to mean fish, so much so that the west country merchants of England succeeded in their lobbying at the English court in persuading the English king to make any permanent settlement in Newfoundland illegal. That lasted until the year 1829. Notwithstanding that, from the early 1500s Newfoundland became something else. It was fish, yes, and it is fish today. It means that. But from the early 1500s it came to mean something else. It came to mean home for increasing numbers of people.

Today, five centuries later, it means home for well over one million people. I include the 560,000 to 580,000 who live there today, as well as about 600,000 who were born there but now live outside the confines of Newfoundland.

The interesting question is: why did the first people settle in Newfoundland? The answer is very simple: fish. In other terms, why did they settle there? Because they were doing what Newfoundlanders have always done and continue to do to this day. They were going where the jobs were. That is what brought them to Newfoundland. They were going where the jobs were. Even if that meant defying the established tradition, defying the vested interest, the corporate agendas and the political agendas they went where the jobs are and that practice has not changed.

Why is it that there are 100,000 native-born Newfoundlanders living in southern Ontario today, 80,000 in the Boston area, tens of thousands in the Los Angeles area, thousands in Fort McMurray, Alberta, and thousands more in Cambridge, Ontario, and why do hundreds of my constituents make the trek from Terrenceville, Bay L'Argent and other communities every year to spend six, seven, or eight months working on the CP rails in Saskatchewan or B.C.? Why is it that hundreds of my constituents and others operate the boats on the Great Lakes every summer for several months a year? It is because they are doing what their ancestors did 500 years before them. They are going where the jobs are.

It is part of this debate—if you are influenced by some of the editorials of the last day or so—so let us put to rest this cowardly, sick notion that my countrymen, my fellow Newfoundlanders, are a bunch of lazy conniving, no-goods who sit up nights trying to figure out ways to con a few more bucks out of the taxpayers of central Canada so they can keep their 10-42 lifestyle in which they work for 10 weeks so they can sit back for the other 42. Let us put that one to rest.

Let us also put to rest that gem of political wisdom, that bit of gibberish which seems to be consuming the energies of the Ottawa policy makers and some of the armchair experts at the universities which say that what is happening in Newfoundland has always been the case. Yes, the fisheries have been up and down, but so has the auto industry, agriculture, and the oil industry. It is always the case that consumer demand or foreign competition or the weather will create fluctuations in any industry. Mark my word that what is happening in Newfoundland today is absolutely without precedent. It has never happened before, never before.

While we are at it, a third red herring that we should dispense with is the one the minister unwittingly got involved in the other day. It is that the fish have discovered a new game, a Newfoundland favourite. They are out, they are playing hide and seek. You cannot find them because they hid away on us. That is the latest one. Scientists could not find them. The fish have gone AWOL, absent without leave to use the military term.

Another quasi-military term comes to mind. They are not AWOL they have paid the supreme sacrifice. The scientists are looking in the wrong place. They ought to be looking in the bone yards, in the fish offal piles in Spain and Portugal, or on the dinner tables of western Europe. If the scientists want to find the fish that is where they are. The scientists have probably been looking in the wrong places.

Those scientists should also check the ice-pans of the north Atlantic and they will find there what the ever-increasing seal population has left because it cannot digest the codfish it has killed. Yes, seals are part of the problem. However, do not let that issue, while it has to be dealt with, distract you from the much larger culprit, which is foreign overfishing.

In conclusion, there is a solution and it is a clear solution. I never said easy but I did say clear. It is clear what must be done and done without delay. Before I come to that let me note that at least in theory there is a less complicated and a more desirable solution. Simply put, that solution would have the perpetrators, basically the Spanish and the Portuguese, of foreign overfishing stop their piracy. To that end, the minister to his credit and some of his colleagues have repeatedly taken the message to the European community that overfishing is taking a dreadful toll on our industry and our way of life.

My friend from St. John's East and I did likewise. We went over to Brussels, Madrid, and Lisbon and talked to all the right people and gave them the same message, as has my colleague from Gander—Grand Falls. We appealed to their common sense, their humanity, their pocket-books, and their enlightened self-interest. None of it worked, and it is not going to work.

The time for friendly persuasion, for gentle talk, and for after dinner cocktails is over on this one. It is absolutely over. It is not going to work. It will not work. Anybody who keeps saying so is dreaming in Technicolor. We acted in good faith and for a thank you we got kicked in the teeth.

The time has come to do what it is necessary to do: to look after our own backyard. Clearly the only solution is to set in motion the necessary train of events to extend Canada's jurisdiction to the nose and tail of the Grand Banks and the Flemish Cap.

I see you signalling, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate your indulgence. I would have wanted a minute or so to elaborate on this point, but the minister needs no education in what is involved in extending the jurisdiction. A number of things can be said about it, maybe at another time, but for the present I appeal to him, when he rises to speak, to address this particular situation. It is at the crux of the problem and of course in tandem is the political will of the Prime Minister to do something about it. These are at the crux of the problem and hold the answer to a solution which will redound to the minister's benefit, will save a way of life, and will save a very great national industry.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member on his speech. It was a very good effort. There is quite a bit of it that I can certainly agree with.

We are speaking tonight about a serious problem. I must say that I have become disturbed in the last few days with the attitude that seems to be taken on the mainland of Canada in newspaper editorials and the like with reference to the situation in Newfoundland. It is most dispiriting.

We have had several hard blows in the last 10 or 12 days. One was the threat to the Hibernia project which is a chance for Newfoundland to diversify, to get high-technological development and to use the resource off our shores to which the Government of Canada has given tremendous assistance. To see almost general cheers go up in editorial boards across Canada, painting this as some kind of terrible megaproject the Government of Canada should never have been involved in and this effort to develop in Newfoundland and Labrador this undeveloped area as a besmirching and ignoble thing that the government did, is most disturbing.

I saw two asinine editorials in the Toronto Globe and Mail, which is supposed to have the intellectual leaders of the country in its editorial ranks. I have sent them a letter today which I hope they are going to publish dealing with their pusillanimous, silly and ill thought out points they made in their alleged editorials. It is not just the Toronto Globe and Mail. It is across the country.

Turning to the blow to Hibernia, in my opinion it is going to survive. I have survived hundreds of disappointments with Hibernia and I am going to survive this other one. We are going to overcome it, no thanks to mainland editorial opinion.

In addition, we have this blow with respect to the state of the fish stocks and the northern cod. Newfoundland members understand what the northern cod means to Newfoundland. It is difficult for mainlanders and those not born in Newfoundland perhaps to understand this.

The province was settled because of the presence of the northern cod. The area we are talking about, 2J-3K-L, extends from the end of my district in Trepassey, up around the Avalon peninsula on the north-east coast of Newfoundland, up through White Bay, up through Labrador to the north of Labrador. This is the area we are talking about. This is the principal fish. The reason why Newfoundland was settled was the presence of the northern cod.

To get this in context, Newfoundland is not finished. Because the northern cod stock is in danger does not mean to say Newfoundland is gone or that this is the whole fish stock of Newfoundland. This is a serious problem. I am not denigrating that, but the idea is getting around that the whole fishery of Newfoundland is gone, that the whole fishery of Labrador is gone, and that the whole fishery of Atlantic Canada is gone. That is not the case. There are many other species of fish in Atlantic Canada and around the shores of Newfoundland. The south coast fishery is not the northern cod. The gulf fishery on the west coast is not the northern cod. This does not affect crab. It does not affect other species.

What I am terribly worried about is the negative reporting of the last few days. Who is going to invest a cent in Newfoundland if we allow this impression to continue that all is gone in Newfoundland and Labrador; we are finished; we have had it; there is nothing left; there is going to be no economic activity.

What can we expect of the banks? They are already pusillanimous enough. They already do not want to invest in the fishing industry. I ask hon. members to keep in mind that yes, this is a very serious problem we are discussing here.

We are not discussing the end of the fishery in Newfoundland and Labrador. We are not discussing the end of the fishery in Atlantic Canada, but we are discussing a serious threat to one of the main fisheries of Newfoundland and Labrador, the fishery that attracted settlers to Newfoundland and Labrador, the reason why there is a rural Newfoundland and Labrador. This is of course a very serious matter.

Turning to the northern cod, 90 per cent of the jobs from the northern cod are in Newfoundland. It is 46 per cent of all the available cod quotas. It is 21 per cent of all of the groundfish that might be caught in Newfoundland; 85 to 90 per cent of it is caught and processed in Newfoundland and Labrador. I am advised that 63 per cent of all Newfoundland fishermen and 69 per cent of all of the plant workers of Newfoundland and Labrador are located in 2J–3K–L.

The present crisis we are still dealing with started really at the end of 1988 when CAFSAC, the Canadian fisheries scientists, had taken over from the NAFO Scientific Council. It had done the work on the estimates of fisheries stocks up to 1986 and turned it over to Canadian scientists. At the end of 1988 the scientists advised us that there was a major change in their prognostications with respect to what the cod biomass was for the northern cod. That is when our problem started.

In that year the total allowable catch for the northern cod had been set at 266,000 tonnes by the then minister. The scientists had recommended that if we kept to the fisheries management level of FO.1, the mortality rate based on FO.1, that we could take 16 to 20 per cent of the biomass of the fish stock in question, the TAC that year could have been 293,000 tonnes. The minister wanted to be on the cautious side so he had set a TAC of 266,000 tonnes.

At the end of that year, in December 1988, the scientists came back with a revision of their figures. They said they had concluded that the fish stocks, which had been brought to a low level by 1977 when a 200–mile zone was established, had not increased since that time by a measurement of five but had only increased by a measurement of three. Their estimates of the previous several years had been out. They said that if the measurement we wanted to apply for the following year was the management tool of FO.1, we could only take 125,000 tonnes of the northern cod.

In other words, this would be a decline from 293,000 tonnes that the scientists said was the proper TAC in 1988 to 225,000 tonnes in 1989. I do not think that any sensible government would have immediately gone from a TAC of 266,000 tonnes, which was the cautious figure we had set, to a TAC of 125,000 tonnes. It wiped out the industry overnight. It just about wiped it out completely overnight as a result.

The TAC was reduced for the year 1989 from 266,000 tonnes to 235,000 tonnes, which the scientific advisers said was a TAC that would not endanger the stock, that it would keep it at its then present biomass. It was safe to set that as a TAC. Dr. Leslie Harris and a group were appointed to review the whole situation. That is where the problem we are still dealing with originated.

Dr. Harris and his group did a very fine job and made their final report in February 1990. I just want to set the record straight about what they recommended or did not recommend. The first recommendation was that in respect of the northern cod stock and as a matter or urgency there should be an immediate reduction of fishing mortality to the level of at least 0.30 and, at the earliest feasible date, to the level of 0.20. Now 0.20 is the management tool FO.1. It allows us to take about 20 per cent of the then existing biomass.

Dr. Harris has always stressed that the scientific analysis is not sure enough, that we should be conservative and that it would be safe to go below whatever the scientist was recommending. Mr. Speaker, I can tell you—and I only have 20 minutes—that we have not set any total allowable catch in excess of what CAFSAC, our scientists, advised could be done. For example, in 1990 we set the TAC at 199,262 tonnes. In 1991 it was reduced again to 190,000 tonnes and a three-year plan was adopted so that in 1992 there would be a reduction to 185,000 tonnes and in 1993, to 180,000 tonnes.

In December 1991 I set the TAC for 1992 at 185,000 tonnes, which was in accordance with the scientific advice I was given. I was told by CAFSAC what would happen if we continued with our three-year plan. I will just read it:

> The assessment suggests that the stock will increase faster than was forecast in last year's assessment largely because of the strength of the 1986 and 1987 year classes. It also implies that the FO.1 target may also be reached in 1993.

They suggested that the existing multi-year management plan be maintained, and so I maintained it. That was December 23, 1991.

I wanted to have CAFSAC continue to look at the fall results of surveys and all the latest information to advise me again in February as to what they then thought in February to see if any changes were necessary. At the beginning of this week, as I made public, their figures have been revised and they now say that the biomass, instead of being 1,330 million tonnes as they thought it was in December, now looks to be 780,000 tonnes. The spawning biomass, which they had thought in December was in the area of 270,000 to 300,000 tonnes, was now 130,000 tonnes, in their view the lowest that it was in the last 30 years. The average spawning biomass in the last 30 years has been 290,000 tonnes.

The situation was far worse than was presented to me in the period leading up to December 1991. A decision has to be made as to what to do about this, and that is what we are debating here tonight. Obviously there is going to have to be some reduction in the total allowable catch for 1992 and there are going to have to be other measures taken. Apart altogether from the scientists, we clearly have advice from the fishing companies and the fishermen that the fish stocks are not in the shape they should be in. We do not know what all the causes are.

Least year, despite the fact that the total allowable catch set was 190,000 tonnes, Canadians caught only 127,000 tonnes. The French caught 1,850 tonnes. The French are the only people who have any right to take a cod fish within the 200-mile economic zone of Canada. They have it because of a treaty entered into in 1972 and as the result of their past history in connection with St. Pierre and Miquelon and fishing in this area.

In the same period last year it is our estimate that the European Community took 47,000 tonnes of cod outside the 200-mile limit on the nose and tail of the banks. What is the nose and tail of the banks that people talk about? The nose and tail of the banks is a little area beyond the 200-mile economic zone where the continental shelf still extends. Down in this area is the tail and up in 3L is the nose of the banks. The codfish stocks are 95 per cent within the 200-mile economic zone of Canada and at different times during the year from 3 per cent to 5 per cent swim outside.

We have been unable to persuade the European Community, principally Spain and Portugal, to observe the conservation practices or the quotas allocated by NAFO, the international organization to which we and they belong which operates in this particular area of the northwest Atlantic. There has been a moratorium declared on the nose and tail of the banks by NAFO since 1986. However the European Community refuses to observe it. Last year it took 47,000 tonnes. Five or six years ago it took 61,000 tonnes out. This is our estimate, not what it is admitting and not what it reports as having taken.

I have not the time tonight to go into the Herculean diplomatic efforts we have made to persuade them to cease and desist and observe the quotas of NAFO. We have not been successful. I intend to have our Ambassador Gherson go to Brussels next week with some of our scientists to put before the Europeans the latest figures we have on the state of the northern cod, the results of the fishery of the last several years, and to request that they start to observe the moratorium declared by NAFO on the nose and tail of the banks with respect to 2J-3K-L cod.

Whether they will respond or not I do not know. I only hope that they will.

Our campaign with respect to this foreign overfishing is going to continue unrelentingly during 1992 both with respect to public relations work in the countries of the European Community and a resolution we have before the United Nations Conference on the Environment and Development setting out what the rights of the coastal state should be with respect to straddling stocks that are both within and without the economic zone of that coastal state, because the present law of the sea is tremendously ambiguous and does not set out the rights of the coastal state.

My hon. friend, during the course of his remarks, said that the Prime Minister did not have the political will to deal with this question. That is simply not true. The Prime Minister, together with the Minister for International Trade, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and myself, in several guises as a minister, has spent many hours discussing this situation with the leading politicians and ministers of Spain and Portugal in the European Community and asking them to rectify it. That will continue and it will be stepped up during this year.

At the UNCED meeting in New York in March our resolution will be pressed and in Rio de Janeiro in June the same action will take place. We intend to ask for a conference of the countries involved in high seas fishing during the year. We have asked for a special session of NAFO to be held in connection with surveillance and enforcement matters, that will be held in March.

Today, I had the Ambassador from South Korea in to see me because certain non-NAFO countries are also fishing on the nose and tail of the banks, South Korea and Panama in particular. The Panamanian vessels are owned by Spanish and Portuguese owners; they are flags of convenience.

The South Korean Ambassador has advised me that as a result of meetings I had in Korea earlier, in excess of a year ago, and the representations we have made, the Korean government is withdrawing one of its licensed vessels from the area now and will be withdrawing another one by the end of the year or the first half of 1993. It has instructed unlicensed vessels, which are vessels not licensed by the Korean government but owned by Koreans, to withdraw from the NAFO area during the first half of this year. It has instructed third country vessels that have Korean crews to do the same. Some progress is being made with respect to that matter.

Our problem is not simply foreign overfishing. There is no point in our believing that just the cessation of overfishing is going to solve our problem. It is far more involved than that. We have to deal with the question of what is happening to the stocks of capelin which the cod feed on.

We have to deal with the question of seals, because whether they eat cod or do not eat cod they certainly eat capelin. If there are no capelins it is going to be very difficult to find cod. That is a question related to this issue, as well.

We have to get more information about the environment and environmental factors and how they affect the presence or actions of cod, capelin and other fish. We have to do more work on that. There are a lot of new initiatives which we have taken that we have to continue.

We have to try to look after those people who are going to be affected by possible fish plant closures or a possible lack of fishing activity. I intend to be in Newfoundland tomorrow to meet with interested groups on Friday and I hope and expect I will announce what steps we should take, commencing on Monday.

In dealing with this question you can be assured, and Newfoundland fishermen can be assured, that we are not taking steps which are going to directly affect the traditional inshore Newfoundland fisherman using traditional methods to catch fish, who is not a mobile fisherman and cannot move 50 miles, 100 miles or 200 miles to fish. I have that very much in my mind. That will be a principle of the action I intend to announce, hopefully next Monday.

In addition to the actions I will announce next Monday there will be other actions in the fisheries management areas announced from time to time. It makes it easier to understand the difficulty fisheries managers have when you see one of our scientists today saying, as quoted in the St. John's Evening Telegram, that: "The calculations of a scientist can be off by 25 per cent either way when they are calculating stock size." That is a fact. I have to try to manage the fishery being told one thing, which I recited to you in December 1991, and getting entirely different information seven weeks later.

S. O. 52

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. Your time has now expired.

An hon. member: He still has a minute.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent for the member to continue?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Crosbie: I am not trying to allege or suggest that there is anything wrong with the skills or qualifications of our scientists. It is just the nature of the beast that they are tackling. Present methods do not allow them to have a higher accuracy level than within these parameters which I have just quoted from the newspaper.

During the last several years we have put in place a number of programs, and will certainly be continuing the same kind of program, to try to help to diversify within the fishery and try to create employment and diversification outside the fishery.

A fisheries alternatives program is operated by ACOA. To summarize, since its inception in 1990 some 575 projects have been approved at a cost of $41.9 million creating 1,547 new jobs in the rural areas affected by the diminution of fish stocks. In the province of Newfoundland there have been 485 projects approved and 1,356 jobs created to try to take account of and replace those jobs that have been lost. We have an economic diversification program under the Department of Fisheries to try to assist diversification within the fishery which will continue. Under that program $19.1 million has been approved for various projects in 1990-1991 and 1991-1992 which has enabled us to keep operating fish plants in Canso and Burgeo and at Grand Bank. Hopefully there will be others. This program has assisted us in starting a number of new businesses in rural areas of Atlantic Canada and of Newfoundland. This kind of program will continue to assist while this particular crisis is upon us.

Mr. Speaker, I did not know I had taken longer than two minutes. This is a very serious problem to cover in 20 minutes. I hope you will excuse me if I have gone a couple of minutes over.

I am pleased to be the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans at this time. What is the point of being Minister of Fisheries and Oceans when everything is going swimmingly and there are no problems because even then on all sides you are assailed because of the conflicting interests in the fishery. But I am pleased to have the opportunity to help my fellow Newfoundlanders and Labradorians in this crisis. I will make every effort I can to resolve this crisis fairly and equitably and get all the assistance I possibly can from the Government of Canada in that direction.

I look forward to the help of my colleagues opposite in that task. Do not be too harsh in your criticism of the government, but keep the pressure on it for the future. What happened in the past or who made an error or a mistake or who was wrong—I can cite instances against the previous government and you can cite instances against this government. We have to keep our eye on the ball and see that the proper action is taken now to help our province through.

I am completely non-partisan in this matter. We have to keep our eye on the ball and see what we can do to help overcome the serious problem. It is not the end of the province of Newfoundland and Labrador. It is not even near the end. There are a lot of opportunities in Newfoundland and Labrador yet and we have to counteract this terrible miasma of propaganda and ignorance that has spread across the mainland in the last 10 days since our difficulties with Hibernia and with this particular news.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I guess it is a pleasure to participate in this debate tonight on behalf of the New Democratic Party and, in particular, on behalf of our critic in this particular field, the member for Nanaimo—Cowichan.

I find it a particularly important debate tonight because it is a debate about people, it is a debate about their livelihoods, and it is a debate about people in their communities.

People throughout Newfoundland and Labrador and, indeed, Atlantic Canada are watching tonight and hoping for some assurance from Parliament and from the Government of Canada that there is a message and a signal for the people of that area who have suffered so much. In fact, as important as this emergency debate is tonight, I wonder if the people of Atlantic Canada are not getting a bit tired of being the subject of yet another emergency debate and if it would not be such a bad idea if maybe for once Atlantic Canada was not on the news because the news has not been good.

When we see the news from that particular region about the number of lay-offs and job losses we know how much that is hurting. We had the Hibernia project mentioned as well as Sears Canada in Halifax, 656 part-time jobs; Stone Consolidated; Dominion Textile in Yarmouth; Rio Algom, the list goes on. It is because of the approach, dare I say, we have had from previous administrations and this particular government in allowing the so-called free market to dominate. That free market is really supposed to determine with an invisible hand just what direction the economy is going to go. Piled on that are the problems in the forest industry. Tonight we are debating the fishing industry but piled on that are the problems from this government, the goods and services tax, free trade, and now the mention from the Government of New Brunswick about user fees in health care. The bad news piles up.

Perhaps people were hoping for something from the minister. I must say that I think there is some disappointment in his comments tonight. We were generous in allowing him some extra time. We are hopeful that his announcement on Monday will go some distance to giving some good news to the people of Newfoundland and Labrador and Atlantic Canada. We did not get any news tonight, we got a recitation of the problem. I think what the minister owed us tonight was a sense of his awareness and to give some assurance to the people on the east coast that the Government of Canada is concerned about their future.

We did not get that tonight so I think there is probably some disappointment. It raises the stakes, if you like, and the minister is very good at that. He is raising the stakes to see just exactly what kind of news he gets or he can provide on Monday. Let us hope it is some good news.

All we have to do is look at the importance of the fisheries resource in Atlantic Canada, and in particular the northern cod resource in Newfoundland and Labrador. We are talking about some $700 million worth of industry in 1991. The fishing industry supports some 31,000 jobs in Atlantic Canada, 90 per cent of them in Newfoundland. The minister, in talking about it, said that is what made Newfoundland and Labrador. Well, we in other parts of the country understand that. It is the three "F"s I have talked about here—our farms, our forests and our fish. We come from communities that have relied on the three "F"s. Tonight we are talking about fish but tomorrow it will be about forests and the next day, on Friday, it is going to be about farms.

That is why this debate is so important, because in those people's homes tonight we are talking about their livelihood and their future.

I congratulate the member for bringing this debate forward tonight and I want to outline on behalf of our party, the New Democrats, the program we have developed. It is a quick, four-point program, and I would like to see how the minister measures up against that when he makes his announcement on Monday.

Of course all of this comes from the decision or the recommendation that the catch is going to have to be reduced dramatically or we are in serious trouble. We are in serious trouble now. We are not talking lightly. We are talking about a possible watershed, the future possible shutdown of an industry, and thousands and thousands of jobs.

This recommendation to the minister is not new. In 1988 the Canada-Newfoundland Inshore Fisheries Agreement had this to say: "That with few exceptions the fishery resources of the Atlantic have reached their maximum utilization and in some cases there is an indication that over exploitation is occurring". That comment was made in 1988.

In 1989 scientists indicated that their previous estimates of stocks strength were overestimated. They recommended a dramatic reduction be made immediately.

In 1990 Dr. Harris, who has been mentioned before, in a study commissioned by the government, confirmed what the scientists had discovered. Indeed, he stated publicly that "the reduction in the total allowable catch should move from 265,000 tonnes to 90,000 tonnes".

The crisis in the fishery was best expressed in a draft document circulated at the Atlantic Groundfish Advisory Council meeting on Monday. In 1991 the TAC for northern cod was set at 190,000 tonnes. Only 127,000 tonnes were actually caught. The inshore fishery was "the worst since 1976, with only 67,000 tonnes caught". Further evidence regarding the government and the previous government, when I referred to the 1983 Kirby report that had been mentioned previously, identified what the problem was.

I know tonight there is an attempt to set a tone that we were going to be non-partisan and not point figures. Fair enough. We will not point fingers but some have to accept responsibility.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans mentioned yesterday about 2,000 jobs—and that is a conservative estimate and about the future of how many people's jobs will be affected by this decision and by what he is going to say on Monday.

In fact, the First Ministers' Conference of 1989 was told that the collapse of the fishery could result in some 6,000 jobs that would be lost. In the case of Ontario, if we were to use the same measurement, we are talking about a loss of some 115,000 jobs.

The government's own Employment and Immigration Advisory Council in 1990, its vision and view of the Atlantic fishery said: "Hundreds of Atlantic communities will lose their only industry. Thousands of families left without adequate incomes will be forced to rely on welfare or to uproot their lives for the dubious promise of mainland wealth". That is from the government's own report.

Let us in the short time we have tonight take a chance to review the four-point plan that our party, the New Democrats, is suggesting. I know the minister will take notes on this and I hope we can measure that against his announcement on Monday.

I preface that outline with the comments that were made just yesterday by our party's leader in Newfoundland and Labrador, Mr. Newhook, who called on the Prime Minister to take a personal initiative in the face of this worsening situation.

It has been mentioned earlier how the Prime Minister when he has a problem at hand gets directly involved. In some cases he just calls George and they straighten out the problem.

Look at the problem we have now. It is time for the Prime Minister to take that personal initiative, to take hold of this problem and address it immediately, and for this government to address the problem of the northern cod fishery immediately.

What are we taking a look at in the four point action plan? The first point, and perhaps the most important point, is that this government should move immediately to assume fisheries management jurisdiction over the nose and tail of the Grand Banks effectively terminating foreign overfishing. We have a main reason for that.

We are talking about the conservation of a resource. It is an environmental emergency. Measures should be taken. We take up and accept the offer and the suggestion made by the minister of fisheries in Newfoundland and Labrador that this minister should give the international community its notice that as of January 1, 1993 Canada will take charge of that particular area.

That is the message that should be delivered in Brussels. This country has a moral obligation to restore not only the fish stocks but also to ensure the future viability of Canadian fishing communities.

If Newfoundlanders and Atlantic Canadians are prepared to make the necessary sacrifices, they must not be asked to bear the burden while foreign fleets continue to operate with impunity.

We should treat this as importantly as Canada has treated the debate about Arctic sovereignty. This government has not done the best of jobs in taking care of our sovereignty in the Arctic, but it has done virtually nothing to take care of sovereignty in this particular area. That is most important. That is the number one part of an action plan to resolve this problem.

The second point is that we must define the priorities for the future and what kind of fishery we want. Will it be corporate based or community based? If we choose the latter, we must move in conjunction with industry, labour and the provincial governments. The minister has mentioned that, putting in place the long-term strategy to achieve that objective and developing new fishing technologies which are not destructive of the ocean's ecology. A strategy which has as its premise of sustainable development.

There are fine words in the government's green plan about attempting to deal with the fish stocks.

I do not know if the minister has read the green plan. Perhaps he should take a second look at it to see that even the goals in this plan are upheld, because if we continue at the pace that we are going, they will not be. We will be in even greater trouble.

The third part of the action plan is to ensure and to watch that those communities, those people in those homes who are watching tonight at the very least, at the bottom line as Mr. Newhook said in his comments, get assistance to take care of those people who may lose their livelihood. Let us hope that that is not the case. As a bottom line, that is government's job as I see it.

In recognition that the offshore fishery could be shut down with job losses reaching between 3,000 and 6,000 people, the federal and provincial governments must be prepared to bring forward programs, perhaps on a level not seen before, of ensuring that thousands of families are not forced to go down the road in search of a future.

There is an old adage about how in war we always seem to be able to find the money, the energy and the effort. During the recent gulf war this government mobilized some $650 million for a six-month period. Under the adjustment program of this government we are talking about a figure of some $584 million over five years in five provinces.

If this is not a national emergency, it is one the government must put the same effort into to mobilize economic resources and government resources to ensure that the people in those fishing communities in particular are guaranteed and do have a future.

Those people want to make a livelihood in the fishing industry. They want to live in their homes and their communities, and they want to have a future there.

The fourth point in the New Democratic action plan is an important one. It is a point that is especially important given some of the debate now on the Constitution. It relates, of course, to the questions around the economic union and some of the necessary rules and regulations that may be needed to protect some of those resources themselves.

We suggest close examination of that particular part of the constitutional package that will give some of those provinces some ability to ensure that they can manage those cases themselves.

In proposing and making suggestions tonight, we spent some time laying out some thoughts so that we have something to measure against what the minister will have to say on Monday.

We have taken this debate seriously enough to consider and lay out some suggestions and not to use the opportunity just to point fingers and blame Conservatives who perhaps duly should have that blame.

In conclusion, in this very important debate we are having tonight about just how important this issue is to Newfoundland and Labrador and to Atlantic Canada we must take a look at the people and their future there. That is my interest in this debate because it is an interest that I think is from coast to coast to coast.

How do we deal with those people who live in resource communities, dependent on our farms, our fish and our forests, if we continue to be the hewers of wood and drawers of water, we will always be or seen to be certainly under Canada–U.S. free trade?

We have talked about the fisheries resource but there is another resource. Perhaps it is the most important resource of all. I am talking about the resource of our people in Atlantic Canada.

As an example, I spoke tonight about young people. Of the pages who serve us in this House tonight, there are some nine who are from Atlantic Canada. I talked to a few of them tonight about their future. Do they have a future? Will they go back home to Atlantic Canada?

I think that is a message that we hope they will take in earnest, that they will go home, back to Atlantic Canada and help develop that area. I know that is a difficult one for them. It is a difficult one for all the young people of Atlantic Canada and it is difficult for everyone in those communities.

I encourage and hope that the minister, when he makes his decisions on Monday, has those communities in mind and makes sure that he makes the right decision for the people of Atlantic Canada and the right decision for the people of Newfoundland and Labrador.

Mr. Dingwall: On a point of order, just to forewarn the Chair that under Standing Order 43(2) members of our party will be dividing their time accordingly, 10 minutes each for the remainder of the debate.

I hope that the Chair will recognize that my colleague from Newfoundland was the individual who moved the emergency debate and I hope that the rotations will be in accordance with that.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to rise and participate in this debate this evening.

I would like to thank you, Mr. Speaker, for making possible this emergency debate on a topic that is critically important to the people of Atlantic Canada. Indeed, as has been said by some other members here, this should be a problem and concern for all Canadians.

I want to address five points in my remarks tonight. I want to talk about what has happened. I want to talk about why it has happened. I want to talk about who is to blame for what has happened because we have heard much about that. I want to talk about what we can do about it and a little bit about what we should not do about it.

Quite clearly, the single most important fishery stock on the east coast of Canada is in very serious trouble. In Atlantic Canada 35,000 jobs depend upon that stock and it is a grave, serious situation, particularly for the province of Newfoundland and Labrador, but also I should say for other provinces in Atlantic Canada, including my own and including the province of Quebec.

But we should not over-dramatize the situation. Not all fishery stocks in Atlantic Canada are in trouble, not the whole fishery in Atlantic Canada is in trouble. Indeed, many of our fisheries have never been in better health than they are right now and let us not over-dramatize the situation. Let us focus on what, in fact, is the problem.

The scientists have said that they miscalculated. In 1988, at the time when the TAC for northern cod was at 266,000 tonnes, they came to the minister of the day and said: "Minister, somehow the numbers are not correct". They urged a vast and an immediate reduction.

The minister immediately reduced that stock to 235,000 tonnes and called upon a special task force to do a serious study of the situation to try to assess what it should be.

Dr. Harris and his colleagues reported and in consequence of that report the stocks were further dramatically and substantially reduced by the minister of the day. I might say it was not with the overwhelming approval of my hon. friends opposite, many of whom criticized the minister of the day and said: "You are putting people out of work". The minister of the day knew that.

Once again the scientists have come to the minister of today and have said: "You have to reduce that stock immediately by 25,000 tonnes over the next few months". In effect they have said: "Close the offshore northern cod fishery until June and then we will have a look at it and see what is going to happen".

That is a serious situation. It is going to directly impact at least three plants in Newfoundland and possibly one in my own province of Nova Scotia. It is going to mean up to 2,000 people, plant workers being laid off. It could mean up to 400 trawlermen being laid off. We have already just last week had 1,000 people laid off by FPI at Catalina. It is a serious situation and we have to ask ourselves: How did we get in this situation? I have heard my hon. friends opposite.

The hon. gentleman who opened the debate tonight said the whole thing is the Prime Minister's fault. Is it not interesting? Everything that happens in this country seems to be the Prime Minister's fault.

Last year the fishery in the Newfoundland was devastated because of ice. I suppose that was the Prime Minister's fault as well. Let us take a look. There is all kinds of blame to be shared by those who are less interested in solving the problem and more interested in determining who is to blame. Let us look at who is to blame.

An hon. member: The Prime Minister is.

Mr. McCreath: There is climate. There is the food chain, seals, fishing technology, inaccurate scientific data, foreign overfishing and yes, maybe there is bad management, but we will come to that and draw our own conclusion when the time comes.

Let us look at climate for example. Everybody knows that 1991 was the most extraordinary year for bad weather and ice conditions in Newfoundland's history. We heard the hon. member for Labrador yesterday talking about the community of Black Tickle where not a single fish was caught in 1991.

Mr. Simmons: I recognize that my friend from South Shore was not in the Chamber when the debate began and when the minister of fisheries and I spoke, so he might not have captured the spirit of the debate. We are here looking for some answers.

Could I appeal to him not to turn this into a circus because it is a very serious issue affecting a lot of people in my riding and elsewhere.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I do not think that was a point of order. The hon. member for South Shore has the floor.

Mr. McCreath: As I said, I certainly would love to avoid partisanship here, but I was at Question Period today and yesterday, so let us talk about what I was talking about.

I talked about the ice conditions and climate being part of this problem. We have to recognize that.

An hon. member: Well do something about it.

Mr. McCreath: I think my hon. friend from Burin—St. George's ought to talk to his colleagues over there.

Let us talk about the capelin stock. Cod fish feed on the capelin. The capelin stocks have been very low. As a matter of fact in the 1991 season, the Russians had difficulty finding any at all and they are the only people who have ever fished that capelin. The reduction in their catches had nothing to do with overfishing because they have never had a quota that exceeded 13 per cent of the TAC of capelin. Capelin has always been a variable stock but it has always been a harvestable stock and there has been plenty of it. Why the disappearance in 1991? Quite simply, we do not know. Perhaps it had to do with cold water. Perhaps it had to do with unusual distributions. The bottom line is that for whatever reason the capelin is not there, and that has obviously impacted on the cod stocks.

Ms. Campbell: Blame it on the seals.

Mr. McCreath: Then we come to the seals. The member for South West Nova wants to talk about seals. It is interesting that scientists say they do not know what the score is on the seals and what impact they have. I will tell you the fishermen know. The fishermen in my area can tell you about seals and the fishermen in Newfoundland can tell you about seals. The fact is that in 1983 the Europeans destroyed our seal hunt. I cannot remember who was in government then but perhaps my hon. friends opposite can. The seal population at that time was about 2 million. Today it is 3.5 million because the seal hunt was destroyed.

It is said that the average seal eats 1.5 tonnes of fish per year. If you multiply that out it means that the amount of fish eaten by seals increased by 1.8 million tonnes per year, or 3.6 billion pounds of fish. That has to have something to do with why cod fish stocks are down.

Fishing technology is another possible factor. The fact of the matter is that our fishermen are a lot better than they were because they have better technology. It is not that the fishermen of today are any more skilled than the fishermen of days gone by. They have better equipment and can find the fish a lot easier than they could then. So naturally their harvesting effort is a lot more productive. This has to be a factor in the situation.

Then we can talk about scientific advice. If you are in government it is an easy thing to blame the scientists for wrong advice. It is true the minister can only act on the advice he is given and if he is given bad advice it may well lead to bad decisions. The fact of the matter is that it is not fair to blame the scientists. This is a very difficult challenge. This government, through its commitment to dealing with this problem, has more than doubled the amount of money made available for science in studying the northern cod stocks. The bottom line is there will never be enough resources. The only way you can ever count the number of cod fish in the ocean is to drain the ocean and count them. It is not really practical to do that. You cannot blame the scientists. You have to recognize that it is always going to be an inexact science and at best it is going to be a difficult challenge.

Then we come to the next possible villain and we are getting down to the core of it here. We are talking about the impact of the Europeans in overfishing. There are two issues of overfishing that are significant. I am afraid that some of my hon. friends, having heard what I have heard in this House for the last couple of days, get very confused about the impact of foreign fishing in the North Atlantic on the northern cod stocks. There is fishing that goes on inside the 200–mile Canadian zone and there is fishing that goes on outside the 200–mile Canadian zone. The difference is that we control what goes on inside. We are accountable unequivocally and unquestionably.

We have had the destruction, or the apparent destruction, of the 2J–3K–L cod stock which is a trans–boundary stock. Where is the problem there? We hear my hon. friends opposite speak about the vessels that are licensed to fish inside Canadian waters. We have heard some suggest this is the source and cause of the problem. Let us take a hard look at it. How many tonnes of cod fish are Europeans licensed to catch inside the Canadian 200–mile zone? The answer is 2000 tonnes. This stock has declined from the point where the TAC was 266,000 in 1988. The minister is now being told to drop it somewhere into the low 100–plus tonnes, and we have 2000 tonnes allocated to the French. This is supposed to be the source of the problem. Well, no, not at all.

Our hon. friends talk about allocations of witch, plaice, and various types of flounder. This apparently is the source of the problem. That is not the source of the problem. Interestingly enough, the foreigners were licensed some years ago to come into our waters. It was in the period of 1981 to 1986 that the EC was given a long–term agreement which gave it access to 45,000 metric tons of northern cod over five years. In 1972 the government of my hon. friends opposite made an allocation of three million metric tons of cod fish inside the gulf to France in a five–year period.

This government had the wisdom to conclude an interim agreement to France that brought the rampant cod fishing by France under control to the point that this year France will probably catch less than 2,000 tonnes. My hon. friends opposite may wish to talk about foreign vessels fishing in Canadian waters as the problem, but the reality is it has absolutely nothing to do with the northern cod.

I might just say, as a digression, that foreign vessels inside Canadian waters are very much to the benefit of Canadian fish plant workers. Ask the people in Canso and Burgeo. One thousand Canadians are employed because of the deal made by this government to exchange silver hake and capelin for cod fish. That has put Canadians back to work. Is it the policy of my hon. friends opposite that those fish plants in Canso and Burgeo should be closed? It is the same with respect to silver hake allocations under joint agreements between Canadian and foreign companies which make use of resources that Canadians would leave in the water, provide a market for Canadians to sell fish back to those foreigners, and provide work for Canadian fish plant workers. No, the problem has nothing to do with the licensing of foreigners to fish inside Canadian waters.

However it has a great deal to do with illegal, rapacious, unenvironmental, and destructive fishing by Europeans outside the 200–mile zone on the 2J–3K–L cod stock. One need only look at the level of non–co–operation that has come from the Europeans. Although they are members of NAFO, each year they ignore the NAFO assigned quotas. They unilaterally give themselves a quota and then proceed to go out and catch every cod fish they can. The story is that in 1991 they caught upwards of 47,000 tonnes of fishery for which they were assigned a quota of absolutely zero.

I find it shocking that European environmentalists have the gall to talk about environmental problems in Canada, to talk about whether or not we harvest seals, to talk about how we harvest our forests, and they look the other way. I have talked to Greenpeace and parliamentarians in Europe. They look the other way at this environmental problem. We as Canadians should not be talking about what this government or the government in Newfoundland did or anything else. We can all stand united on the issue that this is outrageous and unacceptable.

The question is, can the Government of Canada do anything about it?

Some hon. members: Of course they can.

Mr. McCreath: My hon. friends opposite say of course they can. Well the government can meet with the Europeans and say this must stop. It can work with them co–operatively and try to persuade them, but the bottom line is that if it is international waters, it is their right to do whatever they want unless there is co–operation. My hon. friends opposite have suggested we should ignore the International Law of the Sea Convention of 1973. We should throw away our 200-mile zone and unilaterally say that we are moving out and taking over, just as Saddam Hussein did with Kuwait. He said he was moving in and taking over. He had no legal right to do it but he did.

My hon. friend opposite from the NDP suggested we should unilaterally push it out. There is no international law that allows it. We face the possibility that the rest of the world will revoke recognition of our 200 miles and come in and take it all. Or maybe my hon. friends opposite say the solution is to send out the navy and start sinking ships. Is that what they are suggesting?

We have to deal with this in a realistic practical way. There are many people who can be blamed for this problem if you want to. If you want to ignore all those reasons I have given and blame the minister of fisheries or the Prime Minister go right ahead. But having done that ask yourself: How do we solve the problem?

I want to tell you the first way to solve this problem is by having a minister of fisheries and a government that has the courage to do the right thing and see that those stocks do come back. They must have the courage to face up to the fact that we are going to have to close down that fishing for some period of time. They must also have the courage and integrity to put programs into place that are going to help these people get over this time as they have done before, as they did last year with the ice problem and as they did when they brought in the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program with $584 million. To my NDP colleague that is a pittance, but it is a lot of money to us and has created jobs in my riding, in all of Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, and other parts of Atlantic Canada. That is the kind of proper, intelligent, courageous response.

I look to this minister to show leadership in dealing with the seal problem. We are going to have to tell the Europeans that maybe it is time we started shooting more seals. That is the only way to deal with the problem and if they do not like it that is their problem. We are going to have to get more aggressive with the Europeans.

Perhaps it is time for us to react in the Icelandic way and go out there and rough them up a little bit if that is what it takes. It is not the proper thing to do, but we have to protect the Canadian interests.

Now what should we not do? There are two things we should not do. We should not panic. We hear people across suggesting we should panic about this, that Atlantic Canada is collapsing around us and it is "woe is me" everywhere. This is not the case. We have a serious crisis and a serious problem with one fish stock that impacts greatly on Newfoundland and to a lesser extent on other areas. This government must deal with it and this government will deal with it, but we do not want to take the entire fishery. Let us not take the silver hake plan let us not take the turbot plan let us not deal with tuna or lobsters. Those things each have their appropriate place. They are developing as fisheries. They are going to create jobs for Atlantic Canadians in the future as they have in the past.

We have a problem with northern cod. We must deal with northern cod. Thank goodness at this time in our history we have the minister we do today. He is a man who is sensitive to Newfoundlanders and to Atlantic Canadians, a man who is intelligent and understands the issues and the complexities of the fishery. He is a man who has the courage to do what is right, a man who has the ability and toughness to stand at the cabinet table, a man who is not afraid of the opposition or the labour unions. He is a man who is going to solve this problem for Newfoundlanders and for Canadians.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the speeches that have been made here tonight. I want to congratulate my colleague from Burin—St. George's. I also want to thank the minister for the information that he has passed on. The member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley spoke a lot about the fishery. I am not really sure what he said.

I could have sworn that the last speaker from South Shore was speaking from this side of the House. He had a lot to say about the ills of the fishery. He hit the problem which has been skirted around for the last few minutes, but then he did not say what he could do about it. I have to remind him that he is on the government side and it does have a responsibility for taking some action.

I do not take any pleasure in talking here this evening. Normally I do in this House. There are any number of subjects that I would rather speak on.

I want to put a human face on this. I want to speak directly to the problem and I want to suggest a solution. The human face is that I come from a riding which I boast is the biggest fishing riding in Canada. I have not been challenged on this yet. The fact of the matter is I have 57 fish plants. Two days from now on Friday evening the largest plant and one of the most up to date, if not the most up to date plant, is going to close. Eight hundred and fifty people are going to walk out that gate, 155 trawlermen are going to stop work, and they expect to go back in anywhere from two and a half to three and a half months. I hope they will but they are not sure. Their company is not sure and I am not sure.

We are talking tonight about the northern cod stock, 2J-3K-L, that forms a large percentage of the Newfoundland fishery, of the Canadian Atlantic fishery. Yes, there are variables, all kinds of them, plus or minus 25 per cent the scientists tell us. The Labrador current will change. The temperatures will change. The fish migrate.

I want to talk about one aspect. It is the aspect that causes me the most frustration but it is an aspect for which we have the figures and it is an aspect about which something can be done. I have made—I counted them tonight before I came here—20 speeches making that recommendation. You have heard me make some of them, Mr. Speaker.

These are the figures. The northern cod stock until about the 1960s was basically caught by the inshore fishermen. Because of technology and the size of trawlers and those kinds of things the catch of that particular stock of cod reached a peak in 1968 when 815,000 tonnes were caught.

I would remind the House that one tonne of fish works out to about 35 jobs. Every time I say one tonne, it means 35 jobs.

Last year we went from 815,000 tonnes to 127,000 tonnes. That is a reduction of 85 per cent. There are any number of reasons why this happened. I want to take one aspect and that aspect has to be a large part of the problem.

We have talked about NAFO, we have talked about the European Community, and we have talked about overfishing. Two years after this government came to power an allocation of 9,500 tonnes was made to the European Community. It took four and a half times that amount, 30 per cent of what the Canadians took. The next year it had another allocation of 9,500 tonnes and it took 20 per cent of what the Canadians took, 35,000 tonnes. The next year it had no allocation and it took 26,000 tonnes.

What was the government doing about it? Up to now, nothing. The member for Gander—Grand Falls was complaining about overfishing. This government denied there was a problem.

Let me take you to the next year, Mr. Speaker. There was no allocation and they took 35,000 tonnes. What did the government do? It started to talk. It started to enter into diplomatic discussions. It started to send politicians off to the European Community.

Last year, and we you have heard the figures before, the European Community with no allocation caught 47,000 tonnes, the second largest in 15 years, a 100 per cent increase from the year before, while Canadian fishermen took roughly 50 per cent of what they took before, 127,000 tonnes.

The conclusion is that we have known figures. We do not need the scientific plus or minus 25 per cent. We know we have a problem and we know we have to do something about it. Time has run out. Time has stopped for talking, cajoling, coaxing and diplomatic missions. The time has come for the Prime Minister to get personally involved and for this government to do something about it.

The hon. member for South Shore said that you cannot just go outside the 200 miles and do what you want. I would remind this House that in my lifetime, the control of the ocean has gone from three miles, because that was the range of a cannon, and when a cannon became obsolete it moved out to 12 miles, because that was the range that high definition warning radar could pick up an average vessel in a certain sea state—I think it was sea state 3—and then it moved out to 200 miles because people found that there were nodules, there was oil, and there were lots of fish out to that limit, generally speaking, the continental shelf of most countries.

Canada happens to be the second largest country in the world, with the world's largest continental shelf.

When the limit was three miles it was said that we would never be able to get beyond that. We are out to 200 miles now. Anybody who says that cannot be done does not understand international marine law, or does not particularly want to. The difference between international marine law and civil law—the Saddam Husseins and taking over another country—is that it has been recognized that unilateral action creates a precedent in international marine law and it can be done providing there are certain things that accompany it.

First off, there has to be a good reason and when you are looking at the livelihood of a section of your country, then I think that is a pretty good reason.

You have to be able to support it and enforce it. I would suggest that with the record that our navy had in the gulf war—it had 3 per cent of the force and it did 25 per cent of the interdictions— it is quite capable of enforcement. Then you have got to send your bureaucrats and your politicians out to speak out on this subject. Then, you have an action plan. You are doing something about it.

This is not the first time the minister has heard this. It is not the first time members have heard it. I have mentioned it 20 times in this House. Dr. Harris of the Harris report mentioned it in recommendation number 5. It was a Liberal policy platform, page 22, recommendation 10, in 1988. Premier Wells is now saying it; Mr. Carter, the Minister of Fisheries in Newfoundland, is saying it; Mr. Cashin, the head of the Fishermen's Union in Newfoundland, is saying it; and pretty soon everybody will be saying it except the government. When will it be able to say it? What is it afraid of? Why will it not do it?

In 1948 the Truman declaration was a unilateral declaration for the United States to take control of their mineral rights and fish out to 200 miles. It took a while for it to take effect. In 1974 a little country, Greenland, with a minuscule navy, took on the Royal Navy, the British Navy, and won its case in the International Court of Law, by a unilateral declaration because somebody else was catching the fish that caused the livelihood of its people to shrink. Canada did it in 1977.

So we are not inventing something here. We are not doing something that has never been done before. We are suggesting a precedent that has precedents in law, can be done, has been done, and should be done.

As I wrap up my thoughts here this evening, I find it very hard to explain why the government that has a problem, knows what the solution is, is not doing it. I find it very hard to explain to the plant workers in the FPI plant on the border of Port Union and Catalina that this action is not being taken, an action that could ensure that they go back to work and that they will not be on unemployment insurance, and the other 56 plants in my riding, will not be taken.

With all the enthusiasm that I have, and I know that I am joined by my party in this, we are urging this government to pack up the nonsense, to get rid of the fuzz, stop the talking, and let us get on with some action to do something that is meaningful, helpful, and will help save the lives and the dignity of those people who are affected.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin by thanking the Speaker of the House of Commons for recognizing, at the request of the member for Burin—St. George's, that the situation in Atlantic Canada, specifically the situation confronting Newfoundland and Labrador, is indeed an emergency.

It is an emergency that requires the attention of the House of Commons of Canada. It is an emergency that can be defined as being in the national interest. It is an emergency that justifies the quite extraordinary, and Canadians should realize the unusual and rare decision of a Speaker to grant a request by a member for the holding of an emergency debate.

It is important to point that out because it seems to me that in very large measure what we, from Atlantic Canada, and we from Newfoundland and Labrador, have to face every time we debate this matter is the disbelief, the misunderstanding in many quarters and regrettably too often in this House, certainly sometimes across this country, that the fishing issue, the question of the 200-mile limit, the responsibility for conservation of the fish stock, the responsibility for policing, patrolling and managing Canadian waters is not a regional issue.

It is not a Newfoundland issue. It is an issue of national interest and national importance. It is an issue that speaks to and defines in part the sovereignty of a nation. Tonight we are not speaking to fishermen, to plant workers who feel in great peril in their homes. Tonight we are speaking to our fellow Canadians and we are asking our fellow Canadians to bring the moral weight of their intrinsic sense of what is right to bear on a government that has refused to stand up and be counted for the fishermen and plant workers, for a way of life in Atlantic Canada.

Do members realize what it means when we say that the northern cod stock has collapsed as dramatically as it has, when we say that some 2,000 jobs in this industry are going to be immediately and directly affected by management decisions that are going to be forced on the minister of fisheries, when we say that it is the equivalent of an announcement from the province of Ontario that one-third to one-half of the entire auto industry had shut down?

Can we begin to even imagine the response and the reaction across this land if tomorrow the Premier of Ontario announced that one-half of the entire automobile industry of Ontario had gone down the chute?

This Parliament would find itself sitting around the clock day in and day out to deal with a national emergency, because that is what it would be. The economic consequences for Atlantic Canada, and in particular for Newfoundland, are no less when we say that the Atlantic cod stock, the northern cod stock, has collapsed.

There were 31,000 jobs in Atlantic Canada dependent upon the northern cod stock. The northern cod stocks make up 46 per cent of the entire cod stocks of the east coast of Canada.

In 1988, the quota for northern cod was 266,000 metric tons. By 1991, that quota was down to 185,000 metric tons and the fleet was only able to catch 127,000 metric tons. In the same year, the foreign fishing effort resulted in a doubling of the foreign catch. They are catching 20,000 to 47,000 metric tons.

The destruction, the wanton, deliberate destruction of the Atlantic cod stocks, in particular the northern cod stock, is every bit as great a criminal environmental action as the wanton, knowing, and greedy destruction of the rain forests. It is exactly the same because the nations that go out and deliberately overfish on the nose and the tail of the Grand Banks, that wantonly destroy this resource belonging to all mankind for greed and profit in one year, are the same hypocritical nations that stand up in the world-wide agencies, in the UN, and cry about the destruction of the rain forests. Those are the same hypocritical nations, members of the EC, that stood up and banned the seal hunts off the east coast of Canada because they were people of great conscience. They are not people of conscience. They are people of greed and their principles can be bought and sold.

It is time that the Government of Canada understood that the destruction of those cod stocks is a national issue. It is in the national interest. It is time that this government is prepared to upset some of our so-called trading partners. It is time that we are prepared to establish linkage between good behaviour in the cod stocks on the nose and tail of the Grand Banks and a good relationship with Canada in other matters.

I will tell you what Atlantic Canadians feel. More than that, I will tell you what they know in their gut. They know that they are mere bits of plastic to be shuffled around on the world-wide Monopoly board. They know that they are expendable. They know that the government is fully aware of the criminal activity of nations fishing outside our waters and they know that the government is prepared to do nothing because this government has put the interests of Newfoundland, Labrador, Atlantic Canada, and the people on the east coast of this country secondary to other trade interests. That is the reality. That is a form of second-class citizenship that we will not accept in Newfoundland and Labrador.

Earlier tonight the minister of fisheries asked that we on this side of the House be generous in our response. I will tell him that in the area bordered by 2J-3K-L in my constituency people, some living two families to one house so they can save a few dollars, do not have any room for generosity.

In the small communities of northern Newfoundland and Labrador, and on the south coast where my colleague's constituents have seen their plants close, nobody can afford generosity for the member of St. John's West. It was that member who, for his time as minister of fisheries and before his time as minister of fisheries, stood in this House repeatedly and ridiculed the efforts of members on this side to point out that foreign overfishing was destroying the cod stocks off Newfoundland. Every time the member for Gander—Grand Falls stood in his place, or the member for Labrador, in all the years between 1984 and 1985 and said: "my God, open your eyes", the member ridiculed the representations of those members of Parliament. Since 1988 the member for Burin—St. George's, the fisheries critic, the member for Bona Vista—Trinity—Conception, have stood in their places and spoken up for Newfoundland and Labrador and the member for St. John's West has ridiculed their efforts.

I do not feel generous tonight. I do not feel generous. The people of Newfoundland and Labrador who suffered one blow after another in these last two weeks do not feel generous. They cannot afford to feel generous because they are preoccupied with putting bread and butter on the table and keeping a roof over their heads.

I concur with my colleagues. The government must finally prove that it has more than good intentions when it comes to the proper management of fish stocks, that it has more than a warm wish and warm feelings when it comes to the people of Newfoundland and Labrador. This government must stand up and take the action required, the one described by my colleague from Bona Vista—Trinity—Conception, an action that is born out of a will to unilaterally extend Canada's jurisdiction over the nose and tail of the Grand Banks. That is what this government must do. I will tell you what else it must do. It must acknowledge that the destruction which has been wrought upon this stock will not be quickly repaired. It must acknowledge that the management measures which will be put in place to restore this cod stock, because that is the minister's responsibility, are going to take three, four or five years.

It must acknowledge that people are going to be displaced from their livelihood for that entire period of time. As a result of the fact that those people are innocent, they were not the managers of this stock, the government must commit itself to seeing that they survive this time of tragedy brought about by the incompetence, mismanagement and cowardice of the government opposite.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles-Eugène Marin (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to comment on a matter that is extremely important, since the problem facing the Atlantic provinces today is a problem that Quebec and the gulf must cope with as well.

I will share my speaking time with the hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine.

According to scientific data released this week by the Atlantic Fisheries Scientific Advisory Committee, northern cod stocks have dwindled considerably. The total biomass, estimated at 1.2 million tonnes in 1990, is reported to have dropped to 780,000 tonnes in 1991, while during the same period the spawning population fell from 270,000 tons to 130,000 tonnes.

Northern cod represents the most abundant groundfish stock on the east coast. It provides a living for 31,000 Canadians working in the fisheries and processing sectors. Cod catches have been dwindling rapidly since 1988, and in 1991 inshore and offshore fishermen caught scarcely two-thirds of their quotas.

CAFSAC has recommended that the total allowable catch be substantially reduced. It will be cut by 25,000 tonnes for the first six months of 1992, which means half the volume taken during the same period in 1991.

The effects of a dwindling resource are already being felt. A lack of northern cod during the winter closed down one Fishery Products International plant in Newfoundland, resulting in 1,000 lay-offs and forcing 11 vessels to remain in port.

On Monday the minister of fisheries met with representatives of unions and industry and with his Atlantic counterparts.

Tomorrow and on Friday we will have bilateral talks with representatives of fishermen's groups and the provinces in St. John's.

Immediately after these meetings, decisions will be made and probably next week, measures will be announced by the government. The government's plan of action will be guided by specific objectives: first, to strengthen the scientific base and reinforce measures to deal with violations, in order to provide for better management and protection of this capital resource; second, to help the communities, fishermen, and plant workers affected by these events; and third, to continue the all-out campaign to stop foreign overfishing.

A number of unique programs have been set up to restore fish stocks, make scientific surveys, and intensify surveillance and enforcement.

The government has already launched a series of major programs to facilitate Atlantic Canada's adjustment to changing circumstances.

The government's latest initiatives include the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program which includes a plant workers adjustment program and a scientific program on northern cod, the Quebec fisheries federal development program, the Atlantic fisheries assistance program, and the compensation program linked to ice conditions.

AFAP, a five-year program with a budget of $584 million, was launched in May 1990. It includes a series of initiatives and concrete measures designed to ensure the lasting viability of the fisheries and help Atlantic Canada adjust to the drop in fish stocks and cuts in groundfish quotas.

Since the AFAP was implemented, operational activities have been started in many areas. Mr. Speaker, the Standing Committee on Forestry and Fisheries, which I chair, will start reviewing the program's activities a few days from now. Yesterday, we had an initial meeting with opposition critics.

The Quebec fisheries federal development program was announced in the summer of 1990. The overall objective of this program is to provide for the lasting viability of the fisheries industry under the jurisdiction of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans in this province. The program has four components which focus on marketing, processing, operations, research, and infrastructure.

There have been several major achievements since these programs were implemented. For instance, new data were produced for evaluating stocks of northern cod, Scotian shelf groundfish, gulf crab and cod from the northern part of the gulf.

Considerably enhanced surveillance and enforcement has increased compliance with all fisheries regulations by Canadian and foreign fishermen. Compensation was paid directly to fishermen and plant workers affected by poor catches, ice conditions, and plant closings. Financial assistance was given to companies and individuals to enable them to diversify operations in the fisheries and other sectors.

Under AFAP, the federal government entered into agreements with the Governments of Newfoundland and New Brunswick, and it is continuing negotiations with the Government of Nova Scotia.

In 1991, as part of its measures to compensate fishermen affected by poor catches and ice conditions, the federal government injected $57 million into the economy of Atlantic Canada, part of which was taken from the AFAP budget. These two initiatives have helped cushion the impact of the worst ice and marine conditions ever registered throughout the region, and the impact of generally poor catches said to be due to abnormally low temperatures.

Under the compensation program for ice conditions, between May and October 1991, $18 million was paid to fishermen who were unable to leave port because of ice conditions. Mr. Speaker, since 1986, EC fishermen have exceeded by more than 400,000 tonnes the quota set by NAFO for cod stocks on either side of the Canadian 200-mile limit in the Northwest Atlantic.

In this respect, we have been very active before all international tribunals to support our case against foreign overfishing. The problem is not as easy as all that, unfortunately. Overfishing is significant, but what about the seals who feed on both capelin and cod? However, fishermen can rest assured we will do all we possibly can to deal with this situation.

Mr. Darryl L. Gray (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I hear a lot of noise from the other side of the House. I hope that it is because of the position our government is taking for Newfoundland fishermen.

[English]

Let us look at the situation we have. I concur with my colleagues from Newfoundland when they say: "It is a problem for Newfoundland". It is. It is also a problem for Canada and myself as a Quebecer.

[Translation]

As a Quebecer, as a Canadian, as the member for Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine, I am with the Newfoundland fishermen today in everything that has to do with fishing in our area, the Gaspé peninsula, and everything to do with Newfoundland because they are our fishermen.

[English]

For the people who are listening tonight, as has been mentioned before this is not a political debate of the decision the minister of fisheries must make. We have to live with reality. I would hope the decision the minister of fisheries will be for the fishermen of Newfoundland and Newfoundlanders especially but also for the east coast fisheries. The time has come many times over. If I understood the initial speaker on the opposition side, the first minister of fisheries was John Cabot. He did not have the social programs and the network that are in place now. We can blame former governments or we can blame the present government, but that does not do any good. The fishermen and the workers in the fish plants have to be treated not from the past but from today and tomorrow. We will do that. I have confidence.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, you realize that there are two very difficult jobs in this great land, of course with all respect to the Prime Minister. There are two difficult jobs: that of the Minister of Finance who brings a budget down once a year and spends 11.5 months or whatever defending it, and that of the minister of fisheries who has the most difficult job in this land.

Again I say as a Quebecer and as a Canadian that we have problems in Quebec and in Newfoundland, but we must work together. The west coast has different problems. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has the most difficult portfolio that anyone would ever want to have. I am honoured to be on the government side and to be able to work with a gentleman and a competent person in the name of John Crosbie.

Let us look at the problem we have in this debate, as I mentioned, and what has happened in the past. A decision is going to be made: Do we agree with our scientists?

I said before that we are only 295 elected members in the House of Commons; however, we have 300,000 public servants who represent us, who administer our programs throughout Canada, in all the provinces and territories. But what is important for us, and I believe that the minister of fisheries pointed it out, concerning research and information—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Just a reminder. The Standing Orders do not allow mentioning members by name. Since it is the second time, I would remind the hon. member to refer to members by their riding or their department.

Mr. Gray (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. So for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, with the research that has been done, with the people, the officials who work for us, of course, to save the fisheries in Newfoundland and the Magdalen Islands, these facts which have been presented to us must be respected. Where are we going?

The third problem is: What do we do after to keep these programs? How can the federal government get involved?

[English]

I was impressed this morning listening to the minister of fisheries from Newfoundland. He said: "Yes, we will bite the bullet for two or three years but it is a renewable stock". That is the type of co-ordination we must have in the east coast fisheries.

I will have the honour to be on the Magdalen Islands for three days this weekend to touch on all of the demands of the fisheries: lobster, crab, mackerel, codfish, and whatnot. We have to go back and listen to the scientific information to say what can be done and what we can do. The politicians in the past have created a monster. We have built bigger boats subsidized by both federal and provincial governments and we go back 40 years. We have built the boats, we have subsidized the fishing nets, and we have said: "Go and get it". Now we can catch in a week what used to take 10 weeks. That is the domestic side.

On the foreign side—and I understand the foreign problem with the Portuguese and the Spanish—there are measures to be taken. At the same time as we have increased our boats and our fishing gear they have also done that. When we talk about historic rights for foreign fisherpeople, they have done the same thing, but the foreign fisherpeople are not operating as they did historically because they are working with fishery factory trawlers. We must address that, and I know that our Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is looking at it.

After we do those two things, the one dealing with history and the other dealing with the present situation and the foreign fishing, what we have to do is address ourselves to the people of Newfoundland particularly and to the spin-off for the rest of the east coast, the Gaspe. the Magdalen Islands, and the coasts of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island.

Where do we go? The politicians have to get out of the game of playing politics with the fishermen. We should let them know what we can do and where we should be. Then, after all is said and done, let the fishermen decide themselves. They have to. Fishermen like our farmers, like our primary producers, must be together. They must know and they must have the assurance that we in Ottawa, in this great Chamber of perhaps controversy, will back up our people and our fishermen. I am convinced and I know that on behalf of my people from the Gaspe.

[Translation]

As Dr. Marin just said, what is happening to us, the people of Gaspé and the Magdalen Islands, is just the same as what is happening in Newfoundland. We will all work together to find a solution. But the most important people concerned in that, are the fishermen of eastern Canada.

[English]

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the member for Burin—St. George's for calling this debate and I want to thank the Speaker for having it, because this is probably the most serious crisis we have faced.

I have been in the Chamber for 20 years and I cannot recall a time when we have faced a more serious threat in our province. It is, as my colleague from Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte on the west coast of Newfoundland and in part of my former riding has said already, not a regional issue; it is a national issue. My colleague from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception and others have documented the reasons for the decline in the cod stocks. They are clearly evident. As the catch for Canadian fishermen has gone down, the catch for foreign fishermen has gone up. Something like 47,000 tonnes is taken by the European Community, which is almost half the total catch taken by Canadian fishermen out of the total allowable catch. The evidence is clear.

There are some who say that possibly there has been some Canadian overfishing as well and possibly the Canadian offshore fleet is not completely innocent in this matter at all. Perhaps there has been some overfishing on the part of the Canadian offshore fleet, but whatever the cause is the European Community has to bear the main brunt of it. Clearly it cannot be laid at the door of the fishermen of Labrador because on the Labrador coast there is an inshore fishery. We are talking about boats of 20 feet and 30 feet and 40 feet. You can count on one hand the number of boats over 40 feet on the Labrador coast, in Makkovik in the north, in Inuit communities and farther south in Square Island, Triangle and in places like Battle Harbour, a name that is synonymous with the fishing history of our province, in Fox Harbour and farther down in the straits, in Red Bay, Lance au Clair and Lance au Loup, all of these are small communities with small plants and small boats and fishermen who make a small income.

They make almost no income at all at the present time as a result of the fishing offshore and primarily the overfishing by the European communities. That is all they know and that is all they want. They are there because the fish are there. That is what they know and that is what they want to do.

It is not their fault that we are in this situation at this present time, and yet they suffer. In Black Tickle last year, on the Labrador coast, there was hardly a single pound of fish landed. The year before, 2 million pounds of fish were landed in Black Tickle on the Labrador coast. They came there from all over. There were probably 1,500 boats, not just from the island of Newfoundland, but from Nova Scotia and Quebec in that community.

There were two million pounds of fish landed two years ago, and last year, there was hardly a single pound. That sounds incredible. That sounds hard to believe, but it is the fact. It is a fact of life. What do those people survive on now that the fish are gone?

What they are surviving on is what we heard latterly from the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans tonight. He recited all the grants and all the programs that were available to these people. What it amounts to is a handout. What it amounts to is keeping people, and that is not good enough. That is not why they came there. That is not what they know. That is not what they want and that is not what they need.

What they need is not handouts from the minister, but action. What alternatives do we have? Very few, Mr. Speaker. We have the alternative of crab, which we are exploiting at the present time. We have the alternative of shrimp which, thanks to the Liberal government when it was in office, allocated to Labrador fishermen offshore shrimp quotas which are keeping them at the present time and created two small fishermen co-ops on that coast.

Those are alternatives. Apart from those, there are very few alternatives except for an industry that we used to have which was sealing. The Inuit culture to a large degree has been built on the seal. They use it for food and clothing. They have historically. What we suffered from in the sealing industry was overzealous environmentalists such as Greenpeace which told us that it was cruel and inhumane to kill seals. That population is gone. That industry, that door is closed to us.

The seal population has multiplied to the point where it, too, is killing the very cod on which we survive. Each seal eats a tonne and a half of fish. That is depleting the resource almost as much as the European Community.

That door has been closed to us. What has to be done? There has to be a cull of the seal herd. Seal can be used for food, and surely there are people in the world who need food. The seal population has to be culled. That is the first thing.

Second, there must be a limitation. The minister is going to take action next week. He has said here tonight, and we have to hold him to it, that he will protect first those people who depend most on fishing, that is the inshore fishermen. I ask him to keep his word on that and to make sure that when he delivers the new quotas he bears in mind, first of all, those people who depend on the inshore fishery.

Third, he has to do what the member for Bona Vista—Trinity—Conception, my colleague from Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte, and my other colleague from Burin—St. George's have suggested, that is to extend unilaterally the jurisdiction of Canada to the nose and tail of the Grand Banks.

I can recall when the 200-mile limit was brought in. It was a Newfoundlander who negotiated that 200-mile limit. Don Jamieson was the Minister of External Affairs at the time that the Government of Canada brought in the 200-mile limit. Alan Beasley was our ambassador overseas. Between them, they negotiated on behalf of Canada and pushed on behalf of Canada, and fought to get a 200-mile limit. As my colleague from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception has said, before that it was a 12-mile limit. It can be done and it must be done. There is no alternative.

I have just come back from Europe and I can tell you first-hand that we are not making a dent at all. We are not getting anywhere in Europe. Quiet diplomacy has not worked. Discussion has not worked. The only thing that is going to work is unilateral action and a forceful unilateral action.

I am not one normally to suggest dramatic courses of action, but I am at the point where I would like to ask my colleagues to join me, to get on a boat ourselves to go out within the 200-mile limit to take action on our own to stop what is going on. Some dramatic gesture has to be made. The Government of Canada has it in its power, if it has the political will, to extend that jurisdiction and that must be done.

Fourth, once the jurisdiction is extended then the enforcement has got to take place. We have frigates and coastal defence vessels. They can be used to exert the will of the Government of Canada inside that 200-mile limit. These are the things that must be done.

I want to remind the government finally, as I said in the beginning, that the people on the coast that I represent are wholly dependent on fish. There is no alternative. That is why they are there and that is what they want to do.

In the minister's pondering of this in the next few days, I ask him to remember that this coast depends on fish and I ask him, when he makes his decisions, to act in their best interests.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I, too, wish to participate in this emergency debate. In doing so, I want to thank my colleague from Burin—St. George's who made the application under the provisions of Standing Order 52 for this debate, which I believe to be fundamental not only to the regional economy in Atlantic Canada, but indeed the entire Canadian economy.

It has been said by many in this Chamber that fisheries and particularly Atlantic fisheries is a regional issue. It ought to be stated here again that this particular issue goes well beyond the geographical boundaries of the four Atlantic provinces. This is a national problem with very significant repercussions for the entire Canadian economy. It requires the Government of Canada, which has sole authority under the Constitution for management of the fisheries, to take bold initiatives in order to resolve the very serious situation that we find ourselves in today.

I say national because I talk about jobs. I make reference to the social welfare of our citizens and, yes, I refer to the Canadian environment. Whether one lives in Newfoundland, British Columbia, or somewhere in between, all of us as parliamentarians, indeed as Canadians, must accept, must understand and must go to bat for an industry and a way of life that is in serious jeopardy.

I agree with the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans from St. John's West, at the outset of my remarks, where he made reference to the somewhat ill-conceived mainland editorials which have appeared recently in our newspapers across this country. What arrogance. I make specific reference to the Toronto Globe and Mail which likes to refer to itself as a national newspaper. What hypocrisy at its best to say: "I will not read the entire paragraph because I only have a few minutes in which to speak". I say to them, Mr. Speaker, through you and to other members of this Chamber, that those of us in this Chamber, regardless of our political stripe, ought to say to those newspapers across the country which put down the poorer regions of this country and try to make out that we want to live on the public trough for the rest of our lives is just not acceptable. The issue must be put, however, in the few moments I have left. What, where and who is running the fisheries in Canada. Is it the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans? Is it the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs? Before I give that answer I want to put on the record what I believe to be some very obvious facts so that the reasonable Canadian will clearly understand.

In 1991, factory freezer trawlers inside the 200-mile limit were given 100 licences. The Department of Fisheries and Oceans in Halifax issued these licences to Cuba, France, Japan, Norway, Poland, the U.S.S.R. and Bulgaria.

Mr. Speaker, you are an intelligent individual. These factory freezer trawlers are not like the 18-foot rowboats that can be seen on the beaches in some of the more prosperous areas of Ontario. These vessels, I suggest, are anywhere between 300 and 450 feet whereas in Canada, a factory freezer trawler is roughly 175 feet.

We are not dealing with any pleasure boats. We are dealing with substantial floating fish plants. That is what they are. In St. John's, Newfoundland, in 1991 they issued 23 foreign licences, 9 factory freezer trawlers and 14 Faro Islanders, ships which are not factory freezer trawlers. They caught such fish as redfish, capelin, squid, Greenland halibut, silver hake, and numerous by-catches. So, I ask the question: Who is running the Department of Fisheries and Oceans? It is my humble suggestion that it is not the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. He is the tail that is wagging the dog. The people who are administering Fisheries and Oceans are in the Department of External Affairs.

An hon. member shakes his head. Well, let him get up and participate in the debate. Let him show beyond a reasonable doubt that the Department of External Affairs is not running the Department of Fisheries and Oceans when you have that kind of fact.

My other colleague from the province of Newfoundland will participate later this night. He will provide additional evidence that any reasonable man or woman in this country will conclude that fisheries management is being run by the Department of External Affairs.

An hon. member: What about Environment?

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member opposite interrupts me while I speak. I did not interrupt him when he spoke. I want to say if that is not the case, why has the Secretary of State for External Affairs been such a silent individual, as was her predecessor, the Minister for Constitutional Affairs?

I say to this government through you, Mr. Speaker, that it is this cabinet, this Prime Minister, which have acted negligently on behalf of fishermen and the fishing industry in Canada. That is the crime. We have no Department of Fisheries and Oceans. We have a few scientists. We have some able individuals who are sincere in their work. But the fact of the matter is that the decisions are being made by the Department of External Affairs and the Prime Minister of this country.

The Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister for Industry, Trade and Commerce have not taken their responsibilities seriously.

They have not exercised their fiduciary obligations on behalf of fishermen across this country. They would rather be on the front pages of the newspapers, in The Globe and Mail, cutting the ribbons in the foreign nations of this country as opposed to standing up for the fishermen across this country. That is the problem.

And I say in conclusion that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, for whom I have some time and a good deal of respect, and I concur with my colleague from Burin—St. George's that the minister is a victim of a cabinet which does not care, does not understand, and has lost the political will to govern for a sovereign nation such as Canada.

They will be called accountable, not only for their acts but, more important, for their gross omissions in ministering one of the most important common resources to all Canadians wherever they may reside in this great country.

Shame on the Prime Minister, shame on the Minister of External Affairs, shame on the Minister for International Trade, and shame on the Minister of the Environment, as well as the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

S. O. 52

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to take part in the emergency debate this evening.

I do agree with the members across the aisle that it is very timely and very necessary not only to listen to both sides of the issue, but also obviously to point out what the government is doing in regard to a very great problem indeed.

The rhetoric in a debate that is as emotional as this tends to heat up during the course of the evening. I think we have seen some evidence of that this evening on both sides of the aisle.

But it goes beyond attempting to lay blame somewhere. We have done that historically in this House over the years, regardless of who the government of the day happened to be. I say that based on something that happened in this country just in the last couple of weeks that brought it to mind, in the sense of laying blame, who is to blame, how do we solve this thing, how do we get through it?

It has to do with our latest astronaut, Roberta Bondar, when she was actually interviewed on CBC television a few nights ago by I believe it was Barbara Frum.

I was really taken with that interview because she was asked what it was like to be in space and what it was like to look down on this planet of ours. I was really taken with almost the poetic sense with which she answered that question. She said: "You know, it is a feeling that you really can't explain, that you really can't articulate".

But she did a very good job in attempting to articulate it. She said she was really struck by the solidarity of this planet in relation to the rest of the universe when she was up there looking down. She was taken by the immensity, the size of Canada as a nation. I think we are now questioning whether Canada is number one or number two in sheer geographic size in this universe of ours at the present time.

What I am attempting to draw or paint is the sense that when we are talking about the fisheries we are talking about a finite resource. It is not an unlimited resource. It is certainly a renewable resource, but it is a resource that we really do not have a lot of control over.

If you asked a team of scientists today what is going on with the cod stocks you would have as many opinions as you would have individuals. There is no real easy answer to what is happening to the stocks.

This evening I give credit to members on both sides of the House for stepping us through some of the possible causes or reasons for a decline in the stocks. There is some commonality of thought in some of the expressions articulated here this evening.

There is no question the seal problem is a real problem. When you have a seal herd in excess of 3 million, each one eating approximately one and one-half tonnes of fish per year, it is obviously a problem.

That problem stems from the ban that was imposed on the seal hunt many years ago for maybe the right reasons, maybe the wrong reasons. There is no question that fishermen bear the brunt of a decision made many years ago. Basically the seal herd has grown unchecked in recent years and there is no question that it is having an effect on stocks.

We can look at the technology that fishermen today have at their disposal to locate and catch fish. We do not have to be skilled in the fisheries area to recognize that they do have the ability to catch more fish than they did just a few short years ago.

Take a look at the capelin, the feed of the cod. What has happened to that resource? Again, no one can tell us.

An hon. member: We gave it to the Russians.

Mr. Thompson: My hon. friend from Moncton is telling us that we gave the capelin to the Russians. He knows that is totally false.

That is the difficulty with this debate this evening. When you attempt to apply reason on this side of the House, you are always interrupted by a suggestion which is totally false, totally inaccurate.

Let us talk for a minute about giving fish away. I want to quote the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and what he had to say yesterday about what happened in this sort of give-away of fish in Canada.

Let us talk about what happened back in 1972. I am quoting the minister in his response to that question: "I wonder why Canada in 1972 committed such insanity by signing a treaty with the French under which they took 300,000 tonnes of cod in the gulf".

It was not our government that did that; it was his government at the time. That is only the start, the minister tells us. They are taking 4,000 tonnes more this year because of that treaty which has no termination date. So they are the authors of some of our misfortunes. They cannot crawl out from underneath that legacy because that is a reality that stares them in the face. It is the treaty that they entered into.

The minister went on to point out that the people who are criticizing us today are the very people who gave away 75,000 more tonnes of fish in 2G and 2GH.

When we want to get into name calling and laying blame nothing happens at the end of the day. It is just rhetoric on both sides of the issue. The reality is that we are into a real problem. It is not going to be solved by pointing fingers and laying blame.

The government of the day has been very generous in support of the fisheries recognizing the problems that we do have out there. Looking at the raw numbers, the federal government is putting about $3.15 into the fishing community for every dollar that it has generated by the fishery itself. It is an equation that is totally lopsided. It tells me that we are actually putting more into the fishery than we are getting out of it as a resource. Again, we can argue why that resource is not there. Maybe mankind itself has something to do with it.

I opened my remarks by suggesting it is a resource that not even the most talented, the most skilled of all the scientists can accurately predict. We have gone through these highs and lows. We have historically done that in this country.

• (2230)

Again, let us go back to the generosity of spirit. I know some of the members over there are saying, and I agree with them totally, that it is very difficult if you are living in one of those little fishing communities in Newfoundland to have any sense of generosity of spirit, generosity of heart, when you are looking at a resource that is almost disappearing before your very eyes.

That has to be acknowledged and it is being acknowledged by this government. Again, I agree with them. It goes beyond just the sheer geography of Atlantic Canada. It is a Canadian problem. We have to start addressing it from that point of view.

I do not think there is anyone in this House who would deny that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has done everything within his power, within his capacity in the last number of years to make it a little easier for those fishermen who are being affected by that downturn in the resource.

I can step through some of the numbers. I suppose the most obvious one is the $584 million that the minister secured almost single-handedly for the downturn in the fisheries for Newfoundland.

This debate is going to grind on for a few more hours. I want to let the people of Newfoundland know that we have a feeling for them. We do not all live in Newfoundland but we understand the problem. We do want to be generous as Canadians.

I totally agree with the members that have spoken before that it goes beyond just being a problem for Newfoundland. It is a problem for all of us as Canadians, particularly at this point in the history of our country. We have to show a little more generosity than we have in the past.

We have it within our capacity to do that as a nation. I am very proud to be part of a government that does have that generosity.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the speeches of opposition members tonight, and especially those members who represent ridings in the Atlantic provinces.

I will admit that tonight there is some concern in the fishing villages in the riding of Manicouagan.

[English]

Anxiety and uncertainty in the homes of fishermen on the lower north shore is a fact. There are several reasons. The first reason is that they heard at the beginning of the week that there was a report tabled to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans by a committee of scientific experts, a committee of scientific advisers that has told the minister that the northern cod stocks are declining at a very rapid rate.

The minister received that advice earlier this week. As the responsible minister he has called to Ottawa a meeting of all the people involved in the fishery in the Atlantic provinces. He has reported to them the findings of that committee.

The findings of that committee are of course not very bright for the future. They indicate to us what we have been fearing for quite a few years that the cod stocks are declining at a rapid rate and that if we do not address that issue rapidly we will face much more hardship in the very near future.

These fishermen and the members of their families in my riding are asking themselves tonight what will happen for the 1992 fishing season.

They wonder whether their wives, sons and daughters, and other members of their families will find work in the processing plants in their communities next summer. They have a perfectly legitimate reason to be concerned.

They are also worried this evening because since eight o'clock opposition members have been painting a picture of gloom and doom. And in addition to discussing the subject at hand, those opposition members are shouting and insulting government members because of information released earlier this week by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Instead of scaring fishing communities in Atlantic Canada, perhaps they should have waited to hear about the measures the minister will be announcing very shortly to provide some relief. As I was saying, the minister is about to announce a number of measures that will try to ease the situation next summer.

[English]

The purpose of the Liberal Party speakers tonight is to plant fears and anxiety in the heart of the fishermen and their families. One day they will have to answer for that. I say to the people of the lower north shore, I say to the people living in every community in my riding: look at the situation with cool heads. COSA, the Committee of Scientific Advisers, earlier this week informed the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans of findings that are based on a series studies accumulated over a number of years. The minister will address that issue. The minister is strong, and based on his track record he will implement measures that will take care of the situation and alleviate the hardship caused in the fishing communities because of that situation.

As for the minister's track record, I would like to remind the House and the people in the fishing communities that he was the one to introduce programs and measures that directly provide support, provide work, and provide funding in the fishing communities of Atlantic Canada, to help those communities take charge of some of the local operations, to help those communities get involved in developing their industrial bases, both in fishery activities and other types of activities as well.

I would like to comment briefly on the Quebec fisheries development program, designed under the direction of the present Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and announced by him a little over a year and a half ago. The four components of this program provide fishing communities, organizations, and committees with the means to organize their own activities, diversify their economy, and become more actively involved in the fisheries as such.

The Quebec fisheries development program has a dynamic marketing component that will provide the processing industry with the means to reach new markets and sell fish species we have not been able to sell up to now.

[English]

There is a component in the Quebec fishery development program that addresses resource management. Programs have been put in place the last year and a half to ensure that us down the line we manage our stock better, that together with the fishermen, the communities, and the department we will provide better, sound management for our resource. There is also a component that addresses research by the scientists with the aim of providing us with data on fish stocks and information that we did not have before. For quite a few months I have seen concrete results from this program in the communities in my riding, I have seen an active role played by the fishermen. We will continue this.

• (2240)

Yesterday I had a meeting in my office with the general manager of the Lower North Shore Fishermen's Association. We discussed the issue. I will be visiting the communities at the beginning of March and will be in a position to talk further with them and assess with them what can be done to alleviate the situation. Those are positive steps that we will take, as a government, to provide support and incentive to the fishermen to help them pull through this very difficult situation.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, Newfoundlanders have sustainably fished for hundreds of years off the coast of Newfoundland. They have fished and others have also fished off the Grand Banks, and so on. They have made a living, provided for their families, and built their communities.

The fish stocks survived those hundreds of years of fishing. They replenished themselves. They were a renewable resource, a constantly renewing resource, indeed one of the world's great protein sources.

Today those fish stocks are dangerously low and the livelihoods of Newfoundlanders and those in Labrador are threatened. There is a tragedy of enormous proportions in the decline of the fishing stocks off Newfoundland.

I think Canadians ask us to suggest solutions to problems and not to lay blame. They ask us to ensure that government action, on behalf of Newfoundlanders and on behalf of Canadians, is taken in the face of this tragedy.

However, we do have to remember some recent history on how we got into the situation the Newfoundland fishery is in, how that fishery got into the trouble it is in today. We need to understand why because it teaches us how to deal with the solutions in the future. It teaches us how not to respond to the problem we are facing.

The establishment of essentially two large fish corporations, Fishery Products International and National Sea, under a Liberal government meant treating the fish stocks as a resource to be plundered for profit, handsome profits in some years, a resource to be dealt with from the point of view of a corporate balance sheet and short-term profit considerations with no thought for the future. Indeed, it was short-sighted in the extreme as we see today with so many of Canada's resource industries.

Governments, both Liberal and Conservative, both federal and provincial, shared this view so that scientific advice to reduce the total allowable catch was ignored. It was assumed that there would always be plenty of fish, the big corporations' profits and projections were believed in the face of scientific evidence, foreign fishing went essentially uncontrolled for fear of upsetting our European trading partners, and big corporate freezer trawlers were encouraged to plunder that resource.

That approach, that rather typical Canadian big business resource industry approach, has taken us to the disaster we face today.

We in the New Democratic Party and those in the Official Opposition predicted many times over the last three or four years that this was a tragedy of enormous proportions and warned of the situation we are in. Scientist after scientist, study after study, warned against the tragedy that we are now facing. In a sense this is reliving an emergency because it is at least the third or fourth time we have discussed, in terms of an emergency, the disaster facing the fishery off Newfoundland.

The size and extent of the problem is enormous. However the problem is not beyond our ability and scope to deal with.

There are solutions. My colleague from Prince George—Bulkley Valley presented earlier a four-point plan to address in the short term and the long term, the problem of the fishery in Newfoundland. I will mention that in a minute as a way of getting out of this problem.

It is not sufficient to talk about retraining fishermen because what are we retraining fishery people for? There are no jobs in the communities where they live. They have every right, it seems to us, to continue to live in communities in which they have grown up, in communities in which they have a tradition stretching over hundreds of years.

They have a right to continue to be able to exercise their skills in a way in which they choose. With no fish because of the plunder that has taken place, because of the inactivity of the federal government, they need some assistance to survive until these fish stocks are hopefully replenished.

Over and over again, warnings came. In 1988 in the recommendations to the minister leading up to the Canada-Newfoundland Inshore Fisheries Agreement, there were warnings about the impending over-exploitation of the fish stock.

In 1989 scientists indicated that stock strengths were over estimated. In 1990 the well publicized study of Dr. Harris, commissioned by the federal government, confirmed what scientists have been saying. He publicly called for a major reduction in the total allowable catch.

The Department of Fisheries and Oceans predicted just last year enormous worker lay-offs as a result of the decline in fish stocks. We are seeing those predictions coming true, unfortunately, today.

We have seen some initiatives to try to deal with this problem, but those initiatives clearly have not been up to the task because otherwise we would not be where we are today. It is not enough to retrain. It is not enough to assist older plant workers to readjust.

We have to do something to ensure the replenishment of the fishing stocks which means we have to hold back on the exploitation of that resource and we have to do something to enable those who live off the sea to survive until those fish stocks replenish.

This is an ecological tragedy which compares to the devastation of the Brazilian rain forests. It is our own ecological tragedy in Canada.

Before I suggest the approaches we could take to deal with this problem, Canada has to ask herself what sort of fishery she wants. Does she want an offshore corporate fishery as we have had which led us to the situation we are in? Or do we want an inshore community based fishery which Newfoundland experienced over hundreds of years and which enabled the communities there to thrive?

It is clear we have to make a major shift away from the solutions posed by Liberal and Conservative governments to one which is more community based, which actually will create and keep jobs in the community.

We have to move immediately to assume fishery management jurisdiction over the nose and tail of the Grand Bank to effectively terminate foreign overfishing. We must immediately define our priorities for the future. We must define that we want a community based inshore fishery and not a corporate based fishery.

We need a fishery which is premised on sustainable economic development, which will keep that critical protein stock replenished and yet provide livelihoods for those who live off it.

In the process, there will be many jobs lost and many communities in severe economic difficulty. Both federal and provincial governments must be prepared to bring forward programs, perhaps on a level not seen before even in the difficult economic times we face, of ensuring that thousands of families in those communities are not forced to leave Newfoundland and Labrador to go down the road for a future somewhere else.

In other words, we have to maintain those communities in a viable way until the fishing stocks return. It is, as we know, not a solution to encourage those without jobs in the regions of Canada to go to Alberta or to Ontario for jobs because our economy is not providing jobs there either.

We must also ensure that proposals in our current constitutional debates which would see the end of any provincial trade protections and trade barriers be really carefully looked at in the context of the Newfoundland fishery. Newfoundland has regulations which require fish caught by Newfoundland fishers to be processed in Newfoundland. Nova Scotia, on the other hand, permits fish caught by Nova Scotians to be shipped out of the province costing, as Conservative MPs have indicated, at least 1,000 jobs.

We need to reassess what would happen if we broke down provincial trade barriers and we have to ensure that they are sustainable and remain in effect for Newfoundland so that the communities can be protected.

Basically we have to do two things. We have to ensure that fish stocks replenish. We have to stop overfishing by foreign fleets and we have to control the fishing done by Canadians. Second, we have to sustain those who live off the sea until the fish stocks replenish.

I think that the point about responding to the foreign overfishing by taking control over the nose and tail of the Grand Banks is one which is not free of problems, but as the minister of fisheries indicated just last year, the discussions that have taken place with the European Community have not been successful. He indicated that in spite of repeated efforts by the government to make Europeans realize the serious effects of combined overfishing by their member states, they have indeed continued to overfish and indeed, in recent years, have overfished to the extent of 100 per cent of their allowable agreed upon catch.

We have the problem of foreign overfishing, foreign governments, and foreign fishing organizations not paying attention to the seriousness of the depletion of the resource. We cannot, I think, rely upon moral suasion any longer. The government has to act to stop that overfishing, to take control outside the 200–mile zone and ensure that our stocks have an opportunity to replenish.

The New Democrat member of the legislature in Newfoundland, St. John's East, a former member of this House, has called upon the federal government to take control immediately over foreign overfishing off the Grand Banks. The Nova Scotia Federation of Labour has also called upon the government to extend fisheries jurisdiction beyond the 200–mile zone.

The provincial government has called upon unilateral action on the part of the Canadian government, and members of the Official Opposition have responded similarly.

We have all called for the Canadian government to take unilateral fisheries jurisdiction given that foreign fleets have continually overfished the stock. There is no question that this has to be done and has to be done immediately.

In closing, we have in Newfoundland a multi–faceted disaster, an ecological disaster, as we see the depletion of this incredible protein source, an ecological disaster of enormous proportions, an economic disaster of enormous proportions as thousands and thousands of families are thrown on to on unemployment roles, on welfare roles because of the inability to maintain the fish stocks because of their overexploitation and the ineffective management of that stock.

Of course, we see social disaster in enormous proportions as communities are torn apart, as people are forced to leave the province in search of some livelihood and last but not least, we see a cultural disaster as the culture of Newfoundland, the communities of Newfoundland are forced to suffer and some to close.

This multi-faceted disaster is one which the federal government must deal with. As I said, there are two ways in which this must be done. There is no choice any more. It is absolutely critical that steps be taken immediately to preserve and rebuild the fish stocks and we all hope that it is not too late to do this. We must also concentrate on the people who are affected and provide assistance to those who have lost their livelihood. The government must treat this situation as a national emergency. The survival of a fragile provincial economy that is so important to all Canadians is at stake here. It is our responsibility and obligation to preserve it.

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I do not come from a riding in the Atlantic region which is directly affected by the disaster which has befallen the northern cod fishery, but it certainly is a matter that is of great concern to me as are all matters that affect the sustainability of our environment and our resources.

It seems to me that as we discuss a situation such as the disappearance of the northern cod, it reminds us of the continuing tragedy of man's intervention with his environment of the disappearance and endangerment of so many of our species. The cod situation reminds us and it scares us. It always seems to be too late when we get reminded and scared.

It is like the changes in our atmosphere, pollution, acid rain, global warming, and the ozone. Now finally the ozone has our attention and we are starting to talk about serious measures to stay out of the sun and protect our children.

So it is with the northern cod stocks and the situation in Newfoundland. It is a tragic and scarey situation.

My colleagues have spoken in great detail tonight about the measures which have been taken to address the fishery in Newfoundland over the past several years. There have been the constant scientific warnings and constant reductions in the total allowable catch. There has been tremendous investment in the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program to provide not only scientific capabilities to deal with declines in the stocks and find ways of hopefully replenishing them, but endeavouring to find ways to deal with the economic tragedy that affects Newfoundland and Nova Scotia and all the fisheries areas of Atlantic Canada, along with the malaise which we feel from the current recessionary circumstances in so many parts of our economy.

I would have to say that this government on balance has provided extremely sensitive, constructive, and at times courageous management of this resource. I do not think it does us any good at all to debate this subject in the constant harangue of who could have done this, or who should have done this, or who would have done this if they had been in power. It just contributes to the tragic nature of the whole situation.

I would be inclined to recommend to all hon. members that we finally take a situation such as this cod tragedy and constructively try to figure out together what has gone wrong, what the causes have been what the remedies are, and what we can constructively do to remedy and adjust to this significant situation.

It must be really hilarious to those Portuguese, Spaniards and others who are over-fishing just outside our 200-mile economic zone, to look in on this House of Commons today and yesterday and see the theatrics, the opera, and the high drama of television being performed without any significant contribution or consensus developing about what has gone wrong and what we can do about it.

I do not think I can add anything of great detail to the specifics of the cod situation in our Atlantic fishery tonight. I can certainly pledge my support for the Minister of Fisheries and for the constructive approach, indeed the courageous approach, he has to take to this issue because it is so sensitive and so personal to his own political affairs and service. He has to face this every weekend not only as the minister of fisheries for Canada but as the member of Parliament for the city of St. John's and many of the fishing areas around it. I applaud him for the approach he takes. I applaud his department for the comprehensive and scientific approach which they take. I would certainly call on all members of this House to support that approach and to work in addressing this as an environmental disaster, an environmental challenge that we all have to face together. I think if we do, Canadians will start to have some confidence that we in this House of Commons may find a way to deal with it.

On that threshold I would like to address another fish resource in which I have had some particularly unique experience and for which I have a great deal of high regard and respect, almost as a symbol of our natural environment. That is the Atlantic salmon.

The Atlantic salmon which is one of the most magnificent creatures in God's world has been in peril for many decades, for almost all of the decades in my life. Yet we continue to live on the edge with practices that we know are destructive and hope will be successful. But we know inside they probably will not be, and constantly retreat from the sort of management we should be taking.

With respect to Atlantic salmon I think there is an analogy to the cod situation or vice versa. The signals have been there for years that the resource is in trouble. It is under constant attack. It is under constant over-harvest. The runs do not show annually as we expect. We blame it on the weather and on phenomenon that is beyond description when in fact it all boils down to a reality that if we are not at least the cause of it, we are not the solution to it either. We have not been able to manage ourselves sufficiently well to manage the resource.

With respect to Atlantic salmon I would remind the House of the tagging system we have introduced, of the catch and release approaches we have taken, of the elimination of commercial fisheries in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, of the reduction in commercial licences in Newfoundland. Despite all of these measures we continue in a very significant way to debate the merits or demerits of gill net fishing. It is a destructive indiscriminate manner of harvesting fish so that everything that is touched is dead when it is retrieved. The opportunity to release spawning fish, as has become the practice in angling traditions is not possible.

Yet as we advance cases for the termination of gill netting we are still confronted with debate and argument about the fact that the courts may not see it as an adequate conservation measure. We may not be able to sell it as a conservation measure, and we do not dare take the risk of banning gill netting because it will have political and social implications among our citizens of all cultures.

Yet if a resource disappears as the northern cod is on the verge of disappearing, and an entire economy such as Newfoundland's is struck with real tragedy, does it not seem like hollow talk when we wonder if we are over stepping the bounds of conservation by managing a little too tightly or a little too closely?

I would call on the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans who I applaud, admire and support completely. I would call on him to approach the Atlantic salmon resource with the cod resource in mind, to dare to take the conservation measures now that are required to pre-empt a precipitous decline in the stocks, to take the kind of measures that will prevent us getting to this day with Atlantic salmon that we are with cod saying that we have failed. We are in trouble and we do not know how to cope with it. We do not know what caused it and whatever we should have done, it is now almost too late.

I think as we search for a solution to the cod tragedy, it is a solution to which we all must commit ourselves. I ask my colleagues and I ask our minister, with the greatest of respect, to ensure that we do not end up approaching the issue of Atlantic salmon in the same manner and bring about the same sad result we are now experiencing with the northern cod.

Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for this opportunity.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the member for St. John's West, has already addressed the problem of foreign overfishing, its underlying elements, its complexities, and its dimensions.

A clear result is a severe depletion of the biomass and the tragic economic and social implications for the economies of the Atlantic provinces together, and Newfoundland in particular.

Therefore, we can clearly see the human tragedy, the result of plant closures and job losses. The question is: What is Canada doing to resolve this serious problem?

[English]

Before describing the measures that Canada is and will be taking, I want to make four important points on foreign overfishing generally:

First, these fisheries are taking place outside the 200-mile limit in international waters where Canada, to our great frustration, has no jurisdiction and flag states alone have the legal authority to enforce rules on their own vessels. International waters do not belong to any one state, Canada, or any other state, or even to an organization like NAFO, the North Atlantic Fisheries

Organization. They belong to the international community. It is up to individual sovereign national states to control the actions of their citizens and those vessels that are in those waters.

Second, most of the countries that fish in the NAFO area—Japan, Russia, the Faro Islands, Norway, Denmark, Cuba—support fisheries conservation, respect their NAFO quotas, and co-operate with Canada. They do not fish for northern cod. The problem of overfishing is centred on the activities of two countries in particular: Spain and Portugal. They are not the only ones but they are the primary ones.

Third, the small number of countries that do not co-operate with Canada, certain EC member states as well as Korea and Panama, are not eligible for benefits in the Canadian zone. Their fishing vessels are barred from Canadian ports, except in very serious emergencies. They are not allowed to fish for surplus stocks in Canadian zones. They are not eligible to take part in commercial ventures involving any fishing by their vessels in Canadian waters.

Fourth, the number one priority in international fisheries management is improving effective controls. All NAFO members must agree on measures to strengthen surveillance of vessels and to control actual fishing in international waters. They must take all steps necessary to ensure that conservation rules are enforced.

This government is committed, as no other has been, to ending foreign overfishing in the northwest Atlantic outside the 200-mile limit. Since 1989 we have carried out a comprehensive campaign, both at home and abroad. We have undertaken a high-level political initiative led by the Prime Minister to ensure that leaders of the EC, its member states and other nations, including members of the G-7, are aware of the serious consequences of overfishing. The Prime Minister has raised this with his colleagues—heads of government, the head of the European commission—at every available opportunity and frequently to our cost. The tensions that have resulted from our raising the issue of overfishing have created tensions in other areas. We are glad to do that on behalf of the fishermen of eastern Canada.

In bilateral and multilateral discussions we have sought to persuade the European community to return to compliance with NAFO decisions. Sometimes I feel as though I am beating my head against the oak door up there in the gallery. I raise this in every international meeting I have with European ministers, the presidency of the EC, and the Commission of the European Community. Canada's ambassador to the United Nations raised Canada's concerns in the last session of the UN General Assembly. A comprehensive Canadian information campaign has underlined the ecological risks of overfishing and called on the European public to oppose foreign overfishing in the northwest Atlantic. We have to make the Europeans realize that overfishing is to their disadvantage as well as to ours. Believe me, it is one of the most frustrating parts of my job to try to get them to listen, but try we do on every potential occasion.

Work has begun within NAFO—and this is a hopeful sign—to improve its system of surveillance and enforcement and to eliminate fishing by vessels registered in countries that are not members of NAFO. Canada has also spearheaded international efforts to improve the effectiveness of international law as it pertains to high seas fish stocks. A major objective for Canada in this legal part of our initiative, as opposed to the political element which we emphasize every time we can, is international recognition of the special interest of coastal states, others as well as Canada, in conservation and management of fish stocks which are harvested both inside and outside national fishing zones.

A special ambassador for fisheries conservation has been appointed to co-ordinate and carry forward Canada's diplomatic, legal and information initiatives in this important area. He initiated bilateral consultations with the EC Commission early last summer but the community rejected Canada's proposals to help resolve the problem.

Much remains to be done but there are signs of progress, however frustratingly slow. For example, the European Community, which is increasingly Euro-centric and as a result we have to consistently build our efforts there, did accept eight of the 11 NAFO management decisions for 1991 and 1992. In 1991 the EC assigned a fisheries patrol vessel to the regulatory area for seven months and it is likely that the patrol vessel will return to the NAFO area in 1992. We will certainly urge that it does. The EC is co-operating within NAFO to reduce fishing by non-NAFO vessels, including its own reflagged vessels. Of course reflagging is another of the problems which we have to fight on another front. Canada will continue to press the EC to control EC vessels fishing in the regulatory area and prevent reflagging by its vessels.

In the meantime, we are pressing ahead on other fronts and we do so consistently. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has laid out an ambitious plan of objectives and initiatives for 1992. Canada has asked the chairman of the NAFO fisheries commission to convene a special session of NAFO to improve international control in the NAFO area. This is a special meeting and will take place in May. It is very rare that NAFO agrees to have a special meeting of this nature. Canada will be taking its proposals on high seas fisheries conservation to the United Nations Convention on the Environment and Development, the Earth Summit in Rio, to seek international support for our efforts in terms of conservation of what is an important international resource.

We have met with, and hammered on, the government of Panama to ask them to take action to end the use of Panamanian flagged vessels in northwest Atlantic fisheries. The minister himself has travelled to London and Tokyo to speak eloquently on behalf of the fishermen in Canada for effective control of international fisheries. He will visit other capitals over the coming months to build up support for Canada at NAFO and at the Rio summit. These are some of the ways that we are working to end the foreign overfishing outside Canada's 200-mile limit.

The new scientific evidence that has come to light this week as reported by my colleague serves again to confirm the devastation of the northern cod stock by the relentless foreign overfishing and seeming disregard of NAFO's rational conservation decisions in the nose and the tail of the Grand Banks outside the 200-mile zone.

The Prime Minister, my colleague the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, and I have repeatedly and at every opportunity registered with our colleagues in the community that the northwest Atlantic fishery, especially northern cod, is in serious trouble because of continued and excessive overfishing by EC vessels.

This is not an issue just of critical importance to Canada which is our primary concern. It is of importance to the entire fishing industry and fisheries conservation of the world. The EC and the non-members of NAFO have got to recognize this. They have to address it seriously.

If this important resource is to be saved, these countries have to bring their fleets under effective control in compliance with NAFO conservation decisions. We will continue to beat our heads against any door that is available to us to make this point clear.

I should say that those who fish inside our waters, which has been suggested tonight as a kind of sinister failure on the part of the government, are here because of obligations under the Law of the Sea, frustrating though it may be that under the Law of the Sea, people can come into our 200-mile limit and fish for underutilized species.

We are doing everything we can to conserve the fishery that is under our control and to convince others to conserve the fishery and save it when it is under the control of others who are beyond our borders.

We have been doing that daily and weekly. We will continue to do it until we manage to resolve this issue on behalf of the fishery of Canada.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, I move under Standing Order 26:

> That the House continue to sit beyond midnight for the purpose of continuing the consideration of this item of business.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Will those members who object to the motion please rise in their places.

Fewer than 15 members having risen, pursuant to Standing Order 26(2) the motion is adopted.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MacAulay: Mr. Speaker, it is sad that this House is once again debating the many troubles of the Atlantic fishery. Had the government paid the attention that the fishery deserved over the last few years, we would not be here tonight.

We all know that the government has not paid enough attention and the fishery is in crisis again. The other day in Question Period the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans said that this government has done everything possible to help the fishery and that the fault for the problem was an agreement signed by the Liberal government 20 years ago.

I say to the government that 20 years ago there was enough fish off our shores for everybody. Today, after eight years of mismanagement, there is not enough fish to keep the communities alive. The European Community has consistently overfished its NAFO quotas for several years and the government has done nothing.

• (2320)

The minister says that he has talked with his European counterparts about the problem. He has told the Spanish and Portuguese that they must stop the raping of Canadian fish stocks outside the 200-mile limit. The minister says he is doing everything he can and that he is conducting delicate, diplomatic negotiations.

If the government had any concern for the groundfishermen of Atlantic Canada, it would claim its right under International Law of the Sea Convention and extend the 200-mile limit to include the nose and tail of the Grand Banks and the Flemish Cap. This is our right and was recommended by Leslie Harris over two years ago.

Many of my constituents think that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is afraid to offend the Spanish, Portuguese, Koreans, and others. The time has come for this government to take action and enforce Canadian management of all fish stocks, especially straddling stocks. Unfortunately we all know what this government is like enforcing our fishery regulations.

While government allows the harassment of small inshore groundfishermen and forcing dockside monitoring down their throats, it lets Spain and Portugal rob us blind.

The government should cancel all foreign fishing licences in Canadian waters, especially for food fish. What sense is there in allowing foreign vessels into Canadian waters to fish for things like mackerel, capelin and squid? These fish are the basis for the food chain and the foreigners are literally stealing the food from the mouth of the cod. No wonder fishermen are saying that the fish are getting smaller, the cod are starving to death.

It is not only food fish that foreigners are allowed to catch in Canadian waters. The French are allowed to catch 1,600 tonnes of 4T cod each year, the fish that groundfishermen in my riding depend upon for their livelihood.

Fishermen in my riding want to know why they have to take over 10,000 tonnes in quota cuts since 1990 and the first French quota has gone up by 260 tonnes.

The crisis in the Atlantic fishery is not only a crisis of declining stocks, it is a crisis of mismanagement and the government is to blame.

The crisis is not only in cod stocks off Newfoundland and Labrador, it is in every harbour and bay across Atlantic Canada. Ask any fisherman in Prince Edward Island about DFO and he will give you a list of things the government is doing wrong in the fishery: lack of repairs to small craft harbours, lobster size increases, and dockside monitoring to name but a few.

Since I was elected in 1988, wharfs and breakwaters in the Cardigan riding have been falling apart. Wharves like Graham's Pond and Launching required only about $50,000 of maintenance work two or three years ago to keep them in shape.

However, because the federal government did not spend that small amount of money two years ago, the cost of doing major reconstruction has gone up to well over $1 million for the two wharves. If this is not mismanagement I do not know what it is.

There is also the issue of increasing lobster sizes for island fishermen. Last year, DFO increased lobster size for fishermen on the south shore of P.E.I. while keeping the same size on the north side. This move by government has been a disaster for the fishermen in my riding.

In a year where there was a 5,000 metric tonne reduction in cod quotas, the government reduced canner catches in zone 26A by about 1.3 million pounds. These small canner lobsters filled a very special market area and the size increases could effect a loss of over $14 million in that product area alone.

There was no problem with the lobster stocks, there was no need for conservation measures, in fact lobster stocks have been increasing steadily for many years.

Playing with the lobster size has been a major financial blow to the fishermen of Prince Edward Island. It is mismanagement pure and simple. Snow crab fishermen in my riding are concerned about a proposal to allow licences for more fishermen in that fishery.

According to a DFO proposal, Island fishermen are to be shut out from applying for the new licences despite the fact that the licences are for the area off eastern P.E.I. Indeed, Island fishermen were not even told by DFO that more licences were being considered. Fishermen found this out by word of mouth. Fishermen from eastern Prince Edward Island should be given a crack at the new licences. Not giving Islanders a chance is mismanagement as far as I am concerned.

The real crisis in the Atlantic fishery is a mismanagement crisis. Because of mismanagement by this government, the northern cod stocks are dropping like a stone, throwing thousands of people out of work. Because of the government mismanagement, wharfs and breakwaters in my riding are literally falling into the sea.

The fishery has been a way of life in Atlantic Canada for about 500 years and that way of life has been destroyed. The fishing industry in Atlantic Canada is more than simply dollars and cents. With proper management, Atlantic Canada can handle a proper fishing industry with thriving communities scattered around the coast.

Until this government takes concrete action against mismanagement and foreign fishing, the fishermen and plant workers in Atlantic Canada will continue to suffer needlessly.

Concerning the repairs to small craft harbours, I have some information compiled by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. I believe it is a prime example of why the Savage Harbour breakwater on which I tried to persuade government three years ago to spend a small amount of dollars to repair and why Graham Pond wharf needs $1 million today. Launching and Georgetown and many other harbours are in a desperate state.

I just happen to have the figures of DFO spending on small craft harbours for the riding of St. John's West which happens to be represented by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and the dollars allotted to Prince Edward Island which has four ridings.

I will give a couple of examples since time is short. In 1990–91 about $8.5 million was spent in St. John's West and $1.3 million was spent in the four ridings in Prince Edward Island. In 1991–92 $3.5 million was spent in St. John's West, in the hon. minister's riding, and in the four ridings in Prince Edward Island we did not get $1 million.

It is no wonder that the breakwaters and the wharfs in Prince Edward Island are falling into the sea. This is total mismanagement. It is totally unacceptable and hopefully, with these figures becoming public, pressure will be put on government and the minister will see fit to spend the proper dollars on small craft harbours in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to take a few minutes to speak on this emergency debate.

I want to begin by congratulating my colleague, the hon. member for Burin—St. George's, for taking the initiative to bring this emergency debate forward and Your Honour for accepting his motion.

The revised information from the scientists of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans on the state of the northern cod was released this week. It demonstrates that the biomass or the stock of the northern cod in 2J-3K-L off the eastern coast of Newfoundland and Labrador is much lower than was previously estimated. It is indeed an emergency. It is a crisis and warrants the concern of all members of this House.

There is a certain sense of déjà vu in the debate we are having this evening. I remember the last time we had an emergency debate on the fishery. I remember very well because I called for the emergency debate. That debate took place on December 18, 1989, in response to a decision by National Sea to close its fish plant in Canso, Nova Scotia, thereby throwing 750 fish plant workers and trawlermen out of work and effectively shutting down this coastal community in my constituency which has been a fishing community for over 400 years.

At the same time National Sea Products announced the downsizing of its operations in Newfoundland and other parts of Nova Scotia and Fisheries Products International did the same. That was a crisis and an emergency affecting all of Atlantic Canada.

The crisis was precipitated by a fall in Canadian fish quotas and an increase in the difficulty both offshore and inshore fisheries industry had in catching the quota available to the Canadian fishery. As a result, National Sea was making the corporate decision to close these plants, as was Fisheries Products International.

Members will recall that as a result of that debate and the passionate interventions that were made on all sides of this House during that evening and as a result of a very determined fight led by the mayor and town council of Canso for about four months, this government finally relented, intervened and worked out, in conjunction with the Government of Nova Scotia and other consortia in Atlantic Canada, an arrangement that allowed the fish plant in Canso to be purchased and reopened and allowed the fish plant in Burgeo to reopen and essentially save those communities.

We have to say that because of the government's actions in this respect, the people in Canso are grateful, even though it took a tremendous battle on their part. They are grateful that this action was taken and that this company, Sea Freeze, was allowed to preserve the jobs in those communities. That was in May or August of 1990. What has happened since then?

The underlying cause of the crisis is basically the failure of the government to control the over-all effort by Canadians and by foreign fisheries vessels to control the pressure on our cod stocks and the entire groundfish stocks which exist off our coast. The failure of the government to do this means that we are once again confronted with the evidence which precipitates this crisis and this emergency debate only three years later.

The crisis we face this evening, as other members have said, is not a crisis affecting only one part of Canada. It is not a crisis affecting only Newfoundland. It is a national crisis and it is a social crisis. It is a crisis for the thousands of families who live in coastal communities all across the northeastern coast of Newfoundland and Labrador who have absolutely no alternative but to pursue the fishery, the way of life which they and their ancestors have followed for generations.

If there is no fishery, if it continues the way it is, these communities are decimated. Either those families live on welfare or handouts or they have to leave. They have to leave behind that part of the country and that way of life which they have carried on for generations. So it is a social crisis.

It is an economic crisis because 21 per cent of all employed in Newfoundland, 41,800 jobs in 1989, depend on fish harvesting and fish processing. It is a similar number in Nova Scotia. There are 100,000 jobs in Atlantic Canada that are fisheries related. If the fisheries goes, there is no immediate prospect for those communities that depend exclusively in many cases on this industry. This government in seven years and with all the talk and the so-called initiatives about development in Atlantic Canada has not found a satisfactory alternative to those traditional industries which nurture so many parts of Atlantic Canada. The collapse of the northern cod stocks is an economic crisis.

It is an environmental crisis as well because it represents a plundering, mostly by man, of a resource which had heretofore been considered to be inexhaustible. We are discovering that it is not inexhaustible. It behoves us as a society to begin to understand the environmental consequences of the failure to manage a resource, to consider that the pressures on this resource, if they are not checked, will ultimately lead to its extinction, that we take the kind of drastic action nations around the world are beginning to take to control another environmental crisis, namely, the depletion of the ozone or the global warming which we, after ignoring this crisis for so many years, are finally beginning to address. This is a problem not unlike that.

