WILLIAM the Third, by the Grace of God, King of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c. To all to whom these Presents shall come, Greeting. Whereas Our trusty and well-beloved, Awnsham Churchill and John Churchill, of our City of London, Booksellers, have humbly represented unto Us, That they have been at a very great Expence and Charge in purchasing several New English Manuscripts of Voyages and Travels, and in translating divers other Books of Travels and Voyages out of several Languages into English, and in engraving Maps and other Plates for the same, intending to print the said Voyages and Travels in English, in several Volumes in Folio, with new Discourses and Observations thereupon, which may be of great Advantage as well to Trade as Navigation; which said Manuscripts and Books are as follow, viz. Baumgarten's Travels into Egypt, Arabia, Palestine and Syria: Brawern and Herckeman's Voyage to Chili: Monck's Voyage to Greenland: Navarette's Historical, Political, Moral and Religious Account of China: Beauplan's Description of Ukraine on the Confinnes of Poland: Merolla's Voyage to Congo: Mich. Ang. de Gatti and Denys de Carli's Voyage to Congo: The Disasters and Death of seven Sailors who winter'd in Greenland: Wagner's Journey from Moscow to China over Land: Peyrere's Voyage to Greenland, and his Relation of Iseland: Nieuhoff's Voyages: Sir William Mounson's Collection of Voyages and Naval Affairs: Philip's Voyage to Guinea: Sir Thomas Roe's Voyage to the East-Indies: A Relation of a Dutch Vessel shipwreckt upon the Coast of the Isle of Quelpaert's, and a Description of the Kingdom of Corea: Ovalle's Historical Relation of the Kingdom of Chili: Ten-Rhyné of the cape of Good-Hope, and of the Hottentots: Morinus's Travels to the Mines in Hungary: Borry's Relation of Cochin-China: Oviedo's Chronicle and History of the West-Indies: Fernan Colon's Life of Christopher Columbus his Father: The two Volumes in Folio, one in Quarto, and one in Octavo, of Melchisedec Thevenot sen. his original Voyages, which have not been already in English: Gemelli's Voyage round the World: Baldeus's Description of the Coast of Coromandel, Malabar and Ceylon: Sepp of Paraquaria, and Del Techo of Paraquaria, &c. And they having humbly besought Us to grant them Our Royal Privilege and Licence for the sole printing and publishing the same for the term of fourteen Years: We being graciously inclined to encourage an Undertaking of such publick use and benefit, are pleased to condescend to their Request, and do therefore hereby give and grant unto them the said Awnsham Churchill and John Churchill, and either of them, their Executors, Administrators and Assigns, Our Royal Licence and Privilege for the sole printing and publishing the said Collection of Voyages and Travels before-mentioned, for and during the term of fourteen Years, to be computed from the day of the date hereof, strictly charging, prohibiting and forbidding all Our Subjects to reprint or abridge the said Books, or any part of them, or to copy or counterfeit the Sculptures or Maps thereof, either in great or in small, during the said term, or to import, buy, vend, utter or distribute any Copies or Exemplars of the same, or any part thereof reprinted beyond the Seas within the said Term, without the Consent and Approbation of them the said Awnsham Churchill and John Churchill, or one of them, their, or one of their Executors, Administrators or Assigns first had and obtained, as they and every of them offending herein, will answer to the contrary at their Peril, and such other Penalties as by the Laws and Statutes of this Our Realm may be inflicted: Whereof the Master, Wardens and Company of Stationers, of our City of London; the Commissioners and Officers of Our Customs, and all other our Officers and Ministers whom it may concern, are to take notice that due Obedience may be given to Our Pleasure herein signified. Given at Our Court at Hampton-Court the ninth day of December 1700. In the Twelfth Year of Our Reign.

By His Majesty's Command.

THE

P U B L I S H E R S

P R E F A C E.

WE think it necessary to acquaint the reader, that it was not possible to publish this collection of voyages and travels within the time mentioned in our proposals, by reason of the difficulties we met with, as well in finding out persons fitly qualified to translate from so many languages, as in getting the cuts prepared: yet we hope we have made sufficient amends, by adding a considerable number, no less than a hundred and fifty sheets and cuts more than we promised. Particularly we have inserted Baldæus's description of the coasts of Malabar and Coromandel, and island of Ceylon; and instead of abridging Gemelli, as we proposed, we have on better advice chosen to give him intire: which necessarily delayed the publication of these volumes, and at the same time put us to much greater expence than our proposals obliged us; though the buyer does not pay one farthing the more. We might indeed have made quicker dispatch, and performed what we undertook at less charge, could we have contented ourselves with abridging any of the pieces we have given intire, or with leaving out some of those cuts (as possibly there are a few, which in some men's opinion might have been spared) but we would not assume the liberty of prescribing to the publick how much of an author they should read, nor determine which figures are useful, and which superfluous; seeing those who read for their diversion have different tastes, and those who read for instruction have different views.

We take this occasion likewise to inform the publick, that since the undertaking of this design, divers other relations, some in manuscript, others printed, no less curious than useful, are fallen into our hands; which by the advice of learned and judicious friends we have resolved to prepare for the press with all possible expedition, and to publish them in one or more volumes in folio, printed on the same kind of paper with these. In all which we shall not presume to abridge the originals, but fairly and candidly deliver whatever our authors have thought fit to be inserted in their several pieces.

An Account of the BOOKS contained in this COLLECTION.

Vol. I. THE first volume begins with Navarette's historical, political, moral, and religious account of China. The author was a Dominican friar sent over by his order in the year 1646. to exercise his ecclesiastical function in the Philippine islands. But finding no great encouragement to continue in those islands, he ventured over into China; where he spent several years in the service of the Christians he found there, learning the Chinese language, reading their histories, studying the points in controversy among the missionaries, and thoroughly qualifying himself to give a just account of that mighty monarchy. He wrote in Spanish, and was never translated till now:

those that have read him in the original give a high commendation of his learning, judgment, and sincerity; for in handling the particulars mentioned in the title of his book, he delivers nothing but upon the best grounds, as an eye-witness, where he could be so, or else upon the authority of Chinese histories, which he searched and very well understood, or upon the information of credible persons; ever mentioning on which of these the reader is to rely for the truth of what he relates. He often quotes his second volume, calling it, of controversies, the main subject of it being those points still in dispute among the missionaries; this book (as we are informed) was printed, but by the

the interest and artifice of the jesuits, the edition was seized by the inquisition before it was published, so that very few copies of it got abroad.

He gives us an exact history of the empire of China, both ancient and modern; a description of the country and people, perfect in all circumstances; a genuine translation of the morals of Confucius their great philosopher; a full view of the Chinese learning, and a judicious explication of their opinions in religious matters: in which he is so careful and particular, that no other author whatsoever has given so complete an account of the religion of that nation. He likewise makes some considerable remarks on the controversies betwixt the Christian missionaries, which are indeed the subject of his second volume, that, as has been said, was never made publick. Nor does he confine himself to China, but in his way thither delivers many curious observations he made in his voyage to New Spain, and gives a very good account of that country, as also of the Philippine islands (where he made a considerable stay) of the islands lying about them, and of other parts of India; and the accidents he met with in his return home, which was in the year 1673. after he had been abroad twenty six years. On his arrival in Europe he repaired to the court of Rome, upon the matter of the controversies between the missionaries; where he was treated with all the honour due to a person of his merit: and soon after his return to Spain, he was promoted to an archbishoprick in Hispaniola.

Baumgarten, whose travels we have here into Egypt, Arabia, Palestine, and Syria, was a German nobleman, as appears by his life prefixed to his travels. His journal was not published by himself, but after his death collected from his own and his servant's observations, both of them having kept diaries of all they saw; and therefore are two several witnesses for the truth of what is delivered. Here is not only a description of the countries above-mentioned, but a great deal of their ancient history inserted; and what renders the relation yet more agreeable, is the great variety of occurrences in this voyage well worth the relating. In particular, we are obliged to him for his account of the discipline and manners of that strange and unparallel'd society of men, the Mamelukes, who for a long time held the dominion of Egypt, and of whom there is scarce to be found any where else a tolerable relation. His observations on the lives of the christian religious men in those parts, will be delightful to the curious reader, as will also his remarks on the superstitions of the Mamelukes, Arabs, and other infidels. This author travelled in the year 1507. His journal never appeared before in English. The Latin copy here translated was corrected by Joseph Scaliger's own hand.

Henry Brawern and Elias Herckemann were sent to the kingdom of Chili by the Dutch West-India company in the years 1642, and 1643. Brawern was ordered to endeavour to settle among the Indians of that country, who were then revolted from the Spaniards, as may appear by the advertisement before the voyage; but he died there, and so that design came to nothing. The main thing in this journal is an account of the voyage, and a description of the island of Castro lying off the south coast of Chili, as also of the river of Baldivia in that kingdom.

The next tract in order in this collection, is a description of the island of Formosa near the coast of China, where the Dutch had a considerable fort. Of the author we know no more, but that he was minister to the Dutch in that island. The description is but short, yet contains the most material points usually treated of in such relations.

The remarks on the empire of Japan give a particular account of the revenues of the emperor and all the great men of that empire. The rest of it may almost as soon be read as characterized, and is therefore left to the reader's censure.

Captain John Monck's voyage into the northern parts, was performed by order of Christian IV. king of Denmark, in the years 1619, and 1620. The particular preface to it mentions the most material points, which otherwise might have required to be inserted here; but need not be repeated in two places. What may be added concerning the captain is, that he was one of the ablest seamen of his time, having been bred to the sea, and being well qualified for the employment, as having excellent natural parts, improved with all that was necessary to make him capable of such enterprizes. Besides, he was of a bold and daring spirit, proper to attempt those dangerous discoveries, and hardy to endure all the rigours of those frozen climates. But what is his greatest commendation in this place is, that he was a man of truth and integrity, as may appear by his narrative, in which all that have followed him could find nothing to contradict.

To Beauplan's description of Ukraine so particular a preface is prefixed, that little more can be added. In general, the Reader will find many things both moral and natural, that are rare and remarkable. He lived in that country about the year 1640. He was excellently qualified to give this description, being a mathematician and an engineer; and he has performed it so well, that nothing seems to be wanting but the map, which he tells us was seized with his papers by the king of Poland.

The two voyages to Congo in Africk were performed, the first by Michael Angelo of Gattina and Denis de Carli of Piacenza, Capuchins Capuchins and missionaries into that kingdom, in the year 1666. The first of these died there, after he had sent these particulars in letters to his friends. The other returned into Italy, where he composed a small book from which this is translated. It begins with their voyage from Italy to Lisbon, and thence to Brazil, which introduces a brief account of that country; and then sailing over to Africk, treats of the Portuguese town of Loando on that coast, of the behaviour and manners of the people, their way of travelling, the product of the country, of the several princes, the proceedings of those and other missionaries, the state of religion; and lastly, remarks in the author's travels through Spain and France in his return home. More particulars whereof may be seen in the translator's preface before the voyage.

The other voyage to the same country was performed by F. Jerome Merolla da Sorrento in the year 1682. who was also a missionary. The vessel he went in being by contrary winds carried to the southward of the cape of Good Hope, the father delivers all that is remarkable in running along that southern coast of Africk, till his arrival at the port of Angola. Then he enters upon his business, with the discovery of Congo, and first missions to those parts; describes the river Zaire, relates the proceedings of the missionaries, the superstitions and customs of the Blacks, something of the wars betwixt the Portugueses and the Blacks, and of the attempts of the Dutch and English to breed enmity betwixt those two nations. He describes the beasts, birds, fruits, and plants of Congo, and has many curious things not taken notice of by the former missionaries.

The first volume concludes with Sir Thomas Roe's journal, a valuable piece. He was sent ambassador by king James the first to the Great Mogul, in 1615. at the charge of the East-India company, to settle peace and commerce. Not travelling for his pleasure, but only following the Mogul's court to sollicit his business, he had not the opportunity of seeing and delivering many things which other travellers meet with in their rambles: but on the other side, being in that high post, he was the better able to give us a true account of the court of that mighty monarch, to shew us all the customs and manners of it, and to instruct us in their policies, arts and maxims of state, which common travellers are not allowed to pry into. There is little cause to suspect the truth of his relation, because by his very method he appears to have been a sincere man, and he wrote for those who had business daily with others that came from India, and might easily have disproved him. For a fuller account of this work we refer to the preface before the journal itself.

The second volume commences with the voyages and travels of Mr. John Nieuhoff, a Dutch man, and employed by the Dutch company to the East and West-Indies. They are divided into three parts. The first to Brazil, anno 1640. in which he says he went merchant supercargo to a ship of the West-India company. That he was a man well qualified for a traveller, sufficiently appears by the excellent accounts he has left of those countries he treats of. His description of Brazil is so exact and full, that he has left nothing for the diligence of those who have come after him; for besides the general map, there are draughts of the towns of Arecite and Olinda, and cuts off all the strange beasts, birds, serpents, insects, trees, plants, and of the Indians themselves, all taken upon the spot. To which he adds the transactions in the war betwixt the Dutch and Portuguese in that country, he being there in the height of it, that is, from 1640, till 1649. The second part contains the author's travels in the East-Indies, begun in the year 1653. In the way thither he describes the islands of Cabo Verde, giving draughts of two of them, call'd S. Anthony and S. Vincent; and then a map of the cape of Good Hope. Thence he sails to Amboyna, of which, and of the Molucco islands, as also of Formosa, he leaves nothing worth relating untouched. The same he performs from China all along the coast of India and Persia; so plainly representing all things observable or strange there, that with the help of his cuts we seem to be conversing with the people of those parts, to see all their towns and living creatures, and to be thoroughly acquainted with their habits, customs and superstitions. But when he comes to Batavia, the metropolis of the Dutch dominions in the East, he there spares no labour or cost to express the greatness of that city; and this not only with words, but with abundance of fine draughts, representing, besides the town and harbour, the church, the markets, the town-house, the hospital, and many other places and structures. All the habits of those parts are also represented, and in short the whole work contains eighty two cuts, which being all drawn to express the truth, and not by fancy, illustrate the work, and render it extraordinary valuable. All this is interwoven with handsome discourses of the wars betwixt the Dutch and Indians in several parts; and many remarks of their history, both political and natural. The third part is a voyage to the east side of Africk, in the year 1672. which is very short and imperfect, the author Mr. Nieuhoff being unfortunately killed in the island of Madagascar by the natives.

After Nieuhoff follow Smith's adventures, travels and observations. They begin with travels in the Low-Countries, France and Italy, proceeding thence to the wars betwixt the Turks and Transilvanians, where the author served; and being taken prisoner and carried into Tartary, he speaks somewhat of that country; and making his escape from the Tartars, he crossed all Europe, and passed into Barbary: Hence he went to Virginia, the Summer-islands and New-England, and has left us the history of the English settlements in those places, and their state from the year 1624, to 1629. thence he passed to the Leeward-islands, of which he likewise gives an account.

The Publisher's Preface.

Next to Smith's adventures, the reader will find two journals of men left in the frozen regions of Greenland and Spitzbergen, to winter there, and make some observations on those countries. The first of these is of seven sailors, who voluntarily consented to stay in the isle Maurice, on the coast of Greenland. These kept an exact diary, setting down the wind, weather, and all other particulars they could observe, from the twenty sixth of August 1633, till the twenty ninth of April 1634. The method is plain, and such as might be expected from sailors; and as there is nothing in the relation that seems incredible, so neither is there any ground to call the truth of it in question, because they all died one after another, and left this behind them without any alteration: and doubtless as they felt themselves declining, they would have had no inclination to impose on the world. The second journal is of seven other Dutch sailors, left to winter at Spitzbergen, in the year 1634, where they also kept a diary from the eleventh of September till the twentieth sixth of February, when being spent with the scurvy, and their limbs benumbed with the winter's cold, they could not help themselves, and like the others were all found dead at the return of the Dutch fleet in 1635.

The next is a brief relation of a shipwreck in Spitzbergen in 1646, and of the taking up of four of the men who escaped, after a wonderful manner; yet three of them died soon after, and only one returned home.

The descriptions of Iceland and Greenland, were written about the year 1645, by Mr. la Peyrere, a learned Frenchman, author of the book about the Præ-Adamites, secretary to the French embassy at Copenhagen, at the request of the ingenious Mons. de la Mothe la Vayer, and sent to him: Of Iceland, a country long inhabited, though so cold and northerly, he delivers something of ancient history, besides the description of the land, the manners of the people, and other things remarkable. In Greenland he follows much the same method, and both of them are well worthy to be read with attention, as delivering one of the most accomplished narratives we have of those parts, and esteemed as such by

VOL. I.

Mons. de la Mothe la Vayer, who was a very competent judge.

The next in order is captain Tho. James's voyage, anno 1631. for the discovery of the north west passage into the South-sea: setting sail in May, he ran into the latitude of 63 degrees and upwards; where, in June and July, he gives an account of such wonderful shoals of ice that came about his ship, that it is much to be admired how he got clear of them. 'Tis very observable throughout the voyage, that we shall scarce meet with so continual a series of storms, and all sorts of hardships, miseries and calamities, as this captain ran through; who after struggling till September with tempests, cold and uninhabited shores, at last was driven upon a desert frozen island, and there forced to winter in miserable distress. The account he gives of the extremity of the cold in those quarters, and his observations on it are curious, and were very useful to Mr. Boyle, in the experiments he made about cold. But the general esteem his relation is in among the ingenious, will sufficiently recommend it; he returned safe home with most of his crew.

The Muscovite ambassador's journey by land from Moscow to China in 1645, is so short, that it requires little to be said of it, but that it describes the way from Moscow to Peking, and shews us that this city is the same with the so much talked of and little known Cambalu, mistakenly supposed to be in Tartary. This ambassador being never admitted to audience, could learn nothing of the Chinese court, and therefore does not pretend to inform us of any thing that relates to it. Wagner's travels in Brasil and the East-Indies about 1633. which are annexed to this embassy, are as short, and may so soon be read over, that it is needless to give a character of them.

The life of Christopher Columbus has a short preface to it, partly the author's, and partly the translator's, which is sufficient to inform the reader both of the contents of the book, and the value of it above others that treat of the same subject. And indeed nothing can be described more authentick, if we will give credit to original papers, and those from so good a hand as the admiral himself and his own son, who bore part with him in some of his enterprises. But we must not omit to observe, that under the title of his life, is contained the narration of all that was done in the discovery of the West-Indies in his time, about 1492, besides abundance of curious remarks, scarce to be found in any other author that writes on this subject.

Greaves's account of the pyramids, needs little to be said of it. The universal approbation it has received is a greater character than can be here given it; the judicious mons. Thevenot set such a value upon it, that he translated it into French. In a word, it is the most accomplished narrative we have of b those

those wonderful piles, and may spare all other travellers the trouble of writing of them: He has said all that can be expected, he instructs us who were the founders of the pyramids, the time of erecting them, the motive and design of them, and then describes them exactly, and gives draughts of them. His Roman foot and denarius added to his pyramids, is another piece of excellent literature, to give light into the weights and measures of the ancients.

Christopher Borri's account of Cochinchina, where he lived about the year 1620, closes the second volume: 'tis short, but contains many curious things, being full of matter, without superfluity of words to swell it to a volume. There is a small preface of the translator's before it, giving an account of the whole work in very few lines.

Vol. III. The historical relation of the kingdom of Chili, by Alonso de Ovalle, about the year 1646, has the first place in the third volume. 'Tis the only good account of that kingdom; the author, being a jesuit, inserted the relations of several miracles in this work, which the translator has in great measure retrenched; for the rest, his veracity is unquestioned. The author himself is so modest, as to excuse any fault that may be found with his work, alleging its being written at Rome, where he was procurator for those of his order in Chili; and being so far from home, ill provided with papers and all materials for composing a history of this sort: but whosoever reads it, will find more ground for commendation than need of excuse, nothing of the kind being more compleat, full and accurate. Something might be here said as to the particulars contained in this book, but that the author and translator have done it already in two several prefaces before the book. The translator gives the author and his work that honourable character they deserve. The author in his preface sums up the contents of his book, declares how sincerely he has dealt, in order to deliver nothing but the truth; gives his reasons for what he says relating to Peru and Mexico, and lastly demonstrates how this work may be diverting and useful to all sorts of readers.

After Ovalle follow sir William Monson's naval traicts. He was a gentleman well descended, but of small fortune, as he confesses, which made him take to the sea, where he served many years in several capacities, till merit raised him to the degree of an admiral, first under queen Elizabeth, and then under king James and king Charles the first; for he lived till the civil wars, with an untainted reputation for conduct and bravery. Being bred from his youth at sea, and being a man of excellent natural parts, there is not the least shadow of reason to make a doubt of his capacity in maritime affairs. His integrity will sufficiently appear to any that reads him, for he every where carries such a visible ingenuity in what he delivers, that it plainly appears to be written with a true zeal for the publick, and without prejudice or affectation. The excellent advice he gives to his eldest son, is a good instance of his virtuous inclination; and the small estate he declares he leaves him, after so many toils and dangers, plainly shews the honesty of his life. Thus much as to the author; as to his traicts there is a preface before them, to which the reader is referred, for other particulars not touched upon in this place. The first book is chiefly a collection of every year's actions in the war against Spain, on our own and the Spanish coasts, and in the West-Indies. Here the reader is not to expect a full narrative of these affairs, for many of them are so brief that no more is said of them, but the force they are undertaken with, and the success of the enterprise; yet the design is to shew the reasons, either why they miscarried, or why so little advantage was made where they succeeded. In some he is more particular than in others; and what perhaps may be still of use, he at last sets down the abuses in the fleet, and the methods for redressing them. His second book contains somewhat of the method of the first, beginning with fatherly instructions to his son; whence he proceeds to the peace with Spain, which put an end to the warlike naval actions, yet not to his command, being employed against pirates. He inveighs against the Dutch, shews the ill management of a design against Algier, and makes very notable remarks on the attempt upon Cadiz by king Charles the first, proposing methods how Spain might have been much more endamaged, with other particulars about the shipping of England, and sovereignty of the seas. The third book treats only of the admiralty, that is, of all things relating to the royal navy, from the lord high admiral, to the meanest persons employed ashore, and to the cabin-boys at sea; and from a compleat fleet to the smallest vessel, and part of it, with instructions for all officers, the size of all sorts of guns, all sorts of allowances on board the king's ships, and excellent directions for fighting at sea; an account of all the harbours in these three kingdoms, with many more curious matters accurately handled. The fourth book is of another nature from any of the rest, being a brief collection of Spanish and Portuguese discoveries and conquests in Africk, Asia and America, with some voyages round the world, and somewhat of English and French plantations. The fifth book is full of projects or schemes, for managing affairs at sea to the best advantage for the nation. The sixth and last treats of fishing, to shew the infinite addition of wealth and strength it would bring to England, with all instructions necessary for putting such a design in execution.

This

This third volume ends with the description of the coasts of Malabar and Coromandel, and the island of Ceylon in the East-Indies, about the year 1649, by Philip Baldaeus, a Dutch minister, who lived several years in those parts. The preface to the work gives a general idea of it, and of the author, to which the reader may recur to avoid repetition, but for his further information let it be observed, that he first gives a brief account of the actions and conquests of the Portugueses in those parts, and then an ample and full relation how the Dutch expelled them; where we shall find more particulars concerning those affairs than have been hitherto made publick in English, which is a very considerable piece of history. And though he only promises to treat of the coasts of Malabar and Coromandel on the continent, yet to lead the more methodically into it, he begins with the description of Cambaya, the treaties of the Dutch with the Great Mogul, the trade of several European nations along that coast; and leads us even into the Red Sea, describing many places of note upon those shores, and even up the inland country, acquainting the reader at the same time with all that is requisite to be known of the Mahometans in those parts. Hence he descends to treat of all the great peninsula on this side Ganges, of its product, the rivers Nile and Ganges, and more particularly than any other has done of the Malabar language. After this he proceeds to Ceylon, where he enlarges more than upon the rest, as having lived longest there, and concludes with a large account of the idolatry of the East-India pagans.

Vol. IV. The first voyage in the fourth volume is that of Dr. Francis Gemelli Careri round the world, a piece of extraordinary curiosity, altogether new, and but lately published in Italian in six octavo volumes, and now first in English, the author returning home from his long travels but at the end of the year 1698. His learning, as being a doctor of the civil law, and his excellent natural qualifications, have rendered his work so complete, that indeed it seems to be one of the most excellent pieces of this nature now extant. Nothing can be more diverting, as having that extraordinary variety which the whole compass of the earth affords, and that in the noblest and best parts of it. An air of truth appears throughout it, there being nothing but what is told with much modesty, and what is probable and natural enough in itself; besides, that the most part of what is here related may be found dispersed in many other travellers, who saw but pieces of what Gemelli took a view of entire. His remarks and observations are extraordinary curious, because he was not only capable to make them, but had leisure, that being his only business, and money to carry him through. In fine, he has an excellent brief collection of history annexed to every part of his travels, which informs the reader of the antient as well as present state of the countries there spoken of. He is exact for the most part in setting down the distances of places, a great help to future travellers. His accounts of plants and fruits peculiar to the East and West-Indies, with the draughts and representations of them, is a good help to natural history, together with his other descriptions, and his observations of customs, manners, habits, laws, religions, and all other things in those vast regions he passed through. In particular, what he says in that part of his voyage which is from Aquapulco till his leaving the continent of America, is, besides what is in Gage, almost the only account we have of the inland parts of that continent. There is a preface to the work which gives a full account of it.

An account of the shipwreck of a Dutch vessel on the coast of the isle of Quelpaer, which happened in the year 1653, together with the description of the kingdom of Corea. This was originally writ in Dutch by one that calls himself the secretary of the ship then lost, who lived thirteen years in those countries, and at last made his escape with some others. It was thought worthy to be translated into French, and now lastly into English. 'Tis the only account yet extant of the kingdom of Corea, which lies on the east of China, being a peninsula joined to that mighty empire by a small neck of land: and it is no wonder we should be so very much strangers to this country, since besides its remoteness, the author tells us they admit of no strangers; or if any have the misfortune, as he had, to fall into their hands, they never return home, unless they can make as wonderful an escape as he did. The relation itself is not so long as to require very much to be said of it, besides that it has a particular preface annexed to it by the translator, to which the reader is referred.

Next follows a relation of a voyage from Spain to Paraguay, about 1691, by F. Antony Sepp, and F. Antony Behme, German jesuits; with a description of that country, the remarkable things in it, and residences of the missionaries. We have a particular account of their voyage; they landed at Buenos Ayres, of which town they give a very good description, and of the great river of Plate which runs by it; and proceeding up into the country from Buenos Ayres, they treat distinctly of the several cantons of Paraguay.

After this is placed a fragment translated out of Spanish, concerning the islands of Salomon in the South-sea, discovered by the Spaniards, about 1695, but hitherto never conquered or inhabited by any European nation.

tion. It was inserted in Thevenot's collection of voyages. Both the beginning and conclusion are wanting; which, it seems, have perished through the negligence of those intrusted with the original papers. However, by good fortune, as much has been preserved, as serves to give us some knowledge of those islands, and of the nature and disposition of their inhabitants. And because so little is known of those places, this fragment was judged not unworthy a place in this collection.

The history of the provinces of Paraguay, Tucuman, Riode la Plata, Parana, Guaira, Urvaica, and Chile, was written in Latin by F. Nicholas del Techo a jesuit. The antecedent account of Paraguay by F. Sepp, has lightly touched upon part of this subject, but that only relates to one of the provinces here named; whereas this extends from the North to the South-sea, and includes all that vast tract of land in America, lying south of Peru and Brasil. The greatest part of these countries has not been so fully described, nor the manners and customs of those savage Indians so fully made known, as they are by this author, who spent no less than twenty five years among them. But to avoid repetitions, what more is performed in this work, may be seen in the particular preface before it.

Pelham's wonderful preservation of eight men left a whole winter in Greenland 1630, is the sixth treatise in this volume. The preservation was indeed very remarkable, especially considering how unprovided they were left of all necessaries for wintering in such a dismal country, it being accidental, and no way designed. This narrative has nothing of art or language, being left by an ignorant sailor, who, as he confesses, was in no better a post than gunner's mate, and that to a Greenland fisher; and therefore the reader can expect no more than bare matter of fact, delivered in a homely style, which it was not fit to alter, lest it might breed a jealousy that something had been changed more than the bare language.

Dr. John Baptist Morin's journey to the mines in Hungary, about 1650, is a very short relation, as containing not full two sheets, of those mines, the ore they afford, the damps, the springs in them, the miners, the manner of discharging the water, and other particulars relating to them.

Ten-Rhynes account of the cape of Good Hope, about 1673, and of those barbarous Hottentots, the natives of that country, is very curious. After a short description of the cape and table mountain, he describes the birds, beasts, fishes, insects and plants found in that part of the world; and then succinctly treats of the people, their persons, garments, dwellings, furniture, disposition, manners, way of living, and making war, traffick, sports, religion, magistrates, laws, marriages, children, trades, physick and language.

The fourth volume concludes with captain Richard Bolland's draught of the straits of Gibraltar, in 1675, and his observations on its currents.

OF all the inventions and improvements the wit and industry of man has discovered and brought to perfection, none seems to be so universally useful, profitable and necessary, as the art of navigation. There are those that will not allow it to be called the invention of man, but rather the execution of the direction given by Almighty God, since the first vessel we read of in the world, was the ark Noah built by the immediate command and appointment of the Almighty. But this is not a place to enter upon such a controversy, where some will ask, why it should be believed there were not ships before the flood as well as after, since doubtless those first men extending their lives to eight or nine hundred years, were more capable of improving the world than we whose days are reduced to fourscore years, and all beyond them only misery or dotage? It is impertinent to spend time upon such frivolous arguments, which only depend on opinion or fancy. If then we give any credit to history, on which all our knowledge of what is past depends, we shall find that navigation had but a mean and obscure original, that it was gradually and but very leisurely improved, since in many ages it scarce ventured out of sight of land; and that it did not receive its final perfection till these latter times, if we may be allowed to call that perfect which is still doubtless capable of a further improvement: but I give it that epithet only, with regard to the infinite advancement it has received since its first appearance in the world.

The first vessel ever known to have floated on the waters, was the ark made by GOD's appointment, in which Noah and his three sons were saved from the universal deluge. But this ark, ship, or whatever else it may be called, had neither oars, sails, masts, yards, rudder, or any sort of rigging whatsoever, being only guided by Divine Providence, and having no particular port, or coast to steer to, only to float upon the waters, till those being dried up, it rested on the mountains of Ararat, as we read in Gen. viii. 4. From this time till after the confusion of tongues there was no use of navigation, there being as yet no sufficient multitude to people the earth, and those men there were having undertaken to build the tower of Babel, from whence they were dispersed into all other parts of the known world. These first travellers doubtless met with many rivers before they came to the sea, as plainly appears by the situation of Babel, generally agreed upon by all that treat of scriptural geography; and those rivers they passed in a hollowed piece of timber, no better than a trough, or a sort of baskets covered over with raw hides, being the easiest that occurred to invention, and sufficient for their present purpose, which was only to pass on in their way to other parts, without the prospect of trade or commerce, which cannot be supposed to have then entered into their thoughts. What vessels they built when they came to the sea no history describes, and therefore it would be a rashness to pretend to any knowledge of them. That they were small, ill rigged, and only durst creep along the shores, is out of all dispute; if we consider that many succeeding ages were no better furnished, though they never failed from time to time to correct the defects they found in their shipping, and industriously laboured to improve the art of navigation.

An Introductory Discourse concerning

navigation. Not to speak therefore of what is absolutely fabulous, or only supposititious, let us come to the first sailors famed in history; and touching those times of darkness lightly, descend to matters of more certainty and better authority.

If we give credit to poets and poetical writers, we shall find Neptune covering the Mediterranean sea with his mighty fleets, as admiral under his father Saturn, supposed to be Noah, as Neptune is to be Japheth; and to him is ascribed the first building of ships, with sharp stems, or heads shod with iron or brass, to run against other ships and split them, and with towers on them for men to fight when they came to lie board and board. Yet there are others that give the honour of inventing of ships, and steering them to Glaucus, affirming it was he that built and piloted the ship Argo in Jason's expedition against the Tyrrenians; which others attribute to Argos, making him the builder and pilot. These notions, or rather poetical fictions, are rejected by the learned Bochartus in his Geographia Sacra, p. 819, 820. where he shews that the ship Argo ought properly to be called Arco, which in the Phœnician tongue signifies long, a name given it because it was the first long ship built by the Greeks, who learned it of the Phœnicians, and called it by their name, whereas all the vessels used by them before that time were round. This ship Argo, or rather galley, he says had fifty oars, that is twenty five on each side, and therefore must be fifty cubits in length. Here it appears that the Greeks had round vessels before that time, and all we can reasonably conclude is, that this ship or galley Argo, or Arco, was larger, and perhaps better built and contrived than any before it, and might perform the longer voyage, which rendered it famous, as if it had been the first ship. But it is certain there were many fleets, such as they were, before this time; for the Argonauts expedition was about the year of the world 2801, which was after the flood 1144 years: whereas we find Semiramis built a fleet of two thousand sail on the coasts of Cyprus, Syria and Phœnicia, and had them transported on carriages and camels backs to the river Indus, where they fought and defeated the fleet of Staurobates king of India, consisting of four thousand boats made of cane, as Diodorus Siculus writes*. About the year of the world 2622, and 965 after the flood, Jupiter king of Crete, or Candia, with his fleet stole away Europa the daughter of Agenor king of the Sidonians. In 2790 of the world, and after the flood 1043, Perseus went on the expedition by sea against Medusa in Africk. Now to return to the Argonauts so much

celebrated by the poets, upon the strictest examination into truth, we shall only find them inconsiderable coasters in the Mediterranean, and set out by the publick to suppress pirates, though fabulous Greece has extolled their expeditions beyond all measure. Next follows the Trojan war about the year of the world 2871, and 1214 after the flood, where we find a fleet of one thousand one hundred and forty sail of all sorts, still creeping along the shores, without daring to venture out of sight of land.

Now leaving the Greeks it is fit we return to the Phœnicians, who are the same the scripture calls the Philistines or Canaanites, as is largely proved by Bochartus, certainly the earliest and ablest mariners in those first ages: they made the greatest discoveries of any nation, they planted colonies of their own in most of those countries so discovered, and settled trade and commerce in the most distant regions. There can be no greater testimony of their wealth and naval power than what we find in holy writ, Ezek. xxvii. where the prophet speaking of Tyre, says it is situate at the entrance of the sea, is a merchant for many isles, its ship-boards are of fir-trees of Senir, their masts of cedars, their oars of oak of Bashan, their benches of ivory, their sails of fine embroidered linen; and so goes on through most of the chapter, extolling its mariners, pilots, ships, and all things belonging to them. This, though from the undeniable oracle of scripture, were no sufficient proof of their knowledge in this art, were not all histories full of their many expeditions. The first was on the coast of Africk, where they founded the most powerful city of Carthage, which so long contended with Rome for the sovereignty of the world: thence they extended their dominions into Spain, and not so satisfied, coasted it round, still pursuing their discoveries along the coasts of France, and even into this island of Great Britain, where they afterwards had a settled trade for tin, and such other commodities as the country then afforded, as may be seen at large in Procopius, Strabo, Diodorus Siculus, and many other ancient authors. Pliny, lib. 2. cap. 69. with others affirms, that in the flourishing times of the republick of Carthage, Hanno being sent out from thence to discover southward, sailed quite round Africk into the Red-sea, and returned the same way; and that Kimilco setting out at the same time northwards, sailed as far as Thule or Iceland. Both these relations are in part rejected by most authors as fabulous, because it does not appear that the utmost extent of Africk was ever known till the Portugueses in these latter times discovered it; and the very northern parts of Europe were not thoroughly discovered even in the time of the Roman greatness. However, no doubt is to be made but that they sailed very far both ways, and might perhaps add something of their own invention, to gain the more reputation to their undertakings. Nor were they confined to the Mediterranean and westward ocean, it was they that conducted Solomon's fleets to Ophir; and we read in 1 Kings ix. 27. that Hiram (who was king of Tyre, and consequently his men Phœnicians) sent in the navy his servants, shipmen that had knowledge of the sea. And again, chap. x. ver. 11. And navy also of Hiram that brought gold from Ophir. Thus we see the Phœnicians traded to Ophir before king Solomon, and for him. To enter into the controversy where this Ophir was, is not proper for this place, but the most probable opinions conclude it to be some part of the East-Indies, and indeed there is not the least shew of reason to place it elsewhere. How they performed these long voyages without the help of the compass, or magnetical needle, would be another no less difficult inquiry, considering they could not always sail by day, and lie by at night, or continually keep within sight of land, whence tempests at least would often drive them into the open sea; but this is easily solved by all authors, who with one consent inform us, that they were directed by the course of the sun in the day, and by the stars at night. And in this knowledge of the heavens the Phœnicians exceeded all other nations, as may be gathered from Pliny, lib. 5. c. 12, and 19. where he shews that mankind is obliged to the Phœnicians for five things of the greatest use, viz. Letters, the knowledge of the stars, the art of navigation, military discipline, and the building of many towns. By this their knowledge of the stars they recovered themselves when lost in foul weather, and knew how to shape their course across spacious gulphs, and bays, which would have spent them much time in coasting round. However it must not hence be inferred that they were capable of traversing the vast ocean betwixt Europe and America, as some would endeavour to make out; because it is well known that voyage even with the help of the compass was at first thought impracticable, and when discovered, for some time proved very difficult and dangerous, till time and experience had made it more familiar. The very reason alledged for the possibility of their sailing to the West-Indies, which is the certainty of the trade, winds blowing always at east within the tropicks, makes against them, because had those winds carried them thither, the vast difficulty in returning the same way would deter them from that enterprize, they being altogether ignorant, and we may say incapable of coming away north, which was accidentally found out many years after the discovery of the West-Indies.

The Greeks, though occasionally mentioned before them, were the next in order to the Phœnicians in maritime affairs, and learned the art of them. They not only equalled their masters in this art, but soon excelled them, and gave them several notable overthrows on their own element; for we often find them, though much inferior in numbers, gaining glorious victories over the Persians, whose fleets were all managed by Phœnicians. One instance or two may serve for all; the first is the famous battel of Salamis, where the confederate Greeks, whose whole force consisted but of three hundred and eighty ships, defeated thirteen hundred of the Persians, with inconsiderable loss to themselves, and incredible to their enemies, as may be seen in Plutarch's lives of Themistocles and Aristides, in Diod. Sic. lib. XI. Herod. lib. VII, and VIII. and others. Again, the Asbenian fleet commanded by Cimon lorded it along the coasts of Asia, where closely pursuing the Persian admiral Tirastus, he obliged him to run his ships aground, of which he took two hundred, besides all that perished on the shore. And not so satisfied, Cimon proceeded to Hydrope, where he destroyed seventy sail, which were the peculiar squadron of the Phœnicians; for which particulars see Thucydid. lib. I. cap. 11, and 12. Plutarch in vit. Cimon, and Diod. Sic. lib. XII. These victories were the bane of Greece, which growing rich with the spoils of the Persians fell into those vices it had before been a stranger to, and which broke that union which had preserved it against the common enemy. Hence followed the war betwixt the Athenians and Lacedemonians, and several others, where those little states confederating one against another set out many numerous fleets, and strove for the sovereignty of the sea, till having sufficiently weakened themselves they at length became a prey to others. Yet during their flourishing times, and even in adversity, when driven from home by disasters, they never ceased sending out colonies upon all the coasts of the Mediterranean, and particularly of Asia, Spain, France, Italy and Sicily. In all which countries they so far extended their empire, that it would fill a volume to give but an indifferent account of them. Yet under Alexander the Great, the founder of the Grecian empire, there are some things so singular that they well deserve a place here. That these latter ages may not boast of the invention of fireships,

we find in Curtius, lib. IV. that at the siege of Tyre, when a mole was carrying on to join that city to the continent, the inhabitants having loaded a large ship heavily altern with sand and stones, to the end the head might rise high above the water, and prepared it for their purpose with combustible matter, they drove it violently with sails and oars against the mole, where they set fire to it, the seamen in it escaping in their boats. The mole being in a great measure made of wood, with wooden towers on it, was by this device utterly destroyed. Thus we see the Tyrians successfully invented the first fire-ship we read of in history. The next thing remarkable in this mighty conqueror's reign in relation to navigation, was his sailing down the river Indus into the Indian ocean, where we may by the by observe the wonderful ignorance, not only of his landmen, but even of the sailors, who, as Curtius, lib. IX. testifies, were all astonished and beside themselves at the ebbing and flowing of the river. From hence the same author tells us, Alexander sent his admiral Nearchus to coast along the ocean as far as he could, and return to him with an account of what he should discover. Nearchus accordingly keeping along the Indian and Persian shores, and entering the Persian Gulph, returned to him up the river Euphrates, which was then looked upon as a wonderful discovery, and a great masterpiece of that admiral, for which he received a crown of gold from Alexander. Thus much we have concerning this expedition in Curtius quoted above, and in Plutarch in vit. Alex. Purchas in his first Vol. p. 86, 87, 88, gives a very particular account day by day of this voyage of Nearchus, taken out of Arianus, lib. VIII. who delivers it as Nearchus's journal of the expedition.

Next to the Phœnicians and Greeks, the Romans became sovereigns of the sea; yet not all at once, but after hard struggling with the Carthaginians, then in the height of their power, having by their naval force made themselves masters of the greatest part of Spain, and the coast of Africa, of many islands in the Mediterranean, and being intent upon the conquest of Sicily. This island furnished these mighty cities with an occasion of trying their forces on pretence of protecting their allies, but in reality out of a desire of sovereignty. The Romans were altogether unacquainted with naval affairs, insomuch that they knew not how to build a galley, but that the Carthaginians cruising on the coast of Italy, as we find in Polybius, lib. I. one of their Quinqueremes galleys happened to fall into the hands of the Romans, who by that model built an hundred of the same sort, and twenty Tri- remes. Whilst the galleys were building, they exercised the seamen in rowing upon the dry shore, causing them to sit in ranks as if they were aboard, with oars in their hands and an officer in the middle, who by signs instructed them how they should all at once dip their oars and recover them out of the water. When the fleet was launched, finding the galleys not artificially built, but sluggish and unweildy, they invented an engine to grapple fast with the enemy at the first shock, that so they might come to handy-strokes, at which they knew themselves superior, and prevent being circumvented by the swiftness of the Carthaginian galleys, and experience of their mariners. This engine they called corvus, it consisted of a large piece of timber set upright on the prow of the vessel, about which was a stage of several ascents of boards well fastened with iron, and at the ends of it two massive irons sharp-pointed. The whole could be hoisted or lowered by a pulley at the top of the upright timber. This engine they hoisted to the top when the enemy drew near, and when they came to shock ship to ship, they let it run down again into the enemy's vessel, with which its own weight grappled it so fast that there was no breaking loose; and if the attack happened on the bow, the men went down two and two into the enemy's vessel by the help of the aforementioned scaffold; all which may be seen more fully described in Polybius above quoted. By the help of these engines Duilius the Roman admiral overthrew Hannibal the Carthaginian, though superior to him in number of vessels and experience in maritime affairs, taking his own Septireme and fifty other vessels, with great slaughter of his men, though he himself escaped in his boat. This was in the year of Rome 493. In 497. M. Attilius Regulus, and L. Manlius Volfo consuls, commanded another fleet, in which were above one hundred and forty thousand men; the Carthaginians had then in their fleet one hundred and fifty thousand men under the conduct of Hamilcar, who was intirely overthrown, fifty of his ships taken, and sixty four sunk. Thus far the sea had proved favourable to the Romans; but in the year of Rome 499. having set out a fleet of three hundred Quinqueremes, they lost one hundred and forty by storms, which made them resolve to lay aside all naval enterprizes, keeping only seventy sail of ships to serve as transports, till in the year 503, perceiving their affairs in Sicily decline, the Carthaginians being absolute masters at sea, they again set out two hundred sail, and the following year received a mighty overthrow with the loss of ninety three galleys. Resolving now to put an end to the war, they again fit out two hundred Quinqueremes, built by the model of a Rhodian they had before taken, and with them gave the Carthaginians such a fatal overthrow, as reduced them to accept of a dishonourable peace. This was the rise of the Roman power at sea, which they after not only held, but increased as long as their empire subsisted. Their actions are too many and too great for this place; those that desire to see more may read them in Livy, Plutarch, Appian, and many other authors who deliver them at large; thus much having been said only to deduce the succession of navigation from one people to another. Now though the Romans at this time gained the sovereignty of the seas, and held it for some ages, yet we do not find that they applied themselves to new discoveries, or ever exceeded the bounds of what the Phanicians had before made known, their greatest voyage being that which Pliny, lib. VI. cap. 23. gives an account of; being from Egypt to India beforementioned, to have been frequently performed by the Phanicians, and therefore had nothing new in it. What occurs in this place is, to say something of the several sorts of galleys called Triremes, Quadrirèmes, Quinqueremes, and so forth, whereof mention was made above. Herodotus, Thucydides and Diodorus agree, that Aminocles the Corinthian was the first that invented the Trireme galley, about three hundred years after the destruction of Troy. Pliny will have it, that Aristotle a Carthaginian first built a Quadrirème, and Nesichion of Salamis a Quinquerème; but Diodorus contradicts it, attributing the invention of the Quinqueremes to Dionysius the Sicilian. Pliny further adds, that Zenagoras the Syracusan built the first vessel of six ranks, Nesigiton one of ten, Alexander the Great is reported to have proceeded to twelve; Philostephanus makes Ptolomy Soter the first that made one of fifteen ranks, Demetrius the son of Antigonus of thirty, Ptolomy Philadelphus of forty, and Ptolomy Philopator of fifty. Thus we have the original of them all; but what sort of vessels these were, that is, how the several degrees or ranks of oars were disposed, has been much controverted, and is a most difficult point to be determined. The shortness of this discourse will not allow much canvassing of the point, yet a few words out of two or three learned authors will give some satisfaction to the curious. Morifotus in his Orbis Maritimus, p. 608. positively affirms, that each of these vessels had its name from the number of ranks of oars placed one above another, so that the Trireme had three, the Quinquerème five ranks; and so every one according to its name, even till we come to Ptolomy Philopator's Tesseracteres, which he asserts, had forty ranks of oars placed one over another, wherein he agrees with Baiffus, whom he quotes, as he does the emperor Leo, whose words are these; Every ship of war must be of its due length, having two ranks of oars, the one higher, and the other lower. This which to him seems concluding, to others appears of no force; for allowing there might be vessels that had two ranks of oars one above another, that does not at all prove the possibility of having twenty or forty, which must of necessity rise to such a height as would look more like a mountain than a ship; and those upper oars must be so long, and in proportion so large and unwieldy, that no strength of hands could ever manage them. Others will have these several ranks of oars to be taken lengthways, and not in height; that is, so many in the prow, so many in the midships, and so many in the poop: whence will follow that Ptolomy's galley had forty several ranks in length, with intervals betwixt them, in one line from stem to stern, which, allowing but a small number of oars to each of these ranks, will quite outrun the length assigned that vessel, being two hundred and eighty cubits. This opinion is followed by Stewechius, Castilionius, and several others; but sir Henry Savil is of another mind, and supposes these ranks not to lie in length from head to stern, nor in height one above another, but athwart; which must appear preposterous, because allowing so many ranks this way, that is athwart the galley, its breadth would exceed all proportion. The fourth solution of this difficulty, and that very much received, is, that the vessel had its name from so many men tugging at one oar, that is three in a Trireme, five in a Quinquerème, and so of the rest; which indeed as far as six or seven men to an oar has the most resemblance of truth: but when we come to forty or fifty men to an oar, it will be difficult to reconcile either to the breadth of the vessel, not to be supposed capable of eighty men in a rank, or to the height of the men, because though the first man next the side of the galley had the oar under hand, yet the end of it when it came to the fortieth must of necessity rise above his reach. These two objections are again answered, the first by allowing each oar to reach quite athwart the galley, and so the forty men to fill up the whole breadth, rowing as they do in our wherries or barges; and the second by allowing an ascent from one side of the galley to the other for each seat or standing of those that rowed; and for the soldiers and sailors, we must imagine a deck over the heads of the slaves at the oar. This carries much of reason, reason, but little of ancient authority, for we find no ancient monuments that describe any thing of this nature. We will conclude this matter with the opinion of Schöfferus de militia navali, lib. II. cap. 2. where allowing a competent distance according to the length of the vessel betwixt each bank of oars, he supposes the first row to be as in our galleys next the level of the water; then in the intervals another row, not distinguished by a deck, but raised so high by their seat that their feet rested against that which was the back of the bank below them, and so one above the other in those intervals, which takes off much of the height, that must have been, allowing them several decks, and consequently shortens the upper oars in proportion; yet cannot at all lessen the difficulty that will occur upon plying so many oars, which will come to dip so close together in the water, that it seems impracticable to avoid clattering of them, and falling into confusion, not to mention many more inconveniences obvious enough to every man's reason that has seen any vessels of this nature: and therefore it is best to determine nothing amidst such uncertainties, but leave every one to approve that which shall best suit with his notion of the matter. Therefore leaving these obscurities, it is better to proceed upon the history of navigation where we left off, and see in what state it continued from the time of the Romans last spoken of till the fortunate discovery of the magnetical needle, from which time is to be dated its greatest advancement, as will be visible in that place.

VOL. I.

As long as the Roman empire continued in splendor, it supported what it had found of navigation, but added little or nothing to it, that people being altogether intent upon making new conquests, and finding still more work than they were able to compass upon dry land, without venturing far out to sea. But when the barbarous nations began to dismember that monarchy, this art instead of improving, doubtless declined, as did all others. The first of these barbarians were the Goths and Vandals, of whom no great actions appear on the sea, their farthest expeditions on this element being in the Mediterranean, betwixt Italy and Africa, Spain and the islands, where nothing occurs worth mentioning. The Saracens were next to them as to order of time, though much superior in naval power, yet contained within the same bounds, and consequently did nothing more memorable. After the Saracens may be reckoned the Normans, who for several years infested the coasts of Britain and France with their fleets from Norway, till having settled themselves in Normandy, they ran out plundering all the coasts of Spain, and entering the straits conquered a great part of the kingdom of Naples, and the whole island of Sicily. Still these, though they undertook longer voyages, were but coasters, and satisfied with what they found, did not endeavour to add any thing to the art of navigation, especially for that they were as then but rude and barbarous, war and rapine being their only profession. Other nations famous at sea were the Genoese and Venetians, betwixt whom there were bloody wars for several years; and the latter, till the Portuguese discovered the way by sea to the East-Indies, had all the trade of those parts in their own hands, either brought up the Red sea into Egypt, or by caravans to the sea-port towns of Asia. We might here mention the expeditions of English, French, Danes, Dutch, and other nations, but should find nothing new in them all. They all in their turns were powerful at sea, they all ventured sometimes far from home, either to rob, conquer, or trade, but all in the same manner creeping along the shores, without daring to venture far out to sea, having no guides out of sight of land but the stars, which in cloudy nights must fail them. It is therefore time to leave these blind sailors, and come to the magnet or loadstone, and to the compass or magnetical needle, which has opened ways in the unknown ocean, and made them as plain and easy in the blackest night as in the brightest day. To come then to the point.