To conclude, because I realize my time is up, I want to point out this is a crisis of sovereignty. It represents a failure of Canada, of this government, to exercise its sovereignty. For the people, not only in Atlantic Canada, but elsewhere in Canada, it is all too familiar. It is all too familiar that this government talks a good line and talks in this House of Commons about all the efforts, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs said just a few minutes ago, it has taken to convince other countries, but still nothing happens. Still we see that in 1989 the economic community overfished its own quota by 44,700 tonnes. It overfished its quota in 1990 by 60,000 tonnes and in 1991, while our own quota dropped from 197,000 tonnes, the amount we were able to catch, to 127,000 tonnes, it over fished its quota by 47,000 tonnes.

It is time, as we have suggested on this side of the House, to unilaterally extend that jurisdiction, to get control of that zone, and to begin managing that resource properly.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I would appreciate if the hon. member would indicate to the Chair how long he intends to speak.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I would think two or three, maybe four hours, but if I am restricted, I guess 20 minutes will be the maximum.

It has been a long time since I have spoken in this House. In fact, it has probably been a long time since I have been in this House, preoccupied, perhaps unjustly for my constituents, but preoccupied as I have been in the matters of national unity and the Constitution. Not even the Constitution could keep me away this evening.

I want to congratulate the hon. member as well for this debate. I think this debate is important. I think this debate provides us with the opportunity to ensure that all members of this House, and indeed anybody in this country who is interested and is watching, understand how important the fishery is to Atlantic Canada, and particularly to those of us from Newfoundland and Labrador.

I was asked the other day by a reporter who wanted to know about the debate. I congratulated the member and said that what it does is it continuously allows us to reinforce across this country that this is indeed a national issue. This is not some regional issue. This is not something that just pertains to us in Atlantic Canada and primarily us in Newfoundland and Labrador who are most directly affected by the impact of reduced cod stocks.

The fishery in our province I think represents about 6 per cent of the economy. That is just economy. Some people say: "That does not sound like a lot". It probably represents 25 per cent of the employment, and that represents a lot. That is direct and indirect.

As well, in every part of the island of Newfoundland and in every part of the mainland part of our province in Labrador, the fishery has a psychological impact and it has an emotional impact. My family has been involved in the fishery for years. My father took the oldest company in Canada, older than Molson's, out of the fish business in 1967–68. My God, history was being rewritten. They had come from Liverpool in 1720, 1730 and operated in the fish business in our province until 1967 or 1968. It has been a part of me.

It is a part of all of us because we are affected when others are affected, not only in terms of the economy. They always say in Newfoundland and Labrador that you can tell how the fishery is doing by how the car sales are going or how things are going in the hardware business. People say: "What is happening with the fishery?"

For far too long we disregarded the views of the fishermen, inshore and offshore. We sort of said that they have an opinion but they do not understand the science or they do not understand the cycles of fish or their evidence is anecdotal. I like that. I have always liked that, "anecdotal". Finally, thank God, we are recognizing that there is wisdom and knowledge there.

This tie I am wearing is in honour of Dr. Bondar. This is the space agency tie and it was presented to me some four or five years ago. It struck me that we can put Canadians and Americans and representatives of the economic union of states, or whatever flag in the Olympics, people from Indian and Pakistan, into space and we wonder why we cannot find fish. People in Newfoundland and Labrador wonder about that.

Fortunately or unfortunately, aeronautical science or space science is much more developed than fish science. We are coming a long way on fish science. I think it is recognized that in 1974, 1975, 1976 and 1977 when we moved into the implementation of our end of the deal on the Law of the Sea, the imposition of the 200-mile economic zone, our knowledge of science was not that good and it put us in a bind. We made assumptions at the time that were probably invalid on which we made a variety of decisions, repeatedly making mistake after mistake in good faith, based on the best knowledge available.

We have had to improve our science. We have had to improve our science in the pure science end of the world. We have had to improve our science and the ability to collect more information and to analyse it better. We have had to improve our science and the way we use it, the type of information we provide and the type of decisions that get made on the basis of that science.

In 1986 there was a significant strengthening in the effort in Newfoundland and Labrador, a 22 per cent increase. Under the current Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program we are spending something like $150 million over five years to improve the amount of data we have, to improve its collection and its analysis.

We are also doing something that is new and different and is perhaps more significant than all the money we are spending, and it probably costs us nothing. We are saying to the people in the industry, in the inshore and the offshore: "You know about fish, in an anecdotal way, but you know about fish. Come and participate in the process of science, come and tell us what you know, come and tell us what we are doing that might be made better. In the process we will show you what we as scientists do and how it may in fact make your lives better and improve your ability to fish".

Science is an important part of what we do but it is only one component, as I think everybody in this House knows.

We have had an evolution in our fishery. We have the capacity today to catch a lot more fish than we have had in the past, both in trawlers offshore and in the inshore fishery, with the evolution of equipment and gear, particularly the development of the Japanese cod trap. The fishermen in Torbay, Flat Rock, Pooch Cove, Bauline, Portugal Cove, Fox Trap, Kelligrews, Holyrood, Conception, Harbour Main, Brigus, Cupids, Bell Island, and Collier's—please, if I have left anybody out in St. John's East forgive me. It is certainly not to forget the people of Lance au Clair, Loggie Bay, Middle Cove, Outer Cove, and certainly the people of the Battery and Quidi Vidi.

What are they saying about all of this? They say: "All we want is the opportunity to fish. What we need is the fish. As for the rest of it, we can deal with governments at a variety of levels, or we can collectively as fishermen manage the fishery as best we can, to use equipment and the resources of government as best we can". They also say: "If we don't have fish, what is it that we do then?"

They have come to government and said: "We're in trouble, we need help". Frankly, my experience is for the most part that the fishermen who do that are really in trouble and really do need help. They do not ask until that time comes.

In the meantime there are a number of things that government can do. As I think all members know and I am sure my colleagues have said earlier tonight, when the need has been there the government has been there. Certainly there have been emergency response programs in the last three or four years to ensure the fishermen qualify for unemployment insurance. That is something they do not particularly want to do but they must if they can only fish six, eight or ten weeks a year, or as some fishermen in the constituency of my friend across the way who expect to fish in the winter and there are no fish in the winter. We have to provide that protection, and we have been there.

Last year, in response to a critical situation caused by an abundance of ice, we provided about $18 million to try to pick up that slack. As well there was a terrible catch failure last year. All the inshore fishermen are aware of that. That is not to mention the offshore fishermen. We caught just over half the inshore fish last year that we had caught the year before. The government was there. People expect government to be there in the bad times. Hopefully government can be there in the good times, not to hand out money needlessly but to support the development and evolution of our fishery. I want to come back to that.

I want to remind members that the last two or three years have not been good. They have been desperate. They have been desperate for fishermen and their families. They have been desperate for communities and they have been desperate for provinces. Government has been able to provide some support. The Fisheries Adjustment Program has provided $584 or $585 million. As I mentioned $150 million of that was to try to rebuild stocks, improve science, improve monitoring, have more flights and surveillance inshore and offshore to deal with foreigners. Adjusting to current realities is what they call a program that is saying to communities: "You are the source of the solution to your problems. We are there to help you with all the resources that we have including money". The Public Service has been tremendously supportive.

• (2350)

I also remind members of the ability of two levels of government to work together, the ability of four or five departments at two levels of government to work together, primarily at the municipal level with regional economic development commissions, in developing Community Futures Programs, developing local responses to problems, trying to find opportunities in the fishery, trying to develop alternatives, trying to diversify the economy where possible. We provided about $150 million for that.

It is not enough just to put money into response to the fishery in crisis. It is critical that we build so that when the stocks return, when the opportunities are there, it is a modern fishery that is integrated into an economy based on technology, efficiency, effectiveness and international trade in a competitive way.

The world of the fishery these days is unbelievably competitive. In the old days it was one species against another, one country's cod against another country's cod. We are long past that. The substitution in the large markets has been terribly threatening, particularly to the east coast cod fishery as pollack from Alaska has replaced it in the big American fast food markets which are now our big customers, which are now the source of good contracts for big offshore companies and for many smaller operations that buy from inshore fishermen.

The Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency played a substantial role in the ability to support the fishery, particularly in terms of fishery's innovation. We have supported the centre for fisheries innovation at the Marine Institute in St. John's which is now becoming part of Memorial. There has been a number of initiatives marrying education with industrial initiatives, bringing people together who have ideas, others who have a technical capacity, others who have a marketing capability, others who have an academic capability that provides some good research and development in market development, product development and health and safety standards.

Today there are 15 co-operative agreements between the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador and the Government of Canada. I guess co-operative agreements are a new way of saying DREE or DRIE or whatever manifestation they have taken over a period of time. It is government sitting down and working out programs to attack problems, to take advantage of opportunities and to deal with challenges. Just going through the 15 of them from my own memory and my own knowledge, some of them I am not particularly familiar with. The inshore fisheries development agreement is obviously direct. NAFTA has provided tremendous support, particularly to small plant operators, to fishermen who need equipment and to those who have innovation and are able to take that innovation and make it grow.

The comprehensive Labrador agreement has done a tremendous amount to improve facilities along the coast of Labrador. The ocean industries agreement is not directly related to fishery, but it builds on the capacity that after 450 years of having a fishery we now have a technical capability that is focused on our marine world. We live along side of the Atlantic Ocean. We have traded across the sea. We have traded with products that come from the sea. We have a capability in our province that involves marine communications and the application of computer and high-technology innovations to a world that is bounded by oceans. One very exciting innovation has been over the horizon radar. We in this country are world leaders in that development and that has come from the fact that our history is based on the fisheries.

As we look at the environmental improvement agreements, the rural development agreement, enterprise agreements, they are focused on what we can do in the fishery. I would be a fool if I stood here and said: "We have done it all. We have taken care of it. Everything is copacetic". It is not. We have a serious problem. The fish that people, communities, companies large and small in Newfoundland and Labrador and Atlantic Canada generally have depended on are apparently not there. Sometimes we wonder: "My God, what more can happen to us?" Sometimes we wonder if it is some bizarre whodunnit and if we just clicked the channels it would all go away. It does not happen. Believe me, I have clicked a lot of channels lately and it is still there. It is right there in the kitchens, the bedrooms and the boats of people all across Atlantic Canada.

What do we do? We obviously cannot make the fish come back. We have to continue to find ways of managing our knowledge of the fishery, making sure that the decisions we take in the management are based on the best knowledge, advice and analysis available. We have to continue to work with the industry to ensure that we get the best productivity, the best use of the resources we have, and the best benefit to the fishermen, the plant workers and those in between so that we can continue to export a high quality, competitive product around the world.

We must continue as governments provincial and federal to be responsive to needs in times of tragedy, in times of crisis, and in times of threat. We must be there with the support that is necessary to keep the industry moving, to keep the communities whole, and to keep families together.

We must continue to ensure that the world knows that we are under a direct environmental threat that in my view is wanton and deliberate and callous, that is totally uncaring of knowledge of the damage and the threat that is being caused to this resource we have worked so hard to manage, and that we have taken decisions that closed whole communities, that put families and people in jeopardy, literally at jeopardy of survival. Yet the Europeans continue to fish not at levels of the past, not to meet their commitments to reduce, but to increase.

I and other members of this House have gone in good faith to our colleagues in legislatures in Europe. Some think of it as a grand boondoggle. It is hard work. We have sat in the Senate in Paris. We have looked at the bullet holes in the ceiling of the Parliament in Madrid. We have talked to representatives of the fishing industry and communities that go through somewhat the same thing we do. We say: "We want you over there. You have been part of our lives for 400 years. But, by God, if you don't do what is responsible for all of us, there will be no fishery there".

The Prime Minister, senior ministers in this government, senior officials of the opposition parties, colleagues, senior people in provincial governments, industry and labour have gone to Europe, have talked to the Spanish and the Portuguese and have talked to the European Community. We have yelled. We have screamed. We have begged. We have cajoled. I would not be surprised if there were probably a few bottles of rum offered, but to no avail.

At the end of the day what offends me more than anything else is that there is a deliberate, wanton, uncaring process of continuing to take fish outside an agreed management system, threatening the viability of our four Atlantic provinces, Quebec, and this country, without regard for the people who are there. Despite the very direct approaches that process cannot continue.

I end with those words. We have a future in the fishery. We have to manage it properly. We in government with the support of the opposition and others will continue to provide that help, but we cannot continue this environmental threat.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to take part in this debate on the state of the fishery in Atlantic Canada. It is certainly not a happy occasion because, as has been said here tonight by many of the great speakers that have gone before me, this is not a regional or provincial issue. This is a national issue. This is one of the oldest industries in Canada. It is a vital segment of our east coast economy.

A number of years ago Atlantic Canadians stood on the threshold of a bright and prosperous future as a result of the potential of the fisheries. The extension of the fishing limit to 200 miles should have, in and of itself, guaranteed that the fisheries would be a major income producer in Atlantic Canada.

Instead over the past few years it has become the source of continual economic bad news.

Again here tonight we stand to debate fishery policies and again we hear the government claim it is not its fault. Well it is time for someone to take some responsibility for the sorry state of affairs. If the members of the government do not realize where the blame should be placed, let me tell you the people of Atlantic Canada know.

There is an expression that we are all familiar with that says: "Don't lock the door after the horse is stolen". It is fine to stand up now and say that the northern cod stock, the main part of the Newfoundland and Labrador fishery, is depleted and our quota must be cut in half. Surely a person with the intelligence and the integrity of the current minister, backed by the expertise of his department, should have been able to foresee this alarming development long ago.

We have allowed this potentially golden goose to be stolen away from the residents of Atlantic Canada because this government does not have the fortitude to deal with the European Community, and other communities continue to plunder this resource.

If the government was as tough on non–Canadians as it has been on the residents of this country, we would not be involved with such things as the disastrous free trade deal.

Earlier this week the minister spoke in the media about foreign overfishing as if it was a newly discovered phenomenon. The presence of foreign trawlers and the lack of effort of policing the fishery off the east coast has been with us for a good number of years. To raise the issue now with such indignation is like trying to convince Canadians that this government is a stalwart supporter of supply management and marketing boards.

Like the marketing boards at the negotiations at GATT, I fear that the fishery has been abandoned by this government. We will now see a bit of window–dressing trying to convince the fishermen and the taxpayers of Canada it is really strongly supporting this fishery.

I fear it may be too late. The horse has been stolen and it is time to replace the watchman at the stable.

We live in a hungry world, a world in which people, such as we who control such a large proportion of the available food supply, should be able to turn to our advantage. It is ludicrous that we should be constantly telling Newfoundlanders and other Atlantic Canadians not to fish. But it is just as ludicrous that thousands of tonnes of fish have been dumped back into the ocean because the government is not able to develop a policy which would firstly protect and secondly conserve this precious national resource.

By allowing others to continually deplete our resources, we are on the verge of creating an economic and an ecological wasteland in Atlantic Canada. Although many people do not realize it, the east coast fishery is one of our very special natural resources.

Why do we allow the fishery, which should be one of the main economic engines driving our economy in the east, to be plundered in this fashion? Why will the government and the minister not stand and defend our east coast fishery and, in doing so, show Canadians how important they believe and we believe this industry is?

There is very little offshore fishing in my province, but the inshore fishermen realize the harm which has been done to their fishery by the management of the offshore resource.

The catches inshore are declining because the fish have been scooped up offshore by vessels from around the world. I can agree with the minister and with officials at the department that there is a limited number of fish.

What I want to see as a maritimer is fish which should be considered a Canadian resource being utilized to the benefit of the residents of this country. Let the minister who had this responsibility develop policies which will see that the number of fish available are used by Canadians. Also let the minister help Canadian firms and companies develop ways to add value to that product.

Let us keep the fish plants operating and let us keep the fishermen of Atlantic Canada fishing. The precious natural resources of our region should not be used as trading chips in the international games any more than the resources of other parts of the country should be.

When John Cabot came to the waters off Newfoundland 500 years ago he reported that codfish could be taken by lowering a basket over the side. No doubt the numbers have declined but I now ask the minister to always remember that those fish in the Atlantic waters are part of our birthright.

Do not mismanage and do not give away one of the things which could bring our economy out of the economic slump we are in at the present time. These are good people, good fishermen, and good workers. Manage our resource to the benefit of Canadians first and to the benefit of the maximum number of fishermen workers.

This is an industry that was built for the small operator. I say to the government and to the minister: Do not turn your back on them during this present crisis.

[Translation]

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, this is the second time in two years that this House sits late at night to hold an emergency debate on the Atlantic fisheries.

[English]

I want to say a few words on the fishery because it is rather interesting to think that less than three years—actually two years and a few months, probably a couple of months, three months—this is the second emergency debate that we have had on the Atlantic fishery.

This has to tell Canadians there is something wrong. We do not need the Globe editorials to tell us that this government is doing something wrong, or that it cannot handle or manage the fishery. On this side of the House, we certainly know that. My colleagues and I have fought for many years on the subject of foreign fishing.

This is the third minister of fisheries we have had since November 21, 1988. That goes to show you, Mr. Speaker, that something is definitely wrong with the calibre of this Prime Minister's cabinet in dealing with the most important natural resource that we have on the east coast. It is a natural resource. It is a renewable resource and it is food.

We are debating tonight foreign fishing in and outside our 200-mile limit. I listened to the minister for external affairs. I totally agree with her. Under the 200-mile limit, Canada is fortunate to have such a large coastline and to have such a bounty. That natural resource, that bounty, is food. It is food to feed the world.

Not once did I hear her say, or did I hear her colleague the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans say, that we were going to fish the underutilized fish and put the biggest effort into fishing what foreigners that come from Japan, Cuba, eastern Europe, Europe, all over come to fish. They fish outside the 200-mile limit but they come inside and fish the underutilized species that supposedly are excess to our needs under the Law of the Sea and the share in the 200-mile limit that we were given in 1977.

I was looking at the notes of the emergency debate and I said at that time, over two years ago that yes, there was a crisis yes, we had overcapacity fishing, overcapacity in plants, but we also had over 100 freezer factory ships fishing within our waters, fish that our fishermen could catch.

I have not seen one realistic incentive to put for those boats that have the capacity to go out and fish and those plants that have the capacity to work. We have some semblance of an effort but we do not seem to know exactly why the Japanese come over here and fish and why we cannot do the same thing they do. If it means money, then use the ACOA money that has been wasted for the most part in Atlantic Canada because it has not gone to create too many jobs in those fishing villages which have no longer a fish plant working, have no longer boats working.

I heard one of my colleagues in the House talk about cultural genocide. That is what it is when community after community is hurting because of the lack of a decision or a lack of an ability of this government to have a creative program. We have all that supply there.

Tonight I asked one of the pages who is from Nova Scotia this:

[Translation]

"What do you think needs to be done?" This young man, who was about 19 years old, replied: "We have the technology. We can do the whole production. How come it is not being done?"

[English]

That is what this government has to say to the young people in Atlantic Canada. Why have we not put money into research and development instead of having the foreigners come over here year after year to catch the under-utilized species? As they catch the under-utilized species they get a by-catch. That by-catch is not a small amount. That by-catch could keep a plant going in one small community in Nova Scotia. Not once has any one of the three fisheries ministers put any effort into going out and saying to the Japanese: "Next year we are catching that fish", or to the eastern Europeans, or to the Cubans: "We are going to catch that fish and we will sell it to you, and if you do not want it, we will get rid of it somewhere else. We will sell it somewhere else because it is food". What does it take to sell food in these countries where people are starving? Not once has that happened and we have had three ministers.

Obviously the intelligence of three ministers is not as high as the young student who said to me tonight what he would do. That is a young person looking at a natural resource on his doorstep. I have to read The Globe and Mail and be told that we are always looking for handouts. If this government would start focusing on the fact that we have the capacity, we have the technology to fish and to process. What we need is the political will to change.

I sit back and listen to this debate on foreign fishing within our waters and outside our waters. If we could do away with those 100 or more freezer factory ships that come well equipped to process fish for those countries that we should be fishing, I would think as you did away with the effort of those 100 ships or more, they would not have the same desire to come and fish outside the 200-mile limit. Perhaps again we might be able to show NAFO we were serious about what we were doing within our 200-mile limit. As we came to show we were serious, they would begin to put teeth into what the foreigners are overfishing and what they are doing in raping a natural resource. It is a bounty that we do not mind sharing outside, but certainly within our 200-mile limit. We are not a very strong example to the foreigners who have come repeatedly and repeatedly and in larger numbers every year to fish stock that we are forbidden to fish because they have a by-catch in spawning areas.

I know my time is coming to a close, but I have sat here and listened to the ministers. I cannot believe there is that inability to react. I cannot believe the fisheries committee has not met. I heard the chairman tonight. I cannot believe people at The Globe & Mail can just write an editorial crossing us off and saying we are going down the road again or Atlantic Canada is going down the road. I cannot believe they can be so stupid to not criticize this government instead in an editorial once in awhile.

We are going to see our agriculture go out the window if the GATT agreement is signed. The Prime Minister says it may come to that land we have to sign it. President Bush is not saying that. We have a Prime Minister who is going around saying we may have to sign it. The President is not saying that.

It is the same thing here with the overfishing and the foreigners' fishing. We do not have a Prime Minister who is going to stand up and say that we are going to protect our natural resources first.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

We have before us tonight a motion for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely the situation in the Atlantic fisheries sponsored by the hon. member from Burin—St. George's. Truly this is indeed an emergency situation and a situation in which we from every side of the House of Commons have every right to take part in and put our collective minds together.

Earlier this week in the local paper, there was an article entitled "Where Have All the Fish Gone?". It was written by Elaine Flaherty from Southam News Service out of Halifax. It says:

> The accounts from the early explorers of Newfoundland described a sea of plenty; cod fish that swarmed to snatch bait from a man's hand; fish so thick by the shoal that we hardly were able to row a boat through them. The northern cod fishery built a sustained Newfoundland. Historically, it is the reason for the province's existence and today it accounts for about 30,000 jobs in Newfoundland and $700 million of the country's economy.
> A popular poster showing an old photo of a small child dwarfed by an enormous fish beside him underlies the rock's resilience on the fishery. "In cod we trust" it reads. Today that trust is seriously undermined, if not gone like the abundant catches of the past. All last summer fishermen off the coast of Newfoundland and Labrador hauled in empty nets and wondered about where the fish had gone. This week the scientists delivered the bleak news.

The news delivered by the scientists was a very sobering scientific report of the state of the northern cod. It was made public this past Monday. It was discussed at a special meeting of provincial fisheries ministers and the Atlantic groundfish advisory committee. The Canadian Atlantic Fishery Scientific Advisory Committee or CAFSAC have told us that the northern cod biomass has declined from 1.2 million tonnes in 1990 to 780,000 tonnes in 1991. Truly that is a remarkable change in one year. The spawning stock has dropped to 130,000 tonnes from 270,000 tonnes. We from the west coast do not understand that the cod stocks on the Atlantic live for several years. Seven years is really the prime of their existence. On the west coast the cycle for salmon is four years and after they spawn they die. In the Atlantic it is different. We want to make sure that there are sufficient spawners. They start spawning around age three. The hon. members opposite from the east will know this far better than I do, being from the west coast. Nonetheless the spawning biomass has been seriously depleted and the new numbers that have come in have really been shocking.

Catches of northern cod have been falling since 1988. Last year barely more than two-thirds of the Canadian quotas were caught. The minister is now considering the CAFSAC report and the views expressed at the meeting and is consulting widely with the representatives of industry. I am sure we can expect an announcement shortly on the government's response to this serious situation.

Earlier tonight the minister said he would be making his announcement next Monday. I know it is his plan to be back in Newfoundland for the latter part of this week.

In considering what to do it is clear that the government must put a priority on conservation and the long-term health and viability of the stock. It must also consider the potential impact of quota cuts on the incomes and well-being of inshore and offshore fleets, on fishermen, on plant workers, on the communities in Newfoundland and elsewhere which depend on the fishery.

Another very important factor in this complex equation is the continuing supply of this important species of fish to world markets. Although it is only one of twelve Canadian cod stocks, northern cod is by far the most important. We are known and want to continue to be known as reliable suppliers of cod. We need a balanced response to the new situation but we also need a balanced perspective on the complete picture for Canadian fisheries. We still have an ample supply of Canadian cod for the marketplace this year, not to mention other species of fish, shellfish and seafoods.

I do not need to explain the benefits at the end of the chain, to the retail market. However, we do need sound fisheries management that can be promoted from year to year so that there is a reliable resource and a source for the retail market.

In another paper in an editorial entitled Less Fishing Will Replenish Stocks it said: "NAFO recommended a northern cod catch of zero for 1991". Earlier tonight we heard people commenting about the overfishing by the Europeans. This article goes on to say: "The European Community fishermen ignored NAFO's advice and caught an estimated 42,000 tonnes of northern cod last year compared with 132,600 tonnes by the Canadians in the rest of the area. If a resource management regime is to be effective it must cover the entire resource. Otherwise our efforts to conserve stocks will only benefit and be neutralized by the foreign fleets who catch the fish when they cross the 200-mile limit".

Some tonight have suggested that Canada should unilaterally take possession outside the 200-mile limit. However that is easier said than done. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has explained to us tonight some of the things we would have to watch in trying to do that. It is all very well to talk about gunboat diplomacy but is that the real answer that we need? Once again we must try to see if we can get our European neighbours across the Atlantic—in particular two countries, Spain and Portugal, that we feel have not played by the rules as the others have—to joint in.

There is also a suggestion concerning the number of foreign licences permitted to fish within our 200-mile limit. It must be remembered that these are for the species that Canadians have not caught, have not wanted to catch, and in some cases have not been able to catch because we do not have the equipment to do it. I am sure this will have to be seriously looked at in light of what is now taking place in the industry.

We also know what has been taking place since we had to stop taking young seals. Now we only have some culling of the adult seals. We now know that the numbers of seals have more than doubled from what they were some five to six years ago. We know they feast on part of the food chain within the fisheries. We do not know precisely what they eat but we know it starts with the capelin. If they eat the capelin then it is not there for the cod to feed upon to allow them to continue their growth cycle. Therefore, very serious consideration will have to be given to how to handle the seals and how to cull them much faster than they are now.

Tonight we have heard a great deal of blame being attached to the present minister. This minister has been in this portfolio less than one year. This minister has been part of the government during the downturn in the northern cod stocks. However, I think it is most unfair for people to hold this minister responsible for the drop of the biomass and problems like that when our own scientists have changed their estimates of what was out there just within the last three months. The advice they were giving to this minister has changed negatively, very drastically, from as late as November and December of this past year.

It is a situation in which we all must be vigilant be very much aware of the people who are going to be affected if the minister has to announce on the weekend a serious cutback in the amount of fish that will be allowed to be caught over the next several months. We know this resource is renewable. It is something that will not become extinct. If we carefully nurture and watch over this resource it will renew itself and return to the condition it was in and has been in for these many years.

I would ask the indulgence of members opposite as well. I would ask that during Question Period in this House they ask the questions that need to be asked. However, by the same token, it serves no useful purpose to do it in such a way as to cause hysteria in people's minds because their constituents are watching at home. What kind of a message are they trying to send? Are they trying to say: "Oh, it is all the government's fault" when nature has a very serious influence on what takes place.

We, in this government, have done many things. However, I am sure that we do not have much influence on what nature does. We did not have any influence over the ice situation which affected the fishery last year. When there are changes in the atmosphere or in the water temperatures, whether it be on the east coast or west coast, the government does not have any control over them.

Yet it seems that some members opposite take great delight in fingering government members as the ones who could have an influence over that.

I welcome the opportunity to take part in this debate. I want those on the east coast, particularly those in Newfoundland who are going to be more seriously affected by this than any other single group of people, to know that we all care deeply about them and their welfare. We will be doing everything possible to make sure that we are able to tide them over through these next several weeks and months.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, this is a difficult issue we are facing here this evening. It is with thanks to you that the emergency debate was allowed. As has been said before, an emergency debate is an unusual thing and is something the Speaker does not normally grant that readily. From our vantage point, it shows the seriousness of this particular crisis in the fishing industry.

We have heard all kinds of talk this evening, with blame and all those sorts of things attached to the issue. I think we have to look at this as a national issue, the impact on all of Atlantic Canada and really all of Canada. When you look at the number of people who are involved you see astounding numbers in the hundreds of thousands of people. Even in my own province of New Brunswick there are almost 12,000 or 13,000 people involved directly as fishermen and plant workers in the fishing industry. This all has an impact. What we are seeing in Newfoundland could very easily be happening somewhere else. You really have to ask yourself this question. You can give the government the benefit of the doubt and say it managed this industry properly, everything worked out fine and it is just an environmental catastrophe that struck out of the clear blue and there was nothing that it could do. The other answer is that it has totally mismanaged the industry and there was a whole bunch of things that it could do.

Either way, no matter which way you look at it, and I am sure that people in Newfoundland would agree, if the industry was properly managed, they would have anticipated this problem. There were warning signals that had been cast about for the last number of years. I know that we on this side and the members from Newfoundland in particular have been warning the government year after year, Question Period after Question Period, and the fishermen the same. This government tinkered. It did not actually deal with the problem. It was a tinkerer rather than finding the root problems and solving them. Now we have the crisis and we are going to go into crisis management. That, again, is not the way it should be done. We are facing mismanagement of a resource. That is the reality of the situation and something has to be done.

We know there is overfishing. We have heard all the statistics of the European overfishing. We realize that is the nub of the issue, probably the thing that grates the most. We know there has been illegal fishing. It has occurred year after year after year and nothing has been done, and so the frustration does come forward and people are concerned. This has caused the environmental problem. You see things and you scratch your head and you try to wonder what will be going on in people's minds when they give a quota to the CIS, the Commonwealth of Independent States, formerly the Soviet Union. They give them capelin, the feed stock of northern cod. You just scratch your head and ask why they would do that. Yet they did. Then they say that it was an environmental disaster. Granting the licence was the disaster. It had nothing to do with the environment.

This is where we become frustrated. I feel compassion for Newfoundlanders who sit there and watch Brigitte Bardot and other Europeans come over here and say: "No killing of seals, we can't allow that, this is a terrible disgraceful thing", the movies, the news items and all the rest of that. At the same time they will come over here and plunder our fish stocks. You say: "What a bunch of hypocritical you-know-whats".

We realize that presently the statistics show something like three million to four million seals are in the Atlantic coastal region. I am sure that you realize this, Mr. Speaker, but others do not. Those three million or four million seals are making about 300,000 baby seals every year and every one of those is a hungry mouth. We have all heard the statistics on how much they eat. We have an environmental problem there. I was thinking about that. It is just an aside but if we are going to deal with that and were to cull that herd, what are we going to do with the cull because we would have to cull probably 300,000 to 500,000 seals? Where are you going to put that cull? What are we going to do with it? We have got ourselves in a mess. We in Atlantic Canada have to be concerned. If the mess can occur in such a major resource as the northern cod stock, what can happen in the rest of Atlantic Canada, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and the Bay of Fundy, areas that affect my riding?

I think we have to go back to square one to see if we can adopt a plan and take the necessary steps to have something that functions properly. We can talk and we can make suggestions and all the rest, but we have to try some things. Rather than saying it cannot be done and that we had better not attempt it, let us try some things.

We could take a look at the nose and tail. They say it cannot be done, therefore, we will just let it go. Why do we not opt in favour of doing something that may work, rather than giving up before we try? Why not extend our limits to include the nose and the tail of the Grand Banks?

We hear reports from our military as to how successful they were during the Persian Gulf war. What was their task in the Persian Gulf war? It was not to engage in combat as much as to verify and support the blockade of Iraq.

I think we should use those same initiatives and those same skills, because our Canadian troops were the best over there, to verify the overfishing and to prosecute, capture and bring to justice those people who break the law. We have the capabilities and the abilities to do that.

I will hear the arguments from the other side about gunboat diplomacy, et cetera. Maybe that is true. But I look at what happened with Iceland and Great Britain and when the Icelanders stood up and said: "Enough is enough and we are not going to put up with it any more", we knew who owned Icelandic cod. It was the Icelanders and not the people from Great Britain. They were a small nation and they took on the big nation and they came close to winning.

Therefore, we have to try the same thing. Rather than saying it cannot be done and there is no point in trying, let us try to do something to salvage this situation.

I know my time is going by quickly. I say to the people in Newfoundland that this is not the end of the world. This is a renewable resource. There are things that can be done. I am just very concerned about the management of this type of problem by this government.

We in Moncton faced a similar problem. We lost 1,500 jobs and this government's attitude was: "It is just a cyclical thing in the economy. It will go away. Do not worry about it". That is the attitude it seems to be taking in this particular matter.

We as parliamentarians in this place must send a message to the people of Newfoundland that we stand with them and that we are going to be there and support them all the day long, as they say, to make sure that they do not have the heartache, the stress and the impact on family life and all of those things that are associated with the fact that they are out of work and the appearance is that they have no future.

Newfoundland will rise above this particular problem. We have to be there to help. That is the role of Canadians, That is the role of this place and that is what we are going to do.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to stand tonight as a member from Ontario to support my colleagues from Newfoundland and from Atlantic Canada in general.

We in this country have to realize that we as Canadians must stand together or we are going to hang separately. What we need in this country is a good dose of medicine called national pride, national meaningfulness. We are going to support our own to the same degree that other people who are taking advantage of us are supporting their own. But we will not go around stealing from our neighbours. That is what is happening in many issues in the fisheries today.

• (0040)

It is a lack of proper conduct on the part of the international community. A lot of it is coming about because there is no muscle in Canada to say: "You cannot do it".

If next week when the budget comes down there is a cut in the shipbuilding program, then this is a clear signal that we will not have the additional ships that we are going to need to guard our fisheries here in Canada.

I remember very well that in 1984 during the election campaign the present Prime Minister criss-crossed this country and said: "If you just give me a chance to be Prime Minister of Canada, if I just get there, I will guarantee that in a few years' time, you will not recognize Canada".

Little did we know how meaningful that statement really was. We wish he had kept his other promises as well as he has kept that one.

The importance of the fishing industry to the GDP of each Atlantic province in commodity producing industries in 1986 really impressed me: Newfoundland and Labrador, 20 per cent; Nova Scotia, 15.8 per cent; Prince Edward Island, 15.9 per cent; New Brunswick, 5 per cent; and while the corresponding number for Quebec was less than 1 per cent, the industry is vital in the Gaspé and the north shore region of the St. Lawrence.

Tonight I listened to the member for Cardigan who delivered a very good speech on behalf of his home island of Prince Edward Island.

About 500,000 Atlantic Canadians live in 1,300 small fishing communities strung along thousands of miles of coastline. That last statement reminds me a great deal of the situation in northern Ontario and eastern Ontario where lumber is so important and where there are so many small communities. They too are in trouble.

There is proof, absolute proof here. I was amazed at some of the figures on the overfishing of the fisheries area around Newfoundland. It is sad that people around the world, with all the talk about the environment today, seem to have absolutely no respect for conservation.

Over the years of Canadian history there are three things that have been very important to the Canadian economy. One is fisheries. Far beyond the years of Confederation and right back to the early days of the first settlers, the fisheries were important.

The history books tell us of all the problems of the fisheries over the years. They were not problems necessarily on conservation but problems with foreign countries coming and taking the fish out, too many at one time.

Forestry was another main staple in the Canadian economy. This government has certainly fixed that industry today, too. It is in serious trouble.

The person who was responsible for undermining our forest industry, particularly softwood lumber, was rewarded by being appointed to the Senate. There was no fight there at that time, but worse still, there was no judgment in that case.

The third one was agriculture. Look what is happening to agriculture today. On Friday you will undoubtedly have the most farmers on Parliament Hill and in Ottawa than you have seen over the years of Canadian history.

That is because article XI of the GATT may be lost. If it is, the Liberal legislation that set up marketing boards in this country will be meaningless to farmers because they will lose their marketing boards. They will lose their milk quotas that they paid huge prices for over the years. It is a terrible issue for Canadian agriculture. Worse still, they talk about tariffication. We cannot put up tariffs against the United States to protect the farm industry in Canada. The Americans are going to come after us because of that insincere free trade agreement that we signed. They have been very insincere about it. We have all kinds of non-tariff barriers going up today.

The government is not fighting hard enough to protect the fisheries against intruders. It is not fighting hard enough to retain article XI of the GATT and hence save Canadian farm marketing boards and jobs in Atlantic Canada.

The government has not put into effect the necessary resolve to deal with those European countries that overfish in the Canadian Atlantic fisheries. Where is the Canadian resolve in dealing with the European community? It is failing in the farm discussions and it has failed in the fisheries.

I would like to remind Europeans tonight that during World War II convoy after convoy of food was sent from this nation of Canada to feed the civilian population in free Europe and to feed the Canadian armies and other armies that were situated on British soil. It is time that these European countries for which many young Canadians risked their lives and lost their lives, both in the merchant navy as well as in the active forces during World War II, remember that Canadians sacrificed for them. The least they can do today is respect international law that involves Canada. That is all we ask. Surely it is not too much to ask people to live up to decent agreements in the world. Memories are short unfortunately, but history is long and history records the real facts of life.

The underlying problems of the fisheries catastrophe that we are discussing tonight must rest at the very heart of the present government. We have heard that they do not want to hear tell of gunboat diplomacy and so on. The present system is not working. We are not doing the work in the diplomatic areas that we should be doing. Canada is not being respected. That message has to get through to the people who are not living up to the agreements with Canada, be they in fisheries, farm products or whatever.

These people have shown no respect for the Canadian government when discussing farm marketing boards. They show no respect for the Canadian government when discussing fisheries. We have a free trade agreement with the United States and what are we getting in return? All kinds of non-tariff barriers are thrown up.

It is time that we had a government in Canada that will fight for Canadians and not try to appease everybody in the world that is going to break international law and agreements with us.

We need a government that has some courage. We need a government that is willing to stand up on its feet and show some resolve, a government that means business when dealing with the international community. The day is over for a government that is too wimpish to take a strong stand on anything.

I just want to say that it is time not only to complain and march in Canada, but it is time to tell Europeans and others who are trespassing on the rights of this nation, on our sovereignty, to start abiding by agreements. It is time to make it plain to the world that they are not.

We did not pay the price in tens of thousands of lives of Canadians and in hard work in building this country only to sit back and be taken advantage of by other countries. From now on a national spirit in this country is needed that means resolve, determination, and play the game right.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to say that there are two speakers left on this side of the House, myself and the member for Gander—Grand Falls. We will be taking our full period of 20 minutes each.

I want to start by saying that I compliment you, Mr. Speaker, for accepting on such short notice the request of my colleague, the member for Burin—St. George's, for an emergency debate on this issue. Your Honour has been sitting in the chair for many hours today. You have been here often during the last two and a half weeks and know that I have been promoting and advancing the idea that on priority issues such as this we should take advantage of the time we are here in Ottawa when the House of Commons is sitting to extend the hours. I thank you, on behalf of all of us in this House and on behalf of all the people in our communities who want to know, when times are tough like this, that their members of Parliament are advancing debate in a constructive manner.

I must say that I believe the tone or tenor of debate tonight was the kind that many of my constituents would want to hear. Even though we tested the government or challenged the government tonight, there were positions put forward on both sides that I think should provide the beginning of some feeling of hope to Newfoundlanders, the people involved in the fishery. It is not only the fishery but people from all regions of the country. I mean, as the member for St. John's East said, direct and indirect employment is close to 25 per cent.

In my community of downtown Toronto losing 25 per cent of our employment is something beyond imagination. Our community could not function with an unemployment number that high. It is incumbent upon all of us to make sure that the government is seized with this issue and understands that the political will on this side of the House and on the government side as well is going to be there and is going to press the Prime Minister and the cabinet to act on this issue.

I could not help but reflect, as I was listening to the debate this evening, on what makes the leadership of this country, the Prime Minister, different from the previous Prime Minister who led this country, the Right Hon. Pierre Elliott Trudeau, a Prime Minister I had the honour and privilege of serving from 1980 to 1984 on his personal staff.

I tried to reflect, because we had times that were difficult in 1980, 1981 and 1982. We had a crisis in terms of the recession. It was one of the worst recessions that ever hit the world at that time. There are many differences between Prime Minister Trudeau and the present Prime Minister, but the one main difference is that Prime Minister Trudeau was a force in international affairs.

He was a force that was respected; he was a force that was admired and he was not afraid to take on the tough issues. When I say that I am not trying to suggest that the current Prime Minister could not do some of the same. What I am suggesting is that he is not doing enough of it.

Here is a perfect example where the Prime Minister of Canada could take a page out of Pierre Elliott Trudeau's book and he could call up his chief of staff and say: "Get the JetStar ready. We are travelling to Spain. We are travelling to Portugal. We are travelling to wherever we have to go and we are going to put this case before the leadership of those countries that are causing this problem".

I am not suggesting that this is an easy task. I am not suggesting that the Prime Minister will score the first time or the second time that he does this, but he must try.

Right now, the foreign policy of this country is basically being influenced and directed from the forces of Washington. It has affected our entire economic policy. We got suckered into a poorly designed Free Trade Agreement and we continue to flounder in that area. In the process of trying to cope with that poorly designed Free Trade Agreement, our national spirit has dissipated.

When that national spirit dissipates, when it becomes a weakened spirit and there is a crisis like we have right now in Atlantic Canada, in Newfoundland specifically, do not think that the world forces do not see, do not smell our weakness. They do and they take advantage of it. They are taking advantage of it right now.

I just came back from the Middle East. I spent about 10 days in Syria and Amman, Jordan. The people in the Middle East have warm feelings toward Canada, but they wish that we would once again develop our own foreign policy. They wish that we would stop being a mirror image of the United States of America. This example of foreign overfishing is one of people ignoring the basic laws in relation to the environment.

I cannot believe that in this debate tonight we have not had the Minister of Environment here. This makes a mockery of the green plan, what is happening here in Atlantic Canada. This makes a mockery of some of the projects that we are involved in, in terms of Global '92, in Vancouver. This makes a mockery of our plan in Rio de Janeiro in June.

This is an environmental disaster equal to the oil disaster in the Persian Gulf.

I would like to know where Greenpeace is. What hypocrisy, Greenpeace. Where are all the non-governmental environmental organizations this week? Where are they? Are they intimidated by The Globe and Mail? I cannot believe it.

The priorities on this issue are upside down. This is not a regional issue this is not a national issue. This is an international issue. This is an international issue because we are custodians of that fishery, not only for our nation but for other nations on this planet. If we show a lack of will, a lack of fortitude, if we show an indifference toward the international environmental justice, if we show an indifference, what is the next stop? Is it going to be the Americans taking water out of the Great Lakes and we sitting back and just letting it happen?

Is it going to be something on the west coast where my friend must have concerns? There is west coast exposure in terms of the environment, in terms of sovereignty. My colleague for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso earlier in his speech this evening talked about sovereignty. This is an issue of sovereignty. Just because it is happening in a region of our country where it is not easy for the national media to get to it, it may not be as sexy for the national media.

We have to stop letting the national media control the agenda of this nation. We as members of Parliament have to control the agenda. We have to let our voice be heard, not only here in this House of Commons but we have to make sure it is heard in all the other international courts. If we let this issue rest, it is going to be the beginning of a series of advantages that other nations will take from our own sovereignty.

As a member from an urban riding from Toronto I am happy to have the opportunity to speak on this issue. There are close to 5,000 people in my community who are from Newfoundland. Many of them have parents and friends, aunts and uncles still living in Newfoundland and they expect my voice to be heard on this issue. Toronto, contrary to what many people will say, cares about this nation as a whole. Like Charlemagne once said to his son: "Give me one spear and I can break it over my knee easily. Bring me ten together and I have strength". On this issue, all sides of this House must act together. We must encourage the Prime Minister of Canada to take a page out of Pierre Trudeau's book, get his foreign policy act together and start speaking for Canada, and leading Canada.

The people of Canada are saying there is a tremendous void of leadership in this country right now, that the Prime Minister is not leading, he is retreating. I say this without malice toward the Prime Minister but on this particular issue he needs a little nudge. He needs a little bit of a push and he needs to be told, in a very humble, direct way that it is time to fight for some international, economic and environmental justice.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I will not be very long. It is pretty late and I am sure that a lot of people are a bit tired at this hour in the morning.

I suppose it is fitting that I have the last words on this emergency debate and, as I say, I will be very brief. It is fitting because I am the only member in the Chamber whose riding lies entirely in the middle of the northern cod stock zone.

My riding to the east has a community at the very end called Deadman's Bay and in the west a community called Nickey's Nose Cove. Those are the extremities of my riding and both of those communities are within the 3K fishing area on the map. The northern cod zones are 2J, 3K and 3L. I am the only member in this Chamber who has the privilege of having a riding so located and of having 13,000 licensed fishermen in his riding; not 100, but 13,000 who fish only the northern cod stock. They fish nothing else.

There are families who migrate during the summer, who take their children and put them on a boat and go up to the Labrador coast and spend the entire summer there in communities. One of the communities is called Punch Bowl. I do not suppose, Mr. Speaker, you know where Punch Bowl is, but everybody in the middle of my riding knows where Punch Bowl is. For the first time in the 18 years that I have represented those 13,000 fishermen, I had to arrange for welfare to bring them back, men, women and children, because there were no fish.

For the first time in 18 years I went down to a meeting in a place called Crow Head recently. It was in the month of December. There were 67 long linermen, crews, 67 vessels, and they did not have enough for unemployment insurance.

They had to arrange to go out and pick up rocks and garbage under the snow to get their stamps, their unemployment insurance stamps. This was a works program of the federal government for the best fishermen in the world, the longliner fleet.

The hon. member for Burin—St. George's who moved this motion in the House today knows exactly what I am talking about. In fact, he knows some of them personally. The greatest fishermen in the world were picking up rocks and garbage under the snow in order to get enough unemployment insurance to feed their families. It never, ever happened before in our history.

I want to restrict in my few remarks to only one thing. I am not going to talk about foreign overfishing outside. I am going to talk about something that the Government of Canada can do and do now. I am glad the parliamentary secretary is here. Next to the minister, he is the most powerful in the Government of Canada.

The 100 foreign vessels inside the 200-mile zone area licensed by Canada. Those people who believe that they do not have anything to do with the shortage of fish must believe that crew members on those 100 foreign vessels are suntanning.

The crew of 15 factory freezer trawlers from Cuba are around Newfoundland suntanning, because what else would they be doing? Playing bridge, or cards, or cribbage? Do they have an indoor pool? Their boats are big enough, they are 400 feet long. Do they go down and play video games? When you go inside the control room, it looks like Star Wars.

They are all at the television screens and they control their nets by remote control. The nets go down and around every bump in the ocean. They pick out the fish they want. Star Wars in the Atlantic Ocean.

Maybe they are playing video games for those people who do not believe that those vessels are harming the fishery. They must believe they are either getting a suntan or playing Pac-Man on the Atlantic Ocean.

I want to make just one brief reference to what the minister and the parliamentary secretary said. I noted it very clearly. They said: "The species of fish that foreign nations are catching legally"—these are the only people I am talking about, not the illegal ones—"are only catching it because we are not able to catch it or we are not interested in it".

I want to tell the minister and the parliamentary secretary that there is no such thing as an under-utilized species in the Atlantic Ocean today. The only under-utilized species in our ocean are our fishermen and fish plant workers. Those are the only underutilized species.

I will explain to the parliamentary secretary exactly what I am talking about. They are granting 100 licences to various nations. The hon. member knows the nations I am talking about: Cuba, the Soviet Union, Bulgaria to a certain degree, Norway, France, and so on.

These nations may not have quotas of cod in the northern cod zone, but I will tell you what they do have. They have quotas first of all for squid. The 401 for squid is off the province of Nova Scotia. Squid are born in Florida and they die in Florida, the species that we have. They know where to go to die, don't they? When they are born they come up the coast of Canada and they pass to within 80 miles of southeastern Nova Scotia. It is there, the food supply of the cod. The squid we made so much money on in 1979. Men, women and children drawing squid, everybody was happy. Everybody had clothes to put on their backs to go back to school, everybody bought their books and shoes to go on their feet. They did not need welfare, they had squid. That squid is a restricted fishery in Canada today. I cannot get a licence to catch squid. A man on welfare cannot get it. A woman on welfare cannot get it. Not even a fisherman can get it unless he fished it previously for the last five years.

It is restricted, but Cuba has 15 factory freezer trawler licences this year to catch squid in our waters off Nova Scotia, right on the 401. The black line of squid come all the way up past Nova Scotia, go in around Cape Breton, on up the Quebec shore and New Brunswick, up around Newfoundland and right back down to Florida and then they spawn and die.

We have not seen squid now since 1979. Is it not funny that Cuba and the Soviet Union with 25 factory freezer trawlers and scientific knowledge so accurate that the moment those squid are big enough to catch when they get inside our waters past Nova Scotia are there. The 25 of them are there and they put a barrier across the 401 and catch every squid that goes up there.

We do not see squid anymore. The hon. member can check with the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and it will say that it is an under-utilized species. The poor man on my coast who cannot get a licence says: "Oh, yes, underutilized. How is that?" The minister stands up and he says: "But it is the law of the sea. We have to give anything in excess of Canada's needs". What is Canada? It is not National Sea Products Limited and Fisheries Products International. These are the people who are asked: "Do you want this squid quota"? The man trying to support his family is not asked.

The newspaper editor phones the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and is told: "Oh, no, this is in excess of Canada's needs". What does a newspaper editor here in central Canada know about the poor man and woman who cannot get a licence. The squid never reach our coast anymore.

It is the same with our capelin. We cannot get licences for capelin. It is a restricted fishery in Canada today. Only certain people can fish capelin and only in certain bays. You must have a certain size boat and you must have three in your crew. The Russians have 50,000 quota in my riding and Canada has 20,000. Capelin is the main food supply of the codfish.

If you were trying to catch a codfish out in the ocean—I have done it many times all my life—you would go out and you could put bubble gum on your hook and you would catch a codfish. Any child will tell you that. You could use a piece of cotton or something. However, the really good food is the squid and the capelin. Then if you had a piece of mackerel or herring just like a lobster.

Two years ago for the first time since the early 1970s Canada approved four factory freezer trawler licences for Bulgaria to fish—where? We have the biggest spawning area for mackerel in the world in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Since the Canso causeway was built in 1954 the mackerel cannot get in that way any more. They go through Sydney Bight at the end of May and spawn in June in the Gulf.

By September those fish are nine inches long and they go right up around the northern cod zone and they are eaten by cod fish. Lo and behold, who had the nets up? Bulgaria, compliments of the Government of Canada with a 30 per cent by-catch of herring, the largest by-catch our fishermen could ever have in our entire history since we joined Canada in 1949. I can remember the day. The largest by-catch my people ever had was 10 per cent. Bulgaria had 30 per cent. When you look at the licences, everybody has 30 per cent if they are foreign. You have your capelin, squid, mackerel, and herring to a certain degree. What is the codfish supposed to eat in the northern cod zone? There is nothing left. They are scrawny. They are thin. They are not even spawning at seven years anymore.

One further point I want to make is this. I have done research since becoming a member of Parliament. I represent 13,000 full-time fishermen. When I say full-time fishermen, I think twice about it because I think about all of those people out there who are part time or less than part time who are not allowed to get any of these licences that the foreign factory freezer trawlers have, none of these licences. Imagine, I have had fellows write to the Soviet Union and ask for a portion of their quota. Imagine. I sent a covering letter to the embassy here. We give them a portion of the quota in 3K in the northern cod zone. Of course the Soviet Union writes back and says no. Imagine, a Canadian asking the Soviet Union for a portion of his quota in the northern cod zone for capelin.

My point on the spawning is this. When you examine all of the scientific reports on spawning they are very interesting. It is interesting how a codfish spawns. A codfish takes about four weeks to spawn. Actually the male cod grumps for two weeks. You did not know that before, parliamentary secretary, but a codfish actually grumps prior to the two weeks spawning period. He selects his female. It is a very complex system. Just like your living room, he maps out this area, and he selects the female cod for two weeks. Then they spawn for two weeks. Every scientific study that has ever been done on the spawning of cod in captivity in incredibly large tanks and in bays show one thing. If you drop food down during the courtship period or the spawning period, the codfish will go mad and they will collide with the sides of the tank or they will disappear. You cannot disturb them during their two week pre-spawning and during their two weeks of spawning. Who disturbs our codfish today on our spawning grounds?

Do you know that the policy of this country is that we are not certain? You speak to any scientist in Fisheries and Oceans and he will tell you that it is Canadian government policy to allow anybody to fish during a spawning period because we have never had a situation in Canada as long as they have studied cod when there has been no fishing during the spawning period. They cannot tell you whether it has any effect on the spawning of fish, that is allowing boats to fish in that area.

Who covers the main spawning areas of Canada during the spawning season, the Hamilton Banks, the Funk Island Banks? Ninety per cent of our spawning areas are inside the 200-mile zone. You know who covers it? It is those factory freezer trawlers. We do not have any factory freezer trawlers in Canada other than one. National Sea has one. Do not use it. A government fell in Atlantic Canada, I would say, when a fisheries minister approved factory freezer trawlers. We do not have one. Our boats are maximum size, 174 feet. Some of these foreign vessels are 400 feet long. These vessels go with their modern Star Wars gear through the very zones where codfish are trying to spawn during the spawning season.

So add two of those things together. You take away the food of the cod and you take away the privilege that codfish always had while the ice was in in February and March of being left alone, relatively apart from our own offshore fleet which is about 42 vessels, compared to the 100 from foreign nations we license to catch so-called underutilized species. Those are the vessels that disturb our spawning ground.

You add both of those things together. Yes, you can mention seals as the hon. member did. We have a law in Canada today. You are not allowed to get a sealing licence. I bet you did not know that.

The law was brought in by this minister of fisheries. There was no announcement made but you cannot get one for food. A man cannot get one for food, unless he had one for the past five years.

We are limiting Canadians, telling Canadians that you cannot do this and you cannot do that, saying for the sake of the law of the sea in excess of Canada's needs must be given to a foreign nation. It is funny. We are the only nation in the world that interprets the law of the sea that way.

We are not allowed to go within 200 miles of any nation in the world. Not one nation are we allowed to go within 200 miles and fish, even to put a hook over the side of a boat. We would be arrested. We are the only nation in the world that allows it.

The last one that stopped it was Namibia, that big powerful nation just north of South Africa. That small nation last November said: "We're not going to put up with this any more. We are not going to put up with the—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. Your time has expired.

Mr. Baker: One minute to wrap it up.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): One minute, the hon. member.

Mr. Baker: As I was saying, the vessels from Spain and Portugal that the hon. member who moved this motion from Burin—St. George's knows so well, 100 of them left the coast of Namibia and ended up off the hon. member's riding on the nose and tail of the Grand Banks. That is where they ended up.

In conclusion let me say this. It is not very nice to have your constituents, full-time fishermen, unable to go out and fish. They look out in the water 12 miles off and see the flags of Japan and U.S.S.R. All these nations catching such things as Greenland halibut which we know as turbot. That is our mainstay but it is listed here as Greenland halibut by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, underutilized species. Our fishermen have fished it for hundreds of years. It is their mainstay. It is flatfish. Foreigners fishing; Canadians are not allowed to fish.

Anybody who believes that foreigners do not have anything to do—that is the legal ones now, the ones that are licensed; I am talking about my riding and the northern cod stock— with the destruction of our cod stocks really believes that these foreigners in 100 large vessels are out there suntanning in the month of February.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 1.27 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 52(12), I declare the motion carried.

The House therefore stands adjourned until 10 a.m. today, pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-336, an act to amend the Criminal Code and the Young Offenders Act (absence of criminal liability of child under 10 years of age and definition of child and young person).

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Lee: The purpose of this private member's bill is to include the 10 and 11 year old age group as young persons governed by the Young Offenders Act.

At present that act does not apply to anyone less than 12 years of age. Second, it is to lower the age of culpability in the Criminal Code from 12 years to 10 years.

The reason for these proposed changes is that the 10 and 11 year old group are increasingly turning up as perpetrators of assaults causing bodily harm, sexual assaults, threats, extortion and drug couriers, especially in large urban areas.

Under the current law police are unable to charge or arrest young offenders in this 10 and 11 year old age group. This law would rectify this problem for the 10 and 11 year old age group.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Lee moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): On another matter, Madam Speaker, again pursuant to Standing Order 36, the petitioners, mainly from the North Thompson Valley are asking that the Government of Canada state clearly that Canadian rivers will not be for sale to the United States.

SPECIAL ECONOMIC MEASURES ACT

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved that Bill C–53, an act to provide for the imposition of special economic measures, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee E.

She said: Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to lead off the debate today on Bill C–53, an act to provide for the imposition of special economic measures.

Now that the cold war is over, we are living in a period of unprecedented opportunity to enhance international peace and security. Countries are rethinking the way they have conducted international relations for the past 45 years. The international community is looking for new and effective ways to maintain international peace and security with minimal recourse to military force.

The responses of the United Nations and the Organization of American States to the gulf and Haitian crises have highlighted the new opportunities for collective measures to suppress acts of aggression and respond to internationally unacceptable behaviour.

It is in this context that the government has introduced Bill C–53, an act to provide for the imposition of special economic measures.

• (1020)

The purpose of Bill C–53 is to enable Canada to impose a broad range of economic sanctions against a state or part of a state whose actions pose a serious threat to international peace or security or fail to conform to commonly accepted standards of behaviour.

The act will improve Canada's ability to join other states promptly and effectively in the application of economic sanctions.

[English]

The application of economic sanctions will remain an exceptional measure, but it is an essential foreign policy instrument. There are occasions when other peaceful means such as diplomatic representations, public condemnations, various demarches will not bring a delinquent state or a rogue regime to modify its behaviour.

In these circumstances the ability to join promptly in the application of multilateral economic sanctions is both valuable and necessary. The use of economic sanctions, of course, is not new to Canadian foreign policy. On a number of occasions over the past 25 years, Canada has joined like-minded states in resorting to economic sanctions for one reason or another.

For example, comprehensive sanctions were applied against Rhodesia in 1968 and against Iraq in 1990. The United Nations imposed an arms embargo against South Africa in 1977 and more extensive economic measures were applied in 1985 and 1986.

Limited sanctions were applied against Iran and the Soviet Union in 1980, Poland and Argentina in 1982, Libya in 1986 and Haiti in 1991.

[English]

These instances have revealed that our domestic authority to impose sanctions is not appropriate to the current situation. We have seen, for example, that disagreement among the permanent members of the UN Security Council regularly made it impossible to use the United Nations Act to apply sanctions. The Export and Import Permits Act only permits restrictions on trade and goods. Moreover, the requirement for an intergovernmental arrangement or commitment in order to control imports for foreign policy reasons has occasionally made use of that act cumbersome and difficult.

The passage of the special legislation such as the Iran Economic Sanctions Act takes time. Opportunities to effectively influence the outcome of a crisis can thus be lost. Other legislation such as the Emergencies Act was never intended for the application of international economic sanctions and is in fact of very little use.

Measures that are within the discretion of the government can be useful in some circumstances, but they would likely be neither a sufficient nor an appropriate response to the unacceptable behaviour of another state.

In the past we have been able to make do with a limited ability to impose international economic sanctions, but that is no longer the case. The world has changed. Not only has the end of the cold war created these new opportunities for concerted international action that Canada and other countries must seize, the character of international economic relations and the structure of economic transactions have also changed. In the past, relatively effective sanctions could be applied by merely controlling trade in goods.

Today, however, trade in services accounts for an ever larger part of international transactions. In addition, in an age of electronic banking huge sums of money and other assets can be moved from one country to another almost instantaneously. Bill C-53 addresses these new developments and in its provision for controlling trade and technology, for example, a very important element in today's international exchanges, it tries to anticipate others yet to come.

When I speak of these changes I am referring to situations that are very real. After the coup d'etat in Haiti, the ad hoc meeting of ministers of foreign affairs of the Organization of American States urged OAS member states to embargo trade with Haiti and to freeze Haitian state assets. Canada, however, found itself with only limited authority to block financial transactions involving Haiti and to freeze Haitian state assets in Canada. Had the special economic measures act been in force when the coup took place, Canada would have been better placed to respond quickly and effectively to the OAS request. Indeed, Canada had led the OAS in calling for strong economic measures against Haiti and it therefore is of course doubly important that we are in a position to follow through.

With the legislation in place, we will be able to respond better. Embargoes are not always easy to apply. That said, we are concerned that some OAS members, including the United States, apparently appear to be backing away from giving full effect to the OAS resolutions. That reluctance can undermine the effectiveness of sanctions, and it makes it difficult for countries like Canada to sustain the sanctions when others are not sharing the burden. We want to implement measures that will contribute to the return of constitutional government in Haiti. We urge our fellow members to do likewise, as well as other countries. This action was a breakthrough for the Organization of American States and in our view it is very important that we act as member states in concert.

I have spoken about why Canada needs the special economic measures act. Now I want to talk about the bill itself. This is enabling legislation. It will allow but not require the government to apply international economic sanctions. Bill C-53 signals no intention to apply sanctions either more or less frequently than we have in the past. Canadian decisions to use sanctions will be guided by established policies and the need for sanctions will be dictated by developments in international relations. I can, however, assure you that Canada will continue to work hard with the objective of ensuring that sanctions will be called for only on rare occasions. When the government does decide to apply sanctions, the act will give it the flexibility to choose those measures which are best suited for the situation at hand.

[Translation]

The essence of the bill is found in section 4, which describes the conditions for the application of sanctions and the types of measures that may be applied. Sanctions may be applied if the Governor in Council determines that a grave breach of international peace and security has occurred and has resulted or is likely to result in a serious international crisis. Sanctions may also be applied in response to a decision, resolution or recommendation of an international organization or association of states of which Canada is a member, calling for the application of sanctions.

Under the act the government will be able to seize or sequeseter the property held in Canada by the state that is subject to sanctions or by persons associated with it.

[English]

The government will also be able to make orders or regulations restricting or prohibiting a variety of activities such as trade in goods and services, the execution of financial and commercial transactions, the transfer of technology and the operation of air and maritime links.

Bill C-53 is fully consistent with long established Canadian foreign policy that has always treated the application of international economic sanctions as a very serious and exceptional measure. In applying economic sanctions Canadian governments have been guided by three principles. Canada has sought a broad international agreement on the necessity and usefulness of sanctions. Canada has insisted that the burden of sanctions be shared among the countries imposing them and Canada has made every effort to avoid placing Canadian business and workers at a disadvantage in relation to its foreign competitors.

Nothing in this bill requires departure from these longstanding principles of Canadian foreign policy and they will indeed continue to guide us. Every situation in which sanctions will be imposed, of course, will be different.

• (1030)

To be effective, international economic sanctions should be used in pursuit of very precisely and clearly defined objectives. Sanctions measures must be carefully conceived because those that would be effective in one set of circumstances may be totally inappropriate, perhaps even costly in another.

Decisions to impose economic sanctions will involve a complex balancing of many considerations. The kinds of measures to be taken, their likely effectiveness and the potential cost to Canadians will need to be addressed every time a proposal is made to impose sanctions.

Consequently Bill C-53 does not dictate the policy considerations that would determine whether or not to apply sanctions in any particular situation, nor does it dictate the types of measures to be used when the government decides to apply sanctions.

The flexibility that must be granted to the government in Bill C-53 warrants parliamentary scrutiny. In applying sanctions as the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait demonstrated, the government must be able to act quickly.

However, once the government has acted every order and regulation made in application for sanctions must be laid before each House of Parliament within five sitting days of its making. If 50 members or 20 senators move that any order or regulation be revoked, the motion must be debated and brought to a vote.

When Canada applies economic sanctions, every effort must be made to minimize the costs to Canada's business community and to Canada's workers.

[Translation]

For instance, where possible, restrictions should be applied prospectively, thereby permitting the execution of existing contracts. Where costs to Canadians are unavoidable, government programs might be adapted to assist those in Canada who bear the burden. This was done in 1980 when the existing grain price support programs were used to relieve farmers from depressed cereal prices that resulted from Canadian participation in the grain embargo against the Soviet Union. When Canada has applied economic sanctions, direct compensation has seldom been requested. Nonetheless, we do not exclude the possibility that in some future circumstances the government might want to consider the need for a program of compensation for Canadians and persons in Canada adversely affected by the application of economic sanctions. Section 6 of the bill provides for that eventuality.

[English]

This bill is timely legislation that responds to changes in international circumstances. It reflects changes in the character of international business.

The special economic measures act will fit within longstanding Canadian policy that seeks multilateral solutions to international problems. It will be a valuable addition to the peaceful options available to the government to respond to threats to international peace and security.

I hope that all hon. members will see the value of this important legislation and allow for quick passage so that additional options can be considered for addressing effectively the Haitian situation in particular. It is of most immediate concern, but of course there will be others in the future.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, there is some irony in that just about a year ago this House was deeply engaged in a major debate about the Gulf War.

Members of the opposition were trying to put the best case forward to the government about the utility and effectiveness of economic sanctions. They were being treated with total indifference and sometimes arrogance saying that sanctions had no role to play.

It was said that sanctions were useless and were not being effective in that case. One year later, we are now dealing with a bill that centres on the importance and effectiveness of economic sanctions.

It certainly shows that, if nothing else is true, the government has been able to understand the weakness of its ways.

I would like to recall that at that time we said that there were choices and there were options.

We said that this Parliament should have far more responsibility for the setting of standards by which we determine our actions internationally with respect to the democratic interests of this country. Those were being spurned and those were being treated with total and complete impunity.

We are now seized of a bill that we hope will improve upon that. One can at least be thankful that a few lessons were learned as a consequence of that terrible tragedy.

Of course, not all lessons were learned because what we are still faced with is the enormous consequences of a war that spent close to 80 billion scarce dollars. It burned it up at a rate of something like $60 million an hour, and what are the results?

The results are mass starvation in Iraq, continuation of a despotic regime, environmental despoilment, the continuing arms trade in the Middle East, in fact an escalating arms trade in the Middle East. Also, close to three-quarters of a million refugees are scattered throughout the Middle East. A number of countries are impoverished.

Because of a lack of patience, because of a lack of interest or concern about the utility and effectiveness of the use of economic sanctions, we are paying a very deep, steep price even today for that imprudence and lack of caution and jingoism that so terribly seized the Government of Canada, as it did many other governments at that time.

I would say at the outset that we welcome this legislation. It may provide a more important and useful tool for the government. It may in the future be prepared to exercise that option without resorting so quickly and ferociously to the use of force as the first resort, rather than the last resort, in trying to deal with the problem of international conflict and aggression.

It does not mean to say, however, that economic sanctions by themselves are sufficient or should not go unexamined. The minister mentioned in her opening address the application of sanctions to Haiti. Well, let us just stop for a moment and ask what is happening there.

Again, Canada along with other countries was quick to rush to the press conferences to announce a whole series of strictures against the dictatorship that took over in Haiti.

But now Haitian refugees are being sent back and are having to return a second time to political persecution. I have seen no statement from the Minister of External Affairs or from the Prime Minister of Canada about how we intend to help many of those refugees who are there as a direct consequence of the actions being taken.

There is no question that economic sanctions have their consequences, have their results.

It is a negligence in responsibility that we undertake in participating in a multilateral action properly designed to force an end to a dictatorship in a country like Haiti that we take no responsibility, no interest whatsoever in the victims of that action.

My colleague from Broadview—Greenwood will speak later about the efforts he has been making to try to get foodstuffs and humanitarian supplies into Iraq for the children there.

We now have a series of reports. Once again we find, as I discovered on my visit to the United Nations last week, that we are concentrating on enforcement and pressure.

At the same time we are ignoring and forgetting that there is always another side to the equation. That side of the equation includes the people who suffer, the people who pay the price, the individuals, the men and women and particularly the children who suffer the results of that.

The bill itself gives us an important opportunity to honestly examine what it is about—a sanctions policy.

• (1040)

I was disturbed to hear the minister when she said that she treats the legislation purely in mechanical terms, not in policy terms.

It is important for Canada to have policies in these areas. It is important for the Canadian people to understand what the policy of the Government of Canada will be when it becomes engaged in major international actions. It is crucial that we understand what objectives and goals and values motivate and seize this kind of action.

It is not simply a mechanical matter of turning over and responding. It is a question of making choices and judgments and engaging in a proper public debate as to what they require.

It is no wonder that Canadians are confused today about what is our position in the new world order, that we will apply sanctions to one country but not to another.

Look what happened in Yugoslavia where we watched for months upon months the escalation, suffering, damage, and terrible tragedy. Yet western countries were not prepared. Maybe we did not have the means.

It looked once again as if there was a double standard being applied, that we were beginning to say that we will apply enforcement action in one place and not in another depending on what the politics dictate.

It may be that there are realistic reasons for doing that, but they should be spelled out. There should be a much stronger effort to engage Canadians in this kind of debate and discussion.

If we are going to be called upon, as I believe we will be, for a much broader and more active role in maintaining collective peace and security, then it can only be done if there is support from the public. They must understand what is being done. They must be engaged in the debate.

It should not be a decision made behind closed doors in a cabinet room, remote and separated from what it is Canadians believe should take the place.

If we are going to be sending peacekeepers to one area and impose sanctions in another, that has to be part of a judgment made by the people. This is done through their parliamentary system where there is a serious and considerate effort to share information, where there is a realistic opportunity to judge the impact of those actions.

I can recall what took place during the debates in this House during the gulf war when we constantly said to the predecessor to the present minister for external affairs: "Tell us why sanctions are not working, why it is necessary right now to engage in military action".

There was never any mechanism, no real effort to provide that information. There was no evidence. There was no analysis. There were no judgments to say: "Here is why we think economic sanctions as an instrument will not work and therefore we are going to be forced into more serious military engagement".

I ask whether there is anything in Bill C-53 that will correct that, that will require the government to be accountable to Parliament for how the sanctions are working, who is being affected and whether the sanctions are having the desired result.

I suggest that there is nothing in the bill that will ensure the continual observation, monitoring and accountability of this very important and serious international engagement the minister is proposing that Canadians undertake.

Let us be honest. There is no real parliamentary role in this. The measures built into this bill are farcical.

There is nothing to say what happens if Parliament is in a summer recess, as we were during the time of the gulf war, and is not called back for three months. Where is the opportunity in this bill to correct that serious omission of fundamental parliamentary responsibility?

There is nothing in the bill that would require Parliament to be immediately recalled so that a proper debate could be held and members of Parliament on behalf of their constituents could raise questions and determine what the severity of the situation would be. No, this would be a decision taken on high through executive decision and Parliament would be hoeing its garden or doing whatever.

Similarly in the bill there is no capacity for Parliament, again representing the people of Canada, to determine when sanctions are working or when they should be withdrawn or when they should be changed. Sanctions are not some kind of iceberg that sits there. They have to be constantly monitored. Businesses are being put at financial risk, there are enormous consequences in terms of the countries in which sanctions are being employed, and the only provision we have is that 50 MPs get up and say: "We do not want sanctions". Where is the flexibility in that? It is not a question of black or white, but it is a question of responsibility, accountability, information sharing, reporting and proper debate.

I can say to the House that we will be making every effort to improve this bill, to substantially improve the position of Parliament in its role of ensuring that such an important international commitment as the imposition of a sanctions program is subject to parliamentary assessment, judgment and accountability.

I hope the minister will be in agreement with those measures. We are primarily arguing about the fact that we cannot go around the world preaching democracy if we are not prepared to acknowledge it at home. How can we be lecturing other countries about the importance of building democratic institutions if we ignore our own institutions on such a crucial issue as war and peace or major international engagement?

One of the reasons we will be prepared to give quick passage to the bill is so that we can bring it to committee as quickly as possible and prepare a number of amendments that we believe will substantially improve the bill in terms of parliamentary role.

I might as well raise another set of concerns about Bill C-53, that is the triggering of its application. The minister has outlined that it would be triggered by requests from international organizations where there is a judgment about peace and security. I want to pose some questions of the minister. What happens to cases where there are severe violations of human rights?

We see cases now in East Timor and other places around the world where it may be important that the economic tool be used to live up to the principle that the minister and the Prime Minister have established of connecting human rights to economic aid. It is surprising that there is an omission in this bill, that there is not the same kind of flexibility being shown in applying some enforcement action for countries which are not prepared to listen to international standards and adhere to international standards of human rights.

Similarly it may be important to consider whether in this bill we should also consider a criterion of environmental pollution and degradation. We saw a case just a year or so ago when the U.S. Congress applied a form of economic sanctions on tuna fishing against Mexico. It had the desired result, by the way, of stopping a kind of raping of the tuna fleet.

In the last three or four days in this House we have had major debate about what is happening outside the 200-mile limit in our own Grand Banks area. It may be important that we at least keep in the arsenal—and I am not saying for it to be used in a capricious way—the possibility of using economic tools or weapons to respond to countries which take no responsibility for ravaging the ocean's environment, or other environments for that matter. It may be important to consider additional criteria under which this bill can be applied.

It is also important, just as a third area where I think improvement and additions are required, in the field of compensation. As I read the bill we talk about the right to make application for compensation. There is nothing in the bill that says the government has to respond in any tangible way. To make sanctions an effective instrument, as we have seen in past experiences there has to be a commitment by which affected individuals or businesses have a clear mechanism, by which they have some security that their own interests will not be again victimized, and by which they are not the only ones paying the penalty.

In saying all that, it is important to put this bill in perspective. It is really only one of the top most rungs of the international ladder that we have to climb if we are to try to recreate a new international regime or environment.

An important paper delivered at the UN symposium that our party sponsored in Vancouver in October was by Professor Edwin Smith, an international lawyer. It dealt specifically with the question of economic sanctions. He pointed out something which I think would be of interest to members, that under article VII there is only one reference to how economic sanctions should be applied. He pointed out in his paper, if I can quote: "After 45 years we have not had one single military operation that followed the procedures laid out by the charter, but we have had many instances of the application of economic sanctions". He also said: "It would be unfortunate if these economic measures were left to ad hoc procedures that did not benefit from the preservation of institutional memory". He went on to talk about the necessity for the United Nations, if it is to become the major source of decision making in these areas, to enunciate clearly how, where and by what means these decisions will be made.

The interview the Leader of the Opposition and I had with the Secretary-General last week was interesting. It was pointed out that they are now busily preparing a paper to be tabled with the Security Council on July 1 on a whole new set of means of collective security instruments that will be required by the UN.

I find surprising that here we are in the middle of February and there does not seem at this point to be any initiative on the part of the Canadian government to make proposals as to what that paper should include. This may be one of the most important set of recommendations emerging in building the architecture for a new international peace and security system through the UN, and Canada, which is one of the countries that has been called upon in many instances to supply peacekeeping forces or other responses, does not seem to be part of the action. We are not engaging either in this Parliament or anywhere else in serious debate about what we would like the new architecture to be at the United Nations.

What should be the role of the Secretary-General? Should there be a very specific sanctions group, peacekeeping group in the apparatus of the United Nations, so that a wider range of countries than simply those on the Security Council has an opportunity to be involved in the decision making, the implementation and the accountability?

Surely, as a specific interest of Canadians, we are about to send close to 1,000 peacekeepers to Yugoslavia and we are still not clear in this day and age as to the responsibilities and accountabilities of those who decide on these issues.

I believe there will be a meeting of the peacekeeping committee beginning in the first week of April which Canada will chair. It would seem to me that is an important opportunity for us to put forward a series of proposals on peacemaking, on how the Secretary-General may have offices in different parts of the world to provide preventative diplomacy, on how there could be a new information sharing system at the UN, and on how we could be establishing a standby peacekeeping force that could implement sanctions or other areas. There is a wide range of initiatives that I believe Canadians are interested in.

When we held the symposium the response was incredible. People wanted to come. They wanted to discuss and debate this matter, but we have not yet given them an opportunity in the House to provide that kind of involvement. If there should be any lesson that is clear from the gulf war and since then, it is that sanctions and the military should be the last resorts and not the first resort.

It may be that it would have been a more useful initiative by the minister to present a resolution in this House prior to this bill on a peacemaking policy for Canada, the kind of things that we would like the Canadian government to be proposing at the UN and at the OAS in terms of new instruments, procedures and processes for looking at the diplomatic efforts and multilateral action for determining how we can prevent conflict, offset aggression and provide deterrence to the kind of things that happened in the gulf war as opposed to simply responding to them after they happen.

I would use this opportunity, if I might, to urge the minister to do that. I think Canadians are interested. They want to become involved in that kind of debate. I think it is a long-standing tradition of our foreign policy that Canadians become committed and feel a responsibility to multilateral action.

Surely, if the gulf war has taught us anything, it is that the mechanics and the institutions lack a great deal. They need to be modernized, improved and renovated to bring them up to the kind of conditions we now face. We are lagging behind in our capacity to make peace in this world internationally, multilaterally and domestically.

I cannot think of a more profound, serious debate that could take place in this House of Commons. Perhaps the government is prepared to come forward and present its ideas and its proposals and to have serious debate about where we should go in this area before the Secretary-General tables his report on July 1, before decisions are made, and before the security council is seized of this issue.

I would say in summation that the bill itself is a useful measure. It is a beginning but it certainly misses one of the critical criteria in this new age the minister talked about, in this new environment where peace and security may be in our grasp. It will only happen if Canadians understand what their responsibilities and obligations are. They have to feel that they are part of making these decisions. I would strongly urge all members of the House to support the amendments and measures we will be promoting to ensure that on a crucial issue such as economic sanctions Canadians have a role to play, that they have a voice that will be heard, and that they will be part of a decision that is committing themselves and their country to important initiatives overseas.

We would ask this House to support a bill that is substantially amended in the interests of a democratic foreign policy.

[Translation]

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, we support this bill. In the circumstances it is very important for the government to have the authority to impose economic sanctions as an alternative to war.

[English]

We support this bill. We believe it to be a very important bill and one which should have the support of all members of this House as it goes through the parliamentary process.

The bill provides the government with the necessary ability to move very quickly in imposing economic sanctions during an appropriate international crisis. As was argued during the time of the gulf war, we see sanctions as an important alternative to the use of military force in solving international problems.

The government has introduced this bill because as it found during the gulf war it did not have an effective set of legislative authority to impose sanctions as required under UN resolutions or by other appropriate government policy.

All sides in this House during the gulf war supported the use of economic sanctions. We can do nothing else but support the government in reorganizing and making more effective the mechanisms for dealing with economic sanctions when they are required. The legislation would allow the government to freeze the assets of foreign states which offend international law, would prohibit or restrict the import and export of goods and services to an offending state and other financial and commercial transactions as well as air and sea links. It also can restrict the activities of Canadians outside Canada when an organization or association of states calls for such measures. This is an important set of powers for the government in exercising international policy in this country.

The spokesperson for the Liberal Party has outlined some of his concerns with this bill. Frankly, at this stage we do not share some of those concerns. We certainly agree that Parliament needs to be consulted on every opportunity, but we note with interest that the bill does provide for consultation with Parliament by the provision under clause 7 for tabling of orders and regulations made under the bill within five sitting days of the House after they have been made and the filing of a motion on it and an opportunity for Parliament to debate it. It may well be that these provisions should be improved. That is what the committee process will be for and we will be addressing that.

We, of course, also agree with the general proposition that Parliament should be consulted in the process of decision-making wherever possible. In the case of economic sanctions, we do concede to the government the necessary authority to move as quickly as possible. We would not want any consultative process with Parliament to inhibit a government's opportunity to move as fast as possible when the circumstances require it. We will work that one out in committee and hopefully we can improve the bill there.

We have two or three other concerns which are relatively minor when compared with the over-all importance of this bill and we will discuss them when we get to committee. Perhaps I could simply flag them at this stage. The first has to do with a concern that the authority to the government to seize property of a national of a foreign state who does not ordinarily reside in Canada may impinge upon the rights of refugees and others who are legitimately here. We want to make sure that there is a very clear commitment from the government in the legislation, as part of the legislation, to ensure that appropriate rights of those who are resident in Canada are not infringed by the exercise of the government's authority here.

As well, there may be a concern and a need to have some mechanism for compensation to Canadian individuals or businesses adversely affected by economic sanctions imposed. Obviously in many cases that ought not to be required, but there may be appropriate cases where it is. We want the legislative committee to look at that.

Finally, we want to make sure that non-governmental organizations have some mechanism to continue to operate, again in appropriate circumstances, in a country which is the subject of sanctions under this legislation. There may be many in particular situations under which that is required and we want to make sure that is permitted and not inhibited by the legislation.

Having said that, let me now just turn to a brief discussion of the general bill itself and the reasons for our taking the position that we do in this particular case. International organizations and nations have a range of possible responses to breaches of international law under the United Nations charter. Governments and states can condemn, can call in ambassadors, can impose a series of steps short of actually putting serious hurtful pressure on a particular country. When those options do not work, it becomes necessary from time to time for the international community to act much more effectively. The two particular options which are often available are military sanctions—military action, military force—on the one hand or economic sanctions on the other.

As we have seen throughout history, frequently there are occasions when economic sanctions are far more effective and far more important than military sanctions and military action. There is a tendency, however, when governments have come equipped with large military forces for there often to be too quick a response by the use of military force than the more patient response that is needed in the use of economic sanctions.

When we look back on history we see that economic sanctions have frequently been very effective. This debate gives us an opportunity to reflect on that at a time that we are not dealing with a major and immediate crisis, although we have a number of important international issues on the table at this stage. I will get to those in a minute.

In a study which was published during the time of the gulf war and reported in a number of newspapers, including the New York Times, the Toronto Globe and Mail and Toronto Star, by Garry C. Hufbauer and Kimberly A. Elliott, two American specialists in the field, it was noted that in 1935–36 sanctions were applied by the League of Nations against Mussolini for his invasion of Ethiopia. The international community was then trying to force Italy to withdraw from Ethiopia.

In subsequent years that particular case has often been held up as a failure of sanctions. Yet a closer examination shows that sanctions were within a week of forcing Mussolini to back out of Ethiopia and he so confessed to Hitler at some subsequent point. We have an early example in the thirties of sanctions coming very close to working. If the international community had stuck to its position, we might have had a significant change in history during that period.

We have had the example in the early eighties of sanctions against Poland effectively changing the political decisions of that government so as to ease repression, to make economic changes which eventually triggered the changes that we see in Poland and in eastern Europe today.

Governments and states have used economic sanctions against dictators over the years: Trujillo in the Dominican Republic, Diem in Vietnam, Idi Amin in Uganda and Somoza in Nicaragua. In every case, sanctions often coupled with the threat of military action have produced the desired result. India in 1989 blockaded Nepal and forced changes there which have given at least some measure of democratic rights to the people of Nepal.

Of course we have the historic example of sanctions working against South Africa. Many countries avoided the sanctions against South Africa in a totally hypocritical and frankly illegal way. Still, with all of that, the sanctions imposed primarily through the Commonwealth and by other countries over a period of time eventually forced the government of South Africa to change its policies and to begin to bring that country back into the international community and to begin the process of change in South Africa.

We even saw the use of something as simple as a sport boycott having an enormous effect on the psychology and people of South Africa and eventually helping to create the conditions in that country so that relatively peaceful change could take place. In fact, South Africa may be an example where an invasion, the use of military force, would simply not work given the size of the minority white community. What was necessary was the long build-up of economic and psychological pressure on at least a significant portion of that minority to begin recognizing that change was absolutely vital. So we have seen that work there.

We see less effectiveness in Haiti. In fact, if the Government of the United States particularly would seize the assets of rich Haitians in the United States, we might begin to see the kind of change that is necessary in Haiti. Clearly, comprehensive, effective economic sanctions in Haiti are absolutely essential and should be fully supported and pressure kept up by the Canadian government.

This coming week or next week, the Secretary of State for External Affairs will be meeting the foreign minister of Indonesia, a country which has grossly violated the human rights of the people of East Timor. It will be very interesting to see how the government conveys the message there. Again, selective sanctions against Indonesia would be, in my view, absolutely essential at building the pressure on Indonesia to end its repression of the people of East Timor. The government has imposed a very, very limited boycott on certain sales and certain relations with Indonesia. It is interesting that it has not intervened against the sale of military products to Indonesia and has not done an effective job in calling for international sanctions against that country so that the people of East Timor may be restored their rights.

Let me conclude with a few comments on Iraq because it seems that the experience that the world community had last year on the issue of sanctions in Iraq is very important for studying how this bill not only is important, but the policies which should prevail when the government is considering the use of the powers provided for in this bill.

There is no doubt now that if sanctions had been allowed to work then, the Government of Iraq would have eventually had to withdraw from Kuwait. All of the information that was then available suggested that conclusion, and there is no reason to believe at this stage that anything other would have happened. It would have happened with far less human costs than the force that was occasioned upon the people of Iraq and the people of Kuwait.

It is very instructive that the underlying motive of the U.S. government for its pressing forward with the use of military force was the idea that really Saddam Hussein had to be driven out of office. We see now, over a year later, that Saddam Hussein is still the President of Iraq and it is the people of Iraq who have suffered as a result both of the actions of the Iraqi government and the precipitous use of military force instead of sanctions by the international community, including Canada and the United States.

Sanctions have continued against Iraq because it is said that Iraq has not fully complied with the United Nations resolutions, in particular the resolution requiring Iraq to pay certain war reparations and other bills.

The time has come for this and other governments to review their policy in respect of sanctions against Iraq because the people of Iraq are suffering grievously from the continued imposition of sanctions. I submit this government cannot agree to the continuation of sanctions for the simple purpose of trying to assure the re-election of George Bush as President of the United States. I may say President of the United Nations and some day it may not be such a slip as all that.

Last year the United States decided it wanted to have the UN flag to wrap around its tactics in Iraq. It was able to do so because of its strength internationally.

It is very clear that the government of the United States is still determined to drive Saddam Hussein out of office. It is prepared to use virtually any tactic it has at its disposal to do so. It has publicly boasted of the fact that it is sending the CIA in to try to organize other states in the area to achieve that policy objective.

No matter how objectionable the president of Iraq may be, it is still a breach of international law for one country to seek the removal from office of a leader of another country, particularly by assassination or other methods.

The continued imposition of economic sanctions at this stage against Iraq for that purpose is doubly objectionable. The overwhelming evidence coming out of Iraq is that it is the children of Iraq who are now suffering as a result of the imposition of sanctions.

It was interesting last year at the summit on children that the Prime Minister of our country said, and I quote: "The essential needs of children and families must be protected, even in times of war". Those words were included in the declaration jointly signed by the 71 world leaders including the Prime Minister of Canada.

If that is so, how does the international community and this government justify the continued punishment of the children and people of Iraq?

Over 110,000 children in Iraq are estimated to be malnourished, either moderately or severely and are at an increased risk of dying. Most of Iraq's children and a large portion of the people in Iraq are directly exposed to disease, starvation and a series of traumatic problems as a result of the difficulties imposed on that country.

The time has come for the world community now to review its use of sanctions in this particular case and to move on to the next chapter of history. I call on the government in these circumstances to move quickly in that direction and to give us those assurances.

I will conclude with this. Members of the defence committee of this House of Commons were in Europe in the last two weeks.

In the course of our visits there, we had an opportunity to go to Maldegem in Belgium where there is a cemetery containing the graves of over 1,000 young Canadian soldiers killed in that area during World War II.

It was a very moving experience for me to walk among the graves and see the names and ages of these young soldiers who lost their lives there very prematurely and very tragically and to see the references to spouses and children on the graves.

It was very easy for me as a Canadian to visualize what pain and agony they must have gone through and the pain and agony it cost their families.

As I reflected on this bill before us, I thought again of those in Iraq and Kuwait who lost their lives because of the premature use of military force there and the failure of the international community and of this government to give economic sanctions a chance to do the job.

I am heartened that the government has brought forward this bill. It will give the government and this country an opportunity in future conflicts to use economic sanctions as an alternative to war. It is something which we must all pledge ourselves to do.

This bill has our support and we urge the House to pass it.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have an opportunity to speak on this bill.

I am actually delighted that the government has put it on the floor of the House of Commons at this time. For the last three months I have been going through a personal experience that relates directly to this bill. I want to begin by giving a little bit of background on my interest in this bill specifically.

Last November I received a call from Michael Homsi, who is a constituent of mine in Broadview—Greenwood. He said: "Dennis, I have family who live in Amman, Jordan who have friends and family who are living in Baghdad. They are suffering deep pain right now and they wondered if there was some way that Canada could organize United Nations approval to ship food from Canada to Iraq". They did not want this food donated; they wanted to pay for this food. It was a commercial transaction.

Now I had never had any experience with anything like this, and quite frankly I did not know where to begin. Fortunately, this particular day one of my colleagues, the member from Burin—St. George's, was at the United Nations in New York.

He happened to call me on another matter and I explained this situation to him. Within hours he had the secretary to the sanctions committee of the United Nations call me. He explained to me the process whereby a nation gets a certificate of approval.

I called the Department of External Affairs, spoke to a certain gentleman there by the name of Marcel Belec. I must say I was impressed by his quick response and the support which he gave me in responding to this request for my constituent.

To make a long story short, within three days we received a certificate of approval. This certificate was from the United Nations and Canada. It is dated November 12, signed by Donald W. Campbell, deputy minister for international trade and the associate undersecretary of state for external affairs. He signed this certificate allowing us to send food from Canada to Iraq. I must tell you this is not a truckload of food; this is 40,000 tonnes of food. It is a lot of food.

It was conditional upon two things. The first condition was that the order would be monitored by the United Nations from the shipping routes, the distribution, the delivery system. It must be monitored by the United Nations.

The second condition was that the payment must be made by an irrevocable letter of credit to a Canadian chartered bank. That seemed pretty straightforward to me.

We faxed all of this information to the Embassy of Iraq in Amman, Jordan and then the process of delay began.

What happened as that process was going on was that I received requests from the Canadian Arab Federation and other people who had visited Iraq describing what was going on in that country. People were suffering.

I received letters, one from James Kafieh, president of the Canadian Arab Federation. I will just quote one passage: "It is crucial that you commit all your efforts to completing this approved transaction. Our federation also urges you to travel to the Middle East to investigate the most expeditious and efficient routes by which humanitarian relief may be brought to the innocent suffering in Iraq."

I have received letters from other people who are directly related on humanitarian missions. I received one just the other day from Harry Veldstra. He just got back from a mission with the Canadian Council of Churches. I will just give you two descriptions.

One is about a 10-year old boy with leukaemia: "The attending doctor told us that his leukaemia was easily treatable. He had only two or three days to live because the necessary medicines were not available. The best that the doctor could do for him was to make him as comfortable as possible".

A seven-month old baby girl weighed only 2.2 kilograms. She should weigh in at about 7.5 kilograms for her age. She had marasma or acute malnutrition. Her parents were farmers just outside Baghdad. They had no income at all because seeds and fertilizers were way beyond their ability to purchase.

I have always believed that Canada was a nation that measured its strength by the mouths we fed and the environment we protected. We are not a nation that measures our strength by our armaments or by our linkage to international bankers.

It seemed to me as I was going through this process that this was not the guiding principle. I travelled to Jordan about three weeks ago because, as I mentioned earlier, the process for implementing this order was not happening. The money was not being transferred.

We have virtually no frozen assets in this country. We have close to $2 million of frozen assets. That small amount of money basically keeps the Iraqi mission functioning in this country so that we have some form of communication.

When I travelled to Jordan to meet with the Homsi family, Muntasir Homsi, and other people who were there working trying to help the Iraqis to the best of their ability, I had the opportunity to meet with the chief commercial counsellor for the republic of Iraq based in Amman.

Quite frankly, I said to him: "What is the problem? We have the food. We have a letter of certificate here from the United Nations. We cannot seem to get your process of payment organized". He said to me: "Well, Mr. Mills, all of our assets are frozen all over the world. There have been some countries that have released their frozen assets in exchange for humanitarian assistance, food and medical supplies".

In North America the largest frozen assets we have are based in the United States. Those assets are in the billions of dollars. He asked me if Canada could see if the frozen assets that are in the United States could be released against this food order. I said I was not too sure that the United States government would release assets based in their country for this. I said I would return with that. But I said: "What if that fails?" He said: "We would be happy to barter oil for food". That seemed to me to be a reasonable approach. We barter many other items in several countries and we have over the years, in exchange for other services. Oil is no different from cash in many countries.

I returned with a letter from the Khaled Elmakhzoumi. He basically said: "We will order, not only that first 40,000 tonnes of food from Canada. We will give you an additional order for another 70,000 metric tons of food.

We ask you (a) to approach the Americans, the financial institutions of the states and; (b) if that is turned down, is there some way we can work on exchanging oil for food?".

In one sentence in this letter which is near the end, he said: "Although Canada was a member of the Allied forces, this assistance will help re-establish the warm feelings we have always held toward Canada".

Throughout the Middle East I heard repeatedly warm feelings expressed toward Canada. They see us as a country that is distinct from the United States of America. They want us to have our own foreign policy. Quite frankly, I would like us to have our own foreign policy as well. Right now I am a bit concerned that our foreign policy is basically: "Let us check with President Bush".

The member of the New Democratic Party talked about it being a Freudian slip in his speech earlier today when he said "President Bush, the president of the United Nations". We have to be very careful because there are a lot of people who think the United Nations is weighted just a little too heavily in terms of its direction from the United States.

Therefore, when my colleague, the member for Winnipeg South Centre, said in his speech earlier today that as we take this bill to committee and review all of the processes and when we talk about a new world order, we had better just look at all the various aspects of the United Nations and all the various options so that the United Nations can be reviewed and returned to the basic principle it has always had.

As a nation, we should never, ever waver in any way, shape or form from our support for the United Nations or we would never want to waver from a foreign policy that does not work under the umbrella within the realm of the United Nations.

I am not suggesting in any way that we stray from that umbrella, from that guideline, but it is not wrong for us as a nation to review the processes and the activities going on there now.

Getting back to this very fundamental situation here, we have an order from the government of Iraq for 140,000 metric tons of food, a commercial transaction. They are willing to have the order monitored from start to finish, including distribution. They do not have the cash, they only have oil and they want to deal directly. They do not want to accept the United Nation's offer of putting the oil through the United Nations. The sale of that oil would create funds that would be put into an escrow account at the United Nations and the United Nations would buy the food. They do not want to do that because they say that on that sale only two-thirds of the revenues would buy humanitarian supplies and one-third would go for compensation for the invasion of Kuwait. We are mixing the reparations formula with humanitarian aid.

I personally, at this moment, have to question this because if we had the cash here in Canada to pay for this food, we would probably release it because humanitarian assistance, food and medical supplies are exempt. The only form of currency, the only instrument that they have to organize a transaction is oil, they want to mix it with the reparations formula. The people who are paying the price while this debate is going on, while this stalemate is going on, are the people of Iraq, the children of Iraq.

We have a conundrum on our hands here. I do not think that we should mix the reparations formula with humanitarian assistance. I am not saying we should not have a reparations formula and I am not saying we should exempt Saddam Hussein and his operatives in any way, shape or form. That is not what I am saying. He must develop and they must have a reparations formula, but we should not make the people of Iraq the hostage of this.

We should go back to our basic character as a nation, a nation that measures its strength by the mouths we feed and the environment we protect. We are a nation that has always been in the business of saving lives. Right now we are letting the process stalemate us. In the stalemate those children are suffering. When we have a certificate of approval signed by this government, signed by the United Nations, we should figure out a way to get around that red tape and that reparations formula.

I have never ever faced such a difficult constituency case in my life because I do not want anyone to think that I am condoning the actions of Saddam Hussein. In no way, shape or form do I want people to think that I am not wise to the fact that the Iraqis are being political here, asking Canada to ask the U.S. to release funds. The bottom line is the humanitarian side of this and I do not know the answer to this question.

It is why I support my colleague, the member for Winnipeg South Centre, our critic for external affairs, who constantly reminds this House: "Let's go back to our basic character as a nation. Let's review Bill C-53 and analyse it in the filter so that it meets the values which all of our Canadian people want to have and want to project to the rest of the world". Hopefully, we can return to the image and prestige which Lester B. Pearson set for us so many years ago and that Pierre Trudeau carried on with and which are currently suspect.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I would like to salute the member who just spoke for his speech as the critic for the Liberal Party on external affairs.

I have a question for the member from Broadview. Two people have come to me about the Iraq war. One person is from Iraq. His mother is still there. He basically said: "David, Saddam Hussein is still in power. My mother has not been seen or heard of since the war started". As far as he is concerned she has been lost, she is in a wheel chair. Nothing has been accomplished by this war except for the spending of billions and billions of needed dollars, as our critic mentioned a moment ago.

A second person took two months' leave of absence from his work. He went to Iraq to help the Kurds. He came back later to Canada and, if I understand him correctly, found that external affairs in the Pearson Building had very little interest in learning what he had learned with the Kurds.

I wonder if you have any comments on either of those.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for the question.

Quite frankly, my experience with external affairs has been mysterious. Any time I ask for help they seem to always respond. They seem to write the letters. I met with the deputy the first day I got back, Deputy Minister Campbell, and he seemed to be of the spirit that he wanted to help and get involved in this issue, but quite frankly my own judgment is that he needs direction from the political will. Remember, our public servants only follow the direction of what goes on in this House.

I do not want to suggest that the officials in external affairs do not want to help. I believe that the foreign service of this country is one of the best foreign services in the world but right now I believe that our officials in external affairs are partially frustrated.

I went one step further on this case. I went to the Chief of Staff of the Prime Minister of Canada. I said: "What are you going to do with this, Mr. Segal? This is serious stuff. We are losing 2,000 to 3,000 kids a day when we could be doing something about it".

There is a spin-off alongside the humanitarian aspect of this, if I could be so mercenary. There is a trading opportunity here for Canada that is in the billions of dollars in all regions of the Middle East. I do not mind getting orders from Syria or Jordan, or getting orders to fill our factories and to put people back to work.

There is another whole aspect to this debate in that good will also creates an edge on other opportunities. There is a two-pronged attack. I presented this to Mr. Segal as late as last night and he said: "I think we should be doing something about this". I can only hope my greatest hope, that Mr. Segal takes this up with his boss, the Prime Minister of Canada, and that the Prime Minister of Canada returns to the good old days when Canada had its own foreign policy: We took the lead, we dared to do things differently, and what better way to begin that new foreign policy than with the kids of Iraq.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on this particular bill. We will support it. The bill is an act to provide for the imposition of special economic measures or, in more commonly used terms, sanctions.

Over the years our party has taken the position that sanctions are a more much effective tool for peace and for effective foreign policy than anything which might lead to the use of military force. We are talking about non-violent sanctions. Those can be defined as anything that will impose a cost on opponents or may change their behaviour but do not threaten human lives or cause physical injury.

Many of the approaches we have taken over the years as a country have not fallen into that category particularly, because we have in the end used sanctions that have done a considerable amount of harm to individuals mentally and physically.

The purpose of this bill is to improve the government's ability to impose a broad range of economic sanctions during or in anticipation of an international crisis. The sanctions suggested are much broader than are generally considered. As the minister indicated, the circumstances under which sanctions are now put into effect have changed considerably over the years. That is what the bill does.

What will this bill allow the government to do a little more thoroughly? Basically the proposed legislation would allow the government to apply measures such as the freezing of the assets in Canada that are held by another state, prohibiting or restricting the import and the export of goods and services, financial conversion transactions, air and sea links, plus restricting some activities of Canadians outside Canada.

Whenever a government applies such measures it allows the cabinet to put in place sanctions very quickly, without having to wait for an international organization such as the United Nations or the Organization of American States to make the basic decision.

• (1150)

In the past the Government of Canada has found it difficult to put sanctions in place because that authority has not been in place in any particular act. Only by the United Nations Act could it make that move, or it could do it specifically in certain areas. That has made it particularly awkward and therefore it was unable to act on its own. This bill will attempt to make it easier for the government to do so.

Even as we support the bill, we have some concerns and we have some reason to believe that there is a need to look very closely at particular parts of the bill. I hope this will be done during the committee process. I suppose we have a half-dozen concerns. Some of them are minor, but they are basically concerns which we think need to be discussed very thoroughly.

One of the suggestions or sanctions in this particular bill gives the government the authority to seize property or freeze property in the country. Apparently the intent of this is to freeze assets of someone like Marcos from the Philippines who may come to Canada or may have some assets in Canada. However, this has not always been the effect of the freezing of sanctions in the past and it may not be in the future. If a blanket suggestion like this is put in place, there is always someone who is going to be hurt.

The refugee who lives in Canada and has property in Canada or a business in Canada could be affected by such a freeze, if he still is a citizen of a foreign country on which Canada is going to impose sanctions.

There is another part of that particular sanction which I think is dangerous as well. We may wish to delete it to some extent or at least alter it to some extent in committee. I am referring to the ability of the government under these circumstances, if it puts sanctions in place, freezes property or seizes property, to sell portions of the property to pay for the cost of seizing and taking care of the property.

This is dangerous. I hesitate to draw a parallel between what happened to the Japanese in Canada in the last war, but there are some similarities. The property of almost all the Japanese who were forced to move away from the coast and into the central part of Canada was seized and sold. The reason for that was not because the people could not take care of the property but because of the greed of the people in the surrounding areas who wanted control of the property.

There was no national interest in the sale of the property. The sale of the property was done for reasons which were not of any value to Canada. That is not a particularly happy part of our history and it could be repeated in the circumstances which are in this particular bill. I do not think we would want that to happen.

The intent may be good, but I know this is not the reason it was put there. It should be looked at to make sure that it does not happen to hurt not only our people but people from all over the world.

This is not an unusual situation. We will find, without question, numbers of examples where people are returned to their homes and find that the property they once owned has been confiscated by a government, sold for costs which the government says it had, and is no longer available to those people. That is highly unfair and highly unacceptable in our kind of democracy.

There is a second section that we should look at very closely, and that is the section on compensation within this bill, subclause 6(3). This is compensation of citizens or people who are adversely affected by sanctions. Since the reason for putting sanctions in place is to affect a whole nation adversely, there are bound to be effects which are going to overlap into the areas of our citizenship or people we do not want to hurt.

The legislation in this area is very tentative. The Governor in Council may designate a minister to deal with claims. If cabinet overlooks this action, drags its feet, many of our citizens will be hurt or bear the brunt of there being nothing in this particular bill which will allow them to apply for compensation. There is no sort of automatic review of the idea that compensation may be necessary.

I can give a very specific example. When the United States put sanctions on the sale of grain to the Soviet Union after the invasion of Afghanistan, Canada under the Clark government of that particular time acquiesced and went along with it. In 1980 the Trudeau government also acquiesced to that particular request—and that is all it was—of the U.S. government to put in place the same sanction.

Canada in that particular circumstance, because of single desk selling and because we had control of the grain that was sold out of Canada, was the only country able to police the sanction in such a way that there was no grain sold. The United States, for instance, sold to other countries and then it was diverted to the Soviet Union. It was a very surprising fact during that particular period of time, for instance, that Italy became a net exporter of wheat to the Soviet Union. Most of that wheat came from the United States and was transshipped to the Soviet Union. Much of it was not even unloaded in Italy.

Under those circumstances the price of wheat went down about $1 or $1.50 per bushel. Canadian farmers were the only people who were impacted by the United States sanctions on the Soviet Union. At the time I was the spokesman for grains and oilseeds for my party.

• (1200)

I and other members of the opposition, at that time the Conservative opposition, spent a year and one-half badgering the Trudeau government to pay some compensation because there was no automatic method by which compensation could be requested.

It came through eventually, but the process was very painful and it put our farmers at a disadvantage for a couple of years. They still have not recovered from that entirely.

Perhaps this bill should be made more specific. Instead of saying that the Governor in Council may appoint a minister, the bill probably should say the Governor in Council shall appoint a minister whose responsibility it will be to oversee compensation for sanctions when they affect Canadian citizens or other citizens of the world.

I have a couple of other major concerns which I would like to spend a little bit of time on.

Sanctions may bring a country to realize the error of its ways, if that is what is intended, but it is a two-edged sword. When economic sanctions are used, a cost may be imposed on the opponent, but there is also a cost imposed on the user of the sanctions. There may also be considerably greater costs to innocent bystanders. If there is a full international embargo on any particular country, then there are bound to be certain bystanders affected.

I think we need to look at those innocent bystanders and who they are. As a number of previous speakers have indicated, the best examples that we have right now probably are the starving Iraqi children and the situation with the Kurds which are results of the war in Iraq.

We know that the effect of economic sanctions on Iraq has resulted in the starvation of many children. That needs to be considered when those sanctions are extended.

I agree with the previous speaker, the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood, who suggested that there are ways in which sanctions can be kept, but humanely.

In the particular case of Iraq, Eric Hoskins, who is a Canadian physician who participated in the Harvard study group that was formed to look at the impact on Iraqi civilians, has urged the Canadian government to use some of the frozen Iraqi assets to purchase food and medicine for the Iraqi population.

The British have already done this. They have effectively released some food and medicine by using frozen assets which the Iraqi had in Britain.

It becomes very important to understand that that kind of sanction can do much more harm than we realize it will do.

So just to summarize, we will support the bill.

But we recognize a number of weaknesses that must be dealt with in committee. The weakness of compensation must be dealt with as well as the lack of a humanitarian base always being in place when sanctions are put in place.

We are not happy with the idea that only cabinet can make the decision as to when sanctions can be put in place. It must be a much broader base than it has been in the past.

We will support the bill but we hope that during committee these changes will be put into effect.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make some comments about this bill that would impose sanctions against certain countries. I wonder why the government, at this point, brings forward such a bill.

As we know, during the debate on the gulf crisis the government was saying very forcefully that sanctions do not work. This was one of the arguments when they wanted to go to war. They said: "Sanctions are not working and if we do not act fast, the children of Iraq are going to suffer and the population of Iraq is going to suffer".

We know what happened. We went to war. More bombs were thrown on Iraq and Kuwait than during World War II. It brought about the destruction of Kuwait. It brought in ecological damage to the Persian Gulf and today the children in Iraq are starving. The Kurds have been displaced. There is tremendous human suffering because at that time the government said: "Sanctions do not work".

I am quite proud that I voted against that war because it did not solve the problem, it just aggravated the problem.

Suddenly, the government, in the name of a new world order as proclaimed by President Bush, now says: "We want you to give us carte blanche so we can impose sanctions when we wish."

This bill is flawed. The government does not need carte blanche. If it wants to impose sanctions against any nation, it can go back to Parliament and get a mandate to impose sanctions.

I do not see many members on the other side who are going to speak to this bill. Most of them have said that sanctions are not effective and that is why we had to go to war to bring a fast resolution to the conflict in the gulf.

I listened to a member of the Liberal Party who was indicating why it is very difficult to have sanctions and then bring humanitarian help.

If we freeze the assets of a country like Iraq and it wants to buy grain from Canada and it cannot use that money to feed the starving population, what is the use of having these types of sanctions?

Therefore, I cannot support this bill. If it is amended in an extreme form, then maybe I would, but I doubt it. The bill is flawed. At the present time the government does not need a bill like this. If there is ever a crisis it can always come back to Parliament and ask Parliament to impose sanctions against a given population.

• (1210)

I would also like to draw attention to what the previous speaker said about the confiscation of assets of Japanese-Canadians during World War II and how those assets were disposed of. It certainly brought injustice to those people who were Canadians. It shows that if there is a bill that gives the government carte blanche, it is not going to be in the best interests of Canada.

I just wanted to make that comment and maybe ask a question to the previous speaker.

I know that the New Democratic Party did not support the war in the gulf. They felt that we should proceed with sanctions. He just told us that they are going to support the bill, maybe not in its present form, but they are going to support it, whatever the end result is.

How can he square his position that gives the government carte blanche to impose sanctions against any nation by Order in Council? How does he find that acceptable?

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, we would all have to say that we could not support the Bush administration position during the Iraqi war that the sanctions were not going to work. Those sanctions were pre-empted after only five and one-half months, whereas we know that sanctions do take longer than that. That pre-emption of those sanctions was a mistake.

If the objective of the sanctions was the withdrawal of the Iraqis from Kuwait, it is my feeling and the feeling of many other people across the world that the reason the Bush administration withdrew or pre-empted those sanctions was not because they were afraid they would not work. They were afraid they would work.

Their aim in this particular Iraqi war was not necessarily Kuwait. It was the smashing of the Saddam Hussein government and if sanctions worked, then they would not be able to do that. In the end it did not work either way.

To answer your question specifically, we have hope that any government that will be in place will look at the need for sanctions. We hope there will be enough safeguards within the bill when we get it back to the House that we can be sure that what is done is for the best interests of Canada and not for the best interests of the Bush administration.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the yeas have it.

I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee E.

ENERGY EFFICIENCY ACT

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) moved that Bill C–41, an act respecting the energy efficiency of energy using products and the use of alternative energy sources, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee D.

He said: Madam Speaker, prior to starting my comments I want to indicate to my critics opposite that if I leave and do not listen to them, it is not that I would want to leave but I have to host the President of Moldova for lunch. I hope that is understood if I slip away.

I am pleased to be leading off second reading debate on Bill C–41, the energy efficiency act. It is a major challenge facing a government in that it is to find methods of improving energy efficiency across the Canadian economy. By being energy efficient, Canadian consumers can reduce energy expenditures and businesses can become more competitive. Moreover, being energy efficient helps to improve air quality, to preserve water and land resources, and to reduce greenhouse gas emissions.

Of particular concern to many countries is the concentration in the atmosphere of greenhouse gases and their potential to affect the climate. The federal government's strategy to address the global issue is outlined in the green plan. Reflecting the nature of our federation and jurisdictional responsibilities, federal, provincial and territorial governments are working co–operatively to develop a national action strategy on global warming.

I want to commend the standing committee on energy, its chairman as well as the members of that committee. I appeared before them earlier this week and we had a discussion on this issue. They have been doing a lot of work and I look forward to their findings.

Improved energy efficiency is one of the more important components of the strategy. However, governments, both federal and provincial, alone cannot solve this problem. Individuals and organizations need to re–examine how we use energy and there is much room for improvement. Using energy more efficiently is an important first step. To help Canadians use energy more wisely, we have brought forward Bill C–41 for Parliament's consideration, and I use those words "Parliament's consideration" in the best of parliamentary tradition because it is in this area where we can get new ideas and where we can improve on the type of legislation that we are bringing before Parliament that I think can be improved through committee work.

I am convinced that there are many economic opportunities at all levels of Canadian society to be more efficient, especially in the manner in which we use energy. We want to seize these opportunities, opportunities which will benefit both the environment and the economy. Provincial governments, industry associations, community groups and individuals across Canada have already started putting into place promising solutions to our energy efficiency challenges.

I have been particularly struck by the way Canada's electricity supply sector has taken up demand–side management. For example, a few months ago I saw an agreement regarding my department's participation in the activities of Power–Smart Incorporated. This agency was established by B.C. Hydro to assist in the development and delivery of demand side management. Its membership, since those days when I met with them first in Vancouver, has expanded over the years. It now includes 15 Canadian utilities as well as my department. We are now working with Power–Smart and our fellow members on the details of an even further co–operative promotional plan.

Our participation in this enterprise emphasizes our commitment to energy efficiency. It also stresses our conviction to work in partnership to achieve those goals. Bill C–41 is another clear signal of the government's commitment to efficient use of energy. The principle function of the energy efficiency act is to provide the statutory authority for the new efficiency and alternative energy program which was announced in the green plan which we discussed in committee earlier this week.

This program will involve all fuel types in energy using sectors of the economy. It will provide focused support for each sector through initiatives employing targeted information programs, persuasion, regulation and research and development. These initiatives will have net environmental and net economic benefits. Environmentally they will reduce all of the major atmospheric emissions associated with energy use, including those that contribute to acid rain and urban smog. Moreover, by deferring the construction of new energy production and transportation facilities, these initiatives will also result in less degradation of land and water quality.

• (1220)

Additionally the federal initiatives will help strengthen the Canadian economy. This strengthening will result by encouraging investment in energy efficiency and alternative energy technologies.

Canadian consumers who consider energy efficiency more carefully when making their purchasing decisions will be able to reduce their annual energy costs, thereby freeing some of their income for other uses.

Additionally Canadian industry can lower its energy costs, raise productivity and improve its international competitiveness. Furthermore, there is a growing international interest in competitive products as well as technologies and services offering energy efficiency or employing alternative energy sources.

Canadian companies responding to increased domestic demand for such products and services will also gain international opportunities to expand those markets.