The loadstone, or magnet, so called from the Latin word magnes, had this name given it because found in the country of Magnesia, which is a part of Lydia in Asia; or because the Magnesian first discovered its vertue of attracting iron: for both these reasons are given by the learned Bochartus Geogr. Sacr. p. 717. What other vertues and qualities it has, does not belong to this place. But it is certain the magnet has two poles answering to the two poles of the world, and to which they naturally incline (if nothing obstructs) to lie parallel. This property is confined to it self, but communicative, as daily experience shews us in the nautical needles, which by the touch of this stone partake so much of its nature, that the point so touched, unless otherwise hindered, will always look towards the north-pole. Let the learned naturalist plunge himself into the inscrutable abyss of nature to find out reasons for this sympathy; it shall suffice here to shew the benefits and advantages navigation, and in it mankind, has reaped by the discovery of this most wonderful secret. The Magnesian, as was said above, were counted the first discoverers of the loadstone's virtue of attracting iron; but this greater virtue of pointing out the north-pole, was never found till about the year 1300, if we will believe all the best modern inquirers into antiquity, who upon diligent search unanimously agree they cannot find the least ground to believe it was known before, rather than give credit to some few writers, who rather suppose such a thing to have been used by the Phœnicians, than pretend to prove it, having nothing but their own fancies, raised upon weak and groundless surmises, to build upon. The great advocate I find for this opinion in Bochart. Geog. Sac. p. 716. and in Parebas's pilgrims, p. 26. is Fuller in his miscellanies, l. 4. c. 19. yet neither of them mentions any proof or strong argument he brings to corroborate his opinion, and therefore they both with reason reject him. These two authors, and Panciroli. lib. ii. tit. 11. do not forget the verse often urged out of Plautus in Mercat.

Which verforia some will have to be the compass. But there is nothing solid in this argument, it is only catching at straws, when all history and practice of former ages make against it. History, because it could not but have made some mention of a thing so universally useful and necessary; and practice, because it is well known no such voyages were then performed, as are now daily by the help of the compass. It has sufficiently been proved before, that in all former ages they were but coasters, scarce daring to venture out of sight of land; that if out at night they had no other rule to go by but the stars: and what is still more, it is manifest they scarce ventured at all to sea in the winter months. That this is so, appears by Vegetius, lib. IV. where speaking of the months, he says, The seas are shut from the third of the ides of November, to the sixth of the ides of March, and from that time till the ides of May, it is dangerous venturing to sea. Thus much way suffice to shew the compass was not known to antiquity, let us see when it first appeared in the world.

Its ancient use being rejected by general consent, there have still been some who have endeavoured to rob the discoverer of this honour: among them Goropius, quoted by Morifotus, will have this invention attributed to the Cimbrians, Teutonicks or Germanians, for this weak reason, because the names of the thirty two winds about it are Teutonick, and used by almost all Europeans. Others will not allow this to be the product of any part of Europe, and therefore go as far as China for it, alledging that M. Paulus Venetus brought it from thence about the year 1260: but this is asserted without any the least authority, only because Paulus Venetus travelled into China, and when afterwards the Portugueses came thither, they found the use of the needle common among all those eastern nations, which they affirmed they had enjoyed for many ages. Not to dwell upon groundless suppositions, the general consent of the best authors on this subject is, that the magnetical needle or compass was first found out in Europe by one John Gioia, whom others call Flavio Gioia, of the city of Amalfi, on the coast of that part of the kingdom of Naples called Terra di Lavoro. This happened about the year of our Lord 1300. and though the thing be of such stupendous advantage to the world, yet it did not prove so greatly profitable to the first finder, whose bare name is all that remains to posterity, without the least knowledge of his profession, or after what manner he made this wonderful discovery. So wonderful that it seems to contradict the opinion of Solomon, who so many ages since said there was nothing new under the sun; whereas this certainly appears, though so long after him, to be altogether new, and never so much as thought of before, which cannot so plainly be made out of any other of those we look upon as modern inventions or improvements. For to instance in a few things, we find the use of fire-ships among the Tyrians in the time of Alexander the great, as was mentioned before out of Curtius, lib. IV. and therefore not repeated here. Our sea-charts, on which latter times have so much valued themselves, are of such ancient date, that we cannot find their original; yet Morifotus, p. 12. says that Eolus gave Ulysses a sea-chart drawn on a ram's skin, that is, a parchment. Again, p. 14. the same author out of Trogus observes, that Democedes the Crotonian, employed by Darius Hystaspes to view the coasts of Greece, sent him charts of them all, with the ports, roads and strong-holds exactly marked down. Then, p. 215. he shews out of Aelianus and Aristophanes, that there were maps of the world in Socrates's time. This, he says, was about the eightieth Olympiad, and then quotes Strabo, who from Eratosthenes affirms, Anaximander the Milesian was the first that made geographical tables about the fiftieth Olympiad. Sheathing of ships is a thing in appearance so absolutely new, that scarce any will doubt to assert it altogether a modern invention; yet how vain this notion is, will soon appear in two instances. Leo Baptisti Alberti in his book of architecture, lib. V. cap. 12. has these words. But Trajan's ship weighed out of the lake lake of Riccia at this time, while I was compiling this work, where it had lain sunk and neglected for above thirteen hundred years; I observed, that the pine and cypress of it had lasted most remarkably. On the outside it was built with double planks, daubed over with Greek pitch, caulked with linen-rags, and over all a sheet of lead fastened on with little copper nails. Raphael Volaterranus in his geography says, this ship was weighed by the order of cardinal Prospero Colonna. Here we have caulking and sheathing together above sixteen hundred years ago; for I suppose no man can doubt that the sheet of lead nailed over the outside with copper nails was sheathing, and that in great perfection, the copper nails being used rather than iron, which when once rusted in the water with the working of the ship, soon lose their hold and drop out. The other instance we find in Purchas's pilgrims, vol. I. lib. IV. in captain Saris's voyage to the court of Japan, p. 371. where the captain giving an account of his voyage says, that rowing betwixt Firando and Fuccate, about eight or ten leagues on this side Xemina-seque, he found a great town where they lay in a dock a junk of eight or ten hundred tun burden, sheathed all with iron. This was in the year 1613. about which time the English came first acquainted with Japan; and it is evident, that nation had not learned the way of sheathing of them, or the Portuguese, who were there before, but were themselves ignorant of the art of sheathing.

Now to return to the magnetical needle, or sea-compass; its discoverer, as has been said, appears to be Flavius, or John Gioia of Amalfi, and the time of its discovery about the year 1300. The reason of its tending to or pointing out the north, is what many natural philosophers have in vain laboured to find; and all their study has brought them only to be sensible of the imperfection of human knowledge, which when plunged into the inquiry after the secrets of nature, finds no other way to come off but by calling them occult qualities, which is no other than owning our ignorance, and granting they are things altogether unknown to us. Yet these are not all the wonders of this magnetick virtue. The variation of it is another as inscrutable a secret. This variation is when the needle does not point out the true pole, but inclines more or less either to the east or west; and is not certain, but differs according to places, yet holding always the same in the same place, and is found by observing the sun or stars. The cause of this variation some philosophers ascribe to magnetical mountains, some to the pole itself, some to the heavens, and some to a magnetical power even beyond the heavens; but these are blind guesses, and fond ostentations of learning without any thing in them to convince ones reason. There is nothing of it certain but the variation alone, there is a variation of the variation, a subject to be handled by none but such as have made it a peculiar study, and which deserving a peculiar volume is daily expected from a most able pen. But let us leave these mysteries, and come to the historical part, as the principal scope of this discourse; where we shall find, that though the use of the needle was so long since found out, yet either through its being kept private by some few persons at first as a secret of great value, or through the dulness of sailors, at first not comprehending this wonderful phenomena; or through fear of venturing too far out of the known shores; or lastly, out of a conceit that there could not be more habitable world to discover: whether for these, or any other cause, we do not find any considerable advantage made of this wonderful discovery for above an age after it: nay, what is more, it does not appear how the world received it, who first used it upon the sea, and how it spread abroad into other parts. This is not a little strange in a matter of such consequence, that the histories of nations should not mention when they received so great an advantage, or what benefit they found at first by it. But so it is; and therefore to shew the advancement of navigation since the discovery of the magnetical needle, it will be absolutely necessary to begin several years after it, before which nothing appears to be done. This shall be performed with all possible brevity, and by way of annals, containing a summary account of all discoveries from year to year: yet left the distance and variety of places should too much distract the reader, if all lay intermixed, the European northern discoveries shall be first run through in their order of years; next to them, as next in order of time, shall follow the African, and so of the East-India or Asiatick, the one being the consequence of the other; and in the last place shall appear the West-Indian, or American. The first part of the northern European discoveries is all taken out of Hakluyt, beginning with the nearest after the discovery of the needle, quoting the authors out of him, and the page where they are to be found.

An. 1360. Nicolas de Linna, or of Linn, a friar of Oxford, who was an able astronomer, took a voyage with others into the most northern islands of the world; where leaving his company he travelled alone, and made draughts of all those northern parts, which at his return he presented to king Edward III. This friar made five voyages voyages into those parts: for this he quotes Gerardus Mercator, and Mr. John Dee, Hak, p. 122. And this, though it is not there mentioned, being sixty years after the discovery of the compass, we may look upon as one of the first trials of this nature made upon the security of the magnetical direction in these northern seas. Yet after this for many years we find no other discovery attempted this way, but rather all such enterprizes seemed to be wholly laid aside, till

An. 1553. and in the reign of king Edward VI. Sir Hugh Willoughby was sent out with three ships to discover Cathay and other northern parts. He sailed in May, and having spent much time about the northern islands subject to Denmark, where he found no commodity but dried fish and train oil, he was forced about the middle of September, after losing the company of his other two ships, to put into a harbour in Lapland called Arzina, where they could find no inhabitants, but thinking to have wintered there were all frozen to death. However the Edward, which was the second ship in this expedition, and commanded by Richard Chancellor, who was chief pilot for the voyage, having lost Sir Hugh Willoughby, made its way for the port of Wardhouse in Norway, where they had appointed to meet if parted by storms. Chancellor staid there seven days, and perceiving none of his company came to join him, proceeded on his voyage so fortunately, that within a few days he arrived in the bay of St. Nicholas on the coast of Muscovy, where he was friendly received by the natives, being the first ship that ever came upon that coast. Chancellor himself went to the court of Mosco, where he settled a trade betwixt England and Muscovy, with John Basilowitz the great duke, or Czar, then reigning. This done, Chancellor returned home with the honour of the first discoverer of Russia.

An. 1556. Stephen Burrough was sent out in a small vessel to discover the river Ob: he sailed in April, and in May came upon the coast of Norway; whence continuing his voyage, in July he arrived at Nova Zembla, that is, the new land, where he received directions how to shape his course for the river Ob. He spent some time in search of it, but coming to the straits of Weygats found no passage, and the summer-season being almost spent, returned to Colmogro in Muscovy, where he wintered, designing to prosecute his voyage the next summer, but was countermanded, and so this was all the event of the expedition.

An. 1558. Anthony Jenkinson sailed for Muscovy with four ships under his command: he left his ships, and travelled by land to Mosco, where having been nobly entertained by the Czar, he obtained his pass, and continued his journey through Muscovy across the kingdoms of Casan and Astracan, where shipping himself on the river Volga he sailed down into the Caspian sea, having travelled by land about six hundred leagues in the Czar's dominions from Mosco. On the Caspian sea he spent twenty seven days; after which landing, he proceeded five days journey by land among a sort of wild Tartars with a caravan of one thousand camels; then twenty days more through a desert; suffering much through hunger and thirst. This brought him again to another part of the Caspian sea, where formerly the river Oxus fell into it, which now he says runs into another river not far from thence, called Ardock, which runs towards the north and under ground above five hundred miles, after which it rises again, and unburdens itself in the lake of Kitay. Hence he continued his discovery amidst those countries of Tartars to Bogbar in Baëria, whence he returned to Mosco.

An. 1561. He returned to Muscovy with letters from queen Elizabeth to the Czar; and taking the same way as before down to the Caspian sea, crossed over it into Hircania, where being nobly entertained, and conducted by the princes of that country, he passed through to the court of the king of Persia at Casbin, where he obtained several privileges for the English nation, and returned home in safety the same way he went.

An. 1580. Mr. Arthur Pet, and Mr. Charles Jackman sailed in May from Harwich in two barks to make discoveries in the north-east beyond Weygats. In June they doubled the north cape of Norway, and having spent some days in that part of Norway, continued their voyage into the bay of Petzora; where Jackman's vessel being in no good sailing condition he left Pet, who proceeded on to the coast of Nova Zembla, where in July he met with much ice, yet making his way through part of it, though with great difficulty, he at last came to the straits of Weygats: there he drew as close as the shoal water would permit, coming into two fathom and a half water, and sending his boat to sound till he found there was not water enough even for the boat in the strait, and therefore returned the same way he came. A few days after Pet met with Jackman again in some distress, as not being able to steer, his ship's stern-post being broken, and the rudder hanging from the stern. Having remedied this the best they could for the present, they both stood northward to endeavour to find some passage that way; but meeting with much ice, they despaired of success, and resolved solved to turn again to Weygats, there to consult what was further to be done. All the way thither they met with such quantities of ice, that some days they were not able to make any way. Being come again upon the Weygats, they made another attempt that way, but to as little purpose as before, the ice obstructing their progress. Wherefore winter now coming on, they found it necessary to quit their design for the present. Accordingly Pet being parted from Jackman, arrived safe in the river of Thames about the end of December this same year: Jackman put into a port in Norway betwixt Tronden and Rostock in October, where he wintered. In February following, he departed thence in company of a ship of the king of Denmark's towards Iceland, and was never more heard of. The English having made these unsuccessful attempts, gave them over for many years; and the Dutch growing powerful at sea, resolved to try their fortune, hoping the failures of the English might help to point out to them what course they were to avoid, and what to follow; and accordingly,

An. 1594. The states fitted out three ships, commanded by William Barentz, Cornelius Cornelissen and John Hugen: they all failed together, but Barentz ran further up to the northward than the others, till he came into seventy eight degrees of latitude, and in August met with much ice, and abundance of sea-monsters, at which the seamen being discouraged they resolved to return home. The other two ships discovered some islands, and at last a strait or passage capable of the greatest ships, and about five or six leagues in length: being passed it, they came into an open and warmer sea, and upon the coast of Tartary near the river Ob or Oby, a very fruitful country. This they called the strait of Nassau, and might have gone further but for want of provisions. This done, they came back the same way very joyful to Holland, Meteren. hist. of the Low-countries, lib. XVIII. This we see positively delivered, but with how much of truth I dare not decide; only must think it strange, that if such a strait had been once found it should never be met with since, though often searched for, and once by the same persons that pretended to have been the first discoverers, as may be seen in the year 1596: yet we see this assertion repeated by the same author, who takes it from the relations of the sailors, and in the same place before quoted says, that

An. 1595. The states being much encouraged by the relation of these discoverers, fitted out seven ships, six of them to proceed on their voyage to China, Japan,

Sec. this way, and the seventh to bring back the news of their being passed the strait; but they met with too much ice at strait Nassau, coming to it too late by reason of the contrary winds they had in their passage thither: yet the inhabitants of the place told them many particulars more than they knew before; but they returned re infecta, ubi sup.

An. 1596. The Dutch not discouraged by the former disappointment, fitted out two ships under the command of William Barentsen and John Cornelissen, who sailed on the eighteenth of May, and on the nineteenth of June found themselves in the latitude of 80 degrees, and eleven minutes, where they found a country they supposed to be Greenland, with grass, and beasts grazing like deer, &c. and less cold and ice than in 76 degrees: they turned back to an island they had before called the Island of Bears, because of the many bears they saw in it, and there parted company. Cornelissen went up again into 80 degrees of latitude, thinking to find a passage east of the land they had discovered, but returned home without doing any thing considerable. Barentsen made towards Nova Zembla, and coasted along it till he met with an island which he called Orange, in 77 degrees of latitude; thence he steered south and doubled a cape, but was stop'd by ice, and making towards the land, on the last of August, was so inclosed that there was no stirring. They landed and built a house with timber and planks, into which they put all their provisions and goods, where they continued suffering much hardship all the winter. On the twenty second of June they set out from thence in two boats they had repaired, leaving their ship among the ice, and an account in writing of their being there. Thus with much difficulty, they arrived at Cola in Lapland on the second of October 1597. where they found Cornelissen, who had made a voyage to Holland in the mean while, and was returned thither. Barentsen died by the way, but the survivors arrived in Holland on the twenty ninth of October, Meteren. lib. XIX.

An. 1676. Captain John Wood in his majesty's ship the Speedwell, with the Prosperous Pink to attend him, sailed from the Buoy of the Nore to discover the north east passage. June the fourth he anchored in the island of Sbetland, and the tenth sailed out again, directing his course north north east, and north east by east, till the twenty second, when at noon he saw ice right a head about a league from him, and sailed close to it, as they did the next day, entering into many openings which they perceived to be bays. Sometimes the weather proved foggy, and then they made little way; but as fast as the fog fell, it froze on their sails and rigging: they perceived the ice here joined to the land of Nova Zembla, and run out five leagues to sea. They continued coasting the ice to find a passage, till on the twenty ninth of June at near midnight the Prosperous Pink fired a gun and bore down upon the man of war, crying out, ice on the weather-bow; whereupon he clapped the helm hard a weather to come about, but before she could be brought upon the other tack struck upon a ledge of rocks that lay sunk: the pink got clear, but the ship stuck fast, and there being no getting her off, the men got all ashore in their boats with what provision they could save, some arms and other necessaries; only two men were lost with the pinnace. Here they set up a tent, and saw no other inhabitants but white bears. The following days the ship broke and much wreck drove ashore, which was a great help to them, there being wood for firing, some meal, oil, brandy and beer. They killed a white bear and eat her, which they said was very good meat. Thus they continued, contriving to build a deck to their long-boat to carry off some of the men, and others to travel afoot towards the Weygats; till on the eighth of July to their great joy they discovered the pink, and making a fire for a signal, she sent her boat to help bring them off, and by noon they all got aboard. They presently stood off to westward, and made the best of their way home, arriving on the twenty third of August at the Buoy of the Nore. Taken out of captain Wood's own journal.

These are the principal discoveries attempted and performed to the north east, which have proved unsuccessful, as failing of the main design of finding a passage that way to the East-Indies.

Let us now leave the barren frozen north, where so many have miserably perished, and yet so little been discovered of what was intended; ice, shoals, rocks, darkness, and many other obstacles having disappointed the bold undertakings of so many daring sailors, and for so many losses made us no return but the bare trade of Russia, whilst our intentions were levelled at that of the mighty kingdom of Cathay, and a passage to China, Japan, and all the other eastern regions. Let us, I say, quit these unfortunate attempts, and come now to speak of those so successful made towards the south and south-east, along the coast of Africk first, and then to those of the more frequented, as more profitable Asia. The first we find in this order, if the authority we have for it be good, is of an Englishman, by name Macbam, who

An. 1344. having stolen a woman, with whom he was in love, and intended to fly with her into Spain, was by a storm cast upon the island Madera in 32 degrees of north-latitude. Going ashore there with his mistress to refresh her after the toils of the sea, the ship taking the opportunity of a favourable gale sailed away, leaving them behind. The lady soon died for grief of being left in that desolate island; and Macbam with what companions he had, erected a little chapel and hermitage under the invocation of the name of Jesus, to bury her. This done, they contrived a boat made of one single tree, in which they got over to the coast of Africk, where they were taken by the Moors, and presented to their king for the rarity of the accident. He for the same reason sent them to the king of Castile, where giving an account of what had befallen them, it moved many to venture out in search of this island. This story we find in Hakluyt, vol. II. part 2. p. 1. where he quotes Antony Galvao a Portuguese author for it; and D. Antonio Manoel in his works among his Epanasoras, has one on this particular subject, which he calls Epanasora Amorosa. Upon this information, as was said, several adventurers went out, but to no effect that we can hear of, till

An. 1348. John Betancourt a Frenchman, obtained a grant of king John the second of Castile, and went to conquer the Canary islands long before discovered, and made himself master of five of them, but could not subdue the two greatest, as most populous and best defended. These were afterwards subdued by king Ferdinand, as may be seen in Mariana, lib. XVI. p. 29. These were small beginnings, and out of regular course; next follow the gradual discoveries made by the Portugueses, which may be said to have been the ground-work of all the ensuing navigations, which happened in this manner. King John of Portugal enjoying peace at home after his wars with Castile, was persuaded by his sons to undertake the conquest of Ceuta on the African shore. Prince Henry's fifth son accompanied him in this expedition, and at his return home brought with him a strong inclination to discover new seas and lands, and the more on account of the information he had received from several Moors concerning the coasts of Africk to the southward, which were as yet unknown to Europeans, who never pretended to venture beyond cape Nao, which had therefore this name given it, signifying in Portuguese No, to imply there was no sailing further; and the reason was, because the cape running far out into the sea, caused it to break and appear dangerous; and they as yet not daring to venture too far from land, were ignorant that by keeping off to sea they they should avoid that danger. Prince Henry resolving to overcome all difficulties, fitted out two small vessels,

An. 1417. Commanding them to coast along Africk, and doubling that cape to discover further towards the equinoctial. They ventured to run sixty leagues beyond cape Nao, as far as cape Bojador, so called because it stretches itself out almost forty leagues to the westward, which in Spanish they call Bojar. Here finding the difficulty of passing further, greater than at cape Nao, for the same reason of the sea's breaking upon the cape, they returned home satisfied with what they had done. The following year, 1418. The prince sent John Gonzalez Zarco and Tristan Vaz, with orders to pass that cape; but before they could come upon the coast of Africk they were carried away by a storm, and not knowing where, they accidentally fell in with an island, which they called Porto Santo, or Holy Haven, because of their deliverance there after the storm. It is a small island a little to the northward of the Madera: thither the prince, being informed of what had happened, sent Bartholomew Perestrello with seeds to sow, and cattle to stock the place; but one couple of rabbits put in among the rest, increased so prodigiously, that all corn and plants being destroyed by them, it was found necessary to unpeople the island.

An. 1419. John Gonzalez and Tristan Vaz making another voyage by order of the prince, discovered the island Madera, before mentioned to have been accidentally found by Macbam the Englishman, and lost again till this time. The reason of calling it Madera was, because they found it all over-grown with trees, this word in Portuguese signifying wood. They set fire to the woods to clear them, which are said to have burnt seven years continually, and since the greatest want is of wood. The following years were employed in peopling and furnishing the islands discovered, till

An. 1434. Gilianez was sent by the prince to pass that dreadful cape Bojador, though at the same time many blamed the attempt, imagining, that in case they should happen to pass much farther on those coasts, all that did it would turn black; others saying there was nothing there but deserts, like those of Lybia; others alledging other absurdities of this nature, suitable to the ignorance the world was then in of all parts yet undiscovered. Gilianez was satisfied with sailing 30 leagues beyond the cape, giving name there to the bay called Angra de Ruyvas, or Bay of Gurnets, because he there found many of that sort of fish. The next year 1435. The same commanders passed twelve leagues further, where they also landed, but the people fled from them; whereupon they proceeded twelve leagues further, where they found a vast multitude of sea-wolves, of which they killed many, and returned home with their skins, which was the greatest return made this voyage, they being valued for their rarity.

An. 1440. Antony Gonzalez was sent to the place of the sea-wolves to load his vessel with their skins. He landed, took some of the natives, and killed others; then coasted on as far as Cabo Blanco, or White Cape, and returned to Portugal.

An. 1442. Antony Gonzalez returned, and carrying those persons he had taken in his former voyage, exchanged them for some Guinea slaves and a quantity of gold dust; for which reason the river that there runs into the country was called Rio del Oro, or the River of Gold.

An. 1443. The gold above-mentioned sharpening mens appetites, Nunbo Tristan undertook the voyage, and passing further than the others, discovered one of the islands of Arguim, called Adeget, and another De las Garzas, or of the Hérons, because they saw many herons in it.

An. 1444. A small company was erected, paying an acknowledgment to the prince, to trade to those parts lately discovered, whither they sent six caravels; which coming to the isles of Arguim took there about two hundred slaves, which yielded them good profit in Portugal.

An. 1445. Gonzalo de Cintra failed to the island of Arguim, and venturing up a creek in the night to surprize the inhabitants, the tide left his boat ashore; so that two hundred Moors coming down upon him, he was killed with seven of his men, and from him the place was called Angra de Gonzalo de Cintra, fourteen leagues beyond Rio del Oro.

An. 1446. Three caravels failed for the same river to settle commerce, but effected nothing, and only brought away one of the natives, and left a Portuguese there to view the country. But Dinis Fernandez the same year passed beyond the river Sanga, which divides the Azanagi from Jalof, and discovered the famous cape called Capo Verde, or the Green Cape.

An. 1447. Three caravels performed the same voyage without doing any thing remarkable, more than taking up the Portuguese left there before, whom they found in good health, and he gave them some account of the country. This year likewise Nunbo Tristan failed sixty leagues beyond Cabo Verde, and anchoring at the mouth of Rio Grande, or the great river, ventured up in his boat, where he and most of

of his men were killed by the Blacks with their poisoned arrows. Alvaro Fernandez the same year went forty leagues beyond Rio Grande. Prince Henry the great encourager, or rather undertaker in all these discoveries, dying, they were afterwards managed by his nephew Alonso the fifth king of Portugal. Under him,

An. 1449. Gonsalo Vello discovered the islands called Azores, or of Hawks, because many of those birds were seen about them. They are eight in number, viz. S. Michael, S. Mary, Jesus or Tercera, Graciosa, Pico, Fayal, Flores and Corvo. They are near about the latitude of Lisbon. In the last of them was found the statue of a man on horse-back with a cloak, but no hat, his left-hand on the horse's mane, the right pointing to the west, and some characters carved on the rock under it, but not understood.

An. 1460. Antony Nole a Genoese in the Portuguese service, discovered the islands of Cabo Verde, the names whereof are Fogo, Brava, Borvisfa, Sal, S. Nicholao, S. Lucia, S. Vincente, and S. Antonio. They lie about a hundred leagues west of Cabo Verde, and therefore take name from that cape. He also found the islands Maya, S. Philip, and S. Jacob. This same year Peter de Cindra, and Suero da Costa sailed as far as Serra Leona.

An. 1471. John de Santarem and Peter de Escobar advanced as far as the place they called Mina, or the Mine, because of the trade of gold there; and then proceeded to cape S. Catharine, thirty seven leagues beyond cape Lope Gonzalez in two degrees and a half of south-latitude. Ferdinand Po the same year found the island by him called Hermosa, or Beautiful, which name is lost, and still keeps that of the discoverer. At the same time were found the islands of S. Thomas, Anno Bom, and Principe. Some years passed without going beyond what was known; but in the mean time king John the second, who succeeded his father Alonso, caused a fort to be built at Mina, which he called fort S. George, and settled a trade there.

An. 1480. James Cam proceeded as far as the river Congo in the kingdom of the same name, called by the natives Zayre, whence he continued his voyage as far as 22 degrees of south-latitude, and thence home again.

An. 1486. King John being informed by an ambassador from the king of Benin on the coast of Africk, that there was a mighty prince two hundred and fifty leagues from his country, from whom his master received his confirmation in his throne; and imagining this to be the so much talked of Prester John, he sent Peter de Covillam,

VOL. I.

and Alonso de Payva by land to get intelligence of this great potentate, and some account of India. They went together by the way of Grand Cair to Tor on the coast of Arabia, where they parted, Covillam for India, and Payva for Ethiopia, agreeing to meet by a certain time at Grand Cair: the first went to Cananor, Calicut and Goa, passed thence to Zofala in Africk, then to Aden at the mouth of the Red-sea on the side of Arabia, and at last to Grand Cair, where he found his companion had died. Hence he sent an account to the king of his proceedings by a Jew come from Portugal, and with another embarked for Ormuz, then went over into Ethiopia, where he was kindly entertained, but never suffered to return home. At the same time these were sent away by land, Bartholomew Diaz put to sea with three ships, and out-going all that had been before him a hundred and twenty leagues, discovered the mountains he called Sierra Parda, and passed on in sight of the bay called De los Vaqueros, or of the Herdsmen, because of the great herds of cattle they saw there; beyond which he touched at the small island Santa Cruz, entered the mouth of the river called Del Infante, and at last came to the now famous, and till then unknown cape, which he called Tormentoso, because he there met with storms; but the king, in hopes of discovering the East-Indies, changed its name to that of Cabo de Buena Esperanza, or cape of Good Hope: this done he returned home, having discovered more than any man before him. The strange conceit which possessed the heads of the sailors, that there was no possibility of passing beyond Cabo Tormentoso, as they called it, and the great employment the kings of Portugal found in their great discoveries upon the coast of Africk, very much retarded the prosecution of further designs, so that nothing was advanced till

An. 1497. King Emanuel, who with the crown of Portugal had inherited the ambition of enlarging his dominions, and the desire of finding a way by sea to the East-Indies, appointed Vasco de Gama a gentleman of an undaunted spirit admiral of those ships he designed for this expedition, which were only three, and a tender; their names were the S. Gabriel, the S. Raphael and Berrio; the captains Vasco de Gama admiral, Paul de Gama his brother, and Nicholas Nunez, and Gonzalo Nunez of the tender, which was laden with provisions. Gama sailed from Lisbon on the eighth of July, and the first land he came to after almost five months sail was the bay of S. Helena, where he took some Blacks. The twentieth of November he sailed thence, and doubled the cape of Good Hope, and on the twenty fifth fifth touched at the bay of S. Blas, sixty leagues beyond the aforesaid cape, where he exchanged some merchandize with the natives. Here he took all the provisions of the tender, and burnt it. On Christmas-day they saw the land, which for that reason they called Terra do Natal, that is, Christmas-land; then the river they named De los Reyes, that is of the kings, because discovered on the feast of the Epiphany; and after that cape Corrientes, passing fifty leagues beyond Zofala without seeing it, where they went up a river in which were boats with sails made of palm-tree leaves: the people were not so black as those they had seen before, and understood the Arabick character, who said that to the eastward lived people who sailed in vessels like those of the Portugueses. This river Gama called De Bons Sinays, for of good tokens, because it put him in hopes of finding what he came in search of. Sailing hence, he again came to an anchor among the islands of S. George opposite to Mozambique, and removing thence anchored again above the town of Mozambique in 14 degrees and a half of south-latitude; whence after a short stay, with the assistance of a Moorish pilot, he touched at Quiloa and Monbaza; and having at Melinde settled a peace with the Moorish king of that place, and taken in a Guzarat pilot, he set sail for India, and crossing that great gulph of seven hundred leagues in twenty days, anchored two leagues below Calicut on the twentieth of May. To this place had Gama discovered twelve hundred leagues beyond what was known before, drawing a straight line from the river Del Infante, discovered by Bartholomew Diaz, to the port of Calicut, for in sailing about by the coast it is much more. Returning home not far from the coast, he fell in with the islands of Anchediva, signifying in the Indian language five islands, because they are so many; and having had sight of Goa at a distance, sailed over again to the coast of Africk, and anchored near the town of Magadoxa. At Melinde he was friendly received by the king, but being again under sail, the ship S. Raphael struck ashore and was lost, giving her name to those sands: all the men were saved aboard the other two ships, which parted in a storm near Cabo Verde. Nicholas Coello arrived first at Lisbon, and soon after him Vasco de Gama, having spent in this voyage two years and almost two months. Of a hundred and sixty men he carried out, only fifty five returned home; who were all well rewarded.

An. 1500. King Emanuel, encouraged by the success of Vasco de Gama, fitted out a fleet of thirteen sail under the command of Peter Alvarez Cabral, and in it twelve hundred men, to gain footing in India. He failed on the eighth of March, and meeting with violent storms was cast off from the coast of Africk so far, that on Easter eve the fleet came into a port, which for the safety found in it was called Seguro, and the country at that time Santa Cruz, being the same now known by the name of Brazil, on the south-continent of America. Hence the admiral sent back a ship to advertise the king of the accidental new discovery, leaving two Portugueses ashore to enquire into the customs and product of the land. Sailing thence on the twelfth of May for the cape of Good Hope, the fleet was for twenty days in a most dreadful storm, inasmuch, that the sea swallowed up four ships, and the admiral arrived with only six at Zofala on the sixteenth of July, and on the twentieth at Mozambique; where having refitted, he prosecuted his voyage to Quiloa, and thence to Melinde, whence the fleet stood over for India, and reached Anchediva on the twenty fourth of August: then coming to Calicut, peace and commerce was there agreed on with Zamori, the king of Calicut, but as soon broken, and the Portugueses entered into strict amity with the kings of Cochin and Cananor, where they took in their lading and returned to Portugal.

An. 1501. John de Nova departed from Lisbon with four ships and four hundred men, and in his way discovered the island of Conception, in 8 degrees of south-latitude, and on the east-side of Africk that which from him was called the island of John de Nova. At Cananor and Cochin he took in all his lading, destroying many vessels of Calicut, and in his return home found the island of St. Helena in 15 degrees of south-latitude, distant fifteen hundred forty nine leagues from Goa, and eleven hundred from Lisbon, being then unpeopled, but since of great advantage to all that use the trade of India.

An. 1502. The king set out a fleet of twenty sail commanded by the first discoverer of India, Vasco de Gama, whose second voyage this was. No new discoveries were made by him, but only trade secured at Cochin and Cananor, several ships of Calicut taken and destroyed, the king of Quiloa on the coast of Africk brought to submit himself to Portugal, paying tribute; and so Vasco de Gama returned home with nine ships richly laden, leaving Vincent Sodre behind with five ships to scour the coasts of India, and secure the factories there.

An. 1503. Nine ships were sent under three several commanders, Alonso de Albuquerque, Francis de Albuquerque, and Anthony tony de Saldanha, each of them having three ships. The Albuquerque, with permission of that king, built a port at Cochin, burnt some towns, took many ships of Calicut, and then returned richly laden homewards, where Alonso arrived safe with his ships, but Francis and his were never more heard of. Saldanha the third of these commanders, gave his name to a bay short of the cape of Good Hope, where he endeavoured to water; but it cost the blood of some of his men, and therefore the place was called Aguada de Saldanha, or Saldanha's watering-place. Thence proceeding on his voyage, he obliged the king of Monbaza on the other coast of Africa to accept of peace; and then went away to cruize upon the Moors at the mouth of the Red-sea, which was the post appointed him.

An. 1504. Finding no good was to be done in India without a considerable force, king Emanuel fitted out thirteen ships, the biggest that had been yet built in Portugal, and in them twelve hundred men, all under the command of Lope Soarez, who made no further discoveries, only concluded a peace with Zamori, and returned rich home.

An. 1505. D. Francisco de Almeyda was sent to India, with the title of viceroy, carrying with him twenty two ships, and in them fifteen hundred men, with whom he attacked and took the town of Quiloa on the east coast of Africa, and in about 9 degrees of south-latitude, where he built a fort; then burnt Monbaza on the same coast in four degrees, and sailing over to India erected another fort in the island Anchediva, and a third at Cananor on the Malabar coast.

An. 1506. James Fernandez Pereyra commander of one of the ships left to cruize upon the mouth of the Red-sea, returned to Lisbon with the news of his having discovered the island Zocotora, not far distant from the said mouth, and famous for producing the best aloes, from it called succotrina. In March this year sailed from Lisbon Alonso de Albuquerque, and Tristan da Cunha, with thirteen ships, and thirteen hundred men, the former to command the trading ships, the latter to cruize on the coast of Arabia: in their passage they had a fight of cape S. Augustin in Brasil; and standing over from thence for the cape of Good Hope, Tristan da Cunha ran far away to the south; and discovered the islands which still retain his name. Sailing hence, some discovery was made upon the island of Madagascar, that of Zocotora subdued, and the fleet sailed part for the coast of Arabia; and part for India. In the former Albuquerque took and plundered the town of Calayate, the same he did to Mascate, Soar submitted, and Orfuzam they found abandoned by the inhabitants. This done, Albuquerque sailed away to Ormuz, then first seen by Europeans. This city is seated in an island called Gerum, at the mouth of the Persian gulph, so barren that it produces nothing but salt and sulphur, but it is one of the greatest marts in those countries. Hence Albuquerque failed to India, where he served some time under the command of the viceroy Almeyda, till he was himself made governor of the Portuguese conquests in those parts, which was in the year 1510, during which time the whole business was to settle trade, build forts, and erect factories along those coasts already known, that is, all the east-side of Africa, the shores of Arabia, Persia, Guzarat, Cambaya, Decan, Canara and Malabar; and indeed they had employment enough, if well followed, to have held them many more years. But avarice and ambition know no bounds; the Portuguese had not yet passed cape Comori, the utmost extent of the Malabar coast, and therefore

An. 1510. James Lopez de Sequeira was sent from Lisbon with orders to pass as far as Malaca: This is a city seated on that peninsula, formerly called Aurea Cberfonsus, running out into the Indian sea from the main land, to which it is joined by a narrow neck of land on the north, and on the south separated from the island of Sumatra by a small strait or channel: Malaca was at that time the greatest emporium of all the farther India. Thither Sequeira was sent to settle trade, or rather to discover what advantages might be gained; but the Moors who watched to destroy him, having failed of their design to murder him at an entertainment, contrived to get thirty of his men ashore on pretence of loading spice, and then falling on them and the ships at the same time killed eight Portuguese, took sixty, and the ships with difficulty got away. However here we have Malaca discovered, and a way open to all the further parts of India. In his way to Malaca, Sequeira made peace with the kings of Achem, Pedir and Pacem, all at that time small princes at the northwest end of the island Sumatra. Whilst Sequeira was thus employed, Albuquerque assaults the famous city of Goa, seated in a small island on the coast of Decan, and taking the inhabitants unprovided made himself master of it, but enjoyed it not long; for Hidalkan the former owner returning with sixty thousand men, drove him out of it after a siege of twenty days: yet the next year he again took it by force, and it has ever since continued in the hands of the Portuguese, and been the metropolis of all their dominions in the east, being made an archbishop's see, and the residence of the viceroy who has the government of all the conquests in those parts. Albuquerque flushed with this success, as soon as he had settled all safe at Goa, sailed for Malaca with fourteen hundred fighting men in nineteen ships. By the way he took five ships, and at his arrival on the coast of Sumatra was complimented by the kings of Pedir and Pacem. It is not unworthy relating in this place, that in one of the ships taken at this time was found Neboada Beeguea, one of the chief contrivers of the treachery against Sequeira; and though he had received several mortal wounds, yet not one drop of blood came from him; but as soon as a bracelet of bone was taken off his arm, the blood gushed out at all parts. The Indians said this was the bone of a beast called Cabis, which some will have to be found in Siam, and others in the island of Java, which has this strange virtue, but none has ever been found since. This being looked upon as a great treasure, was sent by Albuquerque to the king of Portugal, but the ship it went in was cast away, so that we have lost that rarity, if it be true there ever was any such. Albuquerque sailing over to Malaca had the Portugueses that had been taken from Sequeira delivered; but that not being all he came for, he landed his men, and at the second assault made himself master of the city, killing or driving out all the Moors, and peopling it again with strangers and Malays.

An. 1513. Albuquerque made an attempt upon the city of Aden, but failed, being repulsed with loss. This place is seated on the coast of Arabia Felix, near the mouth of the Red-sea, under the mountain Arzira, which is all a barren rock: It is rich, because resorted to by many merchants of several nations; but the soil excessive dry, so that it scarce produces any thing. Being disappointed here, Albuquerque steered his course towards the Red-sea, being the first European that ever entered it with European ships.

An. 1517. Lope Soares de Albergoria governor of India sailed over to the island of Ceylon with seven galleys, two ships, and eight smaller vessels, carrying in them all seven hundred Portuguese soldiers. This island had been before seen by the Portugueses passing to Malaca, but not much known. Here Lope Soares built a fort, and in process of time the Portugueses made themselves masters of all the sea-coasts of this wealthy island.

About the same time John de Silveira, who had the command of four sail, made a farther progress than had been done before in the discovery of the Maldroy islands, which are so many that the number of them is not yet known, lying in clusters; and these in a line N. W. and S. E. and twelve of these clusters in the line, besides two other little parcels lying together east and west from one another at the south-end of the aforesaid twelve. These, though so numerous, are so very small, that no great account is made of them. From them he sailed to the kingdom of Bengala, lying in the upper part of the gulph of the same name in about 23 degrees of north-latitude, being all the country about the mouth of the river Ganges. To this joins the kingdom of Arracam descending southward, then that of Pegu, and next to it that of Siam, which joins to the Aurea Chersonesus, or peninsula of Malaca. All these countries abound in wealth, producing infinite plenty of silk and cotton, of which last they make the finest calicoes and mullins, with much reason admired by all the nations of Europe. They have numerous droves of elephants, and consequently great plenty of ivory, besides plenty of black cattel and buffaloes.

An. 1517. Fernan Perez de Andrade, sent by the king of Portugal to make new discoveries, leaving all behind that had been before known, and passing the strait betwixt Malaca and the island Sumatra, came upon the coast of the kingdom of Camboia, whence he proceeded to that of Cbiampa, where taking of fresh water had like to have cost him his life. He went on to Patane, and established peace and commerce with the governor there: which done, the season being unfit to proceed further, he returned to Malaca to refit. As soon as the weather was seasonable he set out again, and continued his discoveries till he arrived at Canton, or Quantung, the most remarkable sea-port town on the southern coast of the vast empire of Cbina. He treated with the governor of Canton, and sent an ambassador to the emperor of Cbina, and settled trade and commerce in that city for the present. Though this was not lasting, (for the very next Portugueses that arrived, behaved themselves so insolently, that the fleet of Cbina attacked them, and they had much difficulty to get off; and their ambassador being sent back from Peking by the emperor to Canton unheard, was there put to death) nevertheless some years after the Portugueses obtained leave to settle in a little island opposite to the port of Canton, where they built the city Macao, which they hold to this day, though subject to the emperor of Cbina.

An. 1520. James Lopez de Sequeira, then governor of India, sailed for the Red-sea with a fleet of twenty four ships, and in it eighteen hundred Portugueses, and as many Malabars.

Malabars and Canarins. Coming to the island Mazua in the Red-sea, he found it forsaken by the inhabitants, who were fled over to Arquico, a port belonging to Prefter John, or the emperor of Ethiopia, which was now first discovered by sea. At this time it was a vast monarchy, and extended along the shores of the Red-sea above a hundred and twenty leagues, which was counted the least of its sides; but since then all the sea-coast has been taken from them by the Turks. Here the Portugueses in following years made some progress into the country, five hundred of them being sent under the command of D. Christopher de Gama to assist the emperor against his rebellious subjects, and his enemies the Turks. The actions performed by this handful of men being all by land, do not belong to us; but they travelled a great part of the country, and opened a way for the Jesuits, who for several years after continued there.

An. 1521. Antony de Brito was sent to the Molucco islands from Malaca. These had been before discovered by Antony de Abreu. The Molucco islands are five in number, their names, Ternate, Tidore, Moufel, Machien, Bacham. These islands were afterwards long struggled for by the Portugueses and Dutch, till at last the Dutch prevailed, and continue in possession of that trade till this day. A few years now past without any considerable discoveries by sea, though still they found several little islands, and advanced far by land, too long for this discourse, designed only to shew the progress of navigation. Let us then proceed to the next considerable voyage, which was

An. 1540. Which furnishes as remarkable a piece of sea-service as any we shall read undertaken by a private man. Peter de Faria governor of Malaca sent his kinsman Antony de Faria y Sousa, to secure a peace with the king of Patane. He carried with him goods to the value of twelve thousand ducats; and finding no sale for them there, sent them to Lugor in the kingdom of Siam, by one Christopher Borallo, who coming to an anchor in the mouth of that river was surprized by a Moor of Guzarat called Coje Hazem, a sworn enemy to the Portugueses. Borallo having lost his ship swam himself ashore, and carried the news of what had happened to Faria at Patane, who vowed never to desist till he had destroyed that Moor, and in order to it fitted out a small vessel with fifty men, in which he sailed from Patane towards the kingdom of Champa, to seek the pirate there. In the latitude of 3 degrees 20 minutes, he found the island of Pulo Condor, whence he sailed into the port of Bralapi-

sam in the kingdom of Camboia, and so coasted along to the river Pulo Cambier, which divides the kingdoms of Camboia and Tsiompa. Coasting still along, he came to an anchor at the mouth of the river Toobasoy, where he took two ships belonging to the pirate Similau, and burnt some others. The booty was very rich, besides the addition of strength, the ships being of considerable force. Thus increased, he goes on to the river Tinacoreu, or Varela, where the Siam and Malaca ships trading to China, barter their goods for gold, Calamba wood and ivory. Hence he directed his course to the island Ayan on the coast of China, and passed in sight of Champilco in the latitude of 13 degrees, and at the entrance of the bay of Cochinchina; then discovered the promontory Pulocampas, westward whereof is a river, near which spying a large vessel at anchor, and imagining it might be Coje Hazem, he fell upon and took it, but found it belonged to Quiay Tajam a pirate. In this vessel were found seventy thousand quintals, or hundred weight of pepper, besides other spice, ivory, tin, wax and powder, the whole valued at sixty thousand crowns, besides several good pieces of cannon, and some plate. Then coasting along the island Ayan, he came to the river Tananquir, where two great vessels attacked him, both which he took, and burnt the one for want of men to sail her. Further on at C. Tiloure he surprized four small vessels, and then made to Mutipinam, where he sold his prizes for the value of two hundred thousand crowns of uncoined silver. Thence he sailed to the port of Madel in the island Ayan, where meeting Himilan a bold pirate, who exercised great cruelties towards Christians, he took and practised the same on him. This done, he run along that coast, discovering many large towns and a fruitful country. And now the men weary of seeking Coje Hazem in vain, demanded their share of the prizes to be gone, which was granted: but as they shaped their course for the kingdom of Siam, where the dividend was to be made, by a furious storm they were cast away on the island called de los Ladrones, which lies south of China, where of five hundred men only eighty six got ashore naked, whereof twenty eight were Portugueses: Here they continued fifteen days with scarce any thing to eat, the island not being inhabited. Being in despair of relief, they discovered a small vessel which made to the shore, and anchoring, sent thirty men for wood and water. These were Chineses, whom the Portugueses, upon a sign given as had been agreed, surprized, running on a sudden and possessing themselves of their boat and vessel; and leaving them ashore, directed their course towards Liampo, a sea-port town in the province of Cbequiang in Cbina, joining by the way a Cbinese pirate, who was a great friend to the Portugueses, and had thirty of them aboard. At the river Anay they refitted and came to Cbincheo, where Faria hired thirty five Portugueses he found, and putting to sea met with eight more naked in a fisher-boat, who had their ship taken from them by the pirate Coje Hazem; which news of him rejoiced Faria, and he provided to fight him, having now four vessels with five hundred men, whereof ninety five were Portugueses. He found his enemy in the river Tinlau, where he killed him and four hundred of his men, and took all his ships but one that sunk, with abundance of wealth: But it prospered very little, for the next night Faria's ship and another were cast away, and most of the goods aboard the others thrown overboard, and one hundred and eleven men lost; Faria escaped, and taking another rich ship of pirates by the way, came at last to winter at Liampo, as was said before, a sea-port town in the province of Cbequiang in Cbina, but built by the Portugueses, who governed there. Having spent five months here, he directed his course for the island Calemply on the coast of Cbina, where he was informed were the monuments of the ancient kings of Cbina, which he designed to rob, being reported to be full of treasure. After many days sail through seas never before known to the Portugueses, he came into the bay of Nanking, but durst not make any stay there, perceiving about three thousand sail lie at anchor about it. Here the Cbineses he had with him being ill used fled, but some natives informed him he was but ten leagues from the island Calemply: He arrived there the next day, and intending to rob all the tombs, the old keepers of them gave the alarm, which prevented his design, and he was obliged to put to sea again, where having wandred a month, he perished in a storm, both his ships being cast away, and only fourteen men saved. Thus ended this voyage, famous for several particulars, and especially for having discovered more of the north of Cbina than was known before, though the design of the undertaker was only piracy. The city Liampo before mentioned was soon after utterly destroyed by the governor of the province of Cbequiang, for the robberies and insolences committed in the country by the Portugueses.

An. 1542. Antony de Mota, Francis Zeimoto, and Antony Peixoto sailing for Cbina, were by storms drove upon the islands of Nipongi, or Nison, by the Cbineses called Gipon, and by us Japan. Here they were well received, and had the honour, though accidentally, of being the first discoverers of these islands. Their situation is east of Cbina, betwixt 30 and 40 degrees of north-latitude: There are many of them, but the principal is Nipongi, or Japan, in which the emperor keeps his court at the city of Meaco. The chief islands about it are Cikoko, Tokoesti, Sando, Sissime, Bacasa, Vuogui, Saycock or Ximo, Goto, Ceuxima, Tanaxuma, Toy, Gisima, Jasima, Tanaxuma and Firando. Hitherto we have mentioned none but the Portugueses, they being the only discoverers of all those parts, and all other nations have followed their track, yet not till some years after this time, as we shall soon see. I do not here mention the discovery of the Philippine islands, though properly belonging to the east, as not very remote from Cbina, because they were discovered and conquered the other way, that is from America; and therefore we shall speak of them in their place among the western discoveries. What has been hitherto said concerning these Portuguese voyages is collected out of John de Barros's decads of India, Oforius's history of India, Alvarez of Abassia, and Faria's Portuguese Asia. Having seen what has been done by these discoverers, let us next lightly touch upon the voyages of those who followed their footsteps.

An. 1551. We meet with the first English voyage on the coast of Africk, performed by Mr. Thomas Windbam, but no particulars of it.

An. 1552. The same Windbam returned with three sail, and traded at the ports of Zafim and Santa Cruz; the commodities he brought from thence being sugar, dates, almonds and molosses.