Let me give you an example, Madam Speaker, because a lot of this can become very theoretical. An excellent example, I think, of how energy efficiency can benefit the economy is the recent announcement by General Electric (Canada) that it will invest $144 million in its plant at Oakville, Ontario. It is going to do that to supply two new energy efficiency lighting products.

Often we hear about obsolescence in our manufacturing base. This is a reversal, and I think a very happy synergy between the economy and the environment. This new manufacturing capacity will serve a world market, and it is expected that half the production will be exported from our country.

As a result of this investment, 190 new jobs will be created. An example of the area of energy efficiency services, for example, that shows that we can even go beyond products or tangible items for export sales is that we now have membership from Mexico and Czechoslovakia in Power–Smart. The opportunities for job creation and world markets are there, and it is gratifying to see companies seizing these opportunities.

Our new package of initiatives is designed to be prudent. We hope it is balanced and we think it is co–operative. It is directed at overcoming the barriers obstructing the realization of economic opportunities to increase the efficiency of energy use and the utilization of alternative energy sources in Canada. It will involve all fuel types and energy using sectors in the economy.

Members, I am sure, will be interested in knowing that over the next few weeks I will be making announcements again relating to efficiency and alternative energy program initiatives that came from the green plan.

Many hon. members will know as well that I announced in October the three initiatives directly related to the energy efficiency act. They are energy efficiency standards for equipment, Energuide labelling and the national energy use data base.

In November I announced five initiatives aimed at encouraging a more energy efficient building industry in Canada. I have had a lot of meetings with the Canadian Home Builders' Association as well as some provincial organizations. For example, the building energy code initiative will update and rename the federal government's measures for energy conservation in new buildings. When this is complete, we will look to provincial and municipal governments to incorporate these measures in their building codes.

The building information transfer initiative will support increased public and housing industry awareness of the value of energy efficiency. One of the most successful programs, the R–2000 program, is a R–2000 partnership initiative which will upgrade the current R–2000 standard, give greater recognition of environmental consideration and increase market penetration through regional partnerships with governments and utilities.

I will just spend a moment on this, Madam Speaker. The R–2000 licensing program has now been arranged with Japan for building products in Japan. Generally we as Canadians think that we do not have the same technology levels as the Japanese. On R–2000, it is the opposite. We have brought the R–2000 program to Japan.

I can say, and I do not want to be too parochial, but manufacturers of windows and doors in my own area, in my riding and in my own province are using the R–2000 factor and are now starting to penetrate the Japanese market. It is slow work, it is expensive to get into the market, but the R–2000 seems to have helped, almost like a seal of Good Housekeeping for those markets.

Additionally our enhanced buildings research, development and technology transfers activities, such as the advanced houses programs, will focus on lab testing, field trials and the transfer of technology to the building sector. I have announced that there are nine winners of innovative housing across the country in which we are going to bring additional technology and hopefully use in it a demonstration in different technologies, different climates, different regions and that they will be transferred to the housing sector as well.

All of this is being done co–operatively with the housing industry and not independently by government alone. As well, through the federal buildings initiative, EMR will assist the federal government departments to improve the energy efficiency of their facilities without compromising the work environment of employees.

I want to thank my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, who is here today. I am sure he came just to hear me say this. So often in government we are frustrated by the fact that we can get a practical idea and it seems that the system just does not allow us to implement a practical idea. We went to Treasury Board and to Ontario Hydro and we said: "Here is a deal that you cannot refuse".

In my experience that generally does not get you very far. They find a reason to refuse you. The deal was this to Treasury Board. We will do an energy audit, and we have done an energy audit, of some 1,600 federal government buildings. I am not trying to be partisan about this. When there was a change of government in the province of Ontario, it mandated Ontario Hydro to do it for the Ontario government buildings because of the success we are having here.

Then what we did was this. We said to Treasury Board: "You are giving us x number of dollars per year for energy in these buildings. Keep us at this level of expenditure. We will bring in energy efficiency and the saving. We will work with a consulting company and with that saving we will pay back the costs of the new installations".

Coming from a very practical world, in which I live, I thought that made a lot of sense. I want to thank the President of the Treasury Board today. Since we presented the idea, they have only been co–operative. Despite rumours to the contrary, they can work with great alacrity and speed and I want to thank them.

Madam Speaker, I will speak about your throne in a minute because that is also part of this program. That will come a little later in my notes.

That is in the buildings area. I think it is innovative and it is working. We can transfer that also into industry.

As well, in December I announced two new alternative transportation fuel measures. The technology and market department component will expand the use of gaseous and alcohol fuel through incentives, market demonstrations, technology transfers and information assistance. The second measure will support research and development to increase progress in the fields of liquid and gaseous fuels and electrically based technologies.

I cannot make these announcements on behalf of my colleague the Minister of Transport, but I direct my colleagues in the House to the press today. As you will see, there has been further advancement made in this field by the ministry of transport. They will want to announce it in a more formal way than simply through the press.

The principal function of Bill C–41 is to provide the statutory authority for the federal energy efficiency initiatives related to energy labelling, minimum energy efficiency standards and collection of statistics and information.

With regard to labelling and energy efficiency standards, the bill will facilitate enhancement of the existing Energuide, a labelling program which applies to refrigerators, ranges, ovens, freezers, dishwashers, clothes dryers and washers. The program requires that new appliances bear a specified label providing information on a product's energy efficiency which consumers can use to make the most energy-wise purchasing decision. Bill C-41 will transfer statutory authority for the Energuide program and its regulations from Consumer and Corporate Affairs to EMR Canada, thereby bringing the program under the umbrella of the efficiency and alternate energy program. This will simplify the regulatory and consultative process through which we will update, expand and enhance the Energuide program.

One enhancement will be the redesigning of the label to one that will be easier to read and comprehend. In addition, stronger promotional campaigns will encourage consumers to buy the most energy efficient equipment on the market.

Research and development initiatives under our program will result in more energy efficient products coming on to the market. Minimum efficiency standards will reinforce this improvement by removing inefficient items from the marketplace. In fact, in the right circumstances new products and processes have significant export value. We discussed that as well in the committee recently this week.

While minimum energy efficiency standards will be new at the federal level, in recent years B.C., Ontario along with federal and some state governments in the U.S., have established energy efficiency regulations on several products. Quebec and Nova Scotia have passed enabling legislation in this area and other provinces are considering taking similar actions.

What was developing was a patchwork of energy efficiency standards. Inconsistent standards could prove to be very detrimental. For example, we were seeing that some provinces were becoming dumping grounds for the continent's most inefficient products. In other words, you cannot sell an inefficient product in a jurisdiction that now has passed regulations or legislation, and so it was being made available in other provinces. As well, interprovincial trade could be impaired. It is for these reasons that we are coming in with a national bill.

Consequently there have been requests from both the provinces, the territories, not to mention industry—industry has been very much a part of this—that the federal government exercise its constitutional authority over interprovincial and international commerce in order to help establish a consistent national energy efficiency regulatory regime. This need to avoid interprovincial trade barriers was another point underlined as well in the Porter study on Canadian competitiveness.

Such regulatory action will only be taken following even more consultation with affected parties. Such regulations will be developed so as to avoid unnecessary costs to manufacturers and to facilitate co-ordination with provincial authorities. They will be developed with due regard to Canada's international trade obligations as well as industry's concern that it not be placed in an uncompetitive position.

We will be seeking consistency with standards in provincial and American jurisdictions, and the federal regulatory process ensures that Canadians have the opportunity to comment on these draft regulations.

Part II of Bill C-41 concerns the collection and use of statistics pertaining to the efficiency of energy use and the adoption of alternative energy sources. In the formulation of energy efficiency and alternate energy policy, we have been conscious of our responsibility to evaluate the effectiveness of measures included in that policy and to measure the contribution of energy users to the goal of stabilizing greenhouse gas emissions.

We also wanted to create a solid foundation for possible further measures, not only in terms of facilitating their implementation, but with regard to optimizing their design as well. Furthermore, we knew that in order for Canadians to respond effectively to the threat of global warming we would need to know more about how we use energy in this country.

Both Statistics Canada and EMR have been collecting statistics on the energy industry for some years. My Alberta friends will know this better than most. The focus of these efforts has been at the aggregate level or the financial information. There has been some modest collection of information on energy at the end use level and on alternative sources of energy. This has been done mainly outside of government and the available data are sparse.

In discussing the need for satisfactory data in this area, both departments felt it would be more efficient and expeditious for EMR to pursue the matter as long as every effort was made to avoid duplication and obviously this information was to be made public. Consequently, our new efficiency and alternative energy program provides for the creation of a national energy use data base which will integrate existing sources of data on energy use and develop and organize new data sources.

We will also seek a clearer understanding of the factors that influence the level of energy usage and what influences companies and householders in their decisions to adopt or ignore certain types of energy using technologies. Again, this will be carried out with Statistics Canada.

We hope that most of the data and information we require can be obtained from existing data bases held by StatsCanada and others from voluntary surveys. If this approach proves inadequate, the Energy Efficiency Act will provide the authority to ensure that necessary information is obtained.

In undertaking any of our regulatory activities we will be conscious of the fact that regulation is a policy tool which, I believe, must be used in moderation. So often it is so easy to say that we will pass another regulation. We will control people by doing this.

I feel comfortable about this bill because in looking at the regulatory side we had a lot of consultations. I wanted to have consultations with consumers and industry because if it is simply another barrier to competitiveness then we have to look at that as well. We have taken full account of these considerations and our regulator initiatives, we believe, are effective and efficient in advancing those objectives we have, because to intervene in the marketplace is a decision which I believe should not be taken lightly. It should be taken very seriously.

Wherever possible, we have sought to reduce the amount of regulation in the country in order to eliminate unnecessary burdens, in order to eliminate those on industry, small business and the public. I can say very definitely that if industry and consumers alike had not wanted to move in this direction, I would have had some serious reservations. Therefore, we have been painstaking in considering their advice. We have been doing this also with utilities and we have structured these authorities which we are now creating under Bill C-41.

By reconsidering how we use energy and by making more informed and responsible choices, we can save money, help the environment and at the same time demonstrate leadership to the international community in its efforts to come to grips with the issue of global climate change.

Like any organization, the federal government is an energy consumer, subject to the same energy efficiency challenges as other Canadians. Within the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, as I have pointed out, we now have a program known as the Federal Buildings Initiative. In fact, Madam Speaker, I know you will remember from the Speaker's office that we demonstrated to you and to the press, the economic, low cost energy options that have been adopted here in this House.

Together with my colleague the Minister of Public Works, we toured the ceremonial walk which is taken by the Sergeant-at-Arms, pointing out the energy efficiency lighting, the retrofit possibilities. In concert with Public Works and Ontario Hydro, we will follow up these possibilities as well as look at the energy efficiency options for Parliament Hill's long-term energy management needs.

When we were in this Chamber the Speaker sat down in the Speaker's chair and pointed out that the lighting is now changed. I know, Madam Speaker, that this would never apply to you, but he thought that while it might not help in the ability for him to again find the hair he lost—I know you do not have that problem—he thought the lighting was an improvement.

We are trying to be very practical in this place and show very clearly and demonstrate very clearly what we are doing.

In all of these issues there is an overriding consideration. Often Canadians will use the argument or hear the argument made that Canada uses more energy than any other country and, therefore, by extension we are profligate.

An hon. member: Because it is colder.

Mr. Epp: My hon. friend calls from across the House, because it is cold here.

I want to relate a small incident I had when I attended my first—

• (1240)

Mr. Kindy: Because it's cold. You spend a lot of time in Florida.

Mr. Epp: You might, but I can't.

At the first meeting of the International Energy Agency the minister from Sweden happened to be the minister of the environment and of energy. She took Canada on fairly strongly about our profligate ways. As you know, we all defend our country when we are abroad, and I asked officials for the statistics from her country. When I had the chance to intervene I said: "Madam Speaker, I see that your unit use is not much less than Canada's, and might I suggest it has more to do with latitude than attitude".

I think sometimes we as Canadians want to put ourselves almost in sackcloth and ashes. The fact of the matter is that we have a large country. We have a northern climate. We have a sparse population. And so it is in that context that I have to look at these bills as well.

Additionally we also have abundant energy and as a result we have moved into industries which utilize that abundance of energy. It creates jobs; it creates quality of life.

I fully accept as minister of energy that we have to be more energy efficient but we should not fall into the trap, or hear the siren call that I hear so often that all you have to do is regulate people and force change and behavioural change upon them and all these things will change. The fact of the matter is that if you look today at the press, the first half of Question Period often drives the opposition by "why are you losing these industries, why are these jobs lost, why are these towns closing?"

Mr. Edmonston: Because of the GST, because of the GST.

Mr. Epp: The second half is exactly the argument. I hear my colleague from Quebec. I know he knows a lot about lemons and I guess that is why he keeps repeating what he says. As a result, I say to him that the issue has to be balanced, it has to be balanced between the objectives of the environment and the economy.

That is the job of the Minister of Energy. I have said that that will be my objective. I believe this bill is balanced, balanced between those two objectives, helping Canadian industry, helping Canadian consumers, and moving us in a direction which will help our competitiveness.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, I only wish things were as simple as we have just heard from the minister of energy. As he has indicated, and I would appreciate him doing so earlier when he leaves for his lunch, but perhaps he would prefer to leave now rather than when I get going because I do not think he is going to like what I say very much and I suspect he is not going to like very much what the critic for the New Democratic Party has to say about this bill.

Mr. Epp: I'd rather stay.

Mr. Kilgour: The bill opts for a regulatory rather than a common sense approach, presumably to foster an impression among Canadians, of whom I note that 11 per cent today indicate they would be prepared to support the re-election of this government. My question is, who are these 11 per cent of Canadians? I would like to talk to them.

The intention is to foster the impression that the government wants to achieve substantial energy savings. Federal officials are to be given the right to inspect any electric appliance shipped across our border. If they find something, for example, a furnace or a toaster that is deemed to waste energy, they will under the bill have the right to confiscate and destroy it at the former owner's expense.

It is the Income Tax Act model which, in many respects, still implies that the citizen and his or her property belong to the government, instead of vice versa. It rather reminds you of a visit to the former East Germany before the Berlin Wall came down.

Instead of a law which mirrors existing American ones, which years ago prompted the manufacture of energy-efficient appliances, thus of course causing the dumping of electricity guzzling ones in Canada, our minister of energy is only now attempting to close the barn door.

It might look quite good if one is unaware of our energy waste realities. In fairness to the bill, regulations would phase out some inefficient equipment from the Canadian market, but as Friends of the Earth put it in a letter recently to my office: "According to the Ontario ministry of energy the federal act as proposed has an import loophole. The focus on dealer means that an individual importing an energy using product for his or her own use, that is not for resale, is exempt from the act".

If that view of Friends of the Earth is correct, the bill is even more toothless than one might have supposed. The regulatory approach invariably will create other problems including predictable side effects.

For example, in a fairly recent brief to the Standing Committee on Energy, Mines and Resources, the Canadian Electrical Association gave the example of the recently amended requirement for Ontario building contractors to submit bids for non-profit housing contracts on the basis of lowest first cost. This encouraged the use of electric baseboard heating, the least efficient and economical choice from available heating systems. Is that not official madness from an energy efficiency standpoint?

In the same brief the Electrical Association provided some striking examples of regulatory barriers that discourage innovative approaches to developing new environmentally benign technologies.

Public utilities across Canada today are still barred by government regulations from permitting a joint government-industry-utility technology demonstration developed in one jurisdiction to be brought into the rate base of utilities outside that jurisdiction. Short lead time projects are favoured over longer lead time projects which may be more energy efficient.

The bill we are discussing aims at achieving energy savings in the residential sector. However, I quote from the government's 1990 discussion paper entitled Energy Use and Atmospheric Change: "The equipment initiatives (and these include commercial, institutional and industrial equipment, not only household appliances) are expected to account for about 25 per cent of total energy savings in the year 2000". The same study estimates that about 28 per cent of total energy savings by the year 2000 could be achieved through transportation initiatives and 27 per cent through industry initiatives.

Moreover, within the equipment initiatives, and I quote from the same source, "the largest simple impact on energy use is projected to result from the increase in the energy efficiency of residential and commercial lighting".

The bill before us is entirely silent on this issue. Yet it has become common knowledge that compact fluorescent lamps consume 75 per cent to 85 per cent less electricity than do incandescent ones and last nine to thirteen times longer than ordinary bulbs.

Why the deafening silence? According to Rocky Mountain Institute calculations, efficient lighting hardware now available for almost any application would reduce in the U.S. the need for about 70 billion to 120 billion watts of power plants. Those plants would cost from $85 billion to $200 billion to build and from $18 billion to $30 billion a year to operate.

Road transport accounts for 30 per cent of Canada's energy use currently and almost 70 per cent of our total petroleum requirements. In all industrialized countries the energy gobbled up by transport exceeds that going to the residential and service sectors together. Instead of targeting the residential sector, any responsible energy efficiency act, which this one in my view clearly is not, should target the users who consume and pollute the most.

Besides, as pointed out by Friends of the Earth, the federal act as proposed only applies to "energy using products". That means that products which do not use energy but affect energy efficiency such as doors, windows and so on are not covered by the act.

The need and obligation to collect data and improve knowledge on the activities of every sector of our economy by appropriate federal institutions cannot really be questioned today. Therefore, the inclusion of the national energy use data base section in the proposed act surprises one, to say the least. Is the government telling Canadians that it intends to find out in the foreseeable future what is actually going on in our country's energy sector, or does it really want to equip its energy department offices with a brand new computer system with more borrowed tax dollars?

Isn't the collection of statistics on energy use a fundamental duty and routine procedure of the federal department responsible for the energy policy of this country? Its inclusion in the energy efficiency act tends to demolish any notion of competence of this government on energy matters.

At the heart of the debate on energy efficiency conservation and alternative energy sources is the widespread public concern about our natural environment. The effects of intensive energy consumption take the form of acid rain, smog, global warming, depletion of the ozone layer, toxic waste disposal, and so on. The burning of carbon based fossil fuel still accounts for most of Canada's energy production.

Our energy consumption is expected to double by the year 2020 which raises the question as to whether such growth can continue unchecked.

Improved energy efficiency is the cheapest and fastest way to better our energy consumption patterns. Efficiency improvements are estimated to be about seven times more effective in reducing CO_2 emissions per dollar invested than other methods. A policy of active conservation based on the deliberate development of new technologies is a viable alternative to supply side policies aimed at increasing our output of energy. Conservation is by the way also more labour intensive.

Making houses in our constituencies more energy efficient, upgrading lighting equipment in offices, installing more efficient motors all provide new employment for skilled Canadians and create demand for equipment and supplies.

Despite all its Reaganomics rhetoric and extensive deregulation of energy prices in trade since 1985, this federal government continues to intervene in our energy market most notably through subsidies to energy megaprojects and oil and gas exploration.

The government is also a friend of our nuclear industry through regulations, tax policies and very generous yearly subsidies. Meanwhile, programs in conservation and alternative energy sources have been eliminated or cut down since 1984. Subsidizing some types of energy supply production while cutting back subsidies to energy conservation distorts the competitiveness of energy options and increases the negative environmental impact of federal energy policy.

Conservation and alternative energy sources came into sharp focus during the 1970s when unstable political conditions in the Middle East resulted in oil price shocks felt around the world. Oil supply disruptions and price hikes were again experienced in 1979 as a result of the Iranian revolution. The problem reappeared with the invasion of Kuwait by Iraqi soldiers on August 2, 1990.

Consequently one of the major concerns among Canadian energy conservers in our alternative energy industry as a whole has been the "disgraceful" neglect and declining levels of support for Canada's alternative energy program since the unloved Mulroney government came into office in 1984.

The development of significant new energy sources normally takes decades to accomplish. Research cannot be turned on and off from one fiscal year to the next without doing great harm to research efforts. Because of the long lead times for introducing innovations and the long response time of the energy system, decisions taken today will have their full effect only in decades afterwards.

The Tory funding of energy conservation and renewable energy activities has shrunk from about $500 million in 1984 to $30 million in 1990–91. The modest expenditure contrasts sharply with the huge assistance to our nuclear industry, for example. In other words this government spends much more promoting expensive energy supply options than cheaper conservation options, which is economically and environmentally irrational. They call this Tory economics.

In 1984 the government initiated its cutbacks with the elimination of the energy division of the National Research Council that was conducting research into solar, wind and fusion energy, hydrogen, and other forms of renewable energy. In the budget cuts announced in April 1989, only six months after being re-elected, the government shut down its branch offices in the provinces that provided information and grants for energy conservation and renewable initiatives. This was a pretty clear signal that the federal government was no longer committed to the prudent use of energy or interested in searching for new and innovative ways of keeping energy costs down.

The Conservation and Renewable Energy Office helped get funding for the Flair Homes Energy Demo that has helped give Winnipeg, which is close to the riding of the Minister of Energy, a reputation for being a centre of excellence in housing technology throughout North America. This has attracted the attention of building scientists from around the entire world.

The closure of the regional offices reinforced the trend away from conservation that has been present in other policy measures by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources since 1984.

Valuable programs to advise industries on how to reduce energy consumption, to inform consumers about the energy efficiency of home appliances, to assist people to insulate their homes were all discarded. Our lack of improvement in recent years in energy use per capita can probably be attributed directly to the abandonment of energy efficiency programs in the mid to late 1980s.

A recent study done jointly by Friends of the Earth, Pollution Probe and the World Wildlife Fund entitled The Summit Environmental Accountability Project concluded that our progress has not only been poor in energy efficiency but also in CO_2 emissions over the past five years. In 1990 the Government of Canada made a commitment to stabilize its emissions of CO_2 at 1990 levels by the year 2000, and I am pleased that the minister reconfirmed that the other day before the energy committee.

The government's specific plan of action in the green plan very much appears to be still unclear months after it was announced and the proposed programs are inadequate to stabilize emissions. The green plan's original $5 billion budget has been slashed to $3 billion, and it would very much appear that it will be slashed even further. Absent from it is a comprehensive set of regulations and measures necessary for a significant reduction in CO_2 emissions.

We Canadians could partially meet the stabilization targets through energy efficiency and conservation measures alone, but the government has simply not taken any substantive steps in that direction, nor has it estimated the cost of its CO_2 emission abatement strategy. In fact CO_2 emissions dropped by 27 per cent in the early 1980s but over the past eight years have increased by approximately 8 per cent. This is once again, partly at least, the result of federal government cuts to programs which would help Canadians generally to loosen the iron bond of oil.

The move away from energy conservation and efficiency is typical of Tory policy. In October 1989 the transport minister announced VIA Rail cuts that additionally hurt efforts to reduce CO_2 emissions. Rail transport is more environmentally benign than cars, but government made severe cuts to the service before considering the environmental implications. An environmental assessment document released after the decision had been announced was simply shelved.

Moving away somewhat from fossil fuels means that Canadians will have to choose between nuclear and renewable sources of power. In spite of all of the tax moneys directed over the years at nuclear power, we have not yet solved the problem of radioactive pollution generated at each stage of the nuclear fuel chain from uranium mining, milling, refining, fuel fabrication and transportation to reactor operation, to waste disposal. Disposal includes the reactors themselves at the end of their 30-year life-span.

If the government were involved in assisting the supply of "soft" energy to the same extent as nuclear technology, the economics of the renewable energy technologies would simply cease to be a problem. The technology is here today. It is commercially available despite an uneven playing field. Some are familiar with the Solarwall system from Downsview, Ontario which proved to be an international success. Both Americans and Europeans are showing great interest in that product, which suggests that the Canadian renewable technologies are world class.

Photovoltaic technology has enormous potential in the far north. It is being used to provide electrical power to remote homes, for remote lighting, communications systems where installation of commercial power lines is prohibitively expensive and the price of diesel fuel is very high.

• (1300)

The federal government ought to increase R and D funding for renewable energy technologies. Some analyses show that it takes about 50 years for any new energy technology to become established as a significant producer of electricity. It is going to take many years for new construction techniques or new high efficiency motors, appliances and heating installations to make a substantial reduction in our energy consumption.

Canada for the time being has a yearly R and D budget for wind energy of around $700,000. The U.S. department of energy has an annual budget of $21 million for wind energy. The European community R and D budget hovers around $150 million annually for that type of research.

The government ought to initiate programs demonstrating the applications of renewable energy and energy management technologies.

Demonstration programs are an excellent way to introduce new technologies to the marketplace. They also assist the industry to market their products abroad, since the programs help to provide high profile evidence of domestic use of new technologies. This should be a very critical point in our foreign aid policies to the developing world.

As reported in Scientific American, economic projections show that if nothing is done to hasten energy technology development and to introduce existing efficiency technologies into developing countries, global climate change and other major environmental problems will escalate beyond acceptable levels.

Even if the so-called developed countries manage to reduce our CO_2 emissions by 50 per cent, population growth and economic development in the so-called developing countries would most likely increase their CO_2 emissions from 450 to about 900 kilograms per person annually by the year 2030. World-wide emissions of CO_2 will then be 2.5 times of what they are per year now.

With the co-operation of the industrialized democracies, the developing countries could apply technical solutions that would promote economic growth while keeping energy demand growth relatively low. CIDA, our aid agency, should support the use of renewable energy forms in all energy-related foreign assistance.

Fossil resources will continue to be indispensable to our economy until we have a sustainable system built around renewable energy sources. This is beyond doubt.

Thus, from now on there will be a slow but continuous change from the heavy reliance on relatively cheap and easy oil and natural gas to an extended period of using fossil fuels that have potentially larger environmental impacts.

Eventually, Canadians will choose not to use fossil fuels because of the availability of cheaper and easier alternatives. That the transition from the use of fossil fuels is inevitable is indisputable.

In the meantime, however, we must increase the efficiency of fossil fuel use by extracting the maximum energy from it while minimizing harm to the environment.

Tory energy policy appears to rest ultimately on the optimistic assumption of short-term price stability in the oil market followed by price increases in the mid-1990s and of growing American energy supply requirements, particularly in natural gas.

In 1986, however, that optimism was severely tested by the spectacular drop in world oil prices and by the chaos in the natural gas markets.

As one historian put it: "Within weeks of the fall of international prices companies were cutting back their exploration budgets, laying off personnel and asking for more and more government aid in an attempt to ride out this down side of the energy crisis. Alberta and Saskatchewan responded nervously with further cuts in royalties and taxes, while simultaneously demanding more help from Ottawa in the form of assistance in keeping the oilsands and other projects going when oil prices were rendering them temporarily uneconomic".

Those words by an historian aptly characterize the present condition of our vital oil and gas industry as well. In the first quarter of 1991 numerous companies have reported sizeable losses and the net oil and gas industry income for that period was the lowest in five years.

This poor performance is attributed to a set of complex and intertwined circumstances, including a wider gap between light and heavy crude oil prices, declining conventional production, outdated regulatory requirements, growing environmental demands and a several-year long decline in natural gas prices.

Unfortunately, according to many industry observers these trends are likely to continue, increasing the industry's operating loss and hurting profits. Inevitably one of the most tangible consequences of this will be even more jobs lost in a battered and vitally important Canadian industry.

There is, as members from the west will know, virtually no major oil company that has not been forced to reduce its work force in recent years.

In Calgary, Gulf Canada Resources eliminated 250 jobs last May in an attempt to save between $30 million and $35 million by next year.

Imperial Oil has slashed 4,000 positions since 1989. Recently, more than 1,700 employees were laid off in a single swing of the axe, the same time it shut down 1,000 service stations, or at least announced the shutting down of them and reduced its refining capacity.

Since 1989 Petro-Canada has laid off about 1,500 employees nation-wide, only partly due to its drive to privatization. Last month it announced plans to close about 1,200 service stations across Canada.

Other major oil companies that have or will make major lay-offs include Amoco Canada, BP Canada, Husky Oil and Canada Northwest Energy.

Job losses tragically are now measured in the thousands and the western Canada oil patch could lose as many as 10,000 more livelihoods by 1995. That is careers, mortgages, children's education, demoralization, and it is social problems of all kinds.

The industry's work force peaked in 1985 at 140,000 and has declined steadily since then to 80,000. Last year more than 3,200 employees were laid off by major oil and gas companies alone. Mergers and downsizings are expected to increase-creating serious disturbances in the oil industry labour market.

In fact, I mentioned this the other day, I have a neighbour who goes to work each month, not in western Canada. He goes to work in North Yemen. He gets on an airplane, leaves his wife and two children, flies to North Yemen and works there for a month and then comes back to visit his family for a month, getting each alternative month off.

The question that many of us have is as to why can we not find work for him to do in Alberta, Saskatchewan, B.C., the Northwest Territories or somewhere in Canada, of course Hibernia included.

With bleak forecasts for the foreseeable future, temporarily laid-off professionals and others are not being rehired and many young people are not even considering careers in the oil and gas fields.

A shrinking, highly specialized work force puts an additional stress on the oil industry's efforts to maintain the technological edge which has kept our Canadian oil patch competitive internationally.

All that could backfire when oil and natural gas prices eventually improve and the crisis is hopefully over.

Recent bitter battles between the Alberta natural gas producers and the state of California are yet another reason for concern.

The notorious California Public Utilities Commission which is concerned only with the short-term interests of consumers and not with the long-term survival of producers, is unilaterally demanding radical changes to marketing arrangements with Alberta producers. It claims that the San Francisco based Pacific Gas and Electric Company has no obligation to honour long-term contracts with its suppliers.

Every day more than a billion cubic feet of western natural gas goes down the pipeline to California. For 30 years it has been a peaceful and mutually advantageous business. But political relations between Canada and the U.S. have changed to the point that what was formerly security of supply has become less of a concern for California consumers and the arguments are focusing now on price alone.

To no one's surprise, the Canadian Petroleum Association is outraged, saying that the California Public Utilities Commission—we call it CPUC in Alberta—"refute the sanctity of contracts" and that they "effectively violate the principle that buyers and sellers can negotiate market responsive contracts free of regulatory interference".

• (1310)

The bargaining that is being accompanied by a series of demands, threats and political manoeuvres may result in heavy cuts in the $1 billion western Canadians now earn annually in gas sales to California.

Moreover, should California's pricing policies emerge a winner, purchasers in Ontario might well be prompted to arrange the same deal for their gas consumers.

In fact, some institutional gas buyers in central Canada have reportedly refused to enter into long-term contracts with western Canada gas producers. That is also causing major problems for people who earn their living from oil and gas in my province.

These are just some examples of how Tory policy has turned out to be wrong, threatening to undermine not only the economies of the government's so-called energy policy but also Canada's long term energy interests.

There has been no leadership in the areas of environmental protection and energy conservation. The Canadian public has been continuously misled by misleading promises by a government that nonsensically maintains that it is serious about taking action on changing our energy consumption patterns.

Probably the closest the government has come to supporting energy conservation, ironically was during the Persian Gulf crisis when its energy department began to promote conservation and efficiency in some ads.

In the Mulroney government constitutional proposals, the government wants to recognize, seemingly, the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of the provinces in sectors that are now treated in many cases as concurrent areas. These include tourism, forestry, mining and recreation.

I think many Canadians are likely to query whether the government will by implication simply opt out of a meaningful environmental role in, say, mining and forestry.

The notion that this government is now prepared to discuss transferring to the provinces exclusive authority over wildlife conservation and protection, soil and water conservation and so on is distressing.

Many Canadians are concerned that if that passes, all provinces will be pressured into an environmental bidding war with each other to attract new industry.

Allowing the provincial governments greater control over environmental regulations could well undermine any efforts at implementing nation-wide environmental standards. This might apply as well to the development and adoption of energy efficiency performance requirements for energy using equipment.

The housing industry and office factory buildings provide the government with an excellent opportunity to introduce effective conservation measures. Federally imposed standards could be incorporated into all plans for insulation, low energy lighting, night storage water heating and so on.

Relegating to the provinces some exclusive areas of authority and competence in the area of environmental protection will probably only exacerbate interprovincial discrepancies and further reduce the regulatory coherence of the present federal government.

Many Canadians are painfully ignorant, unfortunately, about energy and environmental issues still. According to the Out of Balance report by the Standing Committee on the Environment: "Three in 10 Canadians actually believe that global warming is going to be positive for Canada".

Our increasingly electrical society has never before been asked to unplug computers, video games, fax machines, to turn down thermostats and to wear sweaters. Wearing more sweaters might help the textile industry in your province, Madam Speaker, and in Cornwall and elsewhere.

Even if energy saving technology is available now, how do we get people to buy it? The public must make a conscious decision to reduce its demand for fossil fuels, realizing that improved efficiency will not necessarily lead to a decline in living standards or in the work environment.

The introduction of energy efficient housing technologies, for example, is slower than it could be because many builders and architects are still unfamiliar with energy saving technologies.

Even more important, Canadians do not yet demand them. I understand that in comparison with the average home built in the United States, some super insulated homes in the state of Minnesota require 68 per cent less heat. For some residences in Sweden, the saving is 89 per cent.

Research done at the Lawrence Berkeley Centre for Building Science in California indicates that an $8 million investment in manufacturing and installing low emission windows would eliminate the need for 36 million barrels of oil which would cost $300 million to produce. The next federal government will have to take the responsibility to provide important kinds of information and education to our public.

Madam Speaker, you are probably thinking I have been going on for a long time. There is much more I could say. My party agrees with much scepticism to let this bill go to a legislative committee. Hopefully a host of changes can be made in committee.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, might I, at the risk of violating the rules at the outset, express my regret that, due to his absence, I am unable personally to inform the minister that the New Democratic caucus supports this bill. I am unable to inform him through his parliamentary secretary as that good gentleman is as well absent. Let me ask the hon. member for Calgary Southwest if she would be so kind as to convey to the minister the fact that, in this matter at least, he will enjoy the support of the New Democrat caucus and we will work to facilitate the quick passage of this bill. We generally welcome any move, however small, to increase energy efficiency in the Canadian economy.

We recognize that this bill is only a shell. It is merely a mechanism, a nicety with which Parliament will give to the government the authority to pass regulations to effect the stated aims of the bill. In other words, we are not actually debating energy efficiency standards when we debate this bill. We are debating whether or not to give the government the authority to set energy efficiency standards.

I would note that this bill having passed, as I assume it will, the government thereafter should present to this House or, at the very least to the energy standing committee, the regulations it proposes to promulgate under the authority of the bill so that the meat of the matter can be debated and approved or rejected, as the case may be.

Unfortunately, even with those regulations, and although this bill is a positive development, it really amounts to little more than a drop in the bucket. In terms of fostering energy efficiency in our economy and in our personal lives, what Canadians required was a Great Dane. What this bill gives them is a Chihuahua. What Canadians required was a Mad Dog Vachon and what this bill gives them is a Green Gabled Anne. What Canadians required was a mighty oak. Alas, this bill far more properly could be deemed a bonsai rubber tree.

This is of a piece with the government's record in terms of energy efficiency. We cannot forget nor should we forget that this is the same government that has slashed its annual expenditures on energy conservation and alternatives by over 90 per cent since it was first elected in 1984. The Conservatives have reduced the budget for energy efficiency and conservation every year that they have been the government; in 1984–85 it was $410 million, in 1985–86 it was $207 million, in 1986–87 it was $100 million, in 1987–88 it was $89 million, in 1988–89 it was $74 million, in 1989–90 it was $49 million, in 1990–91 it will have been $40 million, and this year it will come in at something between $35 million and $39 million.

These are not just numbers that have been cut. These are not just tally sheet ledger entries. These are programs and activities that were intended to, and in many respects did, foster the wiser use of energy by Canadians. There were programs like the Canadian Home Insulation Program which provided contributions of up to $500 per household to save energy, by upgrading the thermal efficiency of existing homes and by encouraging good workmanship and practices in refitted houses.

The Canadian Energy Audit Program, the so-called CEAP, which provided free on-site audits of energy consumption patterns and suggested low cost maintenance adjustments to conserve energy is gone. There was the Atlantic Energy Conservation Investment Program which encouraged energy conservation in an area with high energy prices and few substitutes for imported oil and which resulted in improved buildings, industrial processes and manufacturing operations. It was cut.

I have more. The Solar Energy Demonstration Program, which developed cost effective applications for active solar energy technology and encouraged its use, resulted in over 12,000 domestic hot water systems and over 200 industrial solar systems being supported. That is gone out of the remote community development demonstration program. Pardon?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Slow down.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Is that tone down or slow down?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I was trying to express to the hon. member what I have done before. I ask him to slow down. To say "tone down", I would never do that, but slow down and try to give a hand to the poor people who are keeping up and translating to French.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Thank you, Madam Speaker. I do apologize to the translators. It is, alas, my enthusiasm both for proper energy efficiency encouragement in this country on the one hand and for, in a sort of Calvinist sense, bringing to the attention of this government its sins on the other.

To continue, I hope at a slower pace, the Remote Community Demonstration Program which provided advice and financial support to 370 remote communities adopting energy alternative systems and conservation methods is gone.

Under the Forestry Industry Renewable Energy program, which provided financial assistance for biomass energy facilities, 180 projects were initiated on wood, municipal waste, agricultural waste and peat energy facilities. That is gone.

The Industrial Conversion Assistance Program, which provided one half of most capital costs to commercial, industrial and private institutions where they converted their boilers and heaters from heavy fuel oil to natural gas, is gone.

All of these programs which were in place, which were effecting the transition in Canadian industry and in Canadian homes from the less energy efficient to the more energy efficient use of energy are gone. They are gone with the wind. In the case of wind energy, gone without the wind.

On top of these program cuts, the Conservatives have also eliminated the Conservation and Renewable Energy Offices, the so-called CREOs. These were the major means that we had devised in Canada for taking what the experts and the bureaucrats know about energy efficiency and how to effect it, taking that information and distributing it to the people where the information can be used. Those, too, are gone.

It is a sad record of cuts. The government is only now beginning to turn its attention to reversing some of these horrendous program cuts. Even so, it is hard to get very enthusiastic about this minor turnaround. Funding for these efforts is pathetically small.

On Monday the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources told the Standing Committee on Energy, Mines and Resources that he expects the government will spend an additional $175 million on top of the $37 million already budgeted on energy efficiency and alternative energy. It sounds good. Keep in mind that that is actually less than the government budgeted for AECL, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, for just this year. Unfortunately, the minister admitted that $175 million was not to be spent each year, but would be spread over six years, the life of the green plan.

Moreover, the minister said that that spending would not even necessarily be spread evenly over those six years, but let us be generous and say that it will be spread evenly over those six years. That means that government spending on energy efficiency and alternatives this year would amount to about $66 million in total. That is still less than the government spent for this purpose in fiscal 1988–89.

It is 84 per cent less than was spent the first year the Conservatives took office in 1984–85. Remember, it is not that the government does not have the money. The Mulroney Conservatives have consistently diverted money away from energy conservation, efficiency and alternatives to other less environmentally benign energy sources.

I have some examples.

When the government privatized Petro-Canada, thereby throwing away our valuable public energy company, a company that could have been used to encourage the use of more environmentally sound fuels like ethanol or to take the lead in recycling used engine oil and reclaiming air conditioning chemicals that deplete the ozone layer, the $520 million raised by the sale of the first 20 per cent of the company did not even go into government coffers. It went back to the company. So the government paid the investors for buying shares in a company that belonged to the taxpayer $520 million. I will not say it is madness, I will not say it is insanity, I will not say it is lunacy of the first rank, but I will say it is difficult to say it makes a lot of sense. Still, that is what they did. That is what they continue to do. The government slashed funding for VIA Rail, one of the most energy efficient modes of transportation, while supporting one of the most energy inefficient ones, air travel, by expanding the Toronto airport.

The Conservative government has seriously skewed what financing it does provide toward nuclear energy.

For example, the April 1991 corporate plan and budget summary for Atomic Energy of Canada Limited shows that the federal government has invested $4.5 billion in nuclear energy research and development over the last 40 years. That is $110 million every year for 40 years. In 1995–96 alone, Canadian taxpayers are expected to fork over another $197 million to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited.

It does not have to be this way. For example, Ontario Hydro recently diverted funds previously earmarked for nuclear energy into energy efficiency and conservation, an example that this government would do very well to follow.

So what can be done? How can we better use the public resources that are available to effect a goal that we all claim to desire, which is far greater efficiency in the use of energy in Canada and far more integration of the energy alternatives that are available into our civil society?

There are literally countless ways in which the federal government could spur energy efficiency in Canada, but judging from the thin gruel of legislative activity in this area, this bill included, increasing energy efficiency is clearly not a top priority with the current government. Still, in a spirit of non-partisan accommodation, let me give to the government, which has become virtually invisible, a series of suggestions.

First, implement compulsory fuel efficiency standards for new cars, vans and trucks by at long last proclaiming the Motor Vehicle Consumption Standards Act which was passed by this House in 1982 but to this day has not yet been proclaimed. Voluntary standards are not working. The over-all fuel efficiency of Canada's new motor vehicle fleet increased rapidly during the 1970s, but it slowed in the 1980s and has declined since 1988. We have not only stopped making headway, we are falling back. Adopting progressively more stringent fuel efficiency standards should be one element of a comprehensive Canadian strategy to develop a more energy efficient and environmentally friendly economy.

Environment Canada's inventory of CO2 emissions, published in May 1990, estimates that Canadian road vehicles emitted nearly 27 million tonnes of CO2 in 1987. The entire transportation sector emitted 39 million tonnes, roughly 30 per cent of Canada's total of 128 million tonnes. The National Energy Board projects the transportation sector will emit nearly 150 million tonnes of CO2 by the year 2010.

The August 1989 report by federal, provincial and territorial energy ministers concluded that, and I quote:

> Transportation energy use offers the greatest potential for emissions reductions at point of use.

"The greatest potential", Madam Speaker. What do we do knowing this? This is not a secret, this is not a surprise. Governments and their bureaucracies know this. What do we do? We continue to refuse to proclaim that act, already passed by this House, which would allow us to put in place the progressively more stringent new vehicle standards that would cause massive cuts in emissions.

It is inexplicable but it is a simple, easy place to start. I urge the government in the spirit of the bill it has placed before us today to proclaim that act as well.

Second, we can encourage the design and construction of energy efficient buildings. This is not hard to achieve. The government should start by strengthening the provisions of the 1983 measures for energy conservation in new buildings under the National Building Code. It should incorporate the strengthened measures into the code by extending those measures to include apartments and other commercial buildings not covered by provincial jurisdiction for which energy efficient guidelines do not now exist. At the same time, it can work with the provinces to effect similar improvements in the provincial building codes.

A third step is to restore funding of energy efficiency, conservation and energy alternatives to 1984 levels, especially for research, development and commercialization of new alternatives, for example, the Ballard hydrogen cell being developed in Vancouver. Mr. Ballard himself told the Standing Committee on Energy, Mines and Resources that he was in danger of losing control of his company that has developed this cell which is at least six months ahead of anything else on the planet, to a foreign owner because he cannot in Canada raise the measly $50 million he needs to pursue its commercialization.

If ever there was a place for government to involve itself in the aid both of a cleaner, healthier environment and in the aid of a developing Canadian industry on the cutting edge of international technology, this is it. Or the development in Alberta of the solar pumps that can be used on farms to pump water out of the ground, strictly working on the basis of the sun that shines down out of the sky. This too represents tremendous potential both for domestic development and for international sales. Or, and this is so obvious, the massive extension of fuel ethanol availability throughout Canada.

There is at present one oil company in Canada, the independent Mohawk Oil Company in western Canada, that supplies ethanol blended fuels. There is no reason on God's good green earth why we could not make that a requirement for every gasoline vending corporation in this country. It would be good for the environment and Lord knows it would be good for the farmers who grow the grain and other crops from which the ethanol could be derived.

As well, a fourth step is to restore the conservation and renewable energy offices, the CREOs, across the country, so that Canadians have easy access to the information on the basis of which to make environmentally wise choices about energy and energy use.

In short, what is required is that the government abandon its so-called market based approach to energy policy. Instead let the government develop policies and programs emphasizing a strategic combination of energy efficiency standards, improved information programs, direct financial incentives and research, development, demonstration and commercialization so that Canada may begin to achieve the major economic and environmental benefits that energy efficiency, conservation and alternatives have to offer.

This bill is a step in the right direction. It is a baby step. It is a teensy little step, but it is a step. Even allowing that, we will have some significant questions in committee. We will be interested in expanding the scope of this bill to the extent that it is deemed to be in order. We will be interested in learning if there is any justification for the fact that the bill applies merely to energy using products, thereby apparently excluding significant products such as doors and windows. We will be asking why the bill applies only to manufacturers and bulk importers, thereby apparently allowing the import into Canada of energy inefficient appliances by individuals. These detailed matters will be pursued in committee.

Let me note in conclusion that while we support this bill and acknowledge that it is a teensy step in the right direction, we are also hoping the government will come forward soon with much more significant bills in this vein.

There is a great deal to be done. We in the New Democrat caucus applaud lightly this first step, but we urge the government to seize this matter and take those giant steps that are required. Let green gabled Anna with her chihuahua in her lap ponder her Bonsai rubber tree. Let the Canadian government on behalf of the Canadian people get to work on the job that needs to be done.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Madam Speaker, it was with great interest that I listened to my colleague speaking on the government bill.

Of course, we in the New Democratic Party support the concept of energy conservation. I would like my colleague to comment on this. Every time we see the government rely upon voluntary standards, particularly in the automobile industry, or every time the automobile industry comes up with their own standards, it seems that the average motorist gets it in the neck.

An hon. member: Or in the lungs.

Mr. Edmonston: Or in the lungs, or the pocketbook. I want to bring two points to the attention of my colleague that I would like him to comment on.

When we were looking at energy savings and at the same time reducing pollutants, particularly in 1976 as a result of the American efforts and the Canadian efforts just to be in conformity with the American efforts, there was a device called a catalytic converter that was attached to the internal combustion engine or the exhaust system. As consumer advocates we have always called it "the infernal combustion engine" because it is most inefficient.

This catalytic converter was supposed to clean up the pollutants as well as make for a cleaner running, smoother engine. I have to say that this has not occurred. We were told that we would only need a tune-up maybe once every year because the engines would run much cleaner. We were told that we would save on fuel. For the first five years, of course, we did not save.

Finally, if I may just conclude, motorists felt that they were being had by the industry in the name of protecting the environment.

I would appreciate my colleague's comments on this.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I must say that in matters involving automobiles and the automotive industry I bow to the expertise of my colleague from Chambly. Lord knows he is probably the best known consumer advocate, vis-à-vis the automobile industry in the country, perhaps on the continent. When he tells me that catalytic converters have been a bad thing, I am not going to argue. In fact, this had been my suspicion, but I must confess that what the hon. member has said now greatly reinforces that suspicion.

I would just repeat something I said in the body of my remarks earlier, which is that the record of government regulation of automobile emissions is clear. When those regulations were brought in and effected in the mid-1970s, emissions from automobiles dropped. In some regard, they plummeted. However, when those standards became voluntary in the early 1980s, progress virtually ceased.

People were spending time worrying even about those voluntary emissions. The people in the industry do not any more. Since 1988 we have fallen back. Emissions from automobiles have grown worse.

I can think of no clearer example of the efficacy of government regulation. It may be distasteful for those who believe in the market red in tooth and claw to contemplate the prospect of the public sector telling market players what they can or cannot do. As unpleasant as that prospect may be, it is absolutely essential if as a society we are to progress. That clearly is the record of the history of this country and indeed of all countries, and to argue against it is mere cavilling of the most captious sort.

I thank the hon. member for his comment. I thank the hon. member for his instruction. I wish him all the best in continuing to defend Canadian motorists.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise in the House today to speak on Bill C-41, the energy efficiency and alternative energy act. I have more than a passing interest in this piece of legislation since I have had a private member's bill on the books for over two years that has practically the same things in it, almost word for word. At the outset I want to offer my hearty congratulations to the government for following the strong, progressive and capable lead of the Liberal Party of Canada.

My Bill C-347, the energy conservation standards act, has the same provisions about setting minimum energy efficiency standards on equipment and requiring special labelling to show consumers the most efficient products. My bill also called for national standards that are consistent across the country. So does Bill C-41.

I must say again that I am glad the Tory government is finally taking this initiative. It is a long time in coming, and this is from a government that had slashed alternative energy programs by over 90 per cent since 1984.

The current government is also following the lead of many provinces including Ontario where the Liberal government of the day introduced its own energy efficiency act in December 1987. I guess it is better late than never for the members across the floor.

Saving energy by regulation is a tool of the government. We know that economies around the world operate at below the optimum level of energy efficiency. Ontario and the rest of Canada are no exception. Energy efficiency provides a stream of economic and environmental benefits.

We all realize the barriers that prevent these sorts of energy savings from being captured. These barriers include a lack of consumer information and rate structures that may act as disincentives to conservation.

These barriers must be broken down. Governments have powerful tools to remove them, such as their fiscal policy to favour conservation, leadership by example—that is a good one for this government—incentive programs, consumer education, support for research and development, and actual regulation of minimum energy efficiency levels.

While on the one hand I applaud the government for coming through with this bill, I must also point out that one of the major concerns of people is the disgraceful neglect and declining level of support for Canada's alternative energy programs since 1984.

The development of new energy sources normally takes decades to accomplish. Research cannot be turned on and off from one fiscal year to the next without doing great harm to research efforts.

A recent study shows federal funding has been horribly slashed from about $500 million in 1984 to merely $30 million in 1990–91. I certainly hope the finance minister will be more environmentally conscious in next Tuesday's budget.

It is worthy of note that during the period from 1980 to 1984 an average of $400 million was spent on alternative and energy conservation programs. Then in 1984 the Conservatives out and out eliminated the energy division of the National Research Council. There have been cuts at Energy, Mines and Resources for staff and branch offices, and programs to help people insulate their homes, to inform consumers about home appliances, and to advise industries on how to reduce energy consumption were all discarded. Perhaps Bill C–41 is a deathbed repentance for the Tories. Improving energy efficiency means reducing energy waste. Better building designs, more efficient equipment, improved furnaces, transportation and electric motors can lead to further significant gains. Energy efficiency is the leanest, cheapest and fastest way to improve the energy balance.

The House of Commons Standing Committee on Environment has made great progress on getting the four *r*s implemented on Parliament Hill. The hon. Speaker of the House has spearheaded these actions and he should be congratulated for the extremely successful greening of the Hill plans.

It cannot be overstated that energy efficiency is needed in Canada. A November 1990 study stated that among the industrialized countries Canada ranks first in energy use per capita, first in energy unit per Gross Domestic Product unit, and second in per capita carbon dioxide emissions.

In the early 1980s there was a tremendous improvement of about 10 per cent in CO_2 emissions, but over the last five years there has been no reduction in energy intensity. This is mainly due to the current government's cutbacks in programs since 1984.

Performance on energy efficiency and carbon emissions since then has not only been a disgrace, but many—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry I must interrupt the hon. member.

It being 1.45 p.m., pursuant to order made Wednesday, February 19, 1992, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the bills now before the House.

The first question is on the motion of Mr. Epp for second reading of Bill C–41.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee D.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Danis (for the Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that Bill C–57, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan, be read the second time and, pursuant to order made Wednesday, February 19, 1992, referred to Committee of the Whole.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went in committee thereon, Mrs. Champagne in the chair.

[English]

The Chairman: Order. House in Committee of the Whole on Bill C–57, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan.

Shall Clause 1 carry?

On Clause 1

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Madam Chairman, on behalf of the Minister of Health and Welfare I would like to thank all members of this House for their co–operation in getting this bill through all stages in very exceptionally quick time.

• (1350)

Also on behalf of the minister I would like to thank the hon. member for Don Valley East who is in the House today. The bill the government is introducing, as members know, was originally introduced by the member for Don Valley East. I am sure that all members will join with the government in recognizing the outstanding work that he has been doing for the disabled people of this country.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Chairman, I would just like to indicate on behalf of the Liberal caucus that we support this bill. It is a partial victory for all disabled people. There is still work to be done, but we welcome this bill.

It proves that an initiative by a member of Parliament can really triumph in a democracy.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Madam Chairman, on behalf of the NDP we would also like to express our support for the hon. member's work for the disabled. We owe this legislation to a member of this House who, like most other members, is not a minister and has no impressive titles after his name. I think this proves that if a private member decides that he wants to do something for people in society in general, we can do something right here in the House of Commons.

It is very gratifying to see that we achieved this today on a strictly non-partisan basis. We are delighted to support this bill.

[English]

The Chairman: I will recognize the hon. member for Don Valley East, but I should tell the committee that according to the order passed on Wednesday there should have been no debate whatsoever.

As everyone has kept his remarks very short and knowing the work that the hon. member did, I know he will also keep his remarks very short.

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Chairman, on behalf of the disabled of Canada I would like to thank all members of this House including the government for the outstanding co-operation in putting through this bill to amend the disability provisions of the Canada Pension Plan.

I would like to thank the minister and his staff, particularly Melody Tomka. I would also like to recognize the tremendous contribution and tremendous hard work done by Robert Lea of my own staff on this. All Canadians can be thankful to all of them and to all of the members of this House for this outstanding piece of legislation.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Chairman, as members know, I share a boundary with the hon. member for Don Valley East. I too would like to congratulate him on his fine work. He serves me as a constant reminder of dedication to not only his own constituents but the people of Canada. I salute him.

The Chairman: I guess all of the preceding can be considered a very long point of order.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clauses 2 to 3 inclusive agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, concurred in, read the third time and passed.

SUSPENSION OF SITTING

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to order made Wednesday, February 19, 1992, the sitting of the House is suspended until two o'clock.

At 1.54 p.m. the sitting of the House was suspended.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

PULP AND PAPER INDUSTRY

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, northern Ontario's forestry sector employs 37,000 people. Over 30 communities largely depend on this industry for their survival.

The pulp and paper industry in northern Ontario has been hard hit by the recession, by the high transportation costs in accessing and exporting its resources and by its high production costs due to antiquated equipment. In Ontario, 60 per cent of newsprint machines were installed before 1930.

If the pulp and paper industry is to survive it is absolutely essential for it to invest in new equipment and technology in order for it to become competitive in the global marketplace.

The Liberal Party made recommendations to the government last year asking it to consider implementing a proposal which would require industries to re invest 20 per cent of their annual profits into modernization and pollution control to ensure that they remain competitive.

We also suggested that the government look at implementing an industrial investment fund system of corporate RRSPs similar to the one being used in Sweden.

It is incumbent upon this government to take the leading role in ensuring that the pulp and paper industry in northern Ontario and across Canada becomes competitive through technological change.

PENSIONS

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, this government has again demonstrated that we are listening to the concerns of Canadian women by introducing new legislation that will make major improvements to public pensions.

Part-time employees may now join pension plans.

In the future, plans must offer survivor benefits and these must continue after re-marriage.

Pensions and pension credits will be divided upon marriage break-down.

Men and women retiring under similar circumstances will be entitled to equal pensions.

This will greatly help those who need retirement protection the most. It will help Canadian women.

MACMILLAN BLOEDEL LIMITED

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, British Columbia's largest forest company, MacMillan Bloedel, lost $90 million in 1991.

During the same year MacMillan Bloedel blamed continuing losses for the closure of a plywood mill and a sawmill operation in Port Alberni. These closures permanently disrupted the lives of 600 families in my riding.

Within the last few weeks MacMillan Bloedel issued indefinite lay-off notices to over 450 loggers in three coastal logging divisions. Corporate losses were blamed for these lay-offs as well.

Yet a few weeks ago, in spite of its 1991 losses and in spite of lay-off notices given to over 1,000 of its workers, MacMillan Bloedel declared a quarterly dividend of 15 cents per share on its 100 million outstanding common share.

There should be a law in this country that prevents well-heeled corporate boards from plundering a company's assets to pay themselves dividends while putting workers out on the streets and blaming corporate losses for the lay-offs.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Gaby Larrivée (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, since the GATT negotiations began, the Canadian government has always had only one position: to clarify and strengthen article XI.

I would like to assure the farmers in my riding that the government will continue to work hard towards that goal, witness its latest initiative, sending to Brussels a Canadian delegation headed by our ministers and with representatives of the farming community.

Nor could we overlook the work done by the Prime Minister, who is striving to resolve the issue in our favour.

Certain recent statements and accusations made against the government by the president of the UPA, Jacques Proulx, and the leader of the Bloc Quebecois, Lucien Bouchard, were an attempt to distort the situation in the interests of another quite different cause.

I would ask people to refer to the editorial by Alain Dubuc in today's La Presse. It shows very clearly what those two are up to. Obviously they are not serving the cause of Quebec farmers.

Again I want to assure the farmers in my riding of Joliette that the federal government will continue to defend their interests, as it has always done in the past.

GASOLINE ADDITIVES

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Finance presents his budget to Canadians next Tuesday, I urge him to remove the excise tax on ethanol used in transportation fuel.

We also call on the government to adopt a comprehensive policy to promote the use of ethanol blended gasolines. If all our transportation fuel in Canada had a 10 per cent ethanol blend, we would create new markets for Canadian grain farmers of 8 million tonnes a year, larger than any one of our international markets today.

If all gasoline in Canada had a 10 per cent blend of ethanol we would reduce carbon dioxide emissions from automobiles by 10 per cent. That is why ethanol blended gasoline is often called green gas.

The use of ethanol blended gasoline would conserve our non-renewable resources.

By 1995 we will be importing over 550,000 barrels of crude oil a day from abroad. Ethanol is a winner for farmers, for conservation and the environment, for industrial development and for all of Canada.

We call on the Minister of Finance to remove the excise tax on ethanol blended gasolines next Tuesday.

TAXATION

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, although we must admit the obvious fact that everyone has to help the economic recovery along, some people are unfairly treated by the tax system on the basis of their marital status. Among them, Mr. Speaker, are married people with children, whose situation compared to unmarried people with children is particularly remarkable.

Indeed, under our present tax system a married couple with three children is at a clear disadvantage compared to an unmarried couple in the same situation and with the same number of children. This discrimination, on the basis of marital status alone, costs married individuals up to $3,000.

That is totally unacceptable and I think it is ridiculous that couples are penalized just for being married. The Progressive Conservative caucus and I have made many representations about this to the Minister of Finance.

Hopefully next Tuesday's budget will bring concrete measures to improve this situation, for the greater good of Canadian families.

INNU

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, six children were buried yesterday in the frozen ground of the Innu community of Davis Inlet, a small Indian village on the north coast of Labrador.

They died tragically in a fire while their parents were out drinking. This is not the first alcohol related death in Davis Inlet. But alcohol is simply a symptom of a more profound malaise that has at its roots a sense of powerlessness and lack of control over one's own life.

The Innu live in substandard housing with no insulation, no water and sewers, and at a distance from the caribou on which their way of life depends.

The Innu nation believes a full inquiry is needed to determine the underlying causes of the recurrence of tragedy at Davis Inlet.

At the same time, they have asked the minister of Indian affairs to act immediately to provide an adequate water supply, proper housing and necessary services for the community.

I strongly support these requests on behalf of the Innu nation. I call upon the minister of Indian affairs to act quickly so as to prevent further tragedy such as that experienced this week in Davis Inlet.

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Bob Layton (Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis): Mr. Speaker, no one, either here in the House of Commons or elsewhere in Canada if they have been concerning themselves with the future of our great country will deny that we are facing a serious crisis.

The Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs was asked by the Prime Minister to lead and co-ordinate our efforts to unite Canada.

I believe that Canadians everywhere, including those of us living in Quebec, are growing in our appreciation for his tireless efforts.

In an extensive interview for, but not used by the CBC on The Journal last night, the minister reported on the efforts being made.

The part of the interview with the minister that was broadcast raised the "what if" question: What would happen to Canadian citizens in Quebec if Quebec voted in a referendum to become a sovereign state?

I have talked with the minister and I am assured that the Government of Canada will preserve and protect the interests of all Canadians living in Quebec, primarily by bringing Canada together in a new Constitution including Quebec, even if we cannot persuade Quebecers that Canada belongs to all of us and is stronger when it is united and shared.

It is unfortunate that the full interview with the minister was not broadcast by The Journal.

CHALLENGE PROGRAM

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, it is now February 20 and there has still been no announcement of this year's Challenge program for our student summer jobs.

But there have been plenty of other announcements: at least $350 million cut from the Canadian Jobs Strategy, increased tuitions resulting from the government's $11 billion cut in transfers for post-secondary education to the provinces, and continued stonewalling on revisions to the Canada Student Loans program.

• (1410)

Last summer young people were battered by the recession suffering unemployment rates 68 per cent higher than the year before and 65 per cent higher than the rest of the population.

Students have to wonder why has the Challenge program funding not been announced. Is the news so bad that this government hopes to sneak it past us in a budget full of even worse news, in a budget that misses the point, that the competitive economy must really be the opportunity economy?

MYRIAM BÉDARD

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I draw the attention of this House to another medal winning performance by a Canadian athlete in Albertville.

Our congratulations go to Myriam Bédard of Neufchatel, Quebec, who won a bronze medal in the women's 15 kilometre biathlon event.

This biathlon became a medal event for the first time in this Olympics. It is a sport which requires a combination of skills. Speed, stamina and endurance are needed on the 15 kilometre cross-country ski course and accuracy and skill with a rifle are needed on the target range.

Myriam demonstrated both the brilliant technical skill and the endurance demanded by this incredibly challenging sport.

I know that all Canadians will take pride and joy in her Olympic achievement which serves as an inspiration to all Canadian athletes.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, at least 100,000 jobs in Canada are at stake. Canadian farmers are in serious danger of losing their livelihood, because of the Dunkel report's proposal to eliminate GATT article XI and introduce, instead, a tariffication system that would be subject to annual reductions of 6 per cent.

These proposals would sound the death knell of Canada's agricultural quota system. On behalf of 40,000 farm producers who work under this system, I want to ask the government, and especially the Prime Minister, to protect and reinforce GATT article XI.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, as I said on February 10 in the House, we must step up our efforts to ensure that our farmers win the battle at GATT. We must not accept a compromise that would threaten the four pillars of agriculture in this country. The Canadian government must maintain our supply management system and defend it to the very end, even after March 2, 1992. Tomorrow, the regional president of the Abitibi-Témiscamingue UPA, Mr. Denis Jutras, will be here with Gilles Bérubé, from Vassan; François Lemieux, from Landrienne; Rosaire Mongrain, from Saint-Félix d'Alquier and many other farmers from Abitibi.

I will be here right along with them, in order to maintain a dialogue and ensure that the Canadian government maintains our supply management system past March 2, until the year 2000.

IMMIGRATION

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, disgusting, appalling, shameful and sad, these are the words I have heard repeatedly in over 500 calls since yesterday morning objecting to the deportation of a Polish couple and their child.

Those words also describe the minister's reply today saying no to their claim on compassionate and humanitarian grounds.

Instead of turning his mind and heart to the merits of this case, to what is fair and just, the minister spends four pages implying that this family circumvented the process, did not follow the rules, are seeking special exemption and are abusing the system. These statements are cruel and they are contemptible.

If there is any abuse of the system it is in the minister's office and in the minister's department: delays of three years in holding hearings, no reply to a member of Parliament on behalf of her constituents, no reply even today to what are the criteria and how were they judged.

I have written to the minister on an urgent basis today pointing out issues that he did not address in his letter. I pray to God he will stop this deportation hearing this afternoon and will have the courtesy of giving me a reply to those concerns.

HEART MONTH

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to remind members of the House and all Canadians that February is Heart Month.

Cardiovascular diseases are the main cause of disability and death in Canada. Seventy thousand people die from the disease each year.

In collaboration with provincial ministries of health, the Department of National Health and Welfare has established the Canadian Heart Health Initiative consisting of cardiovascular risk factor surveys and demonstration projects carried out in all provinces.

In addition, an international Heart Health Conference will be held in Victoria, British Columbia on May 24 to 28, 1992. The theme of the conference is "Bridging the Gap—Science and Policy in Action". I would like to applaud the efforts of all of those who are collaborating with the Department of National Health and Welfare toward reducing the burden of cardiovascular disease on Canadians. Let us work together to ensure the health of all Canadians. Let us work together for a better Canada.

AIR CANADA

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I am confused.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Angus: On February 6, Air Canada called for a made-in-Canada solution to Canada's airline woes. It did not want American involvement with its competitor, Canadian Airlines.

It pointed to a public opinion poll which showed that 85 per cent of Canadians wanted a Canadian solution, not an American one. Yet today Air Canada announced that Mr. Hollis L. Harris, ex-chairman of the now bankrupt American Continental Airlines, has been appointed to act as its new president, vice-chairman and chief executive officer. What a slap at Canada's airline executives.

We can only draw one conclusion from today's appointment: Canadian expertise is apparently not good enough and Mr. Harris is also apparently perfect for Air Canada and failure in America means success in Canada. So much for Air Canada's made-in-Canada solution and so much for the laughter in this House.

SIR WILLIAM OSLER

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, 1992 marks the 100th anniversary of the publication of the Principles and Practise of Medicine by a great Canadian, Sir William Osler. This medical text book, first published in 1892, remained in print with revisions every three years until the 16th edition in 1947.

Sir William Osler, born in Bondhead, Ontario in 1849, remains the ideal of every physician in the English speaking world and beyond. He taught in Canada, the U.S. and Britain that education is a lifetime occupation and that hard work is essential.

Dr. Osler was one of the original four professors invited to begin the John Hopkins Medical School in Baltimore. He combined intelligence, knowledge and a love for study and teaching that continues to set a standard for all physicians. The Government of Canada issued a stamp in his honour in 1969.

Protecting and preserving Canada's heritage means recognizing the contributions our citizens have made, both within and outside this country. Let us not forget Sir William Osler.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister who, I believe, might agree that there are some contradictions in the government's utterances on the subject of foreign overfishing.

The government tells us that the Europeans are arrogant, that they are stubborn, that they have ignored the pleadings of him and his government over the last two years. Yet the government tells us that it intends to do more of the same. I ask him why? More to the point, I ask him when is he going to get involved as Prime Minister and turn the heat up on this file?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is talking of the fisheries in Atlantic Canada as if the government had been completely doing nothing about it.

The hon. member knows that when we introduced the fisheries adjustment package there were components to that package which addressed many issues, one being conservation. I trust that we all know that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is dedicated to trying to find solutions that are long-term for the situation affecting fishermen in Newfoundland and Labrador and we should give him a chance to do his job.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, the question, by the way, was about foreign overfishing.

I direct my question to the same minister, if he wants to respond for the absent Minister of Fisheries and Oceans who, I understand, is in Newfoundland on some business. The minister of fisheries said this in the House yesterday, and I want to quote to him what his colleague said:

> We also allow them (the foreigners) to catch fish that we cannot catch and land them at Canadian plants. That is all that is keeping Burgeo going.

Is the government not aware that the Burgeo fish plant has never ever processed a single foreign fish? Why is the minister jumping up here and parading half-truths? When will the government get off half-truths and sometimes no truth at all and get on with the job of saving the jobs of those people at Burgeo and elsewhere?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): I would think the hon. member, being from Newfoundland and Labrador himself, would be so concerned with the situation affecting fishermen in that region that he would not use Question Period as a place to play politics. There is not much positive and constructive in talking half truths. The point the minister made yesterday was that for species of fish that Canadians do not wish to catch, foreign nations, supporters of Canada at NAFO, may be allowed quotas in those waters. Simply put, so that he may understand, Canadians have the right of first refusal on that fish.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of the Environment a question.

The plundering of fish stocks by unscrupulous fishermen from Europe is among the most senseless environmental crimes, like the destruction of the tropical rain forests in Brazil and the depletion of the ozone layer.

I ask the minister what representations he has made to mobilize the international community in the struggle to end the criminal actions of Spain and Portugal.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I am glad that the hon. member raised the issue of overfishing in the North Atlantic from an environmental point of view. It is perhaps high time that the whole international community raised this issue precisely from that standpoint since a whole ecosystem is involved in this overfishing.

Too often it has been dealt with as a commercial matter. For this reason, the minister of fisheries, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and I met last week on this specific subject, even before the announcements that were made a few days ago. The minister of fisheries, who is from Newfoundland, insisted, as he is wont to do from time to time that we should absolutely raise this issue at the earth summit in Rio.

I must also say that the Prime Minister himself undertook to raise it at the international level. The minister of fisheries will do so, the Government of Canada will do so, because overfishing, is of course an environmental issue and an ecological one. I can assure you that the Minister of the Environment intends to do his part for Newfoundland fishermen, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

FISHERIES

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, the northern cod stock has been dealt another deathly blow today by this government.

I have just been informed by the Departments of External Affairs and Fisheries that the Canadian Embassy in Paris has been told to notify the French foreign ministry today that the French metropolitan fleet from St. Malo, France is to be given an additional quota from April 1 to June 30, additional cod quotas for northern cod and gulf cod.

I ask the minister of external affairs why this government is giving more northern cod quotas to France. The northern cod quota and the gulf cod quota were supposed to end on March 30 under the agreement of the boundary dispute between Canada and France.

Will the minister of external affairs now stand up and explain why France is being given this extra three months of northern cod?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Again, Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member is a fair person. He should not make statements that will give the impression in Newfoundland and Labrador, in Atlantic Canada, that Canada will do anything but abide by the conditions of the interim agreement it has signed with France.

He knows that the decision is about to be made by the tribunal that is seized of the issue, which decision we await this spring. If the quota levels have to be reduced in Atlantic Canada, the quotas for France will be reduced in accordance with the interim agreement.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. The Department of External Affairs just informed me that it was notified last Friday that the president of the court had received the judgments of the four other judges.

However, the registrar of the court notified this government that because of a request by the Government of Canada, his decision has to be translated into English before it can be given. The translation will take until the first week in April.

Does this government not realize that it is just plain crazy to today give France three extra months of northern cod quota and gulf quota because it will take an extra week, into April, to translate the document? That is just plain crazy.

[Translation]

France accepts the decision in French only. Why not Canada?

[English]

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, some people may find this funny on the other side, but the fishermen in Newfoundland and Labrador do not.

Again, omitted from the comments of the hon. member—I do not take it to be a question—was the 1989 agreement with France that sent the boundary dispute to arbitration.

We signed this. We happen to be a government that signs a document and honours our signature. That decision was to be rendered in French, and it is a matter for the court to deal with.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Today the bank rate has increased again for the fourth week in a row. It is now above the prime rate at 7.56 per cent. This means that it is going to be very difficult for the commercial banks not to raise their consumer interest rates.

I have to say to the Prime Minister that this is another torpedo to consumer confidence in this country. My question is this.

Informetrica has shown that a 2 per cent drop in Canadian interest rates would get us 52,000 extra jobs and over $4 billion in savings on the deficit. Will the government change policy, reduce interest rates and thereby expand jobs here in this country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think my friend perhaps forget to mention that interest rates have come down some seven and a half points since their high in April 1990.

Interest rates are down to lows that have not been seen in almost 20 years in Canada. The inflation rate is in the process of annualizing very substantially at under 3 per cent, which compares, for example, to a high of 12.9 per cent that went on for some time in the early 1980s.

I think my hon. friend would recognize and acknowledge that this means very substantial progress. There has been a slight upward move of 10 basis points today, but there has been no reflection yet in terms of the prime. We will have to see what happens.

In any event, my hon. friend will surely agree that the only way there can be solid job creation is by keeping inflation low, keeping interest rates down and by inviting investment, both national and foreign, to join in Canada for the creation of the kinds of stimulating jobs that Canadians need.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, in fact, if we go back two months ago, the gap between Canada's interest rate for treasury bills and those in the United States was just over 2 percentage points.

If we look at the situation now, the gap is 3.5 percentage points. Canada's interest rates for treasury bills are almost double those of the United States. That cannot make sense with our most close and toughest competitor. It shows up in the export figures that have come out today showing yet another collapse in export figures to the United States. In fact, for the past year exports to the United States have been down 2 per cent.

• (1430)

I want to ask the Prime Minister this: With all of his strong support for the free trade deal in the past, how can he say that the free trade deal is helping us when we are seeing our exports to the United States this past year down by 2 percentage points? Is it not time to raise the question of reducing our dollar so as to get the competitiveness that we need?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend must have asked about a half dozen questions in that very lengthy statement.

An hon. member: Take your time.

Mr. Mulroney: Well, I will take my time.

With regard to his opening comments about a relative decline in exports, he is only half right. There was a relative decline in imports as well from the United States because of the recession. We continue to have a very favourable and impressive balance of some $6 billion or $7 billion in terms of trade, so that part of it is readily disposed of.

With regard to the question of the Canadian dollar, my hon. friend surely must know that that is a determination made by the international marketplace in regard to fundamental criteria like low inflation rates, low unit costs, enhanced productivity. This all finds a reflection in the value of the Canadian dollar. In point of fact, it has come down by some 4.5 or 5 cents over the last two or two and a half months maximum. I think that probably finds favour with my hon. friend as well.

With regard to his final point where he invoked the free trade agreement, I would just point out to him that recently one of Canada's most distinguished economists, Ed Neufeld, the executive vice-president at the Royal Bank, and I think generally highly regarded, was asked the question: "Now they feel if you open up your borders in terms of trade, trading borders into Mexico, all it will mean for Canada is location of plants into Mexico and out of Canada". His response was: "Of course, that was the theory in Europe when they said, well, if you do this French plants will go to Greece or to Portugal. The point is it is not happening. It is not happening because free trade provides new opportunities in all countries that are party to that free trade". Mr. Neufeld concludes that: "In regard to understanding of the impacts and the liberalizing instincts of international trade, the only problem with Canada is that we were about 10 or 15 years behind and we are now catching up".

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, in fact this government has defended the free trade deal on the basis of export increases to the United States. The figures are now out for last year. They show a decrease in those exports to the United States.

I want to ask the Prime Minister: What will his government do to reverse this situation? What will his government do to increase our exports by reducing the value of the dollar so Canadians can be competitive and give us jobs right across this country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend's statement is quite wrong. Since the free trade agreement and irrespective of the fact that this country and the United States have fallen into a very difficult recession from which we are now in the process of recovering, the fact of the matter is that for the first time since I believe 1976 there is a net positive inflow of investment capital into Canada to the extent of some $8 billion or $9 billion over that same period.

Trade with the United States, which accounts for some 2 million jobs in Canada and 80 per cent of our exports, has increased since the free trade agreement has come in. More jobs have been created. In point of fact, fewer jobs have been lost in this recession with the free trade agreement than in 1981 and 1982 when there was no free trade agreement with the United States. So the free trade agreement, like the auto pact, will be viewed by Canadians as a most important instrument for a durable economic recovery.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday when my colleague from Gatineau asked him what he was doing to save Canadian farms, the Prime Minister said that he was leaving the House immediately to talk to the President of France, the Chancellor of Germany and the President of the European community. I want to say that we are glad the Prime Minister took this action which we have been urging him to do for years. My question to the Prime Minister is this: Did the Prime Minister get the support of Europe's leaders for our Canadian farmers as he was promising to do yesterday?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I had not spoken to any of them in years, but as soon as my hon. friend recommended I speak to them, I rushed right out and placed the first calls in years that I have had with any of them. My hon. friend asks if I placed the calls and before I can respond, I am being interrupted by the Liberals. It must be the enthusiasm of their convention. Is that a leadership convention that is going on?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: No. I was not sure, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, when you are at my position with the troops behind you, if you can keep the troops with you, you are here forever.

Mr. Speaker: I think perhaps we should go to the next question.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: This was why I was unable to accommodate another of the opposition members with regard to another problem yesterday, a member who had an immigration problem and who asked me to see people out here from Ottawa West, because indeed I had scheduled a call coming in at 3 p.m. from Prime Minister Major of the United Kingdom. I then immediately after that spoke with President Delors in regard to the problems of the farmers and the farm delegation arriving in Brussels this morning. This morning I had a lengthy conversation with Chancellor Kohl in regard precisely to the mission which will be arriving in Bonn later on this afternoon or early tomorrow morning.

I made calls to the three leaders and I will be speaking to others regarding the importance of article XI and the importance of supply management to the Canadian economy and to the fabric of Canadian farm life, and how it is vital for them as friends and allies of Canada to understand that we need their support and their assistance in helping Canadian farmers protect this vital instrument. While we did not receive obviously any firm undertakings, I think they are much more acquainted with the needs of Canadian farmers and I hope that eventually Europe will be able to support Canada.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): We will wait to see that, Mr. Speaker. My supplementary is also for the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister also refused yesterday to say whether he would be attending the farm rally on Parliament Hill tomorrow with tens of thousands of angry and frustrated farmers. Surely these good Canadians have a right to hear directly from the Prime Minister. I ask the Prime Minister if he will address the farm rally tomorrow to defend his actions before Canadian farmers.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): I think, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has this backward. The Canadian farmers who have been protesting have been protesting as well in support of the Canadian position which they helped fashion. The position we are defending internationally is one that we have arrived at in co–operation with the farmers of Canada. They are here to express their support for the Canadian position and that is why we have been giving, of course, such strong support and receiving such strong support in return.

Mr. Peterson: We will find out tomorrow.

Mr. Mulroney: If the Liberals plan to politicize something, as the Bloc Quebecois has been trying to do, all I can do is tell my hon. friend we are here to defend the interests of Canadian farmers. That is what we have been doing and that is what we will continue to do.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Any GATT agreement that dismantles supply management will wipe out millions of dollars from the balance sheets of Canadian dairy, poultry and egg producers. Does the Prime Minister realize the implications that this could have for the income, the network and the ultimate future of many Canadian farmers?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

• (1440)

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Prime Minister. Atlantic Canadians are hurting, unemployment is high, bankruptcies are soaring, many rural communities are fighting for their very survival. Should supply management be eliminated, the job losses would be staggering. Does the Prime Minister realize that the dismantling of supply management will seriously hurt our rural communities in Atlantic Canada and across this country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am well acquainted with the points my hon. friend raises.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Do something.

Mr. Mulroney: My friend from South West Nova says: "Do something".

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Why do you think the farmers will be here tomorrow?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has just talked about milking cows. I would not touch that one with a 10 foot pole and I urge him not to either. I urge him not to.

My hon. friend has raised a very serious question, asking if we are acquainted with the difficulties. Indeed, we are. All members of the House are acquainted with the importance of this matter for the farmers.

I raised this question beginning at the Tokyo summit in 1986, right up until again in November in Paris at a three and half hour meeting with President Delors of the commission, yesterday in conversations with Prime Minister Major and again with Chancellor Kohl this morning, trying to cause them to understand the article XI implications which, for example, they have in respect of sugar in the common market and the impact this has upon Canadians in an entirely different way—a large country with a small population trying to maintain supply managed industries—because these do not involve international trade distorting subsidies.

The dairy farm in Canada, as it is elsewhere, but particularly in Canada is part of the national fibre of the nation.

I met with farm leaders privately on Tuesday. I met with farm leaders Tuesday afternoon publicly. I met earlier today with farm leaders from Manitoba here in the House of Commons. I have been speaking to world leaders about their problems.

At the moment we have the Minister for International Trade, the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of State for Agriculture in Brussels en route to Bonn, after a very successful day in Brussels, advancing the cause of Canadian farmers.

These are perhaps not miracles, but I can tell my hon. friend that we are doing what she would want us to do, deploying every effort we humanly can, and to work day and night to protect the interests of Canadian farmers.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a document signed by the Minister for International Trade and sent to government MPs in early January. The text is a veritable song sheet on how to sell the GATT proposals, particularly with respect to tariffication of agricultural goods.

Will the Prime Minister explain how he expects Canadian farmers to believe this government's overtures of support for marketing boards when one of his senior ministers is willing to cave in on the future of supply management? Does he not recognize that acceptance of the GATT Dunkel proposals signs the death warrant for Canadian dairy farmers?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have already indicated that the proposals brought together by Arthur Dunkel on December 20 in respect of tariffication are unacceptable to Canada. This is the position we have defended unswervingly from the very beginning. It is the position we defend today.

Farmers know full well that we are in their corner. We are fighting this battle together on behalf of Canada. My hon. friend seems to be the only person who is out of step with this national initiative to protect Canadian interests abroad.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, that is certainly not what this document indicates. This is a song sheet. It was presented to the Prime Minister the other day by representatives of the dairy industry who demanded an explanation. His response, as I understand it, was to suggest that the Minister for International Trade does not speak for Canada. If the Minister for International Trade does not represent Canada's position at GATT then maybe he should resign and he should be replaced by a minister who will speak on behalf of Canadian dairy farmers.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, even for my hon. friend from the NDP this is a new height of speciousness. He makes a false statement. He attributes to me a statement that I never made and then he proceeds to denounce it. Pretty good going, except the premise was false, your statement is false, and the position you have been adopting today is very unhelpful to Canadian farmers.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister.

It is not just our fishermen and our farmers who are in trouble. In the three years since free trade Canadian automobile workers have lost 27,213 jobs.

In this government's negotiations with Mexico and the United States, will it give us a guarantee that in the future Canadian auto workers will have their fair share of North American automotive jobs?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, this House would do well to remind itself, especially the member opposite, that when his party was the government in 1981–82 the Canadian share of automobile production for North America was 14 per cent. Today, the Canadian share of automobile production for North America is 24 per cent.

We as a government have put in place a strong and healthy economy which has helped to bring those results, and we will continue to fight for those results.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, if this government is going to continue fighting for the same results we are doomed.

The United States, since free trade, has lost only 9 per cent of its automotive jobs but Canada has lost 21 per cent.

In these ongoing negotiations with Mexico and the United States, because Canada is losing automotive jobs today at almost two and a half times the U.S. rate, will this government guarantee in any future agreement both Canadian content and Canadian jobs? Yes or no.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): What this government will do, Mr. Speaker, is what it has done in the past.

What we have today in automobile production on the Canadian side is a labour force 33 per cent higher than it was in 1983. We have pursued policies that have helped that to be put in place. Our labour costs are lower and our interest rates are at record lows. We are coming to terms with our deficit in a way that the Americans cannot. We are putting in place a framework that will make us very competitive.

With that particular record we are very confident that we can continue to increase Canada's proportion of automobile production on this continent.

IMMIGRATION AND REFUGEE BOARD

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, last Monday this House was assured by the minister responsible for citizenship that refugee board hearings were conducted with fairness and with natural justice.

The statement made by the minister was:

> Certainly I am very comfortable and confident that the independence and impartiality of that board is giving everyone the fairest and most generous hearing possible.

Does the Minister of Employment and Immigration agree with those statements made by his colleague and does he stand by them today?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is asking me whether the Immigration and Refugee Board, which is responsible for making independent refugee determination decisions, is a perfect body that should never be improved then my answer is no. We do not live in a perfect world.

I know Gordon Fairweather, and members on both sides of this House know this gentleman. He is committed to ensuring a fair determination system. He is taking action.

If the hon. member is talking about a problem that arose last week, I called the chairman, Mr. Fairweather. He is taking action on the matter and we should give him a chance to do his job.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, that was not the question I asked. My supplementary question is for the same minister.

• (1450)

We have in our possession the negative fill-in-the-blanks judgments written for the judges prior to the hearings. Those are the hearings that the minister just referred to. We know the department has hired advisers to assist judges in their decisions and these advisers do not attend the hearings.

Critical information was withheld from the refugees and their lawyers. This is trial by ambush. Evidence is given to the judges in secret outside the hearing process. Judges are told not to listen to refugees' evidence. They are reaching biased decisions.

Will the minister table those written decisions for the Polish, the Chinese and the other refugee cases? Will the minister cancel all hearings today until we can ensure that every refugee is guaranteed his or her rights under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms of Canada?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker, I will not do that because I will not deprive genuine refugees from claiming that status in Canada and I will not prevent Canada from granting protection to persons in need.

I will not follow the advice of the Liberal Party. No, I will not.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, yesterday during Oral Question Period, the Prime Minister said that he was going to call a number of European leaders to discuss the GATT talks. Considering a question that was put previously, I believe it is clear the Prime Minister is very proactive and very positive in his efforts to defend the interests of farmers in Quebec and in Canada. We are lucky Jacques Proulx isn't prime minister because I can guarantee there would be some very unhappy farm producers in Quebec.

I wonder whether the Prime Minister could tell us whether the tone of the discussions and what transpired in his conversations with the various European leaders could be considered positive and encouraging, and if he intends to pursue and initiate further action along these lines.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his question and also for his sustained interest in an issue that is so important to Quebec farmers.

Yesterday, at the end of the day, I had conversations with Prime Minister Major of the United Kingdom, President Jacques Delors of the European commission, and this morning with Chancellor Helmut Kohl of Germany.

The Canadian mission, which has just finished a good day's work in Brussels, among other things, was able to meet Commissioner McSharry, the European commission's vice-president, Mr. Andriessen, and Mr. Delors' executive assistant, Pascal Lamy, in order to further the interests of Canadian and Quebec farm producers.

Just before Question Period, the Minister for International Trade called me to say it had been a constructive day's work for the Canadian mission in Europe. Telephone calls had been received and signals exchanged. The minister remains hopeful that eventually, with the support of all members of this House, we will have an opportunity to make an effective and successful case for Canadian demands.

UNITED NATIONS

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday and today the Government of Israel has been in blatant violation of UN lines in Lebanon. Two UN soldiers were killed or at least injured. There has been a killing of innocent civilians in refugee camps in Lebanon. As well there has been the assassination of a family of a Palestinian leader, clearly an excessive response to the killing of the three Israeli soldiers on Friday.

Will the Prime Minister personally intervene and make it absolutely clear to the Government of Israel that it can no longer blatantly disregard the authority of the UN in the conduct of its affairs if it expects any further support from Canada and if it expects lasting and just peace in the region?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is no question the events that have gone on in the region in the last week have been personally tragic for the people involved. That is our first concern.

Our second concern—as we have expressed it publicly and we will be expressing it through démarches on both sides—is our concern for destabilization and what could easily destroy what is a very fragile peace negotiation which is going on now and which will continue.

We condemn violence in the region on all sides and we will continue to do so.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, surely the situation has got to the point where the government's response has to go beyond mere condemnation of the situation. It has just gone on and on. The current Government of Israel has simply turned its nose up at the authority of the United Nations.

Will the government, which has today started a debate on second reading of a bill to give it the capacity to bring in economic sanctions in the case of a breach of international law, not begin at least considering, in conjunction with other governments requiring the Government of Israel to comply with international law?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the difficulty with the violence in the region of the Middle East is that it is very difficult to lay it at the door of one particular party.

We deplore the violence on all sides. There has been violence on every side. We have made strong statements about the violence both through the United Nations and its agencies and publicly in Canada. We have frequently made démarches to the governments involved, if they are governments, and to the people involved in the region.

We will continue to do that, but we do not intend to do anything that will add further instability to a region that desperately needs stability.

TRADE

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, I would have liked to put my question to the Minister for International Trade, but since he is away on government business, I will direct it to the Prime Minister.

The Lactel group, Canada's biggest milk exporter located in Sainte-Claire de Dorchester, has been exporting 50 per cent of its Grand Pré milk to Puerto Rico for a number of years. Unfortunately, there has been a dispute in connection with these exports for the past 14 months, and a few weeks from now the company will not be able to export to the United States. Obviously this goes against the free trade agreement.

My question for the Prime Minister is this: Could the responsible minister immediately start proceedings before an arbitration tribunal, as provided by the FTA mechanism in chapter eighteen?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am familiar with the problem described by the hon. member. I believe that the people at Lactel are currently negotiating with the government in Puerto Rico.

Of course, if these people need help—in fact they got in touch with me because, for the hon. member's information, the company happens to be in the same building as my riding office in Boucherville—so they got in touch with me, and I said that if they needed assistance, I was sure the Minister for International Trade would intervene.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, I know the minister has been in touch with Lactel, but they are desperate, and they say that you could have gone before the arbitration tribunal a year or at least several months ago.

My question is this: Why didn't the minister submit this question to the arbitration tribunal? That is all the company wants. Otherwise, they will have to close their business.

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am told that the company is still negotiating. As I said earlier, they got in touch with my office, and I told them that if they wanted a decision or some kind of intervention by the Minister for International Trade, we would of course do for the company what we would in fact do for all Canadians.

FISHERIES

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

The Government of Canada gave the French foreign fleet in the Sydney Bight 1,300 metric tons of cod in 1990. It increased it in 1991 to 1,600 metric tons, and now the Canadian embassy in Paris has said that for 1992, the French foreign fleet will get 100 per cent of last year's quota.

• (1500)

Can the Secretary of State for External Affairs explain to Canadians why such preferential treatment is given to foreign nations such as France when in fact our own fishermen are driven from the sea?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member well knows that these are established under an international treaty. There is the rule of law that deals with international treaties, and Canada is abiding by that. There is an arbitration agreement of which the results should be known in April. In the meantime, there is an international rule of law having to do with treaties with which we must abide.

This treaty was signed by the former government. We are finding some of these issues very frustrating to deal with because we understand the difficulties for our fishermen.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I want to inform the minister that I am very well aware of the rule of law. I am also well aware of international abuse of Canadian fisheries.

I want to ask the minister of external affairs, who has the duty both moral and legal to come clean with Canadians, to tell them why foreign nations such as France, Spain, Portugal and others get preferential treatment to fish in our waters while our fishermen are unemployed. Tell us the fairness.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all what the hon. member is saying is absolutely false. The Spanish and the Portuguese who are fishing on the nose and the tail are fishing outside our waters. We have made the strongest possible representations within the European Community and to those countries directly.

I have done it, the minister of fisheries has done it, the Minister for International Trade is doing it, even now while he is in Europe this week. The Prime Minister has done it. We will continue to do that.

If the hon. member wants a straightforward honest explanation, I gave it to him in my first answer. He clearly does not want that.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Given the importance of the GATT negotiations, can the Prime Minister report to this House on the progress of the delegation of ministers and industry leaders who are now in Europe?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for her question because it is a very important national matter. The delegation that is over there reported to me prior to Question Period through the Minister for International Trade. He says that they had meetings today with Commissioner McSharry, who is in charge of agriculture for the EC, with the vice-president of the EC, Frans Andriessen, and with a number of farming groups along with Pascal Lamy, who is Mr. Delors' representative at the commission.

Apparently the farming representatives and the politicians who are there are pleased with the day they have had. Nothing has been resolved yet, but they have put forward the Canadian case on behalf of Canadian agriculture with a great deal of effectiveness.

They will be moving to Bonn and then on to Geneva. Hopefully these will be building blocks that will provide a durable solution for these important problems confronting Canadian agriculture, wherein the Canadian government joins with agriculture in looking for solutions that will benefit Canadian farmers.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, before the House closes, I am wondering if the government House leader could indicate the business of the House for Friday, Monday and Tuesday. The budget will be given on Tuesday. Could he give us a specific time and state whether or not the remaining days for next week will be allotted toward the budget debate or whether he will be calling other pieces of legislation.

Business of the House

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to a special order passed on Wednesday, the House will adjourn after these proceedings, complete second reading of Bill C-26 tomorrow morning and adjourn after Routine Proceedings.

On Monday it is our intention to call Bill C-55 for second reading and, if completed, the House will continue second reading on Bill C-54, the Farm Products Marketing Agencies.

Discussions among parties are continuing for the rest of the week. We do intend to call the budget in all likelihood on Tuesday, probably at 4.30 in the afternoon. It would be my intention to call at this time two days of budget debate on Wednesday and Thursday and probably the borrowing authority bill on Friday of next week, but I would like to confirm all of that at the start of next week.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to order made Wednesday, February 19, 1992, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at ten o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 3.05 p.m.

PUBLIC SERVICE REFORM ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Thursday, February 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. Loiselle that Bill C-26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee H; and the amendment of Mr. Gauthier (p. 6964).

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Saint-Laurent—Cartierville has five minutes left.

[English]

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, this Conservative government simply cannot manage the affairs of this country.

Because of this ineptitude, service to all Canadians is suffering. Its inability to deal fairly with public servants has had a devastating effect on public servant morale. This government has asked the Public Service to do more with less. The reality is that it is doing less with less resources. This must not continue.

As my party's spokesperson for multiculturalism and citizenship, I am particularly, concerned with employment equity. This bill contains a provision on employment equity. Unfortunately it is not enough. It is so vague and discretionary that it will not improve the participation of the four targets groups in the federal Public Service which is still below acceptable level in spite of the established employment equity policy.

If the Public Service is to be truly reflective of the Canadian population, we must increase the numbers of visible minorities. We must increase the number of women and aboriginal people. We must bring in more people with disabilities.

The Liberal Party believes that all persons are entitled to equal opportunities for entry into the Public Service and will vigorously oppose any attempt to inhibit equality.

Employees must be given assurance that their experience and dedication are valued. Every effort will be made to retrain where necessary to enable them to continue their careers.

The government has failed to achieve in this so-called reform a means of meeting the challenges of the future. We must have public consultations where the interests of the public, of the employees and of the government can be melded into a policy that truly meets the needs of all Canadians.

• (1010)

Using its majority to rush a bill through Parliament is not what Canadians expect of their government. This House should take the time to weigh the consequences of its actions. We are being asked to make a decision that will affect the professional lives of thousands of people. We must have a clear understanding of everything that is at stake here. This cannot be done in a hurry, and that is why we have a duty to postpone this bill, at least for the time being, if we really want to act responsibly in the best interests of those who elected us.

[English]

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, I have already spoken on second reading of this bill. However, on this amendment there are certainly some comments I want to make in response to the statement of the President of the Treasury Board.

He spoke of the process of Public Service 2000, and one of the things he said was that seldom in our history has a program of organizational change been undertaken of the scope and magnitude of Public Service 2000. I agree with him. The scope and magnitude of the impact is on the Public Service, most important on service to the public, on the very effectiveness of this Parliament in making its decisions and having them carried out. They are at stake in this legislation.

I find it therefore reprehensible that the minister, after two years of PS 2000 literally behind closed doors by his own admission, a management driven exercise without the direct involvement of the employees whose lives will be affected, without the direct involvement of the public and without the direct involvement of parliamentarians and after the expenditure of millions of dollars on this exercise, would insist that it be reported back to the House by the end of March. This is the kind of closure on committee that I have seen before during my time in this House. It is the kind of closure that I do not think is conducive to developing and passing good legislation and, more important in this particular case, to a successful revitalization of the Public Service to meet the challenges of the future.

I see also the Minister of Labour in the House. I want to quote from an excellent speech he gave recently called "Working Families Working Solutions" to a conference on partnerships for mutual advantage. He made some excellent points in that speech, which make me wish at this time he were the President of Treasury Board or that the President of Treasury Board shared his views.

I am going to quote extensively, because his points are exactly at the root of why the Standing Committee on Public Accounts said this legislation should not come forward until Parliament had an opportunity to review all of PS 2000 and look at what is appropriate legislation.

What he said is that those of us who care about the work place need to be innovative and caring. "The history of the last 15 to 20 years shows that countries best able to contend with economic change are those that have a tradition and commitment to strong labour management partnerships".

I underline "partnerships" because the bill before us is a contradiction of everything that has to do with labour-management partnerships. It is a refutation of that very principle, and it is a denial of the promise that the previous President of Treasury Board made that no legislation would come forward except what was mutually agreed to. What we have here is a bill that is 90 per cent, at least, not acceptable to those who represent the employees of the Government of Canada.

I am going to quote further from the minister. He said: "In Canada's most important industries, unions and companies are co-operating on issues of mutual concern. I believe the labour minister is entirely in tune with what is necessary to improve labour management relationships in this country, to ensure that we have a work force that is adaptable to change and prepared for the future". The minister knows—and I wish the President of Treasury Board knew it—there are companies in this world where union representatives sit on the board of directors of corporations so that they share mutually in the problems and prospects for the company.

The minister spoke at the same time about the Labour-Management Partnership Program. This is a $1.4 million program that has been put in place to assist unions and employees to work together on initiatives. He has talked about this program as promoting productive, fair work places.

"The commitment of Canadians", and I am still quoting from the Minister of Labour, "to joint action will be a major determinant of the extent to which we are successful in the world economy". I do hope the President of the Treasury Board is listening. "We Canadians", again quoting the Minister of Labour, "are only beginning to see what joint action on the part of labour and management can yield for us. By coming together we can achieve enormously for our workers and for Canadian society as a whole".

That should be the purpose, that should have been the process of PS 2000. In indicating an unreasonably tight time line, less than three weeks, for a legislative committee to report back to this House, the minister asked for non-partisan and constructive co-operation. The minister knows that from the time he took over his portfolio he had the offer of that co-operation on this dossier from me. I think he knows that the offer was genuine. It was based on the public accounts committee's recommendations that it was absolutely essential to have a special parliamentary committee that could hear all parties, that could consider the public interest, that could consider the views of the employees as well as those of management. Unfortunately the actions of the minister since then and of the government have made that impossible. We have a huge bill here.

The last time the Public Service Employment Act and the Public Service Staff Relations Act were brought into this House, it was the result of total process of co-operation, consultation that involved parliamentarians, that involved the public, that involved employees and that involved managers. But they are only one part of the solution to the problems that confront the Public Service today.

There were 118 amendments brought forward in spite of all that long period of consultation because that bill was then and is now dealing with some fundamental issues of vital importance to this country. I tell the minister that offer of co-operation and non-partisanship is still open to him. He only has to do, as has been recommended by the public accounts committee, as has been proposed by this party in this House, set up that committee of parliamentarians. Let us have a thorough review of this bill, bring back to this House legislation that is acceptable to all parties and that can be passed overnight.

This party and this member will not co-operate on a blanket permission to contract out without any process of accountability and without any policy on contracting out. This party and this member will not co-operate on a bill that leaves everything to be done by regulation following the passage of the bill. This party will not co-operate on the undermining of the merit principle which has been at the root of the Public Service of Canada for over 70 years. This party will not co-operate on departing from equity and fairness in employment and promotion in the Public Service nor on accountability to Parliament and accountability to the public for how its human and financial resources are being used.

We will not co-operate on the right of employees to a fair hearing when they feel their rights have been abused and their opportunities in the Public Service jeopardized. We will not co-operate, above all, on the diminution of service to the public because that is what our Public Service is all about.

We will not co-operate on the politicization of the Public Service and that is what this bill is all about.

This is an important bill. It deserves the attention of parliamentarians. It deserves the attention of a legislative committee that will have ample opportunity to hear views, to consider and to do what Canadians do so well to accommodate, to listen to one another, to balance the various interests and to come up with a bill that will serve Canadians and Parliament well for the next decade and into the next century.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Madam Speaker, I spoke on this bill a few days ago. I gave notice at that time that I wanted to speak on the amendment by my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier.

What the amendment is asking for is that the bill be withdrawn and the subject matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

I know it is not always protocol to say who is here and who is not, but I want to make mention of how very pleased I am that the President of the Treasury Board and the Minister of Labour are both here to listen to and to take part in these debates.

I sat on the committee which studied the Finkelman report in 1976. At that time, we proceeded with great deliberation with the recommendations that were brought forward at the time.

My colleague from Ottawa—Vanier and I spent many hours listening to the witnesses who appeared before the committee. We did bring out very strong recommendations. In all modesty, I believe they were of service not only to our public servants but also to all the people of Canada.

I want to put on record as the critic for labour that the Liberal Party views our public servants as very hard-working and dedicated people.

We malign ourselves as a nation when we say that the people who are administering the programs which we legislate here in Parliament are not doing their work, or when we give any indication that their work is not acceptable. In doing a disservice to them, we do a disservice to ourselves.

I spoke the last time of the Liberal Party view of the Public Service. Today I want to address the merit principle per se.

Our party supports the merit principle. We will oppose the government's efforts to reintroduce what we believe is patronage and favouritism in the Public Service.

I will just set this all in perspective once again. In 1919, the Civil Service Commission, now the Public Service Commission, was established to safeguard the principle that the best qualified person would be selected for appointment, promotion and transfer in the Public Service.

This ideal has not changed. This objective has not changed. We in the Liberal Party intend to pursue this as our goal. This principle was established to stop the rampant political and administrative patronage and to ensure Canadians had a non-partisan Public Service where employment and opportunities were open to all based on competence, not favouritism.

It was not unknown even as recently as 20 or 30 years ago, not necessarily in our Public Service but in some public services in the provinces, that when a government changed, the bureaucrats were changed almost wholesale right across the province. That was not fair.

That was rampant, political patronage and we must not have that happen again here with our public servants.

Incidentally, this principle contributed to the protection of employee rights to fair treatment based on ability by establishing appeal procedures. We set up a system whereby if the employee believed that he was not being treated fairly then he did have an appeal procedure which would guarantee fairness.

As well, it ensures that government services are delivered to all Canadians without political favouritism. Sadly, I have heard it said that some people are more equal than others when it comes to dealing with public servants.

I do not believe this. I do not hold this to be true, but if we are going to continue with a principle that we established, then I suggest to you we not only have to have the procedures set in place but we have to work in a spirit of mutual trust.

This legislation, in my opinion, seriously undermines the merit principle. It leaves all but original hiring and limited promotions to the discretion of managers, while opening the door to patronage and favouritism and punitive measures based on a manager's personal likes or dislikes, or to the whims of the government of the day.

I am not only talking about this government that is in place now, but also about future governments.

What we are trying to do is to enact legislation which will be fair not only for today but also for all the tomorrows to come so that our civil servants can be treated fairly.

The ability of the Public Service Commission to be the watch-dog of the public interest is very severely curtailed if it feels it is in any way being hampered.

I want to turn now to employment equity as opposed to just equity in general.

Bill C-26 contains a provision on employment equity that is very vague. In fact, it is so vague and discretionary as to be almost meaningless.

Surely the ministers and the members here will admit that this particular provision requires no accountability. Without accountability, I maintain that the bill is flawed.

We support a strong provision in the legislation committing the Public Service to employment equity and to accountability for treating all applicants and employees equally on merit.

We believe that all persons are entitled to equal opportunities to enter and progress in the Public Service. I and my colleagues will oppose measures that inhibit equality.

The lack of equity in opportunities for employment and advancement in the Public Service is well documented.

There was a report called Beneath the Veneer. This was a report of the Task Force on Barriers to the Employment and Promotion of Women in the Public Service. It is the most recent documentation that attitudes are the main barrier to equality of opportunity.

These attitudes, often unconscious, keep women, visible minorities, persons with disabilities, and aboriginal Canadians lumped in the lower echelons of the Public Service.

Surely we have progressed enough in this day and age that we know that all Canadians are equal under the Constitution. This is our birthright. This belongs to all of us, simply by the fact that we are Canadian citizens.

We must not allow legislation to go through which could in any way be interpreted as somehow disfavouring our visible minorities or weakening our positive attitudes towards women, aboriginal people, and people with either physical or mental disabilities.

The merit principle is not operating equally for these target groups. If selection for promotion were based only on ability I maintain that these groups would be represented at all levels, at least proportionally to the representation in the Public Service.

I maintain from all of the data I have been able to study that they are not. I have some examples to fortify my point.

The first example concerns contracting out, privatization, and this new word that we have, downsizing. That is another word for firing people or letting them go. The use of short-term employees and personnel service contracts have all made it more difficult to correct the inequities of the past. New managerial discretion means the same attitudes identified in the report "Beneath the Veneer" will be unchanged in any way. Target groups fear, and I believe rightly so, that favouritism based on outdated images of who is competent and who is not competent will prevail without looking into the background of these people to see what their true abilities are.

• (1030)

Another aside about this type of treatment is, I believe, that potential for harassment, mental harassment and, yes, even sexual harassment is increased when managers have increased control over one's employment opportunities. If you do not please a manager, in effect what you are doing is excluding your chances to advance in the Public Service.

I conclude with this statement. I agree with my colleague, the member for Ottawa—Vanier, who I believe will be chairing this committee. I hope he is chairing the committee so that we can have an impartial person looking into the different processes and the legislation which is proposed.

We are committed to stability and fair treatment in the Public Service of all of the employees. I speak for my party, as the labour critic, when I say we will oppose measures that reduce the commitment to train and continue the employment of those affected by these changing requirements.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise and participate in this debate today on the motion to amend the motion for second reading of this bill, an amendment proposed by my very distinguished colleague from Ottawa-Vanier.

As you know, Madam Speaker, he has risen in this House and spoken in this debate a few times now. I recall that on the first day of debate on second reading, he indicated his desire to speak for longer than the allotted time, which I think was 20 minutes, and of course the House denied him the unanimous consent to continue, notwithstanding his great knowledge of matters relating to the Public Service, for reasons that I simply cannot fathom.

Now we have the government squawking that this debate is going on too long and yet it denied the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, who knows more about the Public Service than the minister, the opportunity to participate and give the House the benefit of his views, which I may say are much more in accord with the wishes of the public in Canada and the Public Service in particular than are the views of the government and the minister as expressed in this silly bill.

The sad thing is this bill is designed to take away the rights of public servants. That is why we have been objecting to this. The government is unilaterally changing the work conditions for public servants. I must say that from all the indications I have, and I am not an expert in the matter of procedure in dealing with bills of this kind, this method is quite unprecedented.

The minister says he can see that. Of course, I would defer to his authority if he would defer to the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier and agree with his approach to things. The member for Ottawa—Vanier has been here longer than both the minister and I and knows a great deal more about this than either of us do, I suggest to the minister.

I was hoping that the minister would follow past practice, which has been to send the matters for study to a committee in advance and then have a bill come to the House on matters relating to the Public Service. It is quite unprecedented for the government to act unilaterally in a bulldozing way to force its will on the Public Service of Canada as it is doing by Bill C-26.

As I indicated in my earlier speech, which again was cut off because of this new 10-minute rule, I said that this bill was an unfair attack for various reasons. One of the reasons that I did not get to expand on properly and that I would like to explain is that of a rule that allows for the government to proceed with contracting out. We all know that there is no restriction on the government's ability to contract out. However, public servants objected to the fact that they were laid off after contracting out "because of lack of work or because of the discontinuance of a function". The act currently allows for public servants to be laid off because of lack of work or because of the discontinuance of a function.

The Public Service Staff Relations Board in March 1990 ruled that the government could not contract out services and then lay off public servants because of a lack of work. Obviously there was no lack of work. It simply ended the opportunity to do the work by public servants by the contracting out. The government thought this was a dreadful decision from the Public Service Staff Relations Board and appealed it to the Federal Court.

Mr. Justice Mahoney, a distinguished and capable judge of great experience on the bench, heard the appeal and gave a decision for the majority of the court. He said: "It cannot, in my view, be said that the services of an employee whose job has been contracted out are not required because of lack of work or the discontinuance of a function. That employee is not required only because the job has been contracted out. The work remains to be done and the function continues".

It makes perfect sense. That is what the learned judge said in his decision. The government did not like that. The government was wrong. It did not like being told it was wrong by the Public Service Staff Relations Board and by the Federal Court and so it brought in this bill. Clause 19 of the bill gives the government the power to lay off following contracting out. In other words, it can say to public servants: "We think the job you are doing costs us too much. We would rather give it to some of our fat cat Tory friends. We will make a contract with the fat cat Tories and then lay you off and let somebody else make the money".

The minister wags his head. He knows that what I am saying is correct. He is laughing at the plight of the Public Service that he is mistreating by this bill.

The second aspect of the bill that I want to talk about is clause 22 which gives deputy heads of departments the right to deploy staff, that is to shift members of staff around within the deputy head's jurisdiction without any competition.

Deployment, as used in this sense, is simply another word for transfer. Under the present act, transfers are considered staffing actions and are subject to the merit principle and therefore may be appealed. In other words, the best person for the job has to be found within the limits of the class that is allowed to apply and then is transferred to the position, but that apparently is no longer the case. Now we are simply taking away the right of public servants to compete for these transfers. The decision will rest only with the deputy head.

The administrative practice of many, many years, I cannot tell you how far back this goes and perhaps the minister could enlighten us in a speech that he might make on this, but I am sure this practice has existed in the Public Service for easily 30 to 40 years. Now it is being changed so that there is no further right of appeal if a public servant is not transferred to a position that he or she wishes to seek.

The Public Service Commission implemented an exclusion approval order removing the right of appeal on any movement of an individual from one position to another identical classification group and level. This order was challenged and last month the Federal Court of Canada struck it down because the order "departs substantially from the merit principle". In other words, the merit principle, which has been the highlight and the test for transfer and promotion in the Public Service, is being abandoned by the government in this bill. Why? Political convenience, what else?

Why would the government seek to take away from Canadians the right to expect that the best person will be appointed for the job? Because it wants to put its own friends in the job, that is why. This is an abuse of the Canadian Public Service which has been the envy of many other countries because of its independence and its impartiality in terms of political matters. The government by this bill is seeking, in my submission, to politicize Canada's Public Service and it is entirely, entirely inappropriate.

The next change that I think is of great significance is the change in the Financial Administration Act. Clause 81 of the bill gives jurisdiction over termination and demotion of employees. It transfers this out of the Public Service Act and out of the jurisdiction of the Public Service Commission and gives it to the Treasury Board. That has to be one of the strangest things going. Why would you have an independent body which was an adjudicative body dealing with termination and demotion cases suddenly lose its jurisdiction and have the employer, through the Treasury Board, exercise that jurisdiction?

In other words, if your employer fires you, you appeal to the Treasury Board, which is your employer's board for redress. Why is the independent body being deprived of its ability to make those adjudications? Did the government not like the decisions of the Public Service Commission? Was that the problem? One would suspect so. It appoints the members to it. What happened? Did it not get the right people?

I cannot understand this. It is inconceivable that any other employer would take unto itself the right to hear the appeals, particularly where the employer is a political body, such as the Government of Canada and should be accountable through a much more independent mechanism in its dealings with its public servants. That is what we have had in this country for many, many years, I think since about World War I. I may be wrong, but the Public Service Commission is not a new institution in Canada and now the government is undermining its authority in this very important respect.

I see that my time has expired. For all these reasons I urge the House to agree to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier and scupper this bill at second reading.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to address this particular piece of legislation once again. I have indicated previously and I want to stress again that I consider this an attack on the Public Service.

One might ask why this would be occurring at this particular time. Well, Madam Speaker, you and I both know that the civil service is a handy target. Some people talk about their large salaries, their generous benefits and what have you.

One of the things I find surprising is that people put the blame on the civil servants as opposed to those who have granted those benefits. We all know they have unions that represent them and sit down with government to bargain. It is governments that say yes or no. Therefore, why do the civil servants become the targets?

Obviously in a climate such as exists right now where there is a lot of apprehension, anxiety and concern about one's job today, tomorrow and in the future, they become easy, handy targets and I am really concerned about this. I am concerned about the myths that we allowed to speak about the lack of excellence. It is an excellent civil service, yet we propagate these kinds of myths. I find this unfortunate because I find it extremely divisive.

Some countries undertake military or bold action in order to make themselves more popular in the polls when they are suffering electorally. In this particular case, the government has targeted a number of groups. One of them, I maintain, is the civil service. I really find this very, very unfortunate.

Let us look at the purpose of this particular bill. On paper it looks very good. What we want to do is attempt to deal with a changing situation. Obviously we cannot manage and govern as we did a number of years ago. Obviously we need to change the rules and regulations. Obviously we need to find that right balance between permitting the managers to undertake a number of decisions within their discretion. At the same time we need to protect employees and the rights they have acquired overtime.

[Translation]

We need that balance between managers and employees who have acquired certain rights through years of collective bargaining, and I think the two can be combined without denying employees their rights. It would be unfortunate if we were to do that.

[English]

As you know, this particular piece of legislation will permit people to hire, fire and transfer employees without the normal protections they now have. The merit principle is in jeopardy. There will be contracting out. I find it interesting that the government claims that contracting out saves money. When I asked on the Order Paper for a record of everything that had been contracted out, I was told that under a certain figure, the figures are not available. Why? What in the world are we trying to hide?

If you are really saving money, you ought to be proud, government, to show it in black and white. Of course the suspicion is that there is no money being saved. These are simply ways in order to permit those who are friendly to government to profit from government. Until I receive a clear, precise answer to the question I have raised, I shall continue to doubt the government's intentions in this particular matter.

I believe I could find a great deal of support for my feeling that there has been inadequate consultation with a number of people. The government will cite the meetings, but ask the employees whether or not they feel comfortable. Ask the employees whether or not there needs to be additional discussions. There does need to be additional discussions. This is major legislation that will affect services throughout Canada.

[Translation]

Another example of a government that is undermining the very foundations of this country is that it has launched attacks on VIA Rail, Air Canada, Canada Post—all institutions that bound this country together, that made it strong and far more united than it is today. And it continues to attack one institution after another in order to destroy this country. The government may not be doing this on purpose, but the result is the same.