An. 1553. This Windbam, with Antibony Anes Pinteado, a Portuguese and promoter of this voyage, sailed with three ships from Portsmouth: They traded for gold along the coast of Guinea, and from thence proceeded to the kingdom of Benin, where they were promised loading of pepper: but both the commanders and most of the men dying through the unseasonableness of the weather, the rest, being scarce forty, returned to Plymouth with but one ship and little wealth.

An. 1554. Mr. John Lock undertook a voyage for Guinea with three ships, and trading along that coast brought away a considerable quantity of gold and ivory, but proceeded no further. The following years Mr. William Towerson and others performed several voyages to the coast of Guinea, which having nothing peculiar but a continuation of trade in the same parts, there is no occasion for giving any particulars of them. Nor do we find any account of a further progress made along this coast by the English, till we come to their voyages to the East-Indies, and those begun but late; for the first Englishman we find in those parts was one Thomas Stevens, who

An. 1579. wrote an account of his voyage thither to his father in London; but he having sailed aboard a Portuguese ship, this voyage makes nothing to the English nation, whose first undertaking to India in ships of their own was,

An. 1591. Three stately ships called the Penelope, the Merchant Royal, and the Edward Bonaventure, were fitted out at Plymouth, and sailed thence under the command of Mr. George Raymond: they departed on the tenth of April, and on the first of August came to an anchor in the bay called Aguada de Saldanha, fifteen leagues north of the cape of Good-Hope. Here they continued several days, and traded with the Blacks for cattle, when finding many of their men had died, they thought fit to send back Mr. Abraham Kendal in the Royal Merchant with fifty men, there being too few to manage the three ships if they proceeded on their voyage: Kendal accordingly returned, and Raymond and Lancaster in the Penelope and Edward Bonaventure proceeded, and doubled the cape of Good Hope; but coming to cape Corrientes on the fourteenth of September, a violent storm parted them, and they never met again; for Raymond was never heard of, but Lancaster held on his voyage. Passing by Mozambique he came to the island Comera, where after much shew of friendship, the Moorish inhabitants killed thirty two of his men, and took his boat, which obliged him to hoist sail and be gone; and after much delay by contrary winds he doubled cape Comori, opposite to the island of Ceylon in India, in the month of May 1592. Thence in six days, with a large wind which blew hard, he came upon the island of Gomes Polo, which lies near the northernmost point of the island Sumatra; and the winter-season coming on, stood over to the island of Pulo Pinao, lying near the coast of Malaca, and betwixt it and the island Sumatra, in 7 degrees north latitude, where he continued till the end of August refreshing his men the best the place would allow, which afforded little but fish, yet twenty six of them died there. Then the captain running along the coast of Malaca, and adjacent islands, more like a pirate than merchant or discoverer, took some prizes, and so thought to have returned home: but his provisions being spent when they came to cross the equinoctial, where he was staid by calms and contrary winds six weeks, he ran away to the West-Indies to get some supply, where after touching at several places, the captain and eighteen men went ashore in the little island Mona, lying betwixt those of Portorico and Hispaniola, but five men and a boy left in the ship cut the cable and sailed away. Lancaster and eleven of his men some days after spying a sail, made a fire; upon which signal the Frenchman, for such a one it proved to be, took in his topails, and drawing near the island received them aboard, treating them with extraordinary civility, and so brought them to Diepe in Normandy, whence they passed over to Rye in Sussex, and landed there in May 1594, having spent three years, six weeks, and two days in this voyage. Hitherto Hackluit, vol. II.

An. 1595. The Dutch resolving to try their fortune in the East-Indies, fitted out four ships at Amsterdam under the command of Cornelius Hootman, which sailed on the second of April, and on the fourth of August anchored in the bay of S. Blase, about forty five leagues beyond the cape of Good Hope, where they continued some days trading with the natives for cattle in exchange for iron. August the eleventh they departed that place, and coasting along part of the island Madagascar, came at last into the bay of S. Augustin, where they exchanged pewter spoons and other trifles with the natives for cattle, till they fell at variance; and the natives keeping away, no more provisions were to be had: and therefore on the tenth of December they weighed, directing their course for Java, but meeting with bad weather and strong currents were kept back till the tenth of January, when they were forced for want of refreshments to put into the island of S. Mary, lying on the eastern coast of Madagascar in 17 degrees of south-latitude, whence they removed to the great bay of Antongil, and continued there till the twelfth of February: then putting to sea again, they arrived on the coast of the great island Sumatra on the eleventh of June, and spending some days along that coast, came at last to Bantam in the island of Java. They lay here, very favourably entertained by the emperor of Java, till falling at variance many hostilities passed betwixt them; and in November the Dutch removed from before Bantam to Jacatra, which is no great distance. In January finding themselves much weakened by loss of men, and the Amsterdam one of the biggest ships leaky, they unladed and burnt her. Having thoughts of sailing for the Molucco islands, they ran along as far as the strait of Balambuon at the east-end of Java; but the seamen refusing to pass any further, they made through the strait, and on the twenty seventh of February sailed along the coast coast of Java towards the cape of Good Hope; and three of their four ships, besides the pinnace that was a tender, and eighty nine seamen, being all that were left of four hundred and forty nine, returned to Holland in August following, having been abroad twenty nine months. This and the voyage soon after following in 1598. may seem to be mistaken, because it is said in both, that the commander in chief was Cornelius Hootman; but it must be observed, they differ not only in time, but in all other circumstances, and this is certainly the first voyage the Dutch made to India, whereas in the other there is mention of those people having been there before. This is to be seen at large in the collection of voyages undertaken by the Dutch East-India company, printed this present year 1703.

An. 1596. Sir Robert Dudley, as principal adventurer, set out three ships under the command of Benjamin Wood, designing to trade in Cbina; for which purpose he carried letters from queen Elizabeth to the emperor of Cbina: but these ships and the men all perished, so we have no account of their voyage. Purchas, vol. I. p. 110.

An. 1598. Three merchants of Middleburgh fitted out two ships under the command of Cornelius Howsteman for the East-Indies, which sailed on the fifteenth of March. In November they put into the bay of Saldanba on the coast of Africk, in 34 degrees of south-latitude, and ten leagues from the cape of Good Hope. Here pretending to trade with the natives, they offered them some violence; to revenge which, three days after they came down in great numbers, and surprizing the Dutch slew thirteen of them, and drove the rest to their ship. January the third they again anchored in the bay of S. Augustin in the south-west part of the island Madagascar, and 23 degrees of south-latitude, where the natives would not trade with them; and being in great want of provisions, they sailed to the island Magotta, or S. Christopher, on the north of Madagascar, and having got some relief went on to Answame, or Angovan, another small island, where they took in more provisions. Then proceeding on their voyage, they passed by the Maldivy islands, thence by Cochin, and in June arrived in Sumatra at the port of Acben, where after being kindly received by the king, he sent many men aboard on pretence of friendship, but with a design to surprize the ships, which they had near accomplished, but were with difficulty beaten off, yet so that the Dutch lost sixty eight of their men, two pinnaces of twenty tun each, and one of their boats. Sailing hence they watered and refreshed at Pulo Batun off Queda, which is on the coast of Malaca; and having spent much time about those parts, in November anchored at the islands of Nicobar in 8 degrees of latitude, where they had some refreshment, but little; to remedy which, in their way towards Ceylon, they took a ship of Negapan and plundered it. Then directing their course home, in March 1600, they doubled the cape of Good Hope, and in July return'd to Middleburgh. Purchas, vol. I. p. 116.

This same year 1598. the Holland East-India company set out six great ships and two yachts for India under the command of Cornelius Hemskirke, which sailed out of the Texel on the first of May, and coming together to the cape of Good Hope in August, were there separated by a terrible storm: four of them and a yacht put into the island Maurice east of Madagascar; the other two ships and yacht put into the island of S. Mary on the east also of Madagascar, where they made no stay, but sailing thence arrived on the twenty sixth of November 1598. before Bantam; and a month after them came the other five ships and yacht from the island Maurice. The first comers having got their lading, departed from before Bantam on the eleventh of January 1599, and arrived happily in the Texel on the ninth of June 1599, richly laden with pepper, cloves, mace, nutmegs and cinnamon, having spent but fifteen months in the whole voyage. The other four ships and yacht left in India under the command of Wybrant, sailed from Bantam along the north-side of Javan to the east-end of it, where the town of Arojoja is seated. Here the natives, in revenge for some of their people killed by the Dutch in their first voyage, seized seventeen of them that were sent ashore for provisions; and fifty more being sent to their relief in sloops and boats, were all of them killed, drowned or taken. The prisoners were ransomed for two thousand pieces of eight, and then the ships put to sea, and on the third of March 1599. came into the strait of Amboina, where they anchored before a small town in that island, called Itan. This is near the Molucco's, and produces plenty of cloves. There being lading but for two ships here, the other two were sent to Banda, where they took their lading of cloves, nutmegs and mace, and returned home in April 1600. The other two ships left behind at Amboina having taken in what lading of cloves they could get, failed away to get what they wanted at the Molucco's, and anchored at Ternate, where having got the rest of their lading, they departed thence on the nineteenth of August 1599, and came to Jacatra in the island Java on the thirteenth of November, being then reduced duced to extremity for want of provisions: whence after a few days stay they proceeded to Bantam, and thence on the twenty first of January for Holland, where after a tedious voyage they arrived in safety, having lost many men through sickness and want of provisions*. Every year after the Dutch failed not to set out new fleets, being allured by the vast returns they made; yet there was nothing in these voyages but trade, and some encounters with the Spaniards, and therefore it will be needless to mention them all in particular, till in the year 1606, the Dutch possessed themselves of Tidore, one of the Molucco islands, and Amboina, expelling the Portugueses first, and afterwards the English. In 1608 the Dutch admiral Matelief laid siege to Malaca, but without success. Soon after they grew formidable at Jacatra, or Batavia, on the island Java, where they continue to this day, that being the chief seat of all their dominions in the east. Not so satisfied, they at length made themselves masters of Malaca, and expelled the Portugueses the island of Ceylon, by which means they are possessed of the most considerable trade of the east, all the cinnamon, nutmegs and cloves being entirely in their own hands. Nor is this all, for they have conquered the island Formosa on the coast of China, whence they trade to Japan, with the exclusion of all christian nations from that island. And here we will leave the Dutch, to give some further relation of the English proceedings, and so conclude with the East-Indies.

An. 1600. A company of merchant-adventurers was by patent from queen Elizabeth authorized to trade in the East-Indies, and accordingly in January 1600; they fitted out four great ships and a victualler, all under the command of captain James Lancaster, who sailed out of the river of Thames on the thirteenth of February, having four hundred and eighty men aboard his ships, yet got not beyond Torbay till the second of April, and on the first of November doubled the cape of Good Hope. In April following they anchored at the islands of Nicobar, north-east of the great island of Sumatra, and in June came before Achem, where they had a good reception, and settled peace and commerce with that king; but having little to trade with, put to sea, and took a great Portuguese ship richly laden, and returned to Achem, whence they sailed to Bantam in the island of Java: Here they had also good entertainment, and liberty of trade was agreed on; and having taken in what more lading was wanting, which consisted in pepper and cloves, on the twentieth of February they set sail in order to return for England, but meeting with violent storms were carried into 40 degrees of south-latitude, where Lancaster lost his rudder, which was restored with much labour, and so they arrived at the island of St. Helena in June, and having refreshed themselves there put to sea again, and returned safe to England in August. Purchas, vol. 1. p. 147.

An. 1604. The aforefaid company sent four ships more to the East-Indies under the command of sir Henry Middleton, who sailed on the second of April, and arrived at Bantam on the twenty third of December. Two of these ships loaded pepper at Bantam; sir Henry with the others sailed to the isles of Banda, where he continued twenty one weeks, and then returned to Bantam, and arrived in the Downs on the sixth of May 1606. The same year captain John Davis and sir Edward Michellburn with one ship and a pinnace sailed into the East-Indies, trading at Bantam, and taking some prizes, but performed nothing else remarkable. Purchas, vol. 1. p. 185.

An. 1607. The company fitted out their third voyage, being three ships under the command of William Keeling, but only two of them kept company; and setting out in April, arrived not at Priaman in the island Sumatra till July the following year; having spent all this time along the coasts of Africk, and beating at sea against contrary winds. Here they took in some pepper, and then sailed to Bantam, where a Siam embassador invited them to settle commerce in his master's dominions; and so they proceeded to Banda, where they were hindred taking in their lading of spice by the Dutch, who had built a fort on that island. So being disappointed they returned to Bantam, loaded pepper, and settled a factory there, which continued in prosperity till overthrown by the Dutch. Purchas, vol. 1. p. 188.

The third ship mentioned above, which did not keep company with the other two, but set out at the same time, after touching at the bay of Saldamba on the coast of Africk, and at Bantam in the island of Java, proceeded to the Molucco islands, where, with the permission of the Spaniards then possessed of those islands, they had a trade for some days, but were afterwards commanded away. Then sailing towards the island Celebes at the island Butone, or Buton, they were friendly entertained by the king, and brought their full loading of cloves; which done, they returned to Bantam, and thence to England. Purchas, vol. 1. p. 226.

An. 1608. The East-India company for its fourth voyage set out two ships, the Union and Ascension, commanded by Alexander Sharpey and Richard Rowles, who sailed on the fourteenth of March; and having spent above a year by the way, and lost the Union in a storm, the Ascension came on the eighth of April 1609, to an anchor before the city Achem on the coast of Arabia Felix, whence they sailed into the Red-sea, being the first English ship that ever entered it, and on the eleventh of June anchored in the road of the city of Mocha, and having made a short stay to refit, sailed away for the coast of Cambaya, where refusing to take in a pilot the ship was lost on the shoals, but all the men saved in two boats, who got ashore at the small town of Gahdevel, about forty miles from Surat, whither they travelled by land, and were relieved by the English factor there. The captain and most of the company went from thence to Agra the court of the Mogul, resolving to take their journey through Persia to return into Europe. But Thomas Jones, the author of this account, with three others, committed themselves to a Portuguese religious man, who promised to send them home, and accordingly carried them through Damam and Chaul to Goa, where in January they were shipped aboard the admiral of four Portuguese ships homeward bound, and arrived at Lisbon in August, where imbarcking in an English ship they came safe into England in September 1610. The rest of the company that went with the captain dispersed, and few of them came home.

The Union, mentioned before to be separated from the Ascension in a storm, touched at the bay of St. Augustin in the island Madagascar, where the captain and five more going ashore upon friendly invitation were killed by the natives, who thought to have surprized the ship with their boats, but were beaten off with great loss. So sailing hence, they directed their course to Achem on the island Sumatra, where and at Priaman they took in their lading of hafts and pepper, and directed their course to return home. But their voyage proved so unfortunate, that all the men died by the way, except three English and an Indian, who were scarce alive; and not being able to hand their sails, the ship was carried upon the coast of Britany in France, where the French conveyed her into harbour, and most of the lading was saved for the company.

An. 1609. The English East-India company for its fifth voyage set out but one ship, commanded by David Middleton, who arriving at Banda was by the Dutch there hindered loading any spice, and therefore sailed to Puloway a small island not far distant, where with much difficulty and hazard he got loading of spice, and returned home safe. Purchas, vol. 1. p. 238.

An. 1610. Sir Henry Middleton sailed with three ships under his command; and being informed by the natives of the island Zedotora, that he would be friendly received at Mocha in the Red-sea, and find good vent for his goods, he ventured up thither, and after much deceitful kindness shewn him by the Turks, was himself with many of his men secured, and sent up the country several miles to another bazaar. Some men were also killed by the Infidels, who attempted to surprize one of the ships, and were possessed of the upper decks, till the Teamen blew up some, shot others, and drove the rest into the sea, so that only one of them that hid himself escaped and was afterwards received to mercy. After much sollicitation for Henry Middleton and his men were sent back to Mocha, where most of them make their escape aboard their ships. Many fruitless contents having afterwards passed with the Bassa's about the restitution of the goods taken; at last he sailed to Surat, where he arrived in September 1611, and having notwithstanding the opposition made by the Portuguese sold some of his goods, and departing thence to Dabul, had some more trade in that place, yet not so much as to dispose of all he had. Whereupon he resolved to return to the Red-sea, there to traffick with the ships of India, which usually resort to those parts; he detained many of them by force, and bartered with them as he thought fit, the Indians being under restraint, and in no condition to oppose whatever was offered them. Being thus furnished, he sailed for Sumatra, where he got loading of spice, and sent one ship home with her burden, his own having been on a rock, and therefore unfit for the voyage till repaired, which could not be done so soon. This ship arrived safe in England, but Sir Henry Middleton and his were cast away in India. Purchas, vol. 1. p. 247. Other ships sailed the latter end of the year 1610, and beginning of 1611, which still ran much the same course with the former, and have nothing singular to relate. But,

An. 1611. In April sailed captain John Saris with three ships, who having run the same course all the rest had done severally before, entering the Red-sea, and touching at Java, he received a letter from one Adams an Englishman, who sailed aboard some Dutch ships to Japan, and was there detained, in which he gave an account of that country. Captain Saris dismissing his other two ships, directed his course for that island; and passing by those of Bouro, Xula, Bachian, Celebes, Silolo, the Molucco's, and others, came to an anchor on the eleventh of June 1613, at the small island and port of Firando, lying southwest

Southwest of the southwest point of the great island of Japan. This and several other small islands about it are subject to petty kings, who all acknowledge the emperor of Japan for their sovereign. These little princes shewed all imaginable kindness to the English, being the first that ever appeared in those parts. Captain Saris, with the assistance of the king of Firando, was conducted to the emperor's court at Mesaco, where he had audience of him, and settled peace and commerce in as authentick manner as if he had been sent from England only upon that errand; the emperor granting to the English free liberty of trade, and several privileges and immunities for their encouragement. All things being settled there, captain Saris returned to Firando well pleased with his success; and there the goods he brought being not yet all disposed of, he erected a factory, leaving in it eight English, three Japanes for interpreters, and two servants. These were to dispose of the goods left behind, and provide loading for such ships as were to continue the trade now begun. This done, he left Firando on the fifth of December, and stood for the coast of Cbina, along which he kept to that of Cochinchina and Camboya, whence he struck over to the southward, and came into Bantum road, where he continued some time, and lastly put into Plymouth in September 1614. Purchas, vol. 1. p. 334. Thus have we brought the English to Japan, the furthest extent of what vulgarly is comprehended under the name of the East-Indies, and therefore think it needless to prosecute their voyages this way any longer, since they can afford nothing new; nor indeed have hitherto added any thing to what was discovered by the Portugueses, to whom all these countries were well known long before, as has been made appear. Of the Dutch navigations this way somewhat has been said, and it seems needless to add any thing concerning the French, who are not so considerable there as any of those nations already mentioned, besides that they came thither the latest, and therefore not as discoverers, but tracing the beaten road; so that all that can be said of them will be only a repetition of things already spoken of. Having thus given an account of the first discoverers, and the success of all the first voyages to Africk and Asia, it now remains to shew what a vast extent of land is by these means made known, which before Europe was wholly a stranger to, and the commodities it supplies us with; which is one great point of this discourse, viz. to shew what benefit is reaped by navigation, and the vast improvement it has received since the discovery of the magnetical needle, or sea-compass. Then having performed this with all possible brevity, it will be fit to proceed to give the like relation of the discovery and other affairs of America, or the new world, which will lead us to the voyages round the globe, where this discourse will end.

To begin then where the discoveries commenced, that is, at cape Nam, or Nao, which is on the coast of the kingdom of Morocco, and in the twenty eighth degree of latitude; we find the extent made known from thence, taking it only from north to south, from 18 degrees of north-latitude to 35 degrees of south-latitude, in all 53 degrees in length, at twenty leagues to a degree, to be one thousand six hundred leagues, but very much more if we run along the coast, especially upon that of Giamea, which lies east and west for above 25 degrees, which at the same rate as before amounts to five hundred leagues. So that we have here a coast, only reckoning to the cape of Good Hope, of above fifteen hundred leagues in length made known to us, and in it the further Lybia, the country of the Blacks, Guinea, the kingdoms of Benin, Conga, Angola, and the western coast of the Cafres. These are the general names by which these vast regions are known. The natives are for the most part black, or else inclining to it. All the commodities brought from thence, are gold-dust, ivory, and slaves; those black people selling one another, which is a very considerable trade, and has been a great support to all the American plantations. This is all that mighty continent affords for exportation, the greatest part of it being scorched under the torrid zone; and the natives almost naked, no where industrious, and for the most part scarce civilized. In the southermost parts among the wild Cafres, there is plenty of good cattle, which the first traders to India used to buy for knives and other toys at the bay of Saldanha, and other places thereabouts. The Portugueses here have the largest dominions on this coast of any nation, which are in the kingdoms of Congo and Angola. The English and Dutch have some small forts on the coast of Guinea, and the Dutch a large strong town, with all manner of improvements about it, at the cape of Good Hope. From this cape of Good Hope to cape Guardafu at the entrance into the Red-sea, the coast running north-east and south-west, extends above twelve hundred leagues in a strait line, containing the eastern Cafres and Zanguebar, which are the two great divisions of this side; the latter of these subdivided into the kingdoms of Mozambique, Pemba, Quiloa, Monbaca, Melinde, Magadoxa and Adel. Of these

the Portugueses possess the town and fort of Mozambique, having lost Monbacá within these few years, taken from them by the Moors. No other European nation has any dominions on this coast, which is all in the possession of the natives or Moors. The commodities here are the same as on the west-side of Africk, gold, ivory and slaves. All this vast continent produces many sorts of fruit and grain unknown to us, as also beasts and fowl, which being no part of trade, are not mentioned here. Yet before we leave this coast we must not omit to mention the island Zocotora, famous for producing the best aloes, and situate not far distant from cape Guardafu. Next in course follows the Red-sea, the mouth whereof is about a hundred and twenty leagues from cape Guardafu, and its length from the mouth to Suez at the bottom of it above four hundred leagues, lying north-west and south-east: on one side of it is the coast of Aben and Egypt, on the other that of Arabia Petrea, and Arabia Felix, all in the possession of the Turks, and not at all resorted to by any European nation, but somewhat known to them by the way of Egypt, before the discovery of India. From the mouth of the Red-sea to the gulph of Persia lies the coast of Arabia, extending about four hundred leagues north-east and south-west to cape Rosalgate at the entrance into the bay of Ormuz. This coast is partly subject to the Turk, and partly to Arabian princes; and its principal commodities are rich gums, and coffee. Turning cape Rosalgate to the north-west is the great bay of Ormuz, along which runs still the coast of Arabia, where stands Mascate, once possessed by the Portugueses, now by the Arabs. Next we come into the gulph of Bazzara, or of Persia, almost two hundred leagues in length, and enclosed by Arabia on the one side, and Persia on the other. At the mouth of this bay in a small island is the famous city Ormuz, conquered and kept many years by the Portugueses, but at last taken from them by the Persians, with the assistance of the English. Within the bay of the Arabian side is the island Babarem, famous for a great fishery of pearls. From the mouth of the Persian gulph to that of Indus are about three hundred and forty leagues, being the coast of Persia, where no prince possesses any thing but that great monarch. The chiefest commodities here are raw silk, rhubarb, wormseed, carpets of all sorts, wrought and plain silks, silks wrought with gold or silver, half silks and half cottons. From the mouth of Indus to cape Comori, taking in the bend of the coast from Indus to Cambaya, lying north-west and south-east, and from that bay to the cape almost north and south, are near four hundred leagues, including the shores of Guzarat, Cambaya, Decan, Canara and Malabar: of these Guzarat and Cambaya, with part of Decan, are subject to the great Mogul, the other parts to several Indian princes. Yet the Portugueses have the port of Diu in Guzarat, Damam in Cambaya, and the great city of Goa in Decan, besides other ports of lesser consequence: the English the island of Bombaim, and the Dutch some forts. Doubling cape Comori, and running in a straight line north-east, there are about four hundred and forty leagues to the bottom of the bay of Bengala; and turning thence south-east, somewhat more than the same number of leagues to the southermost point of the Aurea Cberfonesus, or coast of Malaca: and in this space the shores of Coromandel, Bijnagar, Gokonda, Orixa, Bengata, Arracan, Pegu, Martaban, and the Aurea Cberfonesus, or Peninsula of Malaca. Hence we will make but one line more for brevity sake up to Japan on the northern coast of Cbina, which in a strait line, without allowing any thing for the bays of Siam and Cochinchina, is at least eight hundred leagues, and in it the east-side of the Peninsula of Malaca, the kingdoms of Siam, Camboia, Chiampa and Cochinchina, and the vast empire of Cbina. All these immense regions from Persia eastward are vulgarly, though improperly, comprehended under the name of the East-Indies. The product of these countries is no less to be admired, being all sorts of metals, all beasts and birds, and the most delicious of fruits. But to speak by way of trade, the commodities here are diamonds, silk raw and wrought in prodigious quantities, cotton unwrought, and infinite plenty of it in calicoes and muslins, all sorts of sweet and rich woods, all the gums, drugs and dyes, all the precious plants, and rich perfumes, not to mention the spices, which I leave to the islands; in fine, all that is precious, delightful, or useful: inasmuch, that though here be mines of silver and gold, yet none is sent abroad, but hither it flows from all other parts, and is here swallowed up. But something must be said of the islands belonging to this great continent, for the value of them is immense, as well as their number, and the extent of some of them. The first in order that are any thing considerable, are the Maldivy islands, rather remarkable for their multitude than any other thing, being so many that the number is not known, yet so small, that no great account is made of them: they lie south-east of cape Comori, betwixt three and 8 degrees of north-latitude; for so far they run, being disposed in twelve several clusters or parcels that lie

north-west and south-east, at the south-end whereof lie two other less clusters or parcels east and west from one another. As for trade, or commerce, though these islands are very fruitful, they have not any thing considerable to promote it, especially to supply Europe, which is the thing here to be considered. Next to these is the great and rich island of Ceylon beyond cape Comori, formerly divided into several petty kingdoms, till the Portugueses first reduced all the sea-coasts under their dominion, and were afterwards dispossessed by the Dutch, who still remain masters of them, but could never yet conquer the inland. This is a place of mighty traffick, for it produces the best cinnamon in the world, and supplies all Europe: here are also found the finest rubies, and several other sorts of precious stones. The elephants of this island are counted the best in all India, and as such coveted by all the eastern princes, who, though they have herds of them in their own dominions, do not spare to give considerable prices for these, which is a great enriching of the country. The islands of Sunda, or the Sound, are that great parcel lying south and south-east of Malaca, the principal whereof are Sumatra, Borneo and Java: the two first directly under the line, Sumatra above three hundred leagues in length, lying north-west and south-east, and about sixty in breadth in the widest place; Borneo is almost round, and about six hundred in circumference; Java the last of them lies betwixt 7 and 10 degrees of south-latitude, is about two hundred leagues in length from east to west, and not above forty in breadth in the widest place from north to south. There are many more, but all small in comparison of these, unless we reckon Celebes lying under the line, near an hundred and eighty leagues in length, the longest way north-east and south-west, and about eighty in breadth in the broadest place from east to west: As also Gilolo, under the equator as well as the last, of an irregular shape, and not above one fourth part of the bigness of Celebes. All these islands have a prodigious trade, being resorted to from all parts, not only of India, but even from Europe. Their wealth is incredible, for they produce whatsoever man can wish; but the principal commodities exported are ginger, pepper, camphir, agarick, cassia, wax, honey, silk, cotton; they have also mines of gold, tin, iron and sulphur, all sorts of cattel and fowl, but no vines nor olive-trees. In Sumatra the Dutch have some forts, and are very powerful, but much more in Java, where Batavia, a populous city, is the metropolis of their eastern dominions. The English had a great trade and factory at Bantam in the same island, but were expelled by the Dutch in the year 1682. After these follow the Molucco islands, which are five in number properly so called, viz. Ternate, Tidore, Machian, Moutil or Moufil, and Bachian: They lie along the west-side of Gilolo, so near the equinoctial, that the last of them lies 24 or 25 minutes south, and the first of them about 50 minutes north of it. They are so small, that all of them do not take up above 1 degree, and 10 or 15 minutes of latitude. Ternate is the northernmost, and in order from it lie to the south Tidore, Moutil, Machian and Bachian. The whole product of these islands is cloves, which are scarce found elsewhere, and here little besides them; which is the reason why the Dutch have possessed themselves of them, expelling the Portugueses, who after long contests had bought out the Spaniards claim to them. With the Molucco's may be reckoned the islands of Amboina and Banda: The first of these produces cloves like the other, and was once much resorted to by the English, till the Dutch destroyed their factory, of which action there are particular printed accounts. Banda is a larger island than any of the others, and in five degrees of south-latitude, possessed also by the Dutch, who have here all the trade of nutmegs and mace, which scarce grow any where but in this and two or three neighbouring islands. A vast multitude of other little islands are scattered about this sea, but those already mentioned are the most considerable; for though those of Cbiram and Papous be large, there is very little of them known, by which it is natural to guess they are not of much value; for if they were, the same avarice that has carried so many European nations into their neighbourhood to destroy not only the natives, but one another, would have made them long since as familiar to us as the rest. Of Japan enough was said when first discovered by the Portugueses, and in captain Saris's voyage thither, where the reader may satisfy his curiosity. All that needs be added is, that it produces some gold, and great plenty of silver. For other commodities, here is abundance of hemp, excellent dyes, red, blue and green, rice, brimstone, salt-petre, cotton, and the most excellent varnish in the world, commonly called Japan, whereof abundance of cabinets, tables, and many other things are brought into Europe. Thus are we come to Japan the utmost of these eastern discoveries, omitting to say any thing of the Philippine islands, and those called de las Landonnes, though within this compass, because they were discovered from the West-Indies; and therefore they are left to be treated of

among the American affairs, as are the isles of Solomon, whereof hitherto the world has had but a very imperfect account. This summary shews the improvement of navigation on this side the world since the discovery of the magnetical needle, or sea-compass, it having made known to us as much of the coasts of Africk and Asia, as running along only the greatest turnings and windings, amounts to about five thousand leagues; an incredible extent of land, were it not so universally known to be true, and so very demonstrable. The benefit we reap is so visible, it seems not to require any thing should be said of it. For now all Europe abounds in all such things as those vast, wealthy, exuberant eastern regions can afford; whereas before these discoveries it had nothing but what it received by retail, and at excessive rates from the Venetians, who took in the precious drugs, rich spices, and other valuable commodities of the east in Egypt, or the coast of Turky, whither it was brought from India; either by caravans or up the Red-sea; and they supplied all other countries with them at their own prices. But now the sea is open, every nation has the liberty of supplying itself from the fountain-head; and if some have encroached upon others, confined them to a narrower trade in those parts, yet the returns from thence are yearly so great, that all those goods may be purchased here at the second-hand, infinitely cheaper than they could when one nation had the supplying of all the rest, and that by so expensive a way, as being themselves served by caravans, and a few small ships on the Red-sea. To conclude; these parts, the discovery whereof has been the subject of this discourse, supply the christian world with all gums, drugs, spices, silks and cottons, precious stones, sulphur, gold, salt-peter, rice, tea, China-ware, coffee, Japan varnished works, all sorts of dyes, of cordials, and perfumes, pearls, ivory, ostrich-feathers, parrots, monkeys, and an endless number of necessaries, conveniences, curiosities, and other comforts and supports of human life, whereof enough has been said for the intended brevity of this discourse. It is now time to proceed to a still greater part, greater in extent of land, as reaching from north to south, and its bounds not yet known, and greater in wealth, as containing the inexhaustible treasures of the silver mines of Peru and Mexico, and of the gold mines of Chile, and very many other parts. A fourth part of the world, not much inferior to the other three in extent, and no way yielding to them for all the blessings nature could bestow upon the earth. A world concealed from the rest for above five thousand years, and reserved by Providence to be made known three hundred years ago. A region yet not wholly known, the extent being so immense, that three hundred years have not been a sufficient time to lay it all open. A portion of the universe wonderful in all respects: 1. For that being so large it could lie so long hid. 2. For that being well inhabited, the wit of man cannot conclude which way those people could come thither, and that none others could find the way since. 3. For its endless sources of gold and silver, which supplying all parts, since their first discovery are so far from being impoverished, that they only want more hands to draw out more. 4. For its mighty rivers, so far exceeding all others, that they look like little seas, compared with the greatest in other parts. 5. For its prodigious mountains, running many hundred leagues, and whose tops are almost inaccessible. 6. For the strange variety of seasons, and temperature of air to be found at very few leagues distance. And lastly, For its stupendous fertility of soil, producing all sorts of fruits and plants which the other parts of the world afford, in greater perfection than in their native land, besides an infinity of others which will not come to perfection elsewhere.

To come to the discovery of this fourth and greatest part of the earth, it was undertaken and performed by Christopher Columbus a Genoese, excellently skilled in sea-affairs, an able cosmographer, and well versed in all those parts of the mathematics, which might capacitate him for such an enterprise. This person being convinced by natural reason, that so great a part of the world as till then was unknown could not be all sea, or created to no purpose; and believing that the earth being round, a shorter way might be found to India by the west, than by compassing all Africk to the southward, as the Portugueses were then attempting to do; he resolved to apply himself wholly to the discovery of those rich countries, which he positively concluded must extend from what was known of the East-Indies still to the eastward one way, and to be the easier met with by sailing round to the westward. Having been long fully possessed with this notion, and provided to answer all objections that might be started against it, he thought the undertaking too great for any less than a sovereign prince, or state; and therefore, not to be unjust to his country, he first proposed it to the state of Genoa; where it was rather ridiculed than any way encouraged. This repulse made him have recourse to king John the second of Portugal, who having caused the matter to be examined by those that had the direction of the discoveries along the coast of Africk, by their advice he held him in hand till he had sent out a caravel with private orders to attempt this discovery. This caravel having wandered long in the wide ocean, and suffered much by storms, returned without finding any thing. Columbus understanding what had been done, repented it so highly, that in hatred to Portugal he resolved to go over to Castile and offer his service there; but for fear of any disappointment, at the same time he sent his brother Bartolomeu Columbus into England, to make the same overture to king Henry the seventh. His brother had the ill fortune to be taken at sea by pirates, which much retarded his coming to the court of England; where when at last he came, being poor and destitute of friends, it was long before he could be heard, or at least be looked upon; so that in fine, Columbus was gone before he returned to Spain with his answer. Columbus in the mean while stole away out of Portugal, and coming to the court of Ferdinand and Isabel, king and queen of Castile and Aragon, he there spent eight years soliciting with little hopes, and many difficulties; till at last, when he had utterly despaired of success, he met with it, through the assistance of some few friends he had gained at court. At his earnest suit he had all the conditions he required granted, which were, that he should be admiral of all those seas he discovered, and viceroy and governor-general of all the lands; that he should have the tenth of all things whatsoever brought from those parts, and that he might at all times be an eighth part in all fleets sent thither, and to receive the eighth of all the returns. This to him and his heirs for ever. With these titles, and sufficient power from the queen, who espoused the undertaking, he repaired to the port of Palos de Moguer, on the coast of Andaluzia, where there was furnished for him a ship called the S. Mary, and two caravels, the one called La Pinta, commanded by Martin Alonzo Pinzon, and the other La Nina, by Vincent Yanez Pinzon. In these vessels he had ninety men, and provisions for a year; and thus equipped he sailed from Palos de Moguer.

An. 1492. On the twenty third of August directing his course to the Canary islands, where he made a new rudder to the caravel Pinta, which had hers broke off at sea, he took in fresh provisions, wood, and water with all possible expedition; and on the sixth of September put to sea again, steering due west, and on the seventh lost sight of land. The eleventh at a hundred and fifty leagues distance from the island of Ferro, they saw a great piece of a mast drove by the current, which set strong towards the north; and the fourteenth the admiral observed the variation of the needle to the westward about two points. On Sunday the sixteenth the men were surprised to see green and yellow weeds scattered about in small parcels on the superficies of the water, as if it had been newly torn off from some island or rock; and the next day they saw much more, which made some conclude they were near land, and others supposing it only to be rocks, or shoals, began to mutter. Every day they saw some birds flying to the ships, and abundance of weeds in the water, which still made them conceive hopes of land; but when these failed, then they began again to murmur, so that the admiral was forced to use all his art to keep them quiet, sometimes with fair words, and sometimes with threats and severity, they imagining, that since for the most part they sailed before the wind, it would be impossible for them ever to return. Thus their mutinous temper daily increased, and began to appear more open, some being so bold as to advise throwing the admiral over board. The first of October the pilot told the admiral, he found by his account they were five hundred and eighty eight leagues west of the island of Ferro, which is the westernmost of the Canaries; who answered, his reckoning was five hundred and eighty four, whereas in reality his computation was seven hundred and seven; and on the third the pilot of the caravel Nina reckoned six hundred and fifty, he of the caravel Pinta six hundred and thirty four: but they were out, and Columbus made it less for fear of discouraging the men, who nevertheless continued very mutinous, but were somewhat appeased on the fourth, seeing above forty sparrows fly about the ships, besides other birds. The eleventh of October there appeared manifest tokens of their being near land; for from the admiral's ship they saw a green rush in the water, from the Pinta they saw a cane and a stick, and took up another that was artificially wrought, and a little board, besides abundance of weeds fresh pulled up; from the Pinta they beheld fuch-like tokens, and a branch of a thorn-tree with the berries on it: besides, that sounding they found bottom, and the wind grew variable. For these reasons the admiral ordered, they should make but little sail at night, for fear of being aground in the dark, and about ten of the clock that night the admiral himself saw a light, and shewed it to others. About two in the morning the caravel Pinta, which was furthest a-head, gave gave the signal of land; and when day appeared, they perceived it was an island about fifteen leagues in length, plain, well wooded and watered, and very populous; the natives standing on the shore, admiring what the ships were. The admiral and captains went ashore in their boats, and called that island S. Salvador, the natives calling it Guanabani, and is one of the Lucayas in about 26 degrees of north-latitude, nine hundred and fifty leagues west of the Canaries, and discovered the thirty third day after they sailed from them. Columbus took possession for the king and queen of Spain, and all the Spaniards joyfully took an oath to him, as their admiral and viceroy. He gave the Indians, who stood in admiration to see him and his men, some red caps, glass-beads, and other trifles, which they valued at a high rate. The admiral returning aboard, the natives followed, some swimming, others in their canoes, carrying with them bottoms of spun cotton, parrots, and javelins pointed with fish-bones, to exchange for glass baubles and horse-bells. Both men and women were all naked, their hair short and tied with a cotton string, and well enough featured, of a middle stature, well shaped, and of an olive colour, some painted white, some black, and some red. They knew nothing of iron, and did all their work with sharp stones. No beasts, or fowl were seen here but only parrots. Being asked by signs, whence they had the gold, whereof they wore little plates hanging at their noses, they pointed to the south. The admiral understanding there were other countries not far off, resolved to seek them out; and taking seven Indians that they might learn Spanish, sailed on the fifteenth to another island, which he called the Conception, seven leagues from the other. The sixteenth he proceeded to another island, and called it Fernandina, and so to a fourth, to which he gave the name of Isabella; but finding nothing more in these than in the first, he proceeded on to the island of Cuba, which he called Juana, and entered the port on the east-end called Baracoa, whence after sending two men to discover without finding what he sought for, he went on to Hispaniola, and anchored on the north-side of it. Here the admiral finding there were gold mines, and plenty of cotton, the people simple, and one of the Caciques, or princes, shewing all tokens of love and affection; and having lost his own ship, which through the carelessness of the sailors in the night run upon a sand, he resolved to build a fort, which with the assistance of the Indians was performed in ten days, and called the Nativity: Here he left thirty nine men, with provisions for a year, seeds to sow, baubles to trade with the natives, all the cannon and arms belonging to his own ship and the boat. This done, he departed the port of the Nativity on the fourth of January 1443, steering eastward, and the sixth discovered the caravel Pinta, which had left him some days before, the captain hoping to get much gold to himself. Columbus having sailed some days along the coast of the island, discovered more of it, and trafficking with the natives, and seeing some other islands at a distance, at length launched out to sea to return for Spain. In the way they struggled with the dreadfullest storms any of them had ever seen, which separated the admiral from the caravel Pinta, so that he saw her no more; but at last it pleased God to bring his shattered caravel into the river of Lisbon, where the people flocked with admiration to see him, and some advised the king of Portugal to murder him, but he having entertained him generously dismissed him; and he putting to sea again, arrived safe at Palos de Moguer, from whence he set out on the fifteenth of March, having been out six months and a half upon his discovery. The court was then at Barcelona, whither the admiral repaired, carrying with him the Indians he brought, some gold, and other samples of what the discovery afforded. The king and queen received him with all possible demonstrations of honour, making him sit down in their presence, and ordering all the privileges and titles before granted him to be confirmed. After some time spent in these entertainments, the admiral desired to be fitted out as became his dignity, to conquer and plant those new countries, which was granted, and he departed for Seville, to set out on his second voyage, which we are to speak of next; we have been very particular in this, because being the first, it required a more exact account to be given of it, and shall therefore be more succinct in those that follow.

An. 1493. A fleet of seventeen sail of all sorts was fitted out at Seville, well furnished with provisions, ammunition, cannon, corn, seeds, mares and horses, tools to work in the gold mines, and abundance of commodities to barter with the natives. There were aboard fifteen hundred men, many of them labouring people, and artificers, several gentlemen, and twenty horse. With this fleet Columbus set sail from Seville on the fifteenth of September the year aforesaid, and on the fifth of October came to the Gomeru, one of the Canary islands, where he took in wood and water, as also cattle, calves, sheep, goats and swine to stock the Indies, besides hens and garden-seeds. Sailing ing hence more to the southward than the first voyage, on the third of November in the morning, all the fleet spied an island, which Columbus called Dominica, because discovered on a Sunday, and soon after many others, the first of which he called Marigalanti, the name of the ship he was in, the next Guadalupe, then Montserrat, Santa Maria Redonda, Santa Maria el Antigua, S. Martin, Santa Cruz; these are the Caribbe islands. Next he came to the large island, which he called S. John Baptist, but the Indians Borriquen, and it is now known by the name of Puerto Rico. November the twenty second the fleet arrived on the coast of Hispaniola, where they found the fort burnt down, and none of the Spaniards, they being all destroyed either by discord among themselves, or by the Indians. Not liking the place he had chosen the first voyage to plant his colony, he turned back to the eastward, and finding a seat to his mind, landed and built a little town which he called Isabella, in honour of Isabel then queen of Castile. Then keeping five ships of the fleet with him for his use there, he sent back twelve to Spain, under the command of Antony de Torres, with some quantity of gold, and a full account of what had been done. Thus ended this year 1493: and here it must be observed, that all the actions done ashore must be omitted, as too great for this discourse, and in reality no way belonging to it, the design of it being only to shew what advantages have been made by sea since the discovery of the magnetical needle, as has been declared before.

An. 1494. Columbus sailed from his new colony of Isabella with one great ship and two caravels on the twenty fourth of April, directing his course westward, and came upon the point of Cuba on the eighteenth of May, where sailing along the coast he saw an infinite number of small islands; so that it being impossible to give them all names, he in general called them the Queen's Garden. Thus he proceeded as far as the island de Pinos, near the westernmost end of Cuba, having discovered three hundred and thirty three leagues to the westward from his colony of Isabella. He suffered very much in this voyage by the continual storms of rain, wind, thunder and lightning; and therefore resolved to return, taking his way more to the southward, and on the twenty second of July found the island of Jamaica; whence he directed his course to Hispaniola, and coasting about it, arrived at the town of Isabella on the twenty ninth of September, where he found his brother Bartholomew Columbus, who was come with four ships from Spain. The admiral built many forts in the island, and being much offended at the ill behaviour of many of the Spaniards, who began to use him disrespectfully, and sent complaints against him to court, returned into Spain to justify his proceedings, and secure his authority. Thus far out of Herrera's first decade, lib. I, II, and III.

The fame of these mighty discoveries being spread abroad throughout Europe, Sebastian Cabot, a Venetian, but residing in England, made application to king Henry the seventh, to be employed in finding out a passage to the East-Indies through the north-west. The king admitted of his proposal, and

An. 1497. Ordered him two ships provided with all necessaries for such an undertaking, with which he sailed from Bristol in the beginning of summer (for here does not appear a particular journal) and directing his course north-west came into 56, Herrera says 68 degrees of north-latitude, where he discovered land running still to the northward, which made him despair of finding a passage that way, as he had projected, and therefore came about to the southward, hoping to meet it in less latitude. Thus he soon fell in upon the now much frequented island of Newfoundland, reaching from 54 to 48 degrees, where he found a wild people clad in skins of beasts, and armed with bows and arrows, as also bears and stags, and great plenty of fish; but the earth yielding little fruit. Here he took three of the savages, whom at his return he carried into England, where they lived long after. Hence he continued his course along the American coast as far as 38 degrees of latitude, where his provisions beginning to fall short he returned to England, Hackluyt, vol. III. p. 6. & seq. This imperfect account is all we have of this voyage, which was not prosecuted by the English in many years after; and Cabot finding little encouragement went away into Spain, where he was entertained.

An. 1498. On the thirtieth of May admiral Columbus having been again well received and honoured by the king and queen of Castile and Aragon, and provided as he desired, sailed from S. Lucar with six ships upon new discoveries, and coming to the island Gomeru, one of the Canaries, on the nineteenth, sent thence three of his ships with provisions to sail directly for Hispaniola. He with the other three made the islands of Cabo Verde, resolving to sail southward as far as the equinoctial; and therefore steering south-west on the thirteenth of July, he felt such violent heat, that they all thought they should there have ended their days: and this continued till the nineteenth, when the wind freshning they stood away to the westward, and the first of August came to an anchor in the island which he called La Trinidad, near the continent of South America, in about 11 degrees of north-latitude. Discovering land from this place, which he supposed to be another island, but it was the continent, he sailed over and came upon the point of Paria, and ran many leagues along the coast of the continent, without knowing it was so, trading with the Indians for gold and abundance of pearls. However thinking his presence necessary at Hispaniola, he could not continue his discovery, but returned the same way he came to the island Trinidad, and found that he called Margarita, where was afterwards the great pearl-fishery, and that of Cubagua, besides many others of less note, and arrived at Santo Domingo, a town newly built on the south-coast of the island Hispaniola on the twenty second of August, Herrera, dec. 1. lib. IV.

An. 1499. The news having been brought to Spain of the discovery Columbus had made on the continent, though it was not yet certainly known whether it was continent or an island; Alonso de Ojeda and some other private men fitted out four ships to make discoveries, and sailed from Port S. Mary on the twentieth of May. John de la Cosa, a Biscainer, went with him as pilot, and Americus Vesputius as merchant. They took their course to the south-west, and in twenty seven days had sight of land, which they supposed to be the continent. Being within a league of the shore, they sent some men in the boat, who saw abundance of naked people, who presently fled to the mountains; and therefore they followed the coast to find some harbour, which they found two days after, with multitudes of natives, thronging to see the ships. They were of a middle stature, well shaped, broad faced, and of a ruddy complexion: they covered their nakedness with leaves, or cotton cloths. Their wealth consisted in fine feathers, fish-bones, and green and white stones, but they had neither gold nor pearls. Ojeda ran along this coast till he came to a town seated like Venice in the water, but containing only twenty six great houses; for which reason he called it Venezuela, or little Venice, in about 12 degrees of north-latitude. Still he kept along the coast of Paria, before discovered by Columbus, for the space of two hundred leagues, and then proceeded two hundred further to the point called Cabo de la Vela. Then turning back he came to the island Margarita, where he careened, and on the fifth of November arrived at the island of Hispaniola, where we may put an end to his discovery.

This same year Peter Alonso Nino and Christopher Guereza sailed from Sevil with one ship to discover, but did nothing more than had been done before, trading along the coast where Columbus and Ojeda had been, Herrera, dec. 1. lib. IV.

An. 1500. Vincent Yanez Pinzon, who was with Columbus the first voyage, set out four ships at his own charge, and sailing to the southward was the first Spaniard that ever cut the equinoctial line. Then sailing to the westward, on the twenty sixth of January he discovered land at a distance, which was the point of land now called cape S. Augustin, on the coast of Brazil, where he took possession for the king of Spain: but not being able to bring the natives to trade with him, he passed on to a river, where landing, eight of his men were killed by the Indians; which made him remove again down to the mouth of the river Maranon, which is thirty leagues over, and runs with such force, that the water is fresh forty leagues out at sea. Finding no benefit could be made along this coast, he held on his course to Paria, whence he sailed over to the islands in the way to Hispaniola; and being at an anchor among them, a furious storm sunk two of their ships downright, the other two escaping repaired to Hispaniola, and having refitted returned to Spain. In this voyage they discovered six hundred leagues along the coast lying south-east from Paria.

In December this same year James de Lepe sailed from Palos de Moguer to discover, and went some way to the southward of cape S. Augustin, but did little considerable, Herrera, dec. 1. lib. IV.

This year also Emanuel king of Portugal fitted out a fleet of thirteen sail for the East-Indies, commanded by Peter Alvarez Cabral, who sailing from Lisbon in March, to avoid the calms on the coast of Guinea, stood out far to sea; and being carried away further to the westward than he intended by a storm, on the twenty fourth of April fell in upon the coast of Brazil in America, in 10 degrees of south-latitude. He sailed along it one day, and going ashore found a tawny people; but the weather still forced him to the southward, to a harbour he called Porto Seguro, in 17 degrees of south-latitude, where he landed, and found the country abounding in cotton and Indian wheat. Here he erected a cross in token of possession, and therefore called the country Santa Cruz, but the name of Brazil prevailed, because of that sort of wood brought from thence. Peter Alvarez sent a ship to Portugal to give advice of this discovery, and he with the rest prosecuted his voyage to the East-Indies, as may be seen in the account of them, Herrera ubi sup. and Faria in Asia, part I. p. 53.

Again

Again this year 1500. Gaspér de Cortereal, a Portuguese, sailed to the north parts of America with two caravels, where he run along a great part of what was said before to be discovered by Cabot, and gave his name to some small islands about the north of Newfoundland, bringing away sixty of the natives. He made a second voyage into those parts, but was cast away, Herrera, dec. 1. lib. VI.

An. 1501. Roderick de Bastidas fitted out two ships at Cadiz, and taking John de la Cosa, who was best acquainted with the western seas for his pilot, put to sea in the beginning of February, following the same course Columbus had taken when he discovered the continent; and coasting all along where he and the others had been, he traded with the Indians. Not so satisfied, he run to the westward, and discovered Santa Marta, Caribagena, and as far as Nombre de Dios, being above an hundred leagues more than was known before. His ships being now leaky and worm-eaten, so that they could not long keep the sea, and having traded for a considerable quantity of gold and pearls, he with difficulty made over to Xaragua in Hispaniola, where his ships sunk after saving the treasure; and he after being imprisoned in this island got over into Spain with his wealth. He carried some Indians from the continent to Hispaniola, who went stark naked, only carrying their privities in a gold case made like a funnel, Herrera ubi sup.