[English]

The government priorities are privatization, contracting out, the use of short-term employees. I have yet to see proof that this is going to be helpful to us, that this is going to be helpful to Canadians in general and that this is going to improve the climate, the morale in the Public Service, that this will get better performance out of men and women who have committed a major part of their lives to Canada and to serving Canadians.

[Translation]

I ask the government to reconsider this bill and to give serious consideration to the amendments that have been proposed, so that when they proceed with the bill, they are absolutely sure they are doing something that will be good for all Canadians across this country.

I sincerely hope they will reflect on the recommendations they have received and on the advice they have just been given, because I believe that if this government decides to take our advice, Canadians across this country will benefit. However, we Canadians throughout the country will pay for it if they go ahead without the necessary consultation, without protecting the merit principle, without ensuring that this bill does exactly what it should do, namely to strike a fair balance between the rights of supervisors and managers and those of the employees who serve Canadians.

That concludes what I wanted to say this morning.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, for the few minutes remaining in the debate, I shall speak in support of the amendment of my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier. We are privileged to have the President of the Treasury Board here with us this morning. He knows the public service well because he was part of it before he entered politics. He distinguished himself in the public service as a civil servant and as a diplomat. So I am sure that he understands this whole issue very well and is sensitive to it.

I would like to deal with this question not from a technical angle but from a practical one. Madam Speaker, you, like me and all our colleagues, probably meet public servants often. One of the most common complaints is that public servants feel that they have to know someone in the system in order to get ahead. This bill confirms that attitude.

• (1050)

That is why I support the amendment moved by my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier. What he is really asking us to do is to set this bill aside and refer the whole matter to the Public Accounts Committee. This committee does outstanding work and I think that it is one of the few committees that is non-partisan and works in a non-partisan way. We should look at the bill objectively and come back with something that could really put some order in the public service. That is very important for our country, so that Canadians can have the services to which they are entitled and which they need. At the same time those who work in that system can feel that they can advance on the basis of merit if they are competent.

I think that the amendment of my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier is reasonable. I would hope that the government and the President of the Treasury Board, who is here in the House, would decide to act along the lines of the kind of parliamentary reform we would like to see and let members consider this matter in committee.

If people feel cynical about Parliament today, they are right. The government is forcing a bill on us. We have no choice in the matter. The only choice we have is to vote for or against the bill. I think it would be a step toward parliamentary reform if the public accounts committee, which has members from all sides of the House, from all recognized political parties, could consider this bill and come back with legislation on Public Service reform that we as Canadians, as the government of this country and as Parliament, could accept as being fair and equitable to all members of our Public Service.

[English]

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I know that the House order we are operating under allows approximately five minutes more in the debate. I thought that I should take advantage of this opportunity to participate for a few moments and to put a few thoughts on the record.

This bill was, as you know, Madam Speaker, tabled first back in June 1991 so it has been before the House for quite some time now, before the House in the sense that it has been available to members and to the people in the Public Service. The public has had an opportunity to look at the bill and to express its concerns about it and to make sure that the issue had a profile within the country. Of course, that is something that is extremely crucial in a democracy such as we have.

The bill before us is important. It is a bill that has been discussed in terms of its preparation for a long time. It has received a great deal of consultation and a great deal of input from a number of different people. As a result, I think the bill before us will receive certainly the majority support of this House, and considerable support across the country.

What I have found particularly intriguing is that as I have watched the process unfold, I have watched my good friend from Vanier, who is a very capable and competent individual and also a very skilled parliamentarian, on two separate occasions move amendments to the bill that, although they are couched in very nice language, have essentially had exactly the same impact. That impact has been to derail the bill, to destroy the bill, to prevent the bill from making any progress here in the House of Commons. Even though we as members have had an opportunity to look at the legislation, we will have a further opportunity to debate it and a further—

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, the hon. parliamentary secretary is getting away with something I know he would not want to get away with. I hope he will accept this correction. He says this bill has been before the House since June of last year. That is correct. It was introduced and given first reading on June 18, but debate—they are talking about debate—started on January 10.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands knows the rules of this place very well and he knows he was entering into debate.

Mr. Milliken: He is misleading Canadians again.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I appreciate your kind intervention and your wise ruling that what my hon. friend was doing was entering into debate.

I should remind him that I sat here very quietly and listened to him make his remarks, which I thought were totally outrageous. I cannot believe what I heard, and I am looking forward to reading it in Hansard. I cannot believe that my hon. friend would have made such outrageous statements, such unbelievable assertions and yet have his own name attached to them on the public record of this House of Commons.

I have to admit I was startled but, in keeping with the decorum of this fine institution, I sat here quietly, listened and waited until I had an opportunity to take a few moments to participate in this debate.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have a feeling that today is Friday.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, it could be Friday, February 21, but nevertheless, the member is trying to insinuate—I cannot use the word mislead—to Canadians that this bill has been before this House for more than two or three weeks at best. It is not true. He knows because he was there. He is part of the government.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, because of these rude interruptions, I have not had an opportunity to express what I wanted to say.

I want to say, and I have said it very clearly, this bill was tabled June 18, 1991. That is some six months ago. The House has then—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately now I must interrupt the hon. parliamentary secretary.

It being 10.55 a.m., pursuant to order made Wednesday, February 19, 1992, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of second reading stage of Bill C-26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada, now before the House.

The question is on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Order adopted Wednesday, February 19, 1992, the recorded division stands deferred until 6 p.m. on Monday, February 24, 1992. The sitting of the House is now suspended until 11 a.m.

[English]

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, I realize that it is just two minutes before statements start. I think some members are in the House who are prepared to commence their statements. Perhaps we could start two minutes early for a change.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion made by the hon. member. Is there consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, as long as members who are prepared to participate are here and are ready to proceed, I think that is a wise idea.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: We shall call it eleven o'clock. Since it is eleven o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed with Members' Statements pursuant to Standing Order 31.

THE LATE ALFRED JOSEPH CASSON

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, as I walked to the House today, I saw the bright sky reflecting the beauty of this country which we too often take for granted.

I thought, what a pity so great an artist and a Canadian as Alfred Joseph Casson will no longer be here to interpret such glory for us.

I am proud to say that he was born in Toronto in the closing years of the last century, 1898, and was soon recognized as one of this country's great talents by the members of the Group of Seven who admitted him to their ranks in 1926.

From his colleagues, notably Lawren Harris, he developed a style based on simplification and the elimination of non-essentials.

He went on to contribute even more than his paintings by giving his full support to environmental causes.

Joining the ranks of the Order of Canada as an officer in 1978, he exposed this country to us in ways that did credit to all other members of that order and to the country itself.

There are those individuals who are given the talent to contribute something special to society. A. J. Casson was such a Canadian. Fortunately many of his works remain preserved in the public.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Madam Speaker, the Canadian negotiating team for GATT agricultural talks is in Geneva. Almost 30,000 Canadian farmers are in Ottawa demonstrating their support for supply management.

The message is very clear. Do not let supply management be sacrificed at the GATT talks.

If government lets supply management die, over 500 family farms in the dairy sector in Prince Edward Island will be destroyed. Hundreds of other Islanders could lose their jobs over the next few years if government gives in to foreign pressure.

Weakness at the GATT would be an economic disaster for Prince Edward Island. Supply management is the safest and most reliable food distribution system in the world.

The Prime Minister and Canada's GATT negotiators must persuade GATT to continue to strengthen article XI.

GASPE PENINSULA

Mr. Charles-Eugène Marin (Gaspé): Madam Speaker, tourism plays a predominant role in Quebec's economy and brings in more than $4 billion annually in revenue. Eastern Quebec, especially the Gaspe Peninsula, is among the most popular tourist destinations. Thanks to local entrepreneurship, a new company in Percé, Set-Ha Inc., will offer excursions for tourists starting next season.

This project, which represents an investment of $1,650,000, was assisted by the Federal Office of Regional Development-Quebec, which contributed $495,000. Construction will be carried out by Kata-Marine International, a shipyard in Paspébiac, in the Gaspe. The project, in addition to generating several dozen jobs, will help diversify tourist attractions in Percé and should encourage the 300,000 visitors that come to this part of the country every year to stay a little longer next time. People in the Gaspe are often told to start doing things for themselves. This project is only one example among many of the energy and entrepreneurship of the people of the Gaspe. The Gaspe lives.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Madam Speaker, thousands of farmers have gathered today on Parliament Hill to show the government their deep concern over the future of agriculture in Canada if supply management is not preserved at the GATT.

The GATT deal is near and much is at stake for our producers.

Supply management has been the cornerstone of Canadian agriculture. It has provided Canadians with an abundant supply of quality and reasonably priced food.

Our producers have asked our government to stand firm in Geneva and fight to have article XI of the GATT clarified and strengthened.

I was very happy to witness in this House on February 12 the unanimous support given to a motion which sought the protection and continuation of supply management.

We all realize that Canadian agriculture is much more than producers, processors and consumers. It is a part of our heritage and when a Canadian farm dies, a part of Canada dies too.

I join with the farmers from my riding of Stormont—Dundas who are outside this building today with fellow producers in calling upon the government to fight tooth and nail at GATT for the preservation of supply management.

LAVAL UNIVERSITY HOSPITAL RESEARCH CENTRE

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Louis-Hébert): Madam Speaker, I want to tell you about some initiatives put forward by our government to support research and development in Quebec. R and D plays a leading role in the growth of our companies and of the whole country. Unfortunately research institutions sometimes face financial problems. To meet this need, we set up a program to increase scientific research and technological development activities.

Through this program we were able to contribute $5 million to the Laval University Hospital Research Centre in Ste.-Foy to help it expand and modernize.

This project involves investments totaling more than $35 million and will create and consolidate more than 400 high-tech jobs.

In conclusion, this assistance program is an excellent way to give a new impetus to research establishments so that they in turn can contribute to economic development—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I must interrupt the hon. member because unfortunately her time has expired. The hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan.

[English]

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Madam Speaker, the GATT negotiations going on right now are crucial for Canada.

They are important for producers because our system of supply management is good for them. They know how much product they are going to be able to produce and dispose of. They know that they will get the reasonable price that they have negotiated. It is good for them.

It is good for the people working in the processing industry. As long as we are producing our own product those processing plants will have an opportunity to dispose of the small surplus that is calculated to satisfy just the process market.

It is good for communities in many parts of Canada where they are totally dependent upon the agricultural input into those communities.

It is good for Canada as a whole. It is a system unique to Canada, better than anything else anywhere in the world to produce the required amount of product.

The government has an opportunity and a responsibility to stand up not just for producers, not just for consumers, but for the whole of Canada and to say: "We are a sovereign nation. We will do this because it is good for Canada. We want you to work with us, but we are going to do it".

WOMEN'S SPEED SKATING TEAM

Mr. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to draw the attention of my colleagues in this House to two marvelous award winning performances by our Canadian athletes yesterday in Albertville.

I would point out that for the first time in Olympic history, the short track speed skating competition qualifies for medals. The Canadian women's team in the 3,000-metre relay won the gold medal for this event.

I wish to congratulate our speed skating veteran, Sylvie Daigle of Sherbrooke, Quebec, Nathalie Lambert of Montreal and two newcomers to the team, Angela Cutrone of Saint-Léonard, Quebec and Annie Perreault of Windsor. I have nothing but admiration for them.

I would also like to make particular mention of Miss Perreault's contribution. She is from my riding of Richmond—Wolfe. She must be very proud of herself today. Her family and her coach must be very proud of her too, and so are all Canadians, including me.

FARMERS' RALLY

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Madam Speaker, today on Parliament Hill tens of thousands of angry, frustrated and scared farmers are rallying to bring to the attention of this government their concern over the government's weak-kneed attempt to save supply management.

Our system of marketing ensures that the supply of a product does not exceed the demand for it. It provides producers with a reasonable return for their hard work while guaranteeing consumers across Canada high quality food at reasonable prices.

These farmers want the Prime Minister to personally meet President Bush and demand an American commitment to article XI.

They also want the Prime Minister to personally meet with them today to explain his actions in getting this commitment from the Americans.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, the federal government has consistently supported those Canadian agricultural producers who have requested that their sector be supply managed.

In fact the Canadian Broiler Hatching Egg Marketing Agency was established as late as 1986.

It is clear that the existing article XI of GATT is inadequate.

Therefore, with the support of Canadian dairy, egg and poultry producers, Canada has sought as part of its negotiating strategy at the current GATT round a strengthened article XI which would guarantee the import quota protection that is required by the supply managed sectors.

The problem is that the Canadian position on the import quotas has been declared unacceptable by all but a tiny handful of other countries.

I hope the delegation of farm leaders presently in Europe will be able to make the European Community better understand the Canadian position.

This calls for substantial reductions to all trade-distorting subsidies, increased access to international markets, a strengthened article XI, and clearer trade rules that equally apply to all nations.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, just outside the halls of Parliament today we have thousands of farmers gathered, fighting to save their jobs, their livelihood.

They are dairy farmers and poultry farmers. They are fighting against what is happening at the GATT talks.

I make an appeal to the Prime Minister of this country to fly to Washington to talk to George Bush directly and personally.

• (1110)

George Bush and the American administration are the main obstacles in fighting against our dairy farmers and our poultry farmers.

There are tens of thousands of farmers out there. It affects not only them, but also their families, their livelihood.

It affects thousands of jobs across this country in the food-processing industry from one coast of this country right to the other.

This is a Canadian issue. We have to stand up for our Canadian farmers, our Canadian people.

If this Prime Minister does not fly to Washington in the next few days to talk to George Bush, he is derelict in his duties as Prime Minister of Canada.

S. O. 31

ATLANTIC ECONOMY

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, the Atlantic economy has supported a disproportionate share of this government's economic assault on the Canadian economy.

There has been record-high unemployment in the region, record-high bankruptcies and a fishery which has been mismanaged by this government into utter collapse.

Now we here mutterings that in Tuesday's budget the government plans to take aim at the Canadian military once again. The military has already been savaged by indiscriminate cuts that border on lunacy.

These further cuts may also seriously damage the shipbuilding industry in Atlantic Canada, if indeed the government downsizes or cancels contracts for the frigate program or the coastal patrol vessel program.

These contracts, worth hundreds of millions of dollars, are not only vital for the efficient functioning of the Canadian navy but also are absolutely essential for the survival of the shipbuilding industry in Halifax and Dartmouth; Saint John, New Brunswick; and Georgetown, P.E.I.

I warn this government that the thousands of employees in the military and shipbuilding industry in Atlantic Canada will simply not tolerate another frontal assault by this government.

SUPPLY MANAGEMENT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, the farmers from Abitibi-Témiscamingue must not see their supply management system taken away from them at the GATT negotiations.

ANGELA CUTRONE

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, I have the honour and the great pleasure of rising in this House today to congratulate, on behalf of all my constituents, Angela Cutrone from Saint-Léonard for her splendid achievement at the Albertville Olympic Games.

Angela Cutrone, Sylvie Daigle, Annie Perreault and Natalie Lambert left for Albertville to represent Canada with determination and with the confidence of their country. They are coming back as champions of the 3,000 meter short track speed skating relay. All Canadians savour this victory with them. Their performance was impeccable. The people of Saint-Léonard are especially proud of one of their own.

Angela, I congratulate you for your courage and for your winning performance. I thank you for winning this gold medal and having so proudly represented Saint-Léonard as well as the rest of Canada.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Madam Speaker, more than 1,00 farmers from my riding are demonstrating on Parliament Hill today, and I want to let them know I support their action regarding the GATT negotiations. I would like to mention the participation of the President of the UPA Nicolet Federation, Mr. Réjean St-Pierre, and of the administrators and farm producers from Drummond, namely Messrs. Alain Désilets, Auguste Boily, Armand Courchesne, Ghislain Grondin, Michel Lambert, Édouard Oberli, Daniel Zuchoski, Rosaire Baril, Constant Cardinal, Jacques Corriveau, Mrs. Ginette Duff and Messrs. Jean-Claude Paradis and Guy Lefebvre.

The government said many times that it wanted to protect and maintain the four pillars of agriculture in Quebec, at the same time as it sought to strenghten article XI. I want to reassure farmers that, from the very beginning, the government's position on Article XI and marketing boards has not changed and it intends to defend those policies to the end.

In fact, Madam Speaker, all members of the House of Commons, both on the government side and in the opposition, support this position.

PORCUPINE CARIBOU HERD

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I rise today to inform the House of another important victory for the Gwich'in peoples of Alaska, Yukon and Northwest Territories in their fight to preserve an arctic way of life.

After intense lobbying by Gwich'in peoples and others, an amendment to the U.S. energy bill that would have opened up the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge in Alaska to oil and gas development was withdrawn from the United States Senate earlier this week.

This is just one victory, for there will be other attempts to open up this fragile wilderness area to development. This development would threaten the very survival of a national treasure, the porcupine caribou herd upon which the Gwich'in have depended for thousands of years.

I therefore call on the federal government to again urge the American government to honour its agreement to Canada to protect the caribou for now and for future generations.

AEROPLANE INDUSTRY

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Madam Speaker, as you know, I have on several occasions risen in this House to make a plea that this government give a very high priority to the development and expansion of the aeroplane industry in this country.

I call upon it to do that because this is an industry that I think could be hugely beneficial by creating a tremendous number of job opportunities and a great deal of investment in this country. It can do so without need of taxpayers' money. It is simply a matter of regulatory changes both in terms of licensing of pilots and in terms of creating a recreational category of aeroplanes.

The argument I face in pushing this industry is that we must as Canadians wait for other countries to develop regulations that would be consistent with ours, thus providing us with a market.

I argue that we led on the advanced ultra-light regulations. We can also lead on this. We can create a market in Canada and the rest of the world will follow us.

PINK SLIPS

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Madam Speaker, plant and store closings have unfortunately become a daily occurrence in Canada.

In common parlance, a notice of work lay-off is known as receiving the pink slip. I have received 1,106 pink slips, similar to the one I hold in my hand, from the members of the United Electrical Radio and Machine Workers of Welland.

The pink slip is intended as a discharge paper to the Prime Minister and this government. It also represents the concerns, worries and despair of my constituents who find themselves unemployed due to government policies such as the free trade agreement, implementation of the GST, and many others.

As it says on this pink slip, enough is enough.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister, the former Minister of Agriculture.

On Wednesday the Liberal member for Parliament for Gatineau—La Lièvre asked whether the Prime Minister would be attending the farm rally today. The Prime Minister refused to answer.

Yesterday the member for Haldimand—Norfolk asked whether the Prime Minister would be attending the farm rally. The Prime Minister refused to answer.

It is not a hard question. The government has had 48 hours to think about it.

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will join with the Prime Minister today to meet with the tens of thousands of Canadian farmers who have a right to hear directly from their Prime Minister?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Yes, Madam Speaker, it is my intention not only to meet but to address the group of concerned farmers.

The Prime Minister, as the House very well knows, has been working on this issue very hard. He has spoken to Chancellor Kohl and Mr. Delors. He has spoken to Mr. Major. He has communicated today with the Prime Minister of Japan and with Italy. He will be meeting with the Prime Minister of Italy, Mr. Andreotti, in Toronto some time later next week. As well he intends to meet with Mr. Bush on this as soon as arrangements can be made.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, my question was very specific. Will the Prime Minister meet today with the farmers? He has a right and a responsibility as Prime Minister to tell Canadian farmers where he and his government stand not only in public but in private on the specific issue of article XI.

Every political party in this country, except the Reform Party, says it supports marketing boards. In fact the Prime Minister has been unsuccessful in convincing his great friend, George Bush, that the Americans should allow the Canadian farmers to survive.

My question to the Deputy Prime Minister is: Will the Prime Minister tell farmers today what specific action he will take with his good friend, George Bush, to let him understand that the Canadian farm family's survival is critical to the survival of our country?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member does not have to lecture me on the position of the government with respect to article XI.

I was the Minister of Agriculture when this position was developed. It was developed in a very methodical way, in close consultation with all the producers across the country and with all the provincial governments. It is a balanced position that has been defended from the time it was developed, has been defended in the interim and is being defended today by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of State for Agriculture, the Minister for International Trade, all cabinet colleagues and all the caucus of this government.

In so far as what the Prime Minister is doing, I just outlined to the hon. member what the Prime Minister was doing. He has met with farm leaders and farm representatives on two occasions this week. He has communicated in public. I indicated to the hon. member that I will be there representing the Prime Minister today, on his behalf and on behalf of the government, as a former Minister of Agriculture and as the current Minister of Finance.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): The truth, Madam Speaker, is that in spite of all those fine words and gestures, the Prime Minister and his team have so far failed on this issue. I would like to ask two questions. Why is the Prime Minister so afraid to meet directly with the thousands of farmers who have come here today? Why does he continue to hide behind closed doors instead of stating publicly today his position on article XI of GATT?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I indicate to the hon. member and to other hon. members of the House what the Prime Minister was doing, how he has stoutly defended the position of the government, and is using his good offices to convey that message to all the world leaders with whom he has close personal relationships.

I might ask the hon. member how come she has become so interested in article XI. I never heard a peep from her in bygone days. Just because there is a protest out there, she wants to cash in on it.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, I would just say that the deputy leader of our party made a great speech last week. I did not see the Deputy Prime Minister make a speech in the emergency debate.

I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister. Tens of thousands of farmers from British Columbia to Newfoundland are rallying on Parliament Hill to protest the lack of progress this government has made in the GATT negotiations to save our supply managed sectors of the agriculture community.

The government has been negotiating for five years and Secretary General Arthur Dunkel in his report on the GATT a couple of months ago does not even mention the strengthening and clarifying of article XI. Why has the government failed Canadian farmers so grievously in those negotiations?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, what the members of the farm community are doing today, I believe, is supporting the position of the government. The hon. member laughs.

Mr. Simmons: They are laughing at you too.

Mr. Mazankowski: He says that they are laughing. Jack Wilkinson, vice-president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture who is over in Europe with my cabinet colleague, said: "Our main goal is to show that we support the position that there is uniform support from the farm community. It is a critical matter to us to have a successful conclusion to the GATT. We are here to do our part, to explain as best we can and to offer support to the Canadian position". I say amen to that.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, 25,000 farmers are rallying on the Hill today to protest the lack of progress in those GATT negotiations. They are terrified of tariffication. They think the government is going to sell them out.

This House passed a unanimous resolution asking the Prime Minister to get involved in these negotiations, to meet with the presidents of Europe and of the United States.

When the Prime Minister has been asked by the House of Commons to get involved in these negotiations, why does he refuse to meet with farmers who have spent thousands of dollars of their own money to come here to protest the lack of action? Why does the Prime Minister refuse to meet with them, speak with them and learn of the concerns they are facing today? Why?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, why does the hon. member refuse to listen to the answers? I just indicated that the Prime Minister has met on two occasions with representatives of the farm community.

An hon. member: This week.

Mr. Mazankowski: This week. He has dispatched three senior ministers of the government, along with farm leaders, to Europe to demonstrate the solidarity and to reaffirm and continue to explain our position. Meetings have taken place with Mr. Dunkel and the GATT negotiating committee. Meetings have taken place in Bonn and in Brussels.

I have just spoken to the Minister for International Trade and the Minister of Agriculture. The Prime Minister, as I indicated, has been touch with Chancellor Kohl and with Mr. Major, the Prime Minister of the U.K. He has also spoken to Mr. Delors. He has sent a communication to the Prime Minister of Japan and to the Prime Minister of Italy. He will be meeting with the Prime Minister of Italy next week. He is setting up a meeting with George Bush.

The Prime Minister is very actively involved in this. He has the support of the farmers and he has the support of members on this side of the House. I would hope that he would have the support of hon. members on the other side of the House as well.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The casualties of the government's war on inflation mount every day: a severe and prolonged recession, decreasing exports from this country and a decreased retail trade as we heard today. Of course there is decreased retail trade; people have no money to buy anything and they do not have confidence that they will have a job tomorrow. The only growth industry this government has created is the welfare industry.

Will the Minister of Finance put the same kind of zeal or energy he has put into zero inflation into having zero unemployment in this country? Can workers expect to see some hope in the next budget?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I find it passing strange that the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party would take issue with the government's war against inflation. If there is anything that is debilitating against low income workers, against senior citizens, against people on fixed income, it is the deterioration of their income as a result of inflation, particularly inflation that is unabated.

For example, I am sure the member would be interested in knowing that with 9 per cent inflation—and that was the average rate of inflation between 1974 and 1984—a person on a pension or on a fixed income would see his or her income cut in half in just eight years. On the contrary, with inflation at 2 per cent per year it would be cut in half in 35 years. That demonstrates the magnitude of the impact of runaway inflation. The hon. member, I would think, would have appreciated that.

Second, to contain the cost of inflation reduces the cost of doing business and improves Canada's productivity. That has been at the core of the problem. If we can get the fundamentals right, as we are so close to achieving right now, we will be in a position to take advantage of the opportunities that are before us.

I hope the hon. member will join with the federal government in its attempt to deal with the basics and the fundamentals because she has some colleagues in government—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the hon. minister may want to continue with the next question.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I am sure those 1.5 million unemployed and the other almost 2 million who are on some form of social assistance do not feel that a lecture will provide them hope, a meal on the table, or a job tomorrow.

The devastation, as we see, is from coast to coast in this country. Nowhere are the effects of bad government policies more evident than on the Atlantic coast where thousands more people are looking at the possibility of losing their jobs.

My question for the Acting Prime Minister is simply: Will the government commit today to review on the east coast every foreign fishing licence it has issued, with a view to terminating those which have contributed to the economic and human disaster? Will the government give notice of intention to extend jurisdiction over the nose and tail of the Grand Banks?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, on the question of extending the 200-mile limit, the hon. member should be aware that Canada at the UN is pressing this issue for extension. We could go at it the way she proposes, and that is probably for Canada to become an outlaw in the world. We can, but we respect international law.

On the question of the fisheries and of those fishing licences to foreigners, she should come and visit Atlantic Canada. She should come and see who is fishing there and she will find out that foreign nations have a right to fish sometimes. It is only after Canadian fishermen have indicated they have no interest in that stock. For the rest of it, we just respect our international obligations.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, it does not matter what industry, it seems, we are discussing. Whether it is disputes related to the trade deal, this government's talks fail, whether it is disputes on the Atlantic fisheries, this government's talks fail. Whether it is disputes at GATT, this government's talks fail.

I want to ask a question of the Acting Prime Minister. There are tens of thousands of farmers who are going to be demonstrating today. They represent only a small percentage of those 100,000 people who could lose their jobs and their family's income.

• (1130)

Will the Deputy Prime Minister urge the Prime Minister to speak to these farmers today and to speak to the Canadian public about the commitment of Canadians to farming industry. Will he urge the Prime Minister not simply to send communiqués, but to meet with his counterparts personally in Europe to put forward the Canadian case, to stand up for Canadians and for once to say to Canadian farmers, Canadian fishers, Canadian manufacturing industry that we will stand up—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The question has been put.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister has met with farmers on many occasions. I would say that this Prime Minister has met with farmers more often than any other Prime Minister in the history of Canada.

An hon. member: Trudeau didn't know what a farmer looked like.

Mr. Mazankowski: He meets with them on an ongoing basis. He met with them on two occasions this week. He has taken action with regard to this difficult situation, in communicating and talking directly to the major players involved in this issue. I will be there to speak on behalf of the Prime Minister and I will certainly convey any message that I pick up.

But my understanding is that this demonstration is in support of the government position. It is to reaffirm the unity and the support for the Canadian position that was developed with care, taking into consideration all the aspects of Canadian agriculture.

The hon. member laughs and giggles over there. He is not taking this seriously. He thinks that this is a time to score a few political points. Well, we take this very seriously and I will be there speaking to the farmers.

GRAIN TRANSPORTATION

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister who knows that any new GATT agreement could have a major impact on Canada's western grain transportation policy.

The current method of paying grain transport assistance directly to the railways is under review. But the Minister of Agriculture has already said that these payments are "an enhancing subsidy under the proposed GATT conditions set down in the Dunkel report".

My question for the minister is this. Has the government decided to change the method of payment?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the government has not made a decision on whether there would be a change in the method of payment. Consultations are ongoing, and in so far as the Dunkel proposals are concerned, Canada's response will be tabled I believe some time after March.

The hon. member understands, I am sure, that if there is to be any modification in the Western Grain Transportation Act, it will require legislation. He is clearly aware of the fact that a review is ongoing, which is required by the legislation itself, so that process is taking its own course.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is for the Deputy Prime Minister and concerns GATT as well. The thousands of farmers demonstrating today in front of Parliament are worried about the potential loss of 100,000 jobs and $10 billion to the Canadian economy. After negotiating for five years, how can the Deputy Prime Minister explain his government's inability so far to protect and improve article XI of GATT? How can he explain that?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the position of the Canadian government is very clear. The ongoing negotiations are still taking place and no one knows for sure whether there will ever be a conclusion to the GATT talks.

There is certainly a lot involved in this process. There are 108 countries. Canada's position has been defined very clearly. The Minister of Agriculture, the Minister for International Trade and the Minister of State for Agriculture are over in Europe right now trying to explain Canada's position so that it will be clearly understood. They are talking to other farm groups and the farm leaders are talking to other farm groups.

A number of countries support the Canadian position. We are attempting to rally more support for the Canadian position because we believe that the supply managed system, the marketing board system, is something that is very unique to Canadian agriculture. It does not contribute to surpluses in the international marketplace, it is a very unique and fundamental part of Canadian agriculture, and that is why the position that we defined is being fought for so intensely.

[Translation]

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Madam Speaker, farmers from all over Canada are right now showing their support for supply management to a government that has not been able to protect them, first under free trade and now in the GATT negotiations. I ask the Deputy Prime Minister how, after five years of failure, can the farmers gathered here trust a Prime Minister who already let them down in the free trade negotiations?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, that is a most unfair comment.

The hon. member should really reconsider that fact. In most cases, we would say that that is a cheap shot. There is no one who has more stoutly defended Canadian agriculture, whether it is the export side or the supply management side, than the current Prime Minister of Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mazankowski: When the hon. member says: "When are we going to protect supply management from the free trade agreement", I do not know where he has been for the last number of years.

The free trade agreement carved out supply managed systems. They were carved out and grandfathered, and the supply management systems remain. That is one of the advantages of the free trade agreement and that is one of the advantages of the bilateral negotiations that took place.

We were able to ensure that the supply management systems were protected and held in place. We were able to ensure that article XI was retained, which is the fundamental pillar to sustaining the supply management systems in Canada.

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Deputy Prime Minister.

One of the stumbling blocks to Canada's attempts to strengthen article XI has been the opposition of the American government.

Will the Prime Minister take advantage of his close personal relationship with the President of the United States by personally leading a delegation of his ministers and Canadian farmers to Washington within the next couple of weeks to gain American government support for the Canadian position?

Will he get off the phone and leave his office? Will he get together with the farmers and lead such a delegation within the next couple of weeks?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I simply remind the hon. member that when the free trade agreement was negotiated, supply management systems were not affected.

They were grandfathered, and that was the agreement with the United States.

Mr. Boudria: Remember ice cream and yoghurt.

Mr. Mazankowski: The ice cream and yogurt decision is one that was taken under GATT and not under the free trade agreement. It had nothing to do with the free trade agreement.

The fact of the matter is that in the negotiations on a bilateral basis, the supply management systems were saved. I indicated in response to an earlier question that the Prime Minister was, indeed, setting up a meeting with President Bush to talk about this matter.

Some say: "Why does he not meet people personally?" He is going to meet the Prime Minister of Italy, Mr. Andreotti. He is going to meet Mr. Bush. He has talked to Mr. Major.

It is very difficult for him to be meeting farmers and travel around the world at the same time. The hon. members cannot have it both ways.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister said in the House on February 5 that he has fought for the cause of farmers for six or seven years.

This is a copy of the government's initial proposal to GATT submitted in 1987. The document strategy is toward tariffication and toward the removal of marketing boards. Now the minister is saying: "We do not want tariffication. We support marketing boards". You cannot have it both ways.

I want to ask whoever is speaking on behalf of the Prime Minister how the Prime Minister can continue to say that his government supports Canada's marketing boards when its opening bid at the GATT negotiations in 1987 was, in fact, to dismantle supply management? Does he support marketing boards? Does he support supply management? Will the real prime minister please stand up?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, that is absolute nonsense. I will send the hon. member a documented copy of the Canadian position that was taken with respect to our negotiating position at GATT which includes very clearly the strengthening and clarification of article XI.

I should know because I was the one who was presiding—

Mr. MacWilliam: It's your document and it doesn't say that.

Mr. Mazankowski: I was the Minister of Agriculture when that position was developed and I will tell the hon. member that a lot of water has flowed under the bridge since 1987.

• (1140)

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, the government's bottom line at the GATT negotiations was revealed last month in a letter from the Minister for International Trade to the Tory members of Parliament. In the letter the minister states that Canada will not withdraw from negotiations even if it loses supply management.

I want to ask whoever is speaking on behalf of the Prime Minister, what kind of negotiation tactic is this? You have been showing your hand before you even play your cards. The Prime Minister and the Minister for International Trade have been playing two tunes off the same fiddle and now Canada's farmers may have to play their swan song—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Will the hon. member please put his question. It has been a very long preamble.

Mr. MacWilliam: Madam Speaker, I did pose my question. I asked what kind of negotiation tactic this was. The government has essentially played all its cards before the negotiations have proceeded. What are you going to do now, now that you have shown your cards, now that you have shown your bottom line, now that the farmers are up against the wall—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The question has been put.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the tactics that are employed by the New Democratic Party of excessive partisanship are certainly not the most appropriate way, in my view, of displaying a position of solidarity.

I thought all members of this House of Commons, with the exception of the Reform representative, supported generally the position that the Government of Canada defined in consultation with the producers of Canada and with other provincial governments; that is, the balanced position which says we call for the strengthening and clarification of article XI.

That is the position that I represented and that the former Minister for International Trade represented. That is the position that the current Minister for International Trade represents and the current Minister of Agriculture and the Prime Minister represents.

I do not know how much more clearer we can be. All the hon. member is doing is trying to engage in excessive partisanship, which I repeat does not play well across the country and indeed around the world.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. Liberal, NDP and Conservative members have unanimously adopted a motion asking the Prime Minister to continue his active of support of Canada's position at the GATT talks on agricultural policy by meeting with the President of the United States and other heads of state. Could the minister tell the House whether the Prime Minister is prepared to go and meet President Bush with a delegation of Canadian and Quebec farmers?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as I indicated in response to an earlier question, the Prime Minister has been in touch with Chancellor Kohl, with Mr. Delors of the European Community, with Prime Minister Major. He has sent a communication to Mr. Mitterrand and to the Prime Minister of Japan, Mr. Miyazawa. He has also sent a communication to the Prime Minister of Italy, Mr. Andreotti and he will be meeting with him in the next week or so.

He is in the process of arranging for a meeting with President Bush at an appropriate time, all of which is to say that the Prime Minister takes this issue very seriously. He recognizes the difficulties and the concerns that are being expressed by the farmers of Canada and he is prepared to act.

All I would hope is that on this occasion, at least for one time, that we act in a unified way, that we act with a display of solidarity. I think that that is what most of the producers out there are here to support, the position of the Canadian government in its difficult fight in achieving a fair deal for Canadian agriculture at the GATT.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Madam Speaker, 20 Newfoundland fishing captains were arrested last year. Their crime was fishing. At the same time, European boats took 164,000 metric tons of fish in the same general area in direct violation of the NAFO moratorium, enough fish to save every closed fish plant in Atlantic Canada.

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister, as the acting head of government here today: Why the double standard? Why is it we are harassing, putting the blocks to Newfoundland fishermen whose only sin is they want to put some bread and butter on the table and at the same time he is letting off the Europeans scot-free?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): The hon. member knows that this is not a double standard. He knows better. If he does not, the fishermen in Newfoundland and Labrador do. The question of foreign overfishing is one that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is working hard on. It is not easy, and we have acknowledged this. We are pursuing the issue on several fronts; at the UN in trying to extend the zone to protect the entire Canadian shelf, and in Europe, the government, with the help of the fishermen of Newfoundland and Labrador, is making public the impact that this has on the ecosystem in the Atlantic.

These are measures that are being pursued all the time and we intend to intensify them.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, as the Minister of Employment and Immigration knows, today, in fact in a few hours, the FPI processing plant in Port Union—Catalina will shut its doors. Eight hundred and fifty plant workers and 155 trawlermen will be without work. It is estimated that 120 of those will not have qualified for unemployment insurance. As their member of Parliament, I would like to seek the assurance of the Minister of Employment and Immigration that there will be put in place for those people a compensation package and that it will be adequate and immediate.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, in 1991, in addition to the safety net of unemployment insurance benefits, this government assisted fishermen and plant workers in Atlantic Canada with the $584 million Fisheries Adjustment Program and we developed a compensation program of $39.5 million. Literally hundreds of millions have been spent to help those people. If his concern is about this government caring about the situation of those displaced workers, I think we have demonstrated many times that we are ready to help and do what is possible to alleviate the problem, and we will keep on doing this.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. A few minutes ago, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, in reply to the question posed by the member from the Yukon said: "We cannot". The minister's knowledge of history needs to be strengthened.

It is a fact that the Government of Canada 20 years ago had the courage to extend its jurisdiction to protect Arctic waters from pollution. This government must now find the courage to conserve the fishery. The key is to claim the responsibility for the fish no matter where they swim.

My question to the Deputy Prime Minister is this: Will the Government of Canada find the courage to extend unilaterally Canada's jurisdiction to the outer limits of the Grand Banks?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): This is the position of the Liberal Party of Canada. Go out and tell the world. Go out. The Liberals in Canada want Canada to disrespect international law. It makes sense. Let us become an outlaw in the world. That may be what the Liberals want for Canadians, but this government will never do that.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, it is not this side of the House. It is the Prime Minister of Canada who, at home and abroad, has made immense and forceful declarations about the fact of his support for sustainable management, for the sustainability of natural resources.

Now the Prime Minister has to implement his words. Therefore the question is: Will this government find the courage that is needed to extend jurisdiction to the entire Grand Banks to ensure a sustainable fishery? Now is the time of truth.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): As my colleague, the Minister of the Environment, indicated yesterday, the Prime Minister has put this issue very high on his agenda for the Earth Summit that will be sponsored by the United Nations in June 1992 in Rio de Janiero.

Maybe through the route of countries acknowledging the impact that this overfishing has on the ecosystem we can achieve protection of those fish that, yes indeed, swim outside of the 200-mile limit. We are at the same time pursuing at the United Nations the legal way, that is extending beyond 200 miles, but according to law. I know the Liberals do not like it, but I am sure Canadians do.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): My question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

If I may, through a question, I will make a suggestion to the Deputy Prime Minister. When he speaks to farmers in a few minutes out front, I wonder if he would consider inviting a delegation of farm leaders to accompany the Prime Minister when he goes to see President Bush in Washington, and as well, inviting a delegation of MPs from all three parties to go with the Prime Minister in order to show the farmers of this country that there is solidarity in this country. We must protect their marketing boards. It is a way of life for the farmers. It means jobs not only for the farmers but for the workers in this country. An all-party delegation, including the farm leadership of Canada, with the Prime Minister might make an impact on the President, on the American media and on the American political leadership.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, certainly I will take the hon. member's suggestion into consideration, but I simply remind him that it was the Prime Minister who decided that his senior ministers, accompanied by leaders of the farm community, should travel to Europe. I think that what the hon. member is suggesting is somewhat consistent with what the Prime Minister has already acted upon.

I spoke with the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister for International Trade this morning. They have had very useful discussions. I think there were discussions with countries that were aligned with the Canadian position and also countries that were not aligned with the Canadian position. Obviously there are strong views held on both sides.

Obviously the effect of it is that the Canadian position is more broadly understood and provides some potential for improving the situation if and when a GATT deal can be concluded. The Prime Minister has been very open in terms of dealing with the agriculture community. I will make that suggestion to him and I thank the hon. member for it.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, it seems to me that the government does not understand sufficiently the degree to which Ontario farmers and farmers from across the country are scared and worried as they gather here in Ottawa today. The government says that farmers support the Prime Minister. In that case, why will the Prime Minister not meet with these farmers today and speak to them, not just with farm leaders, so as to show his commitment and so as to speak to that sense of fear and worry that is out there across the country?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, of course I understand the concern that farmers feel. I have understood it for quite some time because I was the Minister of Agriculture who was speaking on their behalf when the position that Canada has developed and still maintains was undertaken.

We, together with all producer groups across the country in a solidified position, developed a balanced position that we took to the GATT. We had generated a fair amount of support. Of that support, some of it is still there, some of it is waning. It is important to note that all provincial governments supported the Canadian position. The hon. member may not be aware, but the Prime Minister has met with the farmers. He met with about 500 this week.

I will be there speaking on behalf of the Prime Minister and I will convey the Prime Minister's message to them. The Prime Minister cannot be there today, but he has never refused to meet with farm leaders and farm groups. He does it when he travels around the country, he does it in Ottawa and he will continue to do so.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Madam Speaker, today there are tens of thousands of farmers on Parliament Hill and in other centres across Canada protesting this government's lack of leadership and progress in guaranteeing the continued stability of the Canadian dairy and poultry industries.

Several hundred of these farmers are from the United States. I have a letter here signed by 64 United States senators to President Bush demanding a continuation of section XXII of the GATT. It is a GATT waiver protecting their dairy industry.

In light of these mounting pressures within the United States, what action has this government taken to bring the government on side on this issue at the GATT?

An hon. member: A unanimous resolution from Parliament.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex has been grinning and snickering throughout the whole Question Period. As a former Minister of Agriculture, I would have expected something better than that.

The hon. member knows very well that we are doing everything we possibly can and will continue to do everything we possibly can to convince the contracting parties that, indeed, the position Canada has adopted is a balanced, realistic position and a fair position.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Madam Speaker, I have always been a supporter of a strengthened and enhanced article XI.

An hon. member: We know where we stand.

Mr. Ferguson: In view of the fact that these increasing pressures are taking place within the United States to retain their protection under section XXII of the GATT, protection for their dairy industry, their sugar industry and for peanuts and cotton, will the Deputy Prime Minister assure this House today that when they go to Washington that they will meet with these 64 senators who wish to retain section XXII and with the United States dairy farmers to form a common front against those interests that are threatening our Canadian dairy and poultry industry here in Canada?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am delighted and pleased that the hon. member supports the position of the Canadian government. I welcome that and thank him very much for it.

INFLATION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Could the minister give us the latest figures on the rate of inflation in this country?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Yes, I can, Madam Speaker. It is 1.6 per cent and it is one of the lowest in 20 years. I think it is a remarkable achievement because it is very fundamental to reducing our costs and preserving the lifestyle and the standard of living for Canadians and providing the groundwork for sustainable growth with price stability.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. During a recent study trip to India, information provided to members of this Parliament revealed human rights abuses by authorities in India's Punjab state.

Given that Amnesty International and other human rights agencies have been denied access to India, can the minister acknowledge today in this House that such human rights abuses are taking place in India and should be noted by Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Madam Speaker, our position on human rights is quite clear. Whether we are talking about our aid programs or the government's policy in general, we have an abiding concern for protecting human rights.

The Prime Minister himself, at the last two summits, the Commonwealth Summit in Harare and the Francophonie Summit in Chaillot, demonstrated Canada's commitment to protecting human rights, and that is what we are doing.

[English]

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, last year at a meeting of the Commonwealth heads of state, the Prime Minister stated that we will be increasingly channelling our development assistance to those countries that show respect for fundamental rights and individual freedoms.

Will the minister responsible agree to have this issue of human rights abuses in Punjab state immediately reviewed by the external affairs subcommittee on development and human rights so that Canada may update its position on foreign aid to India?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Madam Speaker, the human rights policy was implemented several years ago and it is being applied. It is not a new concept. We are already applying it; we review and evaluate it regularly, as circumstances require and also on a continuing basis. I take my colleague's remarks into consideration and we will continue to apply those principles.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture. Each farmer invested hundreds of thousands of dollars in order to buy quotas. They did so, Madam Speaker, because they believed what the government said to them. Today, it seems more and more obvious that this government met with a dismal failure and that quotas will disappear. Did the government consider the possibility to pay back to farmers their quotas at today's market value? Is it ready to make this commitment and to assure farmers this afternoon that they will incur no loss because of this government's inefficiency?

• (1200)

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead is another victim of the Bloc Quebecois sickness. Just like his leader, he is ready to give up before the negotiations are over. Negotiations are not over. We know what the Bloc Quebecois wants. We know they are ready to give up before the end of the negotiation process.

MIDDLE EAST

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I will direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister.

We are all deeply troubled by the escalation of violence in the Middle East.

We have reports this morning that a shipload of Scud missiles are on their way from North Korea to Syria. We have heard that serious bombings are taking place.

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister: Why is Canada so silent and passive on this issue?

As a country that is chairing the conference on refugees as part of the peace process, is it not the case that Canada must speak out to stop the violence and to try to stop the escalation and particularly to support the sanctity of the United Nations in this area?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, I think yesterday in this House, the Secretary of State for External Affairs very eloquently put forward her position. Indeed, she has spoken out to condemn violence on all sides in the situation in the Middle East.

It has been this government's position to work supportively towards a peace process. Again, we call on all parties to enable that to happen successfully as those talks recommence next week.

AIR CANADA

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Yesterday, Air Canada decided to do a bit of its own out-shopping and went to the United States to find a chief executive officer and president.

I want to ask the Minister of Employment and Immigration if Air Canada has applied to bring this individual to Canada.

If so, what proof has it offered the Government of Canada that there is no single qualified Canadian able to operate Air Canada?

If it has not applied, will the minister make sure that there is a fair and thorough review of such application and no quick approval?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the question of the admission into Canada of workers from foreign countries is regulated, as the hon. member knows. Air Canada, just like any other corporate citizen, has to go through the process.

The individual in question has been granted a temporary work permit. Air Canada will have to provide the department with all the information which the hon. member has raised. Once that is processed, whatever can be made public will be.

PETITIONS

CANADA POST

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I rise today to present a petition from citizens of New Westminster who call upon this Parliament to look at postal services in my community.

The petitioners state that closing the New Westminster post office and changing it into a commercial service centre for businesses only establishes two classes of citizens in Canada, and that this arbitrary decision was made without any consultation with the residents of New Westminster or with the New Westminster city council.

Therefore, they call on this Parliament to halt the plans to close the New Westminster post office on Columbia Street and replace it with a commercial service centre that does not serve the needs of all the public.

PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)) moved that Bill C–55, an act to amend certain acts in relation to pensions and to enact the Special Retirement Arrangements Act and the Pension Benefits Division Act, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee G.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to begin the debate on Bill C–55, an act to amend certain acts in relation to pensions and to enact the Special Retirement Arrangements Act and the Pension Benefits Division Act.

This bill is an important step in the evolution of the various pension plans in the federal Public Service. It responds to a number of long–standing concerns of plan members and fulfils the government's announced intention to ensure its pension programs observe the same income tax actuals as those imposed on other employers' pension plans.

I refer to this bill as a step in the evolution of our pension plans because there are still important issues relating to these programs that remain to be reviewed. Many hon. members will be aware of these.

There are concerns expressed by employees and pensioners about their role in the management of their plans and the investment of the pension funds, with the resulting effects on the return earned by the pension account.

[Translation]

The Auditor General has also suggested that these matters need further study and that the implications of the internal funding of Public Service pension arrangements be more fully assessed in terms of their impact on the management of public debt.

The members of the pension plans have also indicated that they would like to revisit many aspects of the design of these plans, and we agree that the adequacy and appropriateness of elements such as survivor benefits, disability benefits, co-ordination of these programs with the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans, vesting and portability should be reviewed in the context of the changes that have taken place in the work force, career patterns, and standards and practices of other employers since the current legislation was enacted by Parliament.

[English]

While these issues are obviously of great concern to the plan members, both employees and pensioners must recognize our responsibilities to the other stakeholders, the Canadian taxpayers. These important stakeholders expect us to ensure that the financial commitments we make to Public Service pension arrangements on their behalf are both reasonable and fair. It is important, therefore, as we look at the bill before us today, to bear in mind that the government considers these proposals as addressing only some of the most pressing problems with the pensions plans.

At the same time work is continuing on other issues that are also of concern but which may lead to more fundamental revisions to the nature of these programs.

[Translation]

I plan to meet with my advisory committee on the Public Service Superannuation Act very shortly to seek their views on critical issues related to pensions for the federal Public Service. The committee, which includes members from unions, senior management and the Federal Superannuates National Association, will be asked to advise me and the government on what they view as fair and appropriate solutions to long-term issues. Similar committees will be established for the Canadian Forces and RCMP Superannuation Acts under the proposals contained in Bill C-55.

Hon. members will be aware that the pension plan for members of Parliament has come under particular scrutiny by the public. The government will be re-examining all elements of this plan, including those features which have been criticized by some as too generous. In this examination we will welcome and take account of the views of hon. members who can personally attest to the importance of this element as part of their overall compensation package. Some of you have told me that the pension plan was a critical part of their decision to seek elected office.

At the same time I know that hon. members share my concern that some members of the public have criticized the current pension plan as too far out of line with general practice.

[English]

To be credible, a review of parliamentary pension arrangements must also provide for specific input from the public. I have already indicated that the views of those independent of Parliament will be actively solicited in this study.

Returning to the matter currently before this House, I would like to review the major provisions of the bill to indicate their impact and the government's rationale for the proposals.

Bill C-55, as its title suggests, would amend a number of existing statutes, principally the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, the RCMP Superannuation Act and the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act.

It also proposes the enactment of two new statutes, the first being a special retirement arrangements act which would permit revision to the existing plans as they apply to non-career diplomats and lieutenant-governors. As well, this act would provide for the establishment of a new type of plan for those covered under all those statutes except that applicable to members of Parliament.

[Translation]

The second new act proposed is the Pension Benefits Division Act dealing with the division of pension benefits on marriage breakdown. As well, there are related and consequential amendments required to the older Defence Services and RCMP Pension Continuation Acts and the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act.

Essentially the proposed legislation would put in place measures of two general sorts: first, some proposed measures where the government has indicated for some time its wish to move forward and where further delay would cause continued difficulty for members of the plans and their families; and, second, a number of measures to ensure that federal public sector plans comply with requirements imposed on all pension plans by changes to the Income Tax Act in 1989 and given full effect by regulations promulgated in January of this year under that act.

[English]

These tax changes were designed to ensure that all Canadians would have equal opportunities to benefit from tax assistance for retirement savings, whether those savings are made individually or as a member of an employer sponsored pension plan.

• (1210)

Clearly it is the government's view that those plans which the federal government sponsors as employer ought to meet the same legislation which applies to others.

Accordingly, Bill C-55 proposes revisions to each of the pension statutes to ensure they provide for pension plans that can continue to be registered under the Income Tax Act for purposes of tax relief on employee contributions.

Achieving this tax compliance means that in all of the programs, some elements can no longer be provided as part of the registered pension plan.

A simple example of this would be the Income Tax Act provision limiting the maximum pension to be accrued under a pension plan to $1,722 for each year of plan membership. Under the federal programs, this limit is not specified. It is necessary to incorporate the limit in each of the statutes by limiting the level of salary on which benefits can be based.

[Translation]

Imposing these and other limits in accordance with tax law on the basic pension plan would result in reduced pension coverage for certain employees. However, given that it is not uncommon for other employers to provide for retirement income arrangements that go beyond the tax prescribed maximum, and given that fundamental review of these pension plans is still under way, the government has concluded that it is appropriate to continue the present pension arrangements. This would be accomplished in the same way as it is for employers in the private sector by providing for benefits outside those that can be provided under the registered pension plans through a separate arrangement permitted by the Income Tax Act.

For all plans but that for members of Parliament, this would be done by regulations to be made under the proposed new Special Retirement Arrangements Act. These regulations would permit the current pension plan to continue to provide for employee and employer contributions to be made to a new fund to be known as the Retirement Compensation Arrangements Account. For members of Parliament, the retirement compensation arrangement would be provided in the statute itself.

[English]

The term retirement compensation arrangement or RCA is used by the Income Tax Act with reference to funds established by an employer that are in the hands of a third party to provide for future retirement income for their employees.

While an employer and employees may claim a tax deduction for contributions to such a fund, the custodian of the fund must pay tax on all revenues to the fund. The tax is refundable as benefits are paid out of the plan. The effect is that benefits provided this way are more costly than those provided under the registered plan.

While the federal government is obviously not a tax paying employer, we felt it was important to provide the RC approach for benefits outside those which can be provided under the tax registered pension plan.

Why? First of all, it is felt essential that there be recognition in the national accounts of Canada of the future obligation to employees for their own pensions.

It is also considered important that the government not take advantage of its status as a non-taxable employer and as a government to provide employees with compensation at lower cost levels that would not be available to other employers.

The over-all effect of the bill's proposals would be to ensure that pension costs are fully known to Canadians and comparable to those of other employers who provide similar arrangements.

I realize that this discussion of the tax compliance initiative has been somewhat technical, but it is vital to understand that the government has every intention of complying with its own rules and that we are not taking advantage of our unique position as a non-taxing employer and the maker of the rules.

At the same time the members of these pension plans should be assured that the government is not using this requirement as an excuse to alter the retirement income arrangements they rely on.

[Translation]

There is another aspect of this bill which would apply to all the existing plans and to the new arrangements I have just described. The bill also proposes that all plans should henceforth be operated on a fully funded basis, that is the credits made to the various pension accounts in the form of ongoing employee and employer contributions should be at levels which, together with the anticipated future interest earnings, would be adequate to provide for the future benefits of the employees as they are being earned.

As part of this initiative, the contributions that are now being made to the supplementary retirement benefits account by employees and employer would henceforth be made to the relevant superannuation account. The balances in the supplementary retirement benefits account related to each of the pension plans would also be transferred to the main pension accounts. Basic pensions and indexing of pensions would be unchanged and would then be paid from this combined account.

[English]

Employee contribution rates would remain at the same level. The government would contribute at the level necessary to maintain full advance funding of accruing benefits.

Provision is also made that any existing or future unfunded liabilities associated with these plans would be recognized and amortized by additional government contributions.

The effect of these changes and the financial arrangements would be that all pension obligations relating to each sector would be recognized in one plan, thus consolidating the assets and obligations in respect of each group. This would clarify the financial situation of the programs and make sure they operate on a basis that is consistent with private sector standards. The full funding of all benefits would also help to reassure employees and pensioners about the security of their benefits.

[Translation]

Some other aspects of this bill that are of significant impact on the members of some or all plans would be viewed very positively by those who are affected. These are the changes that I have characterized as fairness improvements. They will surely be welcomed by those affected, and the government does not wish to delay them any longer.

The first of these relates to the provision in the Public Service Superannuation Act of the opportunity for persons employed on a part-time basis to benefit from pension coverage, if they choose. To date, Mr. Speaker, as you know, only those working 30 or more hours per week contribute. All employees who are employed to work more than 12 hours per week on average would now qualify to contribute.

Those who are so employed when the provision takes effect would have the option to elect not to join the plan, but future part-time appointees would be required to contribute.

[English]

This is a significant step in allowing individuals to reconcile their personal and work commitments without jeopardizing their long-term retirement situation. It would give effect to a government commitment in the white paper on PS 2000. The bill also proposes that plan members be allowed to elect to make additional contributions in order to count prior part-time employment as pensionable service if such employment occurred after 1980, in recognition of the government's long-standing commitment on this subject.

Another longstanding commitment that would be honoured in this legislation is the provision of an early retirement program for operational employees in the Correctional Service of Canada. I am sure most hon. members have been made aware of the need for this program by the efforts of the CSC employees. I am sure members would agree that work in this field is highly stressful and that it is important that individuals who choose such a career should know that there are alternatives available to them if they cannot continue their career for as long as might normally be possible in other lines of work.

It is also important both in terms of achieving the objectives of the correctional service system and ensuring public safety that this particular labour force have such flexibility. While the detailed terms of the program are to be specified by regulation, and this would be done only after consultation with representatives of the employees concerned, I would expect that it would be similar to the voluntary early retirement provisions that are currently found in the Public Service Superannuation Act for air traffic controllers.

• (1220)

In essence, that program permits individuals to choose to retire at age 50 or later with 25 or more years of service and receive an unreduced pension with indexing payable from age 60. Like air traffic controllers, CFC employees covered by the program would be required, of course, to make additional contributions toward these benefits.

[Translation]

Another aspect of the Public Service plan and the plans of the Canadian Forces and RCMP has been criticized by plan members as imposing hardship. That is the provisions of the plans dealing with pension coverage during leave without pay. While most plan members would agree that provisions which allow pension rights to be accumulated in respect of leave without pay are a positive benefit, some find unduly onerous the requirement that the contributions owing for such periods must be repaid beginning immediately on return to duty.

This is especially true if the employee is required to contribute at double the rate for the period. The bill proposes that an employee be allowed to choose whether or not to count periods of leave without pay in excess of three months. At the same time it would allow an individual who initially chooses not to count the period an opportunity later to elect to reinstate the period as pensionable service. Again the bill seeks to recognize that additional flexibility for plan members is necessary to permit them to manage their personal affairs.

I might mention too that this provision, like that for coverage of part-time employees, would particularly benefit women who continue to be the employees with the greatest need for room to balance family and career commitments. Many women, for example, take advantage of extended periods of leave without pay for the purpose of caring for young children or for elders, and this provision would enhance their ability to return to work without undue financial hardship.

[English]

I would draw hon. members' attention to two other provisions affecting some members of our Canadian Forces and the RCMP.

One of these is the addition of the provision in the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act that would extend pension coverage to a full-time member of the reserve force who had previously left the regular forces without entitlement to a pension. Pension contribution would commence after one year of reserve service and the individual would be permitted to elect to count prior service in the forces of full-time reserve. Again the proposal is directed at meeting the needs of individuals to meet their own career and personal goals.

In the case of the RCMP, Bill C-55 includes provisions which would standardize the age and service requirements for voluntary retirement of officers with those for non-officers. To date, officers must have 30 years of service and be age 55 or have 35 years service to retire without a pension penalty. Non-officers may retire after 25 years of service. Clearly, this existing distinction could act as a disincentive for an RCMP member of long service to accept a commission as an officer.

These are the major proposals of the bill which affect members of the pension plans as employees, but plan members also see these plans as a critical part of the over-all financial planning package for their unique family situation.

I would to review now some of the important proposals which affect this aspect of the plan.

Of the broadest impact would be changes to the supplementary death benefit provisions which are found in part II of the current Public Service Superannuation and Canadian Forces Superannuation Acts. This is essentially a form of life insurance for the members of these plans which provides a lump sum payment to their designated beneficiary or their estate upon death. The benefit is now set at a level essentially equal to annual salary although benefits decline by 10 per cent per annum from age 60. From age 65, a paid up benefit of $500 is provided and after age 70 that is the only benefit payable.

For some time now concern has been expressed by plan members and that concern is shared by the government about the growing reserves in the death benefit accounts established for those two plans. It has been concluded that action should be taken as quickly as possible to address this situation by making significant improvements in the level of benefits payable under the plans.

Accordingly, the bill provides that coverage for active employees be doubled and the paid up benefit be increased from $500 to $5,000.

I am pleased to advise that these improvements would be financed entirely from reserves in the plans and there will consequently be no increase in costs to participants or taxpayers. This change seems to be a fair way to deal with the need for action on this program while awaiting the results of further review of the over-all plan design and its inter-relationship with survivor benefits provided elsewhere under the pension plan.

[Translation]

In another area touching on the importance of pension plan coverage as a family financial planning matter, hon. members should note that this bill would also enact a new statute called the Pension Benefits Division Act.

For some years now provincial family law has been evolving on the subject of the inclusion of entitlements under employer sponsored pension plans as a part of the family assets accrued during marriage. In most jurisdictions the value of pension plan accruals is now taken into account in arriving at decisions about the division of assets on marriage breakdown. In most jurisdictions provincial pension standards legislation requires plan sponsors to recognize and act on court orders or legal separation agreements which specify a division of pension assets.

[English]

Indeed the Federal Pension Benefits Standards Act requires that employer sponsored plans subject to that act recognize such orders or agreement. The federal pension statutes, which would be amended by Bill C-55, are not currently subject to any of this legislation and at present no such request can be honoured. This has clearly led to considerable difficulty for some plan members and their spouses in settling their personal affairs since pension values can be a large part of the total family assets.

The government believes its pension plans should be able to accommodate such situations. A method to do so is set out in the proposed new pension benefits division act. This act would allow the legal or common law spouse access to up to 50 per cent of the value of the pension benefits accrued during the period specified in the court order or agreement. This would be done by having that value transferred to another retirement savings vehicle or in the case of a retirement compensation arrangement or RCA directly to the spouse.

The act, together with appropriate regulations, would provide that an offsetting reduction could then be made in the plan member's pension under the plan.

[Translation]

I would particularly like to draw to hon. members' attention one other proposal in Bill C-55 which would apply to all plans. Representations have been made to me and, I am sure, to other hon. members, that a change should be made to the current provisions of the pension statutes which preclude payment of a survivor's pension to a person who was not the spouse of the plan member when the member retired.

I sympathize with the desire of pensioners to ensure the financial security of those they marry after retirement. However, the government does not feel it appropriate to extend the current survivor arrangements so that an additional pension liability of this sort is automatically assumed by the plan. Nevertheless, this possibility will be considered further as part of the broader review exercise which will include study of the current survivor benefit arrangements in general.

In the meantime, and in conclusion, I am pleased to point out that Bill C-55 would allow pensioners under all of the plans who are in this situation an opportunity to provide for survivor benefits. In effect, individuals may elect to reduce their own pension in order to provide for benefits to a person whom they marry after retirement. For example, for a 60-year old man who married a woman three years younger than himself, a reduction of 15 per cent in his pension would provide a widow's pension of 50 per cent in the event of his death.

[English]

In my remarks I have tried to touch on the major initiatives to be found in this bill and explain why the government feels it is necessary to move on these matters at this time.

There are, of course, other aspects of the bill of smaller impact in terms of the numbers affected. These will be discussed as we move to a more detailed consideration.

I would like to end my remarks today by reminding hon. members that Bill C-55 represents only a step in the Public Service pension reform process.

I expect to have the opportunity to bring forward broader and more fundamental legislation on this subject at a later date, if necessary. I will do so only after serious and detailed study of the issues and after consultation with all those who are affected or have an interest.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I notice the hon. minister's comments that he wants to bring the pensions in the public sector of Canada into line with the same standards applied to other pension plans. All I can say is that it has taken an awfully long time to make one tentative step forward.

It is always a pleasure to get up and say when the government is doing something right. In this particular bill it is doing a few small things right.

However, the government is so unaccustomed to it, it is so tentative about it, that the best it can do is take one small step and get a little toe into the puddle of doing things the right way.

It is really quite unacceptable. Equality is an absolute term. It is not something we can give people in little bits and pieces as the mood moves us. Equality is a right.

It is appropriate in this year, 10 years after the adoption of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms that the government for the first time, with one small exception is making a step toward equality and fairness in its pension plan.

Even before the charter was applied to pension considerations an all-party parliamentary committee in 1983 made a major report proposing changes similar to or at least including those which are before the House today.

In 1985 we had the report on Equality For All that proposed exactly the same changes. That same year the government amended the Pension Benefits Standards Act that applies to all federally regulated employers to implement many of those changes to bring pension plans across Canada into conformity with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Not too long after, it made similar amendments to the Canada Pension Plan paying attention to the parliamentary committee on pension reform and paying attention to people's rights under the charter.

But it has taken a full decade before it will even take a first tentative step toward applying the charter to its own pension plans.

We see this in a number of fields. We certainly see it in employment equity where the government passes legislation that says that companies that are regulated by the federal government or do business with the federal government have to be equal opportunity employers. Until now the government has refused to bring itself under the same rules and regulations. We now have major business organizations asking that it do exactly that, that it not apply rules to others that it is not prepared to live by itself.

We see the government talking about pay equity but refusing to implement it, and in fact fighting it through the courts. We have a constant pattern of do as I say, not do as I do.

Again this morning the minister has talked about a process for fundamental review of the pension plan. He knows its inadequacies perhaps better than I do. He knows the ways in which it does not conform with the same standards required of other pension plans.

The words he said this morning about consultation and a thorough review with all the stakeholders might be encouraging, except we have heard them often before from the President of Treasury Board. Since 1987 the previous President of Treasury Board has promised exactly the same thing, saying that Public Service employees would not have to wait long for equality, would not have to wait long for a fair rate of return on their pensions, would not have to wait long for a say in how their pension plans would be managed, among other things. Yet here we are five years later and they are still waiting.

I hope the President of Treasury Board will not blame me or a quarter of a million Public Service employees if we do not hold our breath. His announcement was made in December that this review would happen, and just this past week before the public accounts committee the person who is to be responsible for that review admitted that no, they had not talked to any of the unions yet and nothing had been done to get the process started.

We will deal with what is before us in the bill but recognize that it is a very small, tentative and inadequate step toward even conformity with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. A decade after the adoption of the charter I frankly think that is a little bit disgraceful.

I think it is also brought about by the fact that there happen to be a number of court cases under way. Even with this legislation in front of us, the government has chosen not to deal with all the issues that are in those cases in front of the Supreme Court but rather has chosen to fight equality in the courts on pension matters.

Let me deal with some of the specific issues in the bill that have been recommended, as I said over and over again, as changes to be made to this pension plan, changes which have been made and which are required of private sector companies that have pension plans but which the government has chosen not to impose upon itself.

The minister has spoken very briefly about a change to the provisions with respect to divorce and separated spouses. One way of doing that is indeed, as this bill proposes, to allow for a division of the assets in the pension fund at the time of a separation or divorce. However, that is far from dealing with all the issues involved and it is far from meeting the standards required of other pension plans. In fact we are still left with the situation where Treasury Board has the discretion, believe it or not, to deem a spouse to be dead just because they happen to be separated and Treasury Board has decided they are not entitled to a share of pension.

The bill requires court orders. I hope the minister is seeking some expert outside advice on how that affects the equality of women and their entitlement to a fair share of family assets on divorce and marriage breakdown. Right now he has a case before the courts. He had it in his office and was able to deal with it a number of months ago and chose not to honour a court order for splitting of pension benefits. I hope he will forgive many women, who were married for 25, 30, 35 or more years while the pension was being accumulated and now have no share in that pension, a bit of skepticism about why this very narrow concession to their interest is being made and why the government is not going all the way as it has required other pension plans to do in allowing them simply a prorated share of the pension that they helped earn.

This is a complex issue and many more points need to be dealt with in conjunction with it. I certainly hope that we are going to have time at the legislative committee to do that and that there is not going to be, again, a requirement to report back in an unreasonably short period of time.

I also hope that perhaps the minister will look at splitting the equality provisions in this bill. I think it is really quite unconscionable to put equality into a bill along with a whole lot of other technical amendments that are required because of changes to the Income Tax Act and perhaps require that people who have been waiting a decade for equality will wait even longer while we go through all the implications of the Income Tax Act for other whole sections of the act that are unrelated to their needs and to their rights.

I would like to touch on a couple of other cases where the government has been much more generous with its legislated requirements for other pension plans than it is prepared to be for its own employees and their spouses, survivors and dependants.

The government knows full well that the vast majority of those elderly living in poverty are women and that one of the prime reasons for that is the lack of access to pension benefits.

Even a spouse of a pensioner who has contributed, usually through her work in the home for many years, to the accumulation of that pension now gets only 50 per cent of the pension under the Public Service plan. Yet the government, seven years ago, required private sector employers to provide 60 per cent survivor benefits.

Why does the government think that a company, whether it is running a retail store, a car dealership or a steel foundry can provide 60 per cent survivor benefits but the Government of Canada cannot?

As I said, there is a number of equality issues involved in this bill. There are a number of equality issues that should be in this bill that are not. I can only commend the minister on the provision with respect to part-time employees. As he knows full well, that applies not only largely to women but is also an important element of allowing persons with disabilities to remain involved in the work force as long as and to the extent possible and continue to receive all the benefits of being employed.

I have been speaking about the Public Service plan. Of course, as the minister has said, this bill applies also to Armed Forces and RCMP plans. Those have a number of specific provisions that are not being addressed in this bill, but again we have a promise that sometime in the future they will be addressed.

I think the minister is well aware of the concerns of Armed Forces pensioners about early retirement which is often not a matter of choice and about their pensions which for many years remain unindexed so that the pensioners drop into poverty well before their pensions start to have any degree of protection against inflation.

There are a number of other issues as well that the bill does not deal with which relate certainly to part-time employees and people who are in and out of the work force more often. We know that they are more often women than men, that this is a major contributor to the poverty of women, and that has to do with how soon one is entitled to the contributions one has made to that pension plan, known as vesting.

With an economy that is changing dramatically and rapidly, the question of portability and when one is able to transfer one's pension to another employer become very important issues. These are issues that are not dealt with in this bill.

In summary, there are equality issues that are barely touched in this bill. I do believe it is unconscionable after a decade of the charter that the government would impose on other employers the obligation to be a fair employer with respect to pension matters and not take that responsibility unto itself. It is part of the cynicism that is rampant in the country right now; again the attitude of do as I say but there are special rules for me and I do not have to live by everybody else's rules.

I want to return to the next phase because the minister has promised a review. As I have said, we have had those promises repeatedly over the years. I really am not expecting a great deal, especially knowing that it was announced in December and still has not started.

The minister is aware as well that government is promoting labour-management partnerships to the tune of $1.4 million in expenditure of public funds. Yet I do not believe there has been consultation on this bill before it came forward. I am not sure that there is going to be consultation in the review process. If there is, it certainly has not started yet. In fact the minister's own summary of what is happening next says that they will take into account views expressed by others. Taking into account is not the same as consulting, and one has to ask the question: "Whose money is this anyway?"

It is interesting when we look back on the history of the Public Service Pension Plan, because every year since its inception until this year it has paid more into government coffers than it has taken out. As recently as 1989, I believe, that amount was $400 million in excess of contributions over pay-out. Every year since the plan was instituted in the mid-1950s it has contributed to reducing the tax requirements of the government and reducing the borrowing requirements of the government. The Public Service Pension Plan alone in that peak year was responsible for reducing the public deficit of Canada by $400 million.

I have spoken in this House often about the management record of the government, which I do not think is terribly good, and the pension plan again shows that. Whereas in 1989 there was that substantial surplus of contributions over payments out of the pension plan, there has been a dramatic plunge; the situation is reversed. For the first time ever the pension plan has paid out more than it has taken in. That means the government is not getting the benefit of a well managed fund which is helping to reduce the deficit but in fact is now having to pay out of public coffers toward the viability of the pension plan.

There are a number of reasons for this. The Auditor General, in last year's report, was very clear about the irresponsibility of the government in how it manages, how it reports, and how it accounts for the management of this fund. So serious are those charges that the public accounts committee has now undertaken a thorough review. The minister has not indicated in any way how his review is going to take account of those complaints of the Auditor General, but the Auditor General said: "If this were a well managed pension fund, invested as private sector pension funds are, it would be generating a far greater rate of return than it does". He criticized the lack of accountability in how the government borrows from this fund and reports to Parliament. He made it clear that Parliament has no way of holding the government accountable based on the current reporting procedures for its borrowing, all of which are debt and deficit related.

One only needs to read the Auditor General's report to realize why in a broader sense we now have double the deficit and double the debt we had when this government took office.

The minister has spoken about the interests of Canadian taxpayers. The interests of Canadian taxpayers is first and foremost in having whatever funds are in the hands of the government well managed and well reported so that people know how their money is being used, how it is being spent, how it is being lent, and so on. As well, the Auditor General had a number of things to say about management, pointing out again that the government has required all private sector employers to have employees involved in the management of what is after all their fund, yet the government has refused repeatedly to do that. I want to point out one more thing. This bill will be in committee very shortly. Naturally we all want to see positive moves toward equality in the bill implemented as soon as possible.

• (1250)

I ask the minister to consider taking those provisions out of this bill, allowing them to be reported back into the House so that a somewhat shameful record of not implementing equality for public sector pensioners for a decade can at least start to be undone.

Dealing with a bill of this magnitude is also going to require understanding the economic implications for the pension fund of the measures we will be asked to approve.

I would like to point out again to the minister that I have written to him requesting copies of any studies that have been done which show the implications for the pension fund of a number of the measures contained in this bill. We have not been provided with those studies, if they have been done. I certainly hope we do not have measures before us without the ability to define what the implications are going to be. I would ask that he provide those as quickly as possible because essential and long overdue changes in this bill can be put into legislation quickly.

I urge him to be most generous when this bill is in committee, in terms of considering amendments that would move a little further along to the equality for women particularly, persons with disabilities who are affected by the provisions of this bill thought they had won 10 years ago but are still battling for in the courts.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak at second reading of this bill and to clarify that this bill deals with public sector pensions as well as those of members of Parliament that the minister spoke to earlier.

In general my party and I support the provisions of the bill. It will go to committee after second reading and we will be proposing amendments to the bill. We support those provisions related to the non-political public sector part of the bill. We will not vote against the bill at second reading because we want to get it into committee and have some of the changes that the previous speaker alluded to that are so important, as well as have a full discussion and hear witnesses from various representatives and interested parties.

New Democrats have certainly led the way in promoting strong and progressive pension plans for public sector workers. We have led the way in establishing and improving pensions for all Canadians. One among us, I believe, deserves special mention, our friend Stanley Knowles who devoted so much of his career to the cause of public pensions and a dignified retirement for all Canadians.

Public sector pensions are not what I want to speak to today. There will be ample opportunity in committee to hear witnesses and to make appropriate amendments.

I think it is long overdue that we raise the question of pensions of members of this House, pensions that at this time mean that after six years of service, members of this House receive a pension regardless of age or whether or not they move on to employment elsewhere in the federal government.

In short, I believe that the time has come to recognize that those pensions must be brought in line with the general workforce. The time has come to bring pensions for members of Parliament into line with the pensions of other Canadians. What is the rationale for the present situation?

[Translation]

It is partly because politicians are very aware of the precarious nature of a political career.

Most women and men who enter politics do so at great personal cost. They risk their career and at times give up a much higher salary. Very often they face an uncertain future.

One cannot know what will happen at the end of a parliamentary career, whether it is given up willingly or not. I understand that. New Democrats understand that.

In the past the transition for us NDP members was often much more difficult than it was for those from the other political parties.

We know that people who choose this life make great sacrifices. But I would like to tell you, and I say clearly, that it does not justify a pension plan like the one that exists now.

We need to have a pension plan like most workers have. Nothing in all that justifies receiving a generous pension at the same time as another public sector salary.

[English]

This is a subject of great intention and differing points of view in the public and I suspect in this House. There are transition difficulties facing parliamentarians when their parliamentary careers voluntarily or involuntarily are brought to an end. I do not believe the way to deal with that is through the pension plan nor through simply assuring that people will have a pension for life after six years of service regardless of their age. There are other ways to deal with this, as it is dealt with in the public domain, and that is through a severance package which is geared to helping those who need to make that transition. It is of sufficient scope to deal with some of those prices of public life.

I do not think we can build a rationale based on the sacrifices we make. We all chose this career. We all ran for political life because we wanted to serve our country. I do not believe this makes us special. It means we have chosen this career because we believe on all sides of this House that we have something to contribute to public life. There are many Canadians who contribute to public life; many do it voluntarily. Many put themselves on the line by expressing their views publicly. There is no doubt that parliamentarians, because we fight for our beliefs and we do so publicly, are subject to closer scrutiny by prospective employers.

It is the union workers who put their views on the line and can be fired from the company. There have been examples, of course, in the public sector, where members have expressed their views and have put their future on the line. We are not alone in this.

We may have some special problems but we are not alone. In itself this is not a good enough rationale in my view. I remind members of this House there is no other Canadian in this country who receives a pension after six years.

The autoworkers, whose plant shut down just today, certainly will not have that kind of pension. The fish plant workers who saw their jobs disappear last week will not have that kind of pension. None of these Canadians, nor the millions of others in a similar position, can count on a plan such as our own.

It is time we came to grips with this in this House. Since the last legislation was passed, there have been a variety of changes made to assist members of Parliament. Some of them should go further in making that transition.

We are accountable for the public trust. We are accountable to those who elected us to make sure that what we support is fair, not less but fair, and that each and every one of us can stand before the electorate of Canada and say that we have put in place a fair system.

I suppose if we are prepared to fight for a pension scheme such as we have for all Canadians, this side of the House would be very happy to support that.

• (1300)

We would be happy to support a pension plan that would be publicly managed so that people could have true portability and could have pension plans that truly serve the interests of all Canadians. But that is not what is at issue in this bill and I do not believe that we can ignore, as parliamentarians, that this bill deals with parliamentary pensions and members of Parliament pensions.

There are many things that make it more difficult for members of Parliament, but any one of us who speaks to our political staff would find that there are the same arguments, because they have chosen a political party, they have stated their views as well and they too would have a difficult time. They do not have a pension similar to what we have.

I believe that the essence of democracy is that we work for things in this House to make it more representative; things like affirmative action so we have more women in this House, we have more visible minorities and we have more aboriginal people.

I believe we work for electoral reform so that people with disabilities and people on low income can be assisted to run for this House of Commons and Parliament and participate in the parliamentary system. In that way we will have better decisions, a better Parliament and a fairer Parliament.

I do not believe that we can simply rationalize the kind of provisions that have been made for us when we look at what is happening to Canadians across this country.

Therefore, I want to give notice that while we will be pursuing amendments in all aspects of this bill, I will be pursuing amendments relating to the age of eligibility for members of Parliament pensions so that eligibility is brought in line with the general public and private sector and amendments that would restrict a former member of Parliament from collecting an MP pension cheque while having also a federal government job, commonly known as double dipping.

Let me also suggest that I believe the bill before us should be split so that the issues of public sector pensions and those of MPs can be dealt with separately. I think this would be a fairer thing to do.

In referring to members of Parliament pensions in this bill, the minister said that the government was intending to study this. There have been a number of studies back in 1969 and I am sure many others that have been done over the years. Let me say to the minister that we have now the opportunity to take some steps into making the benefits that we have in line with those of the general Canadian public.

I also believe that the time has come to establish a non-partisan, independent commission to deal with the issues of MP pensions; not ex-members of Parliament, as has been the case before, as many of the provinces have, to look at the whole issue of members of Parliament pensions.

Having said that, I do believe that we have an opportunity to do something now that is logical, that is consistent with the public domain and that just simply is common sense.

I believe we can make changes that are fair and certainly do not require extensive study.

[Translation]

In 1992 when people are being asked to make one sacrifice after another, when social programs are being cut, when times are tough, members of Parliament cannot in good conscience continue to advocate for themselves a pension plan that other people can only dream of.

The time has come for us to address this directly, to address it in committee after the passing of second reading and to be no more generous than what we advocate for other Canadians. We now have an opportunity to make a step forward. We can set a new direction here. We can demonstrate to Canadians a new kind of politics where fairness is our guiding principle.

I hope that the minister will be open to these issues and that they will have a fair and open debate in committee. I want to assure the minister that we want to see this bill go forward because we believe that the minister has made some positive proposals for public sector workers. I also say to the minister that now is the time to address the other pressing issue and that is of our own benefits.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great attention to the discourse of the hon. member for Yukon about double dipping. I wonder if triple dipping is equally wrong.

If an individual was a federal appointee, had been a federal MP and had been a member of the Ontario legislature and in each case for exactly the amount of time required to receive a pension, is that wrong as well? If so, has she phoned Mr. Deans to tell him about it?

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, there are many ex-members of Parliament, I am sure quite legally and under the rules that exist, as well as the Senate and the bench who are following what the procedure has been.

I am not going to phone anybody. Why should I phone anybody? I am asking that every member in this House tells their electors that from now on it is not okay for MPs to have a pension that no other Canadian has. That is what I am going to do.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, the remarks of the Leader of the New Democratic Party are shared by many people in this country at this particular moment. As she has stated so often, all members of Parliament and all legislatures are held in disrepute and there is a terrible lack of trust.

I am trying to understand where the member is coming from. If someone served as a member of Parliament for eight or ten years and wanted to continue serving the Government of Canada in a capacity other than an elected member, and if they were to forgo that pension option but would work somewhere in the Public Service, would the hon. member consider that a fair exchange rather than taking up the pension? At least that experience and that commitment to public life could be exercised in some other part of the Public Service somewhere in the country or around the world? Would the hon. member consider that a worth-while option as a counter proposal?

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, I am not suggesting that the experience that members of Parliament or indeed senators have would not be valuable in various domains of public service and paid public service. I would not suggest that at all.

All I am saying is it is not very logical to most Canadians, and quite frankly not very logical to me, that if you have a public sector job paid for by the taxpayers that you are at the same time receiving a pension. Of course, you would receive the pension upon retirement. No one is suggesting that not be the case.

Of course I think members of Parliament have much to offer to public life when they are no longer sitting members of Parliament.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I have to be very clear. Is double dipping right or wrong? It was wrong a few minutes ago when it is was part of the prepared text. In answer to a question it seemed to be okay.

I want it clear. Is double dipping or triple dipping right or wrong? I think parliamentarians and Canadians have a right to know.

Perhaps the member could indicate to us as well, given her vast knowledge of this topic, whether she thinks that contributions made to the fund by MPs are in a deficit position at the present time and, if so, by how much?

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, it is really interesting to me that the Liberal Party seems to want to justify that you can get both a pay cheque and a pension. I think this is great.

What I want to say is that we are making a moral judgment here. I am saying it is time to change the law and those who are currently doing that would be subject to the changed law. It is as simple as that. You get a federal government pay cheque or you get a pension.

In terms of the pension fund, as the member well knows, the pension fund itself is not in deficit but there is a $144 million unfunded liability, but that is not the issue.

• (1310)

That is something we can discuss in committee and I am sure the government will have proposals. The issue is whether members of Parliament in this House are prepared to stand up and say: "It is time for a change in this plan. We want to make improvements". This is not criticizing our colleagues of any political party. My predecessor from the Yukon, I am sure, has a pension from the federal government and also has a federal government job. I do not criticize my predecessor, even though he is from the Tory Party, for doing that. What I am saying is that it is time for us to stand up and make some changes now, not simply to criticize.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I am trying very hard to understand where the hon. member is coming from here. There are tens of thousands of people in police forces and fire departments across this country who put in their time and their years and sometimes their pensions mature when they are in their early fifties or sometimes late forties. Many of these, what I would consider to be pretty healthy pensions, tend to come from organizations that tend to be very well organized, mostly trade union operations. Is the member suggesting that the double dipping she refers to, which should not be allowed, I understand, should also apply to those public sector operations as well or is she just saying parliamentarians?

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, let me make it perfectly clear. This is referring to a bill which is before us, which includes MPs' pensions. The amendments which I suggest we should make refer to MPs' pensions and this in fact is an opportunity for us to deal with those. One of those issues is a federal government pay cheque or pension or both. I am referring simply to MPs' pensions at this time.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): I have a short question for the leader. I found her speech to be most interesting and challenging.

I want to ask her this: There are a number of pension plans in Canada that are what we refer to as offside. There is the constabulary in Newfoundland, the teachers in Newfoundland and various other groups throughout Canada who have a special job, such as prison guards and so on and so forth, that have special features to their pensions. What the hon. member is referring to today are the pensions of members of Parliament to bring them in line with other pensions.

Is she suggesting at the same time that these other groups in our society who have special pension plans and abide by the law as amended should also be brought in line to conform with the status quo across Canada of the same pension for everyone?

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, I realize that hon. members would like to do anything to avoid addressing the issue of MPs' pensions. I will respond to the member because he asks a good question. I am making proposals on MPs' pensions and I am suggesting, as I suggested in my remarks, that we should look at a non-partisan committee to look at all of the details of the bill, that there are certain things we could take action on now. The hon. member makes certain points about other kinds of pension plans. That is why I feel what is essential to this is that we do have a non-partisan committee, not of ex-MPs as we have done before, to study this. I am also saying, dealing with members of Parliament pensions, there are certain measures we can take now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee G.

FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING AGENCIES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Wednesday, February 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. McKnight that Bill C-54, an act to amend the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act and other acts in consequence thereof be read the second time and referred to the Standing committee on Agriculture.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to make some comments following some of the comments made by my colleagues last week on this piece of legislation.

As you have heard, the amendments that provide for national check-offs on agrifood commodities are a long sought after and effective technique to enable the Canadian agrifood industry to become more responsible for its own well-being.

This is not a government devised system imposed on the agrifood industry. Many and various sectors within the industry have called upon the government to provide this system for some time.

I note that consultations within these sectors and with the provinces have shown broad support for the check-off system and the legislative means by which that system would operate.

The producers, processors and importers of agricultural commodities do not supply management. That is, all commodities except poultry, eggs and dairy products have never had the legislative means to impose a mandatory national levy on themselves.

Such means have existed at the provincial levels, but any effort to fund such competition enhancing promotion and research at the national level has depended on voluntary participation by members of any agricultural sector. Since it is voluntary, it has not been sufficiently widespread nor has it offered the long-term stability necessary to sustain effective programs.

In addition, there has been no federal legislation that permitted the collection of national check-offs on imports as well as domestic agricultural products. In order to enact such a national check-off system that would include imports, the government had two choices.

It was decided that the amendment option was the best route for a number of reasons. Amending the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act in essence means some straightforward changes to extend many provisions to cover imports.

Simply put, it already contained most of the legislative provisions needed for national check-offs. Therefore, it provided a basis for putting the check-off provisions into law that met the tests of simplicity, speed and efficiency.

Taking this route meant extending a faster and simpler helping hand to an agrifood industry that is determined to become more competitive and self-reliant.

This government is committed to those goals. Heightened competitiveness, especially in the new international trading environment, translates directly into more and better jobs for Canadians.

As you know the Marketing Agencies Act had a somewhat tumultuous birth back in the early 1970s. It was the first federal legislation that provided for the establishment of supply management systems for agricultural commodities.

As such, it provoked a great deal of debate and discussion within the House of Commons, the agrifood industry and the general population. As a result, this act became synonymous with supply management in the public mind, but as the Minister of Agriculture has pointed out it is important that we all understand right now that amending this act to provide for national check-offs in no way ties check-offs to supply management. These amendments will in no way weaken the existing supply management provisions contained in the act. Conversely the amendments do not in any way represent the first step towards supply management for those commodities not currently under it.

• (1320)

To keep this absolutely clear, we have taken great care with the wording of the amendments. The new sections dealing with national check-offs do not simply use the term, marketing plan, which has in many peoples' minds come to mean supply management. Instead, the check-off amendments specifically refer to the market promotion and research plan that better describes the mandate of what check-offs would pay for. It allows for no confusion with the provisions covering supply managed commodities.

Perhaps the best approach to demonstrating the together but apart nature of these two streams of the amended act would be to cite a specific example of how a check-off program might work.

This example comes from a number of draft preliminary proposals that groups within the agrifood industry provided during the consultation preceding the drafting of these amendments.

Let me say that by citing this particular example, I am by no means committing the proponents or ourselves to following their preliminary plan to the letter.

For instance, the Canadian Horticultural Council and the Canadian Produce Marketing Association represent every element of the production and marketing of fresh fruit and vegetables in Canada.

These two organizations have undertaken, through the Fresh for Flavour Foundation, to promote the consumption of fresh fruit and vegetables. Funding for the foundation has been on a voluntary basis and unfortunately it has not been sufficient to pay for an adequate promotional program.

The problem has been an inequitable sharing of the costs among industry and trade members. As a result, the Horticultural Council and the Produce Marketing Association joined the industry call for a national check-off system.

Money raised through the check-offs would be used to promote the sale of fresh produce through programs for food, health and safety, educational activities, product and consumer research, and surveys of special group needs. There would be enough funds to pay for continuous promotional activities and other marketing enhancements.

The proposed check-off on fresh fruit and vegetables would be one-fifth of one per cent of the value of the product.

Based on 1988 sales of $2.2 billion, this rate would have raised $4.4 million. The check-off would be applied against produce being sold in the province in which it was grown, produce sold in other provinces and any produce imported from other countries. It would not be assessed on produce destined for processors or on processed imports.

Let us come back briefly to the $4.4 million that a national check-off would have raised in one year. That is a healthy sum to use in the promotion and marketing of fresh produce and to pay for product and consumer research to supplement that being done by government.

Many voices from coast to coast in the agrifood industry have told us they desire more autonomy. Like all entrepreneurs, they want to feel and be responsible for their own destiny. Having the dollars to pay for those important marketing and research activities is an essential part of that independence, and one we all welcome. Having the right under federal law to choose to collect that money from themselves is just as important.

The check-off amendments provide that right, that choice and that potential for more self-sufficiency.

Let me emphasize that this enabling legislation will have little or no impact on food prices for Canadians. We all know consumers are becoming even more price conscious when they do their grocery shopping. It might be easy for people to look quickly at the idea of national check-off for the agricultural products and leap to the wrong conclusion that these changes to the law will mean producers will charge more, and the consumer would end up footing the bill.

This is simply not the case. Using the example of fresh fruit and vegetables, the proposed check-off is only one-fifth of one per cent of the value of the product which would be an insignificant proportion of retail sales. We should not worry that the check-offs would mean hardship at the grocery store, or that there would be price hikes that would provoke more cross-border shopping. On the contrary, better efficiency gained through check-off funded research will ultimately benefit Canadian consumers, as will the generation of consumer information that will come and be one of the prime results of the check-off program.

Let me conclude by saying the amendments that would create the new Farm Products Agencies Act represent a win-win combination for the agrifood industry and our consumers. We believe this legislation will provide additional confidence to the agricultural sectors that we are all looking for. We urge the House to permit this legislation to move as rapidly as possible, and we ask the co-operation of all members of the House of Commons.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the parliamentary secretary's intervention. We go back together in this House to 1979 and I have learned that he is a very successful farmer, as well as a successful parliamentarian.

I have some facts here that disturb me and I wonder if the parliamentary secretary could shed some light on them. I know that self-sufficiency in food production is the country's best security. That applies not only to Canada but to all countries that have high food production. Yet in 1989, Canada imported more farm products than it exported. Although Canada is a net exporter of agricultural products, agricultural imports have increased by 17.5 per cent throughout the eighties, while exports rose only by 2.2 per cent.

The parliamentary secretary is a successful farmer on the government side, and they are bringing in legislation. We have had the debates around the GATT and clarification of article XI. Could the parliamentary secretary share with this House why there is this discrepancy? Why are exports not keeping up with the imports?

Here we are, a country which is the bread basket of the world, and yet we are importing more food than we are exporting. I wonder if the parliamentary secretary could address that. Will this bill help us increase our exports and reduce our imports?

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to respond to my colleague and as he mentioned, we do go back some years in this House of Commons. We have served on various committees together which we think were very beneficial to the legislation we have today.

But the hon. member speaks of imports and exports. We have to recognise that in the last 10 or 12 years, very many changes have taken place in the world marketing of not only agricultural products but of all trade and trade goods. In particular, consumer demand has played a role in some of the products coming into this country. Consumers are anxious to have fresh vegetables and produce available on a year-round basis. Years ago when more women worked in the home, more homemakers had gardens and preserved vegetables, et cetera, in the fall months. Most people's habits have changed since then and as a result there are probably more imports at certain times of the year. But also as you have said there has been an increase in exports.

Let me go back to about 1985 when I don't think any of us envisioned the trade wars that were going to take place, in particular between the United States and the European community. That brings us up to the GATT talks. We all know we have a difficult time competing against those countries, but I think for a population the size of Canada's we have done extremely well in maintaining support for our farmers, even though those trade wars have been taking place. Our adamant and consolidated position at this Uruguay Round of GATT talks has been developed by the stakeholders and the federal and provincial governments. We hope it will enable us to maintain a better livelihood and the confidence that our farm sector needs.

The member asked if this legislation would help agriculture in the future. I believe it will, because up until now any imported product did not contribute in any way to the advertisement or promotion of anything that was imported. I use beef as an example. If beef is imported into this country, and we know there are times when it happens, there is no way it assists the Canadian cattlemen or those who promote the consumption and use of beef. Now with this voluntary legislation, they will have the right to collect a levy on the product coming in and that will certainly help in the promotion of the product. There again I hope it would enhance the position of our Canadian producers in promoting Canadian products.

• (1330)

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member participated with members from all three parties of this House in the demonstration on Friday. An estimated 25,000 farmers came to the Hill to remind this government not to abandon the supply management marketing system we have established that has been so successful over the years.

I keep reminding this House that we had a family farm in Saskatchewan and after 22 years of farming it could not keep the whole family at home. We had to sell the farm and move to another industry.

Thanks to the supply management system, farmers are now a getting reliable income. Now it is being threatened by the GATT negotiations. We have heard all the arguments pro and con. Naturally these 25,000 farmers were demonstrating to preserve the supply management system.

The hon. member also knows that the western grain producers are getting the Crow Rate subsidy which may also be under threat of being removed by the GATT negotiations.

Can this government not use the argument that the dairy and egg producers are producing food mainly for the domestic market and therefore this should not even be raised in the GATT negotiations? The grain producers are exporting most of their product and would come under close scrutiny under the GATT negotiations.

What is this government doing now to make sure western producers do not lose the western transportation and handling subsidy? It is not really a subsidy because it is paid to the railways and this is how we developed western Canada. It is really a regional assistance plan if anything.

It looks like this government is not speaking out very strongly. It is not negotiating with other countries over the GATT negotiations and we may lose both. We may lose the supply management system and the so-called Crow benefit.

I would like the Parliamentary Secretary's opinions on that.

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Speaker, this certainly gives me an opportunity to expand on some of the discussions we have had on what was said earlier.

The member refers to the farmers and supporters of the farm organizations who were on Parliament Hill on Friday. I was not here on Friday because I travelled to Brussels, Belgium and then on to Bonn and Geneva on the weekend. We left last Wednesday night and met with farm leaders over there on Thursday and Friday. It was a wonderful opportunity for all of us to spend some time with farm leaders in the high level of meetings we had while we visited in those countries.

In Brussels I had the opportunity of meeting with European parliamentarians. I put forth our position and tried to get them to understand why there is no reason to change article XI, other than to clarify and strengthen it. We do not export that product and we are not interfering with their market. I believe they understand that much better now. I believe the farm leaders played a very major role in putting our position across and we thank them very much for that.

Some of them met with Mr. McSharry, the EC Commissioner. I think everyone in this House knows who he is. We met with the German Minister of Agriculture and I believe he understands our position much better. We met with the Vice Chancellor that same day. The other part of the group met with Arthur Dunkel the Director General in Geneva, and with Ambassadors and farm leaders of those countries as well.

I believe our position has been enhanced by those meetings as well as by the strong support from the great number of people who were on the Hill last Friday. They reminded not only this country but countries of the world how important it is for us to maintain a strong agricultural sector, and article XI is very much a part of that.

The hon. member mentioned the Crow rate. I think he would agree with me that the Crow rate has been a topic of discussion in this House many times, probably since we were first elected to this House of Commons. I do not know how much longer those discussions will continue. As well, the method of payment has always been a topic for discussion. We realize that it is an issue we need to talk about. I see nothing wrong with discussing how the Crow benefits should be paid. That is not complete yet. Discussions have to take place with respect to the Crow benefit and the benefits to the western grain farmer.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to follow on the heels of remarks make by the hon. parliamentary secretary. He commented on his recent trip last week to Europe concerning the GATT. More specifically, his trip was to pursue the concerns of the supply management people here in Canada. I wish he had been able to come back with some good news, but he was not able to come back with good news.

In a way it is the same story that has now been going on for five or six years. The government says that it defends supply management and our marketing boards and is doing everything possible to protect our system. However its efforts have so far failed. That is why, even at this eleventh hour, we are pressing the government and have been pressing the government for weeks to not give up one inch. We are pressing the Prime Minister to take advantage of his special relationship with the President of the United States and implore, beseech and beg him to come onside so that we will not lose the most productive and most stable sector of our agricultural community, which is our supply management sector.

The hon. parliamentary secretary also, in answer to a question from my colleague from Toronto, made a reference to the method of payment of the Crow benefit. As we all know, right now payment is made directly to the railways. The government has been sponsoring a number of meetings across the prairies concerning the method of payment. The government says it is consulting, that it is asking the farmers for their view on whether the method of payment, which is direct payment to the railways, should stay the same or be changed.

The government says it has an open mind and that is why it is consulting the farm producers. Some of us feel that the government has already made up its mind and will abandon direct payments to the railways and begin making payments to the producers. With that change would come all kinds of ramifications and implications.

Let us get to Bill C-54 which is before us now. It is a bill which would provide amendments to the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act. In many ways on the surface it is a fairly straightforward bill. It would put in place a check-off and out of that check-off would come money for research and promotion.

I noted what the minister said in his remarks last week about Bill C-54. He said: "The money will be used for consumer education, domestic and foreign markets as well as research and processing of a product, distribution as well as marketing". On the surface that sounds as innocuous as motherhood. However, notwithstanding what the minister has said and notwithstanding what is said directly in this particular bill we on this side of the House have a lot of questions. We are not going to let it slide through unnoticed. We want it to go to committee because we have all kinds of questions.

We also note that there are a number of organizations in this country which support the bill. Some of the organizations which have expressed their support include: the Canadian Cattleman's Association, the Canadian Pork Council, the Canadian Horticultural Council, the Canadian Fruit Wholesalers Association, The Fresh for Flavour Foundation, the Western Grains Research Foundation, the Canadian Honey Council and the Canadian Nursery Trade Association.

Notwithstanding what the minister has said and what these organizations have said in support of this particular bill we want the bill to go to committee. I understand the bill will go to the Standing Committee on Agriculture because that is where it should be vetted and that is where it should be examined in detail.

We want to be assured about safeguards. We want to know exactly how the bill is going to be used. There are concerns in certain quarters. There have been concerns that this is an unfair tax. There is naturally concern about the government's motivation, which might possibly be to off-load its research responsibilities onto the shoulders of producers, and perhaps further down the line onto the shoulders of consumers. The hon. parliamentary secretary who spoke a few minutes earlier said that should not be a concern. He said that it was not the intent of the government to off-load any of its research responsibilities, nor was that its motivation. I take the hon. parliamentary secretary at his word. In fact, his minister said the very same thing in his remarks last week, and I do not question the minister's remarks either.

However we do have these concerns. The place to raise the questions and to examine these concerns is the Standing Committee on Agriculture. If the bill had the effect of off-loading the government's responsibilities, it simply could not be allowed.

There is also the concern about the bureaucracy resulting from such legislation. We should examine that as well in committee.

Another matter is what is going on at the GATT right now. We all know that if Canada fails to get article XI strengthened and clarified and if we end up with a system of tariffication supply management is more or less doomed. Our marketing boards will lose their raison d'être.

If marketing boards no longer have control over prices or quotas what is left of them? What impact would there be with this legislation in place? Again we must ask at committee about the implications of this legislation before us today if we lose our marketing boards.

Mr. Speaker, you will appreciate why we want this to go to committee. I also want to raise the matter of the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act, an act that is now more than 20 years old. Out of that legislation came our supply management system from which came a number of agencies: the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency, the Canadian Turkey Marketing Agency; the Canadian Chicken Marketing Agency and the Canadian Broiler Hatching Egg Marketing Agency.

These agencies, our supply management system, have brought order and stability to that sector of agriculture; order and stability where before there was disarray and chaos. The supply management system in our country is a Canadian success story. It is an outstanding success story, one that we can be proud of. It is a system that has provided plenty of food, good food, healthy food.

I know that the producers are proud of the system. They are proud of their achievements under it and do not want to lose it. I do not want to lose it. We on this side do not want to lose supply management. That would be harmful to our country, very damaging to our country.

Let us not forget that consumers have not done badly in this system either. Do not listen to the hogwash coming from sources such as the The Globe and Mail. Those people would love to destroy supply management. They would like us to believe that if somehow supply management ended tomorrow consumer prices would cease. The Globe and Mail believes in fantasy. The Globe and Mail is dreaming, because that is not the case.

Under supply management not only do we have lots of good healthy food but our prices are not that bad either, the second lowest in the world. That is certainly nothing to sneeze at. They are certainly consistent with the rise in the consumer price index. What do we find if we compare price increases under supply management with price increases in those commodities not under supply management? There is no difference. Supply management does as well as those other commodities.

I have said in the House before, and I will say it again, that they have done away with supply management in Australia. Have the prices gone down? Not that I am aware of.

Despite this great Canadian success story we may lose supply management, and with it order and stability and real productivity in that sector of the agricultural community. We will lose it if the Dunkel report is adopted in the final GATT agreement, if there is a GATT agreement. We will lose it because Dunkel is not moving to strengthen and clarify article XI. We will lose it.

Let there not be any doubt in our minds. I know there are people out there who believe that our supply management system can survive under so-called tariffication. They have put out the word: "Can you imagine? We will have tariffs of 200 and 300 per cent. How could any American company scale that kind of tariff wall of 200 and 300 per cent?"

Let us not be deceived. In Canada we are not in the same situation as they are in the southern United States where the climate is a lot different. It is much warmer. They do not have the same energy costs. They do not pay the same wages. They do not even have the same expensive quality control. They have enormous economy of scale and they have enormous production capacity. They can climb; they can scale that tariff wall.

The wall will come down slowly but surely over a number of years anyway. We can be sure that they would flood this country with their surplus stocks, with their surplus supply. We can be sure that in the phase-in years of tariffication, the large multinationals from the United States would be happy enough to accept marginal profits for the sake of scaling the tariff wall and penetrating our market. When they have killed our supply management system and knocked off our farmers—some of the best in the world—do you think they would be satisfied then with marginal profits? Not on your life, not on your life.

Let us not be fooled by tariffication. Let us not be fooled by this talk of tariffs of 200 per cent or 300 per cent and that somehow supply management can continue under tariffication. It cannot. If you do not have control over quotas and prices, there is not a chance that supply management will continue.

The threat posed against supply management at GATT is part and parcel of what you might call a new world economic order. If the multinationals have their way, the nation state will be dead. There will not be national identities or national borders any more. They want a world that is theirs and theirs alone. They want the entire planet to be their marketplace. They come back and tell us not to worry about their using the entire planet as their marketplace because as long as we are competitive and understand globalization, everything will be fine. In other words, just be smart and work hard and everything will be fine and dandy.

Let us not be fooled by that because they have certain advantages they will exploit and use, advantages that we Canadians do not have. We are just as smart and can be just as competitive as anybody else, but at the end of the day you have to have some kind of level playing field. If they start 100 yards up the track, there is a pretty good bet who the winner will be at the finish line.

The multinationals know that and we have to pursue both national and international policies that are in our interest and I am not preaching protectionism. I am prepared to work as hard as anyone else. I am prepared to be as competitive as anyone else, but just give me an equal opportunity. Give me standards and mechanisms where everyone has to play fairly and by the same rule book. Give me the opportunity to feed myself. A country must feed itself. A country that cannot feed itself is extremely vulnerable and has no future.

We have to realize what is going on around this world. I think there are some people across the way who do not realize this new world economic order is emerging. It is a new order driven by the multinationals who want to establish their own hegemony and their own control. This is not anti-American or anti-any country. All I want is a system where we can protect ourselves, be competitive, very productive and very efficient.

I hope we can give this bill to committee as quickly as possible so we can get the answers to some very important questions.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment my colleague for his passionate support of the marketing boards we have in this country.

I want to refer him specifically to a document our colleague from Lambton—Middlesex put out some months ago, called "Compare the Share". This document basically illustrated the spread between what the farmer received and what we paid at the retail level. It was a clear illustration of the fact that the farmer, in relation to the retail price, receives sparing little.

As an urban member, I have a difficult time communicating to my constituents that the farmers themselves get such a small amount of the money people pay at the retail level.

It is ironic that the member mentioned The Globe and Mail because I share his view that not all journalists at The Globe and Mail, seem to have the same attitude toward our market boards that we do. Does he not think that part of our exercise here, and part of the government's exercise should be to take a more aggressive campaign to communicate the idea of comparing the share so all the people of Canada would understand and thus become more sympathetic to marketing boards?

Mr. Harvard: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood for that question. It is a discerning one and I believe he is absolutely right.

The farmers and urban dwellers are not foes. As far as I am concerned we are partners in a joint operation. We have to eat and farmers produce the food we eat. It is of no benefit to urban dwellers or consumers anywhere in this country to keep farmers impoverished. We want farmers who are prosperous. We want farmers who have their own stable economy. We want farmers who are very productive, and that is what we have.

We just take the service and production from the farm for granted, whether we are eating at home or in a restaurant. We just take it for granted that the food will be there and will always be high quality. It does not just happen. It is not just some miracle or accident. There are people out there working very, very hard in the hope they will derive a fairly good living.

I have heard some people say there are a few rich farmers who may be worth a few hundred thousand dollars and maybe even a few who are millionaires. Well what is wrong with that? Is there something wrong? People in the businesses of coal, newspaper, broadcasting and freight can make a million dollars, or at least they did in the past. People thought that was achievement; that was accomplishment. But for some reason if you spot two farmers in the country who have a million dollars and might be able to fly off to Florida for a couple of weeks in the winter, some people stand up and say that is not right. They are making too much money and that is terrible.

The hon. member from Broadview—Greenwood pointed out "Compare the Share", that excellent work done by my colleague from Lambton—Middlesex. It proves that the farmer is not gouging the consumer. He is not getting his fair share of the profits coming from his production.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I could not help but take note of the words of the member for Winnipeg—St. James when he talked about our realizing what went on in this world.

I could not agree with him more that a country's best security is being able to feed itself. I would like to share with the House, a brief informal meeting that the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade had this morning with Dr. Zimmer, editor-in-chief of a well-known newspaper in Munich.

He shared with us the problems in Germany and we shared with him the problems facing us here. Their farmers are facing a similar problem to ours. Unless they get some assistance from the government, they are going to go under.

I could not help but take note. Dr. Zimmer talked about the farms in Bavaria, where their government is giving subsidies to the farmers because the beautiful Bavarian farms are tourist attractions.

Our time is running out, but I was going to ask the hon. member who comes from the west how our farmers can compete if a rich and powerful country like Germany has to support its farmers or they will not exist.

Mr. Speaker: It being two o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, as the crew of the HMCS Restigouche sails from home waters today to the foreign reaches of the Red Sea, we should all be fully aware that by enforcing the sanctions of the United Nations against the Government of the Republic of Iraq, they are playing an historic role in the establishment of the rule of international law. The vigil in the Red Sea will make a valuable contribution to the maintenance of world peace.

The Restigouche has been called upon to perform this task with the full knowledge of how much has already been contributed by Canadian defence activity within the previous 12 months. We are also aware of the sacrifice involved for the families and the loved ones.

With the experience gained during the deployment with the standing naval force Atlantic and the professionalism shown during the preparations for departure, we have complete confidence in the ability of the crew of the Restigouche to represent the highest ideals of Canadian naval tradition.

May God bless HMCS Restigouche and all who sail in her.

LIBERAL PARTY

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, as the country moves toward a constitutional resolution, the Liberal Party this weekend overwhelmingly endorsed the primacy of the charter of rights, adding these values to its interpretation: the preservation and promotion of Quebec as a distinct society within Canada, and the linguistic and cultural protection and development of the official languages communities living in a minority situation.

In short, Liberals remain committed to a Canada where English speaking Quebecers and francophones outside Quebec are enhanced integral parts of our cultural plurality.

This was a more positive contribution than the constitutional affairs minister's damaging speculation last week about English speaking Quebecers being set adrift in a divided Canada. The minister has raised many fears and concerns in the hearts of many Canadians all over Quebec, especially in my riding, just when we need reassurances about Canada's future.

Instead, we all need to have a renewed Canadian federation that does not compromise any Canadian's individual rights through the application of creative thinking, so that a uniquely Canadian solution can be found which will meet the needs of Quebecers, the east and west and the aboriginal people across this country.

TRIBUTE TO OUR OLYMPIC ATHLETES

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I call the attention of all members of the House to the performance, in Albertville, during the weekend, of Canadian medal-winning athletes. Of course, the clouds over Albertville during the weekend had silver linings for our Canadian athletes.

With the official recognition of short-distance speed skating in the Olympic Games this year, the men's 5,000 metre relay team finally won the silver medal after a close struggle. I wish to congratulate Mickel Daignault, Frédéric Blackburn, Marck Lackie and Sylvain Gagnon for their brilliant perfomances.

For the first time in 32 years, the Canadian hockey team reached the finals for the gold medal, but had to settle for the silver medal. The team deserves our warmest thanks for making all Canadians so proud of their feat.

The XVI Winter Olympic Games were the best for Canada since those held in Lake Placid in 1932. Not only did our athletes win seven medals—two gold, three silver and two bronze—but they finished in the top eight in seven other sports, and new records were set in nine new events or disciplines.

I would like to conclude by expressing my sincerest gratitude to all our Olympic athletes who helped bring Canadians together for the past two weeks in a sporting spirit that is not about to disappear.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, as interest rates have come down, many farmers are attempting to reschedule their farm loans with the Farm Credit Corporation. You would think that with the many farm bankruptcies and losses the FCC would be delighted. Not so.

The FCC is charging a penalty of three months' interest to farmers wishing to reschedule their debt. It is legal, but is it ethical? The administrators of GRIP are also using strong arm tactics to collect their premiums from cash short farmers. One farmer informed me that if he did not pay off GRIP by March 1 he would lose benefits and be charged extra interest. Yet the NISA program owes him money. He was told by NISA that it would take 12 to 14 weeks before that money would be sent to him.

Is it any wonder that 250 farmers in the town of Balgonie in my riding have threatened to stop the trains from running because of the anger and desperation they feel. They are tired of dealing with a government that tells them one thing and does something else. They are tired of not being heard. They want a government that is aware of their plight, that does not use threats to collect premiums, that promptly issues payments when owed and that does not penalize farmers for rescheduling their loans.

Is anyone in the government listening?

OLYMPIC GAMES

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to salute all of our outstanding athletes who represented Canada at the XVI Olympic Winter Games.

The coaches, managers, trainers and officials also did our country proud, ensuring that we remain one of the best in the world.

Canada, as a nation, has been fortunate to be blessed with some of the world's finest athletes, a force that also serves to unify us all as Canadians. Our collective pursuit of excellence was exemplified by gold medalist Kerrin Lee-Gartner, Sylvie Daigle, Angela Cutrone, Nathalie Lambert and Annie Perreault. One-third of our team of 117 athletes will return with a medal.

The tremendous success of the hockey program with Dave King was rewarded with a well-deserved silver medal. The men's 5,000 metre relay team also won silver with Fred Blackburn adding an individual medal. Bronze medalist, Myriam Bédard in women's biathlon, Isabelle Brasseur and Lloyd Eisler in figure skating were joined by the ladies curling team skipped by Julie Sutton.

I ask this House to join me in congratulating my constituents; Glenn Rupertus, Jane Isakson, Keven Martin and Lisa Sargeant. All these athletes gave their very personal best. Canada and Wetaskiwin are very proud of these outstanding Olympians.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, Indonesia's foreign minister, Mr. Ali Alatas, is visiting Ottawa today to tell the government that the human rights situation in East Timor is improving. It is obvious that this is not true.

Forty students who were at the November 12, 1991 massacre at Dili are up on charges: some for subversion which carries the death penalty and others face prison terms of up to seven years.

Members of the Indonesian military, the perpetrators of the atrocities at Dili, have never been charged.

The Indonesian government has released its own report of the massacre from the findings of its own appointed national commission of inquiry. Amnesty International concludes that the mandate and method of work of the inquiry were fatally flawed and that its findings are unacceptable.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs, when meeting with Mr. Alatas, must call for an end to the repression in East Timor and tell him that Canada will be supporting all resolutions presently before the United Nations Human Rights Commission in Geneva and that Canada will finally support UN Security Council resolutions 384 and 389.

FARM RALLY

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, although a perfect record was marred by a few bad eggs at the large farm rally on Parliament Hill last Friday, we should commend the leadership and members of the supply managed commodity groups for the very well planned and executed rally they staged in support of the government's strong position on the need to clarify and strengthen article XI of the GATT.

Canada's marketing boards are the envy of producers in many other countries. It is to be hoped that this well-staged demonstration will signal to other countries the strong support there is to maintain an orderly marketing system which is fair to both producers and consumers alike and, at the same time, does not distort international trading patterns through subsidized over-production.

I am proud that eight busloads came from my constituency of Oxford, the dairy capital of Canada.

ARTICLE XI OF GATT

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister for International Trade, together with Canadian farm leaders, have just returned from a trip to Europe to explain to their European counterparts the importance of supply management, both for the Canadian economy and as a way to avoid distortion on international markets.

We ask the government to tell Canadian farmers now what was achieved during this visit, especially during the conversations Canada's Prime Minister had with world leaders, as well as the government's strategy for protecting, strengthening and clarifying article XI, in the best interests of the Canadian economy, our farm communities and food security.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, as mentioned in The Globe and Mail editorial last week, we can expect the opposition to continue requesting, as we approach budget day, a kick-start to the economy.

The editorial suggested: "The national economy is not a car motor and Ottawa's budget is not a jumper cable tied to an electric generator". The next time the opposition uses the phrase kick-start, call a taxi.

Canada's fortunes will only improve if we stay the course toward responsible fiscal management. This means holding the line on taxes and expenditures. It does not mean going on a spending spree to kick-start the economy. Past governments have proven that the quick fix just does not work.

LIBERAL PARTY

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, the national media is acknowledging what was obvious to more than 1,500 Liberals gathered in Hull and to Canadians watching us from across the country this weekend. The Liberal Party is strong, united under our capable leader and focused on the task at hand.

That task is to defeat this tired, discredited Tory government and replace it with a progressive, responsible and compassionate Liberal government under Jean Chrétien. Both our party reform and our national biannual policy conventions were resounding successes. We did not shrink from the tough issues of the day: tax reform, free trade and the Constitution. In all cases, Liberal delegates approached the issues in a spirit of openness and compromise, and with a genuine willingness to suppress local or particular interests to the greater interests of a stronger Canada.

[Translation]

We have confirmed once again that the Liberal Party is the party of all Canadians. We are ready to meet the challenges of the future and get Canada moving again.

[English]

If the Prime Minister would only do what so many Canadians want him to do: call an election and give the people of Canada the opportunity to elect a Liberal government, we could get Canada working again.

LIBERAL PARTY

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, during the last federal election the former leader of the Liberal Party, the Right Hon. John Turner, took the position that he was opposed to the free trade agreement and should he be returned to the office of Prime Minister he would rip up that agreement. Last weekend we saw the new Liberal Party go back on the fence again.

I want to warn every Canadian who is opposed to the free trade agreement to understand that the Liberal Party stands exactly four square on every side of every issue. On the free trade issue, they have gone back to negotiating. Negotiating got us in trouble in the first place.

If you are against the free trade agreement, vote for the New Democratic Party, Mr. Speaker.

MR. DOUG PETERS

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, I stand today out of concern for the many Canadians who follow the economic reviews of the government. A face and name quite familiar as an economic critic on television, on radio and in print is that of Mr. Doug Peters of the Toronto-Dominion Bank.

It was published yesterday that one of the star candidates for the Liberal Party in the next federal election will be Mr. Doug Peters.

I believe it is a fair question to ask all of the media: How non-partisan can Mr. Peters be if he is to be a candidate for the Liberal Party in the next election?

EAST TIMOR

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, since December 1975 when the Government of Indonesia invaded East Timor, 250,000 of its 700,000 native inhabitants have been brutally butchered. The slaughter of East Timorese by the Indonesian government continues even today. Yet our government continues to do business with Indonesia. In fact, Indonesia is one of Canada's largest trading partners in southeast Asia with two-way trade totalling about $500 million last year. Our legitimization of Indonesia's policies through continuing trade and the abandonment of those oppressed East Timorese is unconscionable. Canada must take a much stronger stand against human rights abuses in East Timor and against its illegal takeover.

I call on this government to curtail any bilateral aid not directly benefiting the poorest, call for the international cessation of all military equipment sales to Indonesia and condemn the Indonesian transmigration and assimilation programs aimed at destroying the culture of East Timorese aboriginal peoples. Canada must provide humanitarian aid to East Timorese refugees and work for free access of the International Red Cross and other human rights and non-government organizations to East Timor.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow is budget day. Anyone entering the House of Commons today is certainly aware of that. The television networks are busy setting up their elaborate anchor desks in the foyer just a few feet away from this spot. Tomorrow night most Canadians will have an opportunity to see what really goes on around this place. After the budget speech, the hallway outside will be filled with spokespeople for various special interest groups, trolling for microphones.

It seems these days that the country is little more than a collection of special interest groups representing a narrow band of society but getting a big chunk of media attention. Among the spokespeople who always seem to pop up is Doug Peters of the Toronto-Dominion Bank. He will likely condemn the budget. Canadians would be wise to remember that he was the adviser to big deficit Liberal Finance Minister Marc Lalonde and apparently plans to run in the next election as a Liberal.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, 300 farmers from Abitibi-Témiscamingue attended the demonstration organized on Parliament Hill last Friday in Ottawa. I arranged a meeting with the President of the Treasury Board who agreed to see Denis Jutras, president of the Abitibi-Témiscamingue UPA, and four UPA members. So far there has been no final decision. The European agricultural question has yet to be resolved, and despite certain statements the European Community has not yet finalized its official position on article XI.

Mrs. Finestone: Time.

Mr. Saint-Julien: Mr. Speaker, the Liberal member for Mount Royal keeps telling me to stop talking. I suggest she rise in the House and tell taxpayers about her travel expenses in Canada and abroad.

The Canadian delegation's visit to Brussels was useful. According to a spokesperson for the European Commission, European negotiators will remember their meeting with the Canadian delegation when they examine agricultural issues at GATT. Three cheers for the hon. member for Bellechasse, for the hon. member for Champlain, and for Quebec Minister Yvon Picotte who were there to defend the interests of Quebec farmers.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has promised to deliver a realistic budget tomorrow. The reality today is that 2,000 workers at GM in St. Catharines have lost their jobs. The reality today is that thousands and thousands of fishermen and fish plant workers will lose their jobs very soon.

Will the Minister of Finance introduce a plan that will deal with these realities tomorrow? Will the Minister of Finance introduce a plan that will get Canada working again?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. Leader of the Opposition knows that the unfortunate announcement from General Motors not only covered a plant in St. Catharines but covered a number of plants in the United States and is a part of the restructuring that General Motors is undergoing. It does not make the job losses any less painless. We, of course, will do all within our power to help those people when the plant is planned to be closed by 1995.

Might I urge my friend from the Liberal Party to be patient. Tomorrow afternoon at 4.30 p.m. the Minister of Finance will deliver a budget that I am sure the Leader of the Opposition will praise and go across this country supporting the Minister of Finance in his endeavours.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, there is nothing that I would like more than to be able to get up and praise the government if it were to take care of the 1.5 million people who want the dignity of having a pay cheque. I can tell the minister if the government does that, we will praise it, but if it keeps ignoring the reality and the misery of these people, we will fight it. What is important at this moment is to make sure we get Canadians working again. Will the minister inform the Minister of Finance that yes, we will support him if he has some programs to help the unemployed. Will he please tell him as well that we will fight him if he keeps doing what the previous Minister of Finance did to this country in the last seven years?

• (1420)

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): The previous Minister of Finance and the present Minister of Finance have been working very, very hard to get interest rates down, to get inflation down. They have accomplished both. There are 1.5 million more people working today than there were in 1984 with full time permanent jobs. A lot of very good things have happened in this country.

I am sure the hon. member will be very, very pleased when the budget comes down tomorrow to support it. I have every confidence that he will applaud the Minister of Finance tomorrow. It is obvious that he still has his adrenalin going from his convention on the weekend. I hope he will carry it over to tomorrow.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister. Did the minister or some of his colleagues happen to watch Radio-Canada last night when Céline Galipeau interviewed workers in the automobile industry who were 47 to 52 years old, with 25 to 27 years of experience, and who at their age were faced with losing their jobs and were not at all hopeful for the future?

Will the government finally realize that pleasing the financial community is not as important as restoring the dignity of these people who want to work and enjoy the satisfaction of earning a decent living?

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): That is exactly what this government is working toward. My colleague, the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology, together with his colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, are working very, very hard on a prosperity program which in fact stresses training and retraining and the encouragement of industries to train and retrain. Our record in Canada is not one that we can be proud of in that area. That is what they are working on at this time, to assure that people have full-time, meaningful jobs, not just make-work programs, throwing money at problems like the Liberals would have us do.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

The government is about to approve the demise of the cod fisheries. The government says it is powerless, but it is time it realized that it does have the tools to do something. The environment is one.

My question is this: Will the minister promise to immediately ratify the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea? Second, will she reverse the defeatist attitude she took on the weekend and take a proactive stance at the earth summit in Brazil? Third, will she protect the entire environment of the Grand Banks, including fisheries resources? Will she act unilaterally and do so immediately?

[English]

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The hon. member is asking two separate questions. One comes out of my statements on Friday, that of the great significance of the UNCED meeting in June in Rio for a variety of purposes, in which Canada is taking a leading role. I think it is important to understand that we see this as one step and not the step in protecting our environment. Therefore we do not want to see expectations raised too high. We want to deal in realities.

On the second point I should say we are working very hard through the preparatory committee that will take place in New York very shortly on ensuring that fisheries and marine conservation are very much a part of that UNCED agenda.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, it may be that I asked two separate questions. It would have been very helpful if the minister had answered at least one of them.

For three years, this government has stood on the sidelines and watched this country absorb blow after blow. Now it is the turn of the fishing industry and it is not true that Canada is helpless. The fact is that it is this government that is hopeless.

Two years ago the Oceans Institute of Canada at Dalhousie University stated that the environmental need to conserve fish stocks inside the 200–mile limit gave the government the right in international law to go beyond the 200–mile limit to prevent overfishing. Why has the government not exercised that right?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have a list of seven or eight things that the government is doing with regard to overfishing. No one takes this more seriously than we do.

First of all, I should point out that we will be informing through our embassies in the EC and the NAFO countries this serious scientific evidence that has come to us in the last week. The Minister of Fisheries and I will be meeting with the EC ambassadors later this week. It is important to make the Europeans understand that this is not just a domestic fisheries issue. The information that we have puts the whole North Atlantic fishery at some sort of risk. Therefore it is in their own self–interest.

We are also pursuing the inclusion of this in the UNCED conference in June. Indeed, if at the end of all our diplomatic efforts we are not able to have an impact, we will have to consider further steps, and we are prepared to do that.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. It concerns the announcement today about the thousands of workers in Atlantic Canada who will be affected once again and will quite possibly lose their jobs.

The government has known for years that this was going to happen. There have been studies. Yet the government's response to these people in Atlantic Canada is that a task force will be established to look at the impact. The impact is clear. The impact is that these people will have no jobs. I want to ask the government why this total disregard for the Atlantic fisheries? Why so late to do anything? Not only does it show mismanagement, it shows callousness to the people of the Atlantic region. When is this government going to make unemployment a priority and start planning to make sure that Canadians can get back working?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is asking what actions can and will be taken for Atlantic Canadians who live off our fisheries.

What the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans announced this morning was a very sensitive conservation and management program of the resource to ensure that this resource is there in the future to allow the people who live off that resource to be able to earn a living. In the meantime, we have a series of programs trying to help these people adjust to those changes in the fishery. If the hon. member says that nothing is being done, she should look at the details of the $584 million program we announced two years ago.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, it is clear that the government has failed to plan for the plight of the people in the Atlantic region that is happening now. It knew this was coming. There is no real plan in place.

While the government says that the war on inflation is over, it is time to take care of the casualties of that war, the 1.5 million unemployed, those people on social assistance, those people who are losing hope. Today, the Conference Board of Canada said that if the government continues with its policies, the recovery will be further hindered. I want to ask the Acting Prime Minister if he agrees that what this country needs is a budget based on a policy of zero unemployment. Is this government going to bring forward such a policy in the budget tomorrow?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, of course unemployment is of great concern to the government and that will be addressed in the budget tomorrow.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I certainly hope that it is addressed more specifically than it was in the Atlantic when this government knew that there was a situation of crisis there.

[Translation]

It is high time this government started being as energetic about creating jobs as it was about fighting inflation. On behalf of all unemployed Canadians, will the Deputy Prime Minister start concentrating all his energy and resources on getting rid of policies that have put 1.5 million people out of work and hundreds of thousands of Canadians on welfare while also causing many bankruptcies?

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I can tell the hon. member, first of all for her edification, that Canada is not the only country that has gone through a recessionary period. It has happened around the world, but I can tell the hon. member that because of the policies of this government Canada is much better poised to come out of the recession than any other country in the G–7.

As a matter of fact, all the prognosticators, those outside our government, are being far more small l liberal in their projections of what will happen in the next couple of years than the government. I think that the policies of the government of the past seven or eight years have allowed us to come out of this recession leading in the modern world, in the OECD and in the G–7. I think the hon. member will be pleased with the budget tomorrow of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, General Motors has just announced a further 2,300 job lay–offs in Canada's industrial heartland. Since the government has had at least two months notice of GM job cuts, would the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology inform the House today of his specific plans for ensuring that these workers have jobs?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend is well aware that we have had a general indication from the people at General Motors that in North America they would be making some significant reductions in employment. Where those were going to occur we could not tell until the actual announcements had been made.

Some announcements were made this morning. They are very troublesome. The loss of jobs, some 2,300 jobs in St. Catharines, is very bad news as far as the Niagara peninsula is concerned. We, with my colleague the Minister of Employment and Immigration, will be working with these people. I am sure my friend is aware that the lay–offs will occur over a period of time from this fall until the spring of 1995.

A large amount of the reduction will be through attrition so it is still not clear at this point how much the programs of the government will be called upon.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, Canadians do not need more studies. They do not need more delays. Canadians need jobs.

I put it to the minister that it is within his power to act to save Canadian auto jobs. It was his free trade deal that gutted the safeguards of the auto pact, and as a consequence Canadians are losing automotive jobs at two and a half times the rate of Americans.

Will the minister finally insist on safeguards for Canadian automotive jobs? Will he tell his trade negotiators to act today to preserve Canada's automotive industry?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I do not have to do that today. I have already done that.

My hon. friend should be honest with Canadian people and understand and indicate to Canadians that the free trade agreement has had nothing to do with the decision that was taken by General Motors today.

The decision has everything to do with the weakness of the automotive industry in North America. The General Motors company is way above the auto pact safeguards, and he knows that those safeguard levels were not affected at all in the free trade agreement.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade.

In his first answer to my colleague, the member for Willowdale, he said that the workers at GM and around the country in effect should not worry because the jobs would go, as he put it, by attrition.

Why does the minister not realize that you do not build an economy by attrition? Why does he not realize that Canadians do not want attrition? They want jobs.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the only point I am making which my hon. friend is trying to distort here is that the General Motors people have said that to the extent people retire in the ordinary course or change jobs through the ordinary course that will reduce the number of lay-offs and reduce the 2,300 down to a number which is a good deal lower. That was the point I was making.

As far as the importance of jobs is concerned, my colleague the Minister of State for Finance has commented very powerfully on that in his answers earlier today. This government is very concerned about the level of employment in the country. He has indicated that the Minister of Finance is very well aware of the concerns that have been expressed, both by members of this House as well as by Canadians in all parts of the country, and will be dealing with that in his budget tomorrow.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the 2,300 workers at the plants at St. Catharines operated by GM that will close and Canadian workers generally will be very disappointed that the minister of industry does not have any contingency plan to announce today or any plan that could be announced in the near future for replacing the jobs that will be lost at those plants in St. Catharines.

On February 11 the minister admitted in this House that the auto pact is on the table as part of the current negotiations with the United States and Mexico. If and when these plants in St. Catharines close, what will the government be able to do to ensure that General Motors continues to meet the requirements of the auto pact for Canadian content and Canadian assembly?

Can he give us a clear answer on that key point today?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think if my hon. friend read what I said in the House, as he said on February 11, he would know that what I said was that if there was going to be a replacement for the auto pact it would only be by something that is better.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs follows up on her meeting today with Indonesian Foreign Minister Ali Alatas.

In view of the recent report by Amnesty International which condemned the government's inquiry into the brutal murders at Dili as being a whitewash or fatally flawed, and in view of ongoing repression including charges of students with subversion, will the minister assure this House that she supports the call for an independent, international inquiry into the Santa Cruz massacre and will Canada strongly support the European community resolution on East Timor which is currently before the United Nations Commission on Human Rights in Geneva?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all we do not necessarily agree with the Amnesty assessment of what the Indonesian government is prepared to do as a result of the commitments made by its inquiry.

I should say that in my meeting today I expressed Canada's views again very strongly regarding the situation in East Timor. I should say as well that we are the only country in the world that is still continuing to hold back on funding new aid projects. No one else is doing that. Therefore the actions we have taken have gone well beyond the UN charter and our commitments under other international treaties.

I am really quite hopeful that the Government of Indonesia takes its responsibilities in this connection very seriously. We recognize that there is still progress that must be made and I pointed that out in the 90-minute meeting on this topic with Mr. Alatas. We will continue to monitor the situation, and if the Government of Indonesia lives up to its commitments then we will review our stand.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, the minister, of course, did not answer the question with respect to the resolution in Geneva.

I want to ask a supplementary question on another very important international human rights issue concerning the continuing imprisonment of two young Canadians in Brazil, Christine Lamont and David Spencer, sentenced to 28 years in jail.

Given the recent commitment by the Brazilian minister of justice to Christine's parents to release Christine and David if Canada formally requests their expulsion, when will the minister finally act on behalf of these two young Canadians who have been victims of a very grave miscarriage of justice and make a formal request to the Government of Brazil for their expulsion so they can return home to Canada?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, these two young people who are in their late twenties and early thirties were found guilty in Brazil of three very serious charges: kidnapping, resisting arrest and conspiracy. We have examined this situation very closely, and indeed the transcripts of the trial following the appeal process are being gone over right now by our legal people. When that review is over then I will make a decision as to what action I should take.

• (1440)

As I have indicated in this House I do think the 28-year sentence is excessive, but we do regard the kidnapping conviction as a serious one as well, as we would in our own country.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

The minister of fisheries said in St. John's this morning that the government might have to contemplate unilateral measures to stop foreign overfishing. Her colleague, the employment minister, said here in the House on Friday that the government would never do that.

I want to ask her: Which it is? Is it what the employment minister says here when the Prime Minister is listening, or is it the line being peddled today in St. John's by her colleague, the minister of fisheries, when he hopes that nobody else is listening? Which is it?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have already outlined in the House today some of the steps that we are taking and are continuing to take with regard to the situation.

It has been an extraordinarily frustrating exercise to try to convince the Europeans how serious this is. We are going to take the most recent evidence to them, as I said earlier in response to a very similar question, and try to explain to them that this is in their interests as well as our own.

I also said earlier in the House today, if the hon. member was listening, that I am quite prepared to contemplate further steps should that be required as long as it is within the bounds of our capacity to act meaningfully.

Negotiations are still the best way to accomplish this, and we will contemplate future steps at the appropriate time should need arise.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): It is all right, Mr. Speaker, Mighty Casey is here now. I have a supplementary question for my friend, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, fresh from his triumphs in Newfoundland.

He will know that in 1970 this Parliament, through legislation sponsored by a Liberal administration, unilaterally established functional jurisdiction over a 100–mile zone in the Canadian Arctic waters.

There is a clear precedent for what we have been advocating. Why then, I ask the minister, is the government so painfully reluctant to take unilateral action in the present case? Is it fearful of the outcome, or is it that it just does not have the heart for the fight?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I wonder where the hon. gentleman was in 1972 when the treaty was entered into with France or a few years later when a treaty was entered into with members of the European community which gave them the right to fish in the same waters that the hon. gentleman says we should take unilateral action on. The hon. gentleman's government gave them the right to fish for six or seven years in these same waters.

With respect to unilateral action, we have taken dozens of unilateral actions and we are having some success. As my hon. colleague may have mentioned, the South Korean ambassador has already conveyed the message that his government has given orders for their vessels to be withdrawn from this area.

Our ambassador had a very successful series of meetings at Panama, and the Panamanian government which has a number of vessels fishing in this area owned by Spain and Portugal will also be taking steps to see to the same.

We are taking effective action unilaterally already.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

Today's announcement on the reduced northern cod quotas means in effect a reduction in jobs, lay-offs, reduced plant operations, and for many people it means no income at all. The announcement on the compensation was very general. It talked about past programs and present programs but nothing specific.

I want to ask the government and the minister of fisheries in particular, because he must know what is happening over there, to put a human face on this and tell this House what specific compensation measures will be taken for those Atlantic Canadians involved.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, as I have already made clear today, when we have established exactly what the consequences of this decision are, if there is need for any additional assistance programs it will be forthcoming.

We already have in place a whole series of programs, including the first line of defence, which is the unemployment insurance program, that will apply particularly to workers in offshore plants.

We also have in place a Fisheries Alternatives Program, a Plant Workers Adjustment Program and diversification within the fisheries program. All of these programs will still apply.

When we know later in the year exactly what the effects are, other programs, if necessary, will be put into place.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I feel sorry for the people who are watching the answer to this question. It simply is not good enough.

The government has known that this has been coming for some time. It talks about task force reports and a new task force being set up.

The people watching the answers to these questions cannot eat task force reports. They have enough in front of them now. These people, because of last year's dismal fishery, are living in an atmosphere of fear, anxiety and to a certain extent, hope. All this is compounded and aggravated by the situation today.

I am going to ask the minister one more time. He must have some idea. Let us know how much, what kind, and when.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman may want to alarm people. I do not know.

I think the hon. gentleman should be concerned about being accurate in his assessment of the situation in Newfoundland. The Newfoundland economy is not finished. This is a serious matter affecting the northern cod species.

If we just take Newfoundland alone, 61 per cent of our fishery is groundfish and 40.5 per cent is the northern cod. We still have many other species of fisheries.

The northern cod is not finished. We only caught 127,000 tonnes of the northern cod last year. The TAC just established is 120,000 tonnes. If we are lucky we may catch that this year.

If we look at Atlantic Canada, Atlantic Canada is not finished. The northern cod is 11.8 per cent of the landed value of all fisheries products in Atlantic Canada.

The region is not finished. There is no need to exaggerate. This process started several years ago. We are responding. There are programs and the economy of Newfoundland is still going to have growth this year.

If the investors listen to the doom and gloom from the opposition, Newfoundland is finished. I say there is still a lot of life in Newfoundland.

HERITAGE DAY

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Communications. This was a question that I wanted to ask last week. Last Monday was Heritage Day but the minister was ill. I am glad to see him back in the House in good shape today.

National Heritage Day was a time to be reminded of the commitments which were forthcoming from his predecessors both in communications and environment at the Edmonton conference on heritage in 1990 where a commitment was made to a formal review toward the creation of a national heritage strategy.

My questions are obvious. Are new initiatives going to be forthcoming for a Canadian national heritage strategy? Will the public be consulted in the process? When will the discussion paper be available?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, first of all let me thank my colleague for his good wishes and I am delighted to be able to respond to his question.

Yes, we have given a very high priority to the whole field of heritage. We are working closely with my colleague, the Minister of the Environment, to prepare material with regard to this.

We will be seeking public input with regard to it and we hope to take initiatives which will help to encourage and to preserve Canadian heritage.

AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRY

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology who said that the lay-off of 2,500 workers at GM in St. Catharines was troublesome. Probably he will find the next round of lay-offs at GM downright irritating but the workers find it catastrophic.

My question to the minister is: When is he going to act to ensure that we have free trade with Japan and the offshore automobile companies, rather than seeing the North American industry savaged as a result of this government's policies?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. member would like to cut off all trade from Japan and all trade from other parts of the world. What we have to realize is that we have an open economy here. If we are going to start erecting barriers against trade with other countries then we are going to suffer as well from the trade that we want to do with those other countries. That is something that my hon. friend does not take into account when he asks that sort of question.

• (1450)

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, the Japanese ship 2.5 million cars to North America a year, 25,000 North American cars are sold in Japan a year, and 2,500 Canadian workers lost their jobs. This was predictable. The government was warned of it. There is overcapacity.

Why is it too much to ask of the offshore producers that they produce jobs as well as cars in this country when they are making money?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the difficulties that we are having with the automobile industry are not just difficulties in Canada. There are difficulties in the whole North American market.

The cause of the lay-offs in St. Catharines is related to difficulties more in the United States than in the market in Canada.

My hon. friend, who has put in a lot of good rhetoric out there, is not hitting the mark with what he is trying to say.

NEWSPAPER INDUSTRY

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and it involves the newspaper business.

There are concerns within the industry that TorStar may be poised to gain effective control of Southam. If that happens, 47 per cent of all the English language newspapers would be concentrated in the hands of one corporation.

Does this prospect concern the minister and would his officials like to try to get the real story here?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, we know that The Toronto Star has shares in Southam and Southam has shares in the other. The director of competition is fully aware of that.

If there is any possibility of a merger between the two, the director of competition has the ability to intervene. We have a competition policy, we have competition legislation and we have the competition tribunal.

The director of competition will follow that issue very closely.

SOVIET REPUBLICS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

I believe all members of the House in fact all Canadians watch daily with dismay the rising tide of fascism and authoritarianism in Russia and the other republics and the threat it poses for democracy there. Yet western countries seem paralysed to do anything.

In fact, The New York Times yesterday revealed that the United States government has refused to honour its commitment of increased obligations to the International Monetary Fund for an aid package.

In light of this deteriorating situation, I want to ask the minister: Can she indicate what plans the Government of Canada has to respond to this dangerous situation?

In particular, will the Government of Canada request a special emergency meeting of the G-7 of the IMF so we can come to grips before these forces threaten the entire economic and world security that we now face and that these represent?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the events on the weekend were indeed alarming for those of us who watched them. We have asked for a full report on exactly what the situation was in Russia on the weekend.

Let me say that in terms of aid Canada has been very active in our own right as well as multilaterally. Our aid, which is actually mostly delivered, amounts to about 40 per cent of what the Americans have pledged.

We are urging the Americans to continue to provide aid. In addition, we have called for Russia and the other republics to become members of the IMF.

We have asked for a doubling of the capital of EBRD. We are continuing to work very actively through the G-7 and our other organizations and with the European Community to try and ensure that there is sufficient aid, not just in Russia but in the other republics as well, to prevent any real tragedy.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary to the minister, let me ask this question.

One of the most immediate threats facing these republics is the tens of thousands of Soviet military officers and personnel who must be reintegrated and retrained and be given proper housing before they become so disgruntled that they join these authoritarian forces.

I ask the minister: Can she tell us if the Canadian government has any specific plan to help in this retraining and this re-integration of these tens of thousands of military personnel?

Will the Government of Canada commit to putting a plan together and take it to the G-7 so we can finally get some action from these countries before it turns into a total disaster?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Derek Burney, who was our Sherpa at the G-7 has been actively working with other Sherpas in order to ensure that there is a co-ordinated effort and a positive effort with regard to the former Soviet republics.

One of the things we have done with regard to the armed forces in particular is to provide a training seminar in Canada on how an army functions in a democratic society.

Senior officers from the republics were here several weeks ago meeting with our own military people in terms of the function of the army in this different environment.

The other thing is that out of the co-ordinating conference in Washington, where we were trying to ensure that countries co-ordinated and did not overlap their efforts, considerable effort is being made towards housing these people by the Germans, for example.

We believe our efforts are best directed in other areas to make sure that we are not all tripping over each other doing the same thing.

HOUSING

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Acting Minister of Finance a question.

In 1990 this government cut social housing spending by 15 per cent. In 1991 it extended those cuts until 1996. This has cost needy Canadians some 6,000 housing units so far.

Affordable housing is a fundamental part of Canada's social safety net. Yet this government has failed over one million Canadians who are still living in core need housing and thousands more who are homeless.

I want to ask the minister: Will the government restore the desperately needed funds for affordable housing?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the budget will be delivered tomorrow afternoon at 4.30. I would suggest that my hon. friend have patience for another 25.5 hours until the Minister of Finance delivers that budget.

[Translation]

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, in Quebec, 360,000 units and households are eligible for these funds, and there is a demand right now for 5,000 units. During the past five years there has been a 20 per cent cut in the federal budget for this kind of housing. The amount of money available for new projects has been going down steadily, while the demand keeps increasing.

Is the government prepared to act responsibly as a partner and provide Quebec with enough funding for social housing?

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I think the record will show that the federal government has been most generous with its social housing benefits, as much as our fiscal framework will allow. I think we have been very generous.

If the hon. member waits until tomorrow, she will see what news is in the budget for the housing sector.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture.

With respect to article XI and despite certain statements that were made during your trip to Europe with the hon. member for Champlain and Quebec Minister Yvon Picotte; did the European Community officially finalize its position on the review of agricultural issues in connection with GATT?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, our trip last week was an opportunity to meet the Europeans, especially for Canada's farm leaders who travelled with the Canadian delegation.

We had a chance to meet Mr. McSharry, the agricultural commissioner, and Mr. Andriessen, the community's vice-president. Of course we did not expect to come back with article XI, safe and sound. Our main purpose was to make the Europeans aware of certain common interests.

We were given a fairly favourable reception, and talks will continue in the weeks to come. I hope that as in the past we will be able to continue to defend Canada's position and represent the interests of Canadian producers. Our trip was productive but we must keep working very hard with the delegations.

PUBLISHING INDUSTRY

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Communications.

The book publisher, Grolier Limited, has consistently and deliberately snubbed its nose in disregard to the government's Baie Comeau policy on book publishing. Last year it moved its direct mail division to the United States with a loss of over 100 jobs. Now it plans to close the school and library division, leaving nothing but a shell company in Canada. What specific measures is the minister taking to stop Groliers and other book publishers from leaving the country?

• (1500)

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): The hon. member will be aware of the fact that I announced a program just a few weeks ago which was designed to do precisely that, to ensure the health of the Canadian-owned sector in Canada. We are pumping a further $102 million into the Canadian book publishing industry. We are taking measures which will make it more profitable for firms to be owned by Canadians, to operate here and to publish Canadian titles. In this way, we hope to increase the consumption of Canadian books and to ensure that more Canadian authors are read in this country.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, it is almost a supplement to the earlier question, but it is to the Minister for International Trade regarding his trip. Just to show how serious the discussions were and to try to alleviate the concern that it was just an unfortunate public relations exercise coming late in the day, did the minister discuss with officials in his meetings in New York the letter that 62 senators of the United States have written to President Bush to say that there shall be no change to the American agricultural adjustment agreement, section 22, which in effect protects cotton, dairy, peanuts and sugar under a form of supply management? Also, did he discuss that with the officials in New York, saying "hey, we have the same situation", to show how firm he is going to be in this government to help justify the concern and the good little message that the Minister of Finance made to those 30,000 farmers on Friday, that if the Americans are able to protect section 22 in their situation and we do not get clarification of article XI we are not going to go ahead and sign this deal?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend is well aware that the Americans are prepared to put section 22 on the negotiating table. That matter has not yet been resolved. It has not yet been resolved whether or not the Europeans and others will accept our position on article XI.

As my colleague said, we had good meetings last week with representatives of the farm community from coast to coast and with Mr. Yvon Picotte, Minister of Agriculture for Quebec. We met with representatives of the commission, of GATT, with the German government, and I think we made some progress. We certainly do not have a complete resolution of this issue by any means, but this was a good trip in that we advanced, I believe, our interests in a respectable way. I believe with the continuing work we can continue to make progress. We need to have the full support of this Parliament and the farmers throughout the country in order to continue to put the strongest possible position forward.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 32 petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES

FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the first report of the Standing Committee on Energy, Mines and Resources.

In June our government and many other governments will attempt to respond to concerns about global climate change at the UN Conference on Environment and Development in Brazil. They may do so by negotiating a convention to limit greenhouse gas emissions. This unanimous report of your committee on energy, mines and resources recommends that our government adopt a flexible policy that includes its stated goal of stabilizing emissions not controlled by the Montreal protocol at 1990 levels by the year 2000, and that it seek a global commitment to a reduction of greenhouse gas emissions by 20 per cent by the year 2005.

Global warming is a global problem requiring global solutions and global accounting. We are, therefore, also recommending that our government support proposals that would facilitate Canada taking global action to meet its commitments.

The committee requests that the government table a comprehensive response to this report within 150 days of this date.

FINANCE

EIGHTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to present, in both official languages, the eighth report of the Standing Committee on Finance which completed its study in relation to the mandate and governance of the Bank of Canada.

I might say in presenting this report that, having served as chairman of the subcommittee which prepared the report, all members of the subcommittee from all of the parties worked in a very diligent and non-partisan fashion in preparing what I think is an excellent report.

PETITIONS

CROATIA

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition signed by many of the Croatian people in my community who ask, now that Canada has recognized that the Republic of Croatia is a full-fledged member of the world community of free nations, that Canada in its participation in the peacekeeping efforts that are presently under way continue to ensure that Croatia remains an independent free country.

GASOLINE ADDITIVES

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I want to present today another petition calling on the government to implement a reduction in the excise tax on the ethanol portion of ethanol blended gasolines here in Canada. A 10 per cent ethanol blended gasoline would cut carbon monoxide emissions by 25 per cent and carbon dioxide by 5.9 per cent. It will cut the trend toward global warming, and of course it will eliminate the need for MMT, methylcyclopentadienyl manganese tricarbonyl, which is an octane enhancer, which has been banned in the United States since 1978 but is still used in Canada.

Of course, we find that the government has done no testing to examine whether or not there are harmful effects on the health of the population of this country, particularly on children who are most susceptible.

HEALTH

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present a petition signed by thousands of Canadians from every region of this country, from the west coast, the north, the east coast, Quebec, Ontario and every region of the country.

They say that the direction of the current federal government is to decrease and then cease transfer payments for medicare and that this will promote undue hardship on the provinces to keep our universal health care system. Inequities in sexual and reproductive health care will result due to this withdrawal of funding. Universal health care is what makes Canada and Canadians special.

Therefore the petitioners request that Parliament recognizes the value of our universal medicare system and the five principles of the Canada Health Act to provide publicly funded, comprehensive, universal, portable and accessible health care for all Canadians.

It is particularly appropriate to present these petitions today in view of the vote that was just taken. I hope Parliament will listen to these thousands of petitioners.

EAST TIMOR

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and privilege to present a petition signed by several hundred Canadians from Courtenay, Ladysmith, Comox, Victoria, B.C. and Toronto, Ontario.

I think it is especially appropriate that this petition appear on the day when Ali Alatas, the foreign minister of Indonesia, is in the country trying to put the best face on the illegal occupation and genocide that is happening in East Timor.

These people are calling on Parliament to condemn the Indonesian military occupation of East Timor, the genocide of the East Timorese people, to support publicly the right of the East Timorese people to determine their own destiny by referendum and free elections, and to support these causes in the United Nations and all other international arenas.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, the first petition I have to present today is unfortunately out of date. I sent it in last November but I have only now had it certified. However I did provide the minister with a copy of it immediately.

The petition calls upon the government to do a number of things which have all been done: to recognize Slovenia and Croatia. Everything here has in fact been done quite fortunately.

FAMILY REUNIFICATION

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions concerning the issue of family reunification. They contain the signatures of people from the Toronto region and across the country.

They call on the minister of immigration to issue minister's permits for spouses and dependent children of persons who have been determined to be convention refugees and to allow them to be reunited in Canada for inland processing.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege of submitting two sets of petitions to the House, pursuant to the proper standing order.

One set of petitions comes from constituents who continue to oppose the GST and who want the government to look for a more simplified, efficient and fair tax system in this country.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, the second set of petitions comes from constituents who want the government to honour the commitment it made in 1988 to begin reclaiming the Great Lakes and specifically begin by taking on the most polluted river in Canada, namely the Don Valley River.

They are hoping that in the not too distant future the government will honour its commitment.

FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING AGENCIES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. McKnight that Bill C-54, an act to amend the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act and other acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): At the suspension of the debate the hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James had the floor to answer some questions.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, this will not take long. I was answering a question from my colleague for Parkdale—High Park who was pointing out that in the state of Bavaria in Germany farms are being subsidized as tourist attractions. It simply underlines the fact that countries will find one way or another of subsidizing their agricultural producers.

I want to add something to that and it has to do with the family farm. If we lose supply management, if we lose our marketing boards, I think it will result in a major loss of the family farm. It will accentuate and further push the trend toward larger and larger corporate farms.

Travelling through western Canada now and seeing some very well kept family farms is something to behold and something to look forward to. If we lose our supply management system, if we lose marketing boards, we will see fewer and fewer of those lovely family farms. It is not only in my opinion bad agricultural practice to lose family farms but we will lose some of the aesthetic beauty as well.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, it is with somewhat mixed feelings that I rise today to speak to Bill C-54, an act to amend the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act.

I work with and talk frequently to the cattle producers in my area and throughout Saskatchewan, most of whom encouraged me to support legislation which they told me would provide the cattle industry with a check-off to help market its product in Canada.

Among those supporters of the beef check-off were Lynn Biggart from Cut Knife, Saskatchewan, an active lobbyist and participant for and in the Canadian Cattlemen's Association; John Feige from Parkside, Saskatchewan, president of the Saskatchewan Stock Growers' Association; and Grant Cadieu from Spiritwood, Saskatchewan, son of the late Bert Cadieu, a former member of this House and a long time and tireless worker on behalf of Canadian Hereford breeders. All three individuals are qualified, respectable spokespeople for their industry. When they talk to me I know they represent many other producers in whatever they have to say.

I have therefore been aware for some time that there was a cattlemen's lobby under way to secure funds or to help secure funds to help this industry deal with some of its most pressing problems, in particular the fight against low cost, highly subsidized European beef being dumped into the Canadian marketplace.

The idea for a check-off for cattle is one that was presented to me in a very positive way, a way that reflected a very real need within the cattle industry. I was receptive of the idea for a number of other reasons as well.

Earlier this year I attended the Northwest Hereford Club's annual meeting and I heard about the positive steps taken by people involved in the marketing of Hereford beef in Canada. I was impressed and therefore I thought that if the beef industry could take the ideas the Hereford breeders were incorporating into their work further then all producers in the beef industry could benefit.

I have already been impressed by the marketing ideas and promotions mounted by the supply managed sector. You know what I mean, Mr. Speaker, because you have seen the television commercials of egg producers, the let's get crackin commercials. Dairy people have the milk, it does a body good promotion. There are the recent butter commercials with the asparagus and the carrots dancing around on the television screen. These are great promotions. They have served their industries well and are helping to promote and produce good quality nutritional ideas among the Canadian public, certainly ideas that we all have to take to heart. They are also ideas that help us enjoy the fruits of the labour of Canada's farmers.

Third, I was receptive to the idea of check-offs. I am already knowledgeable of and supportive of the check-off system in the work place where wage earners have a small portion of their regular salary deducted and used in their collective interest during the bargaining process. In the work place this is called the Rand formula and it recognizes the fact that all employees in a specific work place benefit from the collective bargaining efforts of those who were elected to do the bargaining on their behalf. Therefore, because all members benefit, all members of that bargaining unit must pay toward the achievement of that success.

The cattle check-off, therefore, seemed to me to be just an extension of the Rand formula into the cattle industry. Everyone pays for the benefit of everyone else.

I was about to congratulate my friends in the beef industry for recognizing the positive and long-lasting benefits of co-operation and socialism in their industry until I received a copy of Bill C-54 and had a chance to read and analyse it, I realized that I was not entirely correct. This is not the legislation I was expecting. The legislation is not exactly as it had been described by my friends in the cattle industry. It is not the legislation I had thought I could support without question or concern. It is really nothing more than this government's attempt to tax the individual producer one more time, provide producers' money to projects over which after they have produced it they relinquish all control and influence over the funds that are expended on their behalf.

Not only do I see this as just another tax bill, but it is also a bill which denies accountability for the money raised.

While Bill C-54 will give my friends in the cattle industry a check-off, I do not think I can support the bill as it stands. I hope they will continue to pressure the government for amendments to this bill at the committee stage, or in fact to write new legislation that will give them exactly what they do want, which is an opportunity to participate in the marketing of their product.

There is no question in my mind that the act before us requires more study, because I am not confident that it can stand up to the scrutiny of the many producers out there who want to see the product they grow and sell for their livelihoods promoted and sales increased as a result of that promotion.

It is possible that Bill C–54 will just end up being viewed by the producers as something with the same efficiency and effectiveness as the government's introduced and implemented GST. It amounts to nothing less than another tax, something that reduces the value of their product at the point of sale.

Our goal in this House, and let us make no mistake about it, is to ensure that funds taken at the farm gate translate into higher prices for the producer. Our task is to find the proper tools to achieve that goal.

According to the information provided by the minister prior to the drafting of this legislation, the commodity groups who are pushing for check–off legislation said they wanted check–offs that were commodity based, producer or membership controlled and accountable. This bill does not go that far, extending accountability only through the start up phase.

A majority of commodity based producers must agree to set up the agency in question, but then the membership of the board can be appointed by the minister.

• (1550)

The commodity group membership may never have to be asked for their input again in the process of the operations of the agency.

I realize that organizations that operate with a democratic structure will remain somewhat or totally accountable for these agencies. There are other organizations out there that are not all that democratic, and that makes this legislation unfair to the producers within those commodity groups.

Check–offs are seen as an effective means of promoting self–reliance and shared responsibilities. I agree with that entirely.

The minister knows how well the supply managed commodities have done in this regard. My colleague, the member for Mackenzie, outlined this quite clearly in his intervention in this House last Wednesday when the bill was first debated.

This is a time of economic difficulty in rural Canada. Mr. Speaker, I do not have to tell you or anyone else in this House, or anyone else in Canada for that matter, that this is a time of difficulty in rural Canada. It is an all too obvious fact.

The fact that there were some 25,000 or, depending on which media you listen to, 40,000 farm people on the Hill last week protesting and demonstrating in support of the supply managed sector in this country indicates how serious the economic difficulties in rural Canada are at the moment.

During times of economic difficulty people in rural areas pull together. They co–operate to help each other out. Our history provides many examples to illustrate exactly what I am saying. That co–operation was evident on the Hill on Friday when the producers demonstrated their support for supply management.

To see the cattle producers and other agricultural commodity groups pulling together at this time to try to improve their economic well–being is only natural. I wish them well, and I hope that they will do as well in the future as some of them have done in the past.

Therefore, I support the amendment before us which would send the bill to the agriculture committee for further study.

The concept of a check–off for the cattle producers and others is a good one. It is an idea, a concept that requires further reflection, analysis and understanding to ensure that the final bill which we approve in this House will serve the interests of the cattle producers and the community in which they live, not just the interests of the industry group they are involved in.

These are valuable and worth–while goals to be achieved. Just as I respect the work of my friends in the cattle industry, I also respect the work of my colleagues on the agriculture committee. I trust that they will do the right thing when Bill C–54 comes their way.

Mr. Speaker, I thank you for the opportunity to say a few words here today on this important act. I will save further comments for the committee stage and the third reading debate of this bill after it has had the study that I know it will get in committee.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I could relate very well to the hon. member's comments about how serious the economic situation is in rural Canada.

It is serious when one spouse has to work at another profession, whether teaching or nursing, to supplement the farm income, or when the equipment, such as a tractor, that used to cost $40,000 now costs $150,000. I honestly do not know how these farmers are making ends meet.

Since he is very knowledgeable about the crisis in the rural parts of Canada, I would like to ask the member what recommendations he would make to help alleviate this crisis if he were in government and if he were a minister of agriculture.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the member for his question. I feel quite flattered that the member would consider my views to be worthy of an agriculture minister in this country. I feel very confident that in the next government I will perhaps be given the chance to ask my leader for the opportunity to serve this country in that or any other position on the front bench opposite.

I agree with and recognize the stress apparent in the farm community emphasized by my colleague and the hon. member. The circumstances in the rural community are primarily agriculture based, but they go beyond that.

As the stability of agriculture has been eroded so too has the infrastructure of the rural communities of Canada. The school systems, the health systems, and the business community in the rural parts of Canada have diminished considerably because the stable economic structure of agriculture is not there to support it.

I have seen all too often in my own province communities disappear. That situation began because fewer and fewer farmers were working in the vicinity of a community. As the farmers moved off the land the numbers of people who attended the local church and the local school and were available to purchase goods in the local stores or utilize the facilities of the local recreational centre, skating rink and community hall decreased. This created a situation in which all of a sudden that community ceased to have viability.

When we talk about the policies and the programs that we need to put in place we must first examine the viability of agriculture, we must look at securing an economic base for agriculture so that we can maintain the populations on the farms to ensure that we have people in the vicinity of rural communities to support the activities and the structure in the rural communities.

First and foremost we must have policies in place that will provide for that economic stability in agriculture; that means a good price for farm products, whether beef cattle, hogs, grains, oilseeds or the cereal crops that are grown on the prairies.

We also need programs to address the needs of the rural community itself to which people from the farms have often gone to retire. We need programs that deal with housing and other issues.

Mr. Speaker, you are signalling me that my time is up. I hope that over the course of the next year many of the ideas that I and the members of my party are actively engaged in examining to address the needs of rural Canada and the election platforms that are put forward will prove to the Canadian people that New Democrats have a different and more positive way of viewing the changes required to secure economic and social stability in rural Canada, and that Canadians will give us the opportunity to put those ideas into practice when the time comes.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, perhaps today we should be looking at the original legislation brought in 20 years ago, proclaimed in the other place in this Parliament in early 1972. That legislation was the basis upon which our national marketing agencies were built. Agencies that were built on the foundation of the legislation passed in this House are now on the verge of being destroyed in secret negotiations behind closed doors at the GATT with no real input from this House.

• (1600)

This legislation was unique in its nature because in the British North America Act the various areas of jurisdiction within this country were laid out. For example, marketing within a province was a provincial jurisdiction. We refer to that as intra-provincial trade. When a product crossed a provincial boundary or was exported it came under federal jurisdiction. We refer to that as inter-provincial trade and export trade.

In addition to export trade, which is federal jurisdiction, the powers of the federal government were melded with that of the provincial governments in terms of marketing legislation. In turn, the provincial legislation had to call upon another piece of federal legislation, the Agricultural Products Marketing Act, to get more of the powers they needed to operate effectively.

This was Confederation working at its finest. When we had federal legislation looking after the trade within Canada between provinces federal-provincial agreements were developed and signed by all provincial ministers of agriculture in this nation to work together in an harmonious way and create order out of chaos. In the late 1960s and early 1970s there were trade wars going on within Canada between the provinces. This legislation and the resulting marketing agencies which were set up created order out of that chaos. It brought a level of stability to this nation for producers in the poultry sector. The poultry farmers of Canada were here on Friday with their counterparts in the dairy industry, which operates under different legislation, to defend that legislation and ensure that the government does not trade it away.

It is also unique in that each producer was assigned a quota for a system of planned production, a system of planned production that ensured that Canadian consumers had adequate supplies of high quality foods at a reasonable price. They had some of the best production in the world with no shortages of supply, no chaos at the farm gate level. The processors had a reasonable return for their efforts and unjustified increases in price did not take place.

These organizations had to work under government supervision at both federal and provincial levels. There were two classes of orders and regulations that had to be prior approved by the supervisory body, the National Products Marketing Council. Any change in price had to be substantiated by the cost of production formula.

The over-all annual global allocation also had to have prior approval. It was a system that not only worked well for the producers of this country but ensured the continuing share for each province. The poorer provinces of Atlantic Canada certainly had a level of stability and an alleviation of fear about their operations. Their operations could not be wiped out by a couple of van loads of eggs from other provinces dumped on their markets to depress the prices. It also provided a level of income which they had not seen for years and years.

In February 1972 I bought eggs at 19 cents a dozen at the same time as those eggs were selling at a supermarket in Toronto for 56 cents a dozen. The production cost for that product was a minimum of 38 cents a dozen. No wonder there was chaos in the marketplace.

This act brought stability that has lasted for 20 years. Now it is threatened and may be traded away. We can be proud as Canadians that we were able to develop such a system envied by producers in other parts of the world, not only from the United States, whose farmers were on the hill on Friday supporting us in our efforts, but farmers from Europe and other nations. They wanted to help us defend a system being threatened by the forces of transnational corporations who want to destroy the most sophisticated system in the world. It has not contributed to world surpluses. Yet we have not once seen the government come to the defence of these systems which have been under a concerted attack in the media, an attack that started on the floor of this House in October 1990 as a result of a statement made by the Minister for International Trade, an attack that has continued to this day in the media.

In fact, at 6.30 last night on one of our television networks here in Canada, a former negotiator of this government, who negotiated the free trade agreement, stated that these boards are bad for the country, bad for the consumers and should be done away with.

Mr. Milliken: He was bad for this country.

Mr. Ferguson: Absolutely. Look what he did to us in the free trade agreement. Now he is having second thoughts. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands says he was bad for the country. Now he is having second thoughts. He finally woke up and he is realizing this. Now he is targeting the poor farmers of this nation who provide us with such ample supplies of food.

It is obvious that these statements are a reflection on the government's true intent to end these systems that have not received one cent in government subsidies since they were established. They provided adequate supplies of top quality food, the best quality food of any country in the world, at a reasonable cost to consumers. The price setting mechanisms for these agencies and the production targets of course, as I mentioned earlier, have to be prior approved through regulation by the National Farm Products Marketing Council and receive the blue star approval of Privy Council. Thus the interests of the processors, the producers and the consumers are protected.

I was shocked on February 12 when the Minister of National Revenue announced an export tax on tobacco. There is quite a story behind this. In this House in the last few days of the previous government we brought in an amendment to amend the National Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act to include tobacco and tobacco products, a simple amendment just to add those words.

A member of the Official Opposition at the time stood up and refused unanimous consent, even though thousands of tobacco farmers were protesting on the Hill. That refusal came from the Official Opposition benches at that time. Then the letter from the Leader of the Official Opposition—

Mr. Lewis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think the hon. member is making a well reasoned speech but he just made an allegation that a member of the opposition refused unanimous consent. My hon. friend knows that there is no way in the world that he can back up that statement and I think it should be struck from the record.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, on that point of order, if you go back in all of our precedents dealing with this question, you will find that a member has a perfect right to say in this Chamber that the nay came from a certain side. He does not have a right, however, to say who gave the nay. For the minister to stand up and raise that as a point of order draws attention to the fact that it was at the time the Official Opposition that refused.

Mr. Lewis: That of course is completely specious and my hon. friend knows it. I will be glad to wait around to give him time to look that word up in the dictionary. It is absolutely improper to reflect upon who said yea or nay in a vote or to refuse unanimous consent. My hon. friend knows it. My hon. friend is an experienced member. He is in full flight in his speech. He is on the front bench of his party, which may be easy to do these days. I think my hon. friend knows better than to reflect and make an allegation like that. I would suggest that his speech would be better phrased if he left that kind of citation out of it.

Mr. Flis: Before making a ruling, Mr. Speaker, I think it is very easy to check Hansard of the day and to check that it was on the other side of the House where the nay came from.

• (1610)

As my hon. member mentioned, we do not mention names but we do know where the nay came from and where the unanimous consent was not given.

There has been no minister here all afternoon to listen to this important debate. Now a minister trounces in to raise a point of order. That is how interested they are in the farmers of this country.

An hon. member: A phoney point of order.

Mr. Flis: Correct.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I think that hon. members on all sides were able to convey their message and I ask the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex to return to the debate.

[English]

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I want to make it very clear that I did not name the member who refused to give consent, nor the constituency he came from.

I believe Hansard will speak for itself if we look that up. I was present in the House at the time.

Less than two months later, the Leader of the Official Opposition at the time sent a letter to the Ontario Tobacco Marketing Board dated August 17 or August 19, it does not really matter. It assured its members that if they formed the government, it would give them their tobacco marketing agency. There is no tobacco marketing agency yet today.

The suggestion that they are on the side of the farmer has to be closely examined, but I want to just go on to the announcement of February 12 and the export tax. To put a tax on the export of tobacco—the purest tobacco of any country in the world with less tar, chemical and nicotine content of any country in the world—will simply destroy the export markets.

Today I received a call from three growers in my riding who immediately realized the damage that has been done to their industry. Bill Thuss and Tony Sleagers of RR3, Strathroy and Gene Vineue of RR2, Strathroy advised me that one of the major tobacco processing companies in Canada, R.J.R. MacDonald Inc. is no longer purchasing tobacco for export markets as a result of this tax.

It will in fact destroy those export markets and destroy jobs here in Canada. It will force the countries purchasing tobacco to buy inferior products that contain more tar, nicotine and other chemicals than our Canadian product does.

I ask this government to reverse its position. It is simply not acceptable. It is a further nail in the coffin of this industry in Canada. Those countries will be forced to buy from another market and buy a product even more injurious to their health than Canada's tobacco.

I also ask the government to stop delaying tactics regarding a marketing agency for apples. I know the original act calls for the government to establish these marketing agencies through proclamation when it is satisfied, following plebiscites or declarations, by Lieutenant-Governor in Council or by other means, that the majority of producers in Canada or regions of Canada are in favour of such an agency.

The words "by other means" according to the Department of Justice interpretation I received in 1974 could be a petition by producers. What is the delay? Will this government accept a petition by producers to get the apple marketing agency under way? An agency is required to stop the importation of products grown under very, very cheap labour in other parts of the world. These products have been imported to Canada and are destroying the orchards of the producers who own them.

These products are perhaps treated with chemicals, herbicides and pesticides that are banned in Canada. We have a zero level of tolerance on these imported goods. How can the Canadian consumers expect to have quality products if we have one set of standards and the government allows importation of other products treated with chemicals that are not allowed in Canada?

I want to go just a little bit further. I believe this government intends to destroy the agencies we have. Page 119 of the free trade agreement under definitions chicken and chicken products means chicken or capons, live or viscerous and chicken parts, and so on. It goes on to point out that without limiting the generality of subparagraph 1, there are 13 different types of further processed chicken that are not considered to be chicken. All they have to do is process it in the United States: chicken Kiev, chicken breaded Kiev, chicken cordon bleu, chicken breaded cordon bleu, and so on. Now the door is wide open for further processed products. Yet we have an agency that is going to be destroyed.

I am very concerned about the legislation before us today. I hope I have laid the ground work and legislative history of this act and why it was brought in. It is an act of this House that may be disembowelled by the actions at GATT because the amendments will allow the agency to be set up to collect levies for research and promotion. Is this a set-up for when these agencies lose their effectiveness under the GATT negotiations? Is this what is happening? Does the government intend to disembowel these agencies; take away their powers to establish a system of planned production to market their products across this nation; open the door to products that are produced in other countries under a different set of standards and regulations than they are here in Canada? I have to wonder.

Although they could carry on as agencies, they would have no powers of pricing, establishing quotas or providing any degree of stability to primary producers.

Of course under the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act, the import controls come from the Import Export Control Act. It has worked very well over the years. It is administered by another department. It does not come under the jurisdiction of Agriculture Canada. If there is a shortage of a product developed here in Canada, they are allowed to bring in a specified amount of the product.

I should point out that when these original agencies were set up, the quotas were established to reflect the level of production of the previous five years for that particular province or the individual producer involved. The amount of imports was set up on the same basis of the average amount of imports allowed into this country over the previous five years. What could be fairer than that?

Under article XI of the GATT, if a country has its production established under restrictions, those same restrictions shall apply to imports. Consequently I think it has been a very fair system and I am very fearful that this piece of legislation will go hand in hand with the government's intent to sell those producers down the tubes at the GATT. That will put us not into an interprovincial trade war, but into a multinational trade war that will threaten to destroy this country, our standard of living and all of rural Canada.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to ask the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex a question or several questions.

I listened with a great deal of interest to his very reasonable and objective assessment and review of the legislative history of the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act.

I too was here in those periods of gestation when there was a milk war and a chicken war between provinces. That really laid the groundwork for us to come together and provide this House with the debate on the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act. It in effect allowed supply management and marketing boards in many of the designated products.

The member is correct. I am not sure who said "nay". I think it is a little more tangled. I did not get into that part of the debate between the Solicitor General and the hon. member who is very experienced, not only as a practical farmer in Ontario, but briefly as Minister of Agriculture before the government changed.

As I heard the debate I was thinking that there is a little more to it. I remember there was an election and there were farmers outside. I was very interested because I have tobacco farmers right in the heart of my riding in Atlantic Canada. They were very interested in this small little amendment of getting tobacco named as a designated product. There was quite a history. I know that the climate was certainly not too conducive to resolving issues on the basis of logic at that particular time. However, history and Hansard will show who said what.

I really do appreciate the minister and the ex-minister, the member for Lambton—Middlesex, reviewing that history. It is a sad state and Doug Fisher is totally right. My time is moving so I had better get to my question about the state of this Parliament and where the debate really is. Really the action is outside. This place has become more or less a charade. This is an issue that brought more than 30,000 farmers, and I thought the farmers were rather silly to even suggest that type of number. We all know how to arrange political meetings. You make sure you have a small hall then you manage to expand it. You do not have a large hall only half empty. Whether it is 30,000 or 40,000, you can argue the figures, the place was packed. It would have been more politically interesting to have 10,000 or 15,000 coming and then show up with 30,000 or 40,000. However, they were here.

They were here Friday. Today we have other problems, as Question Period showed. There are plant closures, cod problems, et cetera, et cetera. Yet there was very little discussion of what happened Friday, because it is still out there.

I wanted to ask the hon. member about the fear he has in terms of what is going on in the GATT. Quite frankly I think that is going to be almost as much of a moment of truth for the farm community affected by supply management as anything that is going to come out of the constitutional committee that is hopefully going to be tabled here on Friday. It is fundamental.

My time is already starting to run out before I can get to the question. However, one question is, and I alluded to it in a question to the Minister for International Trade in Question Period, can this member, with his knowledge, rationalize how the Americans intend to maintain article XXII, which provides them with supply management protection, if we do not receive clarification and strengthening of article XI?

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my friend, the member for Annapolis Valley—Hants. I have often admired him. He is very astute in his observations.

One of the things he mentioned was that a lot of the action takes place outside of this place. He is absolutely right. I refer to the fact that these agencies may be destroyed, agencies which were set up under legislation established on the floor of this House and I believe he was a member of the House at the time. They will be destroyed in secret negotiations outside of this House, negotiations that are perhaps only beneficial to the transnational corporations I mentioned.

He was also absolutely right in his comments regarding the rising tide within the United States of what is happening in terms of these GATT negotiations. He referred to article XXII of the GATT which provides a waiver for the United States to control the importation of dairy products, sugar, peanuts and cotton.

We talk about cross-border shopping. The Canadian farmer could not sell milk, and neither could a store, to an American to take back across the border because of that GATT waiver. If we are thinking of doing away with article XI and not fighting for it while we let the Americans keep article XXII or the GATT waiver then there is something wrong in this country. Even though 64 American senators sent this letter to the President, even though dairy farmers in the United States were here supporting us the other day on the Hill because they want a similar system, and even though legislation passed through the United States Congress last June, it was vetoed by the president.

I was shocked when I heard one of the reasons it was vetoed from one of his assistants. They were afraid that there would be increased costs to the consumer in the United States.

The American farmer gets just a little more than half what we get for our milk. They are going bankrupt by the droves. We have the best system in the world. We have to keep it.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have a very short question for the member for Lambton—Middlesex.

He has produced this document Compare the Share, which is an excellent document. However, what bothers me about a document like this, subtitled Canadian Farmers Need a Fair Share of the Consumer Food Dollar, is that when we are dealing not only in the House of Commons but in our offices and out on the front lawn—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order, the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park.

Mr. Flis: The hon. member refers to a very important document. I wonder if he would be kind enough to table it in the House.

Mr. Mills: Absolutely. I would be happy to table this document produced by my colleague from Lambton—Middlesex. I have to ask the question and then I will table it.

The difficulty I have, as an urban member, is in trying to understand why the national media, with the exception of one or two journalists, has not taken this document and gone through it to help educate the people in the urban areas. I would specifically like to ask the member that question.

The final part of my question concerns Looking Ahead: Phase Two in this document, which points to a direction in which we should be examining corporate concentration in the wholesale distribution and retail food industry. I find that very interesting. I know a lot of people in the retail food industry who are quite proud of the prices they are giving consumers. Yet we also know that the farm gate is very low in relation to that price.

I would like to ask the member for Lambton—Middlesex why there is no national media coverage of something that has been promoted around this House of Commons for almost a year? Second, how do we get a task force on corporate concentration in retail and wholesale?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member, in 45 seconds.

Mr. Ferguson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The national media have not picked this up, but other media have. It was in the London Free Press, and newspapers in New Brunswick carried full-page ads this last week. I am delighted with what has happened across Canada. Some of the churches are handing it out, as are other organized groups, such as the British Columbia dairy farmers, the Dairy Farmers of Canada, and so on. I am just delighted with what has taken place. However, I believe that the national media may very well be part of a concerted attack on our marketing board system.

However, as for Looking Ahead: Phase Two, I want to advise my colleague for Broadview—Greenwood that phase two is about 80 per cent complete. It is coming along very, very well. We are looking more at the distribution sector and the profit centres. We do not think the corner store is taking more than a reasonable mark-up. In fact, a lot of them are working with a very narrow margin of profit.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before we resume debate, I would just remind you that only ministers can officially table documents. Nothing prevents hon. members from leaving documents for information purposes at the table, but that is not a formal act of tabling.

An hon. member: Perhaps if we had unanimous consent.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to table that document?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to join the debate on Bill C-54, an act to amend the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

• (1630)

On the surface the bill would enable the establishment of a national agency that hopefully will have the authority to collect levies on domestic and imported products to support research and development to help our farmers. Perhaps it is difficult to argue against that. However, can we trust this government?

Only recently we have seen a series of actions on the part of this government which make this bill look like a charade, make-up, and camouflage. Why is that? Very recently we heard the debate about the GATT proposal that would require Canada to abandon the import controls it now uses to protect dairy, egg and poultry farmers from cheap imports and replace them with a system of tariffication. That is not acceptable to the egg, dairy and poultry farmers.

This GATT proposal is most definitely a consequence of the pressure being placed by the United States on Canada. Shall we resist it? Shall we resist it with all our efforts? I submit we should.

What is at stake in this GATT proposal is the survival of the supply management system, the marketing boards that in essence provide a stable income and fair return on the cost of the labour and industry of our farmers. This system provides Canadians with a steady supply of quality foods now and in the future and ensures an orderly system that spreads opportunities for all from coast to coast.

At stake, under this GATT proposal, is the viability of a $10 billion industry and 100,000 jobs. It affects farmers, their families and other communities for they are the businesses that supply farmers and the processing plants that rely on the raw products from the farmers. If you kill the egg, dairy, poultry industry you kill many more. There is a domino effect on the other industries in the country. Ultimately, the consumers will be affected because the very survival of a self-sufficient national food system is put into peril.

Were this sad scenario to occur, and I hope it does not, we would not be able to preserve our arable lands that are environmentally friendly.

In Manitoba, and across the country, we have seen a steady rise in the number of those who must receive welfare to survive. We have seen a steady rise in the number of unemployed. They would like to find jobs but they cannot find one. In Manitoba there has already been an increase in emigration, in the exit of people from my home province of Manitoba to other provinces. Therefore, when we heard about the GATT proposal it was yet another blow which created a sense of pessimism and gloom, as has also been indicated by the National Dairy Council of Canada. At this juncture, allow me to read a news report from the Winnipeg Free Press of Saturday, February 22. It is titled: "Couple Fear for Future of Dairy Farms". It reads in part:

"Wayne and Teri Fuchs are expecting their first child but they don't know whether their future son or daughter will grow up on a dairy farm. The couple, who milk 25 cows near Steinbach, are worried that a new international trade agreement being negotiated in Geneva will set off a chain of events that will force them off the farm".

That is fear, fear on the part of Canadians who now have farms. They fear for themselves today and they fear for their children tomorrow. So Canada must fear for itself.

Shall we allow this government to sacrifice a primary industry to its unfettered free market dogma? The answer from Canadians is an unequivocal no.

On July 22, 1988 in Geneva our former trade minister said, and I quote in essence: "We are not going to accept any settlement of this GATT round that is going to endanger our dairy farmers".

Three and one-half years later, 40,000 farmers braving sub-zero temperatures gathered on Parliament Hill last Friday. Yet the Prime Minister did not have the courage nor the courtesy to talk to them, to hear them, to learn from them.

In 1987, one year earlier, the government's initial proposal respecting the GATT negotiations today was a strategy toward tariffication away from the marketing board, away from supply management which is opposite to the present claim that is being purported in this bill. No wonder I doubt the sincerity of this government.

When I heard the eloquent presentation of my Liberal colleague, the hon. member for London—Middlesex, I could not help but truly thank him for his excellent presentation. It makes Canadians know the real sincerity of this government.

I ask whether we can trust this government. Let us examine the trade minister's letter of last month to his colleagues on the government side. He said that Canada would not withdraw from the negotiations even if it loses supply management.

Now we have this Bill C-54. What do we believe? On the surface the bill if passed will enable some degree of control on imports. It will thereby ensure collection of levies that will help promote research and development for the farmers and producers.

I ask again whether we can trust this government which has been rejected by 90 per cent of Canadians today?

The farmers at the farm rally last Friday asked this government that they be allowed to stay on their farmlands for another 125 years. Let us allow it to happen.

Let us recall some of the messages on the placards that they brought with them. I will read a few: "Farmers' Survival Means Canada's Survival", "Canada: The Third World Country", and "I Cannot Farm If You Do Not Help".

In conclusion, while I would like to see beauty in this bill, while I would like to see an element of protection for our farmers in this bill, that cannot be guaranteed until this bill is fully and critically examined at the legislative committee. Then we can ensure it truly will be a tool that will keep our farmers on their lands for another 125 years.

• (1640)

I must say that food is a social glue in any society. Our farmers deserve their survival and deserve our support.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to speak on this bill.

Governments generally, and maybe this government in particular, are not interested in having one unified voice for all Canadian farmers. The government is having enough trouble as it is with the present situation that its somewhat retarded reaction on GATT has brought to the farmers across Canada.

For the first time in many years the farmers under the marketing boards and those outside have felt the need to come together and take an established position which recognizes the need to defend farmers.

Grain growers, poultry producers, dairy farmers, they are all fighting together the position the government took on GATT originally and which it has moved away from but also are trying to bolster the position it claims to have now.

They are trying to make sure that the negotiations the government is having at GATT will not devastate supply management and supply managed marketing boards. They are not feeling very happy with the position the government has taken.

In these amendments to the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act, the government is doing a number of things, none of which is going to improve the act particularly.

First of all, it is repaying a political debt to certain groups of producers. It is continuing to divide the farmers. If one group of farmers does not say what the government thinks it wants to hear, it will try to organize another group of farmers. That group will be given some responsibility and the government will expect to hear the answer from it.

The government is not interested in hearing one single voice from the farmers when it can hear a wide variety of voices and opinions. If it gets advice that it does no like from one major group, it can always go out and create another group. That group will tell it exactly what it wants to hear. Then those farmers who have stated the government's point of view will have some ability to operate within the system. That is the payment of the debt.

The government is also making sure that supply management and marketing boards do not proliferate and become stronger. In fact, the government may be driving the marketing boards further down by passing these amendments.

The effective promotion of marketing will be considerably diluted by the possibility of a dozen or so other agencies which will suddenly take to the field. Therefore, we will have less funds to establish the kind of marketing that has been done by the established agencies.

It is ironic. The marketing boards should not worry because at the level at which the government has been supporting them at GATT there may not be any supply managed marketing boards left after the next GATT negotiations.

It would mean that the government would have succeeded in doing what it has been trying to do for the last many years.

This government is ideologically opposed to marketing boards. Everything it has done over the years has indicated that, even to the point of its position as far as the Wheat Board is concerned. It is not a supply managed marketing board but has been affected by lack of support by this government.

Bill C–54 before us is a proposal to amend the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

This legislation has been around for 20 years. It was an attempt that worked marginally and in many cases worked very well along with the Dairy Marketing Act for those 20 years in providing the farmers with the marketing tools needed to become self–reliant market oriented individuals across the world but particularly in the Canadian domestic market.

These amendments will have the effect of limiting the effectiveness of the original legislation. We have not been a smoke and mirrors operation because this legislation will allow a few organizations to form agencies to do the few things they want to do without having to deal with the original act. That act required a considerable amount of work and organization on their part.

If this act is amended, they will be able to change that structure and become an organization which can do promotions, collect money for promotions and possibly do research. Even that has been dealt with rather differently than in the past. On the surface these changes may seem innocuous. In actual fact they may have the effect of limiting the effectiveness of the original bill.

These marketing boards that have been established under the act have all of the rights that are being put in place by the amendment of this act. If anyone of the agencies wanted the ability to establish levies or to raise fees, it could do so under the present act. It would mean that it would have to organize a marketing board of some sort to be able to do so.

The present act has functioned well in Canada. The reason it has functioned well is that there have been similar acts in each of the provinces. These acts permit the establishment of marketing agencies across the country as well as marketing boards within each province.

This process has allowed them to establish an umbrella organization which can do the kind of promotion and work for the development and marketing of the particular product being produced.

What the government is proposing here today is to set up a companion act which will permit the establishment of very similar agencies. These agencies would simply take funds from the producers by way of check–off and then permit a producer group to administer those funds in what is called promotion of the product without any necessary reference or responsibility to the producers initially. I consider this a very inefficient way of doing what the government wants to do.

• (1650)

In terms of straight efficiency and furtherance of a market oriented approach, the government has left this up in the air. What it intends to put in place with these amendments is a second tier of this particular legislation which would develop into a second tier of agencies as well.

These agencies would exist along with the present agencies for poultry, eggs, turkey, hatching eggs and so on, but it would not have the somewhat difficult requirement of organizing and making sure that we have all producers on the same side. A few producers would be able to control the market pretty generally in this particular situation.

I have another concern about this particular legislation, that is the inclusion of imported products. We will no longer be extolling the virtues of the Canadian product, say Canadian beef for instance, but we will be using Canadian money to help sell and improve the marketing of imported products. The U.S. has been doing this to us for many years. It has been putting a tax on our product which it then uses for developing the sale of our products in that country to some extent. At the same time it has put in place customs duties which make our product considerably more expensive relative to its product.

Supply management has been good for producers. It has also been good for consumers. The Consumers' Association of Canada has been very short-sighted in its approach to the effects of supply management. It does not really understand the structure under which supply management has been put in place. By having secure producers we have a secure supply. The Consumers' Association will say that we are paying more than we would need to pay for products produced under supply management.

However, as the member for Lambton—Middlesex told us a few minutes ago, if we take dairy as an example, we possibly pay more for our dairy products now but we do have a secure supply. The dairy producers from the United States who were here the other day told us that they were starving with their system, that they would not be around very long, and that the only organizations that would be producing dairy products in the United States would be those organizations that are vertically integrated, the transnationals that have put themselves in a position to take over the industry as it collapses.

Once those industries have control of production in the United States, the prices will go up according to what the market can accept. If by that time we do not have any producers in Canada, which is the logical conclusion of the GATT negotiations that are supposedly going on, then there will be no farmers there to keep the price down at the cost of production level, which is all that you and I pay for, Mr. Speaker, when we buy dairy products, eggs, poultry and so on produced in Canada.

We pay the cost of production. The cost of production may be a little less in some places in the United States, but if the multinationals, the transnationals, become the producer, the wholesaler and the retailer, the price of those products is going to be out of reach very quickly and we will have no farmers producing in Canada to alleviate that situation.

The GATT negotiations have become a process of destroying marketing boards. In place of those marketing boards we are going to get a check-off system to be used to promote our own and imported products. That is not what the farmers wanted. That is not what they gathered here on the Hill for yesterday. That is not what they have been talking about for the last several years.

What they want is a structure that allows some comfort of protection of the pricing system that they already have, as we have been told many times today, a pricing system that guarantees the farmer the cost of production and is probably the best kind of production structure in the world because it does not gouge the consumer but does make sure the farmer can go on producing.

As I mentioned earlier, ideologically this government has never been in favour of orderly marketing. John Wise, who was Minister of Agriculture in the previous government, did proclaim to believe in marketing boards, but he did not run again. Many of us would like to know exactly why.

Orderly marketing, as I said, is not ideologically a position this government likes. It believes that the free market should be allowed to take effect, but the free market will not work in the provision of food.

What the government does at every opportunity it has is undercut in every way the orderly marketing system. It is quite willing to stand up now and say how much its members have done to defend the marketing boards. They stand up and shout: "We believe", but what they have done is undercut the foundations of marketing boards to a great extent, and they are continuing to do so under the GATT negotiations that we have been hearing so much about lately. They are quite willing to say: "Yes, we will support them now" because they know they have undercut the foundations to the extent that those agencies are crumbling.

I think the farmers have every right to suspect the motives of this government when it starts meddling with this very important act and does things to the act that have the effect of reducing the effectiveness of the act and spreading it across commodities without requiring those commodities to establish structures that will improve the marketing of the particular product they are attempting to produce.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, as I have been listening to the speakers throughout the afternoon, I am beginning to see another instance develop here where once again this government is tending to weaken institutions that have traditionally had strong national powers to make sure national standards are maintained, which made our marketing boards the envy of the world and which gave our family farms all kinds of reassurance. The member has just said that once again we are seeing another example of this government's dismantling operation. Does the member see in this bill a further possibility that national standards will not be maintained or will be weakened; in other words there will not be enough resources to provide and maintain national standards?

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, what is happening at GATT is undercutting the marketing board structure to the extent that this bill touches the legislation under which those marketing boards were established. It will become ineffective or maybe even unnecessary if the marketing boards collapse in their present form.

This bill is not changing the situation so that marketing boards have any security of continuing. What they are providing in this particular bill is the possibility for other agencies which they may call marketing agencies, but they will not have that security of supply management, that security of orderly marketing which the present bill has put into place. What we will get instead is a proliferation of marketing agencies, which will promote their particular product but will not give the producing farmer any security that he is going to get the kind of price he needs to survive.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I will have to issue you an invitation to visit the fine city of Prince Albert, indeed the whole constituency which includes half the province of Saskatchewan.

Nevertheless, I would like to ask the member a question. I was only elected to this House in 1988. The GATT negotiations, which are so much a part of the discussion of marketing boards, have been going on since 1985, that is the current Uruguay round.

Lately the government has certainly taken the approach that it is backing marketing boards 100 per cent, that it is backing the supply management sectors, and that it is going to bat in Europe with all the muscle and ammunition it has. There are farmers over there, along with the Prime Minister.

It strikes me that it is awfully late in the day to be taking that kind of an approach. In fact, it is almost hypocritical to be taking that approach now. My impression is that the threats to our marketing structures, the Canadian Wheat Board, supply management and the Crow rate in western Canada have all come from the United States, from the American side of this debate. It has been American agribusiness interests like Cargill, Continental and others that have put the heat on this government both through free trade and at the GATT to undermine these kinds of structures.

At the same time at the GATT negotiations it seems to me that rather than condemn what was happening through the American Export Enhancement Program we have lined up with the Americans against the Europeans. We had the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds running around western Canada telling farmers to dump their grain on the lots of Mercedes dealers and really making villains out of the Europeans at every meeting I heard him address, including the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool annual meeting.

I was just wondering: Has this always been our approach? Surely we need the European common market to support us, but all I have seen from this government in the past is an attack on the Europeans, falling in with the Americans, with the net consequence that the Americans are getting their way and destroying what is left of the structure of our agriculture.

Mr. Hovdebo: There is no doubt that what we are seeing here is an attempt by members of this particular government to try in some ways to shut the door after the horse has gone. They are trying to convince you and the Canadian farmer that the door has been shut all the time, that this was their policy all the time, when we know it was not.

The tobacco farmers have been trying to establish a marketing board for many years. They finally got a small amendment to this act, but by that time they had expended all their money and all their energies and tobacco was on the downslide anyway. It is was longer valuable. Consequently they did not get the marketing board, which might have saved their industry, at least for some farmers.

It is the same now for apples.

Relative to the position taken by this government on GATT and the need to bring onside the farming community of Europe, it is a very good method that this government has overlooked. The farmers of Europe operate very much as we do in the marketing structure. They recognize that what is good for them would be good for our farmers as well. The American farmers recognize that what is good for us is good for their farmers. The farmers in most of the industrialized world who are producing dairy products and so on recognize our system as being effective. They would be onside. But we have alienated them and they are not on our side, not because they think our system is wrong, but because we have set it up in such a way that they think they would be better off not supporting us.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to participate in this debate and follow the remarks of several of my colleagues this afternoon. The debate, in terms of the public, would seem to be a pretty inconsequential matter involving amendments to the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act, which in terms of Bill C-54 before us today allows check-offs of certain produce so that there can be income and revenue to help with research and other things, which seems to be a laudable objective, and also to help advertise certain produce and production.

Other members have said, with actually a better understanding than I of the farm community, we should take that bill with the amendments and get it to the Standing Committee on Agriculture where the motion is at the present time and really just have the farm interests in to analyse and dissect if some of the purported reasons of this amendment to the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act is going to do what the bill and the sponsors of the bill say it is going to do.

I am not going to spend much time on this. In fact, I am not going to spend any more time on that aspect of the bill. Certainly the thrust of the debate has developed right from the start. Since the subject matter of marketing boards and national marketing agencies has come before the House, that has been the concern of all members, certainly from this side of the House. It is a very well justified concern. We do not have to go any further than the memory and the echo of the 30,000 to 40,000 farmers who took a day off to come here and fill the lawn of Parliament Hill on Friday last in a most fantastic demonstration of solidarity and concern that their very future and the future of the family farm is at risk.

We have all heard those clichés about the family farm. In the agricultural world you get the vertical operation and the corporate structure of the vertical operation, which is certainly much more akin to the United States. If you ever wanted to really feel the concern of family farmers, you only had to stand out there for the two to three hours that many members did with the crowd and obviously some others on the stage. With those numbers in a most restrained and disciplined way, they tried to bring their message forward. I tend to agree. This is a difficult thing, but I can understand the dilemma of the government because there are a lot of political ramifications to this. I am not going to belabour that very much in terms of the Constitution. Here we are talking about the amendments to the act affecting marketing boards today. At the end of the week we are supposed to have a report from the constitutional committee. I would not be surprised if the GATT round does not strike them and clarify article XI which allows Canada to have these marketing boards, and that that omission, along with whatever the recommendations are from the constitutional committee, could very well provoke and perhaps should provoke a parliamentary crisis in this House with a vote that could very well bring on an election a lot sooner than a lot of people think or warrant.

• (1710)

There is not a member from the Quebec side of the government who is going to feel very secure, regardless of constitutional proposals. We can all speak as Canadians on the constitutional proposals. We will wait and see the committee report, but this is the bread and butter of what makes a country tick. It is the farmers and the land. The farther you get away from the land—I have an old fashioned philosophy—the more unreal and perhaps more artificial you get.

There was nothing artificial about those 30,000 to 40,000 farmers with their little children who came and physically demonstrated their concern for the future.

This is one reason I am glad to have a chance to speak today. I am glad the government House leader has had that ingenuity to in effect get this bill before the House so members have a chance to put more pressure and have a chance to speak on this fundamental issue of marketing boards, which as other speakers have said, has not really had that much attention during the five years of the Uruguay round.

As far as I am concerned, the old signals went up. While there were rockets fired over the Peace Tower on January 1 to welcome in the New Year, the real rocket in terms of marketing boards was the Dunkel report in December when Mr. Dunkel tried to bring forward a consensus after five years of negotiation and in effect said to all 108 countries: "Listen, countries of the world, these are my proposals for solving all the problems of trade around the world". There was not anything in the Dunkel report about article XI.

Long before that report it should have been clear to our negotiators in Geneva, to Mr. Dunkel and other countries of the world. We will give and take on many subjects and we will give and take in many areas of trade. There is one part of our fragile economy going through the recession and economic problems that a lot of other countries are going through around the world. There is one part that has been under stress and strain, agriculture. But there is one part of agriculture that is not under stress and strain. The previous history was outlined in the very tremendous speech of the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex earlier when he reviewed the legislative history, when there was instability with certain areas of production of eggs, milk and chickens. I was here in the House when that bill came before us, as I said in a question earlier. I am not going to get into the debate from where I sit because it is not quite accurate to say that the opposition of the day, and I was in that opposition, was against the concept of marketing boards. Quite frankly it is not fair to say that.

There was a member in the opposition who turned and became a member of the Liberal government, the then member from Crowfoot. He fought night and day in several sessions of the agriculture committee. He would not even drink coffee because he thought the government of the day, the Liberals, were going to pollute his coffee so that he might go to sleep and could not carry on the fight for a national farm marketing council which was set up. The fight was not just over the general principles of the bill. It was over whether there was going to be producer representation. There were many other aspects of a very complex question. That was part of the tangled fight between opposition and the government of that day. We finally got the national bill. The history about tobacco that was said here earlier is also correct.

We got the bill. Mr. Speaker, long before you came down the political road and perhaps many years before you were out of school, because you have that gentility of youth. There was stability in certain areas of production, dairy, chickens and eggs, to name three that have marked and helped the Canadian farmer. It has really been the backbone of an area of our economy that has been under stress and strain. That is why it is absolutely incredulous to me. I say I am glad, in a backhanded way, that the government House leader has brought this before us so we can talk about it, but in the general principle of common sense. You have the old axiom: "If it ain't broke don't fix it" or "Don't fix it if it ain't broke". You can tangle that up as this is tangled up. Supply management has obviously been good for stability for the farmer and it has also been good for the consumer. We can talk all we want about sovereignty. We can talk all we want about special status and distinct society. My God, are we going to be such a distinct society in this nation from coast to coast that we will not have our own farmers producing our own farm production and we are going to get it from the vertical operation south of the border?

I was told this three or four years ago, long before the free trade debate heated up and became an election issue in 1988. Quite frankly, I lost a very good supporter over the free trade debate in 1988 who was a turkey producer.

The member for Lambton—Middlesex would know this but I did not know it three years ago, after the Uruguay round had started. Then, of course, we had the free trade matter before the House. I did not know that there was one vertical turkey producer in the state of Pennsylvania that produces more turkeys than the total Canadian production. I know the same thing is repeated in at least four different instances with chickens. Not family farms, not having your son or daughter trying to take up where the old man was and keep the old furrow going, as you harrow and plough and build again for the future. Do not take your income and hope it is going to pass on because the acreage is going to appreciate and that is how you are, perhaps, going to get a pension.

No, these are not family farms. These are vertical, corporate agribusiness operations. Is that what we are going to get if GATT does not go the way we want? I tend to agree. It gets to be criticized by a lot of my former colleagues. I would have loved to see the Minister for International Trade in Europe two years ago when we needed a delegation.

When Dunkel dumped his report in December—there is a lot of alliteration so you have a lot of d's there—we got dunked. I am afraid the Canadian farmer is going to be dunked. The Minister for International Trade is a fine decent man, but he is not in support of marketing boards. He is a free trader. We know he is a free trader because we know about the free trade situation, and I will not fight that battle.

Quite frankly I come from the deep east in Nova Scotia. We believe in the sea, the winds and the currents. You cannot sail against the wind unless you know what you are doing and it is hard to sail against a current.

An hon. member: The minister does not know what he is doing.

Mr. Nowlan: A lot of the things that have been said here should have been said a couple of years ago, when we carved out our balanced position, by the Minister of Finance and the then Minister of Agriculture. At that time I was on the other side of the fence with the government and perhaps I should have tried to speak out a little more. My common sense said there was something wrong. We had our caucus. This was discussed in our caucus, but I will not get into that.

There is a fundamental flaw with us now trying to shut the door when everyone has been led out to the pasture. For wheat and beef we are for free trade and yet when it comes to milk, turkeys, chickens and eggs, we are for protected trade. I say that is why our negotiators now and/or this last minute entourage of ministers and farm leaders would have, quite understandably, a heck of a time to say: "Hey, we do not mind the barn door being opened for the world to come in and for us to sell out in wheat and beef. But, hey, keep the door barred in terms of chicken and other production, dairy and eggs". That is a fundamental problem we face.

I am disturbed by that. I was disturbed when we pronounced this balanced approach. Frankly it was a case of the left hand not agreeing with the right hand because it was trying to go in two different directions. They were trying to sail with different winds, one from the north and one from the south. You cannot do it. The birds have come home to roost. The unfortunate thing is that the only people who are going to get gored, in general, are the Canadian public and certainly our farmers unless this is stabilized.

I say it is up to every member, and especially every government member, who has a farm community that has supply management to take a stand and to let that government know that regardless of all the other problems we have, we are not going to throw away the supply management and the security of that for the nebulous status of a weaker, in effect almost non-existent, article XI.

If the United States can play it both ways, why can we not play it both ways? I asked a question in the House today. Much to my horror, I found out some time last week—and I guess it has been there for some time; I am looking at a letter dated November 25, 1991, which I got by fax today, confirming what I had been told last week—that 62 American senators—and this is in their system, I appreciate that—have written President Bush and in the letter say: "Hey, Mr. President, negotiations are going along in Geneva". In part of it they say: "The Europeans are under current GATT negotiations with the unreasonable demands made by the European Community negotiators. We feel that the willingness of the U.S. negotiators to unilaterally concede article XXII", the section that gives them protection, that is, vertical protection for their vertical operations, admittedly, but protection for their production of milk, cotton, sugar and peanuts. They have had other programs before. They have had eight other commodities protected under article XXII.

In effect, this letter says that the price is too high, that the Europeans are asking too high a price, and they have asked the President not to compromise on article XXII. If that is the position at the moment of 62 senators—and I appreciate it has not quite come to votes yet and the President has not yet signed the GATT deal, if there is a GATT deal—surely to goodness and mercy, if the American Senate, powerful as it is—and we all admit it is pretty powerful—can bring the concerns of their constituencies to their President, why can we not do the same here?

The irony of it is that it is the United States that is trying to break down the supply management in this country. When you get that double-dealing situation of their asking for protection to extend—and to be fair and honest, they have had this waiver under GATT; they have had it and they want to maintain it—goodness gracious, it is too mild to say it is not fair that for the American pressure that is attacking our supply management situation here in Canada, i.e., marketing boards, for them to come one way and attack us and then to have the nerve to make sure their President protects their interests to keep their commodities protected under article XXII, something just does not ring right on that.

I certainly hope that at some stage our minister of trade is going to take a public position, or else privately first with President Bush or the Americans, and say: "Look, you cannot have it both ways. If you want to get rid of our supply management, then how are you going to justify protection under article XXII for your commodities?" If they get protection under article XXII, then we need the same protection of the clarification and strengthening of article XI of GATT.

There is another element in this whole thing, and my time is coming down pretty quickly, I think. I am not going to get into the debate on that Globe and Mail editorial today. Frankly the Globe and Mail editorials are travesty compared to what the Globe and Mail editorials used to be when it was a national paper expressing national news.

All they have to do is read the report of the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex, which has been referred to by the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood, regarding not only stability for the farmers but decent food, good food for our consumers for everyone's benefit. The price of food and percentage spent by the Canadians for food is down now. He has all the figures there.

The whole thing is ridiculous if an industry of $10 billion is going down the drain, and that is the concern. Even the government admits the concern that GATT is not clarified.

We can debate whether they have been strong enough or whether it should have started earlier. But we have heard the Prime Minister and other ministers admit that this will be a dire straits situation if we do not get it strengthened and clarified.

Yet as said in a Globe and Mail editorial, you get an industry that has been stable and has been contributing to the Canadian economy and/or taxes. There is another element to this whole business of marketing boards and stability of that section of agriculture, that you have money there to help pay for some of these social programs that have made Canadians so particular and so distinctive and are a source of pride for all Canadians. You have to have a viable industry all across the board, especially here. We know so many are going down the drain.

I throw out again—and I hope someone asks me the question—that I do not understand when you are beguiled with the answer, "Oh, well, this is what the negotiators or some of the experts are saying. Do not worry about the import quotas to protect your marketing boards. You are going to have tariffication and pay high tariffs. That will keep out products so we will still be able to maintain the family farm".

In conclusion—I hope someone asks me the question—how do you rationalize and reconcile the tariffication under GATT where there are supposed to be big high tariffs to help protect this marketing board situation? It loses the protection of quotas because article XI has not been clarified. How do you rationalize that with the free trade agreement, which is reducing tariffs and completely eliminating them? Quite frankly, I think there has been a lot of duplicity here on this argument of tariffication.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member, who has given a good dissertation on this very complex subject. I know from the discussions we have had in caucus that he is supported in general by my colleagues.

I do not have many farmers in my riding. I do have a few in one area, and I know they have been watching this issue very closely. Along with my other colleagues from Newfoundland, I have met with about 20 dairy, poultry and egg-producing farmers from Newfoundland who are really scared that this will have a very negative effect on them. It may be surprising, but we are looking at somewhere in the vicinity of over 3,000 people in this area who are directly affected.

I was interested in the hon. member's comments at the end on the rationalization between the tariffication, which seems to be an alternative—and not a very good alternative, as I understand it, and as has been put to me by the people who are worried by this move—and the free trade as it was negotiated, which seemed to have some difficulty with this area. I would ask the hon. member if he would like to enlighten us on how he perceives this so-called conflict and precisely how it relates to what the government says it is doing.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member, who is a very distinguished member of this House. He has had much more expertise in the navy and in the maritime world, with his contributions to the naval service of the country.

I am bothered. I do not have the answer. I have been told by some experts that because it is a GATT deal which is international it will supersede the bilateral deal of free trade between Canada and the United States. On the other hand, the primary flow of goods, certainly agricultural goods, is between Canada and the United States, and if you get tariffication and high tariffs under the GATT deal, if it comes to that, as I think of the bilateral agreement on free trade, which is to reduce tariffs, I think you will have to have some type of negotiation with the Americans on this, to try to negotiate with the Americans to try to maintain the high GATT tariffs, because the free trade says to reduce tariffs.

It is American pressure that got us into this quandary of supply management perhaps going out the window without article XI being clarified so that they can pump a lot of their surplus production, which we do not have under marketing boards. I do not think they will be very willing negotiators to try to protect the tariffs, even if we could get them, and that is not the way we want to go.

• (1730)

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the member for Annapolis Valley—Hants to elaborate a bit more for me on his insight regarding a potential parliamentary crisis.

Was he suggesting that the disciplined, orderly message we received from the farmers of Canada last week on the front lawn of Parliament Hill might have some influence on some of the rural members of the government side? Or, was he suggesting that if the GATT discussions do not come down in our favour it might suddenly twig the conscience of 10 members over there? I guess they only need to lose 10 members and we would have an election. Could he just elaborate a bit on that?

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, we are getting a little off the amendments to the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act, but I did mention that in my speech and the hon. member has been here all day paying close attention.

I come from the philosophy that directs me in this whole world of politics. The only consistency in politics is inconsistency and uncertainty. If we have that as a creed, we are not going to be totally surprised at anything that might happen.

All I am saying in a futuristic, prophetic and/or potentially pathetic way perhaps for some is according to my insight and instinct. While it is complex it is not too sexy. It is not as dramatic as a car plant closure or even as graphic as the cod industry and the things that are happening to fishermen on the Atlantic coast. It is basic to the land and to so many people including their relatives that depending on what happens members are going to have to take a real stand if we do not get a clarification or strengthening at the GATT.

They have to let their leaders know that, and then we put that on to the constitutional package which is coming down at the end of the week with all the uncertainties there. Yes, I think Parliament is a lot more fragile than a lot of people think.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I have a short question for the hon. member who was former chairman of the transport committee of this House. He has respect from every side of the House, and I have admired him for a long time.

I am just wondering about this legislation which permits levies to be collected from Canadian producers to promote products produced here in Canada. I am relating here to the fact that in 1989 we had one million pounds a week of no rolled beef coming into Canada from the United States. No rolled beef is ungraded beef.

Last year it was not one million pounds a week; it was three million pounds a week. How can we differentiate between Canadian beef and American beef coming in here to ensure those levies that protect the Canadian producers are not applied to the no rolled beef coming in, increasing consumption of imported beef rather than our own Canadian beef?

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the question was short. My answer is going to be shorter.

I think that is one of the very good reasons we have to get this into committee, to have some of the experts answer that question.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to have the opportunity to stand this afternoon to debate Bill C–54, government initiated legislation to amend the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act.

This act may appear to be perhaps inconsequential as it is brought forward to this House for its first substantive debate on Monday, February 24. As one analyses this act, it can do nothing but raise concern, especially in view of the fact that on Friday as mentioned by my other colleagues we had 40,000 farmers and friends demonstrating on the Hill, farmers who represented the supply managed sector of our Canadian agricultural industry. This legislation is in fact linked to just those groups of producers in this country: the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency, the Canadian Turkey Marketing Agency, the Canadian Chicken Marketing Agency, the Chicken Broiler Hatching Egg Marketing Agency, along with milk producers from my riding of Northumberland. These are the very groups most concerned at this very time in Canada about the security of their future.

I was very pleased that eight busloads of people from my riding of Northumberland came here to demonstrate on the Hill in Ottawa. I was extremely proud of their representation among the 40,000 producers and friends on the Hill on Friday. I want to encourage them to continue to express their concerns to this government on all issues. In this case, their concern was to convince this government that it must protect article XI under the GATT which is being negotiated at this time.

I will do everything I can to protect not only the supply managed farmers in my riding but the many hundreds of other farmers in my riding whose jobs on the land affect thousands and thousands of jobs in my riding of Northumberland.

Farm production, agricultural production is a national security issue for me. Although I know that in Northumberland we have the most efficient and hard-working farmers to be found anywhere in Canada I am not convinced, I have not studied the facts, that my farmers in Northumberland, as hard as I can protect them, are able to produce for this whole country of 26 million people.

Any piece of legislation that comes before the House that speaks to anything which can have an impact on farmers in my riding or anywhere in this country is going to receive careful scrutiny from me. I will be in constant contact with my farmers as well to ensure that their concerns about any legislation which may impact on their well-being will be heard by the House of Commons and any committee that will be reviewing legislation coming forward.

This legislation appears simple. It will provide enabling legislation for the creation of national promotion and research agencies. It will be up to each commodity producer group to decide for itself whether it wishes to implement an agency that will promote and research its particular product. Although there are groups in support of this legislation there are other groups that do not support this legislation. There is some sense that this could be yet just one more regressive tax on farm production in this country. Certainly we know that our farmers are beleaguered in this country right now and do not need, as does no Canadian, any further taxation at this time.

What we need is a cut in taxes to try to spur our economy and brighten the future for all Canadians, not just our farmers.

I am concerned that this legislation does not guarantee that the government would continue to fund its own programs for research and promotion of our agricultural products in this country. I do not feel secure in simply hearing the words from this government that this legislation would not someday be a substitute for the funding the government now puts into research and the promotion of agricultural products in this country.

There is a very important role the government must play on behalf of agricultural production in this country to secure the health of our agricultural production in this country. The legislation is proposing a check-off system, or a levy, to be set by producer-agencies if so desired by each producer group. Presumably that levy would be applied equally to every member of that producing group.

We know that there are many farmers who have unequal incomes within producer groups.

• (1740)

We have some dairy farmers who are quite prosperous at the moment, thanks to GATT's article XI, but we have other dairy producers who are trying to come into the business, are having to make large investments and are not so wealthy at this particular time. Yet, it would appear that this legislation would be applying levies equally across the board to every producer within a producer group.

Could we not work out some sort of guaranteed formula so that we could have a reasonable application of levies to individual members within producer groups. If this legislation were to affect only a regional producing group and every member within that producing group had to pay this levy, would that input, the investment of that region in promotion and research, benefit other regions? Why should that happen?

Can we be assured that, as one of this legislation's detractors says, the check-off system is not an elaborate way of funding farm organizations and directing money to groups controlled by agribusiness and not farmers? The person who has this concern asks if this is a possibility. I would want to be absolutely convinced that it was not a possibility before we put this legislation into place.

Farmers and producers would be paying the levy. We want to give the opportunity to farmers and producers to be involved in the research and promotion of their products but we worry about just adding on another tax without the guarantee that the government will continue and increase its own proportion of funding for production and research.

We also worry that this is a type of user pay system for the farmers only. Yet research and promotion does not only benefit the farmers; there is a great benefit to consumers. If the government does not increase its support for research and promotion then the farmers alone are paying for something that should benefit all Canadians. That is why we must support and put a greater emphasis on the federal government's role in providing the funding required for adequate promotion and research in agriculture in this country.

There is no doubting the fact that we are living in a global community where whatever we produce is in a trading environment and we are trying to liberalize and free trade around the world. However, as I said at the beginning, I consider agricultural production to be a national security issue. This country must never lose its ability to be self-sufficient in agricultural production. If we lose our ability to feed ourselves, how will we feed ourselves? Who will feed us and at what cost?

I have seen other small, vulnerable countries that have lost their ability to feed themselves. I have seen net exporters of basic food commodities become importers in order to survive, and I have seen the cost that they paid. At first, it looked as if prices of commodities in distant lands, across the border looked cheaper, just as Canadians, many of whom are involved in cross-border shopping, look south and say: "Canada's food is expensive. Look how cheap it is in the United States". For these small, vulnerable countries the same situation seems to exist. They were encouraged to get out of their production of basic crops for survival and get into cash crops for export.

They found that those cheap prices which seemed so enticing just outside and beyond their borders suddenly became very high and exorbitant. Those poor people were more hungry than they had ever dreamed of being before and those who had so little became dispossessed of the very, very little they might have had. I never want to see that kind of situation occur here in Canada.

I have a very deep concern about any legislation that will affect farm production in this country in any way. I will want iron-clad guarantees from the committee that reviews and examine this piece of legislation that it enhances protection for farmers in our country and in no way detracts from their ability to survive and feed us, to feed all of us who should be so grateful for what our farmers do for us but who in fact have so little appreciation for the value of their work. We all must become more aware of the agricultural economy in this country and do everything we can to help protect it. It is a national security issue.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the member for Northumberland for those excellent remarks and the clear message that she always leaves with us.

I know the riding the hon. member represents very well because in the 1950s I supplemented my income and put myself through university by working on tobacco farms in her riding. She will know the regions of Osaca and Elizabethville of which I speak. It was very sad when the tobacco industry was on its way out. Many would cheer that because the product did create health problems. However, I was actually very excited at how entrepreneurial these former tobacco farmers were. They tried growing corn, peanuts, and soya beans instead of tobacco. However, by the time that product reached harvest the price dropped and they were working for nothing.

I would like to ask the member what has happened to those tobacco farms not producing tobacco anymore. Are they producing food with which we can feed Canadians and the starving people in developing countries? If not, does she recommend anything the government can do to help transfer from one crop to another?

Mrs. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, I am happy to respond. In fact, the shift that has occurred in production in my riding for those farmers who were involved in the production of tobacco has been quite devastating to many of them.

It was very interesting that there was an agricultural assessment of the quality of lands in my riding some years ago. Tobacco had been such a high-priced crop for farmers and as a result the land upon which it was grown was considered to be a quality, number one quality land. However, when the market changed and it became no longer possible for farmers to continue their tobacco production they found that a lot of the soil that had been producing tobacco was not suitable for many other crops. Therefore, research to find other ways to use those lands to produce food for Canadian consumption and export was very important. It is still an ongoing process.

However, many of those acres of land which had been cultivated for tobacco are not being cultivated today because the land is too sandy and just not suitable for many other crops.

Some have looked at corn, some have looked at tomatoes, and a few are looking at peanut production on those lands. There is a need for research. It is the responsibility of our federal government to assist in the research process and not leave all of the responsibility to the farmers themselves, who are the most vulnerable and in many cases the least able to pay for research.

My concern with this legislation is that it is important to recognize the need to continue research to find diversification of agricultural production without putting the total burden on farmers, who without adequate research are simply going out of business with the result that their lands are not being used.

• (1750)

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a preamble and a question. I was very interested in what my colleague was saying about the difficulties farmers are facing both in the international market as well as in their own industry here in Canada.

We live in one of the richest countries in the world in terms of agricultural land; yet our farmers are faced with bankruptcy on a daily basis. They have to struggle. I wonder what is the situation of farmers in Third World countries are in, where they have absolutely no government support, no government research centre. I know the answer to that.

I want to ask my colleague if she is aware of any studies that have been done in order to determine what it is we have to do as a society to protect our farmers. I agree with her statement that when the farming industry goes down, the whole society collapses. Historically, farming has been the backbone of any country, of any society anywhere in the world, when we talk about societies with an agricultural component.

I want to congratulate her and commend her. Those 30,000 farmers who came to the rally on the Hill visited my riding of Ottawa Centre. I was delighted, along with my constituents, to receive them where they spent a magnificent day and made their message very clear. I want to ask my colleague if she is aware of any study that has been done to determine the issues we have to deal with in order to provide our farmers with a permanent safety net.

Mrs. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, I personally am not aware of particular studies. It has always been my experience that when you are faced with a problem, you had better go and speak to those people who are most directly affected by the problem.

I would say that the number one experts in Northumberland, in Ontario or across this country on the issue you are asking information about are the farmers themselves. Some of the farmers are very highly educated, but are vulnerable to the economic stress in farming the land today. We have many well qualified agricultural academics who, along with the farmers, work on very complex issues and help them by suggesting the best remedies. They do carry out many small research projects and can give advice and direction.

For me personally the farmer himself is the number one expert on what requirements should be in place to assist them and protect their survival.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my hon. colleague if, in the course of her observations with respect to the farming community, she has noted the incredible stress on the wives, the families and the impact it has on the state of marriage and divorce as the farm home and the farmland add to the complications of a very difficult life in the first place.

Mrs. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for the very excellent question. As farms are weakening and being destroyed and going out of production, it is not just land, crops, equipment and bank accounts that we are talking about. We are talking about farm families. The social destruction that is occurring in farm families across this country is enormous. It is very heart-wrenching to hear the individual stories.

Farmers are very proud people individually. It has been my experience that they do not always care to share with each other their personal economic problems. There has been in fact a dramatic increase in the numbers of suicides, family breakdowns, violence even in our wonderful agricultural communities. This situation must be addressed. In fact, farms cannot survive without off-farm income. There is not a farmer that I know of who is not involved in survival through off-farm income. Not just the farmer, but his wife and kids are all involved in the process. They are all working hard. They are the most hard-working people I have ever encountered. When they are working so hard and they cannot make ends meet, the stress within families and the amount of family breakdown is something we cannot tolerate.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity this afternoon to speak to Bill C-54, an act to amend the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, there is a serious threat to agriculture in Canada today, and especially to agriculture as regulated by this legislation. I am of course referring to GATT and to the possible loss of GATT article XI(2)(c), which would allow foreign produce to enter Canada. Canadians want to maintain article XI, and they need the kind of protection we now have in this country.

Mr. Speaker, a few days ago, I heard some people say that Canadian farmers should be more productive, and one of these people was Professor Gilles Paquet of the University of Ottawa. Professor Paquet is probably good at figures. However, he tends to forget that although dairy producers in Canada, including those along the U.S border, have slightly higher production costs than their U.S. counterparts, they would have no trouble competing with these people provided subsidy levels were more or less the same on both sides of the border. However, that is not the case.

In the United States, some of the subsidies offered farmers are absolutely incredible, while in Canada, our farm producers receive very little in the way of subsidies. For instance, dairy producers get only $6.03 per hectolitre, which represents about 8.5 per cent or 8.9 per cent of their total income. I imagine the hon. member for Sarnia—Lambton knows that even better than I do. In the United States, however, farmers receive far more substantial amounts.

Nevertheless, some people insist that Canadian farmers should emulate American farmers. It is not easy, because the Canadian farmer is not competing with the American farmer. He is competing with the Treasury of the U.S. Government. It is not easy; it is well nigh impossible. I do not know a single trade or industry that could compete with the Government of the United States. If major industries cannot do it, how can we expect the individual farmer to compete with the U.S. government?

This leads us to the subject of the bill before the House today, whose purpose is to amend the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act.

[English]

I must say that at the present time we are at the eleventh hour of the final day of the GATT negotiations, literally speaking, and we are very worried. I think this bill is a good measure, although it certainly does not address the most fundamental issue for many farmers in Canada today.

Nevertheless, I know that people such as the Canadian Cattlemen's Association, the pork producers and so on, would like to have the check-off systems that would be permitted at the national level so they could put funds together to launch a national advertising campaign, for instance asking Canadians to eat more beef, pork or whatever product a producer group wants to get together and make such a pitch. The other thing that it would do, of course, is permit them to do research collectively. At the same time, that would free up funds elsewhere. Who knows, maybe farmers could collectively buy some of those funds that are freed up and help at some point in the future to launch, if ever necessary, measures against unfair practices of producers in other countries, if that was ever deemed to be the appropriate thing to do.

Just in case anyone is very concerned here, we are not reinventing the wheel in Canada. In fact, U.S. producers do most of those things already. As a matter of fact, I am told that they even use some money from check-offs to engage in countervailing activities and that kind of thing. Certainly the Americans are not shy about using this kind of measure.

I think the hour of adjournment has just about arrived. With that, I will end my remarks and continue at the next opportunity.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the amendment lost.

The next vote is on the main motion.

[English]

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the House might be disposed to apply the previous vote to the vote we are about to take, in reverse.

Mr. Hawkes: That is certainly all right with us, Mr. Speaker. I think the member for St. Catharines would like to make a brief intervention.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I would like my vote to be recorded with those of my party. I apologize for not having been here to vote on the amendment, but this is quite an important day for me since two of my assistants who have been with me for 16 years are retiring, and I wanted to mention that.

[English]

Mr. Sobeski: Thank you, for recognizing me, Mr. Speaker. The reason I abstained from voting on this particular motion is that I am honoured to be named the chairman of the legislative committee that will review Bill C-26.

Mr. Bellemare: Mr. Speaker, since I was with the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, we arrived a few seconds late. For this division I would like my vote to be recorded with the Liberal Party, my party, against the government.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

COUP D'ÉTAT IN HAITI

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table in the House today a petition from 1,055 people in my riding and surrounding areas who denounce the coup d'état in Haiti, the military actions led by General Raoul Cédras and the destruction and pillage of institutions working for the development of that country ravaged by poverty, lack of free expression and carnage that has already claimed thousands of victims.

For these reasons, the petitioners ask Parliament and the government to demand that democracy be restored and human rights respected, not to recognize the present regime and to make the embargo ordered by the Organization of American States effective. They want Canada to put as much energy into freeing Haiti from the oppression of the military officers illegally in power as we put into freeing Kuwait from occupation.

[English]

VIOLENT CRIME

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour, duty and privilege, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition, certified correct by the clerk of petitions. It contains the signatures of Canadians living in the communities of St. Catharines, Hamilton, Stoney Creek, Grimsby, Guelph, Burlington and Etobicoke.

These petitioners join the tens of thousands of petitioners, in fact we have received over 100,000 signatures, requesting that Parliament recognize that crimes of violence against the person are serious and abhorrent to society. They ask that we amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act of 1972 and the Parole Act accordingly.

• (1010)

BREAST IMPLANTS

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure and with some sadness that I table a petition signed by women from all across the country requesting that the Ministry of National Health and Welfare have an independent judicial inquiry into the testing and approval process for all medical devices. In particular, this petition is around the case of Meme breast implants and silicone breast implants.

The petitioners ask that the minister take the time to seek scientific evidence about the safety of these implants, as well as appoint an independent judicial inquiry to ensure that the manner in which medical devices are approved in this country is appropriate.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour this morning to table a petition signed by a group of people in the riding of Manicouagan, particularly individuals from Blanc-Sablon, Lourdes-de-Blanc-Sablon, Middle Bay, Bradore, Old Fort and Rivière-Saint-Paul. In this petition, the signers ask Parliament to eliminate the goods and services tax on women's sanitary products.

The petition has been certified correct as to form and content.

[English]

PENSIONS

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to present two petitions from people right across Prince Edward Island, including employees of the federal government, whether active now or retired, who are very concerned about the government's intention to de index pensions.

These people come from Traveller's Rest, Wellington, Summerside, Miscouche and all across the province of Prince Edward Island. They are very fearful that if the government brings in legislation to de index pensions, their lifetime work will be unprotected and they will be very open to the vagaries of the future.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, it is also my pleasure to present a petition to this House.

The petition is signed by a number of residents in my constituency, especially from around the Dunnville area, who are really upset with this government when it put a tax on water, namely the GST.

The petitioners call on this government to remove that tax and to make water zero rated status under the GST.

You will know, Mr. Speaker, this is just one of hundreds of petitions that I presented on this issue.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to have the opportunity to present to this House petitions that I have received from constituents of Broadview—Greenwood.

These petitions continue to call upon the government to develop a fairer, more simplified tax system, and they want the GST abolished.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, the petitioners continue to remind the government that the commitment it made in September 1988 to begin reclaiming the Great Lakes, specifically reclaiming the Don River, has not begun. They would like the government to please honour that commitment.

VIOLENT CRIME

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present a petition signed by numerous residents of Kingston and area. Some of the signatures are from Napanee and Harrowsmith in the riding of Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to recognize that crimes of violence against the person are serious and abhorrent to society and ask that the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act, 1972 and the Parole Act, be amended to reflect the seriousness of those kinds of offences.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING AGENCIES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Monday, February 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. McKnight that Bill C-54, an act to amend the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act and other acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, it is with some chagrin that I rise to discuss the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act at a time when the farmers in this country are mightily concerned that marketing boards are going to go the way of the dodo bird because of this country's failure to represent Canada's interest at the GATT.

The government has failed so far to persuade the other 107 members of GATT to strengthen and clarify the supply management provisions contained in article XI of the GATT. Our concern is that the government, through its attachment to the American way of doing business, is falling into line with the American philosophy at the GATT and leaving Canadian farmers high and dry.

Particularly after the massive demonstration last Friday of farmers from all over Canada—some estimate that over 40,000 farmers came to Ottawa—it is well known that farmers are very concerned about the outcome of this round of negotiations at GATT. Somebody asked me how can these farmers, who are so hard pressed, and we are talking about being concerned about farmers going under, afford to come to Ottawa to demonstrate on Parliament Hill.

The week before last, I met with the farmers in my riding in anticipation of the demonstration on the Hill. I met with dairy farmers in Pitt Meadows. They were so worried and so anxious about getting the message to this government that they were willing to pay what it took to come to Ottawa to get that message across.

They were willing because it is not just their livelihood, it is their homes, homes where some of them were born, grew up and are working toward passing on to their children. There are farms in my riding, maybe not as old as farming in eastern Canada, but there are third and fourth generation farmers who are willing to make the sacrifice to come to Ottawa to get the message across to the minister on how important they feel the presentation of Canada and the success of Canada at the GATT talks is.

We have to think about what is at stake. We are not just talking about farms. What is at stake if Canada's supply management boards are considered trade distorting measures by the GATT? One hundred thousand Canadian jobs are at stake, added to the hundreds of thousands of jobs that are already lost in Canada by buying in and linking ourselves closely to American economics. These 100,000 Canadian jobs include 38,000 farmers. That is not speaking of their families.

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I appreciate the remarks of the hon. member but we are on Bill C-54 which deals with check-off legislation. I have not heard it mentioned once yet.

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, I introduced my remarks by saying that it is a sad day when we are introducing such legislation and I even used the title of the bill. I pointed out that this is the reason why this piece of legislation just might be a tiny bit suspect. I am laying the groundwork for why I think this legislation might be a tiny bit suspect.

One of the hon. members says that I am making it a political debate. Amazing but this is politics. This is the House of Commons. Five parties are seated here. We do not really want to talk politics or talk about the reality of large or small p politics in this country. That is the very kind of response that alarms farmers about this kind of legislation.

This bill covers 38,000 farmers and their families, 22,900 employees of those farmers and 36,000 processing jobs. That comes to a total of lost farm production of $4.7 billion to this country and $5.5 billion in processing, for a total loss of over $100 billion to the Canadian economy.

I think that is very relevant to this bill because we are talking here about farm products marketing agencies while we have our negotiators going to GATT. We are not sure that they will be taking our best interests or the best interests of farmers to GATT. It seems rather intriguing that this bill is before the House just prior to that discussion at GATT.

The loss of our supply management system through the GATT will do to rural Canada what the free trade agreement has done to urban Canada. That is devastating. Not only the farmers in my riding are going to be devastated by a failure of protection of supply management in Canada. The people in my riding, the spinoff industries such as Buckerfield's, the suppliers, the wholesaler and the people who deliver milk, are all going to be affected by the failure of this government to uphold Canada's position at the GATT.

The minister has said that our position has remained unchanged and that they will continue to argue for protection of supply management. He has also continued to note that Canada is but one of 107 countries at GATT. If we go in figuring we are going to lose, chances are we will lose. If we go in believing in our system, believing in supply management, believing in marketing agencies, then I think it is fair and safe to say that we will in fact do a good job on behalf of our farmers.