An. 1502. Admiral Columbus, being through the malicious insinuations of his enemies removed from the government of Hispaniola, but still fed by the king with fair words, obtained of him four ships to go upon some new discovery, and sailed with them from Cadiz on the ninth of May. On the twenty ninth of June he came before Santo Domingo in the island Hispaniola, where the governor refused to admit him into the port. On the fourteenth of July he sailed away to the westward, and after driving some days with the currents in calms, struggled for sixty days with violent storms; after which he discovered the little island Guonaja, northward of cape Honduras, in 19 degrees of latitude. He sent his brother ashore, who met with a canoe as long as a Spanish galley, and eight foot wide, covered with mats, and in it many men, women and children, with abundance of commodities to barter, which were large cotton cloths of several colours, short cotton shirts without sleeves curiously wrought, cloths of the same to cover their privities, wooden swords edged with flint, copper hatchets to cut wood, horse-bells of the same metal, and broad flat plates of it, crucibles to melt the copper; coco-nuts, bread made of Indian wheat, and drink of the same. Being carried aboard the admiral, he exchanged some commodities with them, and then dismissed them, only keeping an old man, of whom he enquired for gold; he pointed eastward, which made Columbus alter his design of sailing still westward. Therefore taking the way he was directed, the first land he came to was cape Cafinas on the continent of the province of Honduras, where his brother landed and took possession, the natives coming down in peaceable manner, wearing short jackets of cotton, and cloths of the same before their privy-parts, and bringing him plenty of provisions. Sailing hence many days to the eastward against the wind, he came to a great point of land, from which perceiving the shore run to the southward, he called it Cabo de gracias a Dios, or cape Thanks be to God, because then the easterly winds would carry him down the coast. He run along trading with the natives, and touched at Porto Bello, Nombre de Dios, Belen and Veragua, where he heard there were gold mines, and sent his brother up the country, who returned to him with a considerable quantity of that metal, exchanged for inconsiderable trifles. Upon this encouragement Columbus resolved to leave his brother there with eighty men, and accordingly built houses for them; yet after all the Indians becoming their enemies, and the Spaniards mutinous, he was forced to take them aboard again, and then sailed away for Hispaniola. The ships being quite shaken with the many storms, and eaten through with the worms, could not reach that island, and therefore he was forced to run them a-ground on the coast of Jamaica, close board and board by one another, shoring them up with piles drove in the sand, and making huts on the decks for the men to live in, because they were full of water up to the deck. Hence with incredible difficulty and danger he sent messengers in a canoe over to Hispaniola for some vessels to carry him and his men away, and after suffering much was at last transported to that island, and thence into Spain, where he died. Herrera, dec. 1. lib. V, VI. So that we have here an end of his discoveries, and all the continent of America made known from cape Honduras in 18 degrees of north-latitude, to Porto Seguro on the coast of Brasil in 17 degrees of south-latitude, being above fifteen hundred leagues, taking only the greater windings of the coast.

An. 1506. The news of Columbus's new discovery being spread abroad in Castile, John Diaz de Solis, and Vincent Yanez Pinzon resolved to prosecute what he had begun; gun; and coming to the island Guanaja, whence Columbus had turned back to the eastward, they held on their course still westward, running along the coast of Honduras till they came to the bottom of that deep bay, which they called Baia de Navidad, now called the gulph of Honduras. Then turning to the north-east, they discovered a great part of the province of Gucatan, whereof little was afterwards known till the discovery of New-Spain.

An. 1507. It being still unknown whether Cuba was an island or part of the continent, Nicholas de Obando governor of Hispaniola sent Sebastian de Ocampo to discover it: he sailed along the north-side of it, touching at several places, and careened his ships at the port now well known by the name of the Havana, which then he called de Carenas. Then continuing his voyage to the westernmost end of the island now called Cabo de S. Anton, he turned to the eastward along the south coast of the island, and put into the port of Xagua, which is one of the best in the world, and capable of containing a thousand ships. Here he was most courteously entertained, and supplied with abundance of partridges and good fish. Having rested here a few days, he held on his way along the coast, and returned to Hispaniola, with the certain news of Cuba's being an island. Herrera, dec. 1. lib. VII.

An. 1508. John Ponce de Leon sailed over from Hispaniola to the island called by the Indians Borriquen, by the Spaniards S. Juan de Puerto Rico, and by the English Porto Rico: It is but 15 leagues distant from Hispaniola, has a good harbour, which with the plenty of gold found in it gave it the name of Puerto Rico, or the Rich Harbour. Herrera, dec. 1. lib. VII.

This same year 1508. John Diaz de Solis, and Vincent Yunez Pinzon, who before discovered the gulph of Honduras, sailed with two caravels fitted out at the king's expence to discover the south coast of America; and coming upon cape S. Augustin in about 11 degrees of south-latitude, continued thence their navigation along the coast, often landing, and trading with the natives till they came into 40 degrees of the same latitude, whence they returned with an account of what they had found into Spain. Herrera, dec. 1. lib. VII.

An. 1509. John de Esquibel was sent from Hispaniola, by the admiral James Columbus, son to Christopher Columbus, with seventy men to settle a colony in the island of Jamaica.

This same year John de la Cosa sailed from Spain with one ship, and two brigantines, to join Alonso de Ojeda in the island Hispaniola, thence to go and settle on the continent. James de Nicuesa set out soon after him with four ships upon the same design. After some dispute about the limits of their provinces, they agreed that the river of Darien should part them, and then they set out towards their several governments. Herrera, dec. 1. lib. VII.

An. 1510. Ojeda landed at Cartagena, where, after endeavouring to gain the Indians by fair means without success he came to a battle with them, in which John de la Cosa was killed, and he escaped by flight, having lost seventy Spaniards. Nicuesa arriving a few days after, and joining the other Spaniards belonging to Ojeda, revenged the death of the former seventy, and took a great booty. However Ojeda removed thence to the gulph of Uraba, where he founded the town of S. Sebastian, being the second built on the continent, if we reckon that before founded by Columbus near the same place, which did not stand as has been mentioned, nor did this continue long at that time, being removed after most of the Spaniards were consumed to Darien. Hence the Indians carried swine, salt and fish up the country, and in return brought home gold and cotton-cloth. Nicuesa with his ships sailed to Veragua, and after many miseries and calamities, at last founded the town of Nombre de Dios on the small Isthmus that joins the two continents of north and south America, Herrera, dec. 1. lib. VII, VIII.

An. 1511. The admiral James Columbus from the island Hispaniola sent James Velasquez with about three hundred men to plant in the island of Cuba, where no settlement had yet been made.

An. 1512. John Ponce de Leon, before mentioned as first planter of the island of Puerto Rico, being grown rich, fitted out three ships in that island, resolving to discover to the northward. He sailed on the third of March, steering north-west and by north, and on the eighth anchored at Baxos de Babueca, near the island del Viejo, in 22 degrees and a half of north-latitude, and on the fourteenth at the island Guana-bani, which was the first discovered by Columbus. Hence he directed his course north-west, and on the twenty seventh, being Easter Sunday, discovered an island not known before; whence he proceeded, steering west-north-west till the second of April, when they came to an anchor near a port of the continent they had run along in 30 degrees and 8 minutes of north-latitude, which he believed to be an island called Florida, that is, flowry, or flourishing, both because it looked green and pleasant, and because it was Easter time, which the Spaniards call Pasqua Florida. After landing to take possession, he sailed south and by east till the twenty first of April, when he met so strong a current, that though they had the wind large, his ships could not stem it, which obliged him to come to an anchor; this being the now well known channel of Babama, through which most ships return out of those parts into Europe. Here he landed, and had a skirmish with the Indians who were warlike. On the eighth of May he doubled the point of Florida, which he called cape Corrientes, because of the great strength of the current there. Being come about, they spent many days along the coast and neighbouring islands, watering and careening, and dealing with the Indians for hides and Guanimes, which are plates of a mixture of gold and copper. In June he had two battles with the Indians, who in their canoes came out to draw his ships ashore, or at least to cut his cables. Having beaten them off he came upon the coast of Cuba, though he knew it not to be that island, and thence returned to Puerto Rico, whence he sailed into Spain to beg of the king the government of what he had discovered, Herrera, dec. 1. lib. IX.

An. 1513. Basco Nunez de Balboa, who had subtilly wound himself into the government of the Spaniards, who were beforementioned to have built the town of Darien, having used all his endeavours as others did to find out more gold, and being told by an Indian, that there was a mighty prince beyond the mountains who had vast plenty of it, and that there was also an open sea, he resolved to venture over to find these treasures, and gain the honour of being the first that found this so long looked for sea. Accordingly he set out from Darien in September with Indian guides, and others given him by the caciques his friends to carry burdens. Entering upon the mountains, he had a fight with a cacique that would have stopped him, in which he killed the cacique and six hundred of his men. On the twenty fifth of September he reached the top of the mountains, from whence, to his unspeakable joy, he saw the South-sea; with this satisfaction he went down, and coming to the shore walked into the sea to take possession of it for the king of Spain. This done, he with eighty of his men, and a cacique his friend, went into nine canoes, and put out to sea, where a storm rising, they had all like to have perished; however, with much difficulty they got into a small island, where some of their canoes were beaten to pieces and all their provisions lost. The next day with what canoes remained they landed on the further side of the bay, where after some opposition from the Indians they made peace, and the cacique brought a good quantity of gold as a present, and two hundred and forty large pearls; and seeing the Spaniards valued them, he sent some Indians to fish, who in four days brought twelve mark-weight of them, each mark being eight ounces. Basco Nunez would have gone over to the island of pearls, five leagues distant, but was advised by the Indians his friends to put it off till summer, because of the danger of the sea at that time. Here he had some information of the wealth of Peru, and was assured that the coast ran along to the southward without end, as the Indians thought. Basco Nunez having made so great a discovery, and gathered much wealth, returned over the mountains to Darien, whence he presently sent advice to the king of what he had found, Herrera, dec. 1. lib. X.

An. 1515. John Diaz de Solis was sent out by the king to discover to the southward: he sailed on the eighth of October, and came to Rio de Janeiro on the coast of Brasil in 22 degrees twenty minutes of south-latitude, whence he continued his course down the coast which lies south-west to cape S. Mary in 35 degrees of latitude, where he landed and took possession. Then turning with one of his caravels into the river of plate, which because it was so large and fresh, they called the fresh sea, and by another name, the river of Solis, he spied along the shore abundance of houses of Indians, and the people coming down to gaze at the ships, and offering what they had. Solis landed with as many men as his boat could carry, who going a little up from the shore, were set upon by the natives, who lay in ambush in the woods, and every man of them killed, notwithstanding the cannon fired from aboard. When they had killed the men they removed them further from the shore, yet not so far but that the Spaniards aboard might see them, where cutting off their heads, arms and legs, they roasted the whole trunks of the bodies and eat them. Having seen this dismal sight, the caravel returned to the other vessel, and both together repaired to cape S. Augustin, where having loaded with Brasil wood, they sailed back to Spain. Thus ended the famous seamen John Diaz de Solis, Herrera, dec. 2. lib. I.

An. 1516. Padrarias governor of Darien before spoken of, sent the licentiate Espinosa with a good body of men over the mountains to Panama, who had some encounters with the Indians in those parts, and made some considerable discoveries along that coast. But having gathered a great quantity of gold, and abundance of slaves, he returned to Darien, leaving Hernan Ponce de Leon with a small force at Panama. This commander lost no time, though he had no good vessels but some small barks, for

in them he ventured to run up to the north-west as far as the port of Nicoya in the province of Nicaragua, a hundred and forty leagues from Nata, which is at the mouth of the bay of Panama; where finding the people in arms, and that they fled to the mountains upon the first firing, he concluded there was not much good to be done there at that time, and returned to Panama. At the same time Basco Nunez de Balboa, who first discovered the South-sea, cut timber at Ada on the north-sea, and having hewed it out fit to put together, had it all carried up twelve leagues to the top of the mountains by Indians, Blacks and Spaniards, and thence down to the South-sea, which was an incredible labour, there being all the timber, iron-work and rigging for two brigantines, Herrera, dec. 2. lib. II.

This same year 1516. Hackluyt mentions a voyage made by Sir Thomas Pert and Sebastian Cabot, by order of king Henry the eighth of England, to Brazil, but gives no particulars of it, Hackluyt, vol. III. p. 498.

An. 1517. James Velasquez governor of Hispaniola, gave commission to Francis Hernandez de Cordova to make some further discovery on the continent. He bought two ships and a brigantine, furnished them with all necessaries, and a hundred and ten men, and sailed from Havana on the eighth of February to the westward. At the end of twenty one days they saw land, and drawing near perceived a great town. Five canoos came to the ship, and thirty men went aboard, wearing short jackets without sleeves, and clouts about their waists instead of breeches, who being well entertained were dismissed: and the next day twelve canoos came with a cacique, who said, Conex Cotoche, that is, come to my house; and the Spaniards not understanding it, called that point of land cape Cotoche, being the westernmost of the province of Yucatan, in 22 degrees of latitude. The Spaniards going ashore with this invitation, were set upon by Indians that lay in ambush, whom they put to flight. Here they found three structures like little temples with idols, built with lime and stone, which were the first that had been seen in America. Returning to their ships, they kept along the coast westward till they came to Campeche, where they took water out of a well, there being no other, and retired to their ships, the Indians pursuing at their heels, yet without engaging. Further on at a place called Potonchan, being ashore again to water, they were beset by the Indians, who killed fifty of them, and the rest, whereof many were wounded, with much difficulty got aboard their ships. Wanting hands for them all they burnt one, and with the other two vessels in great want of water, stood over for the coast of Florida, where as they were watering the Indians fell on them and killed four or five more, but were put to flight, so that the Spaniards had time to carry off their water, and so returned to Cuba, where James Fernandez the commander died of his wounds, Herrera, dec. 2. lib. III.

An. 1518. The report of the discovery made in Yucatan pleasing the undertaker James Velasquez governor of Cuba, he provided three ships and a brigantine, with two hundred and fifty men, to prosecute that enterprise, under the command of John de Grijalva, who sailed from Cuba on the eighth of April, and driving to the southward with the currents came upon the island of Cuzamal, in the 20th degree of latitude, not known before, and south of the cape of Cotoche; where keeping along its coast, they anchored at a place they called Santa Cruz, because that was the third of May and the feast of the finding of the cross. Landing he could not prevail with any of the natives to come to trade, yet found in the island good honey, swine with their navels on their backs, and several small temples of stone, as also an Indian woman of Jamaica, who went aboard, and was afterwards of great use to them. Grijalva sailed on to Potonchan, where Francis Hernandez, the first discoverer of that country, had been; and after defeating the natives held on to the river of his own name, saying this country was like a new Spain, because of the many structures he saw of lime and stone, whence the name remained to the adjacent kingdom of Mexico. Coming to the river of Tahasco, he treated with the natives, and a cacique there with his own hand put upon Grijalva a suit of complete armour of all beaten gold, besides many other rich presents he gave him. Then coasting along, he saw the great mountains of S. Martin, and the rivers of Alvarado and Banderas on the coast of New Spain, at which last place he was supplied with provisions, and traded for much gold with the governor, who had received orders so to do from Montezuma the great monarch of Mexico, upon the news brought him of the first ships that appeared on that coast. He spent seven days at S. John de Ulva, trading with the natives, and then went on as far as the province of Panuco, from whence he returned to Cuba, having in this voyage discovered all the coast of New Spain, almost as far as the province of Florida, Herrera, dec. 2. lib. III.

This same year the licentiate Espinosa, by order of Peter Arias Davila governor of Darien, founded the town of Panama on the South-sea. Ibid.

An. 1519. Ferdinand Cortes, with eleven sail fitted out at the charge of James Valezquez, sailed from Cuba in February, and landing on the coast of New-Spain before discovered by Grijalva, marched up to Mexico, made himself master of that mighty city, and subdued all the provinces about it till he came to the South-sea. Here were found those rich mines of silver, which with the others of Peru have ever since enriched the universe, not to speak of the abundance of cotton, and very many other precious commodities. In fine, his actions and the wealth of this country are the subject of large volumes, and too great for so short a discourse. Therefore we will proceed to the discoveries. Ibid.

This year also Ferdinand Magalbaens, or as we call him, Magellan, sailed from Spain to discover the strait of his name, the particulars of which voyage are the subject of the first of those round the world, to be found together at the latter end of of this discourse, and therefore need not be repeated in this place, for there the reader may find it at large, with an account of those southern parts of America.

This same year 1519. An English ship of two hundred and fifty tun came to the island of Puerto Rico, pretending it came out with another to discover a passage to Tartary, and had been at Newfoundland, where there were fifty Spanish, French and Portuguese ships fishing, and that offering to go ashore their pilot was killed. They further said they came to load Brasil wood, and carry the king of England an account of those countries. Hence they sailed over to Hispaniola, where being fired at from the castle they returned to Puerto Rico, where they traded with the inhabitants, and going thence were never more heard of, Herrera, dec. 2. lib. V. Hackluyt, vol. III. p. 499. gives the same account out of Ramusio, only differing in that he says it was in the year 1517.

An. 1522. Cortes having subdued the mighty kingdom of Mexico, and greatest part of the provinces of Mecboacan, Panuco, Guauaca, Tabasco and Socomusco, a conquest above two hundred leagues in length, above a hundred and fifty in breadth in the widest part, and lying betwixt 14 and 24 degrees of north-latitude; and having discovered the South-sea, which washes the shores of several of the provinces mentioned, he resolved that way to send to the Malucco islands, and in order to it sent ship-wrights to the port of Zacatula to build two ships to discover along the coast, and two caravels to sail to the Molucco's, causing all the iron-work, sails and rigging to be carried upon mens backs from the Vera Cruz across the country, which is at least a hundred and forty leagues.

Whilst these vessels were preparing in New-Spain, Giles Gonzales Davila with incredible labour had built four in the island Tararequi, not far from Panama, whence he sailed on the twenty first of January this same year 1522. taking Andrew Nino along with him as his pilot. Having sailed an hundred leagues along the coast to the north-west, they were forced to send to Panama for necessaries to refit their ships, which being brought they proceeded. At Nicoya Giles Gonzales landed, and travelled into the province of Nicaragua, where abundance of Indians with their cacique submitted themselves: but afterwards meeting with a more warlike nation, he was forced to retire to the sea. Whilst Gonzales travelled by land, Andrew Nino had sailed along the coast as far as the bay of Fonseca in the province of Guatemala, discovering three hundred leagues that way further than was known before; which done, they both returned to Panama with great wealth in gold and pearls, Herrera, dec. 3. lib. IV.

An. 1524. Francis the first, king of France, employed John Verrazona a Florentine, to make some discovery to the north-west. He set out from Diep with four ships, and after some time spent privateering on the coast of Spain, he steered to the island of Madera, whence dismissing the rest, he departed with one ship and fifty men upon his enterprise. The first twenty five days he ran five hundred leagues to the westward, after which followed a dreadful storm; and that ceasing, in twenty five days more run four hundred leagues, and then discovered a land before unknown, which was low and well peopled, running to the southward. He sailed fifty leagues along the coast to the south without finding any harbour, which made him stand about to the northward, and at last come to an anchor, where he traded with the Indians, who went naked, covering only their privities with furs like sables, and garlands about their heads made of fine feathers; their complexion like the other Indians, their hair black and long, tied up behind like a tail. His short stay there gave him not leisure to learn any thing of their customs, but the country seemed delightful, with pleasant plains, and plenty of woods of several sorts of trees, great variety of beasts and birds, and some tokens of gold. This country was in 34 degrees of north-latitude, a temperate climate, and is the northern part of the province of Florida. Sailing hence fifty leagues to the north-east, they came upon another coast, where they took a boy, and so run on, seeing all the way abundance of trees, variety of herbs and flowers for two hundred leagues, leagues, where they again anchored, and were well entertained by the natives, a cacique coming often aboard, and seeming well-pleas'd with the French. Hence they held on their course above a hundred leagues, and saw people clothed with feathers, and a very pleasant country; but pass'd on still to a great island, and anchored betwixt it and the continent, where the people were still naked, with only furs before their privities, and valued copper beyond gold. Thus he proceeded, landing and taking a view of the shores, till he came into fifty degrees of north-latitude, where his provisions falling short, he resolv'd to return into France, having discovered seven hundred leagues along the coast, and giving it the name of New-France, Herrera, dec. 3. lib. VI. Hackluyt, vol. III. p. 295. Purchas, vol. IV. p. 1603.

The same year 1524. Francis Pizarro sail'd from Panama in November with one ship and two canoos, in which were eighty Spaniards, and four horses to discover to the southward. Coming under the equinoctial, which was further than any had discovered on that side, he landed, and provisions failing sent back the ship for them, remaining himself ashore with most of the men, where they were drove to such extremities, that twenty seven of them died for want, and therefore they call'd this place Puerto de Labambre, that is, Port Famine. The ship returning with provisions, they proceeded on their voyage to the port they call'd De la Candelaria, where they again went ashore and travel'd up the country; but all the people fled from them, and the continual rains rotted their clothes. Though all the rest of his actions in this expedition were in the ensuing years, yet the summary of them shall here be deliver'd together, to avoid the confusion that might be caus'd by the dismembring of them. Hence they went on to a place they call'd Pueblo Quemado, where they had two bloody encounters with the Indians, and therefore proceeded to Cbicama, whence they again sent back the ship to Panama for provisions. Whilst the ship was returning, James de Almagro, who was at the chief expence of this enterprize, went out of Panama with a ship full of provisions, and sixty men in it, and running along the coast, at length found Pizarro at Cbicama; and having relieved and confer'd with him, returned to Panama for more men, whence he brought two ships and two canoos with arms, men, ammunition and provisions. Leaving Cbicama, they proceed'd along the coast; and after many delays, and several times sending back to Panama, during which time the rest of the men were left ashore; and suffer'd incredible hardships, Pizarro came to Tumbez, where he sent men ashore, who were friendly entertain'd by the natives, supplied with provisions, and returned aboard with the joyful news, that they had seen stately palaces, and all sorts of vessels of silver and gold. Here he was invited ashore, and went twice, having much discourse with the Indians, who gave him an account of the great city of Cusco, and of the immense wealth of the mighty monarch Guaynacapa. This done, having gathered a good quantity of gold, and got some of the large Peru sheep, and other things to shew the wealth of the country, he returned to Panama to gather a force sufficient to make a conquest in that rich country, he had discovered. In this voyage he reach'd as far as the port of Santa in 9 degrees of south-latitude, having run above two hundred leagues, in which he spent three years, being detain'd so long by the misfortunes and wants above-mention'd, besides many more too tedious to insert here. The conquest and further discoveries shall fall in their due place. Herrera, dec. 3. lib. VII. VIII, and X. and dec. 4. lib. II.

An. 1525. The emperor Charles the fifth fitted out six ships and a tender at Corunna, under the command of D. Garcia Jofre de Loaysa, and well furnish'd with provisions, ammunition and commodities to trade, as also four hundred and fifty Spaniards. These ships were to pass through the straits of Magellan to the Molucco islands, and sail'd from Corunna in July. On the fifth of December they came upon the coast of Brazil in 21 degrees and a half of south-latitude. December the twenty eighth the ships were parted in a storm, but met all again except the admiral. January the fifth they came to cape Blanco in 37 degrees, and thence to Santa Cruz in 51 degrees, where the admiral and another ship being missing, they put up some signs to direct them. Coming to the mouth of the straits, one of the ships was cast away in a storm, the other three with much difficulty got into the strait. January the twenty sixth the admiral, and the other ship that was missing, with the tender came to the mouth of the strait, where it was near perishing in a storm: and on the fifth of April the five ships being again join'd, put into the strait, whence the foul weather had beaten them out. May the twenty fifth they came out into the South sea, where a violent storm parted them all; and the tender being left alone with very little provision sail'd to the northward, till it came upon the coast of New Spain, where the men were plentifully relieved by the Indians for the present, and afterwards by Cortes from Mexico. The admiral was parted from the other ships, and never saw them more, for he died on this side the line, and soon after him John Sebastian Cano his successor, who had brought the ship called the Victory home, after sailing round the world in the voyage undertaken by Magellan. Then they chose Toribio Alonso de Salazar for their admiral, and so directing their course for the islands Ladrones, on the thirteenth of September discovered an island, which they called S. Bartholomew; and the wind not permitting them to come near it, followed on their course to the Ladrones, and came to the two southermost of them, where there came to them a Spaniard that had been left there when the ship of Magellan's company left at the Molucco's attempted to return to New Spain, as may be seen in that voyage. Five days, this which was the admiral's ship continued in the island Bataba, and then prosecuted its voyage to the Molucco's on the tenth of September 1526, and on the second of October came to the great island Mindanao, one of the Philippines, where they got some fresh provisions, and then sailed away towards the Molucco's, and arrived safe at Tidore on the last day of December, and there built a fort, whence for a long time after they made war with the Portugueses of Ternate; where we will leave them, having ended their navigation, and shall hear of them again in the following years. Herrera, dec. 3. lib. VII, VIII, IX. and dec. 4. lib. I.