I would urge that people take farmers very seriously and consider what would happen if we lose our ability in this country to produce our food, to feed our citizens. There are those who say: "Well, get rid of these marketing boards. Get rid of that whole process because the Americans will feed us cheaper". They might feed us cheaper for the first couple of years, till they make sure all of our farms have gone under, and then we had better believe that the ante will go up. If we lose our ability to feed our citizens then I think we very much risk losing our sovereignty.

This issue is not related to a very narrow definition of Bill C-54. This issue goes far beyond this bill. That is why I am very concerned we are debating this kind of thing at this time and yet leaving farmers from all across Canada feeling at total risk that we are not taking them seriously and that we will not be serving their interests at the GATT.

I would ask that the government direct its attention to how we can best protect our farmers. Whilst the hon. parliamentary secretary feels that I have not addressed this bill, I think the whole question is inextricably intertwined. I would ask the parliamentary secretary and the government to renew their efforts to ensure that a bill like this makes sense by ensuring that we continue to have marketing boards and supply management in this country.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the speech of the hon. member from British Columbia. It reminded me of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture meeting yesterday in Vancouver. The umbrella organization for the entire country was holding its meeting. Outside that meeting at just about exactly this time 24 hours ago Vancouver time some 450 dairy, poultry and egg producers rallied to protest the lack of progress by this government.

Clearly that is tied into the legislation before the House today. This is the umbrella legislation, the National Farm Products Marketing Act, which provides for the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency, the National Broiler Meat Agency, and other agencies. These producers were protesting the fact that the government has been negotiating for five and one-half years and has really accomplished very little in those GATT negotiations for an industry that involves some $10 million of economic activity for this country. It involves almost 100,000 jobs and 38,000 farmers. Yet in spite of the economic impact, let alone the fact that much of that impact is resolved into rural communities across the country, the government has made so little progress in those negotiations that Arthur Dunkel in his report of December 20 never even mentioned as a negotiating option the idea of a strengthened and clarified article XI.

Those producers are angry and frustrated that the government has failed to make any progress in those negotiations. In fact there are only five countries around the world, some of them very important in trade terms, some less important, that are supporting Canada's position. They are calling on the Prime Minister, and I had the opportunity to speak to that rally yesterday in Vancouver, to rally the support of those five countries that support our position—the Prime Minister of Japan, the Prime Minister of Israel, South Korea and the other countries—to get a joint declaration and put to the President of the United States and to the European community countries that our bottom line is to maintain, strengthen and clarify article XI.

I believe that is what those protesters in Vancouver were saying yesterday. They want to see results, not just sweet words from the government, on this very important issue facing the entire rural Canada but especially the dairy, egg and poultry producers of this country.

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his comments. The rally in Vancouver was the first of a number of activities that will be happening on the west coast. I will be attending on Thursday morning a massive rally in the Fraser Valley, on the south side of the Fraser. For those hon. members who happen to represent that area, I would suggest they might want to attend as well. I would also suggest that the Prime Minister, or certainly at the very least the Minister of Agriculture, may wish to attend. I would challenge the Minister of Agriculture to attend that rally.

We are talking about a very serious business. I think it is absolutely critical that this government get its act together, get busy and protect Canadian farmers' interests at the GATT. It is not good enough to say: "Well, we are one of 107". It is not good enough to be satisfied that only five countries are supporting us. This government claims to know how to manage the economy. This government claims to know how to organize. I would suggest it is time for it to organize and manage the economy when it comes to the farmers of this country.

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil—Papineau): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the rhetoric of the members of the opposition parties since the discussion commenced regarding the very important GATT negotiations. The first question I have in my mind is the following: Does the opposition think that Canada is alone in the process? We are saying, and we believe in this, that marketing agencies and the protection we want for farmers are as important for us as they are for them.

I want to ask the member for Mission—Coquitlam: instead of speaking, talking and saying it is so important and it is so damaging, what has she done? What has the New Democratic Party done in the international community with the Government of Canada to try to resolve this, to convince other parties? She must have contacts in her party in Europe. I am sure she does. Did she call them? Did she explain to those parties in Europe like the Green Party how important it is? I am asking her to tell me what they have done to help us and to help the farmers instead of just talking about it.

• (1030)

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, the member from the government side thinks that talking about protecting farmers is rhetoric. I really appreciate that kind of attitude.

What have we done? First of all the job is that of the government. When one is elected to govern—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Langan: Let me finish. When one is elected to govern one has a duty and a responsibility to lead, which this government has not done.

In terms of what we have done, we have certainly worked with our farmers. My colleague, the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap, if the hon. member were interested in listening, did in fact represent the case for Canadian farmers in Belgium on an inter-parliamentary tour. He spoke very strongly and very supportively toward expanding the parameters of article XI and met with a number of people there to try to influence that.

We as a party have talked to our colleagues in Socialist International as well. The government can stand here, be high and mighty, and ask opposition members: "What have you done?" But my question is: "What have they done for farmers in Canada?"

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, coming back to the legislation that we are dealing with today, Bill C-54, does the hon. member support legislation that would allow organized marketing agencies to collect a levy against imported products coming into this country?

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, I am really delighted that questions and comments have gone on so long. I have noted that when I want to get up and answer questions and comments, it is over like that.

I think our party has made its position absolutely clear on that.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have enjoyed the latest exchange. To hear the New Democratic Party say it has no responsibility to do anything because it is not elected to government indicates its total lack of expectation that it will ever be elected to government.

We in this party take our responsibility seriously and have tried to assist in the situation of the Canadian farmer. We regard the situation in which they find themselves as very serious and one about which members of Parliament have an obligation to try to do something. We have striven to do that in the limited ways available to us as members of the opposition.

We have been warning about the problems with this arrangement for some time, but our pleas seem to have fallen on deaf ears. We have taken the view that the government has not been assiduous in promoting the interests of Canadian farmers in these talks. Frankly I think what happened is that the government finally woke up to the fact that it got itself into serious trouble and is now trying to salvage the situation by making it look as though every action is being taken to save our farmers. I hope it is successful. I think every member of this House shares that optimism.

In talking about Bill C-54 today, I want to indicate what I think my colleague from Lambton—Middlesex indicated in his speech the other day. We have been saying all along that while there is nothing in this bill that we find objectionable per se, we are concerned as to what is the real purpose of this legislation.

We are concerned that what the government is trying to do by this bill is to change the rules in relation to Canadian agriculture so that if the GATT talks are successful in leading to a collapse of Canadian agriculture as we now know it, there will be this mechanism in place to do what little good it can do in the circumstances. In other words, this bill will pick up the pieces and try to make it appear that these marketing boards still exist when they are unable to do anything about price.

That is the thrust of our concern about the bill. I submit, on the evidence, the facts and the statements by the ministers who have been involved so far in the discussion, that there is every reason for Canadians and Canadian farmers to be concerned about what is going on.

I understand the situation to be that the current proposals at GATT appear to be the final position. Of course they have not been completely finalized at this moment. They would lead to a tariffication of the barriers that basically prohibit the entry of American dairy and poultry products into Canada. That prohibition is what allows our marketing boards to operate within Canada to ensure a reasonable price to the consumer and a fair return to the Canadian agriculture industry. The system has been remarkably successful from all the accounts I have read and from all of the farm groups I have met with, as small as they are in my riding, but significant.

I have every reason to believe that the system has worked extremely well for Canada and for Canadians. It has guaranteed us a fully adequate supply at a reasonable price. We have in Canada top quality products manufactured by very efficient producers who are becoming increasingly efficient and a safe and dependable supply at all times.

The Canadian supply of these products is the envy of the world. There are few other countries that are able to match the Canadian experience in terms of the factors I mentioned: availability, dependability and quality of supply. All of those have been provided by our farmers under the existing marketing boards.

I understand that the current GATT proposal to allow for these organizations is a change whereby the protection they have against foreign imports would be tariffied. Significant tariffs would be increased which under the GATT agreement would be reduced by a fixed percentage over a five or six year period.

Then the problem arises, as I understand it, with the free trade agreement. The government has not stressed this, of course, in its discussions. It has not really told Canadians what will happen if the current GATT negotiation proceeds to completion in accordance with the existing proposal. I can understand its reluctance because, of course, what it has do is shoot a few holes in the much vaunted free trade agreement. It has to somehow convince Canadians and Canadian farmers that it is not just the GATT negotiations that will have put the boot to the marketing boards in Canada. It is also a fact of the free trade agreement.

As I understand the way it works, the tariffs will have to be eliminated over a period of time under that agreement. They are not just reduced, they are eliminated. I have read this in some of the newspaper accounts describing the GATT round. If that is incorrect, I would like to hear about it from the government. I would like to hear some statements on this because we have had no explanation as to how this will work.

The indication I have from the material I have read on this is that some special deal will have to be worked out with the United States government as part of the free trade deal to avoid the phase out of those tariffs completely. Of course, it is that phase out that would destroy completely the marketing boards as we now know them.

The tariffication would be difficult. The reduction in tariffs would be more difficult. The elimination of the tariffs with the United States would be a disaster for our farm community and they are understandably upset and concerned.

That takes me back to the free trade deal. As Your Honour will recall, we in this House in 1988 stood and opposed the government's free trade agreement. We said it was a bad deal for Canada. Indeed, the deal that was negotiated was, in our view, and I have certainly expressed this view in the election and I still say today, a sell–out of Canadian interests. It was a disaster for this country. It was badly negotiated.

If Canadian farmers are apprehensive about the possible ramifications of the GATT deal which this government has been negotiating, think how they will feel if they realize that there is an important negotiation now to take place with the United States to protect the Canadian marketing boards from this detariffication process that should follow under the free trade deal.

The Canadian farmers in particular know the bargaining record of this government. It has been rotten, just a disgrace. This government goes into negotiations with no aims or objectives. It goes in with the sole aim of making a deal, a deal at any price. We know what happened in the free trade negotiations. We remember how Simon Reisman, the government's great negotiator, went off to Washington and came back to Ottawa a few days before the deadline and said: "There is no deal". We can only speculate as to why he said that. But I would be willing to wager that the reason was that he was given a set of parameters. The government said: "You cannot give away this, this or this". He came back to Ottawa and said: "Unless I give away some of these things, there is no deal. My mandate is exhausted. I have bargained everything I could bargain. You told me I couldn't give up on this, this and this, so I can't make a deal. The talks are off".

• (1040)

We know what happened. Then we had this minister, the wonderful Minister of Finance at the time, and one of his colleagues—I think she was Minister of Employment and Immigration who is now Secretary of State for External Affairs—go to Washington and make a deal.

We can only speculate that they gave away some of the things on Simon's list that he was not supposed to give away in order to buy the Americans off and make a deal. I will bet they gave away everything on the list because the Americans must have realized that this government was desperate for a deal.

It had invested all kinds of political value into a free trade deal and it could not really back out at this stage. Off they went and made a deal.

You would think, Mr. Speaker, that the chief negotiator, having been given a list of no-nos would then quit. Having the floor cut out from underneath him, having said: "No, I can't give you this," and then to have ministers come into the talks at the last minute and say: "Yes, you're getting all this," a chief negotiator worth his salt, with any sense of respectability would have quit, but he did not. He stayed on. Then he went on the campaign trail for the government to sell the free trade deal.

I recall in the months leading up to the election how Simon came to Kingston. He had a large public meeting at the Ambassador Hotel. He made a speech at this meeting. In the course of the speech he praised the then member of Parliament for Kingston and the Islands, who was a minister in the Conservative government, who had been giving him the instructions in these talks. He said what a great job she had done. He made speeches about how the critics of this deal were wrong. He listed all their criticisms and refuted the criticisms by reading chapter and verse from his deal. He said that these critics were all wrong.

What were some of the criticisms that the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra used to put out? I remember he said that there was insufficient protection for Canada under this deal. Here we have a perfect example of it. Here we are in GATT talks where there may be a deal that is thoroughly undermined by the free trade agreement.

In other words, whatever deal is made at GATT will be damaging for Canadian farmers, but not half so damaging as the effects of the free trade agreement on that deal, unless a special exemption is arranged with the United States. In other words, we have to go back to the table asking for more because of Simon and this government's failure to defend Canada's interest in the original talks.

Yet, and this is the most shocking thing, this man who was presumably a public servant at the time—he was certainly working for the government as some kind of ambassador for the free trade deal, I think he had that status—went about the country in the course of an election campaign making statements about the Leader of the Opposition.

I have here some quotations of things that he said. In The Toronto Star, November 16, 1988, five days before the election, it states: "Former free trade negotiator Simon Reisman has accused Liberal Leader John Turner of being a traitor to his country for attacking the proposed deal". Imagine, he said, and this is a direct quote from him in the same article: "These are lies that debase longstanding public traditions in this country, lies that are designed to frighten and confuse Canadian voters".

One of the longstanding traditions in this country is that public servants do not meddle in political matters. Mr. Reisman had no trouble dispensing with that particular principle when he got talking about his free trade deal. He said, and I quote from The Globe and Mail on November 17, four days before the election:

> "I think the man who is selling out Canada is John Turner", Mr. Reisman said on a Toronto CBC news show, "because he's reckless, he's betraying the country and he's playing with the future of our children and our grandchilden. And I challenge him, I accuse him of being a traitor to Canada for saying the things he is saying".

I could go on quoting all these sorts of things from Mr. Reisman, but I think I do not need to because we now have Mr. Reisman singing a different tune. He has finally wakened up to the fact that he sold Canada down the drain. In The Ottawa Citizen on January 18 of this year, we have Mr. Reisman calling the Americans "thugs". The free trade negotiator who spent months in bed with the Americans in Washington selling our country out now refers to his former friends as thugs. When I say he was in Washington with these people, he had the full connivance and support of the Tory cabinet because they were down there doing the same thing.

He says, and I am quoting from the article now: "Punitive trade actions against Canada are dangerously close to outright violations of the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement say the two top Canadian negotiators of the deal".

I do not like to use this kind of language but he said: "The Americans are bastards; they are behaving like real thugs these days and protecting their interests". This is a quote from Mr. Reisman. His language seems to be intemperate.

The right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra in 1988 was a traitor because he criticized the deal. Now Mr. Reisman says that the Americans are thugs and calls them other unpleasant names because they are taking full advantage, full advantage I may say, of all the rights they acquired under the deal, rights that Mr. Reisman and the Tory cabinet sold out, Canadians rights they sold away. They were warned that the free trade deal was a bad deal, that there was a lack of protection for Canada in it, by the Leader of the Opposition at the time and by members of this caucus who spoke against this deal across this country. Now they are finally realizing that maybe the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra was right. Maybe he was not the liar. Maybe it was somebody else. Maybe he was not the traitor. Maybe it was somebody else. What is shocking is that there has been no public apology for those shocking statements. Mr. Reisman was not the only one who called the Leader of the Opposition a liar.

Then there was the Minister of Finance who referred to him as a liar. The hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood remembers that well because he is a Toronto area member, as is the then Minister of Finance. He made statements accusing the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra of being a liar. We know that there was a concerted effort by the Conservative Party to discredit the then Leader of the Opposition in the course of the free trade debate. It was felt that if he could be discredited then his arguments on free trade would carry less weight and the Conservative government could get re-elected.

They set out on a deliberate smear campaign to destroy the credibility of the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, led by the then Minister of Finance in one of the most shocking episodes in recent Canadian political history and supported fully by a public servant.

Mr. Mills: Don't forget the full-page ads.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. members says: "Don't forget the full-page ads". I quite agree.

Mr. Foster: Three or four million dollars.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member from Algoma says: " It is $3 million or $4 million". It was much more than that. The studies indicate that it was at least $15 million if not $20 million. It was a fabulous sum of money, all raised by Conservative government supporters who paid good money to run advertisements in the newspapers of Canada to hoodwink Canadians into thinking that the free trade deal that our friend Simon negotiated was a good deal for Canada.

Everyone knows that it was a very bad deal for Canada. It is the reason why Canadian farmers are concerned to the point of distraction today. They know that if the government does not sell them out in GATT, it will sell them out under the free trade deal that it has negotiated. They are very apprehensive that the people who will do the negotiating to save the Canadian government's position under the free trade deal when such negotiations are under way are the people sitting on the other side of this House who have a proven record of incompetence, inability to negotiate anything worth while and who are a disgrace to this country and should get out so that we can have Canadians elect a new government and get on with the business of this country in a proper and efficient way.

We cannot have this government back to the negotiating table. It does not know what it is doing at the negotiating table. It will give anything away to make a deal and to please its friends, the Americans. We have to remember that the Americans are our best friends and they are our closest neighbours. But our leader says: "Business is business".

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I may remind the hon. member that we are still discussing Bill C-54. The Chair is trying to be as flexible as possible, but perhaps the hon. member would bear in mind that we are still on Bill C-54.

• (1050)

Mr. Milliken: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I realize that. As I said at the beginning of my speech, my comments on free trade are relevant because the proposed legislation alters the obligations of marketing boards.

[English]

I tied it directly into that because these marketing boards are under attack because of free trade. I have gone off the track slightly to talk about free trade because it is very important to the future success of these marketing boards.

I have tried to point out in the clearest possible terms that the marketing boards will fail unless an amendment is made under the free trade deal to protect them. The current GATT talks are going to result in a tariffication of the protection that is built in for these marketing boards. They will be diminished and eliminated under the free trade deal unless arrangements are made.

That is why it ties in. These boards will become empty shells unless some other arrangement is made. The government should be under the gun and apprehensive but we do not see any sign of that. The Minister of Finance went out to speak to the crowd last week. His assurances that he was fighting his best for their interests were great. Unfortunately it appears that his fight was taken up rather late in the game.

We on this side of the House have condemned the government for its actions. We wished it had acted with greater alacrity from the outset to protect Canadian farm interests. We regret that its inability to negotiate has resulted in a bad deal at GATT. It has resulted in a bad deal under the free trade agreement and I am sure I could list other negotiations that have been very badly handled. The Public Service strike that resulted from their botched negotiations last year comes to mind.

I am sorry that Canada is saddled with a government as weak and ineffective as this one. I wish that today, before the budget comes down, the Prime Minister would go to Rideau Hall and advise the Governor General it is time the country got a chance to pass its judgment on these people in an election.

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Speaker, I would tell the hon. member not to count on it.

In respect to Bill C-54, the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act, it was very heart warming to hear the member mention that he supported the bill in principle. I would be very disappointed if I was a producer in this country listening to the comments being made. Many producers of products across this country believe this legislation will help them in the promotion of their product and for the use of Canadian products. Very little is being said in respect to what this legislation is.

The government has been asked for this legislation since 1984 and perhaps before that. We are the first government that has offered to bring something forward for the marketing agencies, not just the supply management agencies. They have their certain ways of collecting funds, but we have many other agencies that do an exceptional job in the promotion of farm products across this country. They have not been able to charge check-offs on imported goods coming into this country. They believe, as we do, it is very essential that we make these amendments to this act.

If the member wishes to have a debate on GATT, let us use an allotted day and have a full-fledged discussion where all people can participate. Let us stick to the legislation we are dealing with right now.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, it would take half an hour or more to refute the litany of misconceptions advanced by the member for Kingston and the Islands on the subject of the farm products marketing agencies. Let me deal with one of two. It appears to me this is a city lawyer's view of agriculture in Canada.

He spoke about Simon Reisman. These remarks were explained fully in an interview with Peter Gzowski on Canada's national broadcasting system, CBC radio. He indicated very clearly that he was talking about U.S. traders in relation to Canadian traders. He was not talking about government officials. He was not talking about the U.S. officials and the Canadian officials that negotiated the free trade agreement. It was the lack of goodwill on behalf of the traders. We can expect that sort of thing in trading wars as the member should know.

Let me deal with another point he made about marketing boards and the free trade agreement. During the free trade agreement debate the agriculture community raised the concern that they were threatened in relation to marketing boards by the provisions of the free trade agreement. We said there was no threat and they would be protected.

Three years have elapsed since the signing of the free trade agreement and marketing boards are flourishing in Canada. Indeed we saw 30,000 beneficiaries of that very system on Parliament Hill. What are they afraid of? They are not afraid of the free trade agreement but the GATT negotiations. It was the Liberals who stood in this House of Commons and said to scrap free trade and rely on GATT; GATT will bring us everything we need in the international field. Now they are coming back and saying GATT cannot be trusted and we have to get rid of GATT. They want to get rid of free trade, get rid of GATT, get rid of everything and isolate Canada. It will not matter about marketing boards because there will be nobody to buy anything.

I just want the member for Kingston and the Islands to answer one simple question. I know there are Liberal business people across this country who want to hear his answer, Liberal Party supporters who trade internationally. If article XI is not changed in the manner he directed and if the wishes he presented to this House today are not granted in the GATT negotiations, does the member recommend to the Government of Canada that it withdraw from GATT?

The Liberal Party members who support the member want to hear his answer. Does he recommend withdrawal from GATT?

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to answer the hon. member. I will not recommend that Canada withdraw from GATT unless additional information comes to light that we do not have now.

Knowing this government's secret deals, it will not release the documents that it should be giving to this House, as has happened in the United States. We are not privy to those documents. We do not know what the deal is. Until we see it my answer can only be taken for what it is worth.

I want to say something else to the hon. member. He has become an apologist for Simon Reisman. Like Mr. Reisman, he gets misquoted once in a while so now he is trying to justify Simon's bad language and intemperate remarks. Well we did not hear him trying to do that during the election campaign in 1988 when Mr. Reisman was calling the member for Vancouver Quadra a traitor and a liar. That is when he should have been on his feet saying that Mr. Reisman, as a public servant, had no business making any such statement whether he thought it or not. Mr. Reisman had an obligation to stay silent on those issues and exercise the proper discipline that applies to public servants.

I would have loved to have come into government in 1988 because if I had been Mr. Reisman's minister he would have got the boot so fast he would not have know what happened to him. Public servants have no business making statements like that, especially in the course of an election campaign. Mr. Reisman went way beyond the bounds of propriety in his comments about the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra.

The second point the hon. member raised is that somehow the free trade deal has had no effect on Canadian farmers. He clearly has an ever so selective memory because, although I do not understand or pretend to understand the full ramifications of it, I am fully aware there was an ice-cream and yoghurt decision made which was seriously jeopardized from Canada's point of view, by reason of the free trade deal. Canadian farmers have suffered terrible losses because of that decision as I understand it. My colleague from Algoma can explain the situation better, but as I understand it Canadian farmers would have done much better had that decision not been made. Yet the free trade deal had a very direct bearing on the outcome of the case dealing with ice-cream and yoghurt.

The hon. member obviously is the one who is speaking from a city lawyer perspective. I would suggest he get his facts straight, cast his mind back even a year or two and remember that Canada got shafted because of the free trade deal. Canadian farmers are paying because of this free trade deal. On the evidence that is before us, uncontradicted by the parliamentary secretary or anybody else, Canadian farmers could pay a good deal more because of the free trade deal.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to stand in this House today to debate Bill C-54 which is an act to amend the Farm Product Marketing Agencies Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

I think it is an important debate because it deals specifically with issues that this country is now dealing with in the international arena.

I know that many Canadians believe they do not really understand what this debate is all about. They really do not understand what supply management means. They do not really understand these GATT negotiations or what GATT means and how these negotiations could affect their everyday lives. I would like to change this indifference and misunderstanding about supply management which seems to abound not only in the seats across the way but in editorial boards across this nation. I believe strongly in the message coming from a number of Canadians, especially in the farming sectors of rural Canada. That is, without a viable Canadian farming sector there can be no food security for Canadians. We all know what the consequences of no food security for Canadians means.

• (1100)

Because of the public indifference and the real ignorance out there on this issue, I would like to urge every member on the other side of the House, Canadians from urban areas, heads of editorial boards and newspapers to listen to what members of Parliament, especially on this side of the House, are saying about this issue. It is a very important issue for Canada.

Many of them may not fully understand the issue at hand and may not really understand why we are supporting this thing called supply management. Hopefully the government will actually be able to convince people in the international community and all Canadians of the reasons why Canada needs article XI of the GATT. That is why our debate today is so important. I am concerned about the misinformation out there, and what it is doing to Canadian producers. I am concerned when I read in the newspaper that our Canadian supply managed producers are inefficient. This came from an article by Mr. Leblanc in The Financial Post yesterday, where he ended by saying "Canadian farmers of supply managed commodities are inefficient". Editorial writers like him and editorial writers across the country do not really understand the importance of a national food security system for Canada.

I know we have not had a very long history as a country. We have not had the wars Europe has had which tore countries apart and forced people into near starvation. But I think if these people understood how important food is to the sovereignty of a country, they might think differently about what they are saying about supply management.

I am concerned also that these theoretical economic arguments really make no practical sense when it comes down to the day-to-day lives of Canadians. They make no practical sense when this government talks in terms of esoteric economics, saying that we have to join world economic blocs. Well that means very little to the farmers in my area. It means very little to the workers across Canada who want jobs, and the farmers across Canada who want livelihoods they can turn over to their children.

Supply management is really not too hard to understand. It ensures that the supply of any given product does not exceed the demand for it. Agricultural sectors that are supply-managed do not contribute to world surpluses. As a result they do not contribute to artificially low prices that we are seeing around the world today. Ultimately supply management does not distort international trade, and that is why GATT is there. GATT is there to stop distortion of international trade.

That is why Canadians have to work really hard, whether they are in cities or rural areas, whether they are on newspaper editorial boards, whether they are farmers. We have to come together to explain to the world why a system like supply management is so important.

As a result of not distorting trade, Canadian supply management is not a burden on the Canadian taxpayer. In fact I would argue that without supply management, Canadian taxpayers would be paying much more for their food and many more taxes, to help boost the livelihoods of Canadians in rural areas. Instead, prices and quotas of supply managed products are based on the cost of production. In other words, poultry and dairy farmers receive a fair price for what they produce.

Consumer groups have spent a lot of time and a lot of energy. In fact, they have received a lot of the money for this time and energy from the government across the way, from the Minister of Agriculture, to do studies on supply management. As a result of these studies they claim to tell Canadians that they would be better off without supply management.

Unfortunately I have found in most cases, when reading their studies, when reading what they say, that they have a lack of knowledge and a lack of understanding of what the issue is all about. They really ignore some of the most important realities.

Sure, in the short term if we move away from supply management, it would probably look good for consumers. We would have open markets, cheap food and that is the argument.

Mr. Parker: About six months.

Mr. Speller: Yes, for about six months, if that.

The notion of this cheap food is a fraud. It is a fraud brought upon most Canadians by a group paid for by this government.

People, in their short-sightedness, have forgotten the simple economic theories of supply and demand. In times of surpluses we would be a dumping ground for surpluses of foodstuffs. But in times of food shortages, which is always a real threat in this world, we would always be the second best market.

In either scenario our producers could not survive and it is not because they are inefficient. The fact is true competition can only take place when producers compete on a level playing field.

The highly subsidized farmers in the United States and Europe are hardly fair competitors. They are highly subsidized. This so-called world price that members across the floor on the other side like to talk about so often is not a real price. It is a magical price brought out of the air because of our friends to the south, who really are the only ones we need to convince on this issue.

We sent a group of farmers and a group of politicians over to Europe last week to talk to the Europeans when we all know that there really is only one person in this world who we have to convince. That is the Prime Minister's friend, Mr. Bush.

Those of us who have studied GATT, those of us who have studied international trade for a number of years, now know how it is controlled. We know the only country in the world that really wants these markets of ours is the United States.

Europe is not going to ship over a whole bunch of milk to Canada to go into our markets. Sure, they want a bit of our cheese market maybe, but that is it.

It is the American president to the south, congressmen and senators who are telling their farmers: "Now hold off. Just wait. Don't worry. I know things are rough now, but you have a market to the north coming real soon because we have been given a guarantee that you will get that".

For all Canadians, the issue is an issue of national security. If a country cannot supply its own foodstuff, it will not be an independent country for very long.

The draft GATT agreement calls for all internal and external subsidy, border restrictions and trade barriers to be converted into tariffs which are to be reduced over a period of time. This would have major implications for supply management and we could no longer control the quantity or the quality of the food that we produce in this country and that we allow into this country.

With tariffication and once tariffs are reduced, American multinationals can invade our markets with cheap food because they can set prices below the cost of production. They can do this because the American government subsidizes their farmers at rates much higher than those in Canada.

• (1110)

We do not hear this very often from across the floor, but the cost of production is 25 per cent cheaper than in Canada. How can we compete as Canadians? How can our farmers compete on a so-called level playing field that the government talks about when our cost of production is 25 per cent more? For this reason they can also survive longer in low markets.

In an attempt to force competitors, namely Canadian farmers, out of the market, of course for the ill-informed consumer out there, this means initially cheaper food. But what happens in the long run once all our farmers have been displaced by three or four major American corporations? We will simply be at the mercy of other countries and totally dependent on them for our foodstuff.

So much for nationalism and so much for sovereignty. Then we will pay for our short-sighted policies of the 1990s. Canadians pay a fair price for their food. In fact, we pay the second lowest price in the world for it.

On the other hand, as has been so eloquently outlined by my friend, the member for Lambton—Middlesex, many Canadians out there know his name; they have seen the work he has done in "Compare the Share". He points out that Canadian farmers have not been getting their fair share of the Canadian food dollar.

If this goes through there will not be any Canadian farmers out there to get any share of the food dollar.

In many instances for example in 1980, the price spread between the farm gate price of milk in a kilogram of cheddar cheese and the retail price for that same cheddar cheese was $3.13.

By 1988 the price spread had more than doubled to $6.94. This kind of discrepancy between farm gate and retail prices is also true for beef, poultry, pork, corn and wheat, many of our farm products.

As politicians it is our responsibility to get the message out to the rest of Canada as to the importance of Canadian food security.

For rural Canada, our problems are twofold because when our farms go, so do our infrastructures. The whole rural infrastructure disappears. We are feeling the pressure of that today throughout southwestern Ontario where I come from, especially in my riding of Haldimand—Norfolk.

This argument just is not about cheap food and it is not just about farmers being displaced. It is about the ability of the nation to produce its own food and to secure its food for the present and for the future.

We must not sacrifice our ability to produce food in Canada. We must not sacrifice that. To have to rely on another country for the supply of our domestic market is a real threatening thought. We can see, today, why the Europeans for instance are bargaining so hard. They have had to do that in the past.

At least in our current system of supply management we can guarantee consumers access to high quality food at very reasonable prices. Ultimately we must also recognize that sovereignty is linked to the ability of a country to feed its people.

We have been given assurances by the government that it stands by its promise to strengthen article XI at GATT. Yet we know the importance it places on reaching an agreement at the GATT.

We have heard from farm groups that tell us that if we move to a system of tariffication, our agricultural industry will disappear because farmers will be thrown out of work and rural infrastructures will close down.

We have not heard the most convincing argument. As a result, we are missing this real important point. Surely if all Canadians understood what was at stake here, the future of our food supply and indeed the future of our country, they would be less indifferent to the dilemma now being faced by our Canadian farmers.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to my hon. friend's remarks and I must say that I totally concur with the support he provides for our supply management system in Canada.

Of course all members of this House are gravely concerned about the potential impact of the GATT negotiations on our dairy, poultry, egg and turkey marketing systems in Canada. We hope that our government and our farm leaders who are involved in the negotiations are successful in getting the Europeans, and particularly the Americans, to recognize that the security of food supply in Canada is a very legitimate concern on the part of Canadian farmers as well as all Canadians.

Nevertheless we may be faced with the prospect that a deal may be reached in GATT that does not provide for the maintenance of supply management, for the maintenance and clarification of article XI, as is the position of this government, as is the wish of literally thousands of farmers across Canada.

I would ask my hon. friend if he would tell us what the position of his party is and what his position is, should an agreement be reached at the GATT that does not provide for the maintenance and clarification of article XI. Is it his recommendation, is it the position of the Liberal party, that the agreement should not be signed by this government?

Mr. Speller: Mr. Speaker, I was going to thank the hon. member for taking a non-political view on this but I guess I will not.

I will tell him what I would do. I really wish we on this side were in government because we would not have put ourselves in the position this government is in.

If I was a negotiator and I wanted to put forward the best argument I had to support my country, I sure as heck would not go before Canadians and say: "Look, we are going to sign this agreement anyway. But we are fighting as hard as we can on your behalf, but I want you to know, Mr. Bush down there, we are still going to sign this".

I want to ask the hon. member, why is it that George Bush has not said he is going to sign it? Has the head of the European Community said he is not going to sign it? Why is it that our Prime Minister is the only person in the world to come forward and say: "We are going to sign it anyway". What kind of negotiating position is that?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I will remind all members that the discussion is on Bill C-54.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleague, the hon. member for Haldimand—Norfolk who has once again demonstrated a very strong working knowledge of the issues which most affect his constituents. His constituents can be proud of the fact that they have a representative who is such a strong voice for them here in the highest court of the land.

While it is true that supply management is a most complex issue which most affects the producers of Canadian agricultural products, I would like to ask the hon. member this. This issue does not get the attention of people who were born and raised and spend most of their lives in the city. I wonder if the hon. member could explain to those who live in urban Canada that the issues of rural Canada affect them as well.

Mr. Speller: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for those comments. He has hit the issue here. He really has hit the point that all of us on this side of the House, especially those from rural Canada, want to get across. We need to speak to those in the urban centres who are now listening to some newscasts on TV that are telling them that with supply management the prices are much higher, that farmers are being subsidized. As the minister of fisheries said, they are being subsidized to the tune of $16 billion annually, that governments are paying a lot to their farmers and therefore they are inefficient.

It is not really a hard argument to get across because it is a question of national food security. I ask them in urban centres: Which would they rather have? Would they rather have a country that depends for its food on another country? Canada, because of the closeness of the U.S., would more than likely be dependent on the Americans if we open our borders. The Americans have many advantages over Canadian farmers, not only the cost of production, which I mentioned earlier is 25 per cent cheaper there, mostly because of these government tax increases that we have been seeing over the last few years, but also they have the larger market. They have these large—as our fisheries people say—almost factory ships. They have these huge, huge farms with hundreds of thousands of birds.

Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, the quality of the meat that comes from these farms I would not even look at, let alone eat. We are talking not only cost, we are talking quality of food. The Canadian quality of food in a supply managed country and the efficiency of those farmers can be found nowhere else in the world.

Which would they rather have? Would they rather have a low quality food which in the beginning may be a little cheaper or would they rather have a country that has a farm sector which can feed itself? It is not too hard an argument to put forward.

I say to Canadians in urban centres that the importance of this question is one of self-sufficiency and national security for Canada. I thank my hon. friend for pointing that out to the House.

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Mr. Speaker, I would just ask the member a question, based on his remarks of a few moments ago where he made derogatory statements about the Prime Minister with reference to whether or not Canada might sign the GATT. I would like to remind him that just a few days ago when the NDP was arguing that we should say we will not sign, his colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, who presumably speaks on behalf of his party on external affairs and trade matters, or at least has in the past, suggested that Canada would be crazy not to sign the GATT.

I am wondering how he reconciles his comments about the Prime Minister with the spokesman from his own party who has stated flatly we would be crazy not to sign the GATT at the end of the day.

Mr. Speller: I have to say to the hon. member that I too was disappointed in the NDP motion. I saw the press release that they put out, and I say this sincerely, that said they were really going to take a hard line on this and stand up for Canadian supply managed farmers. When the motion came forward to the House it never really said anything about whether or not we would sign a deal or not a sign a deal. It had really become watered down. That disappointed me.

In terms of whether or not—

An hon. member: Why didn't you amend it?

Mr. Speller: Well, Mr. Speaker, we did amend it.

We as a party would never have put ourselves in this position. We as a party would never have signed the free trade deal. Do not forget our leader went down to Washington. He talked to President Bush and let him know exactly where we stand on this issue. We stand fully behind our Canadian farmers. We stand fully behind those Canadians who believe in a national food security policy for Canada. As much as we have tried to convince our friends in the other two parties to take the same stand, they refuse to.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before resuming debate, I point out that after the first five hours of debate speeches are limited to a 10-minute maximum, without questions and comments.

[English]

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to have the opportunity to make a few comments in regard to the bill that is before us.

Bill C-54, as the title suggests, is really a bill to establish a national farm products council and to authorize the establishment of agencies for farm products.

There are some good sections of this bill. There are also some recommendations in the bill that are going to cause some real difficulties.

The overriding concern I have is that this particular legislation is, at least at this point in time, almost irrelevant in terms of the larger debate that has been before the House and has been discussed at the ongoing negotiations in the General Agreements on Tariffs and Trade. There is not much future in passing this bill if the decision from GATT comes down against the very future of marketing boards and marketing agencies in Canada.

That is why I say that the bill is essentially irrelevant in the context of the larger debate in which we are still immersed.

What really is at stake, when we look at the difficulties that Canadian farmers face, is the very future of marketing board structures in Canada and, I submit, the very future of the Canadian way of life. We have 100,000 Canadian jobs that are dependent upon our well-established system of supply management in Canada: 38,000 dairy, poultry and egg producers, almost 23,000 employees of these farmers and some 36,000 processing jobs that spin-off from these particular industries. That is $4.7 billion that could be lost in farm production if our marketing board systems, which this bill reflects upon, are in fact lost or unravelled, as well as $5.5 billion in processing. When you look at the over-all impact on the Canadian economy, some $100 billion in economic activity is generated by our agricultural community.

I want to go back and put a historical perspective in terms of why this government is between a rock and a hard place on this issue of the future of marketing boards in Canada today. First of all, let us reflect on last Friday when we had over 40,000 dairy, egg and poultry producers from across Canada rally on Parliament Hill in protest of what they conceive to be the possible loss of their livelihoods, the loss of supply management in Canada.

The government tried to spin the line that the 40,000 farmers out on the Hill on Friday had come in support of the government's position on marketing boards, but I want to make perfectly clear that those farmers were angry out there. They did not come in support of the government's position, they came to reinforce and to ensure that the government does not back down on their position with respect to article XI in GATT. If you can call snowballs and eggs a show of support then this government has a rather twisted sense of reality. The farmers are very, very worried that this Prime Minister and this government are about deep-six marketing boards in Canada. They came to make their point perfectly clear to this government that they do not want to see that happen.

• (1130)

How did we get to this position where the future of our agricultural industry is in fact at risk? It is a very serious situation indeed. If you look back to 1987 in some of the opening rounds of the Uruguay round of negotiations at GATT, Canada at that time under this government, this Prime Minister, submitted a proposal to those negotiations, the initial proposal on the table. I read from the script here. It is entitled Proposal by Canada Regarding the Multilateral Trade Negotiations in Agriculture, and it is dated October 20, 1987, from the negotiating group on agriculture.

If I could just read a portion of that text I think the answer to my question becomes perfectly clear. Let me just quote.

> Canada proposes the adoption of a comprehensive approach which would result in the elimination of all subsidies which distort trade and of all access barriers.

The United States has fingered Canada's marketing boards as being a trade barrier, an access barrier. It has identified the very system of our agricultural industry as being an unfair trade-distorting mechanism. Here is our government acknowledging "all access barriers and distortions of trade will, over a period to be negotiated as an initial phase of this process and consistent with the above goal, a major reduction in all these trade-distorting subsidies, a major improvement in secure and predictable access to be phased in over five years".

It goes on to say: "The use of a single measure"—Mr. Speaker, read my lips: "single measure" means tariff—"which converts all access barriers, administered price systems and trade-distorting subsidies shall be implemented".

What we are talking about here is very simple: We are talking about tariffication of agricultural products into Canada. And if you talk about tariffication, the consequence is ultimately the dismantling of our supply management systems, because supply management using quotas cannot exist in parallel with the process of tariffication of the industry. It just cannot happen. That is where this government has been duplicitous in its arguments at the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. What it has said over the past week is "we support article XI, we want a strengthened article XI, we support the concept of marketing boards in Canada—oh, yes, but we would also like to see tariffication".

As I said the other day, you cannot have it both ways, and this government has been trying to play two tunes on the same fiddle. We have the Prime Minister talking about the need for support of agricultural marketing boards. We have the Minister for International Trade in a private letter to all his government MPs basically trying to sell the concept of tariffication.

The question I asked last Friday stands: Does this government support marketing boards, or does it support tariffication? You cannot have it both ways.

What is the reason for this whole shemozzle that we now have before us? The reason is very simple: The United States wants to open up our trade barriers to gain access to the Canadian markets to sell their surplus production. And, boy, have they got surplus production. They could have virtually swamped the Canadian market in dairy, poultry and egg produce. That would completely eliminate agricultural life in Canada as we know it today.

The farmers understand that. They know that their future is at risk, they know that their investment is at risk. That is really what is before us today. That is why I say—and I know my time is limited, but if I can just summarize—that this particular bill, Bill C-54, that we have before the House is really irrelevant in the context of this larger debate. Bill C-54 has been presented at this time for the reasons of political optics: The government wants to be made to appear as supporting the concept of agricultural boards and supply management by introducing this piece of legislation. Well, it won't fly. The 40,000 farmers who were on the lawns of Parliament Hill on Friday understood that. Their message was clear: "Don't sell us down the drain with article XI. Don't sell us down the drain by tariffication. Support the future of marketing boards in this country". That is what this government has to do. In terms of the agreement, it may require us saying we are going to ignore those provisions of the agreement. Other countries have done it before. They have ignored the recommendations of GATT. We may very well have to be placed into that position. We cannot sign away the future of agricultural life in Canada today. It is simply unacceptable.

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure this morning to make a few remarks about Bill C-54, an act to amend the National Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act and other acts.

Before I get to the bill, I would like to make a few remarks about the tremendous effort made by the producers of Prince Edward Island last Friday in their participation in the great march on Parliament Hill. This had to be the largest but the most orderly march that ever occurred on Parliament Hill.

In Prince Edward Island we have approximately 600 dairy producers. We have a number in the chicken marketing board and the egg marketing board. Out of these total of say 650 farms, fully 200 of these people showed up at their own expense to demonstrate to this government their concern about the possibility of them losing their livelihoods.

On Thursday night after they finished their work in their barns, finished milking their cows and so on, they drove to Charlottetown where they rented two aeroplanes to fly them to Ottawa. They arrived in the middle of the night or very early in the morning, three or four o'clock Friday morning. They caught a few hours of sleep after they checked into their hotel. They showed up on Parliament Hill at 10, 10.30 Friday morning, demonstrated their concern to the government and to government officials and met government officials in the meantime for approximately four to four and a half hours. They then returned to their hotel, flew back in the late evening, arriving in Prince Edward Island at two o'clock in the morning, drove home to their various farms across the island and did their farm work that morning.

This is a tremendous and magnificent demonstration of concern and commitment to the supply marketing system in P.E.I. These farmers knew. They have been looking around for the last number of years, observing what has been happening to their neighbours in agriculture. They are seeing their neighbours who were in the hog industry having a very difficult time partially in regard to the countervailing duty and barriers that our friends to the south continue to put up.

They have noticed their friends who are in the potato industry and seen what they have gone through this last two years since the discovery of PVY-N in the potato crop there. If nothing else, it could scare producers and scare people who live in the rural areas. P.E.I. is basically a rural province. Without the farming and the fishing in Prince Edward Island, we really would have no reason to exist.

There are only four methods, four sources of real wealth in this whole world: farming, fishing, forestry and mining. All wealth derives from these four sources. Prince Edward Island is very fortunate in having two of those sources. They are basic to them to a great degree in farming and fishing and to a lesser extent, but still a very important extent, in forestry. We do not have any mines in Prince Edward Island.

To demonstrate their concern for the future, not only of themselves and their families and their way of life, but to demonstrate their concern for the future of their whole province, we had fully one-third of the producers marching on Parliament Hill to try as a last desperate effort to show this government what is actually going to be happening in Prince Edward Island if it fails in its GATT negotiations.

All is not lost. I do not want to be a harbinger of bad news all the time, but we do have some very powerful friends on the world stage. In this case, it is the Japanese on whom we are going to rely.

The Japanese are very concerned about their import restrictions on rice. They are a very powerful player on the world scene. I cannot see them letting their farmers down with regard to the supply of rice. If the Japanese get a special waiver under GATT to protect their farmers from the importation of rice, there is no reason in the world why this government, the Canadian government, cannot get a similar waiver to protect its farmers in the supply market commodities.

We know that the American farmers are not happy at all with the conclusions that Mr. Dunkel is coming to in order to sign an agreement on agriculture in GATT. The American farmers are not pleased at all. Sixty-some senators in the U.S. Senate have written to the President of the United States. These senators represent rural states. They are urging President Bush not to sign the agreement if it is not changed as far as their producers are concerned.

We know there are a lot of European farmers who are not happy with the Dunkel recommendations, and we know that the Canadian farmers are certainly not in any kind of agreement at all, although it would help to a small extent at least the prairie grain farmers.

What are the chances of these governments signing an agreement, knowing very well that farmers in various countries, Canada, the United States, Japan and Europe are not at all happy. I really cannot see politicians overruling or overriding the concerns of their farmers.

It is strange that we are debating Bill C–54 here today. It is a bill that, if the government fails in protecting article XI and in strengthening article XI, will only be of use to farmers who are not in the supply marketing system. This bill that we are amending is called the National Farm Products Marketing Act.

This is the act that the Liberal government put through in 1970–72 with Senator Bud Olson and the friend of marketing boards whom all farmers know, Eugene Whelan. They fought to put that act through in those days. This is legislation under which they formed the dairy marketing board, the chicken marketing board, the turkey marketing board and so on.

This is the legislation they were created under. If the government fails and our supply marketing system goes to tariffication, the only people who are going to benefit by this act at all are those who are not in the supply marketing system.

The horticultural industry or the beef producers will be able to form agencies in order to collect check-offs which are funds that they will be using to promote and market their products. They will be the only farm groups able to use this particular legislation.

It is a very unusual thing. I do not know why the government chose to use this particular act to bring in this ability. I know this is going to be of great benefit to people in the horticultural industry, especially those who spend a lot of money promoting their products. We have a very short growing season here and they put great effort into promoting products such as strawberries. We spend the rest of the year importing strawberries from the rest of the world, especially the United States. Now, we will be able to check off strawberries and other horticultural products coming into Canada which will be to the benefit of our farmers in this regard.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have a few moments to speak on Bill C–54. As my colleague from Egmont said, this bill only has limited use and really only applies to certain sectors of the agricultural community. The previous speaker from the New Democratic Party mentioned that this bill is more political optics. It is another diversionary bill from the Government of Canada.

I want to speak to this bill as an urban member. So often in agricultural issues members, especially urban members, do not fully comprehend the relationship of the needs of the rural community to our needs in an urban centre.

The relationship became very apparent to me about a year ago when I was visiting Moscow. While I was there speaking at an environmental summit I had the occasion to visit various parts of the city. I got up early in the morning to make these visits and day after day I saw people lining up at seven o'clock in the morning with brown cloth sacks waiting to get into the local food market. When I saw these lines I naturally thought: "Well, there must be some kind of a special on in these particular stores". However, upon further research I saw that the reason these people were lining up at seven o'clock in the morning was because there was just not enough supply. If they did not get there early in the morning they might not have any food for the day.

I went into a few of these stores and upon examining the situation even more closely I could see that it was not just that the quantity was so little but that the quality of the food was so poor. It is absolutely beyond one's imagination. You have to have been there and seen it to believe it. The way people in Moscow treasure their food supply is something that we in this country have no conception of.

When I returned I did my grocery shopping in the local Knob Hill Farms or Loblaws or some of the other stores in the Danforth area and I thought back to the experience I had in Moscow and Latvia, where most of the shelves were absolutely bare.

We in this country have no real appreciation for security of food supply. We have no idea of the importance of the contribution the farming community of this country makes toward our quality of life. You really must be without or see people living without in order to fully appreciate it.

We saw a situation last week when close to 40,000 farmers visited this city to try to communicate a message of concern. They were not just sending that message of concern for their own farms. They were sending a message of concern for all people in this country. We in this Chamber have to get our heads around this issue. We have to wake up and make sure that people in this country understand that the link between the rural economy and the urban economy is an inextricable one. As the rural economy goes so goes our urban economy. I have been saying in this House that the strength of this nation is proportional to our food supply.

We are a nation whose strength has always been measured by our ability not only to feed ourselves but feed other regions of the planet. We have one of the most progressive food supply programs anywhere in the world.

Yesterday, I referred to a paper written by my colleague from Lambton—Middlesex, Compare the Share. Today I would like to refer members to a paper written by a member from the government side, the member for Souris—Moose Mountain. In January 1992 he presented a paper called: Food: A Priority. It is a fabulous document. One of the national journalists in The Toronto Star, Carol Goar, covered this paper in late January. I refer it to everyone in this House.

What we are talking about here today in this bill is bringing attention not only to all members of this House but to all Canadians that our farming communities and our agricultural communities need help right now. They need to know that we, as national politicians, are behind them. We are behind them because that security of supply, that quality of supply, is something that has always been the envy of the world. The government over the past few years has tended to dismantle things, tended to retreat from governance rather than charging ahead. Rather than leading this government tends to wait and see, to hive off, to decentralize.

I am so nervous. With the budget coming out today, with the constitutional document before us, with this tremendous problem we are having with the most precious resource we have in this country, our agricultural community is being shaken to the core. I am so nervous that if this government continues on its current strategy of devolution of powers and dismantling our farmers may be caught in the cross-fire.

The Prime Minister said last week that he would do his best to maintain the marketing boards of this country. I hope, not only for rural Canada but for all of Canada and also for the world, that he is able to achieve that because the greatest strength this country has is not only the ability to feed ourselves but to feed those who are most disadvantaged in the rest of the world.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on Bill C-54, an act to amend the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

Grain growers, poultry producers, dairy farmers are all fighting together. The government has moved away from the position it took on GATT originally but is also trying to bolster the position it claims to have now.

I want to concentrate on one industry and a letter dated February 12, 1992 on the impact of tariffication on Canadian chicken producers. What they argue could come about is really devastating. The Canadian Chicken Marketing Agency has analysed the impact of the Dunkel proposals on Canadian producers. The conclusion of the CCMA analysis is that within three years, 86 per cent of Canadian producers would be out of business and only 330 out of Canada's 2,411 producers would remain. Within two years production of chicken would have ceased in Atlantic Canada. It is unlikely that many processing plants would survive the first several years. Within six years the industry would have all but disappeared, only 39 producers would be left.

I and many Canadians are concerned, especially the 40,000 farmers and agriculture producers who were here last week, about Canada's food self-sufficiency if the government fails to protect our marketing boards and fails to strengthen or keep the provisions of article XI of the GATT.

They do not trust this government. It is obvious they do not trust this government to protect the needs of the Canadian people and the workers involved with producing our agricultural foods across Canada.

It is much broader than that. We must alert the Canadian people that it is much broader than that. Where I come from the people in our transportation industry, in the railway industry depend very heavily on the transportation of grain across Canada. If we start to lose those markets it will affect everyone, every Canadian. Every Canadian must stand up to protect the very efficient system we have at the present time.

There is another area of concern which we have not identified. If we start to get into the really competitive market in which things begin to concentrate in one area and we start to try to be efficient and produce on a large scale, if we have large-scale processing of agricultural goods, such as the poultry industry or the turkey industry, and they start to concentrate in one area our environment is going to be very heavily affected because we are going to have a concentration of these large groups of processing plants trying to be efficient. We have a very efficient area spread across various parts of Canada. It is important to identify the environmental aspects of what we may be looking at here.

These are the kinds of discussions that took place earlier with regard to free trade. It shows very clearly that when we were dealing with the Americans regarding the free trade agreement we should have been looking at each sector of our economy, and at how to trade and be self-sufficient in our own country. We have not done that. We are starting to feel the ramifications of a trade agreement that does not recognize the self-sufficiency of our own country. If this is to proceed we will allow the basic fundamental agricultural programs essential to self-sufficiency in Canada to go down the drain. I do not think the Canadian people are ready to accept that. Our critic for agriculture has worked extensively with this. He has brought delegations to our caucus and talked it over. We have discussed it with the turkey producers, the grain producers, the poultry producers and the egg marketing boards. The people who protested in front of this building simply do not trust the Mulroney government to protect the agricultural base in this country.

Unless we as the opposition on this side of the House and the people of Canada start to stand up and really put the pressure on this government to bring about the protection that is required, I think we will be faced with the very dim results of not being able to sustain our own agricultural base in our own country.

I do not think there is a country anywhere in the world that would allow its agricultural base and its very basic foods that average Canadian people accept every day to be delivered from another country.

I know I am not prepared as a member of Parliament. I get faxes coming from grain producers in my part of southeastern British Columbia and from the dairy and poultry industries. They are small industries but are very important to every part of our country. We must protect these boards. If we do not we are going find, as the chicken industry has indicated, that the industry will have all but disappeared within six years.

That is what we are faced with. If this government does not get away from its idea of trying to support tariffication, and at the same time telling the marketing boards and the people involved that it is there to fight for their rights, I do not think we are going to get the results we are hoping for.

I would urge all Canadians to get on the wire, contact this government and tell it that we are not going to accept anything but a strengthening of Article XI of the GATT.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to have the opportunity to speak today, following probably the biggest rally this nation has ever known last Friday on the lawn of Parliament Hill.

If you had the opportunity as I had over the weekend to go back and mingle with a few practising farmers who spend their time in the stable regularly, you would find there is great agonizing going on out there. There is real pain and real hurt in the dairy industry.

We speak of the dairy industry in particular, but it would equally apply of course to the poultry industry. Farmers can always be so practical in their examples of things that really hit home. I heard one poultry farmer say that when an American chicken arrives at the border to come into Canada, remember it has not been fed on Canadian grain. That is quite a message. They do not need any Canadian grain. They have enough grain in the United States to feed the chickens. How are we supposed to have any money to buy the chickens?

I do not think most people realize that. They are not just talking about bringing a few articles across the border and putting a tariff on them. If they had been fed Canadian grain, that is one thing. But would you expect that American chicken to ever be fed on Canadian grain? You can see the ramifications that would have for the grain distributors, the grain dealers and everyone else down through the cycle. That is the kind of practical experience I have had in my association with these dairy farmers as they try to relate where their industry would now go with this new thinking.

We must remember too that we are still recognized as northern people. This city we are in right now has the coldest average climate I think of any capital in the world. We must not forget that. Are we going to throw our markets open to free market forces when that is one thing we have to contend with? We cannot do much about that but it has a great impact on the livelihood. Do we think we can become competitive by just throwing our basic food supplies open to market forces and going toe to toe with the Americans? If we take the example of the dairy industry, all you have to do is go down into North and South Carolina and a little bit farther south and look at the herds of dairy cattle they have there. They do not have barns, they have milking parlours. They are very, very sophisticated. They milk three times a day. The cow is just a machine they push feed through.

The farmer in Grenville County, a few miles away, may have an excellent herd of 60 or 70 cows and make a decent living. Perhaps he is able to pay for his tractor, make his payments at the bank, meet the guy who comes around from the Farm Credit Corporation and keep him happy. How can he compete with what you see going on down south in the Carolinas with those huge herds? Barns are not a great problem down there. They have some protection for their cattle, naturally, but most of the cattle stay outside. They can afford to do that because they do not have the inclement weather we have up here. Anyone who can describe how they can carry on an industry up here and compete with that I think should go out and talk to some farmers. They will explain it in a sensible way as they are so capable of doing.

I can remember those years before we had a managed marketing system. I can remember when you had 13 or 14 cows and you managed because you sold your milk to the cheese factory down the road and you had a regular pay cheque coming in. No farmer would admit that is where we should be today. They are entrepreneurs. They will move with the times. They are willing to go out and borrow money and expand their operations, and a lot of them did. They borrowed more because they were told this was the way to go. They borrowed from the banks and any other source they could get relief from, and now they find themselves in a big dilemma.

Some would accuse the farmer of always whining. That is not the real experience. Go out and talk to these people. They are going through a lot of agony right now. In most cases they are operating with borrowed money. They thought they were doing the right thing.

The farmers appreciated the changes. There is no question about that. The farmer is no different than any other businessman. In order for him to survive he realized he had to go out and acquire three, four or five former farms and he was willing to do that. When you expand your acreage like that a lot of other things have to happen. If you are going to have a viable and competitive operation, everything else along the line has to be expanded. They borrowed lots of money and bought bigger equipment, bigger tractors and advanced farm machinery. They were willing to do that, but with the uncertainty that is out there today they wonder if they should have bothered. They are probably thinking they should not have bothered.

Farmers like to think their contribution is recognized in this country, but then you see 30,000 to 40,000 assembled out here, leaving their farms, getting on buses all day and all night, spending two hours out here and the Prime Minister of this country does not even have the decency to show up. For the Prime Minister to not even make an appearance on the Hill hurt the farmers and it hurt them terribly. I can tell you farmers have long memories. Maybe while they are milking those cows or spending time in their barns they will have a little more time for this kind of practical remembrance. They will remember that, I can guarantee you, ladies and gentlemen. That will not be forgotten.

The farmers are not finished yet. This was just an initial response to their concern about their industry. Last Friday it was announced that further demonstrations are being planned. I hope that at some point the Prime Minister will come out of hiding and go and meet those people who are out there trying to make a contribution to our Canadian way of life. The big problem with the dairy industry prior to the milk marketing board was the great inconsistencies. The amount of product put out on the market was up and down. If you are going to go out and invest a lot of money in something, you cannot live with that kind of uncertainty. The marketing board was endeavouring to provide some kind of consistency. The banks would not lend you any money to start with if they could not have some assurance you were going to be able to pay it back. The way to pay it back is to guarantee there will be some consistency. The price of the product then was based on a formula and this changed in what we called the marketing system. They took into account the cost of the man's production, the cost of his seed, the cost of his fertilizer, and all the other factors that you would put into that formula. They saw there had to be a margin of profit, of course, and they arrived at a figure. How much is this man then entitled to put out on the market?

With that kind of thinking behind it, he could be assured that he was going to get a pay cheque. He knew roughly how much it was going to be, and he was going to be able to meet his commitments.

Farmers are just asking to have that system recognized. Could you imagine if the marketing boards were prevalent in the United States? George Bush is going out and promoting this movement away from marketing boards. The farmers in the States—and they were out here last Friday too in great numbers—would love to have the system we have here. But because of political reasons Mr. Bush cannot visualize giving them this system. It is an election year in the United States. Canadian dairy and poultry farmers are paying the price for a weak voice on the part of this Canadian industry down in the United States.

I think the Canadian farmers deserve a better hearing than that. I think the Prime Minister should at least stand up and apologize to Canadian farmers for not being present at the biggest rally we have ever witnessed. He should tell them when he is going to meet with Canadian farmers in this country, because they deserve better treatment than that, and they will remember.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate on Bill C–54 and to have the opportunity to say a few words on the crisis facing our Canadian farmers, particularly those farmers who live in eastern Canada.

The debate today concerns the amendments to the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act, in order to implement the enabling legislation for a check–off for imports into Canada. That is the immediate purpose of the legislation. But the legislation will become irrelevant to many in Canada if our agriculture industry is decimated. Certainly that is the feeling among many farmers, particularly those who operate under supply management, if the current proposals that are being debated at the GATT are allowed to go through and the strengthened article XI which the Canadian agricultural industry has been urging this government to defend and which the Liberal party implemented to its great credit some 20 years ago is allowed to go by the wayside.

I have farmers in my constituency. I have dairy farmers, poultry farmers, turkey farmers and mixed farmers in my constituency, and I can tell you they are very worried.

They are very worried that the value of their farms will plummet, their life savings will disappear, and they will find themselves forced to abandon their farms. We will find, in Atlantic Canada as well as in other parts of Canada, the lands which are now productively tilled, which not only enhance our food security but our environment, allowed to grow covered with weeds and deteriorate. As a consequence, in Atlantic Canada we will lose our farms and our farmers, that segment of the population which is not only of large economic value to Canada but of large social and cultural value and is part of our security as a country. The issue is bigger than simply the amendments to the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act.

I want to say a few words on behalf of our supply managed farmers, particularly the ones in my constituency. I had an opportunity just a week ago to speak with a couple who have been farming in the region of Mabou in Inverness County. They are dairy farmers who purchased a farm some eight years ago. They are young, articulate spokespersons for the farm industry and honest, hard-working citizens of the community. They are making that dairy farm work. It is an excellent operation, very efficient. They have worked on that farm for the last 18 months without a holiday. They actually came to the rally last week. That was the first opportunity they had to leave the farm. They took the train to Ottawa to participate in the rally and show their concern on behalf of dairy farmers in Nova Scotia about the consequences if supply management is allowed to be negotiated away in the GATT negotiations.

They are very distrustful of this government. They do not believe this government's protestations that it supports supply management. They see double talk and duplicity in the words of the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister for International Trade and the Prime Minister when they talk about supporting supply management. They see that the government's words are hollow and that it is unwilling to stand up for the farmers and other Canadians whose interests are being compromised in international bodies.

We have a government that is unwilling to go toe to toe with other governments, particularly the Government of the United States, and defend our interests. It is necessary that the government be willing to take measures that will hurt the Government of the United States and hurt the interests of the United States to demonstrate that we defend our own interests. That is what this government has been unwilling to do for a whole series of interests, not only the free trade agreement and the interests that have been attacked since the free trade agreement was put in place.

It has also shown how spineless it is with respect to defending Canadian sovereignty beyond the 200-mile limit in the nose and tail of the Grand Banks where we have watched the plundering of fish stocks by the Spanish and the Portuguese fleets for five years. This government continues to say: "Well, we are negotiating. We are exercising diplomacy. We are having a public relations campaign". All the while our fish stocks are being plundered.

Mr. McCreath: What are you suggesting?

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): We are very clear on the issue.

Mr. McCreath: Send out the gun boats. Is that your position?

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Unilateral declaration of that area as a management zone for Canadians.

An hon. member: What is the basis for that?

• (1220)

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): There is basis in international law. I am sure that is what we will have to do eventually. However, the problem is that we will be too late. There will be no fish left.

In any case, I am deviating from the point at hand which is the agricultural sector. What is really affecting farmers at the moment is what is taking place in those GATT negotiations.

The member for South Shore knows full well that if article XI is allowed to disappear, if we replace the supply management system the Liberal Party put in place with a system of tariffication all the farmers in his part of Nova Scotia will be destroyed in a very short while.

The farms will disappear, and I am sure he will bear the consequences of that electorally. Worse than that, farmers will see the values they have built up over generations decimated at the hands of international negotiations and a government unwilling to defend its interests when push comes to shove.

Push has come to shove. Push is coming to shove at the GATT negotiations with the Americans, and with the Spanish and the Portuguese fleets off the 200-mile limit in the nose and tail of the Grand Banks. It is time that this government defend our interests on the world stage, which is what it has been consistently unwilling to do.

We are finding our sovereignty eroded in so many vital areas that touch our economic interest. That is the point of this debate. That is what is at issue here, far beyond the immediate question of this legislation which on the face of it is necessary legislation because it at least provides the enabling legislation to allow this government to take some steps in defence of our agricultural sector.

It will be too little too late if we lose article XI at the GATT.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to speak to this bill today. This bill causes me some concern and I know it causes concern to the farming community across this country.

Today there is a tremendous farm crisis in Canada. It is not only in western Canada, where I come from, but right across this nation.

Certainly the one area of farming that has been truly successful in the past few years has been marketing boards and those areas under supply management. They have taken farm products, dairy, milk or whatever, and structured an economy around them so producers in that area know they will have a solid income and that they will be able to survive and progress as a farm family.

This whole area of supply management is now coming under review. It is in question and in jeopardy of being lost forever. I really wish that the government, instead of focusing on this particular bill today which is not going to help marketing boards in the end, would focus its attention on other areas.

This bill will provide a check-off or an opportunity to pick farmers' pockets in a fashion that is completely unnecessary.

This government should be focusing some attention on the area of farm finance and farm debt. The areas of farming really in desperate straits are those farmers who have incurred huge debts, are paying huge interest rates, have a shortfall of income and are struggling.

This is the government that, back in 1989, introduced its Growing Together paper with a huge fanfare. As a result of that a number of task forces were set up to look at a whole host of areas including farm debt and farm finance.

There can be nothing more important than managing farm finances. These days you borrow a lot of money. It is nothing to have a $200,000 or $250,000 debt. That is not unusual. If a farmer borrows sums of money of that magnitude at 10 or 12 per cent, which happened in the 1970s, and suddenly a few years later is faced with 18, 20, 21 and 22 per cent and higher interest rates, it is very hard to manage that operation. Many farmers have found themselves with problems not because they mismanaged their farms but because of high interest rates and low prices. The complement to farm finance is farm income.

This government has failed to bring in any substantial legislation to deal with farm finances. It has thrown out money here and there in a haphazard fashion. In particular the grain sector of agriculture has really suffered.

The government is providing lip service to supporting supply management. In actual fact I believe—and most farmers believe it as well—the government is simply going to say: "Look, we did our best. We have tried for you but we have to let supply management go". There will go the prize. The most successful aspect of agriculture under supply management will be a thing of the past. It will disappear.

Every region of the country in rural areas depends on a particular source of the economy, a primary source of the economy. In areas where supply management and farming are factors it is a tragedy to think of losing those farms. If we look at areas of Quebec and Ontario where supply management is very prominent, there are literally tens of thousands, hundreds of thousands of people who will be affected. In rural areas of Quebec there are regions that depend on supply management. When these farmers disappear that whole region—and many regions are suffering economically now—is going to be extremely depressed.

This government, although it undoubtedly has to be aware of it and I know there are many members from Quebec who very concerned about it, seems to be unwilling. In fact the government seems to have been steered in that general direction over the last number of years to the point of saying: "I am sorry, we have done what we could".

Unless there is a commitment to supply management, unless that commitment is strong and is going to maintain itself, there is going to be devastation in many regions of this country. To see the supply managed sector disappear is a heart break for all farmers.

The other aspect of this bill and this attitude of the government toward supply management and agriculture in general has been to split the farm community. The farm community is a diverse lot, to begin with. These are independent people who have pride in their farm, pride in their land, and are individuals. That is to be applauded. When we talk to various agricultural groups we find many different positions depending on which group we speak with. Western Canadian wheat growers certainly have a different position from that of National Farmers Union.

What is more fundamental is that a split is now being perpetrated, I would suggest, by this government between the supply managed sector and the grain sector. We had this GATT proposal sitting in front of us which tells the grain producers that there will be lower subsidies in European and American grain. Hopefully this will mean a somewhat higher price in grain. On the other hand it is saying we have to do that at the expense of the supply manage sector. A grain producer on the prairies who is in debt up to his eyeballs and is looking for anything to survive is in some ways faced with an option he cannot refuse. The effect has been to split the two groups, and that is a tragedy because farm families are all in the same boat. They simply want to have their land and produce their product whatever it might be, whether it is grain or cattle or poultry or dairy. They want to have an income and they simply want to live their lives. These people contribute a tremendous amount to the economy.

• (1230)

The sad part is that in rural regions across this country, whether we are talking about farming or looking at fishing communities in Atlantic Canada, there is a tremendous amount of financial and emotional stress. Until the government, until we as a Parliament say to the people of this country that we think rural Canada is important and that we are going to pay special attention to rural Canada, this problem is going to continue. Unfortunately over the last 40 years we have had successive governments with an urbanization mentality and much of the legislation passed has been passed without the consideration of rural Canada.

I find it very frustrating and sad that we seem to go on ad nauseam ignoring rural Canada. We pay lip service to it. We talk in glowing terms of living on the farm, the rural way of life and so on. Yet we do very little about it.

Instead of debating bills such as this one which is simply going to hurt supply management, or is certainly not going to help it, we should be focusing our attention on areas in rural Canada that will help rural Canadians to maintain a viable rural infrastructure for all of rural Canada and focusing a commitment on those farm families and on those rural communities. It is an issue that is long overdue. It needs attention. It is about time that we in this Parliament started paying attention to some of the needs of rural Canada because if we do not do it and if we do not do it soon there will be nothing left to say.

CANADA–FINLAND INCOME TAX CONVENTION ACT, 1991

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill S–2, an act to implement conventions between Canada and Finland, Canada and the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic and Canada and the United Mexican States for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax and the prevention of fiscal evasion and a convention between Canada and the United Mexican States for the exchange of information with respect to taxes, as reported (without amendment) from Legislative Committee F.

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (for the Minister of State for Finance and Privatization) moved that the bill be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Merrithew (for the Minister of State for Finance and Privatization) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a few comments about the bill on the record.

This bill seeks to implement tax conventions between Canada and Finland, Canada and the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic and Canada and the United Mexican States, and a convention between Canada and the United Mexican States for the exchange of tax related information.

Tax treaties promote international trade and investment. They provide stability for investors by offering certainty regarding the method and rates of taxation of income flowing between countries. Tax treaties also seek to alleviate double taxation of income from international transactions.

The three tax treaties under review follow the general pattern of treaties previously approved by Parliament. Indeed Canada has over 50 some treaties in existence at the present time all based on an OECD model. Important administrative benefits are provided for taxpayers. The requirement to pay tax on business profits in the country where the profits originated is eliminated unless the taxpayers have a permanent establishment in that country.

As well, treaties provide a mechanism to settle various problems encountered by taxpayers in the interpretation and application of treaties. One of the most important aspects of tax treaties is the alleviation of double taxation where the same income is taxed in the hands of the same person by two different countries. Tax treaties eliminate double taxation in these situations by either providing one of the states with the exclusive right to tax or by ensuring that taxes paid in one state can be used to offset taxes payable in the other state.

I would now like to indicate briefly the main elements of the three tax treaties currently before the House. I will deal with the fourth item, the exchange of information, later on in my remarks. These treaties provide generally that dividends may be taxed in the source country at a maximum rate of 15 per cent. A 10 per cent rate will apply to dividends paid to a company that holds an equity interest of at least 10 per cent, except that it is 25 per cent in the case of Mexico, of the voting power in the company paying the dividends.

In the case of interest paid by a resident of one country to a resident of the other country, a general rate of 10 per cent, except that it is 15 in the case of Mexico, will apply. There are however a number of exceptions which I discussed in my remarks during second reading.

With respect to royalties the conventions provide for a general rate of 10 per cent, 15 per cent in the case of Mexico, in the source country. Copyright royalties from cultural or artistic works are generally exempt from withholding tax under the three treaties if the recipient pays tax on the royalties.

Some of the other matters dealt with in these tax treaties include capital gains, discriminatory treatment of foreign nationals and pensions. The treaty provisions dealing with capital gains reflect the standard Canadian position enabling the source country to tax gains arising on the sale of real property, business assets and shares in real estate companies. Under the treaties discrimination on the basis of nationality is prohibited, thereby ensuring nationals of a country equal treatment with nationals of the other country in the same circumstances. However, this does not prevent a country from providing fiscal incentives, for example the small business deduction, to resident taxpayers.

I would also like to point out that Canada has preserved its right to tax pensions and annuities paid to residents of the three countries involved in these treaties.

The final item I want to discuss is the exchange of information convention with Mexico. It was signed before the signature of the comprehensive double taxation convention I have just described and complements the comprehensive treaty. The exchange of information convention will assist the revenue authorities in combating tax evasion.

I might say that the convention with Mexico is the result of 15 years of negotiations. The Mexicans had declined to have tax treaties before that and Canada is one of the first countries to achieve such a thing. I should also say for the record that notwithstanding the fact that many of my hon. colleagues from the NDP availed themselves of the second reading to get up and have a debate on Canada–U.S.–Mexico or North American trade, which may well be fair ball if that is their perspective.

• (1240)

I want to point out for the benefit of this House that this tax treaty with Mexico has absolutely nothing to do with trade negotiations between Canada, Mexico and the United States or Canada and any other country. This is a straightforward procedure, one that is common between countries and one in which Canada already has 50 treaties with other countries of the world.

Let me conclude by saying that these tax conventions provide equitable solutions to the various problems of double taxation existing between Canada and these countries. The three countries which have signed these agreements all hope to implement the conventions as soon as possible. Consequently I commend this bill to the most favourable consideration of this House.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I had the privilege like the hon. member of rising to speak at second reading of this bill. I rose on behalf of my colleague, the learned member for Windsor West. He was unable to be present at the time of second reading debate and asked me to assist him by making a brief submission to the House in respect of this bill. I am pleased to do so again at third reading.

As I indicated at the time of second reading, we were concerned that the bill should go before a committee so that a committee could review in detail the negotiated tax treaties between the three countries involved. I believe that the committee has now completed that work, that a report has been submitted to the House, and that it has recommended the bill without amendment. Apparently the committee was satisfied that the bill complied in all respects with the usual form of these kinds of treaties and accordingly recommended them to the House for consideration.

Generally tax treaties between Canada and other countries are beneficial and avoid the incidence of double taxation on income earned by Canadians who reside in those countries or who carry on business there. In that respect we think this is a very positive step.

I want to say that the parliamentary secretary in his remarks made comments about the Mexican free trade deal and the fact that it had been dragged into the debate by the New Democratic Party during the debate at second reading. Frankly I think it was a move by the NDP to kill time. There is not really much that is controversial in this particular bill. I agree the tax treaty with Mexico has nothing to do with any free trade agreement that the government might negotiate with that country.

I suspect members of the New Democratic Party were reflecting a view which we share, that this government is not a good negotiator. Any of the negotiations it carries on are liable to result in a disaster for Canada. We have had lots of evidence of that. I suspect that is why they have raised the issue on this particular bill. I must say I share their concern fully. We have expressed the concern on many occasions. I expressed it again earlier this morning in a speech on another bill , and I am not going to repeat my remarks which I know Your Honour felt were irrelevant to that particular bill.

Having said all that, I want to say that we are delighted the committee has reviewed this bill. I am not an expert in this field and I defer to others who are more knowledgeable about the technicalities of tax treaties, as very complicated as they are.

We are prepared to allow the bill to pass at this stage. I am pleased to give our support to it in light of all the things that have transpired to date.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, these days with all the news of taxation concerns, finances, and all the bad news that is coming out, it is nice once in a while to have some good news. I would like to start my remarks by complimenting a particular individual who resides in the city of Moose Jaw.

Every year we have the Saskatchewan Telemiracle. Local radio station CHAB does its own 36-hour Telemiracle. Last week one of the announcers, Mike Hardy, did a 36-hour telethon and raised over $7,200 for the people of Saskatchewan. As Mike Hardy would say, that is good news.

With respect to some bad news, I like most Canadians have some real concerns about what this government is doing with respect to taxation and budgetary matters. There is some real concern with respect to the directions this government has taken over the last number of years in its financial affairs. Certainly as a party, the New Democrats have gone on record, and very forcefully, that we are opposed to legislation such as the goods and services tax which we see as an unfair and regressive tax and have called for its elimination.

Often we get the comment that it is very fine for the New Democrats to call for the elimination of the GST, but what would you do in the alternative? Where are you going to raise the funds and what are you going to do?

We have put forth a lot of alternatives and certainly one of our economic critics from Winnipeg has done an awful lot of work leading the party in developing alternatives. The member for Essex—Windsor has also done similar work. Over the last few years, we have developed a real economic alternative. It had originally been suggested that the GST would cause a 1.25 per cent increase in consumer prices. In fact consumer prices have risen by over 2.6 per cent. Retail sales have declined by 5.3 per cent in volume. Exports have declined by 2.9 per cent and imports have increased by 5 per cent.

There has been an increase in the number of people cross-border shopping and I suggest it is for legitimate reasons in a sense that there are a lot of economic factors.

Mr. McCreath: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. With the greatest respect, while I find my hon. friend's remarks most interesting, telethons in his riding have nothing to do with the bill before the House. I would suggest if the NDP had been seriously interested, at least one of them might have shown up at at least one of the meetings of the legislative committee that considered this bill. None of them did.

Mr. Laporte: I do not think the New Democratic Party has to apologize to the hon. member or anyone else for the approach we have taken in this country with taxation. This party has been very effective and has put forth all kinds of alternatives and suggestions as to how this government can improve the financial state of most Canadians in this country.

There are provinces in this country that have New Democratic governments in place. Saskatchewan's government is being responsible and putting forth budgetary restraints contrary to the last government which was a Tory government. Supposedly the Tories have a history of being financial experts and economic managers but they have done a tremendous job of creating problems in Saskatchewan and are on the way to affecting this entire country.

The hon. member's comments are totally unjustified and I think made in a purely partisan manner which does not benefit this House or anybody in this country. I am very disappointed with those comments.

I just want to point out, with respect to the goods and services tax and other regressive taxes in this country, the New Democrats have put forth many, many alternatives. We have called for changes in corporate tax rates which are essential if the average Canadian is going to survive in this country. According to the Public Accounts of Canada, budgetary revenue from corporations has decreased from 20.1 per cent in the early 1960s to 16 per cent in the 1970s. It is down to about 9 per cent today.

If we are going to have fair taxation in this country it is important, in developing legislation, that we focus on fair taxation for corporations. It is something we have not done, it is something we have been moving away from. I would suggest that an initial move should be to make changes to corporate tax rates.

• (1250)

We would also suggest that there should be a change to progressive tax rates in this country. Changes to the Income Tax Act could result in a situation in which there is no difference between the rate paid by those who earn $50,000 a year and those who earn $250,000 a year. The middle class is being taxed the same as the upper class, and that is not fair, that is not just. Our income tax system must be made more progressive, and those at the top of the income scale must be asked to contribute more than they are now. That is only fair.

The Reform Party recently talked about a flat tax, which is a most preposterous notion. Certainly the Reform Party focuses on simplicity and that is a proposition that does not bear scrutiny. With a flat tax, under the proposal they have made, the only people to pay higher taxes would be the poor and those with low incomes. That is certainly going in the opposite direction of fair and proper taxation.

The government argues that higher income taxes drive people to move to the U.S. This may be true of a few people for whom Canada is nothing more than a place to make money. However, for the majority of Canadians, professional or otherwise, Canada will continue to be the country of their choice, particularly if their taxes are used to build a society that benefits all Canadians and not just a few.

Those are alternatives. We need to implement a green tax in this country. The environment in this country and world-wide is in dire straits. As a result, such a direction is extremely important if this country is to progress and develop.

The approach the New Democrats have taken in this country toward taxation has been both reasoned and logical, and it is certainly an approach that will benefit all people.

I want to make one more comment relating to regional taxation. There has been a lack of interest or a lack of direction in taxation in this country with respect to the regions of this country. If we are to maintain regional development we must have a new approach to taxation.

The best example is Atlantic Canada. Billions and billions and billions of dollars have been pumped into that area. Are they any less dependent? No, they are not. In fact they are more dependent. About 15 years ago I talked to one official who got quite discouraged with Ottawa politics. He said he had a deputy minister responsible for DREE who indicated that he wished we could simply take all the maritimes and turn it into a park so we could all go visit there once a year. That is very well for someone outside that region of the country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I remind the hon. member that debate is on Bill S-2. I appreciate the words of the hon. member were relevant.

Mr. Laporte: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to make these remarks today. I think these are very important issues for all Canadians and should be raised on a constant and continuing basis.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I will try to direct my comments to the bill. The problem we have here is that we would like to see agreements reached under which Canadians would receive fair taxation. This bill identifies Finland and Mexico. The problem I and my party have, especially our trade critic, is that the free trade agreement and the negotiations taking place with Mexico have not even been presented before this House. Yet, here we have a bill being presented with regard to taxation with Mexico. It could have serious ramifications for the trade talks going on with the Mexican government.

That bothers me a great deal. Our member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca on numerous occasions has urged this government to bring forward the proposals it is discussing and trying to bring about in the discussions with Mexico. Yet, we have a bill being introduced by the government to reach a tax agreement with Mexico. Is it not fair ball that we should know about the discussions taking place with regard to the free trade discussions with Mexico? Should we not know about the discussions taking place if we are going to decide whether this bill should be considered appropriate for those discussions? I think we should know. I think the Liberals would agree with us.

We have urged this government to present the arguments and the proposals. Evidently the Mexicans have had the privilege of being able to debate and discuss the free trade agreement. The Americans have had open discussions. Yet, we as parliamentarians have not even had the courtesy of having the proposals brought forward to the House. Then the government has the gall to bring in a bill concerning taxation with Mexico and Finland.

I am not so sure, but we may agree that legislation is required. However, should we not know the ground rules we are playing with? Should we not know about the discussions taking place between this government, on behalf of Canada, and the Mexicans? I think we are entitled to that. If this government had a sense of fair play our members of Parliament could hear the discussions and examine the proposals it is trying to present to the Mexicans concerning free trade with Mexico, then we would be in a much better position to understand the rationale of this piece of legislation before us.

This government cannot be trusted. The Canadian people do not trust this government. The New Democratic Party certainly does not trust this government. The Canadian people have very clearly shown their distrust in the polls, in which the Conservatives are at somewhere around 11 per cent as a result of the policies it is bringing in.

To bring a piece of legislation before this House with regard to taxation, especially with Mexico, at a time when we are in the middle of trying to bring some rationale to what this government is doing—and goodness' knows we have enough problems with the free trade agreement and its effects in Canada.

The government wants to introduce a bill that will set up a taxation agreement with Mexico and we do not even know what negotiations are taking place with the Mexican government concerning free trade. I do not think it does either. It is incompetent. It is showing its incompetence by bringing in a piece of legislation such as this before we even know the terms of the agreement and what we are going to be discussing with regard to free trade.

Mr. McCreath: Have you read the bill?

Mr. Parker: I want to say that they tie together. If anyone tries to convince me that the taxation and free trade agreements do not tie together they are sadly mistaken because they cannot convince me of that and they cannot convince our party of that.

We have asked this government to put the proposals before Parliament so that we can see what they are.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Parker: I see that the member is worried about the time. I am not a bit worried about the time. I have 20 minutes to speak on this bill and I am prepared to speak for 20 minutes.

An hon. member: On the bill?

Mr. Parker: Yes, I am speaking on the bill. I am speaking on a taxation policy this government is trying to arrange with Finland and Mexico through this bill.

It ties directly to the free trade agreement with Mexico. We have not even seen the documentation or the proposals this government has put forward with regard to free trade with Mexico. It has a responsibility to bring those proposals before us so that we can see and scrutinize those documents.

Until the government does that, it cannot expect us, as parliamentarians, to be able to address the provisions of this bill. How could it?

An hon. member: That has nothing to do with it.

Mr. Parker: It does have something to do with it.

The Liberals say that it has nothing to do with this. They might be prepared to accept this kind of legislation before they know what kind of trade is going to take place with Mexico but we have a different view of this question.

It is important that we fully understand what is going on between these countries before we allow the government to introduce a piece of legislation of which we do not know the background.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being one o'clock p.m. I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

The House took recess at 1 p.m.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

TRADE

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, despite the doom and gloom constantly repeated, repeated and repeated by the parties opposite, Canada's trade numbers with the United States continue to prove our policies are right and those of the opposition are wrong.

Buried in a 20-page government document of merchant trade statistics released by the U.S. commerce department yesterday is undisputed evidence of Canada's strong performance as a trading nation.

Sales of Canadian goods to the U.S., despite our so-called high dollar, remain steady at $91.1 billion. Yes, the trade surplus between the two countries was tilted in our favour to the tune of $6 billion.

Our policies are working and I repeat, repeat, repeat that we are going to hold the course because it is the right thing to do.

OLYMPIC GAMES

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, the XVI Winter Olympics are over and Canadians can be proud of the way our athletes represented Canada in Albertville.

Canada's showing at the games equalled our previous record of seven medals which was set at the 1932 Olympics in Lake Placid. Canadian athletes also obtained gold, silver and bronze medals in three demonstration sports.

In terms of individual performance, 21 of our athletes placed in the top eight of their sport, while Canada finished eighth out of 64 countries competing at the Albertville games.

The dedication and hard work of all our athletes have achieved results which the Canadian amateur sport community can build on for 1994, when our athletes will again take to the hills and arenas at Lillehammer, Norway for the XVII Winter Olympics.

To all our Olympians who represented their country in the true spirit of international sportsmanship and friendship, our congratulations on a job well done.

MEMBERS' EXPENSES

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, at its meeting on February 12, 1992, the Board of Internal Economy decided it would be appropriate for members of the House of Commons to take steps in line with the government's initiative—in other words, to apply the spending freeze for February and March to their own budgets.

The House of Commons expects to reduce spending by about $2.2 million. The Board of Internal Economy should also consider measures similar to what I have been advocating for several months, such as restricting the number of members, senators and officials in parliamentary delegations abroad and asking them to file individual accounts of their trips, as I suggested at the February 4 meeting of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

YOUTH CRIME

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of the House of Commons and especially to the Minister of Justice a number of community forums on youth crime and gang activity which were held recently in the riding I represent.

One was at the Sir Frederick Banting Junior Secondary School in Coquitlam, British Columbia. Parents in the community are concerned with the increase in youth crime and gang violence in Canada, with many victims and witnesses too intimidated to come forward and report crimes.

They demand that the Minister of Justice address the rise in youth crime immediately. They demand action on youth gangs before Canada starts to have the same kind of problems that are manifest in the United States.

They want protection for victims and witnesses of youth gang crimes. They want public education on youth crime and gang activity in Canadian communities. They want stiffer penalties for young offenders within the juvenile system. They want even better control of guns. Finally, they want a further review of the Young Offenders Act with the goal to having good resources to catch juveniles when they are juveniles.

These are good suggestions, Mr. Speaker. I hope the Minister of Justice is listening.

B.C. ECONOMY

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, although these are difficult times for all Canadians, the recent fiscal news in British Columbia continues to improve. The Investment Dealers Association of Canada said that B.C. experienced one-half of the gross domestic product decline that the rest of Canada experienced in 1991 and applauded British Columbia's 1.2 per cent increase in employment for 1991.

It predicts a 3 per cent increase in the British Columbia gross domestic product for 1992 and that B.C. will show the strongest recovery in Canada for the next decade.

It credited the promising outlook to the easier access to U.S. markets due to the free trade agreement, the business sector's improved productivity, the diversification of export markets in the Pacific Rim and also the entrepreneurial drive of new immigrants.

It is not a coincidence that all of these factors are fiscal goals and nation-wide objectives which this government has worked diligently to attain.

Today, on budget day, the British Columbia economy waits in anticipation for continued positive fiscal direction from this government.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON NEW REPRODUCTION TECHNOLOGIES

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, we learned that the Royal Commission on New Reproductive Technologies has given two research contracts to Burson-Marsteller, a public relations firm that works for the pharmaceutical industry in particular.

Not only is this a public relations and not a research firm but it has several drug companies among its clients. The first contract for $21,000 is to identify the issues to be dealt with in the second contract for $45,000,. One purpose of this research is to counter criticism of drug companies' involvement in developing reproductive technologies.

This Royal Commission on New Reproductive Technologies has serious problems and it is high time to look into them.

STATUS OF WOMEN

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, this government claims to fight on behalf of women's equality. If that is the case, I want today to throw out a challenge to them.

There are 24 judges in the general division of the Manitoba Court of Queen's Bench. Only one of those 24 is a woman. That is a disgrace. It is also very embarrassing. Worse still, two vacancies which existed last year were filled by men.

The government has an opportunity to make up for its mistakes. Currently there is one vacancy in the court and four more vacancies are expected over the next year. Here is the government's chance to stand up for women's equality. There are several outstanding women practising law in Manitoba, some of them are leaders in the women's movement. They would make excellent judges and they would also bring a much-needed woman's perspective to the judicial process.

I urge the government to do the right thing. Rest assured all Manitobans, especially women, will be watching.

LIBRARIES

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, in the course of the hearings held by the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture last fall, we were made sharply aware by Canadian writers and publishers of the fundamental importance of the printed word, both in expressing the cultural diversity of our country and in developing a common sense of citizenship within it.

Never has the power of words been so crucial to the future of Canada and never has the freedom to read them been more valuable to us as citizens.

I share the view of the Canadian Library Association that it is the responsibility of libraries throughout Canada to guarantee and facilitate access to all expressions of knowledge and intellectual activity, including those which some elements of society may consider to be unconventional, unpopular or unacceptable.

The libraries of this country, including our own Library of Parliament, have a special obligation to help guarantee the right of free thought and expression through the presentation of the written word. When reading materials are suppressed, democratic freedom comes under attack. Once started, such suppression quickly spreads to all forms of communication.

The freedom to read is basic to democracy. This special week reminds us to cherish and preserve it.

THE DISABLED

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, there was good news for disabled Canadians recently from the Canadian Human Rights Commission. A commission tribunal has ruled that Elections Canada has the responsibility to improve access for disabled voters at polling stations.

I am sure all members of this House would agree that the right to vote is one of the most important rights in a democratic society. There are many Canadians who cannot exercise that right without proper access to a polling station.

• (1410)

This a legal precedent of considerable importance, a precedent that has far-reaching implications regarding access. Canadians with disabilities are waiting for the government to confirm that it accepts and will respect this important ruling.

MR. DOUG PETERS

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, during my three years on the finance committee, it has become fashionable within the Canadian business community to target the Bank of Canada.

One particular economist has had a long litany of complaints about the current monetary policies. I have always believed that policies should be assessed in light of what has happened. What have been the results? Today inflation stands at 1.6 per cent, interest rates are at a 20-year low, consumer confidence is but two and one-half hours away. Our anti-inflation policy met the test.

Economists who believe that inflation is relatively harmless should go back to school. High inflation causes high unemployment and recession. If it is true we learn from our mistakes, then Doug Peters should turn down a Liberal desire to get into politics because based on his latest miscalculations, he could become the best economist ever.

TOBACCO INDUSTRY

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, the former MP for Broadview—Greenwood pioneered non-smoking legislation to promote health. Now New Democrats welcome the government's adoption of our proposal for an export tax on cigarettes as a measure that is pro-health, pro-small business and anti-smuggling. However, tobacco companies have reacted with threats.

First, Imperial Tobacco threatened to move cigarette production from Canada. Now, RJR-Macdonald's says it will not purchase Canadian tobacco from the 1992 crop because of the export tax. This is simply economic blackmail, using Canadian farmers as pawns. Part of the government's response must be more assistance for Canadian farmers to diversify to crops other than tobacco.

We must say yes to the health of Canadians and no to those who use blackmail to try to change public policy.

MR. DOUG PETERS

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to question the motives of media critics of the financial policy of the government. I would think a prime example of this concern is Mr. Doug Peters of the Toronto-Dominion Bank. As the chief economist for the bank, I would think he plays an integral part in the direction of bank policy.

Here is the concern which I have. Is Mr. Peters' philosophy of an economic policy toward higher inflation meant to benefit Canadians or is it so that he may look good in front of the eyes of his employers?

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, Canadians applying for unemployment insurance often wait up to 12 weeks before receiving a cheque. To carry them over, many apply for welfare assistance. In the regional municipality of Hamilton—Wentworth, welfare payments made to individuals waiting for UI exceeds $10 million a year. When the UI cheque finally arrives, it covers the period they were on welfare.

The regional municipality of Hamilton—Wentworth has asked that this overlap of welfare be reassigned to the region from the federal government. Cabinet members from my region, including the minister from Lincoln, told the region that they would press their cabinet colleagues to get the processing time for UI cheques down to just a couple of weeks. The member for Lincoln told the region she would report back to them on her progress.

There has been no progress. It has been months and overlap payments persist. Hamilton—Wentworth is asking the federal government to use the region, Hamilton, as a pilot project for reassigning retro UI payments to them. The plan will save the region and the federal government millions of dollars a year.

I invite other municipalities to write the minister of unemployment.

SMALL BUSINESS

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, prior to February 1990, small businesses had no problem getting a bank loan. If they needed money, the bank said "how much".

However, between February 1990 and the beginning of 1991, when the Bank of Canada was severely restricting credit, the chartered banks did so as well. It hurt. In many cases, it resulted in otherwise unnecessary bankruptcies and unemployment, but the banks were being squeezed by the Bank of Canada. What else could they do?

Since the beginning of 1991, the Bank of Canada and the chartered banks have been steadily lowering their interest rates, but the banks still have the credit squeeze on, no loans for inventory, no lines of credit. It is asset based secured loans only. Unfortunately the policies of our lender of last resort, the Federal Business Development Bank, are no different from those of the chartered banks. If we are ever going to get the economy going again, and the banks will not help, then the FBDB must lighten up its lending policies.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, just over 76 years ago a fire broke out on Parliament Hill in which seven people lost their lives. This morning my offices in Centre Block were virtually destroyed by fire and, like the tragic fire of 1916, there is no suspicion of incendiarism. It does bring to immediate concern the most significant symbolic infrastructure of our country, our Parliament Buildings.

It is known that renovations valued at $226 million are required to safeguard further deterioration of these buildings. I cite from a Public Works report a host of deficiencies present in the parliamentary precinct: removal of asbestos, dangerous masonry, inefficient elevators, inadequate and outdated electrical installations, obsolete and inefficient heating and ventilating systems. These are required to address these health and safety situations. Perhaps the government should revisit its decision to decrease building maintenance by 30 per cent over the last six years.

As the now illegible words read on the west face of the Peace Tower: "Where there is no vision the people perish".

SENIOR CITIZENS

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of this year, Canada's senior citizens received a measly 75-cent increase in old age security.

The government is ignoring the reality of Canada's senior citizens. There are 80 per cent of single women over the age of 65 who live in poverty; 50 per cent of seniors have incomes so low they qualify for the Guaranteed Income Supplement.

Ever since the government's first budget in 1985, it has been attacking the programs seniors depend on. It tried to deindex pensions and then it started the clawback. Now the government has given the seniors another slap on the fact with a 75-cent increase.

The last time seniors' pensions were increased above the rate of inflation was in 1984 in the last Liberal government budget. The Liberal Party has a proven record on seniors' issues and we will continue our good work after the next election.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

FISHERIES

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Strong evidence based upon the Convention of the Law of the Sea suggests that Canada has the right to go beyond the 200-mile limit to prevent the depletion of cod fishing stocks in the Atlantic. Yet all we have is the fishing minister standing by, winking and nodding, while individual fishermen put their lives at risk trying to stop foreign overfishing. Is this not a hypocritical and negligent response?

An hon. member: It is.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Why has the minister refused to exercise Canada's right to extend its environmental control of fishing stocks to the entire Grand Banks?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we recognize the significance of the Law of the Sea. There have been some considerable difficulties as it has been developed. It provides for a comprehensive regime, regulating the world's oceans, but it is not going to be effective if it is not accepted by a large number of member nations.

There are some obstacles to its acceptance. Canada is working very hard to ensure that the provisions, particularly concerning marine resources, are put into place. We are trying to do that unilaterally as well as working to make sure the provisions go into the Law of the Sea.

It is only one of the efforts we are making. We are also putting this forward as a very important priority at UNCED in June, but it does depend on multilateral co-operation.

[Translation]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, from that answer, it is clear that this government has no plan, no strategy, no political will.

I have a two-part question for the minister: Will she sign the Law of the Sea Convention and affirm Canada's right to protect our fishing banks and, secondly, will the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs visit the major countries to obtain a firm commitment for a new marine conservation regime?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, results are what counts, not the efforts made or signatures collected, but results and of course political will also. We have that political will.

Yes, I discussed the situation related to the major fisheries problem with all the leaders and all foreign affairs ministers of Europe and of other countries as well.

• (1420)

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, let us see if we can get the minister to try another response.

In 1990 the U.S. Congress enacted a law to eliminate drift-net fishing off its Pacific coast by imposing selective but tough economic sanctions against Mexico.

I want to ask the minister this: Is this not an example of a country exercising its right to protect the environment? Will the government, in its meeting this week with the European ambassadors, clearly indicate that Canada will take similar action in order to give true meaning to its support for sustainable marine environment off the eastern coast of Canada?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly delighted to hear the hon. member make a favourable reference to the United States. It is the first time I have ever heard him do so.

Let me say this: We have made a number of representations. We will continue to do that. We have not only a strategy, but we have a very effective plan of action that we are putting into place regarding EC ambassadors and regarding trips to Europe by our ambassador, by the Minister of Fisheries and potentially by myself. We have had discussions with the President of the European Community. These are the efforts that are ultimately going to succeed, not some hysterical reaction on the part of the hon. member from Winnipeg.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for my friend, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, who yesterday put on his citizen Crosbie hat to support the fishermen who are going to take on the international fishing pirates. He is wise to do that because every red-blooded Newfoundlander supports him and so do, I believe, most Canadians, but the minister's support must not be selective and cute.

Does the minister not know that Canadian enforcement ships have arrested foreign fishing boats for violations only to be instructed by Ottawa to let them go without laying charges?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, this is a startling revelation. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will give us more information.

I do know that we have arrested many foreign fishing vessels for offences within the 200-mile economic limit. As a matter of fact, within the last month a Portuguese captain was prosecuted in St. John's and convicted because of an incident two or three years earlier. He was arrested when he came back within the 200-mile economic zone because they were fishing within the 200-mile economic zone two or three years ago. He was fined several hundred thousand dollars.

There may have been some incident in the past which the hon. member is referring to that occurred, but it is certainly not the common practice and there would have been a very good reason for it if it did occur.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I should be glad to give the minister chapter and verse on some of those incidents.

Since Spanish and Portuguese fishing vessels were banned from Canadian ports back in 1986, they routinely use St. Pierre for servicing and supplies. The catch is, of course, to get to St. Pierre they have got to enter Canadian waters. This government is aiding and abetting their illegal fishing by allowing them to do so.

I want to ask the Minister of Fisheries: Is the government now prepared to take immediate steps to ban completely their use of Canadian waters and is the government prepared to enforce that ban?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, this is an entirely new suggestion.

What we have off Canada's coast, as we have elsewhere in the world recognized by other countries, is a 200-mile economic zone which gives the coastal state certain rights with respect to management of the resources within the 200-mile economic zone, including the fish that are within the 200-mile economic zone.

The international law does not recognize any right in a coastal state to interfere with the free navigation of other countries' vessels across the high seas or within the 200-mile economic zone when they are not fishing or otherwise interfering with the resources within the zone.

The hon. gentleman knows he is speaking through his hat, as he is doing most of the time.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans as well.

Yesterday he is quoted as having said that we are prepared to use imagination and seamanship. My question to him is this. Does this constitute an encouragement on the part of our frustrated fishermen to engage in high seas vigilante activity or was he saying that this minister will hold his course, go to NAFO and tell them to stop overfishing Canadian fish or we are prepared to be as tough as little Iceland was in the early 1970s. Tell them to stop overfishing or we will cut their nets. Is the minister prepared to do that?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I was appearing before the European Community at Brussels and at NAFO long before the hon. gentleman knew what NAFO was.

With respect to vigilante-ism, where was the hon. gentleman when Greenpeace were out vigilante-ing around the ocean as they have done so often on both thbe east coast and the west coast? The hon. gentleman never rose in this House to denounce vigilante-ism when it was Greenpeace's vigilante-ism. But when it is Newfoundland vigilante-ism, when it is fishermen vigilante-ism, the hon. gentleman is up to decry it and to deny it and to attack it. Shame on the hon. gentleman.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that you recognize, as do all members on this side of the House, how utterly bizarre was that response. I did not condemn the fishers, I condemned this minister for forcing them out there to do that. We want him to act.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Since I cannot get a sensible answer out of the Minister of Fisheries, I will turn my attention to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology.

Yesterday 2,300 GM workers lost their jobs. My question to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology is what action is this government prepared to take in defence of the other 38,000 GM workers in fear of their jobs as GM prepares further layoffs under political pressure on the American side that the damage be done in Canada rather than the United States?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, it is hard to see a connection between the first question and the second question.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, one of the best things that the government can do is to create the right atmosphere for new investment in this country, investment that will create jobs that will replace the jobs that will be disappearing as a result of the GM decision.

This has been the essence of the policies that we have been following to get inflation down, get interest rates down to provide that incentive for new investment. That new investment could go into new equipment, new technology, new plants, new research and development. That is the way that a dynamic market based economy will deal with companies that are laying off people and at the same time create the new investment that will provide the jobs for the people who have been laid off.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is this. I wonder if the kind of investment he is talking about is the kind of $20 million interest free investment made to Boeing of Winnipeg which the minister of energy said, and I quote: "would ensure job security for the current work force". Yet, 180 people were laid off last weekend, permanently. Is that the kind of help that the GM workers can expect?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, we have in place a number of programs that help companies create jobs, that help companies bring in new technologies, that help companies deal with the ever changing global environment we are dealing with in the world today, not just in Canada. That together with the policies I have talked about in my first response is what will help companies create jobs.

I think what my hon. friend is looking for is the Government of Canada to create a new factory, drop it down beside General Motors in St. Catharines and say: "There, 2,300 workers. There is a new plant".

• (1430)

I think my hon. friend understands that is not the way the economy works.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in this House the Minister for Industry, Science and Technology said that he has instructed Canada's trade negotiators to insist on safeguards for Canadian automotive jobs.

Does this mean that if the auto pact safeguards for Canadian jobs are not met, the minister will reinstate tariff penalties that were wiped out by the free trade deal?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, what our negotiators, working with the Americans and the Mexicans, have been instructed to do is to try and find an arrangement and an environment for the automotive industry that can make that industry as competitive internationally as possible.

Governments cannot do everything to make companies internationally competitive. Companies, workers and management have to be part of that over-all objective.

What we will be trying to do in the free trade negotiations with the Americans and the Mexicans is to create that environment whereby we can take the best advantage of the three countries and create the strongest possible automotive industry for the three countries.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, the minister has refused to honour his commitment of yesterday to insist on safeguards for Canadian auto jobs.

Allow me as a supplementary to say this. Yesterday, the industry minister said in this House that the auto pact safeguards for Canadian auto jobs: "Are not affected at all in the free trade agreement". Yet because of the free trade agreement the big three can pull all their jobs and production out of Canada and export cars back into Canada duty free.

How can Canadians trust this minister to negotiate a trade—

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. I am sure the hon. member can put the question in such a way that it is less offensive.

Mr. Peterson: How can Canadians have faith that this minister can negotiate a good trade deal with the United States and Mexico when the minister does not even know what the U.S. free trade deal has done to Canada's auto sector?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, let me quote if I could from the president of the Chamber of Commerce in St. Catharines who was commenting on the decision yesterday and the causes for the decision.

He said: "I certainly don't see free trade as an issue in this thing at all. There was free trade by the auto pact in the first place. I don't see the auto pact as being affected by free trade whatsoever and I would not put any blame on this on free trade".

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, as the previous questioners have mentioned, the industrial heartland of Ontario is truly being devastated with these lay-offs, especially yesterday with the 2,300 jobs lost in St. Catharines which is in my riding.

My question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Will the minister advise how funds promised in Bill C-21 will be used to retrain the workers of the GM plants in St. Catharines after these lay-offs? Will the minister advise what immediate programs and how much money he will make available to retraining of these auto workers?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, concerning that specific location, the consultant from industrial adjustment services has met with local plant management and local representatives of the CAW to discuss the establishment of an IAS committee.

This proposed committee will assist in the development of an adjustment plan for the affected workers. The department will offer its full range of programs and services to all affected workers.

We trust that the programs in place under the umbrella of this IAS committee will serve the interests of the affected workers.

I am not in a position to give an amount of money because this work is taking place as we speak. When the time comes, if the hon. member wants to know these figures, I will provide them.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): I thank the minister for his response and I look forward to his answer as to the specifics of the money.

Mr. Speaker, I address my next question to the Minister of Supply and Services and in his absence to the Acting Prime Minister. I refer to a communiqué released on February 13 for federal contracts recently awarded in Ontario.

In light of the serious blow suffered at the GM plants in my riding, will the Acting Prime Minister tell us why the Department of Supply and Services placed an order of nearly $1 million for new cars for the RCMP, albeit General Motors cars, but cars that were totally assembled in the United States?

Surely there could be some direction from this department to give some consideration to our Canadian manufacturers and suppliers. I wonder if the minister could address himself to that.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I would caution my hon. friend in putting questions like that because Canadian automotive production represents 17 per cent of North American production.

If we are going to get to a position where individual governments only place orders for Canadian assembled cars we are going to be the losers.

PUBLISHING INDUSTRY

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Communications.

Yesterday I asked the minister about Grolier publishing company and the book publishing policy of the government.

The minister announced that he was pumping $20 million a year into the publishing industry. He of course did not mention the $185 million per year that this government is sucking out of the book publishing industry with the introduction of the GST and the elimination of the postal subsidies.

Since the minister announced his new policy, Grolier is closing its library and school division, it is moving its inventory, equipment, furniture and records to the United States and is leaving nothing but a shell.

Again I would like to ask the minister: What specific action is he and the government going to take to prevent book publishing companies like Grolier and others from leaving the country? Obviously his new policy is not working.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, it is a bit premature for the hon. member to say a policy that was announced about three weeks ago is not working.

As he is well aware, the Grolier acquisition took place some years ago and what they are doing is consistent with the actions which they took some years ago.

What we are doing is to try to ensure that a Canadian-owned book publishing industry can prosper in this country. What we are doing is putting new money into the industry.

What we are doing as well is changing the foreign ownership provisions in order to ensure that it is possible for Canadian companies to be able to purchase foreign companies, first of all because they will be healthier; and second, in order to ensure that we are able to require that undertakings be given by foreign companies operating in Canada if they intend to take over operations.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, that is what is called a one-ply answer. Of course, the takeover of Grolier occurred under the Baie Comeau policy which was not enforced.

My question to the Minister of National Revenue is this. When Grolier closed its direct mail book division and moved it to the United States it was a loss of 100 jobs.

Now the mail order division in the United States is packing the books in the United States, metering them, addressing them and bringing them in bulk across the border and distributing them through the Canadian postal system. In that way, the intention of the Minister of National Revenue to charge a $5 special tax on the mail order is avoided.

Is Grolier going to be able to get away with this? What is the minister going to do to prevent this type of circumvention of his own regulations?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, that question was filled with nonsense because anyone that would move south of the border to try to evade the $5 processing charge would realize that they would have to pay applicable duties, applicable taxes including the GST, freight and postage once returning to Canada. It would cost them a great deal more to try to move into the United States to try to circumvent the new system that we just applied.

• (1440)

In fact, the new system that we just applied is going to increase the productivity in this country by some 3.5 per cent within that industry. This will result in the creation of some 2,000 to 3,000 jobs for Canadians.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, on December 12, the Minister of Justice tabled legislation to ensure that a rape victim's past sexual history could not be used to prove consent. It sent a strong message that no means no.

Yesterday, the minister told the Canadian Bar Association that she was willing to revise the bill "in the interests of fairness".

In the absence of the Minister of Justice, I ask the Solicitor General: Is the government backing off? Why is it backing off? Will no still mean no?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice was attending the Canadian Bar Association winter meeting and was engaged in a dialogue with the association.

During the course of her remarks, she indicated as we all indicate as ministers, that she is always interested in improvements to the bill.

She is not backing down in any way from the legislation which she tabled. She made the standard offer that if it can be improved by the bar who work with it all the time, or by members of the Opposition, she would look at and entertain any amendments.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, the legislation clearly stipulates a definition of consent.

The words "revise the bill" related to that very definition of consent. After a meeting with the Canadian Bar Association, the minister seems to have changed her mind.

Will the Solicitor General commit the government to a strong definition of consent, or will he tell us what other kinds of safeguards will be available to the victim if precise definitions of consent are removed?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I know my hon. friend has an interest in this legislation. She was very complimentary to the legislation when it was brought in.

The government stands fully in favour of what the government said in the bill, but this government has never said that we cannot improve on things.

We brought forward legislation that women across the country, including members of this House, welcome. We intend to stand behind it.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister.

Canada's representatives at GATT have not been able to convince members of the European Community of the importance to Canada of maintaining GATT article XI.

Does the Acting Prime Minister agree with the Minister for International Trade that the United States is the key to success or failure as far as obtaining clarification of GATT article XI is concerned?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I don't think it is useful to identify those who are opposed to clarification.

I think most countries currently negotiating at GATT are in favour of an agreement, and Canada is one of those countries. Canada's position has remained the same—to support and strengthen article XI—and we have repeated this to the Europeans. They listened very carefully to what we told them. I would even say they made it quite clear that they supported article XI. However, it is not their main concern. They would like to have tariffication first and keep article XI as a safeguard. That is not Canada's position.

We are continuing our discussions with the Europeans to try to bring them around so that we will have an agreement that will allow Canada to support these marketing boards, and I believe the hon. member also supports that position. We will continue to defend our position. We will continue our discussions with our allies, wherever they may be, in Europe or elsewhere.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, my question was quite simple. The Minister for International Trade said the United States is the key.

Could the minister explain very briefly, why the Prime Minister has not approached the president himself about a matter that is so important to Canada's farmers?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asks whether the government agrees with the Minister for International Trade. I would have to say that the government does.

The Prime Minister has engaged himself in this issue. He has spoken to a number of the leaders in Europe. He has indicated that he is seeking to make arrangements to either speak to or meet with President Bush in order to put the full influence of the Prime Minister behind the interests, in support of the interests of the farmers, in order to seek a clarification and strengthening of article XI.

That is the position of the government, and that is the position that the Prime Minister is seeking to ensure through his own activities and involvement in this issue.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the government House leader.

Last year in the throne speech the government promised to make the agenda of Canadians the agenda of Parliament, in other words to empower private members. This promise of parliamentary reform was reiterated in the unity document Shaping Canada's Future Together.

Does the government still have the will to come forward with a comprehensive set of proposals to empower private members? When will it table its proposals?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, certainly that remains the commitment of the government.

As the hon. member knows, in 1984 with the McGrath commission many changes were introduced which added considerably to the ability of individual members to exercise influence on public policy. That continues to be our program.

These kinds of things, of course, can only be done with the full co-operation of members on both sides of the House. For that reason, the management committee of this House, on which both sides of the House are represented, is currently looking at a package of proposals. I am looking forward to its recommendations. I hope we will have an opportunity to implement them as soon as possible.

BREAST IMPLANTS

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Following the U.S. Food and Drug Administration hearings last week on the safety of silicone breast implants, Dr. Cornelia Baines referred to women who testified as squeaky wheels and said that they were more interested in lawsuits than in factual information.

She also stated that there are many products on the market, from penicillin to peanut butter, that can cause severe reactions in some people, but this is not a reason to discontinue their use.

I ask the minister if he will remove Dr. Baines from his review panel because it is obvious by her biased and misleading pre-emptive statements that she is neither impartial nor credible to bring forward recommendations on women's health.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the member that I spoke to Dr. Baines last night about what was reported in the press.

She told me that those remarks were made at the commission by people who were witnesses before the panel. She did not say that herself. She was reporting words that were said by people at the panel.

Dr. Baines is a well-known epidemiologist in Canada and is very highly respected in the Toronto area. There is no reason for me not to believe what Dr. Baines said to me. Moreover, she works with three other members and the other members did not confirm what the hon. member said.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Perhaps the minister would consider playing back Canada AM on the morning that the FDA made its report.

Mr. Speaker, the minister is proceeding with a plan to fast-track the approval process for new medication by privatizing the process. This is a recipe for disaster.

As we have witnessed with silicone implants, the health protection branch simply cuts and pastes. Companies supply research with no real mechanism to identify problems or verify test results presented by manufacturers.

Will the minister tell this House when he is going to take his responsibility for the health of Canadians seriously and stop being merely a rubber stamp for the manufacturers?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it would be good if this member would call me instead of looking to the newspapers for her information. I would give her the truth. The review process, at the first phase, could be made by the private sector, but all drugs are reviewed a second time by the Department of National Health and Welfare. It is done in all countries in Europe, in Australia, in the United States and in Canada.

• (1450)

Once again, instead of taking this information anywhere, Canada AM or The Toronto Star and so on, maybe she can call me. I will give her the real information that she needs.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, the interpretation of significant demand with regard to the official languages regulations will be implemented on January 1, 1993.

My question is to the President of the Treasury Board. Other than providing notification through The Gazette, what other measures have been taken to ensure Canadians have access to this significant information?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for Wild Rose for her question.

To begin with, we have ensured that federal institutions are well aware of the regulations and the circumstances under which they have to provide these bilingual services. We have a list of bilingual offices across Canada and this list will be made available. Furthermore, we have been meeting with official language communities and they will receive, as soon as it is available, the copy of the updated bilingual offices' directory.

All Canadians, as you know, can readily identify the federal offices providing bilingual services because there is an official language symbol available in those offices.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Today we learned that over 10,000 bogus 2051 forms were used to obtain illegal immigration visas. It appears that the department officials and other immigration consultants were accomplices in the sale of those forms to desperate immigrants for as much as $10,000 a visa.

What assurance can the minister give that this matter is being cleaned up and has he called in the police to investigate this issue?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, thanks to The Toronto Star, the member knows about current issues. This was raised in June of last year. I understand there was coverage in the papers but he may not have read it. In fact, we instituted a new document at that time and more secure procedures last June concerning this.

As for the 10,000 figure, all I can say is that the RCMP has been called in and they are investigating it. We are co-operating with them and we await the results of that investigation.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister.

Immigration consultants and officials may have profited by signing visas allowing illegal immigrants to enter Canada. This is truly tragic today when so many Canadians are looking for jobs themselves and so many legitimate would-be immigrants are seeking entry legitimately into Canada.

Will the minister revoke those illegal visas immediately? Will he see that all of the alleged wrongdoers involved in that process on the 2051 claims, whether they are within government or outside of the government, will be punished?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, instead of following the advice of the Liberal Party, I will not indict anyone until after the RCMP has completed its investigation. Once the RCMP has dealt with it we shall follow the law.

CHILD CARE

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

A recent Globe and Mail story told us of a stressed 12 year old boy spending four hours a day caring for his younger brother and sister while his parents work to support the family. Is this the type of child care program the government envisions for this country?

Canadians want a national child care program. I ask the minister: where is the program this government promised Canadian families in 1984, in 1988 and again in the last Speech from the Throne?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, what I can say to my colleague is that the Government of Canada took a step in December with children and the family issue with the convention for children. We are very close to taking another step which will not be the child care network. We believe that Canadians have other priorities today. It does not mean that the government is not involved. We put more than $1 billion a year into child care services in Canada through the Canada Assistance Plan.

I can assure my colleague that the government will move and soon on the question of the family and children in a perspective that I hope my colleague will support.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, we just heard this government confirm to the House that it has breached its promise to Canadian families on the child care program.

Like the parents of this 12-year old boy, middle class families have been hardest hit by the Tory tax squeeze. Statistics Canada recently reported that from 1986 to 1990 personal taxes rose while personal incomes fell.

Will the minister explain why his government's economic policies have discriminated against the middle class and bled them dry at tax time.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it is quite likely that the Minister of Finance will give some answers this afternoon. I expect that will be the fact.

I want to say to the member that when we look at the heritage we had before 1984, it was not just the middle class you strike. You strike everybody in the country.

WOLVERINE TUBE COMPANY

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

The ongoing issue of the Wolverine Tube Company plant closure has been a very serious one for my riding of Delta. In the most recent development a number of Korean workers have been brought in to dismantle the plant.

Through what process did these Korean workers gain admission to Canada and further, why are they performing a task that Canadian workers should be employed to do?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in this instance the company in question sold its equipment to KCC Transport Systems in Korea.

Officials of the department met with officers of that company last week to explain the requirements of our immigration legislation. The company has decided to hire a minimum of 20 Canadians to dismantle the equipment in question, although some Korean workers will be involved.

The reason is that the equipment was built in 1958 and the blueprints are no longer available. It may be necessary for Canadian workers to train the Koreans in order for them to be capable of reassembling the equipment in Korea.

Everything was done according to the law and the regulations of the act.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It concerns two women in Yukon, Andrea Underwood and Anna Carrott, who have lived together as a family with Anna's two children for eight years, the last two running Morley Lodge in Yukon.

Anna, a British citizen, has been ordered to leave Canada with her children by next week because our immigration laws do not recognize lesbian or gay relationships, unlike those of other countries. In view of the tremendous community support this family has received, will the minister undertake to review this case and will he agree to extend Anna's visa and not tear this family apart, at least until the courts have had an opportunity to rule on the legality of this cruel and discriminatory policy?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): For the very reason the hon. member just mentioned, this is before the courts. I do not think it would be proper for me to comment since it is before the courts.

Furthermore, the hon. member must know that the Privacy Act, which is meant to protect people, prevents the release of information on individual cases like this and their names. I do not think we serve their interests well.

• (1500)

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): The two women themselves have publicly pleaded with the minister to recognize their plight. So the Privacy Act clearly does not apply.

I want to ask a supplementary question of the same minister. It relates to another imminent deportation, that of Mr. Mahmoud Abu Shandi, a Palestinian refugee in Canada. I want to ask the minister whether he will agree to allow Abu Shandi direct access to the normal refugee application process, access which he has been denied under the national security provisions of the act.

Will the minister agree to a full and comprehensive parliamentary inquiry into the nature of the relationship between CSIS and Mossad, particularly as it applies to immigration in Canada?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, for security reasons, I cannot comment on this case.

COMMUNITY TALKS PROGRAM

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology.

Last fall, the minister and the Minister of Employment and Immigration commenced as part 1 of the prosperity initiative a program called Community Talks.

While visiting these towns, I am sure the facilitators have heard individuals bring forward a wide range of constructive comments including the development of partnerships, the need for more co-operative education and training tailored to the workplace.

My question is: Have there been too few participants? Are they being listened to and will they be part of the solution?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, we have had over 150 of these meetings, I believe it is, and propose to have some 200 meetings across the country.

They have been exceptionally good meetings. They have brought together people from varied backgrounds, talking about a range of issues under the general umbrella of the prosperity initiative on science and technology, education, learning, investment, the competitiveness of our domestic market and international business.

In response to the particular question as to whether they are being listened to and will their suggestions be acted upon, the answer is a very solid yes. We are listening very closely and we are developing proposals right now as to how we might respond to what I would say are some very good suggestions that have been brought out in these meetings.

EAST TIMOR

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): My question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Yesterday, the minister said that Canada may soon lift the suspension of $30 million in proposed aid projects to the Indonesian government for its inquiry into the massacre at Dili. The minister has clearly bought the glib, smooth, PR lines of the Indonesian foreign minister.

Will the minister issue a directive immediately to the Canadian delegation in Geneva that Canada supports the European Community's resolution on East Timor which is now before the United Nations Human Rights Commission.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, what I suggested yesterday was that I was encouraged by the statement of the foreign minister of Indonesia regarding actions that his government was prepared to take.

There are a number of draft resolutions. As I understand it, no final resolution has been determined to go before the human rights commission in Geneva. We would certainly support one that we think is worded in a way that meets with Canada's principles on this matter.

I would like to point out to the hon. member that no member of the European Community, however strong the resolution, has cut off aid to Indonesia.

Canada is the only country in the industrialized world, the only country in the world, that has cut its program of aid to Indonesia and still has that cut in effect. That is the strongest possible action.

CANADA–FINLAND INCOME TAX CONVENTION ACT, 1991

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. McDermid that Bill S–2, an act to implement conventions between Canada and Finland, Canada and the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic and Canada and the United Mexican States for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax and the prevention of fiscal evasion and a convention between Canada and the United Mexican States for the exchange of information with respect to taxes, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Angus: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am wondering if I could clarify with the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader that in the event the debate on the bill you have just called is completed prior to the time of the budget later this afternoon, that the House will suspend until such time as the Minister of Finance is prepared to rise.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I would like to confirm to the hon. member and other members of the House that once this legislation is dealt with, we will then suspend to the call of the chair at 4.30 p.m. for the budget. We have no intentions of calling any further bills after this.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

SUSPENSION OF SITTING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Deblois): As indicated by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, the sitting of the House will be suspended until 4.30 p.m.

The sitting of the House was suspended at 3.07 p.m.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 4.30 p.m.

Mr. Speaker: It being 4.30 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 83(2), the House will now proceed to Ways and Means Motion No. 11, the budget statement.

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Finance) moved:

That this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

He said: I am honoured to present my first budget as Minister of Finance. I want to thank the Prime Minister for the confidence he has placed in me and for his wise counsel and support, and particularly his help during the period leading up to the budget.

I also want to take this opportunity to thank the pople of my constituency, the Vegreville federal constituency, who have supported me over the years and have given me the benefit of their good advice, and also for their understanding, particularly in recent days, because I have not been back to the riding for at least four weeks. I do appreciate very much their support.

I also want to thank my colleagues for their advice and good counsel and their help but mostly for their co-operation during the course of the time leading up to the budget. Above all, I want to thank all of those who have sent me their good wishes over the past couple of days. I can assure them that it has been most appreciated.

When I began work on this budget a few months ago, I wanted to ensure that it would be built from the ground up, with the help of Canadians in all parts of the country.

I wanted a budget that would deliver a strong bottom line: one that supports the well-being of Canadians and their families; one that promotes the success of our business people in expanding and creating jobs; one that contributes to a strong and more united Canada. And that's the bottom line of the budget I am delivering today.

In preparing the budget, my colleagues and I listened carefully to Canadians in business, labour, the voluntary and social sectors; to workers, students, managers, farmers, investors, and Canada's youth.

I received hundreds of letters from individual Canadians. We heard from members of Parliament and from provincial governments. Almost every day, I can tell you, Sir, that I received calls from right across the country, giving me some of their thoughts and some suggested solutions to the problems that we face.

During the past two months the Prime Minister met twice with the provincial premiers and they will meet again soon. I met with provincial finance ministers in December and January.

During these consultations we talked of the challenges we face, of the hardship of economic slowdown in Canada, the United States and the other major industrial countrie; of the reality of global industrial restructuring to which, we must all adjust.

Throughout the process I was struck by the sincerity, the understanding and the realism reflected in the advice of Canadians on how best to tackle our economic problems.

Listening and leading

This budget reflects the good advice we received.

It also provides the leadership and direction that Canadians want to help meet the economic challenges that confront us.

It will keep Canada firmly on course for better times ahead, for renewed and sustainable growth, for job creation and for deficit reduction.

The direction we are setting will not appeal to those who believe there are shortcuts to economic success, the same quick fixes that were tried by others in the past and failed. That's not the direction that a majority of Canadians want to take.

Growth and job creation

Canadians want realistic, lasting solutions to our economic problems, not quick fixes that lead to long-term breakdowns or further burdens for the taxpayer.

They are ready to work together to help Canada compete and win in a tough, uncertain economic world. They know that when Canada wins, Canadians win.

Canadians want to cut the deficit.

They do not believe that governments can borrow us out of the trouble that governments borrowed us into. They know that higher debt means higher taxes, and they want an end to rising taxes.

Canadians want government streamlined and made less wasteful to meet the changes and demands of the 1990s.

They want government to adjust to the same budget realities that households and businesses must face every day.

They want the burden of government reduced. They want less regulation, less overlap and duplication.

They want less government and better service.

Canadians want to ensure better development of Canada's most valuable resource—our people.

They want better opportunities for people to improve their skills, and to use their initiative and talent to build a better future for their families, their community and their country.

Canadians are concerned about the growing costs of health care and about the social safety net. They want steps taken to ensure that our social programs meet the basic needs of Canadians and remain a vital part of our Canadian identity.

Canadians know that good social policy and good economic policy go hand in hand—and that each supports the other.

Most of all, Canadians want a renewed basis for confidence —confidence that jobs will be created and jobs maintained.

Responding with action

In this budget we will respond. This budget will bolster recovery this year and strengthen growth and job creation in the years ahead.

We will substantially reduce the deficit.

Despite the economic slowdown, we will hold the deficit to $31.4 billion in the 1991–92 fiscal year. We will reduce it by almost $4 billion to $27.5 billion in 1992–93.

We will cut spending and we will cut taxes.

We will cut spending by $1 billion in 1992–93 and by $7 billion over five years. These savings will be used to cut taxes.

We will act to strengthen Canada's competitive position.

We will reduce the tax burden for the manufacturing and processing sectors.

We will increase support for research and development and encourage productive investment.

We will provide measures to help small business.

We will simplify, streamline and substantially enrich our support for families and children.

We will assist Canadians with registered retirement savings plans (RRSPs) to buy a home.

We will increase our support for Canadians with disabilities.

We will provide additional tax assistance to students.

We will reduce personal income taxes for all taxpayers.

We will restructure and streamline the operations of government to improve both efficiency and service to Canadians. Forty-six government organizations will be eliminated, deferred, merged with other operations or privatized.

This budget responds to the desire of Canadians to have a more expansive economy and a less expensive government. It will help ensure:

a stronger, more productive economy better able to create the jobs that Canadians need; and a leaner, more efficient government better able to deliver the services Canadians need.

To help prepare Canada's economy for the 21st century, the government will also step up its effort to work with business, labour, the voluntary and social sectors, and other governments. We will seek to renew the national tradition of partnership on which this country has been built and sustained through many challenging times.

A strong foundation for recovery and sustained growth

The measures in this budget are economically, socially and fiscally responsible. They provide help where needed. They are paid for by reducing and reallocating expenditures, not by increasing the burden of borrowing and taxing.

In the same responsible way, year after year, the government has acted in response to need. Over the past few months:

We provided assistance to the agriculture, fisheries, transportation, housing and publishing sectors.

We strengthened support for a more productive and competitive aerospace sector.

We increased worker training and adjustment funds under the unemployment insurance program.

We are enriching the equalization program to help the less wealthy provinces.

We introduced measures to give Canadian retailers a fairer chance to compete with their American counterparts.

We reaffirmed our commitment to a healthier environment by taking further action to implement Green Plan initiatives in priority areas such as global warming, air and water quality and sustainable forests.

All of us are learning lessons from the hardship of recession and global restructuring. One of the most important lessons is that government must never again allow itself to be financially crippled by debt:

Governments do not have the capacity to inject massive stimulus into the economy. To try to do so by further borrowing would hurt us down the road. We cannot get out of a hole by digging it deeper.

Restoring the balance, easing the burden

Reducing the deficit is essential for sustained economic growth and prosperity. It is also an essential foundation for the confidence, at home and abroad, that will ensure a strong recovery.

We have made substantial progress since 1984 by cutting the deficit-to-GDP ratio almost in half from 8.7 per cent to 4.6 per cent. Fiscal balance has been further supported by firm, consistent policies. These have enabled us to maintain tight control of program spending, to make faster-than-expected progress in reducing inflation and interest rates, and to respond quickly to contain upward deficit pressure over the past several months.

As a result, we are able in this budget to cut spending and direct the savings to tax cuts that will help individual Canadians and support economic growth.

The progress we have earned together will yield further dividends. As growth resumes and we make further progress toward price stability, the deficit will fall steadily and quickly.

Action to restrain expenditures

This budget implements a wide range of spending cuts.

We will broaden and deepen the Expenditure Control Plan which was introduced in the 1990 budget and extended by last year's budget. This will be done in a way that does not affect major transfers to provinces.

The defence review of last September and further measures taken with this budget yield a substantial peace dividend for Canadians. Since September 1991 the world has changed a great deal. This has allowed us to reduce our longstanding presence in Europe without lessening our commitment to NATO solidarity. The planned withdrawal of our troops from Europe can be advanced and a task force stationed in Europe is no longer necessary. Defence spending will be cut by a total of $2.2 billion over the next five years.

We will cut the non-wage operating budgets of departments by 3 per cent to save $150 million next year and $800 million over a five-year period. International travel will be reduced. First-class travel for members of Parliament, Senators and senior public servants will be eliminated.

We will save $75 million a year by reducing communications budgets. A no-frills publishing policy will substantially reduce the number of government publications.

The growth in spending by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation (CMHC) on social housing will be held to an average of 3 per cent per year.

Other program reductions will save $170 million next year.

As a result of government decisions taken last year, ministerial, parliamentary and public service pay is currently frozen. In addition, the Prime Minister and all ministers will take a 5 per cent cut in their ministerial salary beginning April 1.

We will strengthen cost recovery and improve the collection of outstanding tax liabilities.

We will continue to privatize Crown corporations where they no longer serve public policy objectives. We will dispose of surplus assets.

Our measures to streamline government will also contribute substantial savings over the next five years.

We are also taking action to manage future spending pressures in a fiscally responsible way. The government is prepared to act when necessary to counter the serious fiscal effects that may come from legal challenges to government programs. For example, while the government will continue to implement equal pay for work of equal value, it will not make any further retroactive payments for the period prior to November 1, 1990.

All these measures respond to a clear message from Canadians: difficult times are no excuse for governments to live beyond the taxpayers' means. It has not been business as usual for thousands of Canadian taxpayers, farmers, fishermen, business people, workers and families. It cannot be business as usual for any government that truly cares.

Working together for recovery

The economic recovery began with great promise in the second quarter of 1991, but subsequently weakened as conditions deteriorated in the economies of our major trading partners, particularly the United States.

Real output in the fourth quarter of 1991 was flat or may have declined. Available evidence suggests this weakness has carried over into early 1992.

Times are difficult. There are serious economic problems to solve. But there is no substitute for sound policies. That is the realistic perspective in which this budget was developed.

Neither I, the Prime Minister nor any other member of this government is going to tell Canadians that one budget can meet all our economic challenges.

But in times like this it is too easy to lose perspective, to allow pessimism to feed on itself, and to lose sight of the improving outlook for renewed growth.

We need to look beyond the gloom and give optimism a chance. I'm not talking about blue-sky, hope-for-the-best optimism. I'm talking about down-to-earth optimism based on a realistic assessment both of the proven character of Canada's people and of the improving prospects for our economy.

Time and again, Canadians have demonstrated their ability to overcome adversity, to adapt to change, and to succeed in maintaining this country as one of the best in the world.

We have done this by listening to each other, believing in each other, working with each other, and seeing things through. Many things have changed in Canada. But from listening to Canadians, I believe more than ever in the fundamental strength of our people and our ability to meet our economic challenges.

There are good reasons to look forward to an early resumption of solid economic growth. Some negative factors will soon turn positive.

The United States and other countries we export to are working to revitalize their economies. We will soon begin to benefit as they return to solid growth.

The impact of the measures in this budget should strengthen business and consumer confidence. Once confidence starts moving in the right direction it will reinforce itself as spending and investment decisions further strengthen economic activity.

But as the economy turns upward it will be powered by much more than this reversal of negative factors.

Strengthening the fundamentals

Our economy is poised for a sustained recovery on its own fundamental merits, a recovery that draws on the strength of a dramatic improvement in interest rates, inflation and production costs.

Inflation has come down dramatically over the past year. It is now running at an annualized rate of less than 2 per cent, its lowest level since the early 1970s. Inflation in Canada is about one percentage point lower than U.S. inflation.

Wage settlements also show how inflationary pressures have eased. For the last quarter of 1991, public sector settlements averaged 2.4 per cent, down from an average of 6.4 per cent in the first quarter of last year. Private sector settlements have fallen to 3.3 per cent, down from a first-quarter increase of 5.1 per cent.

Progress in reducing inflation and wage pressures has made it possible to ease monetary conditions. Interest rates have dropped sharply, down by about seven percentage points since the spring of 1990.

The one-year mortgage rate is now the lowest it has ever been. A family taking out a $75,000 mortgage today would save more than $300 a month in carrying costs compared to the spring of 1990.

The emerging new Canadian economy

In assessing Canada's economic prospects it is impossible to overstate the importance of this dramatic turnaround in the cost of living and doing business in Canada. This will have an increasingly positive effect on all families and all enterprises in Canada.

As an indication of just how much things have changed, consider these facts:

For a senior citizen on a fixed pension, inflation at 9 per cent —the average rate from 1974 to 1984—cuts that income in half in just eight years. At 2 per cent, it would take about 35 years.

For a worker, a wage increase of 2 to 3 per cent today provides more real purchasing power than an increase of 11 per cent 10 years ago. In fact, 11 per cent in 1982 was a real wage decrease because the rate of inflation was even higher than 11 per cent.

The benefits of low inflation are clear:

Higher inflation undermines our standard of living.

Lower inflation helps to raise living standards.

It restores confidence in the value of money.

It helps to protect people on fixed incomes.

It improves our cost competitiveness in the global economy.

It improves the climate for the long-term investment that will further expand the productive, job-creating capacity of our economy.

It paves the way for longer-term home mortgages at affordable fixed rates.

Just a reminder. Ten years ago today, in February 1982, the interest rate on a 5-year mortgage was 19 and a half per cent. Today it is 9 and three-quarters per cent.

As a more competitive and productive Canadian economy emerges, we will hear more and more about Canadians developing their skills and realizing their potential, Canadians innovating and investing in a more productive economy, Canadians achieving the excellence that consumers around the world are demanding in the goods and services they buy.

In support of excellence we will hear more and more about Canadian business, labour and government combining their talents, putting outdated adversarial relationships behind them in their own best interests.

Canadians know that this new economy won't just emerge by itself, just as lower inflation, lower interest rates and lower wage settlements didn't just happen. We made progress against inflation because clear inflation objectives were set, leadership in wage restraint was demonstrated and Canadians responded to the challenge.

Working together, Canadians will build our new, more successful economy by continuing to face up to fundamental economic challenges in a realistic and determined way.

Strong framework for growth

Step by step since 1984, the government has implemented a comprehensive program of economic renewal. We have carried out a wide range of fundamental reforms to improve the framework of government policies affecting the efficiency and the productivity of the economy.

Whether in the area of trade, training, tax reform, science and technology, privatization or deregulation, the approach underlying our reforms has been consistent and clear: the real source of growth, wealth creation and jobs is the initiative of people in the private sector. Governments must create a positive environment to allow this initiative to flourish.

The Canadian economy will soon respond to the positive conditions now in place for recovery.

Earlier this month, the Conference Board of Canada forecast that growth in Canada would be the highest among the G-7 countries this year. This view is also shared by the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development and the International Monetary Fund.

We expect growth to pick up in the second quarter, averaging 2.7 per cent for the year as a whole and rising to 4.5 per cent for 1993. The recovery will be led by a strong increase in residential construction and consumer spending in response to lower interest rates.

Continuing progress toward price stability will allow for further easing in interest rates. The 90-day commercial paper rate is projected to average 6.9 per cent this year and 6.5 per cent in 1993.

More than 500,000 jobs will be created before the end of next year, with employment increasing by 3 per cent in 1993. However, strong growth in the labour force will keep the unemployment rate this year at about current levels. It will decline to 9.5 per cent by the end of next year.

From 1994 to 1997, we expect growth to average 4.4 per cent. Inflation will be in line with our inflation targets. More than one million jobs will be created and the unemployment rate will decline to 7 per cent.

There is good reason to be optimistic, but we must also be realistic. The world economy is changing. Barriers to the movement of goods, services, capital and information are coming down. Industry all around the world is restructuring to take advantage of new opportunities. In the process, the Canadian workplace is being transformed.

These events have repeatedly driven home the same message: no country, no government, no corporation and no worker is immune from the competitive forces that are reshaping the economic world.

Canadians will have to work together to build a more prosperous future. That's why the government launched its prosperity initiative last year as a broadly based consultation process. Our goal is to develop a national action plan to strengthen Canada's ability to adapt, to compete and to prosper.

At the recent First Ministers' meeting, many governments stressed the important contribution that adequate infrastructure makes to our competitive position. The Government of Canada agrees this is important. We are, for example, working with the private sector to develop airport infrastructure. And we are actively pursuing the building of a fixed link from the mainland to Prince Edward Island with private sector financing. We are prepared to work with the provinces to explore ways in which the national highway system might be upgraded in a fiscally responsible manner.

In the same spirit the government will work closely with the provinces to strengthen the framework that our economic union provides for future growth and job creation. Among our key objectives will be action to reduce interprovincial trade barriers, to cut overlap and duplication among government programs, to better harmonize our tax systems, and to co-ordinate our approaches to budgetary policies.

The provinces will be setting their own budgets in the near future. It is important that they pull in the same direction as this budget: toward better fiscal balance, lower deficits, greater spending restraint and control of the tax burden. There is only one taxpayer, and the taxpayer deserves a break.

Action for recovery and sustained growth

This budget builds on the foundation we have put in place.

Action to bolster recovery

We will help bolster the recovery by providing a welcome break for Canadian taxpayers and home buyers. The equation is simple: we are reducing spending in order to cut taxes.

Reducing the personal income surtax

Personal income taxes will be cut. The personal income surtax will drop from 5 per cent of basic tax to 4 per cent on July 1, 1992 and to 3 per cent on January 1, 1993.

This will increase Canadians' after-tax income by $500 million in 1992-93, and more than $1.2 billion per year thereafter. All 14.6 million taxpayers will benefit.

The Home Buyers' Plan

We will introduce the Home Buyers' Plan to allow Canadians to use existing funds in their registered retirement savings plans (RRSPs) to buy or build a principal residence. Individuals may withdraw up to $20,000 tax-free for this purpose and repay the amount over 15 years. This measure takes effect immediately and will apply until March 1, 1993.

Action for investment, initiative and jobs

We are taking a number of actions to encourage initiative and productive investment. These measures will assist Canadian industry to create jobs.

Manufacturing and processing

The manufacturing and processing sector is vital to Canada's economy. It accounts for almost one-fifth of Canada's economy and its jobs. It operates in international markets, with over 40 per cent of its output exported, and is highly exposed to international competition. This sector has been particularly hard hit as manufacturers in Canada and other countries have been forced to restructure their operations.

To help the Canadian manufacturing and processing sector meet the challenges of globalization:

The manufacturing and processing tax rate will be reduced from 23 per cent to 22 per cent, effective January 1, 1993, with a further reduction to 21 per cent on January 1, 1994.

The capital cost allowance rate will be increased for manufacturing and processing machinery from 25 to 30 per cent, effective for acquisitions made after today.

New activity in all sectors will be encouraged by reducing the withholding tax rate on direct dividends to 5 per cent. The government is prepared, in tax treaty negotiations, to begin reducing the rate on January 1, 1993. This will help Canada compete for international direct investment. It is particularly important now as international businesses restructure their world-wide operations.

A number of other measures in this budget will assist in financing the growth of Canada's economy and in preserving and creating jobs.

Research and development

The government recognizes the importance of research and development. Canada's system of tax incentives to support research and development is already one of the most generous in the world.

This budget commits an additional $230 million over the next five years to improve these incentives by making them more easily accessible to users.

Lifetime capital gains exemption

Currently, taxpayers can receive tax-free capital gains up to a lifetime limit of $100,000. This limit will not be changed. However, the lifetime capital gains exemption will be targeted toward more productive investments.

Capital gains accrued on real estate after February 1992 will no longer qualify for this exemption. Gains accrued prior to March 1992 will continue to qualify. This restriction does not apply to real estate used in an active business. Nor does it affect the $500,000 exemption for small business and qualified farm property.

Principal residences will continue to be fully exempt from tax on capital gains.

Small business

Small businesses are key to the healthy growth of Canada's economy. The federal tax treatment of small businesses is among the most favourable in the world. In these difficult times, however, many small businesses are experiencing serious cash-flow problems.

In response, the government is announcing two measures to help small business:

The Small Business Financing Program will help small businesses in financial difficulty, including farmers, to obtain loans at lower interest rates.

In addition, the ceiling for loans to individual small businesses under the Small Business Loans Act will be doubled from $100,000 to $200,000.

Venture capital

Venture capital makes an important contribution to innovation, wealth creation and job creation. The government provides tax assistance to encourage venture capital investments.

In May 1985 this government provided initial support to the creation of Labour Sponsored Venture Capital Funds. These funds are growing in importance and should prove to be a useful source of venture capital.

This budget will make it easier to establish such funds and will provide further tax assistance to them.

Ethanol and methanol fuels

This budget provides important measures regarding ethanol and methanol fuels. The government will encourage the development and use of ethanol and methanol fuels made from renewable feedstocks. Such fuels offer important environmental benefits, including low levels of carbon monoxide and carbon dioxide emissions.

Effective April 1, 1992, we will eliminate the excise tax on the ethanol and methanol portions of blended fuels that are mainly gasoline.

A social dividend

Building a healthy economy is good social policy and good social policy helps to build a healthy economy.

Spending restraint and progress toward fiscal balance will allow the government to increase assistance to Canadian families, consistent with the values and expectations of Canadians. This social dividend is financed by spending cuts in many areas, including savings in defence in response to the changing world order.

Enriching benefits for families with children

In May 1990, on behalf of the Government of Canada, the Prime Minister signed the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. This Convention, which aims to protect the rights of children around the world, was one of the main agenda items at the World Summit for Children which the Prime Minister co-chaired later that year. On December 11, 1991, the Prime Minister announced that Canada has formally ratified the Convention.

My colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, has been consulting Canadians on how best to meet the needs of children in Canada. As part of a package of measures he is developing to strengthen support for children, he has recommended a major reform of the existing system of child benefits.

Under the current system $4.5 billion in financial assistance is provided to families with children through the family allowance and the tax system. This has evolved over the years into a patchwork of measures which is neither well-targeted nor easily understood.

Under the proposals outlined by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, child benefits will be completely restructured and substantially enriched.

There will be one monthly child benefit. Unlike the family allowance, it will not be subject to tax. Children under the age of 18 will be eligible.

The new benefit will include a new earned-income supplement of up to $500 per year for low-income working families with children.

The benefit will be as much as $144 per month for one child, for a total of $1,733 per year. Benefits will be targeted toward lower- and middle-income families.

The new system will increase total federal child benefits by $400 million per year.

The single monthly payment will make the system simpler and more responsive to family needs.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare is releasing a White Paper that outlines details of this important proposal. The package that he has developed reflects this government's commitment to the family and to the well-being of children, a commitment vital to the Canadian way of life.

This budget proposes two further measures affecting the taxation of families effective for the 1993 income tax year.

The maximum child care expense deduction will be increased by $1,000—to $5,000 for each child under age seven and to $3,000 for other eligible children. This will benefit 600,000 taxpayers, 75 per cent of whom are women in the work force.

In addition, common-law couples will be treated the same as married couples under the tax system. This will ensure consistent tax treatment of different types of families—a key element in improving the fairness of the tax system. Existing tax disadvantages to the traditional family unit will be eliminated.

Assisting Canadians with disabilities

Over the past several years, and in many of our budgets, this government has dramatically improved assistance for Canadians with disabilities. This past September, the Prime Minister announced a $158 million Strategy for the Integration of Persons With Disabilities. This budget builds on this record of action.

We will expand the definition of expenses eligible for the medical expenses tax credit. We will also broaden the range of expenses eligible for the tax deduction, introduced in the 1991 budget, for modifications by businesses to buildings and devices to assist Canadians with disabilities.

We will make the education tax credit available to disabled individuals who attend a post-secondary educational institution on a part-time basis.

We will recognize disability pensions under the Canada Pension Plan and Quebec Pension Plan as earned income for purposes of contributions to registered retirement savings plans.

More than 400,000 disabled persons currently benefit from assistance through the tax system. These changes reflect a constructive process of ongoing consultations with representatives of Canadians with disabilities. These consultations will continue and will focus, in particular, on how to alleviate work disincentives for persons with disabilities.

Increasing the education credit

The budget provides additional tax relief to students.

The amount on which the education credit is calculated will be increased by one-third from $60 to $80 per month of full-time study.

The limit on the total amount of tuition fee and education credits which may be transferred to another taxpayer will be raised from $600 to $680.

These measures will assist all full-time post-secondary students.

In addition, my colleague, the Secretary of State, will be negotiating new arrangements for student loans with financial institutions. The expected savings will provide scope to improve the Canada Student Loans Program and to eliminate the 3-per-cent administration fee on student loans.

Retirement planning and savings

This budget provides greater flexibility in retirement planning by extending the payout period for registered retirement income funds over the lifetime of the holder.

We will also delay by one year the phase-in of higher contribution limits for registered pension plans and RRSPs.

Streamlining government and improving service

To streamline government, we will eliminate, consolidate, defer or privatize a total of 46 government agencies, boards, commissions, corporations and advisory bodies.

Among the agencies that we will eliminate are the following:

the Petroleum Monitoring Agency

the Pay Research Bureau

the Law Reform Commission

the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security

the Economic Council of Canada

the Science Council of Canada, and the Demographic Review Secretariat.

We will consolidate the operations of several other agencies, to save overhead and focus resources. For example:

the Patent Appeal Board, the Trade Mark Opposition Board and the Copyright Board will be merged into a new Intellectual Property Tribunal;

the offices of the Privacy and Information Commissioners will be merged;

the mandate of the Canada Council will be expanded to include the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and international cultural programs now run by the Department of External Affairs.

As well, 13 advisory councils will be terminated.

As a result of these actions, there will be 160 fewer government appointments and 500 fewer employees. Savings will amount to $22 million per year on an ongoing basis.

The government will continue to privatize Crown corporations and will take a more aggressive approach to the disposal of assets. We will sell our interest in the Co-operative Energy Corporation. We will examine, on a priority basis, the feasibility of privatizing the Royal Canadian Mint, the Cape Breton Development Corporation and the Blainville Motor Vehicle Test Centre.

We will sell surplus lands at Downsview, Pickering and elsewhere in Canada. And we will sell properties abroad that are no longer needed—including properties in Paris, Bordeaux and Washington.

Improving service to Canadians

Canada benefits from one of the most highly regarded, professional and competent public services in the world. For some time now, as part of Public Service 2000, the government has been encouraging a process of revitalization and modernization —to ensure that Canadians continue to be well served by their federal public service.

An important part of this process is to free up the creativity and entrepreneurial spirit of public servants—to cut away the red tape and allow them to do their job of serving the public better. Consistent with this approach, this budget proposes a number of measures to allow public servants to better serve the public.

Federal departments and agencies offering related services to individuals and businesses will take all reasonable steps to bring their services together in one place.

Procedures for dealing with the federal government will be simplified. Currently, businesses may need up to six different registration numbers in their dealings with the federal government. We will move toward a single registration number. We will make greater use of simplified tax forms. We will develop standards of service to promote more accessible hours of service and faster response times.

We will implement a department-by-department review of existing regulations, beginning with Agriculture Canada, Transport Canada and Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Existing regulations that should be kept will have to be publicly rejustified. The government will ask the Standing Committee on Finance to assist in this process and report by September 30, 1992.

These actions are part of an ongoing process to streamline government organization and improve service to the public. The government will welcome suggestions for further action from any member of the House or from any Canadian who is watching.

Sustaining progress in the medium term

The measures in this budget will improve the economic and social well-being of Canadians. They are being implemented within a responsible and prudent fiscal plan. Reallocation to meet new priorities will not compromise deficit reduction.

Over the next five years, program spending will grow on average by only 3 per cent per year. Our spending will be within the limits of the proposed Spending Control Act.

The deficit will fall to $27.5 billion in the upcoming fiscal year, decline further to $22.5 billion in 1993-94 and decline continually thereafter.

Financial requirements will be eliminated in 1995-96. We will then begin to reduce our outstanding debt in the financial markets for the first time since 1969-70.

As we continue to make progress on the deficit and the debt, we will achieve a crucial objective for Canada: to increase our capacity to cut taxes further and make strategic investments in the economic and social development of our country and its people.

Our progress in restoring this flexibility will be measured by the steady reduction in the share of each tax dollar that will be required to pay for interest on the public debt. From more than 35 cents in 1990-91, it will drop to about 30 cents in 1992-93. By mid-decade it will fall further to about 25 cents.

For all Canadians that has to be welcome news. This is a burden that has been sapping Canada's financial capacity to provide the services required from a strong central government. The reversal of this trend that I refer to today is one of fundamental importance to Canada's fiscal integrity and economic well-being.

I am tabling the budget documents including Notices of Ways and Means Motions. Details of the measures are included in the documents.

Pursuant to an order of this House, I will introduce today a bill seeking borrowing authority for the 1992-93 fiscal year.

I am asking that an order of the day be designated for consideration of those motions.

Conclusion

This budget is about listening to Canadians and responding to their views with leadership and action.

But it is not just about the initiatives that I have announced to take effect tonight and in the months ahead. This is about charting a course for the future.

It is a challenging, complex and far from certain future, but a future that is full of opportunity for Canada.

To meet the test of that future, our job as Canadians is to harness our skills, our knowledge, our initiative, our resources and our strength through partnership and co-operation.

In the consultations leading to the budget, I was inspired by the realism of Canadians and their willingness to contribute to the building of a stronger, more productive economy.

There are many different ways that we can contribute—as many ways as there are Canadians.

In the budget last year, the government introduced the Debt Servicing and Reduction Account. This Account receives the revenues from the GST and the proceeds of privatization of Crown corporations, and ensures that the money will not be used to fund new spending initiatives, but will be used to pay the servicing costs of the debt and eventually to pay down the debt. The fund has one other source of revenues —contributions from Canadians. During the first 10 months of the current fiscal year no less than $375,000 has come to the fund in this way. As Minister of Finance, I want to express my gratitude for these contributions to Canada.

At the same time I would be remiss if I did not extend a sincere invitation to others who may wish to support the fight against the nation's debt in a similar way.

There is another kind of contribution to Canada that I hope all Canadians will make in the coming months. It is to reach a little deeper into the reservoir of tolerance and co-operation upon which this country has been built, and to work together to preserve and renew the unity of our country. In this way we will remove the single greatest obstacle to our future prosperity.

By working together on all our national challenges we can ensure that we will do what our parents did, and theirs before them: to build for their children an even better Canada than they inherited.

To meet this challenge we must renew our pride as Canadians: pride in producing goods and services that can compete with the best in the world, pride in being citizens of a country which is the envy of the rest of the world.

• (1730)

I am confident from listening to Canadians that we are ready to face this challenge and to win and, by winning, provide a more prosperous, more promising and more secure future for all Canadians.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. minister have unanimous consent to introduce the bill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1992-93

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-61, an act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year commencing on April 1, 1992.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Mazankowski moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, there is only one true test, only one real measure of this budget that counts for anything, and that is what this budget does for those 1.5 million Canadians without jobs and what it does to help our economy get moving again with strong and meaningful growth. By that measure this budget is nothing more than an abject failure.

[Translation]

In light of this test, this budget is a total failure.

[English]

It is a failure because instead of a strong reduction in unemployment this year, and even after taking into account what the minister claims are measures to help Canadian families and businesses, this country will still have an unemployment rate of 10.5 per cent and an unemployment rate of about the same level next year. There is nothing in this budget to bring about the strong growth this country desperately needs.

[Translation]

There is nothing in this budget to create a really strong economic recovery for this country.

[English]

The Minister of Finance does not admit this failure. He does not mention it in his budget speech but it is there, it is set out, hidden in the budget papers. Look at page 41. Here are the government's own words and I quote:

> Taken together, annual growth this year and next still remains well below the 4.7 per cent average of growth in the 1983 and 1984 recovery period.

Also the Minister of Finance has the nerve, il a le toupet, to stand up in this House to boast about a tax cut for individual Canadians. There is no cut in the basic personal income tax rates. Instead it is a small cut, not the elimination of a special surtax imposed on all Canadians by this government since it took office.

Let us see what this supposedly generous Minister of Finance and government has done for Canadians. Let us look at the chart on page 135 of the budget papers. For a one-earner couple with two children earning an average income of $40,000, the minister is giving them a surtax cut of $27, after raising their taxes by more than $1,000 since 1984. For a one-earner couple with two children, earning $20,000 a year, he gives them a cut of $6.

Guess what Mr. Generosity, the Minister of Finance, is giving to a family earning $15,000. It is $2 a year—$2 from two-buck Maz. No wonder I say that even this Minister of Finance is not going to be able to sell Canadians a used budget like this one.

In other words, for the poorest of the poor in this country, the Minister of Finance is giving a tax cut of 50 cents this year for each member of a family of four with an income of only $20,000. You cannot say the Minister of Finance does not give a damn for poor Canadians. At least he is giving them 50 cents a year for each member of a family of four.

This budget has no heart, no hope for Canadians without jobs il n'y a aucun espoir dans ce budget pour les Canadiens sans emploi. It is clear this budget is an abject and abysmal failure because it simply does not do what it has to do. It does not get Canada working again. That is why I move:

That the debate be now adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: Accordingly, pursuant to Standing Order 83(2), the motion is deemed adopted. Consequently this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m.

The House adjourned at 5.37 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, February 26, 1992

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

FISHERIES

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, on Monday the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans announced a 35 per cent reduced northern cod quota.

There were general statements on foreign overfishing, seal problems and compensation, with no specifics, no firm action, only vague promises, repeating the past.

Time is running out. There are variable factors that can be controlled in this complex issue but I believe the minister has either missed the boat or he is failing to close the barn door before the horse bolts.

In the House of Commons, he denies supporting unilateral action by Canada to control the nose and tail of the banks. In St. John's for the Newfoundland media, he is hawkish on resorting to this serious but reasonable and essential measure.

We are still awaiting specifics on the seal cull. Yesterday there was a perfect window of opportunity in the budget to lay out concrete compensation plans, but it was sadly missed.

I ask the minister and this government to come clean once and for all and let Canadians know that this government has the political will to move on these all-important issues to salvage the Atlantic fisheries.

MACEDONIA

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, a great number of my constituents are of Greek origin and are deeply concerned by the developments in the Balkans.

It is very disturbing for all Canadians of Greek origin to witness any attempt to rob them of their cultural heritage. I would like to assure them that, as any schoolboy knows, Macedonia is an integral part of Greek culture and civilization and the Canadian government is more than aware of their sensitivity and concern.

I am glad that next Saturday, February 29, thousands of Canadians of Greek origin will demonstrate in Ottawa in order to make the government and their fellow Canadians aware of their feelings regarding this issue.

I urge all Canadians to come to the Hill next Saturday to support that peaceful demonstration.

RURAL CANADA

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, to those of us from farm constituencies, yesterday's budget seems to ignore the continuing plight of farm families. Bankruptcies remain high. The accumulated farm debt remains at record levels. The price of grain remains inadequate. Economic confidence remains depressed and the GATT talks have not been concluded.

Yesterday's budget speech should have acknowledged that the farm community may require substantial assistance during the coming year and therefore given farmers confidence in their own future before they plant their crops this year.

Farmers do not want to have to come to Ottawa, hat in hand, after the harvest is complete. This budget should have acknowledged the continuing uncertainties in agriculture and expressed the government's intention to cover this year's shortfalls if they occur. Otherwise we are left to conclude this will be another difficult year for farm families dealing with a difficult and apparently uncaring government. Rural Canada deserves better.

OLYMPIC GAMES

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of all New Brunswickers, I want to congratulate Mark Lackie for his silver medal performance in the 5,000 metre speed skating relay at the XVI Winter Olympics in Albertville, France.

Mark was the only member of the Canadian team from New Brunswick and the only New Brunswicker ever to win a silver medal at a Winter Olympics.

His remarkable achievement makes us all proud to be Canadians and proud to be New Brunswickers.

Congratulations Mark, and best of luck in your future skating competitions.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, the government on a number of occasions, for example the Speech from the Throne and through its ministers, has made a number of important statements about education. What has been its action?

There will be another $250 million reduction in transfer payments this year alone. What effect will this have? It will have a negative effect on the amount and quality of education, the amount and quality of training and retraining and the amount and quality of research and development.

The government is beginning to privatize student aid. It is supposedly going to remove the 3 per cent administrative fee on student aid but it will fold it into the interest rate and the students will end up paying more. Combined with the elimination of the six-month interest free period for needy students upon graduation, the government is just adding to the growing debt of students in Canada. The merging of Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council with the Canada Council and the decision to close the Science Council of Canada and the Economic Council of Canada makes it abundantly clear that this government has lost its bearing.

[Translation]

There is nothing in it for students.

NATIONAIR

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Laval-Est): Mr. Speaker, employees of Nationair have been locked out since November 19, 1991. Many of my constituents work there. Nationair accounted for 51 per cent of Mirabel's traffic and the whole economy of Mirabel goes through Laval. Since this lockout began, the union has forced employees to boycott Nationair. The strikers use wrong-headed tactics like intimidating travellers and raising doubts about safety and equipment to reach their goal. Even elected NDP members are used to apply pressure.

In short, the unions are using defenceless employees to destroy a national company. I think that this union is being controlled by some people in Toronto who have no interest in reaching a settlement and particularly by the Quebec Federation of Labour, which seems to own 25 per cent of Air Transat, a competitor of Nationair. Unfortunately in this whole affair it is the employees who pay, and they are turning the other employees against them.

I wish to assure these employees of my support and I demand that the union stop filling its pockets at the workers' expense.

STATUS OF WOMEN

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, yesterday's budget cuts put a roadblock on the highway to the advancement of women in Canada. The government has served notice that it will not make pay equity retroactive payments prior to November 1990, thus paying only lip service to women's equality in the work force.

The government has also threatened the spousal allowance, decreeing that should the cases currently before the courts result in substantial settlements of money, the program could be cancelled. The majority of low income seniors benefiting from this allowance are women. Thus, again, the government states that challenges to potentially discriminatory legislation will result in cancellation.

Finally, the government today announced that a national child care program is a dead issue. Canadian women who are in need of suitable affordable child care cannot find it and the increase in child care deductions will not create the needed spaces. Once again the government has backed down on its promise.

Does the minister responsible for health and welfare really consider it, and I quote: "a privilege to have killed child care in Canada"?

THE BUDGET

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, northern Ontarians were very pleased to hear of the initiatives undertaken in last evening's budget to help us through the recession: reductions in the manufacturing and processing tax rates; a 2 per cent cut in personal income tax; a home buyers' plan that allows the use of RRSPs up to $20,000; increased venture capital funds and the ceiling for loans to small businesses doubled by $200,000.

As the finance minister said yesterday, we hope that the provinces take notice of how we are able to cut the deficit by cutting government spending, not by raising taxes. We hope the money we have given to the taxpayers will not end up with the provincial tax man. We need money in the economy, not in provincial coffers.

If I could send one message to Queen's Park, it would be a plea from the taxpayer. Northern Ontarians are saying to you, Pink Floyd, no more taxes.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, the federal government knows that we are living through the worst recession in 30 years. The federal government also knows that the Canadian economy is handicapped by chronic structural weaknesses such as dependence on raw materials, uncompetitive industries, an overvalued dollar hindering exports and unacceptable backwardness in science and technology and research and development.

I expected the government to take serious action in the budget. What did the government do? At one stroke it abolished the Economic Council and the Science Council of Canada.

I wonder whether the government is serious when it talks about economic recovery.

NATIONAL DEBT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, in 1984–85 the Liberal national debt was $206 billion. Compound interest on the Liberal debt from 1984–85 to date is $239 billion. The federal Liberal leader calls for openness, integrity and elections.

On behalf of Canadian taxpayers, I ask him to tell us how the Liberal government acted openly and with integrity in leaving us this $445 billion debt.

The Liberal member for LaSalle—Émard will be in Val-d'Or next week. I hope that he will talk about this Liberal national debt, which is the theft of the century.

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, Canadians were looking to this government to boost consumer confidence and so revive consumer spending. The survival of many retailers is dependent on the government's actions. The jobs of many Canadians are on the line.

The December sale figures came out this week. They showed a 10 per cent decline over last December in retail sales. It is obvious that this government has no plan to put 1.5 million unemployed Canadians back to work. There is no capital works program, little investment in research and development, even less in the way of training initiatives to deal with the restructuring.

This government's lack of action to boost consumer confidence indicates that it has lost the will to lead this country. The government could have acted; it did not.

Canadian retailers and workers are going to continue to suffer due to this government's neglect.

PETROCHEMICAL INDUSTRY

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, for a number of months I have worked with local industry and the Sarnia–Lambton Chamber of Commerce to point out that aspects of our current federal–provincial tax regime had to be changed to make it more attractive for new investment in the petrochemical and refining sector.

The case was made to the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology. They listened, and action was taken in yesterday's budget. The 1992 federal budget has taken the lead to address this after-tax problem. Provisions for our local petrochemical refining base include a reduction in the manufacturing and processing tax rate and an increase in the capital cost allowance rate for M&P machinery.

I am pleased that our government has taken the first step to make Sarnia—Lambton a more attractive place for new builds in the petrochemical and refining sector. We can now look to the Government of Ontario to follow our lead and introduce initiatives that complement these federal measures. The last thing that Sarnia—Lambton needs is the province to move into the tax room which the federal government has now vacated.

HOUSING

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, last December the federal minister responsible for housing announced rather grandly: "The federal co-operative housing program, which helps to house low and moderate income households, will continue in 1992". That lasted until yesterday. That program was cancelled by the Minister of Finance.

That means that over 4,000 housing units for those who are in need will be cancelled. That means that we will lose 4,000 jobs building those units now and perhaps another 10,000 later. That means municipalities and provincial governments will lose in this calendar year $46 million for each 1,000 units that have been cancelled.

That is a sad message. That means that the half million people in this country who are on waiting lists for socially assisted housing will get nothing. That means that that group of over 40 activists from the province of Quebec who have camped out on the ice below Parliament Hill waiting for some good news from this government got a cold blast of winter wind this morning and nothing else.

CAPE BRETON

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the Mulroney government has once again targeted Cape Breton Island in its budget with the announcement that it is going to privatize the Cape Breton Development Corporation and dismantle Enterprise Cape Breton. The government is abandoning the coal miners of Cape Breton, their families and the small business community.

At the present time we have areas in Cape Breton with an unemployment rate upward of 50 per cent. The Cape Breton economy is desperate and yet, instead of putting programs in place to stimulate job creation and get people off UIC and welfare and back to work, the federal government wants to pull out of Cape Breton, leaving 3,000 jobs in limbo.

The national Liberal caucus during the ACOA debates of 1987–88 predicted the privatization of Devco and now we see that the groundwork has all been laid out. This government has abandoned the region of eastern Nova Scotia, the same way it has abandoned the farmers, the fishermen and the auto workers. This government is ignoring its responsibility to this region of the country and is deliberately making things worse for the people of Cape Breton and, indeed, all of Atlantic Canada.

THE BUDGET

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, the finance minister's budget brought down in the House last night is evidence that this government does listen. The budget demonstrates that it has heard Canadians say: "No more taxes, leaner and more efficient government, less regulation and, most important, no new spending".

This government has also listened to backbenchers like myself. Since the fall of 1990, I have been drawing to the attention of caucus the numerous beautiful but very costly government publications. I must say I was delighted to hear the finance minister say that this is a thing of the past. From now on government publications will be subject to a no frills publishing policy.

By reducing communications budgets we will save $75 million a year. This good news I know will be well received in my riding of Simcoe Centre.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

THE BUDGET

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, these are the worst economic times we have experienced in 50 years. We have been in a recession for 24 months, but there was nothing in yesterday's budget to kick-start the economy. The government, however, wants Canadians to believe it has cut taxes.

We can see the minister's tax reductions on page 135 of the budget. A family of four with an income of $15,000 will enjoy a staggering tax reduction of $2 per year, while a family of four with an annual income of $20,000 will enjoy an equally staggering tax reduction of $6 per year less than two cents a day. Why does the minister not recognize where his responsibilities lie and do something to get this country moving again?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is inaccurate when he says that this is the worst economic times in 50 years. He was a senior member of the government that presided over one of the worst recessions in our history, namely 1981–82. This budget is about economic recovery. This budget is about creating jobs. It is about creating confidence and improving our competitiveness and creating a positive economic environment for investment.

• (1420)

If the hon. member has been listening, he will know that organizations like the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, the Business Council on National Issues have all indicated that these are the right steps at the right time to improve the investment climate, to preserve jobs and to create new job opportunities for Canadians in the future.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the budget of yesterday marked the beginning of the end of universality. The government has broken its promise. Universality is no longer a sacred trust.

I want to ask the minister if he is also going to end the universality of medicare. Will he subscribe to the plank of Preston Manning? I want to tell him that beds in hospitals in Canada are for sick people, not only for people who have money. We will fight if this government wants to kill medicare in Canada as it did with the family allowance yesterday.

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, first, I must say I am very proud of what the government did for Canada's children yesterday.

[English]

Second, I am going to be very up front with the Leader of the Opposition about what he said. I do not know what he means about universality because the Liberal Party does not always have the same position. If I understand, universality means that I cannot take money from a man or a woman who earns $250,000 to give to children who are in a position where they need to be helped. I do not want that universality.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Some day we will have a good debate about what that means. In Canada we treat all citizens the same. For those who make money, we tax it back.

What the minister is trying to do today will leave the impression in Canada that not everybody is treated the same way. The second step will be that he will be moving on medicare. I was in the United States last week. Everyone there envies our universal, free medicare for all citizens, and we want to keep it that way in Canada.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I do not know why the Leader of the Opposition is talking about medicare. Nothing in the budget will change medicare.

What medicare does is respond to the needs of Canadians in terms of health. That is exactly what we do. As usual, the Leader of the Opposition is talking about universality and talking about keeping all the cheques.

I would like to quote his colleague, the premier of New Brunswick, Mr. McKenna: "The time has come when the premier of New Brunswick should be prepared to give up his family allowance cheque so that his next door neighbour who is poor will receive twice as much money". Is that your opinion, Mr. Leader of the Opposition?

An hon. member: No, no.

An hon. member: Any other questions?

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): I am delighted to hear that you are following the Liberal leader in New Brunswick. It is not going to be very long before you are going to be following the federal Liberal leader in this House.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The government's economic policies during the past seven years can be summarized as follows: no training programs, cuts in research and development, and no adjustment measures for workers who lose their jobs. The budget does absolutely nothing to correct this situation. Anti-inflationary policies alone are not enough.

How can the government reconcile this hands-off policy with the need for a thorough restructuring of the Canadian economy?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had listened to the budget and, more important, read the budget, he would recognize that there are a lot of measures in there that will improve the competitiveness and will improve the confidence of the manufacturing and processing sector, a sector that has been the hardest hit during this recession and during the industrial restructuring that is going on.

There are a number of measures incorporated in the budget, from the improvement of capital cost allowance to lower income tax, to improved research and development, to new venture capital, to measures for small business. All of these things are going to have a very positive effect and it now puts Canada in a competitive position to attract investment, not only to upgrade and to modernize, but to create new manufacturing and processing activities.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

This budget is tokenism and the time for tokenism is over. What the minister is saying is that we can meet the European, the Asian and the American challenge to our industrial base, to literally hundreds of devastated Canadian communities, with a budget that simply confirms the economic lunacy of the last seven years.

Retraining, lip service, R and D, a drop in the bucket, adjustment measures, nothing. My question is: Who in heaven's name do you think you are kidding?

Mr. Speaker: I would ask hon. members, in spite of their enthusiasm, to not address their questions directly to the minister. They should come through the Chair.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, you are right. The way these people answer questions, I should have put them to you not through you.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Yesterday's budget abandoned pay equity for women, abandoned universality and abandoned the unemployed in this country. A budget that starts out by accepting 1.5 million unemployed in this country and offering nothing to them is a failure right from the beginning.

Unemployment costs this country $30 billion a year and today we learned that UI payments alone went up by 34 per cent this year.

The Minister of Finance had choices. Why did he make the choice to retain the $1 billion business lunch deduction for those who have money and not take that $1 billion and put it into job creation to get Canadians working again?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I know the New Democratic Party is a party that is anti-business and I know that it would like to have scrapped the capital gains tax as well.

I have to remind the hon. member that we believe that the capital gains exemption and benefits to the business community are appropriate measures to encourage investment in business. The capital gains tax, which the hon. member is adamantly opposed to, is a measure that encourages investment and encourages risk-taking. This party and this government are going to continue to support those measures.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Clearly this government was not prepared to make choices in terms of creating jobs, but preferred to make a choice to keep the tax loopholes there for the rich.

[Translation]

The main tax relief contained in the Budget will give six times as much money to people who earn $100,000 as it does to people who earn only $30,000. Why introduce a tax measure that will only make the rich richer? Is that fair and equitable?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would read the budget, she would learn that some 500,000 new jobs will be created by the end of this year. In the period 1984-88, they laughed when we said we would create 1 million new jobs and we created 1.5 million, and we will do it again. We will do it the proper way, not by adding to the burden of taxation and the burden of the deficit.

• (1430)

In this budget we cut spending, we cut taxes, and we cut the deficit. We are going to create a positive environment for investment and for job creation not only for today but indeed in the future.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise one of the promises the government has made on several occasions. The minister today is making another promise to the unemployed. What the unemployed would like is for the minister to do something and get some jobs going in this country.

Today the Minister of National Health and Welfare is quoted as saying: "I have the privilege on day care as I had with many other issues like VIA Rail to be the killer".

My question is for the Prime Minister. His party made an election promise of a national child care program. There was nothing in the budget to say that the national child care program was gone. Will the Prime Minister stand today in this House and tell Canadian people that his promise of a national child care program is dead?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would like first to apologize for two words I used this morning.

Sometimes when I use English as a second language I can make a mistake and I did. Of course the word "privilege" in French can mean that it is an obligation. It is in that respect that I used it. On the word "killer", of course I never killed anybody and I would not kill anything either. That is what I meant when I used those words.

Second, in terms of day care or child care we had a choice as a government. I had the choice myself of dealing with the day care issue on one side or trying to deal with the major problem of child poverty which has been raised by the hon. member and many other members in the House.

This is in the action plan that we will unfold later in the month dealing with all the problems of children in society who face abuse, violence and so on.

Canadians have told me, when I talk about that, that instead of continuing the question of day care or child care, they would prefer in light of the resources we have if we deal with the question of children at risk and poverty, as the Minister of Finance mentioned yesterday, and this is what I will do.

I am not saying that child care is not important. It is one of the important issues for children, but first we have to look at all children who face abuse, violence, sexual abuse and so on, and help poor children as we said we would yesterday.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the minister's explanation rings a little hollow.

In the same interview he went on to say that the polls showed people were more concerned about children living in poverty and children whose mental and physical health is threatened by family violence and sexual abuse.

I would like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare, whose mandate it is to defend all children, why he would create a situation where he is pitting abused and hungry children against children who legitimately need safe child care across this country? Why is he pitting child against child?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have to make a choice, because in our society, children are faced with situations like that.

Of course children need day care, but as the hon. member said herself, there are children who are exposed to sexual abuse and family violence. A two and a half year old child was killed the other night in Montreal, for no reason at all.

When a minister of health has choices to make, Canadians want him to have the courage to make them. I believe my cabinet colleagues fully support my contention, and I would hope the hon. member and all members of this House do so as well, that we must find ways, as soon as possible, to help children who are suffering in Canada for no good reason at all.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, listening to the polls does not take any courage.

I may refer the minister, who went on at lenght about what he wanted to do for children, to page 92 of his cabinet colleague's budget. If his government is doing so much for children, why will it to cut $1.5 billion in equalization payments next year, the very payments which affect the health and education of our children? Why is it making those cuts and why is it not defending its policy?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, equalization payments to the provinces have grown by 60 per cent since this government came into office, from $5.4 billion in 1984–85 to $8.5 billion in 1992–93, and it will grow to $9.2 billion in 1993–94.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

This Conservative government introduced the surtax in 1986 and raised it twice following that. All told it has raised taxes 33 times. How can this Minister of Finance look Canadians in the eye and tell them that they are better off in 1992 and that he is saving them with a $2 tax break? It is absolutely insulting.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, one of the reasons we have had to increase taxes is to pay for the burden of debt inherited from our Liberal predecessors. Prior to 1984, prior to our taking office, the Liberal government of that day was spending $1.33 for every dollar's worth of revenue it was taking in. That could not be sustained. That had to be changed.

We had to start paying down the deficit. We had to start reducing the deficit and we had to start dealing with the burden of debt. That is exactly what we have been doing.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, this government is not intent on saving Canadians. At 11 per cent in the polls it is merely trying to save itself. Canadians are still taxed to death and no amount of sleight of hand or rhetoric can change that fact.

Why has the minister not made some meaningful and realistic changes that would help Canadians make ends meet?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member that Canadians are overtaxed. We are doing everything in our power to reduce taxes. We are reducing government spending. We are reducing taxes and we are reducing the deficit.

For the information of the hon. member, with the impact of the child benefit package and the impact of the reduction in the surtax in 1993, a single parent with two children making $50,000 a year will have a benefit of $394; a two-earner family with two children will have a benefit of $240; and a single earner family with two children will have a saving of $280. I think that is very important. That will help provide clothing and put food on the table.

CHILD CARE

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Over and over again this government mouths platitudes about the equality of women and its commitment to the equality of women. The minister knows full well that child care is the vehicle that would allow poor families to break out of the poverty cycle and enter the paid work force. He has lots of data on that. Yet the minister said he had made his choices; he had choices, he said, and he chose to be the killer of child care.

My question for the minister is this: After promising in 1984, after promising in 1988 a national child care program, and after promising as little as a year ago a national child care program, why is the government breaking its commitment to the families of Canada, to the women of Canada, to the children of Canada? Abused children, battered children need child care just as all Canadian children do.

• (1440)

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): First, Mr. Speaker, the member should say, because she knows it, that the government has put more than $1 billion a year into the child care system in Canada.

Second, she knows, because I am sure she read the budget, that we have increased the child care deduction by $4,000 to $5,000 for all children from zero and seven. We have increased it by $2,000 to $3,000 for all children from seven to fourteen.

I believe it is a good move. I am sure that she agrees, because she is talking about abuse and violence, with the efforts we are trying to make to give those children the chance to be better nurtured, to be better helped, to be better nourished. I believe and I hope that she agrees with that.

In other words, we deal with child care with the capacity we have to do that, but we also have to deal with the children who face day after day the reality of life. I challenge my friend to say that she disagrees with that kind of policy.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, the minister can challenge me all he likes. He is wrong.

This government talks about spending a billion dollars on child care. It also loses a billion dollars every year on the business entertainment expense allowance, which even allows for the deduction of escort services at the expense of the children of this country.

This is the end of a universal social program, the child benefit that the minister is talking about. Today the minister has killed child care. What is next? The old age pension or medicare?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, today we have made a choice and I expressed the choice to my friend. What she has to understand first is that the social policies are there to respond to the needs of Canadians. It is for this reason we have the social policies that are in place today and announced yesterday in the budget.

The health care policies answered a question of Canadians about health care. We do that and it will not change. We do exactly the same thing with senior citizens.

Today we have decided that to answer the problems of children we should use the money that we give to the rich but, my God, the NDP has asked me not to reallocate money for those who earn $250,000. What a miracle.

I want to give to poor families to care for their children. I hope that the saviours of the world will help me to do that.

THE BUDGET

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I would like to get back to the Minister of Finance. In his budget the minister totally and completely abdicated responsibility to the unemployed.

Can the minister explain why he and his government have turned their back on the 1.5 million unemployed Canadians and the 2.5 Canadians on welfare? Can he explain to those people why he has relegated them to the trash heap?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, nobody has been relegated to the trash heap. We have created a climate of confidence, an improved climate of investment.

When we assumed office the hon. member's party left us with an unemployment rate of close to 12 per cent. It was not a crisis then.

I know that unemployment is too high. We are putting in place the fundamentals. Interest rates are down.

Inflation and the cost of doing business are down. We are improving the investment climate to help the restructuring process and to ensure that the companies engaged in manufacturing and processing will invest in Canada, will improve their facilities, and will make new investments that will create new jobs. That is why we are so confident that 500,000 new jobs will be created this year and a million jobs over the next four years.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, a lot of consolation that is to the unemployed Canadian today. This government has the moral responsibility to put those Canadians back to work. The minister says he is going to create half a million new jobs, yet he admits that the unemployment rate will remain as high as it is.

The government's only answer to the unemployed in this country is tough luck. The minister promised a realistic budget and unemployed Canadians are asking today what exactly is this minister's definition of reality. Is he so far out of touch with reality that he has totally ignored the pain and the suffering out there? Does he not realize that people are hurting? Why? I would like to ask the minister why he has not given some hope to the unemployed in Canada.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to the hon. member, this budget does give hope.

One only has to listen to the spokesmen for the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Business Council on National Issues, and the Canadian Federation of Independent Business.

They have indicated that with the fundamentals in place, with low inflation and with low interest rates, what we have to do is create a positive climate for investment so that new investment will take place to modernize, to upgrade, to encourage new investment, and to create new job opportunities, particularly in the processing and manufacturing sectors.

We have outlined five specific initiatives: the increase of the capital cost allowance; lower tax rates; improvements in venture capital; improvements in R and D; and reductions to withholding tax.

All of these are seen as positive moves which will create a climate of confidence and a ray of hope for those who are working today and those who are unemployed.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Yesterday the minister told Canadian women that Canada cannot afford to pay them as much as men. The minister said yesterday that regardless of the Human Rights Commission's decision, the government has no intention of paying a fair salary to 70,000 women who have struggled for eight years for a basic right. Why this discrimination? Why are women the victims of this government's unfair and ill-conceived policies?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, at the risk of sounding immodest, I would like to tell the hon. member that this government is very proud of what it has done for pay equity in Canada. In any event, I believe that this government is the first national government in Canada to do so, long before the Liberals and the provincial governments, and even all other governments in the world, if I am not mistaken. Not one of them acted as we did, giving pay equity as we did.

I will remind the hon. member that in recent years we gave nearly $500 million in catch-up payments and that we pay out $80 million a year for that.

The decision we made in the budget was to do what the provinces do and not be liable to pay for the past, for the Liberal regime. We are assuming our responsibilities for the future and that is what we are prepared to do. We believe in pay equity and that is what we will do for the future.

[English]

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. The minister knows perfectly well that he is cheating Canadian women out of $1 billion.

Equality does not begin and end when this government says it does. During the last election the Prime Minister said the money was in the bank for pay equity.

I ask today: Why is the government budgeting now to pay its debt to Wall Street but wiping out its debt to women?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, after the most extensive study ever conducted in Canada on pay equity, we came to a proposal which was put to us to pay $370 million. We paid it and we consider that we have settled this account for the past.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the Public Service. Canadians are concerned about reports that government workers are being mistreated by union leaders.

It has been reported that some abusive and self-serving union leaders continue to condone harassment of Public Service employees because of their political beliefs.

Will the minister assure this House and all Canadians that this government will not tolerate harassment of Public Service workers by union bullies?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I am aware that many Canadians have found profoundly disturbing activities alluded to by the hon. member that have been reported in the media.

However, our capacity to act is very limited because section 8(1) of the Public Service Staff Relations Act prohibits us from interfering.

• (1450)

However, I am glad to tell the hon. member that there is at least one union local that has claimed that the alliance has committed an unfair labour practice and is challenging the right of the Public Service Alliance of Canada to impose these kinds of actions. We will be following that very carefully.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

My community of Windsor has 21.5 per cent unemployed as we stand here in this House of Commons today. The same tragic, senseless human waste is there right across this country.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance why it is that his budget has paid so little attention to the plight of these 1.5 million jobless across this country and at the same time has left unfair and unacceptable tax loopholes still in place?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is tragic that the unemployment levels in the hon. member's area are as high as they are. I regret that very much.

Obviously, his area is a manufacturing and processing sector and we have undertaken a number of initiatives which will indeed strengthen the manufacturing and processing sector, not only strengthen the viability, but indeed encourage the investment opportunities in that particular area.

The hon. member knows very well that capital these days is very mobile in a globalized economy. What Canada has to do is ensure that it has an appropriate environment and a competitive environment to allow that expansion and that new investment to take place.

I ask the hon. member again to reread that section dealing with the manufacturing and processing sector. I am sure he will find that there are a lot of positive elements in there. It has generated a great deal of positive response from that particular community and for that I am very grateful.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): In fact, Mr. Speaker, I read those sections very carefully because they represent yet another new tax loophole to the manufacturing sector in this country, an increase in the capital cost allowance, which nobody has ever indicated increases investment any place in the world.

I want to ask this minister point blank: Why has this minister left in place in our tax system a situation that permits corporations to pay for the cost of escort services for their clients and write it off against the taxpayers all across this country?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have heard it all. I do not know where the hon. member has been. In the pre-budget consultations I travelled right across this country. At every meeting that I attended there was a request for an improvement in the capital cost allowance.

If the hon. member does not believe that I will bring him lots of evidence to prove it.

[Translation]

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Finance announced that tax incentives for research and development would be improved.

Does this mean that federal tax credits will be harmonized with Quebec's so that Quebec businesses will no longer be penalized for their research and development efforts, as requested by the Quebec minister of finance at the last first ministers' conference?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, what we propose to do is to improve the administration of the research and development incentives with industry and to provide further funding for that purpose.

There have been some difficulties in the administration of that. We will be sitting down with industry officials to try to work out the difficulties and the obstacles that have been in place so that the industry can truly take advantage of the R and D incentives that were provided for in previous budgets and indeed in this budget.

[Translation]

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance knows perfectly well that by obliging Quebec businesses to subtract the R and D tax credits they receive from the Quebec government from their deductions when calculating federal tax credits, the federal government is actually taxing 39 per cent of the tax credits granted by Quebec to its research and development sector. That is what the finance minister wanted to know. Is the federal government prepared to stop requiring businesses to deduct what they receive from Quebec when they ask for federal deductions, as is the case in Ontario?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, there are several key initiatives in this budget that will improve the manufacturing and processing sector and particularly the opportunities to use research and development incentives.

I am pleased to note the provincial minister of finance for the province of Quebec, Mr. Levesque, has expressed a very great deal of satisfaction with the budget. It would seem to me he likes the direction and the thrust of the budget.

I should remind the hon. member that several other provinces are very much supportive of the initiative we have taken in this budget. I hope the hon. member will support it as well.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The government's plan to privatize the Canada Student Loans Program is a slap in the face of Canadian students. Many will be seriously hurt and their chances of obtaining an education will be seriously damaged.

Why does the minister feel it is necessary to hide behind the bankers? Why is he getting the bankers to do his dirty work? Why does the minister not put an end to this masquerade and give students the support they need?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there are several initiatives in this budget that will help the students in terms of the student loans program.

My colleague, the Secretary of State, will be undertaking negotiations with the bank to improve the administration of that, with a view to removing the 3 per cent administration fee. I am sure the hon. member will be pleased with that.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, essentially the minister is saying: "Don't call us as a government; call your banker if you want an education".

We have a serious problem in this country. We have 400,000 young Canadians on the unemployment rolls of this country. That is a problem we cannot sweep under the carpet. That is what the government is trying to do with this budget. There is nothing here for young people. They have been condemned to chronic unemployment and the government refuses to act.

When will the minister and his colleagues wake up to the fact that no plans for youth means no plans for the future?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): There are several initiatives in this budget that will indeed help the youth in their education. I refer him to the budget. There are a number of initiatives with respect to the education credit.

If the hon. member has any other specific suggestions, I would be very pleased to receive them.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Yesterday's budget on the one hand provided access to home ownership for Canadians with savings, with which we agree. On the other hand, the government has abandoned its commitment to affordable social housing. This budget cuts funds for affordable housing by 50 per cent in three years and is eliminating some 12,000 affordable units in the next two years.

Why has this government relegated over one million Canadians, including 500,000 children living in inadequate shelter, into permanent poverty with no hope of ever being able to own a home and with no hope of ever finding adequate shelter?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I thought my colleague opposite would be congratulating the Minister of Finance and this government for some of the excellent things they did for housing.

Instead, it gives me an opportunity to point out to him and to reassure people who are dependent on social housing that we are really increasing the amount of money spent on social housing this year by $70 million. There is $2 billion spent approximately each year on social housing, which comes to $10 billion over the next five years.

This government has no apologies to make in that regard. The hon. member knows there are many other programs that are more targeted and more appropriate to those in core need than the co-op program, although this was in many ways an excellent program.

• (1500)

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, with a single stroke of a pen this government has terminated the co-op housing program, to which the minister just referred, a fully targeted program which has provided lower and middle income groups secure and affordable housing for 20 years. Currently 164,000 Canadians are on the waiting list for co-ops. Their hopes of ever getting adequate and affordable shelter have been crushed by this government.

Last December this minister promised the co-op housing people $6 million for their co-op housing. Yesterday, he completely cancelled the program.

I ask this minister, and this finance minister, will they reinstitute this program that has served Canadians so well in the past 20 years?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, no, we will not at this time. There are other programs that are more directly appropriate for people who are in core need, as the hon. member knows.

He should remember, as well, that when it comes to social housing, this government has consistently spent more money each year on social housing and we are continuing to do so. I remind him that the last time his party was in office in 1983-84, $1.2 billion was spent on social housing. We have spent $100 million plus each year since that time and our commitment continues.

SCIENCE COUNCIL OF CANADA

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The Science Council has been killed under orders from the Prime Minister's Office. It cannot be because of costs, because it costs so little. Can it be, I ask through you, Mr. Speaker, that the Science Council would look at the so-called prosperity agenda which promised more training, more education, more technology, more research and development, and identify it for what it is, a crock and a scam?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. In point of fact, as my hon. friend might perhaps know, the Science Council has, of course, done very good work. In the last number of years pursuant to consultations with universities, think-tanks, the private sector and various provincial governments, a new organization, the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology, has been created. Yes, indeed, independent. It is that board which has assumed more and more of the responsibilities which previously in some areas had been assumed by the Science Council. It was felt by the government that while all of these agencies clearly had a certain value that this was the appropriate—

Mr. McCurdy: They were just too critical.

Mr. Mulroney: My friend says they were just too critical of us. They were not critical at all. They were supporting the policies of the government. They thought that the government had taken the proper move in creating the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology which created, for example, the Centres of Excellence, some hundreds of millions of dollars that have been distributed into universities across Canada.

An hon. member: Scholarships.

Mr. Mulroney: The Canada Scholarships Program which provides for 10,000 new scholarships in science and technology to be given to Canadian students across Canada. One of the conditions is that 50 per cent of all of those scholarships must be held by women.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance is quoted in the media today as calling Ottawa a fat city. This is a gross insult to the people of Ottawa. It is a gross insult to any city.

Yesterday the budget eliminated over 20 agencies that presently employ hundreds of people. I want to ask the minister if he conducted any studies that justify the closure of these agencies and if not, will he put an immediate stop to this harsh and unfair insult to the taxpayers of this region?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I never referred to Ottawa as fat city. If the hon. member has the quote, I would like to see it, because I cannot recall ever making it. I would certainly like to see it.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to the members' attention the presence in the gallery of the Hon. Karl Erik Olsson, Minister of Agriculture from Sweden.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

PRIVILEGE

LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE H

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I rise today on a question of privilege.

On February 18 the members of Legislative Committee H apparently voted to adjourn consideration of Bill C-203, an act to amend the Criminal Code concerning terminally ill persons sine die.

This extremely unusual procedure has effectively meant that the bill is dead and will not be brought back to the House of Commons. This action on the part of the legislative committee has breached the privileges of the House of Commons and of individual members. It constitutes contempt of the House.

In addition to setting a dangerous precedent, it also flies in the face of repeated commitments to the empowerment of members. Under the Standing Orders of the House, bills that receive second reading are referred to a legislative committee for study and consideration.

It is important to appreciate the purpose and significance of this stage in the legislative proceedings. The sixth edition of Beauchesne's describes legislative committees as follows, in citation 759(3):

> Legislative committees are appointed by the House to consider specific bills and amendments thereto.

It also sets out the function of a legislative committee in citation 798:

> The function of a legislative committee is to consider the bill for which it was created, and to report the bill with or without amendment to the House.

This point is also made in the fifth edition at citation 763:

> The function of a committee on a bill is to go through the text of the bill clause by clause and, if necessary, word by word, with a view to making such amendments in it as may seem likely to render it more generally acceptable.

The fifth edition also states in citation 764(1):

> A committee is bound by the decision of the House, given on second reading, in favour of the bill, and should not, therefore, amend the bill in a manner destructive of this principle.

It goes on in citation 764(2):

> The committee may so change the provisions of the bill that when it is reported to the House it is in substance a bill other than that which was referred. A committee may negative every clause and substitute new clauses, if relevant to the bill as read a second time.

It is also provided in citation 754:

> (1) Every public bill, when it is read a second time, is referred to a committee before any amendments are made to it.
> (2) To 'commit' a bill means to refer it to a committee, where it is to be considered and reported.

It should be noted that citation 885 of the fifth edition states:

> (1) It is the duty of every committee to report to the House a bill that has been committed to them and not, through long adjournments, to withhold from the House the result of their proceedings.
> (2) If a committee does not report back a bill, the House should take cognizance of the matter.

Although these statements are made in the context of private bills, it is submitted that they are equally applicable to any bills, public or private.

The authority for this statement is page 614 of Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure and Practice, fourth edition, where the principles are set forth generally:

> "It is the duty of every committee to report to the House the bill that has been committed to them," says the best English authority, "and not by long adjournments, or by an informal discontinuance of their sittings to withhold from the House the result of their proceedings. If any attempt of this nature be made to defeat a bill, the House will interfere to prevent it."

The fundamental point is that a bill having received second reading has been approved in principle by the House. The purpose of referring it to a committee is to iron out the details. That is why in the words of Standing Order 113(5), legislative committees are given a power "to send for officials—whom the committee deems to be competent to appear as witnesses on technical matters" and so forth.

The committee has to consider the bill, but it also has a duty. It has a duty to report back the bill. It cannot ignore the bill or do nothing. The committee is required to report back to the House. It can make amendments. It can even change the bill significantly, but it must return the bill to the House. This is clear from the wording of Standing Order 113(5).

• (1510)

> Any legislative committee shall be empowered to examine and enquire into the bills referred to it by the House, to report the same with or without amendments—

This is consistent with parliamentary practice as far back as Bourinot, whose fourth edition 1916 sets out the principle clearly at pages 520–521:

> Every committee on a public bill is bound to report thereon. The house alone has power to prevent its passage or to order its withdrawal.

The 21st edition of Erskine May at page 654 is to a similar effect:

> A select committee to which a bill has been committed has no power to put an end to the bill—

Applying those general principles to the present case, the members of Legislative Committee H decided to adjourn consideration of Bill C–203 sine die. I understand that this means it cannot be brought back for consideration, either by the chairman or by the members of the committee. To all intents and purposes, this means that the committee has chosen not to report the bill back to the House. The members of the House who supported this motion have thus prevented the House of Commons from further considering a bill that was approved in principle by the same House.

This is far worse than if they had reported the bill back with amendments, even if these had significantly changed the bill. At least in that case, the members of the House could have proposed amendments at report stage and the bill could have been considered and disposed of by the House itself.

Legislative committees are supposed to assist the House, not to substitute their own judgment for that of the House. The actions of the legislative committee have prevented the House from voting on the bill; either approving it or voting it down. The subject matter of Bill C–203 is very difficult, both morally and legally, but it is unconscionable that a committee has taken away the right of the House to decide that matter.

This is a violation of all tradition and it flies in the face of the role and function of legislative committees. But it is also particularly important to remember that Bill C-203 is a private member's bill. Much has been said lately about empowering individual members of Parliament. One of the ways this can be done is through Private Members' Business.

Since the McGrath committee's report, various procedural changes have been made to enhance the opportunities and chances of success for private members' bills. It has been said that private members' bills belong to all members and to the House: all members have an interest in their progress through the various legislative stages. Unlike a government measure, which the government can control and bring forward as and when it wishes, private members' bills that are votable are guaranteed an opportunity to be debated. This right is hollow, however, if the bill gets stuck in a committee so that the House never has a chance to consider it again.

I would like to quote another citation from Erskine May's 21st edition, page 600.

> For a committee to endeavour to dispose of a bill which has been committed to it by adjourning sine die, or to some distant day, would be inconsistent with the duty imposed on the committee by the order of the House committing the bill to the committee. Nor can a committee relieve itself from the obligation of considering the bills allotted to it and reporting them to the House by adjourning further proceedings on a particular bill sine die—

For all these reasons, I would submit that Legislative Committee H is in contempt of the House of Commons, and accordingly my privileges as a member and the privileges of this House have been breached.

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, since this is my particular private members' bill, not only have the privileges of all members been breached by the committee not returning the bill to the House to have it considered by the entire House, but it certainly breaches mine as the author of the private members' bill.

In the spirit of the reforms of 1978-79 and 1984, the members are breaching the intent of the House of Commons, that in fact the public should have access to the House of Commons through private members and through the private members' process. This will in fact bring members' bills through to a final vote in the House of Commons.

I too would like to quote on page 600 of the 21st edition of Erskine May which states:

> For a committee to endeavour to dispose of a bill which has been committed to it by adjourning sine die, or to some distant day, would be inconsistent with the duty imposed on the committee by the order of the House committing the bill to the committee. Nor can a committee relieve itself from the obligation of considering the bills allotted to it and reporting them to the House by adjourning further proceedings on a particular bill sine die, or to some distant day—

Further, page 607 of Erskine May states that:

> It is the duty of a standing committee, as of all committees, to give the matters referred to it due and sufficient consideration. The chairman of a standing committee will not therefore normally accept motions in pursuance of which the committee would conclude its deliberations before it has gone through the bill committed to it.

This bill passed unanimously through the House of Commons. There was not one dissenting vote against it and that seldom happens in itself. Surely the House has the right to have the bill considered and returned.

I know you have no knowledge of committees as such, but this particular committee in fact heard 25 submissions from groups across Canada, and they did not even have an opportunity to discuss it. They did not even start the discussion let alone go through the bill clause by clause, or go through amendments—excellent amendments—suggested by many of those who appeared before the committee.

This is a cost of thousands of dollars to us in the House of Commons and to the taxpayers of Canada. We make a farce of our whole process and of the whole presence of private members in this House of Commons when the whole of our country is calling for a concern that private members' votes should be put in a non-partisan way. Issues of controversy like this should in fact be put for private members to vote according to their conscience.

That kind of reform is called for and it seems a shame that some members do not understand this. I know the chairman did not do this through any direct intention. Perhaps he did not recognize his responsibilities to you and the House of Commons according to the traditions of the House of Commons as outlined by myself today.

So I would urge you to consider this matter. Then perhaps a motion could be presented to have the matter considered forthwith that the committee should report back to you according to the intention of this House of Commons.

The Speaker has ruled on many occasions that it is not competent for the Speaker to exercise procedural control over the committees. Committees are and must remain masters of their own procedure.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I was present at the committee at the time in question. I just want to very briefly bring two things to the attention of the Speaker.

One, of course, is that the Erskine May precedent or rule that has been brought to your attention is superseded by our own traditions here in Canada as demonstrated in citation 492, page 354 of Beauchesne's fourth edition. It explains quite clearly that the sine die rule has been utilized here in Canada in the past.

Nevertheless, and probably more fundamentally, the ruling in question by the chairman at that particular time was not contested in any way, shape or form, to my knowledge, when it was handed down by the chair of the committee.

That is all I have to say at this time, except to indicate that I and several other members of the committee did not receive any prior notification that this item was going to be raised today.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take much time on this either, and I apologize to members opposite. I want to clearly indicate to them I had no warning of this coming up myself on a day that is dedicated to the budget debate. So I want to be very quick.

My first point is that I think the argument has already been made regarding Erskine May and whether or not that applies in this situation. I do not believe it does. I believe it has been superseded by our own Standing Orders and by our own practices.

Second, you cannot put a question to a committee that you cannot answer. For example to make my point, here in committee of the whole the chairman always says "Shall I rise and report the bill?" Now, if the House were to say no, obviously they could not rise and report the bill.

• (1520)

We are in precisely the same circumstances here. I think the committee did act within its mandate. Citation 760 of Beauchesne's sixth edition, subsection (3) states:

I do not want to take any more time of the House. I think the argument is very clear.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, to identify myself in this debate, I am the chairman of this legislative committee. I say I am the chairman because to my knowledge the committee has not formally been disbanded.

I take notice of the remarks of the hon. member who spoke earlier from the other side of the House. I would point out to the Chair, in making his judgment, it is not my intent here to take sides one way or the other. I simply give this information to the Chair and to all members for their consideration.

I believe the duty of the Chair is to prepare himself or herself for all possible contingencies. To that end, I asked the Clerk of the House to research what my responsibilities would be as the chairman in the event that certain scenarios unfolded.

As it turned out, I was informed that one of the motions made was perfectly acceptable in terms of the rules of the committees and of the House and I therefore proceeded on that basis.

The chairman of a legislative committee is always in the hands of the members of the committee. If there was an action on my part which was improper then I beg the Chair to make a ruling to that effect so that we can proceed as it would be directed by the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: I do not need to hear further argument. I am sorry, the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to prolong the discussion, but I do want to acknowledge the fact that the hon. member for Edmonton—Strathcona, who has raised this issue, is a dedicated member of the Private Members' Business and raises a very critical issue.

In light of the fact that we want to get on with the budget debate, would it be possible to request to you, Mr. Speaker, that we set aside the consideration of this issue for another moment in order to hear further interventions. Most of us did not know this was coming today. It is a very serious issue and I would hate to think we would seek a ruling on this without further input.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I am going to rule on it now. I am fully aware of the implications of this particular situation. Some hon. members have said they had no knowledge this was coming before the House. I hope all hon. members realize that when I receive a question of privilege, that is the privilege of the member applying until the member has risen. I know there was no suggestion the Chair should have communicated with members, but I hope all hon. members will know it would have been quite improper for the Chair to do so.

I compliment the hon. member for Edmonton—Strathcona on his argument and I compliment him on how concise it was. It was brief and to the point. I have listened with great care to the hon. member for Fraser Valley West who of course has a very strong personal interest in this particular matter.

The first thing I have to look at, and the hon. parliamentary secretary mentioned it, is that it is not for the Chair to get involved in matters within a committee unless there is something so egregious and so outrageous that it transcends the normal bounds and amounts to a contempt of the House or, in some extraordinary way, a breach of the privilege of an hon. member and this does not.

First of all, does it affect any hon. members' capacity to carry on their duties as members of the House of Commons? The answer to that is no. All members can carry on their duties as members of the House of Commons. The second thing is whether there is some other procedural approach that might be taken to deal with this matter in front of the whole House, as my hon. friend from Kamloops has suggested. Yes, there is. A motion can be put down.

I go back very briefly to a citation which the hon. member for Edmonton—Strathcona cited. I think I have the exact words: "The House should take cognizance of the matter".

That is really where we are. If the House wishes to take cognizance of this, if the House wishes to exercise its authority, then of course it may do so. But in my view, it would not be correct or proper at the present time for the Speaker to intervene.

POINT OF ORDER

REPORT OF THE BEAUDOIN-DOBBIE COMMITTEE

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a point of order because I have just been informed that Friday at noon, the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee will table its report and hold a press conference or something like that. I have also been informed that starting at 9.30 a.m., journalists will have access to copies of the report before it is actually tabled in the House.

I know that most of my colleagues have had the privilege and the opportunity to be briefed on most of what the report contains within their own caucuses. Members of the bloc, the members of the Reform Party of Canada and the independents did not enjoy the same privilege. Perhaps it would be appropriate to follow our usual practice, as the Minister of Finance did for his budget yesterday, which is to allow the critics to be briefed or at least let them have as much information as the members of the press.

Mr. Speaker, I know you are here to maintain the good order of this House. Perhaps you could ask the parliamentary secretary to check into this, but I would appreciate it if we could follow our usual practice, since unlike other caucuses, we did not have a chance to be briefed. I think the real battle will be about substance, not procedure.

Mrs. Venne: The whole thing is insulting.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the problems of the hon. member and a number of other members, but the decision to have a lockup is made by the committee, not by the government. Since it is not a decision of this House, it is not up to me to intervene. I am sorry about the situation this has created for the hon. member, but I have no solution.

The hon. member, very briefly.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, in that case I would like to reserve the right to raise a question of privilege. Meanwhile you said it was a decision by the committee, but we all know that decisions are often made by the majority on the committee. I wonder whether members of the press now have more privileges than members of this House. That is my question.

[English]

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raises a concern that has some interest and some legitimacy.

May I suggest that he raise it with the co-chairs of the committee and see if they cannot do something to accommodate him.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I believe that in the weeks to come our country will be entering a very important phase, and the point raised by the hon. member is certainly a valid one.

I think the parliamentary secretary just made a very intelligent suggestion. First, to submit to the joint chairmen what the hon. member just said, bearing in mind that the Chair said it has no responsibility in that respect. Certainly the fact that two or three of us are rising in the House shows how important it is to proceed in an orderly fashion.

To me it seems incredible that some people should get this information in advance, if we agree that Parliament is supreme and all parliamentarians, irrespective of the opinions of the various political parties, are equal. As far as I am concerned, I would appreciate it very much if what we are saying now were carefully considered by the government, by the chairmen, the joint chairmen. I hope the hon. member's suggestion will meet with the approval of those who are listening or who should be listening to us at this time.

• (1530)

I agree it is not up to the Chair to dictate certain guidelines in this respect, but I wish to thank you for allowing us to add our own comments and letting us go on at some length so that the message will be heard.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to several petitions.

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATIONS

ASIA PACIFIC PARLIAMENTARIANS FORUM FOR EDUCATIONAL, CULTURAL AND ECONOMIC CO-OPERATION

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34, I have the honour to present to the House the report on the Asia Pacific Parliamentarians Forum for Educational, Cultural and Economic Co-Operation held in Canberra, Australia, on December 10 and December 11, 1991.

This is a very important conference that is attempting to keep the wider Pacific basin an open option in keeping with APEC and PECC work over the past years. This is an attempt to unite the parliaments of the Pacific with common understandings, particularly as they relate to the tremendous opportunities for growth of trade.

The United States, our major trading partner, is losing precedence to our Asian partners: Japan, Korea, China, Taiwan. The entire region is a region that is of extremely increasing importance to the Parliament of Canada. Therefore, this interparliamentary organization needs to find new precedence among our parliamentary organizations.

Along with the member for Saint-Denis, having observed this first hand, we feel very strongly that his report, which will follow, and this report must be taken very seriously.

Canada must join this organization and be an active part or we will be excluded as we have been excluded from the European Economic Community.

The timing is very important. This is a very significant report. We urge you to study it carefully.

HEADS OF DELEGATIONS MEETING OF THE PARLIAMENTARY ASSEMBLY OF THE CONFERENCE ON SECURITY AND CO-OPERATION IN EUROPE

Hon. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34, I have the honour to present to the House the report of the Heads of Delegations Meeting of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Conference on Security and Co-Operation in Europe on January 13, 1992 in Madrid, Spain.

I will not read a précis of the report, under the circumstances, knowing that the hon. Leader of the Opposition is waiting to make his speech.

PETITIONS

ARROW AIRLINES CRASH

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour and duty to present petitions on behalf of many residents of Canada who are petitioning regarding the tragic crash of the Arrow Air DC-8 at Gander, Newfoundland on December 12, 1985.

The petitioners state that the Canadian government's accident investigation into the tragic crash did not establish the cause and whereas no proper public inquiry—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows that it is not appropriate to get into a debate. What the House wants to hear is what is the petition, what is the prayer. I am sure the hon. member can finish that off shortly.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, because of the seriousness of this petition I am reading it verbatim.

Mr. Speaker: The petition may be read verbatim, but I think the hon. member, whether he is reading the preamble or not, is getting into argument.

The difficulty in this case is that because we cannot hear any other member on the presentation of a petition, I am asked by all hon. members to be fairly strict about limiting the amount of debate that goes with it. What the hon. member ought to do—and I would think that the petition would show this—is let the House know what it is that the petitioners are asking for. We do have to limit debate. After all, all petitions of course could be considered serious matters.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, the families of the victims desperately want to learn the complete circumstances of the deaths of 256 loved ones, and Canada has yet to fulfil its international obligations to investigate fully the worst aircraft crash in Canadian history.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to urge the government to appoint a royal commission to ascertain, evaluate and report on the investigation of the Gander crash with particular attention to deliberate or inadvertent attempts that may have been made to obscure the circumstances.

I would like to draw to the attention of this House that I received a similar petition signed by citizens of the United States and by many of the parents of the soldiers who were killed in this crash. I cannot present their petition in this House because they are not Canadian citizens.

Therefore, I did send their petitions directly to the Prime Minister. Hopefully, with the Prime Minister's intervention and that of the Minister of Transport, the government will see fit to appoint a royal commission to find out once and for all the cause of this crash. Was there any cover-up or not?

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, Question No. 158 will be answered today.

[Text]

Question No. 158—Mr. Rideout:

> With respect to the recapture and trial of Allan Légère, (a) what were the total costs of the (i) manhunt (ii) trial (b) what proportions of these costs were paid by the federal and provincial governments (c) what was the cost of the RCMP DNA testing?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am informed by the Department of Justice and the Ministry of the Solicitor General of Canada as follows:

The Department of Justice was not involved in the Allan Légère trial since it involved the provincial responsibilities on administration of justice. All questions concerning the costs of the trial would have to be directed to the provincial authorities in New Brunswick.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police

(a) (i) It is difficult to calculate the total cost of the manhunt. The RCMP was investigating a number of murders and other serious crimes in the Miramichi, and other areas, in which Allan Légère was one suspect. Certain costs, such as costs for overtime and travel, were collected which were directly attributable to the escape and the recapture of Allan Légère. These costs totalled $110,000. Not included in this figure are costs associated with unsolved crimes, sightings of Allan Légère and subsequent investigations and the salary costs of investigators.

(ii) The trial costs have been identified as being approximately $314,000. This represents the cost of six (6) Provincial Police Positions for courtroom security and escort duties, and the costs associated with the DNA analysis. No other trial costs were captured.

(b) Both the costs of the manhunt and the trial, as identified above, will be divided between the federal and provincial governments, with 30 per cent of the costs charged to the former and 70 per cent to the latter. The costs of the DNA analysis will be charged 100 per cent to the federal government.

(c) The cost of the RCMP DNA testing was $63,000. This includes the human resource expense as well as travel.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The question as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary has been answered.

Mr. Cooper: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to be so kind as to call Notice of Motion for the Production of Papers P–1, in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all correspondence, briefs and reports relating to the visit of government officials in January 1991 to Europe to discuss Canada's treatment of native peoples.

Mr. Cooper: This notice of motion is acceptable to the government and the documents are tabled immediately.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Cooper: I ask that the other Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Tuesday, February 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the budget presented last night is a budget of illusion. It substitutes smoke and mirrors and the appearance of activity for the action that is needed to help the Canadian economy and millions of Canadians battered and bruised by the policies of this government to get up off the ground and back on their feet.

For example, in this budget the minister holds out the promise of a tax cut to Canadians reeling under the effects of the 33 separate tax increases imposed on them by this government since it took office in 1984, including the impact of the GST.

When the smoke clears away, when the government stops moving the shells around and Canadians look underneath, what do they see? For Canadians earning below the poverty line a salary of $15,000 a year for themselves and their families including two children, what does this minister offer? A tax cut of $2 this year. If we look at an average family earning $40,000 a year, what does this minister offer it by way of a tax cut? $27 a year.

If we look at the table in the government's own Budget Papers, guess who gets the biggest tax cut of all this year of $111? It is a family earning $100,000 a year. It is not surprising because this is typical of Tory tax reform.

Also, if we look at the minister's table, strangely enough the single taxpayer gets a bigger cut than an entire family. That is real "Mazanomics", to use a word I saw in some of the press coverage.

• (1540)

Looking at this $2 cut for a family below the poverty line, no wonder I have called the Minister of Finance "Mr. Generosity" and "Two Buck" or better still "Two Loonie Maz".

The government talks of its proposed new child benefits program, but let us look at this proposed program after the smoke of the budget speech clears away. What do we see? The average family gains very little from this proposal. In fact a family with an annual income of $40,000 will receive an added annual benefit of only $44. In three years the value of the benefit will decrease by 10 per cent and within a decade the help will be gone for most families because this benefit is not indexed for inflation.

The government's proposal will put $2.1 billion back into the system over a five-year period, starting January 1, 1993. The Minister of Finance must hope that Canadians have forgotten that between 1986 and 1991 the Conservative government took more than $3.5 billion out of the child benefit system. This proposed child benefit program still fails to put back in the hands of Canadian families everything this government took away from them only between 1986 and 1991.

By the way, nothing in the proposed child benefit program addresses the profound need for child care facilities. In fact the government's drum beating for this new program hides the fact that the government has apparently abandoned its pledge of a national child care program to provide facilities to look after the children of parents who are at work.

Ms. Copps: Child care killer.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the government has proposed the increase of its child care expense deduction by $1,000, but it is important to note that this deduction provides absolutely no benefit to families who do not earn enough money to pay income tax. Also, this program will not go into effect for almost a full year. If there are any additional benefits in it, they will not be available to Canadian families right now when they are suffering from the effects of this very serious government induced recession.

In the budget it is true the government did adopt the Liberal proposal, although not in the exact same detail, to allow the use of RRSP funds to buy homes. The government has already accepted our proposal to lower the down payment required to buy a home.

When the Tory drum beat stops and the smoke clears away and they stop moving the shells around, what do we see? The Conservatives are cancelling the co-operative housing program. They are cutting back on the growth in the funds for Canada Mortgage and Housing to provide for other programs of low income housing. The RRSP and low down payment programs, we expect to be useful, but they do nothing for people who cannot afford to put money in RRSPs and who cannot afford even a 5 per cent down payment. The budget makes it harder and not easier for those Canadians, low income Canadians, tens of thousands of them, to be able to get decent, affordable housing.

The budget does have some interesting words, fine words about education and training. Again, when the smoke clears away, there is a lot less there than meets the eye. The budget talks about increasing the student tax credit. Yes, it makes a slight improvement.

[Translation]

The government agreed to raise the education tax credit from $60 to $80 per month for students in post-secondary institutions.

[English]

This budget does nothing to restore the cuts in federal transfer payments to the provinces for post-secondary education, cuts that will mean that in Ontario alone likely 5,000 fewer young people will be able to go to university next year. What good is a tax break to pay for university studies to a young Canadian who cannot get into university in the first place because of the government's cuts in transfer payments to the provinces for post-secondary education? The universities now have to cut back the number of students they will accept in their entrance year.

The government also pays lip service to the need for more research and development in this country. When the smoke clears and the Minister of Finance stops moving the shells around in his shell game of a budget, Canadians will see that the budget offers about only another $230 million for this vital activity spread over five years. At the same time the government cancelled the Science Council, a vital source of advice and research and support for having a more effective, competitive and technologically advanced country.

The budget also appears to do things including tax changes to help business. Everything in this budget that the government says is targeted to help business will not even begin to make up for the damage this government has done to business, especially manufacturers, through its high interest rate and high dollar policies.

When the smoke clears away from this budget and the mirrors stop flashing, Canadians will see there is nothing in the budget to take away the reality that our interest rates are still very high. They are still too high in real terms after deducting the rate of inflation from them.

There is no pledge in this budget about further declines in real interest rates. This budget says nothing about the need for further declines in the Canadian dollar. Instead the Bank of Canada, apparently with the support of this government and this Minister of Finance, appears to be working to keep the dollar up in spite of pleas from our resource companies and our manufacturers that the dollar be allowed to decline further to help restore their competitiveness in world markets.

The government talks about fundamentals, but it still refuses in its budget speech to admit that the fundamentals of the interest rate and the dollar are still not right and are still working against the best interests of Canadian business and the Canadian economy, still reeling from the impact of the GST and the free trade deal and yes, world economic changes.

[Translation]

The Conservatives' economic policies have caused record levels of personal and business bankruptcies in Canada. The economy cannot grow until businesses can operate in a relatively stable and healthy environment.

[English]

The budget sets out forecasts of the government deficit, forecasts of the unemployment rate and economic growth for Canada. I note this government has not been right yet in those forecasts, if we look back at its previous budgets. Even if these forecasts turn out to be right, they paint a sad picture of too high unemployment and a lagging and weak economic growth.

The minister's own budget papers confirm how poor its management of the economy has been. Take a look at page 41 of The Budget Papers and I quote:

> Taken together, annual growth this year and next still remains well below the 4.7 per cent average of growth in the 1983–1984 recovery period.

Take a look at the next page. It says:

> Annual growth of 4.5 per cent in 1993 is below the norm of past recoveries—The present recovery has been weak by historical standards. Excess capacity will thus remain in the economy throughout this period—despite the anticipated pick-up in growth in 1993.

That is quotation from the minister's own budget papers. These are buried in these papers but not found in the budget speech.

When The Budget Papers speak of excess capacity, this means more lay-offs, more lost jobs, more closed factories and lost production.

Once again, when the smoke clears away and the illusion of good economic management this budget attempts to create is gone, we see the budget is really a sham when it comes to helping create a strong recovery. This budget is lacking in many things, but it is especially lacking in a commitment to strong economic growth.

• (1550)

The budget continues to address the deficit and debt reduction. These are certainly important issues, but there is no recognition of the role of economic growth in helping to deal with those problems. With economic growth there is less government expenditure for things like welfare. With economic growth there is more revenue without tax increases because businesses are making profits and people are working and earning incomes.

Looking at this budget and comparing it to past budgets, it is basically more of the same. When one has a worn out used car with a new coat of paint, in spite of that new coat of paint it is still the same worn out used car. This budget, in spite of its smoke and mirrors, is still the same worn out, tired budget presented over and over again by the previous minister in spite of the efforts of the present one to dress it up with a new coat of paint, in the form of the appearance of help for Canadians.

When we look at this budget in terms of the government's own priorities of debt and deficit reduction, this government is a failure because the budget speech confirms that the government has again failed to meet its own deficit target. No matter how much it twists and turns, it cannot escape the reality that since it took office, the public debt has actually doubled to $420 billion.

[Translation]

The Conservatives increased our debt; they did not reduce it. I know how much the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance love to distort the truth about it and blame the previous government for the exponential growth of the debt.

[English]

The government has responded to some of the suggestions in my leader's emergency economic recovery plan, but what about the other elements in this plan? Where is the national community works program it proposes that would help municipalities all across this country get on with projects they already have on the shelf to upgrade roads, bridges and pollution control system? This program's costs would be shared with the provinces and municipal governments and would help put tens of thousands of people back to work.

Where are the programs the Leader of the Opposition mentioned in his emergency economic recovery program to help our workers obtain basic skills right now? Where are the programs of adjustment to retain and upgrade our workers and restore our industrial base to help it recover from the negative impact of the free trade deal, the GST, and world economic trends?

These programs certainly are not anywhere in this budget. This points to the basic failure of this budget. It does little or nothing to help the 1.5 million Canadians who are unemployed get back to work. It does little or nothing to help the 2 million Canadians on welfare get back into the labour force.

After the smoke cleared away, the minister, in his speech last night, admitted that with all the activity the budget speech described, there will still be an unemployment rate this year of over 10 per cent and about the same high level next year.

I do not see how the government, if it is responsible and caring, can live with these numbers. Instead of action, the Prime Minister, when he has the chance to say something constructive, calls the unemployed crackpots when they protest their plight.

This budget should have provided a frontal attack on unemployment. It gave us only the illusion of action and nothing more than smoke and mirrors.

As I said last night, the only test that counts is what this budget does for the 1.5 million unemployed. By the standards of that test this budget is an abject failure. This budget does nothing for the fish plant workers in Newfoundland. It does nothing for the auto workers in Ontario or the oil workers and the farmers of western Canada.

What does this government in its budget have to offer the workers who have been laid off at Hibernia and the 2,000 workers who will be losing their jobs at the General Motors plant in St. Catharines? To the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance these people are nothing more than crackpots to be ignored and swept aside.

When I responded to the budget last year I described it as a "blueprint for de-Confederation". The budget given last night does nothing more to strengthen the fabric of this country when that strengthening is badly needed. It gives the illusion of action but it is only a mammoth shell game. Last year the then Minister of Finance called his budget a plan for economic recovery. But instead of recovery, it brought further recession and fear about the future. There is little in this budget to take away that fear and concern from the minds of millions of Canadians.

[Translation]

These people deserve better than that. They worked very hard all their life, but every additional year under this government sets them back a little further. Did they do all that for nothing? Today, they cannot even afford what the middle class took for granted not so long ago. Those who always took care of their future are worried today. They are starting to wonder how much longer they will have a job.

[English]

Before he gave his budget speech the Minister of Finance said he would present a realistic budget, a realistic budget. But now that we have heard it, it is clear this budget is the height of unreality. It has instead strong elements of fantasy. It ignores the reality of too high unemployment; it ignores the reality of slow economic growth and lingering painful recession. A realistic budget would give Canadians heart and hope instead of continuing the despair caused by this government's policies.

The priority of a truly realistic budget would be to get Canadians working again. This budget does not do so. In this budget once again this government has betrayed the trust of Canadians. This government has confirmed why it does not deserve the confidence of Canadians and why there should and must be an early election to get rid of this callous and incompetent Conservative government.

In conclusion that is why I move, seconded by the member for Beauséjour:

> That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "that" and substituting the following:
>
> That this House condemns the government for its budget's failure to provide realistic support for the millions of Canadians who are victims of its short-sighted fiscal and monetary policies and for its failure to offer a realistic blueprint for the creation of jobs and economic growth in order to bring about a strong and early recovery from the economic disaster induced by this government.

• (1600)

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, it is always an interesting exercise to get up and look first at the rhetoric of Conservative budgets and then to look at the details of those budgets.

The rhetoric of this budget talks about strengthening the fundamentals. It talks about an emerging new Canadian economy. It talks about action for jobs. It talks as well about a social dividend and yet, when you actually look at the details of this budget, it provides little help to the many, many people across this country who are in such desperate situations. They are in such devastating positions that their families face grim futures. They themselves have started to lose hope.

I say to the Minister of Finance and this government that there is across this country a sense of despair, a loss of hope which is taking place, and this government is not responding with the kind of compassion, caring and serious programs which are essential if we are going to see that despair reversed and if we are going to see some hope provided to this country for the future.

I wish that I could talk about the budget in a more positive way because, frankly, there are cosmetics on this budget. This is a budget which has taken the face of previous Conservative budgets and put some make-up on it. There is a little bit of lipstick. There is a little bit of rouge here and there, but what there is not, when you penetrate below those cosmetics, is anything that seriously gets at either the roots of our economic problems in this country or gives the people who are out of work across Canada a sense that over the next six months or over the next year we are actually going to see recovery, that we are actually going to see significant growth. Is there any chance that they are going to get a chance to get back into the work force and put food on the tables of their families?

I come from a constituency which has just had a study produced this week which indicated—it is not a community which is different from many in southern Ontario, it is not a community which is different from any in Atlantic Canada or in parts of Quebec—that 21.5 per cent of the labour force of Windsor is out of work. These people are unemployed.

That is a human tragedy. It is a human tragedy for the people affected. It is a colossal waste of resources for this country to have people out of work, having to receive unemployment insurance, having to receive welfare when they could be productively contributing to our economy. They could be giving our economy a sense of growth, a sense of expansion, and they could be giving all of us as taxpayers some partners to help in the burden of paying taxes.

That is one of the things we forget. We think sometimes it is just the 1.5 million people out of work who are affected when there is a serious economic downturn. The reality is that every Canadian is affected because every Canadian has to pay more in taxes. Every Canadian has to shoulder a greater burden because people have been thrown out of work and have to receive unemployment insurance or welfare instead of paying taxes to the community.

As we look across this country, the realities of 1992 are not much different from the realities a year ago, except that they are worse. A year ago this government said we had a budget in front of us that would give us recovery. This budget promises us recovery.

The Minister of Finance said back in October that the economy was starting to boom. The Minister of Finance has said that he regrets those words, he overstated himself. He should, because we are not in a boom; we are not in a recovery. We in fact are facing the worst, the most prolonged economic downturn as far as our manufacturing sector and our farming sectors are concerned that we have experienced in this country since the great depression of the 1930s.

When you get that long a period of unemployment you do not just have people out of work. We have found in the statistics that have come out in the past few months, increasing inequalities in our country, increasing poverty. We have found that we are exporting less, that our trade position is worse than it has ever been before. We found bankruptcies at record heights. We had more bankruptcies last year than this country has ever seen in a single year before.

I could go on and list the great set of disastrous economic circumstances which are in front of us as a country. I do not want to suggest doom and gloom as the only reality. There are many Canadians who have ideas, who have hopes, who have suggestions. We heard from them across the country. We heard too their sense of anger that this government had not taken action to put this economy back into recovery, had not put people back to work.

[Translation]

The budget contains an impressive list of cuts, changes and modifications of all kinds to government programs and agencies. Some taxes on corporations and on individuals were changed. The Minister of Finance wanted to give the impression that he is a man of action and that he knows how to take charge of the situation. But this budget contains nothing to get the economy out of its slump and to put people to work.

• (1610)

Like the Liberal Party at the end of its mandate, this government is drained, unable to present a creative budget. This government keeps repeating the same refrain about cutting the deficit. If it had abolished the capital gains lifetime exemption as suggested in the New Democratic Party's budget proposals, the Conservative government would have recovered $2 billion. Sixty per cent of those who benefit from this exemption earn over $100,000.

[English]

We are talking about a loophole in the case of the capital gains exemption which benefits only .4 per cent of the taxpayers of this country. Less than half of 1 per cent receive 60 per cent of the tax breaks from that tax loophole. If we had eliminated that tax loophole we would have gained $2 billion that we could have used to put people back to work; that we could have used to reduce the GST and get rid of it for certain sectors of the economy; that we could have used to do something about improving the infrastructure in our municipalities; that we could have used to establish a child care program such as this government today has just abandoned.

We do not have a set of strong actions against the loopholes for the rich that remain in our tax system. Instead we have a series of tax changes which in the first place are very small. The tax changes which took place in this budget were about half of the total amount of tax increases this government put in on January 1, in terms of increased UI premiums that individuals and companies had to pay.

With one hand it gave people about $1 billion extra and then a month and a half ago it took away from people almost $2 billion in UI premiums. So much for tax decreases from this government.

In the second place, those tax decreases that were provided were far more beneficial for people who were rich than for people who were poor. For every dollar that went in tax breaks to an individual making $30,000 per year, the average wage that an industrial worker in Windsor would get, people who are wealthy in this country making $100,000 a year received six dollars. Six dollars for every dollar that went to the average person.

That is not fairness or social justice. That is the same old Conservative philosophy which has led in this country in the past seven and one-half years to increased taxes for the average family and decreased taxes for the rich. It has led to decreased taxes for corporations and consequently to an economy that is suffering very badly.

I mentioned today in Question Period that some of the tax loopholes are especially gross and unbelievable. I find it inconceivable that a government, after it had been pointed out to them, would still keep a provision in the tax system permitting a company to hire escort services for their clients. I asked the Minister of Finance about this today and he refused to answer the question. I think he was embarrassed. He certainly should be embarrassed. This government should be embarrassed by what it has given the rich, the powerful and the well off in this country at a time when people are suffering so badly across this country.

As we look through this budget, there is no action to expand jobs. In fact I can point to things in this budget that reduce jobs such as the elimination of co-operative housing. This excellent program has benefited thousands of people across this country, not only those who live in co-operative housing but also those who build that co-operative housing and produce the materials that go into it. Mr. Speaker, I think your timing must be slightly off. It was about four o'clock when I started. If I can continue—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I want to be clear. I think you have two minutes left in your speech.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that having looked at the clock when I got up and it now being just past a quarter after, it seems to me that two minutes is rather a remarkable interpretation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I want to remind the hon. speaker that I gave him two minutes more than the usual time because of the interruption. You have two minutes left.

Mr. Langdon: It seems to me that what we have in front of us is a budget which does not provide a response to the answers of Canadians. Instead it provides answers to the needs that the large scale business community in this country wanted. It is not surprising the Minister of Finance, when he quoted those who supported his budget, said today that they had support from the Business Council on National Issues. They had support from the Chamber of Commerce and from the manufacturers. That is not surprising. It is a budget that was written for them, not for the average person in this country. That is the reality.

• (1620)

I say to this government and I say to this minister that they have to get a vision of reality.

He talked about realism before he presented this budget. He has to recognize that the reality across this country is a grim and tough reality. It is a grim and tough reality with many, many people out of work.

That required a budget that had compassion, that had force, that gave leadership and that put people back to work. That is not the budget that we have before us and that is why I would like to move a subamendment to the amendment which has been moved. I move:

> That the amendment be amended by adding the following words after the words "monetary policies":

That amendment can give us a direction which will put people back to work and give us a sense of hope for the country.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the member for Essex—Windsor and there were many things he said in his speech that I agree with.

I was hoping that the Minister of Finance naturally would take a much more aggressive approach in tax reform. It is no secret to this House where I stand on comprehensive tax reform.

I would have thought that there would have been a little bit more in this budget, a lot more actually for training. I supported the member for Essex—Windsor on that.

As I listened to him I could not help but think of my own province, the province of Ontario. Some of those same criticisms that he was putting toward the government could also be applied toward the premier of Ontario.

The province of Ontario has traditionally been considered one of the engines that is vital to the economic health of this country.

Does the member for Essex—Windsor not think that maybe some of that advice that he is giving this Minister of Finance—and by the way I agree with a lot of it—could also be given it the treasurer in the province of Ontario?

In the province of Ontario right now the unemployment situation is a disaster. The video business in Toronto is a good business to be in because we seem to be paying people to stay at home. We are not getting them back to work.

I caution the member for Essex—Windsor that as he is criticizing—and I am certainly going to be critical of this government—we should also be putting some ideas forward.

Those same ideas should be presented to the premier of Ontario who is doing a disastrous job right now in the province and not helping this engine of recovery at all. I was wondering if he could maybe comment on that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before giving the floor to the hon. member, I received the amendment to the amendment from the hon. member for Essex—Windsor. That amendment is under consideration by the Speaker.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I would say two things.

First, it is interesting the provincial Liberals in Ontario attack the New Democrat government in Ontario because it is doing too much, because it is being too expansive, because it is trying to do too much for people. And this federal Liberal wing attacks that government for not doing enough. It would be interesting if they would at least get their act together. As far as we are concerned there is no difference, which will be reflected in my comments.

What I have said this government should be doing is precisely the kinds of things which the Ontario government has been emphasizing and has been putting into effect so as to get people back to work.

I can list for members the various plants which have been saved by the aggressive action of a government that is providing leadership in Ontario, for example, in Sault Ste. Marie there is Algoma Steel with over 3,000. We can talk about de Havilland which has been saved. We can talk about Kapuskasing which has been saved.

In area after area in my province the New Democrat government is being aggressive and providing leadership because it does care about people.

It is also putting tax changes into effect. For instance, in its last budget it saw to it that for every dollar in tax breaks that went to the average working family, there was not $6 that went to the rich as this government is putting into effect. Instead, there was an increased tax burden on the rich so that they contributed a fair share of taxation in the province of Ontario. That is the direction which has to be taken.

It is a direction which I think we all recognize cannot represent a vast expansion in the deficit. That is something on which there is broad agreement, but a reallocation of money is essential, and this government has not given us that reallocation of money.

It has played a shell game which has tried to suggest that such reallocation is taking place, but no such change has really occurred to put money in the hands of those who need it to get people back to work.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, I want to raise the matter of universality because it certainly comes up in this budget.

There is no doubt in my mind that with respect to family allowances universality is dead and gone. You can thank the Tories for that. It was Liberal governments in the past that brought universality to this country.

If Tory government members can end universality with respect to family allowances, where do they go next? Do they stop at family allowances or can they then attack universality at the level of medicare? If they can attack universality at the level of medicare, can they go further? For example, can they go on to pension plans? Why not?

It seems to me that if you can argue that upper middle income people or so-called rich people in this country do not need the benefits of universality, then you can equally argue that upper middle-income people, rich people, do not need the benefits of medicare. If you can argue that, you can go down the road farther and you can argue that upper middle income people and rich people in this country do not need the benefits of pensions. Where does this nonsense stop?

It seems to me that if we are going to fight for it we have to fight for it now because once you unleash this, once you attack universality or end it in one area of our social programs, that attack will continue. I want to ask the speaker for the New Democratic Party whether he shares that view of mine.

• (1630)

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I have to say I agree very strongly with the member from the Liberal Party who has just spoken. I think we have in front of us an attack on universality which is very dangerous for the future of our social programs. As soon as you make the social programs in this country simply for a disadvantaged minority, and everyone does not have a stake in our social programs, then inevitably by the politics of majorities and minorities, those majorities will squeeze the money that goes to that minority and those social programs will cease to be useful.

I agree with my friend from Winnipeg. I suggest to him as strongly as I possibly can that yes, we must fight this. I urge him to fight it as strongly as he possibly can with the Liberal premier of New Brunswick who has suggested that we should get rid of universality in medicare; with the Liberal premier of Quebec who has suggested that we should get rid of universality in medicare.

I think this battle has to take place, and as someone in the Liberal Party, I think he is well placed to lead that fight against those in his party who are heading down that road. There are certainly a lot of them and I worry about them a great deal.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to lead off the debate on the government's budget for the 1992–93 fiscal year.

I would like to start by congratulating my colleague, the Minister of Finance, on a budget that reflects the concerns of Canadians. He not only heard what they had to say. He listened. This is truly a budget for all Canadians, not just for the government.

During pre-budget consultations, there was a clear consensus on the need for adopting a well balanced approach that would help strengthen our economy today and in the years to come.

The Budget

Mr. Speaker, I think it is clear, and you and I heard the minister say, that Canadians want to cut the deficit. They know that higher debt means higher taxes, and they want an end to rising taxes. They want the burden of government reduced. They want less government and better service.

Canadians want to ensure better development of Canada's most valuable resource—our people. They want better opportunities for people to improve their skills, and they want steps taken to ensure that our social programs meet the basic needs of Canadians.

Most of all, Canadians want a renewed basis for confidence in their economy—confidence that jobs will be created and jobs maintained.

The budget is a response to these demands. The equation is quite simple: The budget will cut public spending and use the savings to provide tax reductions that will help Canadian citizens and support economic growth.

[English]

This budget will not please anyone who thinks we can spend our way to instant prosperity. My colleague, the Minister of Finance, said yesterday that you don't get out of a hole by digging it deeper. The budget of course makes tough decisions to reduce government spending. These cuts make it possible for us not only to reduce the deficit but also to cut taxes and deliver a social dividend to Canadians and their families.

[Translation]

The personal income surtax will drop from 5 per cent of basic tax to 4 per cent on July 1, 1992, and to 3 per cent on January 1, 1993. This will increase Canadians' after-tax income by $500 million in 1992–93, and by more than $1.2 billion in 1993–94. Every one of the nearly 15 million taxpayers will benefit from it.

The new home buyers' plan will allow Canadians to draw on their registered retirement savings plans to buy a house. Individuals will be able to withdraw up to $20,000 tax-free and repay it over 15 years.

Interest rates have declined considerably, about seven points since the spring of 1990, and Canadians are very pleased with that. Similarly one-year mortgage rates have fallen six percentage points. Thus a family that takes out a $75,000 mortgage loan amortized over 25 years saves over $300 a month. Lower inflation is the key to lower interest rates. Inflation has dropped spectacularly, from a 6.8 per cent annual rate in January 1991 to barely 1.6 per cent today.

[English]

The manufacturing and processing sector exports some 40 per cent of its production and is highly exposed to international competition. To help it meet the challenges of globalization, the manufacturing and processing tax will be reduced from 23 per cent to 22 per cent by January 1, 1994.

Furthermore the capital cost allowance rate will be increased for manufacturing and processing machinery from 25 per cent to 30 per cent.

[Translation]

The budget also recognizes the crucial role that research and development play in today's global economy. We are streamlining the administration of the scientific research tax credit. This should enable businesses to make greater use of the credit and stimulate about $230 million of research and development in the next few years.

The government is setting up the Small Businesses Financing Program to help small businesses, which are so important to the Canadian economy, obtain loans at lower interest rates. Furthermore the ceiling for loans to small businesses under the Small Businesses Loans Act will double to $200,000.

[English]

As one can see this budget makes a concrete investment in overcoming our current economic weakness, in reducing the burden of deficits and taxes, and in building a more competitive future. But it also invests new resources in assisting Canada's children, the disabled and students. The government has proposed major reform of the child benefit system. The new system will increase child benefits by $400 million per year and target them to low and middle income families. I will come back to this proposal in a moment.

The budget also includes measures to help disabled persons play a fuller role in Canadian life. For example, the range of tax deductible expenses for medical treatments will be broadened.

The budget will also provide additional tax relief to students. The maximum amount of income on which the education credit is calculated will increase by one-third. The limit of the total amount of tuition fees and education credits which may be transferred to another taxpayer will rise to $680.

Even as the government is being streamlined, measures will be taken to improve service to the public. For example, departments and agencies will work to provide more convenient one-step access to the services they offer. Standards of service will be developed for such matters as longer hours of opening and faster responses. Procedures and forms will be simplified and existing regulations will be reviewed to ensure they serve valid public purposes.

Yesterday in the budget we saw a major $2 billion step toward improving federal support for children and families.

• (1640)

The new child benefit will consolidate the existing family allowances, child tax credits and dependent child credit into a single monthly benefit beginning January 1993. The child benefit will also include an additional amount for low income working families.

It is the largest and most important social initiative since the child tax credit was introduced in 1978. The proposed child benefits built on existing federal programs for children and families total $15 billion annually.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell you today why we are taking this action. To begin, I would like to quote something that I read recently: "Children are an asset to the state, human resources are of much more importance than material resources". Those words were spoken by then Prime Minister Mackenzie King in the House of Commons in July 1944, nearly half a century ago, when the family allowances bill was presented. He also said: "There is an obligation upon the state to assist in the upbringing of children" and "the family and the home are the foundation of national life". To be sure, politicians are rarely unanimous. However, when the importance of children and families is concerned, I am sure that we can agree.

[English]

We plan to discuss this proposal with the provinces however. We plan to discuss implementation and not introduction. In fact we will be introducing legislation before the summer and I hope we will receive support from all members of the House.

We want the kind of support that Mackenzie King received in 1944. Adjusting the way we support children and families is a hallmark of Canada's social policy tradition.

Since 1945 successive federal governments have made additions and adjustments to our child benefit programs. These programs have been modified on more than 20 separate occasions. Each of these changes were made with good reason. Each was appropriate to its time, but the result of all these additions and adjustments is a patchwork of benefits.

It is complicated. It makes little sense. It tries to be fair, but it falls short in that regard, too.

[Translation]

The new child benefit follows up the recommendations of two parliamentary reports, one from a Senate committee entitled Child Poverty: Towards a Better Future, and another from a House subcommittee entitled Canada's Children: Our Future. The recommendations were very good. We have accepted and implemented them.

[English]

The new child benefit has three characteristics. First, it is simpler. There is no additional paperwork to fill out. It is tax free for parents to keep and benefit their children. An all in one payment is made every month. It is fairer.

The new child benefit will be based on the over-all income of the family and not on individual incomes. It will go to families who need it. To help working families better provide for their children, there is an earned income supplement of $500 per family.

Finally it is more generous. Virtually all single parents and one earner families will receive more. Annual benefits for low to moderate income families with incomes below $50,000 will increase by an average of almost $250 a year.

I believe it is a fiscally responsive decision and that fiscal responsibility is itself a social benefit. Our children must not inherit a Canada that is crippled by debt.

Of course some will say this is the end of universal social programs. I believe it is a reaffirmation of Canadians' belief in fairness. I cannot justify sending a family allowance cheque or giving a child tax credit to families that earn hundreds of thousands of dollars. It is just not fair.

[Translation]

On the contrary, I think that as a society, whether we are politicians or ordinary citizens, we cannot remain indifferent when children go to school hungry or do not have boots to wear in winter.

If we want to help children, we must help families. Of course the government does not have unlimited resources so it must make the best use of them.

[English]

Every generation leaves the next a legacy. We all struggle to do our best for our children. As we make these efforts, we also recognize that our children will one day have to make their own way in the world. We must give them every opportunity.

Prosperity is not a commodity that can be bought or sold. It is not something that can be handed down from one generation to the next. Prosperity is the result of a healthy, happy, educated and motivated collection of people. Certainly prosperity has something to do with money, but it has a lot more to do with people. Tomorrow's prosperity is in the hands of today's children. The legacy we must leave them is one of unrestricted opportunity. They must inherit from us a future that is wide open, free for them to make the paths they will.

[Translation]

All the measures described, together with the initiatives that the government has taken in the past, strengthen the foundation for growth and job creation. As the Minister of Finance reminded us yesterday, and it is worth repeating, the Canadian economy is fundamentally well placed for a sustained recovery.

In summary, I think that this budget provides leadership and does what Canadians say they expect the federal government to do. But it is also true that no level of government can make the economy healthy.

The economy will only be healthy if all levels of government and all sectors of the economy work together constructively to put long-term gains ahead of short-term interests. That is why our government, in close co-operation with the provinces, will try to strengthen the policy framework that our economic union provides for growth and future job creation.

The provinces will soon bring down their budgets. It is important that they follow a course compatible with this budget: better financial balance, lower deficits, tighter control on spending and on the tax burden. To repeat again what the Minister of Finance said, it is always the same taxpayers who pay and they deserve a break.

That is the message which Canadians gave us and we listened to it. I think the budget we tabled yesterday provides a clear answer to that message.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have a lot of respect for the minister of health. I have watched him serve in many profiles for this national government over the last few years. I think that his child tax benefit plan is an interesting one and it is the beginning of an interesting debate.

The minister says they are listening to the people of Canada.

• (1650)

I am hearing right across this country that people want to get back to work. In the province of Quebec alone we have 600,000 entrepreneurs. This minister is the Quebec minister. I have listened to some of these people and they are not feeling confident. The unemployment numbers in the province of Quebec are high. The minister talks about children and the ability to buy snowsuits and rubber boots, and having enough food to eat. The best way to provide this is to get these people back to work. The best way for children to be looked after in terms of their health and their welfare is their mother or father having a job.

I do not see anything in this budget that is going to kick-start the entrepreneurship of this country. There are 1,700,000 entrepreneurs in this country. The government says it is way ahead of its inflation targets. It has a very low interest rate. In spite of all those things, there is a low, low confidence in this country. I believe that the Minister of Finance, without being dramatic, without going to the deficit or to the debt, should have done something to kick-start that entrepreneurial spirit that exists in this country if he wants to get people back to work again. It seems to me that that would be just as powerful a way of looking after the children of this country as the program that he is on. I am not against exploring that program, but it seems to me the dignity of a person working is equally important as that tax credit.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I want to say I appreciate the comment. It is positive. It is constructive. Maybe it is not based on the same perceptions, but I appreciate the way the member is approaching the issue.

I agree that the more we have the capacity to produce in the country, the wealth of the country will grow automatically and we will be able to do more for poor children. I totally agree with that and I agree that wealth comes first of all by working. People in the labour force who are able to get a job and to work produce wealth in the country.

However in Canada, as in any other country in the world, I would say we face today a kind of cyclical period. It happened in the 1970s and it happened at the beginning of the 1990s. I believe that my friend will agree with me that jobs are not coming. I will use the expression which is coming from French—I made a mistake this morning. I hope I will not make one this afternoon—which is spontaneous generation, which is coming so suddenly that we do have to take into account all different factors of the problem we face today. My colleague was and still is involved in the business sector. He knows very well that all those conditions are such that a few macroeconomic conditions like interest rates, dollar plays, and many other factors refer particularly to the question of restructuring of the economy and so on. When doubled with a recession as the one we face, it makes that very difficult. In Quebec, as in Ontario, it may be they are proportionally touched with problems with the recession.

Other provinces have problems too. Last week I was in British Columbia and obviously the reality is different. It is not because there are no problems. The question is the different realities in the two central provinces touched by the recession. There is no doubt in my mind that what I would call the point d'arriveé with the question of children has to be fixed with the point de départ.

The Speaker has told me that I have taken too long. I believe that what the Minister of Finance has proposed, and it may be in terms of triggering some kind of new economy, is modest in the capacity that we have to do it for small business, investors and so on.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the minister, but there are several members with questions, and I will now recognize the hon. member for Rosemont.

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I heard the Minister of National Health and Welfare and Minister responsible for Quebec speak with great pride about the budget. I must say I have had enough of the opposition's worrying about the future of universality as it applies to health care, now that the government has dropped this principle for family allowances. I think the two cases are quite different. Although the government's decision is not spectacular as far as supporting our families or the birth rate is concerned, the latter being vital to us in Quebec, the fact remains that this reform does send the money to the families that are most in need. As far as health care is concerned, however, programs are already being affected today. During the eighties, and even more so recently, the federal government has been withdrawing from health care support to a very substantial degree. In 1985–86, according to agreements existing at the time, the federal government paid 46 per cent of health care and higher education costs. We know that by 1994–95 it will be paying only 32 per cent. This is clearly a withdrawal from those agreements. For Quebec next year this means a shortfall of $1.9 billion. How can the minister say he hopes the provinces will do the same? Does he mean the provinces should send the bill to the municipalities, which will send it on to the citizens of this country who ultimately pay anyway? If the federal government withdraws from health care financing, the provinces will either have to change the program or tax their residents. Although the minister continues to defend the principle, at least officially, the programs are already being affected.

There is another issue that is extremely important to Quebec —

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but he has only one minute left to finish his comments, after which the minister has a chance to respond.

Mr. Tremblay (Rosemont): Regarding research and development programs, I simply want to know whether the minister responsible for Quebec is aware that the federal government is actually skimming off 39 per cent of the tax credit allowed by Quebec to businesses for research and development, as the finance minister explained at the last first ministers' meeting.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I think that the Minister of Finance already commented this afternoon on the subject of the second question from the member for Rosemont. So that I can have more time for the first question, I would just point that out.

As for the first question, I do not challenge the figures given by the hon. member for Rosemont, except that I am sure he knows that the federal government transfers not only cash but also tax points for health care, at the request of Quebec, among other provinces. In 1977–78 I believe that Quebec asked the federal government to transfer tax points instead of cash, and that is exactly what has happened. If he considers the tax points transferred, he does not obtain the same result for the proportion going from 46 per cent to what it is today.

Second, the recent debate in Quebec is significant for the national health issue. All provinces share the same concern; the hon. member talked about a $1.9 billion shortfall for Quebec, but everyone agrees that 9 per cent of the gross national product for health care is enough. In other words, the health care system in Canada does not lack money, but the way it is managed must change. Mr. Côté and the other ministers agree on that. Giving Quebec $2 billion more will not necessarily relieve the overcrowded emergency wards. Funding has doubled and tripled in the past 10 years, but the problem has not changed. The problem is one of management and the federal government will continue to do what it has done. Of course we do not transfer money that we do not have and for the information of the member for Rosemont, Quebec does the same since it transferred responsibilities to the municipalities under the Ryan plan, as we know very well.

• (1700)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair, having considered the motion in amendment put forward by the hon. member for Essex–Windsor, can now rule in favour of the motion.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me to have this opportunity to speak about the 1992 budget.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, we have a new Minister of Finance and we have been told to expect a brand new budget. I must say that, when I first looked at it, I thought that there might be something in there. Then I took a second look and realized that a coat of varnish was making everything look great. As soon as you take a good look, you can start noticing the cracks, real big cracks!

[English]

When I first saw this budget I thought just maybe there was going to be some hope for Canadians. I heard about tax breaks and I thought hallelujah. We are already so overburdened with taxes it is high time. But when I looked more closely at what was underneath this budget I realized that the tax breaks were just a bit of colouring.

When we are being hammered on the head constantly and somebody takes a chip off the hammer, we may feel a little of relief at first glance but we are still being hit on the head. It does not take away the fact that we are overtaxed. This has not helped us in any way, shape or form. What is $2 in 1992?

What we see is a budget which goes ahead and says: "In 1992 we will reduce the surtax by 1 per cent". Then when we look beneath that we find the surtax is 1 per cent but it starts July 1. Right away that makes it .5 per cent. The surtax is a tax levied on the tax that has been calculated. When we look down the line it does not mean a whole lot, especially not for those who need it the most.

But it was a gesture and we have to allow them their gestures. After all, this is a budget for an election year. It is a budget crafted in 1992 but nothing really happens until 1993. It is a one-year budget but with five-year benefits, so we are told.

This government is not going to be here in five years time so it is easy to project into the future. I can project all kinds of beautiful things too if I think I will not be around to answer for it.

I wanted to know, when I opened this budget document, what the government was going to do this year. Over the last few weeks we have heard about a barrage of plant closures and job losses. Over the years we have heard this government go on about competitiveness: we have to be competitive and we have to be the best.

One thing happened last week in the announced closure at the plant in St. Catharines. There was a plant that was competitive. There was a plant that made money. It is closed. Now tell me: how are we going to help those people who are faced with job loss? Is there anything at all in this budget to help these people? Absolutely nothing.

Let's talk about the farmers. What is in it for the farmers? Mum is the word, mum is the word. What is in it for the fishermen on the east coast? Absolutely nothing.

We talk about the deficit. We have heard much talk about the deficit and how this government was going to be God's gift to deficit reduction. We just have to go back to the very first years of its mandate. We had a brand new minister then. He said: "We are going to reduce the deficit. We have to reduce the deficit". The size of the annual deficit since 1986–87 has not been reduced at all.

As a matter of fact the national debt has doubled in size, and this through some of the best growth years of our economy, this despite the fact that our income taxes and all taxes have gone up at least 33 times. The average Canadian is suffering an horrendous burden in terms of taxation.

Now we are looking at bankruptcies which are reaching record levels. We are looking at unemployment which is at a record high. What is the government predicting about unemployment? It is going to be quite normal now for our employment rate to remain above 10 per cent at least for the next two years.

What kind of nonsense is this? How can we expect to have competitive, happy and prosperous people when we are saying: "You are not going to have a job. I am sorry, we can't help you"?

Keeping in mind that the Tory text since 1984 has been expenditure control, cutting the deficit and reducing government debt, in 1990 the then Minister of Finance stated: "Our policies are working". He was making reference to the monetary policy, which by the way really helped create this made-in-Canada recession. However, as we know, the forecasts of budget deficit, interest rates, growth rates and inflation rates have consistently been wrong. Why should they be right this time?

Beginning with the February 1988 pre-election budget which was subtitled Securing Economic Renewal, the public was left to believe that renewal had been secured. "In three and a half years our economic progress has been dramatic. Our policies and initiatives have worked in building the framework for the economic success we now enjoy", stated the then finance minister.

In the following months he went on to explain: "The structural changes that we are making in the Canadian economy have strengthened the foundations for economic growth and investor confidence". Absolutely beautiful words. Where is this economy growth and investor confidence right now?

The recovery is being held back by many factors, and probably the most important one is that the Canadian consumer is afraid to spend. In any event he has very little money to spare. His confidence is badly battered, not only by the lay-offs and bankruptcies seen in any recession but also by the permanent job cuts and industrial restructuring sparked by flagging government fiscal and monetary policies.

When we hear this new finance minister speaking of restraint, we hear echoes of the other finance minister who preceded him. When he talks about failing to meet budget targets this year but achieving them in two and three years, the reverberations of prior years are very loud. Have we not all heard it before? Is it not the typical speech? "We are sorry we did not meet the targets this year, but for sure next year we are going to meet them". They are going to be really on target next year or five years from now or somewhere, somehow, some day they might. We might as well say that.

The Conservative record of deficit reduction is dismal. In 1985 the deficit came in at $34.6 billion what was predicted to have been $33.8 billion. They were off. The federal debt that then needed controlling was at $224 billion. Now it sits in excess of $420 billion. In 1986 the finance minister said that he would have the deficit down to $25.9 billion but it was $28.2 billion. In 1987 the deficit was $30.7 billion. In 1988 the deficit stood at $29.3 billion, and in 1989 at $28.6 billion. The deficit has gone up every year since 1987-88.

In order to hasten the recovery process, the finance minister at that time in 1989 launched what was described as an ambitious five-year fiscal plan. The finance minister was never short of plans. He mentioned this five-year deficit reduction plan in last year's budget as well. Forget the old clear and realistic medium term plan. We are now back in the business of medium term predictions with new ambitious five-year deficit reduction plans.

I go on about this only because I want to show the people that this is a lot of mumbo-jumbo and a lot of really nice words which will not produce very much. We just have to go through the list of what is in this budget today. Let me refer to one of the things that is happening. Remember how the environment was sacred to this government and it had this fabulous green plan. Let me tell the people across the way that the environment is sacred and our children will suffer because we are not being honest and we are not tackling the environment the way we should be doing.

This fabulous green plan was supposed to be a plan for five years, but the following year the Conservatives extended it to a sixth year. Now they are saying: "We really cannot afford it so we are going to cut back $75 million a year for the next two years, but we will make it up on the last three years". Come on, come on.

They talk about helping people with housing. There will be no more co-op housing. Social housing will be cut back but there will be some. Fine. We brought in the brand new idea that RRSPs could be used to purchase homes. It was a great idea. Our leader suggested it. I am very happy to see that they have taken it up, but why only limit it for one year? Many Canadians right now have RRSPs locked in for long terms of four or five years before they can access them. How will they be able to access these funds so they can use them this year if there is a one-year term?

An hon. member: Some will buy any way.

Mrs. Marleau: Yes, some will buy anyway and in some instances it will help.

An hon. member: We hope they will buy.

Mrs. Marleau: We certainly hope so. We think it was a great idea. We just wish they had extended it a little longer so that those who cannot access RRSP funds this year would be eligible to access them in the next few years.

Turning to Canada student loans, there is always a sleeper in everything they do. They give with one hand; they take away with another. They say: "We are going to allow you a bigger deduction for the fact that you are a student, but we are going to start charging interest on your Canada student loan from the day you graduate".

I do not know how many of them know students and know how difficult it is for them to get jobs. It is extremely difficult to get a job and start working the day after one graduates. For most right now it is almost impossible.

Another thing they are doing is privatizing the loans. I will give an example of a woman in my riding who came to see me not long ago. She had been left alone with two children. She decided that she did not want to live on welfare or mother's allowance. She wanted to make a life for her family. She went back to school and she got a Canada student's loan. This lady, when she finished her schooling, got a job. We have to understand that other than the Canada student's loan she has never lived off any kind of government assistance. Now it is 10 or 15 years later and she owes more in interest than she does on the original loan even though she never defaulted on her payment, not once.

The other day she came to see me and asked: "Do you think that there is some way I can get out from under this horrendous burden that seems to get worse and worse and worse?" Now her children are at an age where they have to go out and get Canada student loans.

I wonder if there is any compassion, where people who help themselves get a little help also. However, with privatization the collection people will be at her door and it will not matter that she is supporting two children and not on mother's allowance; she has to pay her loan. If she were on mother's allowance maybe she could have gone bankrupt and not even tried to pay the loan, but she did not. These kinds of insensitive actions really are deterrents to people who want to do the right thing. I would ask that you reconsider some of these methods of collecting Canada student loans. There is no doubt there are people with money who are not paying back their loans and I have no objection to you going after them. But there are many out there who are struggling and having a very, very difficult time. In that case, we should have a little compassion.

One item in the budget is reductions in grants and contributions. It all sounds so good. We do not know yet what is in that because it is going to come out with estimates tomorrow.

There are agencies eliminated and consolidated. Some of them may have been absolutely useless. Some of them could be very good. It may even lead me to believe that some of them have been eliminated because they were a little bit too good. There are two that come to mind and they happen to be led by some very capable women. I am wondering if that is something that just happened. You sometimes wonder how the minds of these financial people work.

We are going to have tighter government travel guidelines. I have no problems with that. I cannot travel first class, by the way. The only plane that flies direct to Sudbury is a 19-seater with no washroom or service. But I do pay first class prices for that flight. I wish you could do something about helping alleviate the cost of transportation for people in the outlying areas.

The communication budget cuts. Hallelujah. They are going to stop spending some of their massive advertising budgets.

Mr. Mills: Go to personal service contracts.

Mrs. Marleau: I am just wondering. You are going to cut it out, but are you going to have consultants do it? How is it going to work? I have this feeling that somehow there is an election year coming and there will be some way you can go out with a massive advertising campaign.

You know, the prosperity agenda: You can do it. You can compete. You say that to the people in St. Catharines. You say that to most people and they will look at you and tell you they remember.

Tax compliance and cost recovery are great ideas, but why are you cutting back on staff in those departments? Why are you not really making those departments effective? Each one of these tax collecting people brings in more than his or her salary, yet the numbers have been reduced.

There are many people out there who have not complied with the GST. No one has been near them. No one has asked them why they have not complied. There are billions out there. Maybe if we had additional staff we could collect some of these thousands of dollars out there. I am very anxious to see something done there.

Mr. Sobeski: How can people avoid paying tax?

Mrs. Marleau: You ask them. They will tell you.

Changes to withholding tax always sounds great. The government is going to allow more foreign investment in Canada. I like foreign investment. It does things for Canada, but it is only for foreigners. They are the only ones who get this benefit. Why are we not encouraging Canadians to invest in Canadian enterprises? We are giving them tax cuts but they are not half as good as this. Part of the problem with foreign investment is that all of the profits leave the country and that has been a major problem with our economy. I am of two minds about this one.

Small business financing. Hallelujah. If a small business is in trouble the government is going to allow it to borrow up to $200,000, up from $100,000. I do not know where you people live, but I know a lot of small businesses and they have no means of borrowing up to the $100,000 even when they are in good financial positions. Do you live in Never Never Land? If a business is in trouble do you think it will be able to increase the amount of its loans to $200,000?

The child tax benefit is a beautiful package. It sounds so great. But do you realize that the family allowance cheque goes out to mothers? Every mother in this country receives the cheque directly. When the mother works outside the home perhaps she does not rely on that cheque coming to her directly as much as the stay-at-home mother.

• (1720)

Do you know that for thousands of stay-at-home mothers in this country, it is the only cheque that comes to them in their name? Is there any way at all it can be arranged in this new scheme of things that the stay-at-home mothers receive that credit directly in their hands? I think it is extremely important.

The Speaker is trying to get my attention here. I can keep going on and on. What I can say is that the government members are big on r words. I will say to the people of Canada, just remember that when we had the free trade debate they promised us jobs, jobs, jobs.

We did not get jobs, jobs, jobs so most of us are pretty sceptical now. When the GST came in they said you would love this GST. It is was going to create jobs and it was going to make us all prosperous. Nobody believed them. Nobody believes them now and nobody will believe the government is going to do anything with this budget except try to—

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, we have listened with great interest to the hon. member as she described the hardship businesses are experiencing. She mentioned in particular the case of a Canadian woman who is going through hard times. Believe me, I do sympathize with the Canadian men and women who suffer hardship from time to time.

However, did the hon. member who talked a lot about the deficit, telling us it had not been reduced, tell her constituent the real reason she is suffering such hardship today and why it is increasingly difficult for government to act, that it was because we basically have our hands tied due to the mismanagement of the former Liberal government?

The hon. member talks about the deficit and tells us that this government did not reduce the deficit. The truth of the matter is that in 1984 there was a $38 billion deficit, of which $22 billion was interest to service the debt and $16 billion were cumulative operating deficits. This means that in those days the government was spending more than it was collecting in taxes, which created a total deficit of $38 billion.

Eight years later, in 1992, we are told that the deficit stands at $31.4 billion, with a $12 billion operating surplus, which means that the difference between $12 billion and $31.4 billion is due only to interest on the debt.

The hon. member should know that if we had a balanced budget, if revenues and expenses were the same, the deficit would now be $43.4 billion. What is worse, and the hon. member is silent on this, is that if we had kept increasing expenses at the same rate as the Liberal government did until 1984, our deficit today would be $80 billion and our debt would be $600 to $700 billion.

I ask the hon. member whether she and her party recognize, once and for all, that the deficit is indeed lower and that it is by lowering the deficit that we will again have the necessary leeway to ease the tax burden on our citizens, or does the hon. member intend to support her leader's policies—I conclude on that note—which would increase expenses, reduce revenues and add to the national debt?

Mrs. Marleau: Mr. Speaker, in response to the gentleman opposite, I can inform the Conservative member who just asked me a question that the Tories have not a clue how to run things. They have not the slightest inkling. They are very good at making speeches. However, when you consider we have had 33 tax increases since they came to power, during a period of prosperity the like of which we have not seen for a long time, I hardly think they have any right to say they know how to run a country.

In any case, when we come to power, we will have some terrific problems because of your poor management. In any case, we will put people first. That is how a government should be run. First, Canadians will be a lot happier and, second, we will run things very decisively.

[English]

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the hon. member from Sudbury. She read a budget but I would like to ask her something. We had some comments from some other people. The President of the Canadian Manufacturers Association said that investment in the goods producing sector will be stimulated by cuts to the tax rate on manufacturing income. He praised the government's move to let companies write off the cost of new equipment and machinery more quickly.

The hon. member talked about consumer confidence. Mel Fruitman, vice-president and research director of the Retail Council of Canada, said that the economic growth assumptions underlying the deficit forecast are creditable. His group is happy with the budget because it manages to cut both the deficit and taxes. He said they think this will help rebuild consumer confidence. Finally the Canadian Home Builders Association said they think this whole thing is a springboard to recovery.

So here are three people in the retail business who are saying this is the springboard and this indeed may bring back consumer confidence. They read the same budget. Is the hon. member telling me that the home builders, the retail council and the manufacturers association are wrong?

Mrs. Marleau: I would imagine the manufacturers are very happy at having a tax cut, and of course they would support it. But let me remind this government that there are very few manufacturers making any money these days so it really matters very little. There are also very few manufacturers.

All I can say to the member for Cambridge is that perhaps many of you, and a lot of us also, would like to continue to live in hope because otherwise we die of despair.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment our co-critic of finance on her speech. During the course of her speech she talked about the Small Businesses Loans Act. This Small Businesses Loans Act, which was first passed in 1961, assists small business to access financing for investment purposes, et cetera. The amount after this budget increased from $100,000 to $200,000.

I think that is a good initiative, but there are two problems with this. Of the 1,700,000 entrepreneurs in this country, I would venture a guess that probably 95 per cent of them are not aware it exists. Second, and I would like to ask my colleague from Sudbury if she has had similar experiences, I hear from a lot of my small businesses on Queen Street, Gerard, Danforth, Pape, et cetera, that they are having a tough time maintaining their lines of credit. Many of them are below $100,000, let alone getting an additional $100,000.

I would like to hear from my colleague and see if she has had the same experience.

Mrs. Marleau: I have definitely had the same experience. I know of many people who own small businesses who have been horribly burdened by a lot of the taxes brought forward by this government. They are having a very difficult time keeping their heads above water. Many of them, by the way, are going bankrupt. That is where the bulk of the bankruptcies lie, in small business. I tell you: You have done very little to help them because, again, as I said during my speech, if you are in trouble, no one will advance you any money. If they will not advance you up to $100,000, why would they advance you up to $200,000 when you are in trouble? I have yet to have found one small business person that is in trouble who has been able to get any kind of loan. I will tell you it is a very serious, misleading sort of statement there because that is not hope for small business. Small business needs more than just nice words. It needs concrete policies to help them get through this.

• (1730)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for North Vancouver. I would appreciate it if the hon. member would indicate to the Chair if he is splitting his time with another colleague.

Mr. Chuck Cook (North Vancouver): That was the first thing I was going to mention, Mr. Speaker. With your consent, I will split my time in order that more speakers may have an opportunity to be heard in this debate.

My comments will be in a slightly different vein from what we have been listening to today, I think perhaps much more philosophical than some of the comments.

I have been a participant and have listened to and watched this kind of debate for something like 13 years. I think some of the opposition speeches I have heard are quite good, as a matter of fact well done. We did the same speeches between 1980 and 1984 with about the same results in terms of affecting government policy.

There is one question that does not seem to be asked here. I have yet to hear a speaker even mention the subject and perhaps it is the most important subject facing this country and this House of Commons today. I do not hear it being mentioned on the government benches particularly nor on the opposition benches. That question simply is: Can we afford it?

What can we afford and what can we not afford? With a really creative budget, if we were to gather together all of the ideas expressed by the opposition, put them together, the amount of spending would be absolutely massive and massive spending at this time is the last thing this country needs.

What people seem to forget is that the whole world is in a restructuring mode. The economic world order is in a process of changing radically. I suspect it is the largest change that has taken place in economics in the world since the industrial revolution. If that is going on, then I will forgive my own government for not being able to go against the trend of the new economic world order, but I would suggest to all Canadians that they consider very carefully what is taking place throughout the world, which means that an individual government of any country, and you could look at them all, really has little to say or can influence the total world significantly today. In John Donne's words: "We are not an island unto ourselves" and that bell is tolling for all countries and all economic orders in the world. We have seen some of it in eastern Europe. We are certainly seeing a restructuring taking place in the United States, North America, Central America, throughout the world. Things are changing and changing radically.

I cannot agree to massive spending in an attempt to go against world trends. To use another analogy, I am not really sure that massive spending would have helped the Luddites in the economic revolution that took place with industrialization at all. Massive spending is not the answer. Time, perhaps, will help, doing what you can to help individuals and people, but note the qualifier: doing what you can. I personally, and I think a great many Canadians, do not believe that you can solve problems by throwing massive amounts of money at them. If you would like an example, let us talk about Atlantic Canada and the maritimes. Certainly over the last few generations, massive amounts of money have been thrown at Atlantic Canada and look at the results; not very much.

We have a new world economic order, the greatest structuring since the time of the industrial revolution. That brings me then to the solutions being offered. Let us deal with all parties. I am attempting to be pragmatic and fair. If I look at the Liberals, all I have to do is look at their record and listen to their speeches during this debate. Obviously they would go back to what they did so successfully and for so long, spending massive amounts of money, building up the national debt, paying no attention to the fact that their grandchildren and mine will still have debts to pay off as a result.

If you look at the New Democratic Party, it would do even more. We have evidence of that already in the present NDP government of Ontario. Do not forget a $10 billion deficit for the province of Ontario will grow and will be there for some time. If that is the economic policy of the New Democratic Party, as much as it wants to help people, as much as it feels that everyone should be helped, somebody has to pay for it.

That is one of the things I note in this House that people tend to forget. Who is supposed to pay these bills and how are they going to be paid? There is little thought given to that. I suppose the Canadian public does not give that much too it as well.

Let me talk briefly in terms of our own party. I do not particularly like our present budget if you would like to know. I think 1 per cent cuts, things like 5 per cent off cabinet ministers' salaries, travel restrictions where you cannot fly first class—I have not found a first-class flight in a year anyway—are cosmetic. I do not think they were needed there and I think they are somewhat dishonest as well. I wish we did not have them there.

However, over all, the Minister of Finance has done a good job with what he had to work with and with the times in which he is preparing a budget. We are into a situation where the best thing we can do is try to hold our own, not increase spending, and sincerely hope that the world turns around and starts recovering. I doubt if there is going to be any major recovery in Canada until we see the world straightening itself out. There is little evidence of that at the moment.

I do not mean to be depressing about the whole subject, but I also do not believe that any Canadian government is alone. We are part of the world and we survive by being world traders. The more world trade we can do, the better off we are.

I should also mention that other party that perhaps is the one that is talked about most these days, and that is the Reform Party. We have the huge spenders, the NDP. We have the spenders, the Liberals. We have the Conservatives and, for a change, that name means something, attempting to conserve, attempting to be conservative. And then you have the Reformers. If we can believe what they say, they would cut and slash throughout government. It is almost a situation of throwing the baby out with the bath water because they would disrupt this country and the governing of this country to such an extent that it would take years to recover from it.

I just lost another group of friends.

Remember, in government operations we have done a couple of good things over the last few years. It has not been as good as I would have liked, but we have turned an additional government operations deficit of $16 billion around to a surplus of $13 billion. That is pretty good action in terms of government operations. A lot more of them could and should perhaps be cut down.

• (1740)

Just remember, every dollar this or any government spends when it is added to the deficit means another dollar for your grandchildren to have to pay. Why were we sent here? We were sent to this place to attempt to do the best we can for the people we represent. Obviously, there is a difference in viewpoint between the three parties as to what we feel is the best thing to do.

We seem to have forgotten that the initial purpose was to do the best we can for this country, but to do it in a prudent way. We are in a situation where our spending must be cut back. Spending is being cut back. We are preparing for a situation—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I invite the hon. member to end his speech, please.

Mr. Cook: To conclude his remarks in five seconds. In any event these are some of the things. I wish every member would think about them and realize we cannot go on spending if we hope to have a country for the future.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, first I want to say that I agree with my hon. friend from Vancouver when he describes the reduction in cabinet salaries and the abolition of first-class air travel for MPs as cosmetic. I agree with him. I think it is tokenism. I do not think the government will score any Brownie points with that budget initiative.

I want to get on to something else. My hon. friend from Vancouver was talking about the global changes, the restructuring of the world economy. It is true. There is a major change going on. It is hard to say where it is all going to end. It is hard to say where Canada is going to wind up in this major world-wide restructuring that is going on.

What I find rather passing strange, when it comes to the budget and when you take into account the restructuring of the world economy, is this government's decision to abolish the Science Council of Canada and the Economic Council of Canada. To me, it makes no sense. It seems to me that at the very time when there is this major alteration in the world economy, and where a lot of us really do not know where we are going, it is sort of like travelling in the dark, at the very time when we need independent research and independent advice from independent bodies like the Science Council of Canada, the Economic Council of Canada, what does this government do? It abolishes them. It does not seem to make any sense.

There is no way it is going to do without some kind of consultation, without some kind of independent research. It seems to me that there will be no saving to the taxpayer. The government will have to go to independent or rather private think-tanks like, for example, the Fraser Institute which is located in his home city.

I ask the hon. member, does it make any sense to abolish these advisory bodies? It does not to me.

Mr. Cook: I have two points in regard to the hon. member's comments. The first point is this. There are parallel organizations to both the Economic Council and to the Science Council. As a matter of fact, most of the work now that the Science Council used to do is being done by an advisory group.

I come back to my initial and original point and would re-emphasize it again. They would be nice, yes. Can we afford it? I wish that question would be asked more often by more people around this place. Can we afford it?

Lots of things are nice.

An hon. member: Can you afford not to be without it?

Mr. Cook: Yes, we can afford to be without both of them because you will see the workload will not change.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. The hon. member for Beauce, who has 10 minutes.

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to say a few words about the budget. There has been a lot of comment, and editorial writers across Canada, both anglophones and francophones, expressed a lively interests this morning in the budget. I think on the whole their reaction was positive.

Yesterday, the finance minister brought down a budget that apparently sent a signal not only to the federal apparatus but to all other levels of government, including the provincial government, the municipal government and school boards across Quebec.

I visit my riding regularly, and for many months I have been meeting hundreds of people, both in my riding offices and at special events. Every time people said that governments—and when they spoke to me they meant the federal government—should cut spending and stop using the credit system they have used for 25 years.

Incidentally in early January I wrote to the Minister of Finance and told him what my constituents had said, that people were starting to have enough and were irritated to see how governments were acting. I also told him that our Quebec caucus committee on spending cuts had come up with 32 points where government spending could be cut.

Of course the government apparatus had grown fat over the years, thanks to our predecessors, and the annual deficit was out of control. When we took power in 1984 we had an accumulated debt of over $220 billion and interest rates started to climb. As a result, today we have a national debt of more than $400 billion and an annual deficit that we reduced from $38 billion to about $30.5 billion. Interest rates were steadily going up and inflation was not under control.

Today we have good news. I think that it is because of previous budgets that clearly told the public that it had to make sacrifices. As part of our economic plan, we are still trying to lower the rate of inflation.

I remember that in 1982 when I was a businessman in Beauce inflation was 13.5 per cent. Today we have reached a record 1.6 per cent, the lowest since March 1971, 21 years ago. Since our government's restrictive policies brought inflation under control and interest rates are down, I think that with a budget like the one we presented we can do good things for the people not only in Beauce but in Quebec and in Canada.

On behalf of my constituents in Beauce, I told the Minister of Finance that we had to cut in several areas. I listed them and it was publicized in Beauce. People know my position on the budget presented yesterday. I must say that our finance minister listened to his MPs, who listened to the people.

Today The Budget Papers show that drastic measures have been taken. We want to make cuts in many places: grants, contributions and other programs. On page 84, we read: "Reflecting the need to make the deficit reduction and expenditure restraint thrusts as broad as feasible, a wide spectrum of grants and contributions will be reduced. The savings will be $170 million in 1992–93, $71 million in 1993–94". People will have an opportunity to read it. Copies are available in our constituencies. All these cuts will be made so that we can have funds for new programs to stimulate employment.

We are eliminating the waste due to overlapping and duplication in the federal administration. The government machine was simply too big. We are eliminating the waste due to duplication with the private sector. There is the possibility of strenghtening particular sectors by combining related organizations and their functions and the need to postpone desirable initiatives that the government cannot afford to finance right now. We are continuing to privatize commercial activities that no longer serve the needs of public policy.

Canadians clearly indicated that they want the government to live within its means. They want a smaller burden imposed on them by the public sector. It has been mentioned that the salary of the Prime Minister and his ministers was cut by 5 per cent. This is not where the emphasis should be put. We have streamlined federal administration by cutting 46 institutes, commissions, international centres, boards, monitoring agencies and advisory committees. There are many. The axe fell on 46 of them yesterday at midnight. The equivalent of these corporations is easily found within the Department of Science and Technology where basically the same work is done.

Projects such as the Canadian Race Relations Foundation and the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute are postponed. We will merge or combine some other corporations or other groups to save money. We will privatize corporations. We will cut $2.2 billion in National Defence.

I said earlier that we have been living on credit for 25 years. We have created an excessively heavy governmental apparatus. It took a few years to streamline this apparatus, because we had to get to know the organization inside out.

The 1992 budget will cut spending by $1 billion next year and by $7 billion over the next five years. We have had to take measures that were not always popular. In the past seven years, we have made a tremendous effort to cut public spending, but I think the finance minister has now come up with the kind of proposals Canadians were waiting for.

The expenditure control plan introduced in the 1990 budget and extended by last year's budget will be broadened and deepened. Defence spending, as I said before, will be cut by a total of $2.2 billion. Non–wage operating budgets of federal departments will be cut by 3 per cent. That is a lot of money. This will save $150 million next year and $800 million over a five–year period.

First–class travel for members of Parliament, senators and senior public servants, already subject to restrictions, will be eliminated altogether. It does not make sense to have senior officials flying around the world at great expense. One senior official does not matter that much, but when you have 1,000 across the country running up this kind of expenses it is time to pull the plug.

The growth in spending by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation on social housing will be held to an average of 3 per cent per year. The government will also set aside funds to review the tax treatment of family budgets. This is important, but unfortunately I do not have enough time to expand. I do know a number of useful initiatives have been taken and that my constituents will be very pleased. Of course there are a number of so-called tax experts and economists who make sweeping statements and say that ministers' salaries should be cut by 5 per cent. The budget does more than that.

I prefer to listen to what was said by the economists who came out yesterday in support of the government. There is a reference to "Wilson's iron hand in Mazankowski's velvet glove" in Alain Dubuc's editorial in La Presse this morning. "Without necessarily being a reason to rejoice, the budget brought down yesterday afternoon will probably be the least unpopular Tory budget we have seen so far, not only because it does not hurt as much, but because for the first time the Tories have managed to square the circle; in other words, reduce the deficit and taxes simultaneously".

No tax increases, no increases in income tax, and at the same time we reduce the deficit. That is why I think we should support what the Minister of Finance is trying to do. I think that each department will go ahead and implement these decisions, decisions based on the recommendations members have made to the Minister of Finance who has listened to them. We have pleaded the good cause on behalf of our constituents. The people from Beauce will no doubt be happy to know that this budget contains no tax increases but does contain spending cuts.

[English]

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my colleague to comment on two aspects of the budget.

First, he commented about listening to his constituents and in the budget the finance minister talked about consulting with Canadians, business, labour, voluntary and social sectors, students, managers and farmers.

The finance minister also met with the provincial premiers. I know that the premier of Ontario and the premier of Alberta had asked for RRSPs to be used as down payments on homes. The finance minister for Quebec had asked for controls on government deficit. The Nova Scotia premier asked for a reduction in tax levels and the premier of Newfoundland asked for restrained government spending. These things were in the budget.

I would like him to comment on whether he believes that the finance minister listened.

The second comment was about how the finance minister was able to reallocate spending. The example is the new child tax benefit in The Budget Papers. The cost to do that particular program when it is mature is about $300 million.

However, the finance minister by the equal tax treatment of common law couples and married couples is able to save $280 million, which basically pays for the program. Is the member impressed with the finance minister's ability to reallocate spending?

[Translation]

Mr. Bernier: Mr. Speaker, I would say that the steps taken by the Minister of Finance and this government are incentives. This reallocation of spending and the ensuing cuts will do a world of good to our balance sheet a year from now. Over time I am sure this will, as my hon. colleague mentioned, give us the tools we need to keep working at creating jobs. It is clear that this cannot be done overnight, but by cutting spending we bring the deficit under control and foster low interest rates which make borrowing quite affordable for the Canadian people as well as a controlled rate of inflation. With control there is more money available for social programs.

I think the social programs listed in the 1992 budget speech are far-reaching, national programs that will benefit the Canadian people. The effects will be felt in a year or two. We could have let the deficit keep on increasing as the previous government did. The Liberals never cut expenditures during the 22 years they were in power, pleasing everybody, creating programs, spending money and helping friends. That is the role they played, but now we figure that people have had it with that kind of useless spending.

Streamlining will improve budget analysis and their application to direct job creation. I know that the incentives concerning our manufacturers contained in this budget will promote job creation in the long run. We must first maintain the jobs that are there. That is very important. Were the recession affecting only Canada there might be an easier way out, but it is world-wide. If every government in the world took steps, and particularly those in our country—I urge my provincial colleagues, the councillors and mayors at the municipal level and the school board administrators to follow our lead and to cut spending, cut surpluses and streamline—we would all be better off.

• (1800)

[English]

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to join in the debate on a very important budget at a very important time in our country's development. Every budget gives us a chance not only to comment on what the Minister of Finance has to say, but also to reflect upon the situation in the country.

I would like to address the question of the structure of the economy and the failure of this budget to address it. In the last three years, partially as a result of the free trade agreement and partially the result of a number of structural changes in the Canadian economy, the Canadian economy has been unable to create the wealth to sustain government activity. At the same time the strategy of this government has been to reinforce the failure of the private sector to create wealth, and the fact it is has only created debt itself.

We come into this budget with the reality that we have been unable to find ourselves with a presentation since the formation of this government of under $30 billion a year. The annual debt and an accumulated debt are now estimated to be in the neighbourhood of $450 billion. It does not take a genius to figure out that although it limits the government's actions every year there have to be voices in the House to say that some people are responsible for this. The responsibility of the government is to make sure that Canadians are better looked after in some changes in the way it has structured this economy and in the way it has structured this budget.

It is without apology that I say that this budget is another failure of this government to respond to the great economic malaise we find ourselves in, in the hope that people will begin to listen, to understand that other countries have found other strategies out of recessions such as this. In our history since the industrialization of Canada, whenever our government has chosen to sit back and to do nothing in times of economic crisis, the recession or the depression has only worsened. The Keynesian strategy of using capital works and public consumption to gear up the economy is one which has been successful one decade after another.

Many times people respond to me by saying that is just another cliché, that is just another Liberal position. I would like to point out that one of the major differences between the Canadian economy and the American economy is that the Americans can rely on private consumption to pull themselves out of a recession or out of a depression. In markets in excess of 250 million people, there are those who can spend their way out. The production facilities are there and so on. The logic of the American economy is to use private consumption to generate enough demand which, in turn, begins the cycle again.

In Canada, with our weak markets, our small markets, the fact that most production takes place offshore, either elsewhere in North America, in Asia or in Europe, means that the way we generate wealth in this country is entirely different. The failure of this budget to deal, first of all, with the creation of wealth is astounding. Second, the failure of this budget to deal with the consequences of not having wealth is also outstanding.

The fact that we have 10 per cent unemployment accepted as a structural reality in the Canadian economy, in this budget, is amazing. The fact that we have a UI system which translates into people being taken off UI and put on to provincial and municipal welfare systems also undermines the stability of the economy and reinforces the reality of the 10 per cent figure for unemployment which is in fact much higher.

Depending on whose figures we want to use, we have somewhere between two million to 2.5 million Canadians out of work and living either on welfare or on UI and unable to find even a temporary position, let alone full-time successful employment.

I was happy to see in this budget the government wanting to deal with a couple of questions of pressing concern in social policy. It has been a while since we have had an initiative on this government's part on the social policy front. I think it is a beginning with the question of child poverty which should be commended and should be supported. As I will note throughout my speech today, that is not sufficient in its approach, but nevertheless the minister should be congratulated on combining a white paper on the reform of the child welfare system or the child support system, along with the economic statements. I hope that the white paper provides an opportunity for the House to continue this discussion and also to have extensive discussions and consultations with groups outside Parliament.

In dealing with the question of poverty in this country, which this budget seeks to address, we have heard through one report after another of the crisis among children in poverty. This government seeks to address it by answering one of the most important components of the problem—cash in low income families. By targeting children in low income families, it helps to begin the process by providing the resources needed to look after the basics.

In the history of North American social policy, that is considered to be but one component of a multi-pronged strategy needed to answer the question of child poverty. Up to the arrival of this particular government, in the history of Canada, dating back to the 1930s, we saw a series of initiatives to deal with child poverty which have been severely undermined in the past eight years. Here I am referring, for example, to questions of food.

For the first time since the depression, we have to deal with the reality of finding food for children, either in the schools or in the food banks. It has been largely a voluntary effort and we support the voluntary organizations such as Winnipeg Harvest which have been delivering food to children for the past couple of years, but we also have to deal with the reality that these organizations need support. It has been recognized in our major urban centres of Winnipeg, Vancouver, Toronto and now Montreal that as of September publicly funded food programs will be needed in the schools. This particular budget is silent on the needs to expand the Canada assistance program to make sure children have food.

Second, one of the foundations in social policy for addressing questions of child poverty is that of the adequate provision of housing. We have, for many years, tried to put on the market in large and small centres, but particularly in large centres in Canada, as many housing units as possible so that children have a place to go to in the evening, their families have a place to sleep, all these basics which have been taken for granted.

We find in this budget, once again, a cutback in social housing. More astoundingly we find the elimination of the co-operative housing program which was an excellent process for combining the resources of individuals with the resources of government to build a significant number of units to which low income families have had access. I am very sorry to see the demise of this program. When you juxtapose it to the initiative on child benefits, you see that on the one hand the government has taken away support systems while the other hand it is putting forward the promise of other benefits.

A third area in which looking after children is very important is the area of health care. We have long used Canada's national health care system to ensure both preventive medicine as well as responsive medicine for children is available in every community. The tremendous cutbacks in transfer payments to the provinces are having a devastating effect on the health care system. This is recognized by members on all sides of this House and it has been recognized by every provincial government. We need further support for the medicare system so the basic health needs of children can be addressed.

In addition, we have used education as the major source of mobility for children. We now find that because of the offloading of costs related to changes in the UI programming and transfer payments, more and more of the problems related to inner city schooling, for example, have been put on school boards which can no longer afford the programs to support children from poor families. They can no longer support, for example, English language or French language training for new Canadians.

This means that poverty becomes a more permanent condition in our inner cities because school boards and municipalities cannot respond to the needs. They cannot respond to the needs because the taxpayer at the local level has been overburdened. That is because the province has to offload costs to protect their tax base. The province has to offload because the federal government has cut back so much.

We find, if we look at the basics of education, health care, housing and food, the government has walked away from four of the most essential ingredients in the support of children in our society.

• (1810)

I would like to take a minute to point out that one of the great gaps in this budget is dealing with aboriginal children. As we all know, we deal with aboriginal youth, particularly on reserves but also in Canada's larger cities. Very few aboriginal families are captured by the tax system and their support systems are very important.

This budget is silent on the question of aboriginal development, except to note the cutback in excess of $130 million to organizations delivering services such as child welfare, education and health care.

We find that before we discuss the actual child benefits package, we had better be sure that we understand the exact implications of the total strategy of this government. It has so undermined the life of children in this country that it now has to bring together a package which only begins to address the problems it has created for itself.

The program as outlined by the white paper attached to the budget has been welcomed by many of the groups involved with poverty and developing public policy on poverty for the past decade. In this context, the government has developed some good-will among groups which have been long seeking some income support for low income families.

The question becomes: Where does one find the money? The immediate response of this government is to argue that through the end of universality, one will make moneys available to low income families. The spectre is raised many times—it was raised by the minister today in Question Period—of why Canadian taxpayers should support a family where the income earned is $250,000.

That is not the question to be addressed. The question to be addressed is how does the ordinary Canadian working family maintain support for their children? The question does not become the traditional argument of targeting versus universality, but how does one reach out and make sure that families which need support are kept within the framework of social policy and not shunted aside?

When one begins to set aside that rhetoric of the initial position in the white paper and in the tax papers and begins to look at it more concretely, one finds that Canadians are being asked to pay a very, very high price for having the child tax benefit program.

It is only for families whose income rises above $40,000 that the benefit is marginal in this new system. Members should not forget that this is the big shift that no one wants to talk about. We are no longer talking about individual incomes, we are talking about family incomes.

The price that we are paying for the end of universality is marginal to the healthiness of the individual families that we are trying to reach.

For example, if two people are working in a family and they are both earning a very modest $25,000 a year for a total of $50,000 and if they have two children, the benefits now are going to be about $4 a month. Four dollars a month is marginal in improving the situation of your children.

As we review this budget we should be careful to make sure that Canadians understand that this package is being put together with a little bit of sleight of hand.

For many families earning $40,000, $50,000 or $55,000 a year—do not forget that according to StatsCanada, the average family income is $51,600—when you have thresholds in which you begin to decline the benefits, a lot of the benefits decline at $40,000 and also do not forget that this is indexed the same way that the pensions now are at 3 per cent each year. Every three years, you lose 10 per cent from the thresholds, you find very quickly that the average Canadian family will have access to minimal or no benefits under this.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Inflation is less than 3 per cent.

Mr. Walker: Are you going to predict that for the rest of the life of this program? I want the minister to put her reputation on the line for that. She knows very well that this is just a small window.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): I will change the statute if it gets bigger.

Mr. Walker: The minister is taking an interest in the debate. We await her questions and her participation later on.

In the meantime the government has presented a package in which each of the documents is presenting a slightly different figure as to what it is. Following the presentation of the budget, the benefits for a working couple with two children at the threshold level of $30,000 are to be about $44 in favour of these families; at $40,000, $44 in favour of these families; and then an anomaly: it is slightly more at $50,000 and drops off dramatically right after that.

I want to point out that many Canadian families in large metropolitan areas will assume when a government talks about targeting and helping out working families that it recognizes that the tax burden put upon those families in the last seven years has been very difficult for them to manage.

There have been estimates from independent agencies lately that the additional tax burden put on Canadian families is somewhere between $1,000 and $1,200. We have seen higher figures, but let us use the lower figure. Well, that is a tremendous burden when the return appears to be about $44 per year.

As we examine this proposal more closely, we will see that we must ask Canadians whether or not these benefits are worth it. I am sure the minister would be interested in examining these figures more closely in the weeks to come.

We welcome the beginning of the discussion on one of the most central issues in social policy. That is how we look after our children. We are not particularly happy to see that. We are beginning to pit one child against another.

Family income levels now become an issue as to whether a child is helped. Families with marginal incomes in metropolitan areas are deemed to be too wealthy to be helped and others to be poor enough to be helped. This segmentation in social policy within communities and neighbourhoods in the past has led to devastation and a decline in support for social programs.

This party calls upon the government not to move ahead with this budget but in fact to remove it, and particularly to set up the white paper for extensive consultation so that we may all take a better look at this child benefits package as presented in the budget.

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I was listening carefully to my hon. friend opposite. I was surprised that he would attack a program which is so fundamentally sound in its basic structure. It opens the delivery of social programs in Canada so that they are available universally to everyone, but they are delivered through the tax system based on income.

Surely he does not expect in any way that people who earn $100,000 or $200,000 a year or even more, should be getting a family allowance. We have this extraordinarily complicated system of giving out money, taking it back, giving it to one person and taking it from another person in the same family.

Can he tell me what he would propose doing to make the system simpler, more fair, and universally accessible to all families?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the question from the member for Calgary North and the question of who has access to the money.

One of the support systems we have quietly provided for Canadian families is to provide a cheque each month for several million women, although the amount has been very modest. In fact, using the figures out of the budget it is estimated that 600,000 women probably will not receive a cheque any more.

The question of who receives the cheque is very interesting. So far the white paper is silent on that. I would be interested to see how the Department of Finance, as it develops this concept of family income, which will be the first time that it has really been developed, decides who actually gets the cheque.

I speak advisedly here, not as an expert, but the sum appears to be a minimum of $100 a month, perhaps more. Then that does begin to affect the family expenditure patterns. It will be interesting to see exactly how we should all work together to make sure that the moneys are allocated properly. It is not a question of having the so-called little bit of money on the side, but in fact it is now a major amount of money to be suggested here.

• (1820)

The question of how to proceed at this point is, of course, the most interesting one facing us in the House. We welcome the opportunity to listen to people and to develop the policies as the Parliament of Canada and to see which direction to go in.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a comment with respect to the jobless because there are about 1.5 million unemployed in Canada at this time. That is a conservative estimate. Some people believe there are even more than that.

It seems that the budget is cold comfort for the people who are unemployed. While the budget is a grab bag of many things, it really does not have a major thrust in attacking the problem of unemployment in this country.

The finance minister even admitted in his speech yesterday that the unemployment rate is going to stay around the 10 per cent mark for about the next two years. That is a lot of pain, a lot of hurt, and is a terrible drag on the economy as well.

I would like to ask my friend from Winnipeg North Centre whether he feels that is a major failure of the budget.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the member for Winnipeg—St. James for the question.

In the Manitoba area it is estimated that there are at least 45,000 unemployed and that represents only those who are captured by the UI system. As my colleague well knows, that excludes aboriginal people whose figures are not even included.

The number of people not participating in the labour force in Winnipeg alone is probably 50,000. In Manitoba I would estimate it to be 75,000 to 80,000 people.

As those people get left behind and get left out of the UI training process and have no access to other training, the issue becomes absolutely critical that we find a way to put people back to work.

I was reminded by another colleague that in looking at the total amount of moneys we spend in this country on welfare and UI pay-outs, we would have a work force of considerable proportion if we could just understand that historically we put these peole to work.

Taking the strategy this year that for some reason the less work that we have for these people to do the better off we are going to be is an absolutely absurd strategy. We must take those funds available to us, recognizing that the money is already going out each week—

An hon. member: $30 billion.

Mr. Walker: If it is as my colleague says, $30 billion that means we have roughly $600 million going out each week which just disappears into the system.

There are no jobs, no hopes, no training. How do the young people at the age of 18 put themselves in a situation where they can go to school, can find jobs in the summer and can get a start? Those who are 18 and are not inclined for whatever reason to go to school, what do they do for the next decade?

We are going to wake up here at the turn of the century and, instead of having these glorious speeches about the future of the country, we are going to be trying to explain to a number of people under the age of 40 why we could not figure out what to do with them.

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity of speaking in this very important debate. I will be brief as I wish to share my time with the hon. member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve.

First of all, let me say that the budget presented by my colleague, the hon. Minister of Finance, is both a caucus budget and one which clearly responds to the needs of people, particularly the needs of families with children.

As chairman of our caucus committee on family issues, I am very pleased with this. In fact I am delighted that the minister has responded in a very significant way to the recommendations that I and some 30 of my colleagues have worked on over the last two years. In this regard, I would like to thank most sincerely all of my colleagues who have worked to prepare these proposals.

In fact, I would go so far as to say that this effort to bring about one of the most revolutionary changes in the way we deliver social programs is a near perfect example of what can be accomplished when a truly national party is given the responsibility for governing our country.

These proposals received support within our caucus from British Columbia, Alberta of course, all through the west and into Ontario. The enthusiasm and support that my colleagues in Quebec offered was truly heartwarming and I want to offer a very sincere thank you to them.

I wish that everyone in Alberta could understand at the most basic level of love of family and concern for children just how much Quebecers are like Albertans, and vice versa. We would have no trouble in keeping this country together if we could communicate on this basic level. To my colleagues in Quebec, I extend my warmest thanks.

The efforts of our caucus committee were also strongly supported by our colleagues in Atlantic Canada. They, too, understand that all Canadians want a tax system to be fair, simple and supportive of families and traditional values.

I extend to all of my colleagues my sincere thanks, but most of all I would like to thank our leader, the right hon. Prime Minister, for the direction and encouragement he has given us and the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Health and Welfare for their support and their willingness to take on a reluctant bureaucracy.

Our Prime Minister and the cabinet have clearly shown through this budget that they care about the aspirations of all Canadians.

The new integrated child tax benefit may be the most dramatic change in so far as it changes the way social programs are delivered.

But the other items, such as the new rule allowing RRSPs to be used for home purchases, the general tax reduction, the supplement for low income working families with children, and the introduction of fairness between married and common law couples are all clear indications that this government and this minister care about families, particularly families with children.

The average person in Canada has very simple aspirations. He or she wants to grow up to be a healthy, productive and happy adult, get a job, get married, buy a house, raise children, and eventually retire in reasonable comfort and watch the children go through the same cycle. I know because I am at the beginning of that watching cycle. I care very much about the future of my children and my grandchildren.

This budget speaks forcefully to these good citizens who form the backbone of our society. First of all, it says very simply and clearly that the government is no longer going to tax marriage and quite rightly so. People should not be taxed on their lifestyles.

Under the existing system married couples sometimes get a better deal than common-law couples. But common-law couples, particularly those with children, more often get tax breaks that are not available to married couples. These inconsistencies will come to an end with the implementation of this budget.

There are many initiatives in this budget that will encourage investment and create jobs. Perhaps the most important is that the manufacturing and processing income tax rate will be reduced in two steps from 23 per cent to 21 per cent. Along with this, the capital cost allowance for manufacturing and processing machinery will be improved by 5 per cent and the withholding tax rate on direct dividends will be reduced to 5 per cent.

Tax incentives for research and development will be increased by $230 million. Lower interest rates will be made available to small businesses and farmers who are in difficulty and small business loan limits will be doubled from $100,000 to $200,000.

All of these and other actions will improve the health and the investment climate in the business sector. Five hundred thousand new jobs should result.

• (1830)

As I said earlier, virtually everyone wants to own their own home. The recently announced reduction of the down payment required for a home, plus the budget initiative allowing anyone buying a home to take $20,000 from RRSPs, will put home ownership within the reach of many thousands of Canadians who could not previously afford it.

I would like to note here for our viewers and those listening at home that anyone who does not have a 1991 or earlier RRSP to use in this way and who is contemplating buying a house before the end of the year, has only two days in which to make an RRSP contribution. If he or she makes such a contribution, it should be in the form of short term, say 30 to 90 day notes, so that it can be cashed in before this opportunity expires.

Despite the fact that this option is only available for a short time, I am very pleased that our Minister of Finance has developed such a simple and safe plan to help use RRSPs to get people into their own homes while at the same time boost the home construction industry and preserve the value and purpose of RRSPs.

The real centrepiece for families in this budget is Canada's new integrated child tax benefit. This represents a totally new approach to the delivery of our basic social programs. The present system is a jumble of contradictions and complicated taxback systems that are based on an outmoded, flat rate concept of universality. This new proposal says that the child tax benefit should be paid through the tax system, that it should be based on income, and that it should be universally available to everyone. This is the proper form of universality. People earning $100,000 this year do not get it, but if their income drops to $20,000 next year they get it.

I am pleased that the Minister of Finance has decided to base the child tax benefit on family income. This combined with his decision to eliminate the difference between married and common law couples will mean that the tax system will be much fairer, and when it comes to taxes fairness is the key to their acceptability.

The future health of our nation is based on our ability to raise children to be physically and psychologically healthy and productive adults. This is the only real insurance that we have for the sustainability of our society.

I am very pleased therefore that the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Health and Welfare have developed this child tax benefit and that they have included in it a supplement for low income working families, with children. The supplement, which may be up to $500 will assist those families who may not have access to subsidized child care to get out from under the welfare trap. As it reduces with increasing income it is consistent with the over-all model of delivering social support that is reduced as income levels improve.

There are many other ways in which the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister have shown that they care about the circumstances and aspirations of Canadians and that they listen to their caucus colleagues who bring these concerns and advice to them.

I could list a few in these last minutes I have to speak: assisting Canadians with disabilities; improving their medical expense deductions; giving them education credits; recognizing disability pensions as earned income; and such other things for the environment we live in as removing taxes from ethanol and gasoline mixtures; helping students, very much another family issue, by increasing their education credits; and making retirement plans more flexible. All these things show a sense of caring and concern for Canadians. Cutting the government's own expenditures has been its most important action because in this way we can afford to do all of this without increasing the deficit.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to say that the member for Calgary North should be congratulated. I for one think that he has done terrific work in looking at ways to reform and simplify the basic tax system. We have had some exchange of paper and I know his heart is in this issue and that he is heading in the right direction.

The one thing that puzzles me about this idea—and it is not dissimilar to some of the ideas we have been exploring in the single tax—is why they would wait until January 1993. Here we are in February 1992. The member has been working on this issue, as he said, for a couple of years. He has refined it fairly well.

I think there is a bit of an illusion going on here. It is tantalizing but it really does not come into effect until a year from now. Right now families are in desperate need of this kind of assistance.

Since he is chairman of that special committee and he has obviously had some direct influence on the Minister of Finance to get this issue implemented, does he not think it would ring more true if he could get it implemented by, say, the end of the tax period at the end of April?

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate very much my hon. colleague's comments and his interest in what he calls the single tax and what I have been calling the integrated flat tax. This is a very important concept. I have read at great length his own work in that area. I also respect and compliment what he has done there.

As far as the timing of the implementation of this proposal is concerned, he may have noticed that when I was speaking I talked about a reluctant bureaucracy. We have been working for some time on this issue and certainly have had considerable support, but it has been a very difficult sell to make such a fundamental change, as he might understand. Because of that, I would say the change has only been agreed upon in the last couple of months and it takes a good year to take something this complex and implement it. I am sure that is why the department has allowed itself the time to do that and the minister needs the time to consider all the ramifications.

The key issue here and what we can celebrate is the minister and the Prime Minister's commitment to this very fundamental change which will improve, I am sure, the way we deliver social programs in Canada.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, this is mostly a comment, but if there is time I hope the member will answer.

I salute him on his efforts for fair taxation for families. I would like to tell him something that a friend of mine who has six children told me yesterday. He told me something I did not know. He is a stockbroker, I should admit. Other than the banks and utilities last year, there was not a single company listed on the Toronto Stock Exchange that made any money.

The government which he supports is dumping gold as fast as it can get it out the doors of the Bank of Canada. The last country that did that, Moscow, stopped doing it a year ago when it ran out of gold. Canada is doing it now at an horrendous rate, to put it mildly. His point is that six gold mines have closed in the past year. We are selling off gold bought at 40 cents an ounce for $400 an ounce for two reasons. One is to keep the dollar at the 84-cent level, which as he said is bankrupting most of Canadian industry, particularly our mining and natural resources sector. The second is to try to come up with a phoney figure for the deficit by selling off the topsoil, so to speak.

I wonder if he has any comments on the fundamental economic policy his government has reflected once again in this budget.

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member's facts are right, I would share his concern. I for one believe that we should have a somewhat lower dollar, not too low. From the western resource producers' perspective, I believe that would be appropriate.

• (1840)

As far as his comment that companies on the stock exchange are not making money is concerned, I think he will rejoice with me or celebrate with me the fact that we have reduced the manufacturing and processing income tax rate and that this should provide some relief in that area.

[Translation]

Mr. Allan Koury (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to participate in this debate on the 1992 budget. I would like to highlight a few points for the benefit of my constituents in Hochelaga-Maisonneuve.

I am thrilled with the improved taxation for families and I must congratulate my colleague from Calgary North for his efforts and hard work. We will simplify, streamline and improve the assistance we give to 2.9 million families and 2.3 million children in Quebec. Nationally benefits will increase by 400 million dollars a year.

National Health and Welfare Canada has proposed, in a white paper, the new integrated child tax benefit. Canadians know that our future prosperity and well-being depend on our children. Undoubtedly, according to international standards, Canadian children are in very good health and receive good care and education.

Of course parents are chiefly responsible for seeing to the needs of their children, as we have long recognized through our public programs such as family allowances and the assistance provided in our tax system. Those programs will be totally restructured and substantially enriched. The actual patchwork of federal measures made up of three different child benefit programs—family allowances, child tax credit and refundable child tax credit—will be replaced by one single monthly benefit for children under 18.

The new benefit will be as much as $144 per month per child for a total of $1,733 a year. It will also include a new earned-income supplement of up to $500. This benefit will represent a supplementary assistance for working low to middle-income families.

Furthermore benefits will be based on family income rather than personal income and that improves the fairness of this new program. A single monthly benefit is more simple, more efficient and better adapted to the needs of a family than the actual system which sometimes has the families wait for many months before they get a payment.

The budget also provides assistance to families by changing the deduction for child care expenses. The maximum child care expense deduction will be increased by $1,000 to $5,000 for each child under age seven and to $3,000 for other eligible children.

We will make it easier to own property, by letting Quebec families use funds already invested in their RRSPs. Individuals will be able to use up to $20,000. This means that if there are two people in a family, a husband and a wife, and they each have $20,000, they can invest $40,000 in this home and in the next 10 years they will be able to save $4,000 annually to put back into their fund. This means that they can repay in 10 years, instead of 15, the $40,000 previously invested in a registered retirement savings plan and used to buy or build a house. This measure, which takes effect immediately and will apply until March 1, 1993, will make it easier to buy a house and be a big boost to the economy. Those who take advantage of it will have 15 years to repay the amount withdrawn from their RRSP. As I just told you, they can also do so in 10 years.

The Home Buyers' Plan will help Canadians take advantage of mortgage rates that are now lower than ever, as well as of moderate prices for homes. It will also help buyers benefit from the recently announced reduction in the down payment required for a CMHC-insured mortgage.

This new plan will contribute to renewed growth in the housing sector this year. According to the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, housing starts should increase 15 per cent this year. The real estate industry will benefit from the improved economic climate and lower interest rates. Homes have never been so affordable in the past 10 years, except for a brief period in 1985.

As for providing greater assistance to the disabled, new measures improve the help given to some 42,000 handicapped people in Quebec in order to reduce the disincentives to work that hold them back. The list of expenses eligible for the medical expenses tax credit will be expanded, as will the list of expenses eligible for the tax deduction for modifications by businesses to buildings and devices to assist Canadians with disabilities.

Furthermore, the education tax credit will now be made available to disabled individuals who attend post-secondary educational institutions on a part-time basis, while the definition of earned income for the purposes of pensions will be expanded.

With the increase in education credit, the budget provides additional tax relief to students, who are our most important resource. The amount on which the education credit is calculated will be increased from $60 to $80 per month of full-time study, starting with the 1992 fiscal year. The limit on the total amount of tuition fees and education credits which can be transferred to another taxpayer will be raised from $600 to $680.

The personal income surtax will be reduced. All 4.7 million Quebec taxpayers will benefit as a result of the reduction in the general surtax. It will drop from 5 per cent of basic tax to 4 per cent on July 1, 1992, and to 3 per cent on January 1, 1993. This will increase Canadians' after-tax income by $500 million in 1992-93, and by more than $1.2 billion per year thereafter. All taxpayers will benefit.

Principal residences will continue to be fully exempt from tax on capital gains. The $500,000 exemption for small business will not be affected. The federal budget will encourage economic recovery and promote economic growth and job creation. A number of actions will be taken to encourage initiative and productive investment. These measures will promote the healthy growth of the private sector, which is, after all, the only true source of economic growth and job creation.

The manufacturing and processing sector accounts for almost one-fifth of Canada's economy and its jobs. With over 40 per cent of its output exported, this sector has been particularly hard hit by the restructuring of the global economy.

• (1850)

To help the manufacturing and processing sector meet the challenges of globalization, the manufacturing and processing tax rate will be reduced from 23 per cent to 22 per cent, effective January 1, 1993, with a further reduction to 21 per cent on January 1, 1994. The capital cost allowance rate will be increased for manufacturing and processing machinery from 25 to 30 per cent, effective for acquisitions made after today. Hence, the Canadian rate will match the rate in the U.S.

Thanks to these two measures, revenues in this sector will reach $40 million in 1991–1992 and as much as $750 million in 1996–1997.

New activity in all sectors will be encouraged by reducing the withholding tax rate on direct dividends to 5 per cent. This will help Canada compete for international direct investment.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, I have a short observation and a question for my hon. friend from the province of Quebec.

I do not know whether my good friend from Quebec has a co-op housing development in his riding, but I do. I naturally have visited that housing project in my riding. I have talked to the residents there and they are mighty proud of their facility. In this particular development there are elderly people, pensioners, and they are very, very happy with the facility. I have not talked to them today, but I am sure that they are very distressed over the announcement coming from the budget that the co-operative housing program has been eliminated by the government.

I should point out that the housing program was certainly a cost-efficient program. It delivered affordable housing to seniors, single parents, disabled and low income earners. Despite the fact that the government sees a saving of something like $25 million over the elimination of the program, I would like to ask my friend from Quebec how he feels about the abolition of the program, whether he thinks it makes sense.

[Translation]

Mr. Koury: Mr. Speaker, being an expert in housing in Montreal, it will be easy for me to explain to my colleague the co-operative housing phenomenon.

When you talk about senior citizens, you talk about people who live mostly in low cost housing units. That will continue to exist.

I have built 741 co-operative housing units, and it caused a problem in the Montreal area. People left their residences to move into co-operative or low cost housing units, leaving a whole lot of apartments vacant. Entire buildings are empty. I met people in my riding. Some apartments stayed vacant for 19 months. I know from experience that these people pay taxes but they do not have enough income. Their income is insufficient but they are taxed just the same.

They have to pay the co-ops, but they did not lease their residence. There are lots of apartments like this in Montreal. The present vacancy rate is 7.2 per cent. There has to be a freeze somewhere because people contributing to co-ops will not be able to go on doing so and a disaster is bound to happen. There should be a freeze so that vacant units will be filled and will stay that way. If subsidies are handed out, they should be given to needy people through their revenue. I think it is the best system. Everybody will have some revenue even if they get subsidies. At least, these units will not be vacant while more units are being built and the vacancy rate is 7.2 per cent. It could even reach 7.5 per cent by next summer.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it was interesting to be in the lockup yesterday and be able to look over the budget and look at the pretty gloss on the budget documents, the budget speech and the budget papers. The initial reading of our finance minister's budget speech was one that left sort of a warm fuzzy feeling. And then, as it started sinking in, you realized that what was inside the shiny cover was in fact not as shiny or as bright as it first appeared. I would suggest that in fact it was a cosmetic approach to soften the image of the harsh realities of the last seven and a half years of Tory rule in Canada.

It was interesting to look at some of the press comments, some of the editorials that have been printed today. Particularly interesting was The Globe and Mail which emphasized to me exactly what I had seen when I started, after reading the speech, going into the papers and finding out the harsh realities of what was behind the cosmetic approach. What I found was the same old wrinkled face with a lot of cosmetics caked on it.

In The Globe and Mail they say: "Budget illusion: Some Smoke, Some Mirrors", and in the first paragraph they state: "The latest federal budget accomplishes a neat trick, it stands still but gives the illusion of movement". That is exactly the way I feel about that particular budget. It does give you that warm fuzzy feeling. It does make you feel that, maybe they are doing something, but under scrutiny and under analysis it is obvious that it has gone nowhere.

I would like to touch on a number of things in this budget that concern me, a number of things that I believe are the harsh realities of where this government has gone instead of where it should have gone.

There are a number of things. Perhaps first of all I should say that all in the budget certainly is not bad. There are some positive things. Being a person who likes to talk about the positive, let me talk about some of the positive things. Unfortunately, some of the positive things are tempered by negatives.

I personally feel, as does my party, that the Registered Retirement Savings Plan situation is a good one. The use of Registered Retirement Savings Plans at a time when an injection needs to be made into the economy, particularly in central Canada, makes sense. It makes sense to be able to use some money that is already saved at a reasonable rate and to be paid back over a period of time, thereby answering the critics who say it is for retirement.

• (1900)

Through the use of this particular instrument, it makes it possible for those who have some Registered Retirement Savings Plans but may have difficulty in purchasing a home. That is a positive, but if you analyse what is in the Registered Retirement Savings Plan program, you see that in fact they have opened it up so it can be stacked between spouses. In other words, a husband and a wife can use $40,000 of the Registered Retirement Savings Plan to make a down payment, but it is not for first home buyers. A recommendation of the subcommittee on finance was made within the last few weeks to the Minister of Finance, that it be for first time home buyers only, not necessarily for a new home but for existing housing, thereby helping those who may have been having problems.

By doing what they have done, in effect they have made a situation possible where a couple could live in a home and decide to upgrade. A couple, for instance, my age, who have had the opportunity of paying into registered retirement savings plans and perhaps have $20,000 each in that plan, can pull out the $40,000, move to a new home. There is nothing stopping them from renting out the existing home they have, using their $40,000 out of their Registered Retirement Savings Plan, interest free for 15 years, and taking any benefit that they have from that particular situation.

That, it seems to me, is once again assistance to those who are in a position already to purchase a home, but opening up a loophole to take bigger advantage of their taxable income.

The upside of this, of course, particularly in the riding of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt where we have a good number of saw mills and lumber mills, is hopefully it will create housing starts so that we can begin to sell more lumber and get our economy in those areas going, increasing employment, increasing all of the things we need in the area to get things under way. On the other hand, a little further along we see that the government has cut out over a five-year period $622 million from social housing and terminated co-op housing immediately, costing $25 million.

Those who use the social housing provisions, those who use the co-op housing are normally those in the lower end of the economic scale, those who cannot afford to purchase a house, those who do not have Registered Retirement Savings Plans and certainly do not have $20,000 in Registered Retirement Savings Plans, if they have any in order to put into new housing. They are the ones who usually buy into co-ops so that they have a price they can afford and still say they own their own place. They take pride in that fact that they have been able to bring up their family in housing that they own and that they maintain. They know they can either pass it on or have an investment at some time in their future.

In this budget the government built in something for those who can already afford it while taking away, on the other hand, from those who cannot afford it.

It does not seem to be fair. It seems to be the policies that I have seen over the last seven and a half years, and the policies that I have particularly seen over the last three years while I have been sitting as a member of this House, where we have two classes of people.

We have those who have and those who have not, the rich and the poor. More and more we see the whittling away of the middle class, those in between who can afford a little bit of something. Through taxation, the policies of this government, free trade, increases in unemployment insurance, GST, clawback and you name it, more and more it has hit the middle income earners.

It is interesting to look further and see that in the course of the budget we talk about streamlining. I have no objection to streamlining. I have no objection to making government services more available to the average Canadian. In fact if it were simply that, I would applaud it.

It is interesting to look at the way they talk about it and the type of language they use in the budget papers for this streamlining. They talk about measures to promote improved government service to Canadians.

In the next sub-title, they talk about co-location of services in urban centres and single window services in smaller centres. This does not mean moving all federal public servants in a given city into a single building. That sort of massive relocation would not be cost efficient. Rather, it means co-locating points of service delivery in a rational way and over time to provide better, more convenient service at the lowest possible cost.

If that means giving better service, fine. If it means a continued assault on the rural towns and villages of Canada, then I and my party certainly say: "No. No more. We have had enough". We in the small communities have watched as they have gutted our rural post offices and set up privatized post offices.

We are fighting that right now in Penticton. We are trying to keep the jobs in Penticton, a community of 2,600 where they have closed the main post office. They have privatized and now have threatened 12 more sorting jobs and moving in this type of so-called increase in service to a larger community to the north, Kelowna.

Twelve jobs to a population of 26,000 are a lot of jobs, but I look at this. Does co-location mean taking services and moving them into the larger centres? For instance, in Penticton, we have about 30 people employed by the federal government in veterans' services. They service the whole southeast part of British Columbia, from Merritt in my riding across to the border in Kootenay East.

Does this co-location of service mean that they are going to move this service to Kelowna or Kamloops? It would cost another 30 jobs in the city of Penticton, on top of the potential 12 jobs lost in the post office. If that means also the movement of the Ministry of Health and Welfare, Old Age Security and Canada Pension Branch that employ about three people in that same building with the veterans' services to somewhere else, perhaps to Kelowna, making all of the people in the south end of the Okanagan Valley use a telephone when they are seniors who like to deal face to face, then I say no. My party says no. Enough of this gutting of rural Canada. Let's make services better for people, but let's serve the people. Let's serve the people who we are supposed to be serving. Let's be reasonable about this.

In my critic area of small business, I note in the budget that there are supposed to be some benefits. It seems that they spend a lot of time in the budget papers talking about how good they have been and how well off small business is. Certainly, if we look at the bankruptcy figures over the last two or three years in particular, I think you will agree with me, Mr. Speaker, that they have not been very kind to small business in Canada. In fact the fiscal and monetary policies of this government are driving small business into bankruptcy, into receivership. In some cases those who have not gone broke are moving across the border.

What have they done? They have set up in this budget a small business financing program. Under this program the small business corporation or the unincorporated business will be able to issue small business financing instruments. In talking to the finance department officials, it appears that this is lifted straight out of a bond issue situation act that was prior to 1987 and will probably only apply to banks. Does this mean it is an effort to simply ensure that banks have the opportunity of added insurance against loss? It does not appear to be.

If there was an investor, that investor would be able to come and buy in. In fact, by the next page we see that it is restricted to corporations, individuals who are viewed as being unable to obtain ordinary financing and who are already in financial difficulties. If they have to go out and get the financing because they are in financial difficulty, it is very unlikely that any of the financial institutions are going to take the chance anyway. If they are in financial difficulty, you can be certain that they have already got chattel mortgages and mortgages. They have already got their book accounts tied up. They do not have anything with which to bargain. Who is going to come in after all as a lending institution and take exactly the same amount that they could get by lending somewhere else? It is just not going to happen. It is more window dressing. It is more smoke and mirrors. It is an attempt, it appears to me, to look like they are trying to help the small business community, but it is doubtful that it will work.

The Small Businesses Loans Act increase to $200,000 is applaudable but once again, as has been pointed out in some speeches and questions in the House already, it is apparent that most small businesses are not aware of the Small Businesses Loans Act and, if they were, would not use it at any rate. It is very cosmetic. They have not really looked at the source of what the problem is for the small business community. You do not have to look very far when you look in here and you see that the goods and service tax is bringing in money, and you see what is has cost the small business community over the last year and some months since it was instituted.

Throughout my riding and throughout a number of other ridings across Canada that I have been in since January 1, 1991, it is apparent that not only the small business community has been hurt by the GST. It is apparent that even larger industries, including the forest industry in my area, have all complained about the problems with the GST, the problem with compliance costs. It is interesting to look at the estimates of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. Their estimate of the cost to business in 1991 is a staggering $6.6 billion to collect the GST for the federal government. They estimate that the cost in 1991 of complying with the collection costs for the GST to small business is $4.5 billion.

This is added on top of the problem they already have in people being so annoyed at the goods and service tax that they are not purchasing any more. They are annoyed that those in the band across lower Canada against the United States border are going across into the United States to buy their goods and in many cases buy their services.

We have to look very carefully at the goods and services tax. There is nothing in this except some wonderful words telling us that the goods and services tax is on target.

It may be on target but it is certainly hurting everyone. If the arrow has hit the target, it is killing small business. I think this government has to face up to that fact and has to do something about it.

Even the Canadian Federation of Independent Business and other businesses have suggested to the government that if it cannot harmonize, cannot knock off the tax on certain things that people normally use or need, such as fuel services and whatnot that are so expensive in Canada, then it should get rid of the goods and services tax. To that I heartily agree.

In order to get this economy going, the government was warned it must drop the goods and services tax.

What hope has this budget given to the average man on the street? Nothing. The government talks about tax breaks, a 1 per cent cutback in the surcharge. That amounts to some $19 in the first year to a person with a $30,000 income. What is that going to do for the economy? That is really something, $19 in the first year. While the government gives $19, it takes back in the other hand.

In this budget the Minister of Finance has admitted to the end of universal family allowance. The first major step was the clawback. The second major step was the admission that universality had ended. Today, family allowance; tomorrow, old age pension. Will it be medicare in the future?

I will fight against this. I will fight against cutbacks in the old age security. I will fight against universality attacks by this government in the future on medicare.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, I think there was a sigh of relief right across the country when it was discovered yesterday that there were no tax increases in the budget.

Most Canadians feel that they are taxed far too heavily. They are fed up with the rate of taxation in the country, so there was that sigh of relief.

However, when we look at the figures, one has to put these tiny decreases in perspective. The previous speaker from British Columbia alluded to this. When it comes to a family earning $40,000, the surtax decrease will be only $27. By the way, that is after raising the taxes $1,000 in recent years. For a one-earner couple with two children, earning $20,000, the finance minister is going to give them a $6 relief. For families earning $15,000, there will be a whopping $2 cut in taxes.

It seems to me that we cannot get the cuts much smaller than that. I would like to know what my friend from British Columbia felt about that.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, it is interesting that the smoke and mirrors continue. This is part of the smoke and mirrors where the government can actually say: "We did give you a tax cut".

It is also interesting to look on the other side of it, when we look at the cost of unemployment insurance over the last little while, where the money is going for unemployment insurance.

The government says that it is supposed to go into training. It does some shifting around and yet it does not do any training. The increase in the unemployment insurance that will kick into effect this year in effect raises the taxes on the average employer and on the average employee. They are all going to have to kick in more for that particular aspect of it.

Let me just say one other thing. One of the other cuts that hits hard at a time of high unemployment—and high unemployment means higher taxes because we all have to kick in or we will have higher deficits—the government has cut $1 million from Canadian Jobs Strategy.

• (1920)

That is an area that has been well used by a number of our ridings, a number of areas within Canada and certainly, within the area of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt.

Those types of cuts in my area where the unemployment rate is over 4 per cent higher than the national average cuts hard. The cost of that is incalculable.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the member mentioned unemployment insurance and the cutbacks in retraining funds, despite the fact that there was supposed to be $1.8 billion in the charge-back fund.

Most everybody will understand and recognize the fact that the Department of Employment and Immigration will allow an individual to take a 12, 16 or 20-week course, then go back to the department and may get approved for a separate and isolated program from the first program and if successful, may go for a third separate program.

He or she may get approved for three separate years of training on three different programs, but have refused to approve training for two or three consecutive years which makes eminent sense so that at the end of a retraining program you come out with a certificate.

I have been told by the people in Ottawa that the program is inconsistent across the country. Some employment offices are proceeding with approvals for two and three-year training programs and others have not. It is just a mess.

The people who work in the employment centres have no idea where to go with this. They are saying: "They are grey areas. We are not getting any instruction". They are working on it, but one has to wonder about the sensibility of such an action.

If we want to retrain people, let us do it properly. Let us retrain them so that at the end of their program they have something to show for it, that they really are retrained. I suspect it is somewhat rhetorical, but I would like the member to comment on that.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, what I have seen in my area is a similar problem, where there is a lack of consistency between one area and the other.

One of the problems we are running into in those areas through all unemployment retraining programs and for most unemployment insurance programs, is that because of cutbacks people are not getting proper instruction.

People are overburdened with work and cannot keep up with the massive number of applications for either retraining or unemployment insurance. It is a problem.

When they talk about streamlining service I really question that. In my area I have seen that dismantling of the service is closer to the truth of what is happening and that people have to wait and go on welfare.

Over the last few weeks I have had people come to my office from the social services areas around my riding telling me that they cannot get UI and they have had to apply for social assistance. They cannot get job retraining, they have to wait. Some of them have missed the deadline because of the long delays.

It is a never-ending problem with these people and this government simply turns its back and says: "We are going to streamline the service".

I agree with the member for Broadview—Greenwood. In fact, they are dismantling all of the systems. The service is going straight downhill. People are not getting what they pay for. They are not getting what they expect and they certainly are not getting what they need.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, thank you for allowing me to take part in this debate. As I begin tonight, I want to quote from the speech of the Minister of Finance yesterday:

> I wanted a budget that would deliver a strong bottom line: one that supports the well-being of Canadians and their families; one that promotes the success of our business people in expanding and creating jobs; one that contributes to a strong and more united Canada. And that's the bottom line of the budget I am delivering today.

I think most of us in this House who have analysed that budget would concur with the minister. He has done that.

I go back to a phrase that the minister often uses. I think it is the theme of his budget: "getting the fundamentals correct" or "strengthening the fundamentals". I think he has done that in this budget. What are those fundamentals? Let us look at some of them and maybe help explain them to Canadian people this evening.

The first thing I want to mention with regard to those fundamentals is inflation. It has just been reported that inflation at this point in time in Canada is the lowest it has been in 20 years. It is coming in now at an annual rate of about 1.6 per cent. That is one of those important fundamentals that has to be there for a number of reasons.

We have had many people in our society who have been hurt by the ravages of inflation, not only businesses but our elderly. If we go back to the old rule of 72, which is what they call it in the investment world, any combination of numbers that would equal 72 would give us how much incomes can be eroded when we are taking a look at inflation. If we are taking a look at inflation at 12 per cent for six years, that amounts to 72 per cent. Imagine what that does compounded on top of other expenses with regard to the real income of average Canadians. We can also apply that with regard to incomes.

The minister has pointed out quite well in this House in recent days that if we can get down to a 2 per cent or 3 per cent annual rate of inflation, the demands by the work force in Canada with regard to wages will come down as well. They will understand that a 5 per cent or 6 per cent increase in wages in relation to a 2 per cent or 3 per cent inflation rate is much better than a 15 per cent wage increase when they are looking at inflation of 11 per cent or 12 per cent.

That fundamental of getting inflation under control is a very important one. As I say, it not only affects our senior citizens but also the working class. I believe that the minister has done that.

If we take a look at interest rates, we see that right now in Canada they are the lowest they have been in 20 years. That has to be good for investment. It is not only good for investment but it is also good for homeowners, those people who are considering purchasing new homes.

As pointed out earlier, the difference between interest rates today and what they were 10 years ago reduces a mortgage on a $75,000 home by over $300 per month. That is very important to recognize because it is a saving for those individual families.

Going back to my opening remarks with regard to inflation, if we are paying less that means we have to earn less. Our demands on our employer are not as great and we have freed up some money to do other things with. Again, it is a very important concept which I think the Canadian people now understand more than they did last year because they can see clear evidence in their daily lives that it is working.

Again I go back to interest rates today versus where they were last year and certainly where they were two years ago. If I go back 10 years, I know we were in the 22 per cent range with regard to interest rates.

• (1930)

Along with that we have to take a look at the value of the Canadian dollar. In Canada we have not decided yet whether we like a low dollar or a high dollar, but we do want a stable dollar. Those fundamentals have to be there in order to achieve a stable dollar, a stable currency. That means the other part of the equation, the debt burden we carry as Canadians, has to be stabilized as well.

That leads me into some of what the minister pointed out yesterday with regard to our debt situation or our deficit situation on an annual basis. He is going to maintain the deficit at somewhere in the order of $31.4 billion this year. Next year it will tumble to $27 billion and go down by approximately $5 billion the year after that. Our target was to reach a point of zero borrowing, where we were actually bringing in revenue not only to pay down the debt and pay the interest on it but simply pay off the principal amount of the debt. That is the secret to the big equation. That is something we have not been able to do as a government, because for many years leading up to 1984 that debt was allowed to multiply at such a rate that when we assumed office we could not generate the necessary dollars to pay it off.

I think that target of being able to pay off the debt or pay down the principal in the year 1995, 1996 or 1997 is achievable. Last year, despite the downturn in the economy, and it was a very tough year, we did not do all that badly. On the revenue side the minister is pretty well on target. Despite a recessionary year he brought the thing in pretty close to target. This year, with an expected growth of something in the order of 3 per cent, I think the goal the minister has set for himself and the government is very achievable.

We have heard in the last number of days—and we have heard it in the House today as well—about the failure of the government to kick-start the economy or jump-start the economy. That brings me back, when I talk about kick-starting or jump-starting the economy, to an editorial I read the other day in The Globe and Mail. It read: "If I hear that term kick-start or jump-start one more time, I am going to call a taxi. When will these people realize that the economy is not like a car engine? It is not like a generator of money that you simply put a charge into it and off you go". We have proven as a country over the years that that just does not work. I do not think we want to follow that course knowing that at the end of the day someone has to pay the bills. Our inability to pay the bills has put us into the difficulty we are in today.

We are not going to follow that course. I am very glad to see that the minister has not taken that course. The only way out of debt is to earn our way out of it, work our way out of it, pay it down and pay it off. We are not going to fall into that trap of kick-starting or attempting to jump-start that money machine. It just does not work.

One interesting statistic that I am very proud of in relation to the government is our percentage of debt in relation to our Gross Domestic Product. If we take a look at our projected deficit and in fact what the deficit is today, we have made remarkable progress. In 1984 the ratio of debt to Gross Domestic Product was in the order of 9 per cent, slightly less than 9 per cent. I think it was 8.7, to be exact. Now we are just a little over 4 per cent. We have cut it in half.

It is very interesting to note that some countries in the western world have gone the other way. As we are going down they are going up. I think we are on the correct course because the Canadian economy, as it grows and as we take the types of measures that we have to take and were taken in the budget yesterday, that number will get even smaller. It is a very encouraging number. It does point to some of the things we have done as a government in relation to the fundamentals. It clearly indicates that we do have them right.

One of the topics the minister mentioned yesterday was in relation to interprovincial trade barriers. It is very important that the minister addressed it. As we know, it is one of the proposals that we are trying to address in our constitutional package. I am pleased to see that the minister did address those yesterday.

There are about 500 interprovincial trade barriers between the 10 provinces in this country. At the end of the day they cost us a lot of money. The economists tell us that it costs the average family of four anywhere from $1,000 to $2,500 a year, depending on whose figure you want to accept. It does cost us something. That cost is felt in communities all across this country.

I believe that it is imperative we address these interprovincial trade barriers, especially when we are negotiating and working through our trade agreements with other countries, whether it is with the United States through the FTA or internationally through the GATT.

As we continue to eliminate some of the trade distorting practices and barriers between countries, we have to take a strong look at what we can do here at home.

We have been attacked or broadsided on universality and that is putting it mildly. One of the things the minister said yesterday in relation to incomes for poor families, and especially for children in poor families, is very refreshing, and that is the system of payment that will go to families which need it. I quote, as the minister did earlier today in the House, what the premier of New Brunswick said about child allowance. He said that there is something ridiculous about a system that allows someone with $100,000 to get child allowance. There are people in my neighbourhood and your neighbourhood who have trouble feeding their families. We should develop a system that addresses the problem a little more realistically. This is what the minister did yesterday.

It was also refreshing to hear yesterday that RRSPs can be used for a down payment on a new or existing home for one year. For example, a married family with both partners having RRSPs would be able to double the $20,000 to $40,000. This is good news for the housing market. It will only be for one year. We are going to try it and we will see how it works. It should be a big boost for the housing people.

In relation to the family, the minister announced that common law couples will not be taxed less than traditional families. It goes back to one of the policies brought forward by our member from Calgary North in support of the family unit. Part of that is the payment that will go to those families in need but the other part of the equation is a fairer tax system for the traditional family. The minister will make that change as well.

• (1940)

The ceiling for small business financing is being raised. In fact it is being doubled, I believe, from $100,000 to $200,000.

Some government agencies are to be eliminated. I have this one highlighted in the budget speech because it is quite interesting. I will step through this if I have the time.

There are a total of 46 separate government agencies that will be affected by the streamlining measures that were outlined yesterday by the minister. Some of these agencies will be wound up or eliminated completely, some will be deferred, others will merge with other agencies. I want to mention some of these. It is important because it is a saving of about $22 million.

I read through this list today for the first time. There are agencies in it I did not know existed. At the end of the day it costs the Canadian taxpayers $22 million. I will mention some of them: the Law Reform Commission, the International Centre for Ocean Development, the Veterans Land Administration, the Petroleum Monitoring Agency, the Agricultural Products Board, the Demographic Review Secretariat, CN (West Indies) Steamships Limited—there is one I did not know about—the Science Council of Canada, the Economic Council of Canada, the Pay Research Branch. That is a new one. The Canadian Environmental Advisory Council, the International Aviation Advisory Task Force and Committee, the National Advisory Committee on Development Education, the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council and on and on and on the list goes.

Some agencies will be merged and some corporations will be privatized: for example, the Co-operative Energy Corporation, the Cape Breton Development Corporation, the Royal Canadian Mint and the Blainville Motor Vehicle Test Centre, one which I have never heard of.

I think those are all good moves on the part of the minister. As the minister pointed out yesterday, these were signals or messages that he was getting from all Canadians, not just parliamentarians, not just provincial ministers, but ordinary citizens. I have had some of those letters, as all of us have in this House, on ways that the government could cut costs and at the same time maintain services.

I believe that the minister has struck a good balance in this budget. As the member for Fundy—Royal mentioned yesterday, he has been in this House since 1978 and he says it is the first time that he can recall a budget coming in where there was absolutely no tax increases, not even hidden tax increases. I think that is encouraging. A signal was clearly given by the Canadian people, one that the minister acknowledges, that we are heavily taxed as Canadians and at some point we have to draw the line. I think he has drawn it very clearly.

To conclude, before we go into questions and answers and responses, in 1984 this government promised, through the life of its mandate, one million jobs. At the time the government was criticized by all opposition parties, but the fact is that in the life of that first Conservative government, led by our present Prime Minister, we did not create a million jobs. We created 1.5 million. We overshot our objective. We are going to do it again because in this budget the minister is suggesting and anticipating job creation in the order of 500,000 new jobs by the end of 1993.

Because I believe the fundamentals are correct in this budget and the minister is doing the types of things that we have to do, I believe that 500,000 jobs by the end of 1993 will materialize and we will exceed that figure as well.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the member a question. Is it not true that his government has added 34 new taxes, including the GST, which struck disproportionately at low and middle income Canadians?

Is it not true that the government has more than doubled the national debt since taking office, from about $168 billion to $420 billion? Is it not true that it has wreaked havoc for both our manufacturing and natural resource sectors by maintaining the Canadian dollar and interest rates far too high for far too long?

As I said to a member a while ago, they are selling approximately 300,000 ounces of gold monthly on average at the Bank of Canada in an attempt to reduce the deficit and to keep the dollar at levels which are wreaking havoc among Canadians in terms of unemployment.

Is it not true that virtually no Canadian company except the chartered banks and utilities made any profits last year? I am talking about companies listed on the Toronto Stock Exchange, for example. They have allowed the situation to develop in which foreigners now hold about $330 billion in the debt of our national government, our provincial governments and the private sector.

Is it any wonder that The Economist magazine this week, taking 13 advanced industrialized democracies, put us ahead only of Sweden in terms of our economic prospects for the next year. They talk about investment. Why would any intelligent person invest in an economy which has a government that is so bad? In my view, there is not a worse government anywhere in the democratic world, a government that knows so little about basic economics, about creating jobs and keeping jobs that it has done the kind of things I just mentioned.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, to respond to the member, it is bizarre when you think of it. Here is a guy sitting on the other side of the House now who ran for this government in 1984. He sat on this side of the House for four solid years. He ran for this party in 1988 and deserted us when the going got tough. That is the type of guy he is.

The truth of the matter is simply this. There is only one country in the world that has beaten Canada in terms of economic growth in the last six years, that is Japan, but just barely. In fact this year we are going to lead every single country in the world in terms of economic growth, including Japan.

I just want to point something out. We are always talking. They are always trying to derail the FTA because apparently the Americans are getting the best of it.

The truth is that we are doing a heck of a good job when it comes to competing with those guys south of us. What we tend to do is take a look at things with blinders on. We are having our difficulties here in Canada, and we all acknowledge that. We acknowledge that, but the difficulties south of the border do not even come close to what we are seeing. What we see on television every night is not even close to what is really happening there.

It is interesting to note that yesterday the U.S. Commerce Department released some amazing figures with regard to U.S.–Canada trade. Do you know what they told us? These are U.S. figures. In 1991 Canada's exports to the United States stayed right up there at $91.1 billion traded between the two countries.

After everything is said and done, we came out with a $6 billion trade surplus. That means, for the hon. gentleman who just asked the question, it is in our favour. We did better than they did.

We are competing on a daily basis. There are a lot of jobs in this country that depend on trade with other nations. In fact, 40 per cent of our individual wealth as Canadians depends on trade. We are doing a heck of a job.

I want to give a clarification of those figures. That figure of $91.1 billion is what we shipped to the United States.

• (1950)

After the interchange of goods back and forth, we came out $6 billion better. That tells me we are doing a good job and it tells me that if this member had known what he was doing in 1988 he would have stayed right over here on this side of the House.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have some short comments. First of all, I would like to remind the member for Carleton—Charlotte that my colleague did not desert the government side of the House. He just said to me that he was expelled. We should not leave that misunderstanding in the eyes of the constituents of this country.

When I was listening to the member talk about the inflation rate being 1.6, and it is the lowest inflation rate that we have had in over 20 years, we recognize that. We see that has had some positive effect on the economy.

But one of the negative effects that it has had on this economy is that it has produced this tremendous number of unemployed Canadians, a tremendous number of people who are on welfare.

In this Chamber, this House of Commons, this nation's boardroom, we are not here just to speak for the advantaged and to talk about all the good things that are happening in terms of targets and objectives that we are out to meet. We are here to speak for those in our society who are disadvantaged.

As you are talking about this heavy ratchet you have put on inflation—and I recognize that—you must also recognize the other side of the coin and that is the 3 million people who are out there in deep pain.

We sometimes think that there is a tendency to forget that, you are so excited about the inflation numbers maybe being a year ahead of schedule that you forget about the 3 million people who have been left behind.

I am sure the member for Carleton—Charlotte would agree that it is our responsibility on this side of the House to prick your conscience and remind you about those 3 million people because certainly the Governor of the Bank of Canada is not going to remind you.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, the number that the member uses is 3 million. I want to remind Canadians there are 1.5 million Canadians unemployed, not 3 million. I do not care whether he inflates the number at all. That is his business. Whether it is 1 million, 1.5 million, or 800,000, it is too many Canadians unemployed. We do not argue that point.

As I go back in my remarks earlier, we have to get the fundamentals right in order to get the economy moving. He understands that because he understands the Canadian economy probably more so than anyone else on that side of the House. He does. I have heard some of his speeches.

I do disagree with the number that he uses. The fundamentals have to be there in order to get the economy moving. That is what we are doing because we have to have an inflation rate that businesses can live with, where there is stability in the marketplace and interest rates are down.

I just want to remind the member of his leader. When his leader was part of the government in 1981–82 and the Liberal Party had the government in this country, his leader sat over there.

The unemployment rate at that time was 12.8 per cent and rising. Inflation was 12.9 per cent under the government of which the Leader of the Opposition was a member.

Interest rates at the time were 22 per cent. He corrects me. The Prime Minister of the day was Mr. Trudeau, but the finance minister at the time was the present hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Mills: I rise on a point of order to correct the record, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Finance at that time was the hon. Allan J. MacEachen.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. That is a matter of opinion.

Resuming debate with the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I only have seven minutes before the day is adjourned. I am going to save the body of my speech for tomorrow morning. I want to finish off responding to my friend from Carleton—Charlotte.

One of the reasons we on this side of the House are so concerned about the direction this government is taking us is the massive dismantling job this government has done in the last eight years, from VIA Rail cuts to the cutbacks in the CBC. There is not a thing in this country that has not been touched by this government. It has been one of the biggest dismantling jobs that we have ever seen anywhere in the world.

While the members on the other side tend to gloat on what they call the streamlining of government, they do not seem to realize that a lot of government institutions like the Science Council of Canada and the Economic Council of Canada are think-tanks that do not always agree with the government. They did not always agree with us when we were in government. They are instruments of provoking and advancing debate.

It is this dismantling that tends to make us very disturbed on this side of the House. Right now we are in the midst of a very serious constitutional debate. Quite frankly I am nervous that this government is in the process of giving away so many powers to the provinces that this place will become redundant; there will be nothing left to do here but send cheques to the provinces.

This country needs a strong national government. This country was built on national programs from coast to coast. That is where we get our national will. That is where we get the thread that binds us as a nation. When times are tough, like the times we have right now, it is this strong national government that pulls us together.

Let us take a look at this budget. This budget barely touches retraining. I dare say one of the reasons we do not have a lot of retraining in this budget is that we are in the process of giving it away to the provinces. We are going to constitutionalize training and give it away to the provinces.

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if my friend opposite would advise the House as to why his party opposed the $1.8 billion of UI funds going for retraining.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I am not opposed to the $1.8 billion that we currently use in terms of retraining. When we have 1.5 million people unemployed and another 2.5 million on welfare, that is not enough. When we talk about training and retraining, in the city of Toronto we cannot find spots. We talk in this House about training and retraining, yet when people go to get it, it does not exist. That is the whole problem with this government. This government is one of the most dangerous governments we have ever had in our country's history because it is an expert at communications. It is all tactics and no substance. We are right in the middle of a very serious constitutional debate and I am deathly afraid that this constitutional arrangement that we are playing around with is going to be no different than this budget, just a total sham.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being eight o'clock p.m., this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at ten o'clock a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 8 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, in a few minutes we will be having a fairly lengthy statement by a minister and statements following that by opposition members. Just to provide an opportunity for a minister to table a bill and not then have to delay the House, I think you will find unanimous consent for the following motion:

That we proceed immediately with introduction of government bills and revert to tabling of documents thereafter.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary has put a proposition to the House and is asking for unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 25 petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

[Translation]

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1992–93

EXPLANATORY STATEMENT BY PRESIDENT OF THE TREASURY BOARD

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to table in the House the government's Main Estimates for the 1992–93 fiscal year. I believe that these estimates attest to the government's ongoing efforts to make its operations more efficient, to reduce costs and to maintain a fair balance between the demand for federal services and the taxpayers' ability to pay.

The Main Estimates explain in detail how the government plans to spend $159.6 billion, the planned budgetary expenditures for 1992–93, pursuant to the announcement made this week by my colleague, the Minister of Finance.

In presenting this budget the government wishes to obtain authorization to spend $48.8 billion from Parliament. The rest is covered in legislative authority already granted by Parliament.

Last year I made explicit commitments in the House. Today I wish to report on our achievements over the past year and on the measures that we have taken and are now taking to cut spending and obtain the most value from each taxpayer dollar.

I will also tell you, Mr. Speaker, about our commitment to provide Canadians with the best services possible, what we are doing, and the plans we are making to meet this commitment.

The spending control plan that we introduced with the 1990 budget and that we later broadened and expanded in the 1991 budget affected many programs. The growth of most programs, except for equity programs and those that meet Canadians' basic social needs, has been slowed, while other programs have been frozen, reduced or simply eliminated.

Spending control has forced departments and agencies to face increasing demands with fewer resources. The freeze or reduction of operating and maintenance budgets has been an important element of the cost cutting measures in all budgets since 1985. Since that year the real value of operating and maintenance budgets for programs in place has gone down by about 30 per cent as a result of these and other measures.

[English]

In keeping with the 1991 budget, the government limited salary increases to zero and three per cent over two years when Parliament passed the Public Sector Compensation Act in October 1991. We have also reduced to three the number of management layers below the deputy minister level. This makes the management structure in the federal Public Service comparable to that of many large organizations in the private sector which have had to restructure their operations to reduce costs.

We are ahead of schedule on the commitment made in last year's budget to reduce the number of senior managers by 10 per cent within two years. There are now 4,430 members of the executive group, down 320 from January 1991.

Our record is there for all to see. It is a record of performance, not words. We have reduced appreciably the rate of growth of program spending. In 1984 program spending represented nearly 20 per cent of the country's Gross Domestic Product. Today, mostly because of the restraint measures we have introduced, the figure is down to 16.7 per cent.

The savings we have made in recent years have not come only from reducing the payments we make to individual Canadians and the transfers we make to the provinces. The deepest cuts were made in government operations and capital. Canadians have indicated that they want governments to spend less, to spend smarter and to be more efficient. We continue to scrutinize expenditures to ensure that we spend only where Canadians need and want to receive services.

Programs including grants and contributions are being reduced in a number of areas. Defence spending is being scaled back further. Funding for new social housing will continue to grow but at a more limited pace. We remain committed to the green plan spending of $3 billion over six years, but we will delay some of the spending for two years. We are improving the management of the Canada Student Loans Program. These actions will yield savings of $530 million in 1992–93 and $3.4 billion over five years.

We are continuing to restrain the cost of government operations. Departmental non–salary operating budgets are being reduced by a further 3 per cent. The 20 per cent restriction or reduction on travel outside Canada introduced in December 1989 will be continued.

• (1020)

The number of international meetings and the size of foreign delegations will be scaled back. Ministers, members of Parliament and deputy ministers will no longer be entitled to travel first class. Business class travel will be reduced as will be the amount spent on hotel accommodations.

The government Leader in the Senate, the Hon. Lowell Murray will be reviewing spending in the communications function to identify $75 million in expenditure reduction.

Forty–six separate organizations will be wound up, privatized or consolidated with other organizations. Thirteen ministerial advisory councils will be brought to an end. Three new agencies will be put on hold, and a number of activities will be privatized.

Cost recovery will be extended to a number of additional program areas, continuing to shift the cost of providing specific services to the beneficiaries and away from general taxpayers.

Assets no longer required will be sold. The government will increase its effort to collect unpaid debts.

These measures, taken together, will provide savings in excess of $1 billion in 1992–93 and $7.3 billion over the next five years.