Cortes

An. 1526. Sebastian Cabot, who made the great discovery in north America for king Henry the seventh of England, being now in the Spanish service, sailed from Cadiz with four ships, designing for the Molucco's through the strait of Magellan: but when he came upon the coast of Brasil, his provisions began to fail, and the men to mutiny, both which things obliged him to lay aside his first design, and run up the river then called of Solis, now of Plate; and going up it thirty leagues, he came to the island of S. Gabriel, and seven leagues above it to the river S. Salvador, where he landed and built a fort, in which he left some men, whilst he discovered higher. Thirty leagues further up he found the river of Zarcarana, and erected another fort, which was called by his name. Then continuing the same course, after running up two hundred leagues he came to the river Paraguay, up which he turned leaving the great river, and at the end of thirty leagues found a people that tilled the ground, which he had not seen before, and they opposed him so vigorously, that he was forced to return down the river after losing twenty eight of his men: where we must leave him a-while, to shew that this same year James Garcia was sent from Galicia with one ship, a small tender, and a brigantine to discover this same river of Plate, and came upon that part of the coast of Brasil which for its many rocks and shoals is called Abrelojo, or Open your Eyes, at the end of the year.

An. 1527. At the beginning of the year he came into the river of Plate, and there found two of Cabot's ships, but sent back his own to carry slaves into Portugal. Then he run up the river, and found Cabot in that of Paraguay, where we said he lost his men, whence they returned together to the ships. Cabot sent one of them back into Spain, with an account of what he had discovered, the reasons why he went not to the Molucco's, and some silver and gold, desiring to be reinforced, and to have leave to plant there, which was not done till some time after, when it shall be mentioned in its place. Herrera, dec. 3. lib. IX. and dec. 4. lib. I.

This same year Cortes fitted out three ships on the coast of New Spain in the South-sea, and sent them to the Molucco islands, where they joined the Spaniards before-mentioned, and prosecuted the war with the Portugueses. One of the ships attempted to return with cloves to New Spain, but was beaten back to Tidore by contrary winds, where the continual wars reduced the Spaniards to only twenty, who were forced to put themselves into the power of the Portugueses, and by them were carried into India, where some of them returned into Spain. These ships were in several of the Philippine islands, and took possession of them for the king of Spain. Herrera, dec. 4. lib. I.

This year also Francis de Montejo sailed from Seville with three ships, and five hundred men in them, to conquer the province of Yutacan, and Peter de Alvarado for that of Guatemala. Of the discovery of both something has been said already, and therefore there needs no repetition.

The same year still Pamphilo de Narvaez sailed from Sanlucar on the seventeenth of June with five vessels, and in them seven hundred men, and spent much time at Hispaniola and Cuba, where, after escaping a dreadful storm, he was forced to winter. In March following he put to sea with four ships and above four hundred men, and on the twelfth of April after many storms and dangers came upon the coast of Florida; he landed his men and forty horses, and then travelled with them by land, sending the ships at the same time to coast along and find a safe harbour where they might settle a town. Those that marched by land, after incredible sufferings ashore, and losing their ships, built some barks to carry them off, making sails of their shirts, and ropes of their horses tails and manes. By the twenty second of September they had eaten all their horses, and then went aboard their barks: they crept along the shore seven days in those creeks almost starved, till they found some dry fish in an Indian house, but after this suffered such extremity of thirst, that five of them died with drinking of salt water. They landed again and got some refreshment, but the Indians proving treacherous, they lost some men, and so put to sea again, where they ranged many days in foul weather, and were all parted. At last all the barks were cast upon the shore and several men drowned, those that escaped almost naked and starved met with charitable Indians, who came down and lamented their misfortune with tears, fetching wood to make fire to warm them, carrying them to their houses, and giving them all the best they had; but this lasted not long, for the Indians though so loving were poor, and soon after suffered extreme want themselves, so that the Spaniards dispersed to shift, and the sixty that landed were soon reduced to fifteen. Such was their misery, that five of them who had kept together ate up one another till only one was left. Three or four that survived these calamities travelled some hundreds of leagues across the country, and with incredible hardships at length came to New-Spain, the rest with their officers all perished; and this was the end of the expedition, Herrera, dec. 4. lib. II, IV.

Before we proceed, it must be here noted, that this same year king Henry the eighth of England sent out two ships to discover to the northward, which sailed out of the Tbames on the twentieth of May, and entering between the north of Newfoundland and the continent one of them was cast away. The other directed its course towards cape Breton, and the coast of Arambec, often sending men ashore to get information of the country, and returned home in October, which is all the account we have of this voyage, Hackluyt, vol. III. p. 129.

An. 1530. Francis Pizarro having been in Spain, and obtained many favours of the emperor, and power to conquer what he had discovered, sailed from Panama with a hundred and eighty five Spaniards, and thirty seven horses. At the bay of S. Matthew he landed the horses and most of the men, to march along the shore, whilst the ships coasted; and falling upon the town of Quapel, he took a vast booty of gold, silver, and emeralds: then he sent three ships to Panama and Nicaragua to bring recruits of men and provisions. Being reduced to great straits, and ready to abandon the country, a ship arrived with supplies. Hence they sailed to the island Puna, which lies between three and four degrees of south-latitude; where after much feigned friendship from the Indians, he came to a battle with them, and having gained the victory, continued there, setting at liberty six hundred Indians of Tumbez, kept there in slavery, which gained him the affection of those people. Two ships coming to him with recruits from Panama, Pizarro sailed over to Tumbez, of which place he possessed himself after killing many Indians, who used all means by open force and treachery to destroy him. Here inquiring into the affairs of the country, he was informed of the greatness and infinite wealth of the city of Cuzco, and of the vast power and large dominion of the emperor of Peru. Then moving still to the southward, he founded the city of S. Michael, and staid there long to settle that new colony, to get more supplies and further intelligence into the affairs of the country; and though these things happened in the following years, we will conclude with them at once, according to the intended brevity. At that time two brothers contended for the monarchy of Peru, these were Atabaulpa and Guaascar, of whom the former had been successful in several battles. Pizarro resolved to make his advantage of their divisions. He therefore marched into the country with scarce two hundred men, and coming to Caxamalca, whence Atabaulpa drew out with his army, he sent to invite him back. The Igna came with an infinite multitude of Indians; and having filled the great market of Caxamalca, he ordered they should seize all the Spaniards, and take care that not one escaped: upon which as his horns and other warlike instruments began to make a dreadful noise, Pizarro gave the signal in like manner; and falling on, routed that multitude, and took the Igna prisoner, and with him an incredible treasure of gold, silver, and cotton cloth. The Igna being prisoner, offered for his ransom ten thousand ingots of gold, and a great room full to the top of silver; which he had almost performed, when new troubles arising, he was put to death. After which Pizarro marched to the great city of Cuzco, near two hundred leagues from Caxamalca, to the south-east; whence moving to the sea, he founded the city of Lima in 18 degrees of south-latitude, and subdued all that vast empire of Peru. Herrera, dec. 4. lib. VII. and IX. and dec. 5. throughout the greatest part of it.

An. 1532. Nunbo de Guzman, sent out by Cortes from Mexico by land to reduce the province of Mecboacan, discovered and subdued the provinces of Culiacan and Cinacloa, extending to 28 degrees of north-latitude on the coast of the South-sea, and opposite to the south end of California; all which was done by land, and was a consequence of the former navigations, Herrera, dec. 5. lib. I.

Some ships were sent out these years by Cortes from New-Spain, to discover to the north-west; but they having gone no further than has been already mentioned, it is needless to give any account of them.

An. 1534. Simon de Alcazova, a Portuguese in the king of Spain's service, undertook to discover to the southward of Peru; passing the strait of Magellan, and fitting out two good ships with two hundred and fifty men, he sailed from S. Lucar on the twenty first of September; and entered the mouth of the straits of Magellan in January following. Having spent some time in it, and being half-way through, the violent storms, which lasted many days, were the occasion that his men in a mutinous manner obliged him to turn back out of the strait, and put into port Lobos, a little above the mouth of it. Here he landed a hundred men to discover up the country, appointing his lieutenant to command them, because he could not himself, by reason of indisposition. They marched ninety leagues thro' a desert country, seeing scarce any inhabitants, and being ready to perish sometimes for want of water; and by this time all the provisions they brought from aboard were spent, the country affording little or nothing. This done, they returned towards the ships, and some of them mutinying by the way, secured those that opposed their wicked designs; and coming aboard, murdered Alcazova their commander in chief and his pilot, designing to leave the rest that had opposed them ashore, and turn pirates. But being divided among themselves, the loyal party took the advantage to possess themselves of the ships, and executed many of them. This done, they directed their course for the islands of America. The greatest ship was cast away on the coast of Brasil; the other in much distress arrived at the island Hispaniola. Thus ended this enterprise, Herrera, dec. 5. lib. VII. and VIII.

This same year 1534. Jaques Cartier sailed from the port of S. Malo, by order of Francis I. king of France, to discover the north part of America. He set out on the twentieth of April, and on the tenth of May put into the port of S. Catharine in Newfoundland; where having spent some days in refitting, he sailed all the length of the island from cape Raz to cape de Grace; and entering between the island and the continent, run to the westward along the shore, till at the mouth of the great river Canada, he turned to the southward, came to the bay called du Chaleur, and traded with the natives in a very peaceable manner, as they did all along those shores on the back of Newfoundland, viewing all the creeks and harbours; till the fifth of August, when they departed thence homeward, and arrived at S. Malo on the fifth of September, Hackluyt, vol. III. p. 201.

An. 1535. The same Jaques Cartier sailed again from S. Malo, May the nineteenth, with three ships upon the same discovery; and after suffering much by storms, which parted them, Cartier on the twenty fifth of June came upon the coast of Newfoundland in 49 degrees and 40 minutes of latitude, and staying some days, was there joined by his other two ships. Then they all together entered the great bay on the back of Newfoundland, sailing to the westward, and foul weather coming on, anchored in the port of S. Nicolas, where they staid till the seventh of August; and then steering to the southward, on the fifteenth came upon the island of the Assumption. Thence he turned again into the great river, and coasting along it, came to the island he called of Orleans, in the country of Canada, where he traded amicably with the Indians; and leaving the ships there, with fifty men in the boats, he ran fifty leagues higher, where he saw the town of Hochelaga, consisting of about fifty great houses, each capable of a great number of people, and the town inclosed with a triple fence, all of timber. Returning hence to his ships, he went to Stadacona, a town about a league from them, to visit the prince of that part of Canada. In these parts he found much fish, Indian wheat, and tobacco. He continued here all the winter, discovering what was nearest, and inquiring into the further parts of the country; and in May following returned home with a particular account of the great river of Canada, and the whole country called by that name, or New-France, Hackluyt, vol. III. p. 212.

This year D. Peter de Mendoza sailed from S. Lucar with eleven ships, and eight hundred men in them, for the river of Plate, where he happily arrived, and settled the colony of Buenos Ayres, which continues and is famous to this day; though the greatest part of his people perished there for want, before they were relieved from Spain, Herrera, dec. 5. lib. IX.

An. 1536. Two ships were fitted out at London, under the command of Mr. Hore, with a hundred and twenty men, for north America; of whom we find no account that they did any more than get to Newfoundland, where they were in such want, that that they eat up one another; and those that were left, surprized a French ship that came into those parts, and so returned home, Hackluyt, vol. III. p. 129.

An. 1539. F. Mark de Niza, with his companion F. Honoratus, a Black whose name was Stephen, and some Indians for interpreters, set out on the seventh of March from the town of Culiacan at the entrance into the strait of California on the South-sea shore, to discover the country to the northward by land. F. Honoratus fell sick, and was left behind; and F. Mark proceeded to Petabben, sixty leagues from Culiacan; the people there and all the way paying him extraordinary respect, and supplying him plentifully with all necessaries. Hence he went on to Vacapa, and sent the Black towards the sea to discover that port, who soon after sent messengers, desiring the father to come speedily to him, because he had received information of a country called Cibola, where there were seven great cities, built with stone two stories high, and the people well clad; and that it was but thirty days journey from the place where he then was. F. Mark set out towards this country, and all the way he went, the people offered him not only provisions, but Turky stones, earthen dishes, and other things, whereof he would receive nothing, but what was barely for his and his company's maintenance. He passed through a desert of four days journey, and coming out of it, the people of the first towns ran to meet him clad in cotton cloth, or skins with collars and other ornaments of Turky stones. Having travelled a hundred and twenty leagues from Vacapa, he came into a most delightful plain, all inhabited by very civilized people, and six days journey over; and then entered into a desert of fifteen days journey, where an Indian brought him the news that Stephen his Black, who had gone all the way before, was killed at Cibola by the governor's order; which was confirmed by other Indians that went with him, and had escaped. F. Mark having with much difficulty persuaded some few Indians to follow him, went on till he came in sight of Cibola, which he viewed from a rising ground, and afterwards declared it was the best city he had seen in America, the houses being two or three stories high, and very beautiful; but durst not go into it, for fear if they should kill him, there would be none to carry back an account of that discovery. He therefore returned, having seen many good towns in his way, and found people very much civilized; whereof he sent an account to the viceroy. He also was informed, that beyond Cibola there were three great and powerful kingdoms, called Marata, Acus, and Tontecac, where the people lived very politely, wove cloth, and had great riches. Cibola lies in about 38 or 39 degrees of north-latitude, Herrera, dec. 6. lib. VII.

Upon the news of this great discovery by land, Cortes set out three ships from New Spain, under the command of D. Francisco de Ulloa; who directed his course to the north-west, run along the back of California, searching all that coast as far as cape Enganbo in the latitude of 30 degrees: but here was no discovery of any consequence made, and Ulloa resolving to go further, was never more heard of; another of his three ships had been lost before, and the third, which now left him, returned to New Spain. Herrera Dec. 6. lib. IX.

An. 1540. Don Antony Mendoza viceroy of Mexico, upon the information above-given by F. Mark of the country of Cibola, ordered Francis Vasquez de Coronado, governor of New Galicia, to march thither with some forces, and plant colonies where he thought convenient. Coronado set out from Culiacan in May, with an hundred and fifty horse and two hundred foot, and store of ammunition and Provisions. He directed his course almost north-east, and after a long march of many days came to the first town, where Stephen the Black above-mentioned was killed. Here they saw five towns, each of about two hundred inhabitants, and the houses of stone and mud, and flat at the top; the country cold, but plentiful, the people clad in skins of beasts. Five days journey to the north-east of Cibola is a province called Tucayan. All these places gave the Spaniards friendly Reception, except the first town of Cibola. They travelled seven days further still north-east, and came to the river Cicuique, where they found abundance of cows, and then proceeded twenty days without knowing where they were. Here Coronado ordered all his forces to stay, except thirty men, and with them he travelled thirty days to the northward always among abundance of cattle, and on the feast of St. Peter and Paul came to the river to which he gave those names. Hence they turned into the province of Quivira, which is a finer country than most in Europe, and where they saw grapes and several sorts of European fruits, as also flax growing wild. Having taken an account of all this country, he returned to his government. In his way outwards he travelled three hundred and thirty leagues, and but two hundred in his return, because he came back the direct way. Quivira is in 40 degrees of latitude. Coronado was out two years upon his discovery, and was blamed at his return for not having planted a colony.

The

The same year the viceroy of Mexico set out two ships at Acapulco on the South-sea, to discover on that element, whilst Cornado travelled by land, and gave the command of them to Ferdinand de Alarcon, who set sail on the ninth of May. Coming to the flats at the entrance of the strait of California, he sent his boats before to sound, and yet run aground; but the tide rising, brought him off, and he run up till he came to a great river, up which he went with his boats, and traded with the Indians for provisions and hides. Having gone very far up this river, Alarcon heard tidings of Cibola, which was what he looked for, and of the death of Stephen the Black. He called the river Buena Guia, and returning to his ships, put aboard his boats abundance of provisions and commodities to trade with; resolving to join Francis Vasquez de Cornado that way. Alarcon went up this river eighty five leagues, and then hearing no news of Cornado, in search of whom he went, he took down the river again to his ships. He proceeded on his voyage many days after up the coast, enquiring for Cornado and Cibola, till perceiving at last there were no hopes of finding them, he returned to New Spain; having sailed 4 degrees further than the ships sent by Cortes. Herrera, dec. 6. lib. IX.

This year still, James Cartier before mentioned sailed from S. Malo with five ships on the twenty third of May for the coast of Canada and Saguenay; and meeting with very bad weather at sea, were parted, and came together again after long beating at sea, in the port of Carpoint in Newsoundland; and on the twenty third of August put into the haven of Santa Croix, or the holy cross in Canada. Hence the lord of Roberval sailed four leagues further, where he thought a convenient place, and there erected a fort, into which he landed the provisions and ammunition; and keeping three ships with him, sent back the other two into France. This is the first colony I find in north America, and the first in all that continent of any nation, except the Spaniards or Portugueses. Hackluyt, vol. III. p. 232.

There occurs another navigation this year, no less remarkable in its way, than any of those already mentioned. Pizarro having conquered the mighty empire of Peru, guided by his boundless ambition, travelled up into the inland, and wanting provisions, sent captain Orellana down the river of the Amazons with eighty men in a boat, and several canoes. He set out about the latter end of this year, and being carried two hundred leagues from the place where he entered, the violence of the current driving the boats twenty five leagues a day, he thought he was too far gone to return against the stream, and therefore held on his way, till in January for want of provisions his men eat all the leather they had. Being ready to perish, they came to an Indian town, where they found provisions, the Indians abandoning it at first; but Orellana speaking to some in the Indian tongue, they all returned, and plentifully furnished him with turkeys, partridges, fish, and other necessaries. Finding these Indians sincere, they staid here twenty days; in which time they built a brigantine, and set out again on Candlemas day, and ran two hundred leagues farther without seeing any town; when being again in great want, they spied some Indian dwellings, where they civilly asked for some sustenance, and had abundance of tortoises and parrots given them. In the way hence they saw good towns, and the next day two canoes came aboard, bringing tortoises and good partridges, and much fish, which they gave to Orellana, who in return gave them such things as he had. Then he landed, and all the caciques of the country about came to see and present him with provisions: so that he staid here thirty five days, and built another brigantine, which he caulked with cotton, and was supplied by the Indians with pitch for it. They left this place on the twenty fourth of April, and running eighty leagues without meeting any warlike Indians, came to a desert country. May the twelfth they came to the province of Macbiparo, where many canoes full of Indians set upon them; yet they landed some men, who brought provisions from the town in spite of the multitude of natives that opposed it, and repulsed the Indians from their boats. Yet when he went off, they pursued him two days and two nights, and therefore when they left him, he rested three days in a town, whence he drove the inhabitants, and found much provision, whereof he laid in good store. Two days after he came to another town as plentiful as the last, and where they saw much silver and gold, but valued it not, being now intent only upon saving their lives. In fine, with such like accidents he run down this vast river, seeing many towns and large rivers that fell into this; fighting often with the Indians, till he came into the North-sea. These Spaniards judged the mouth of the river to be fifty leagues over, that the fresh water ran twenty leagues into the sea, that the tide rises and falls five or six fathoms, and that they had run along this river eighteen hundred leagues, reckoning all the windings. Being out at sea, they coasted along by guess with their small vessels, and after many labours and sufferings, arrived at last in September at the island Cubagua on the coast of Paria, where was then a Spanish town, and great pearl-fishery. Herrera, dec. 6. lib. IX.

An. 1542. John Francis de la Roche, lord of Roberval, whom Francis I. king of France had constituted his lieutenant in the countries of Canada, Saguenay, and Hochelaga, sailed from Rochel with three ships, and in them two hundred persons, as well women as men, on the sixteenth of April; and by reason of contrary winds did not reach Newfoundland till the seventh of June. Here he made some stay to refit, and there came into the same port James Cartier with all his company, who we mentioned went into Canada two years before. He left the country because he was too weak to withstand the natives; and Roberval commanding him now to return with him who had strength enough, he stole away in the night, and returned into France. The last of June the general sailed out of port S. John in Newfoundland, and run up the river of Canada, till four leagues above the island of Orleans, the place now called Quebec. Finding here a convenient harbour, he landed and erected a strong and beautiful fort, into which he conveyed his men, provisions, and all necessaries, sending two ships back into France with the account of his proceedings. Being settled in this place they suffered much hardship, their provisions falling short, but were relieved by the natives. Roberval took a journey into the country of Saguenay to discover, but we have no particulars of this his expedition, Hackluyt, vol. III. p. 240.

The same year 1542. D. Antony Mendoza, viceroy of Mexico, fitted out two ships on the coast of the South-sea to discover to the northward, under the command of John Rodriguez Cabrillo a Portuguese. He sailed from the port of Navidad on the twenty seventh of June, and on the twentieth of August came up with cape Engano on the back of California in 51 degrees of latitude, where Cortes his discoverers had been before. September the fourteenth they anchored at a cape they called de la Cruz, or of the cross, in 33 degrees of latitude. October the tenth they traded with some peaceable Indians in 35 degrees 20 minutes, and called those the towns of the canoes, because they saw many there. On the eighteenth of the said month they anchored at cape Galera, and above it in a port they called Of Possession, trading with the natives, who go naked, have their faces painted in chequers, and are all fishermen. From this time they had many storms, which obliged them to turn back to the island Of Possession, where they continued many days by reason of the foul weather.

At length they put to sea again, and sailed to the northward as far as 44 degrees, where the cold was so intense they could not bear it; and their provisions now failing, they returned to New-Spain; having sailed further to the northward, than any had done on that side, Herrera, dec. 7. lib. V.

An. 1543. The viceroy last mentioned gave the command of two ships, a galley, and two small tenders, to Ruy Lopez de Villalobos, to discover the islands to the westward. He sailed from the coast of New-Spain on the first of November, and having run a hundred and eighty leagues in 18 degrees and a half of latitude, came to two desert islands about twelve leagues distant from one another, which he called S. Thoma and Anublada. Eighty leagues further they saw another, and called it Roca Portida. Seventy two leagues beyond it they found an Archipelago of small islands inhabited by a poor people, where they watered; and on the sixth of January passed by ten other islands, which for their pleasantness they called the Gardens, all of them in about 9 or 10 degrees of latitude. January the tenth after a great storm, in which they lost their galley, they discovered another island, from which some Indians came in boats making the sign of the cross, and bidding them good-morrow in Spanish. February the second they came to an island they called Casarea Caroli, about fifteen hundred leagues from New-Spain, where Villalobos would have planted a colony, but forbore because the place was unwholesome. This island by its bigness, for he coasted along it sixty leagues to the south, must be Luzon or Manila, the biggest of the Philippines, and he says it is three hundred and fifty leagues in compass. In a small island near to it he found China ware, musk, amber, civit, benjamin, storax, and other perfumes, as also some gold. Here they resolved to stay, and sowed some grain, which being little, they were reduced to extremity. Hence they removed to the island of Gilolo near the Moluccos, at the invitation of the king of it; whence they sent two ships at several times to carry news of them to New-Spain, which were both forced back by contrary winds. Between the Moluccos and Philippine islands the Spaniards were long tossed, sometimes removing to one, sometimes to another, ever persecuted by the Portugueses, and suffering great wants; till being quite spent and without hopes of relief, they put themselves into the hands of the Portugueses, and were by them sent thro' India into Spain, Herrera, dec. 7. lib. V.

An. 1562. The French admiral Cbastillon fitted out two of the king's ships under the command of captain John Ribault who failed failed with them on the eighteenth of February, and two months after arrived on the coast of Florida, where he landed at cape Francois in about 30 degrees of latitude, but made no stay. Running hence to the northward, he came into the river of May, where he was friendly entertained by the Indians, who presented him fish, Indian wheat, curious baskets, and skins. he proceeded still northward to the river of Port Royal, about which he saw turkey-cocks, partridges, and several other sorts of birds and wild beasts. The mouth of the river is three leagues over, and he sailed twelve leagues up it, where landing, the natives presented him Chamois skins, fine baskets, and some pearls; and here he erected a pillar with the arms of France. Having taken a view of all the shores of this river, he built a fort here but sixteen fathom in length and thirteen in breadth, with proportionable flanks, in which he left only twenty six men with provisions, ammunition, and all other necessaries, and called it Charles Fort. This done, he sailed some leagues further along the coast, and finding it dangerous, and his provisions almost spent, returned to France. Those left in the new fort discovered up the river, and contracted great friendship with five Indian princes, whose subjects when their provisions failed gave them all they had; and when that was spent guided them to other princes southward, who freely presented them with what they wanted. The fort happening accidentally to be burnt down, the Indians of their own accord rebuilt it. The French had lived long in a peaceable manner, and having no enemy abroad they fell out among themselves, and murdered their captain, choosing another in his stead. After which growing weary of the place, they built a small bark and put to sea in it; but their provisions failing, they were all like to perish, and eat one of their company. In this distress they met an English vessel which set some of them ashore, and carried the rest into England, Hackluyt, vol. III. p. 308.

This same year Mr. Hawkins made a voyage to Guinea, where having got three hundred Blacks, he sailed over with them to Hispaniola, and sold them at good rates. But this being a trading voyage, and not upon discovery, deserves no further mention, Hackluyt, vol. III. p. 500.

An. 1564. Captain Laudonniere had the command of three ships given him by the king of France, and sailed with them on the twenty second of April for Florida. He passed by the islands Antilles, and arrived on the coast of Florida on the twenty second of June. After spending some days along the coast, every where entertained with the greatest tokens of affection by the Indians, he sailed up the river of May, and finding a convenient place erected a fort, which he called Caroline in honour of Charles king of France. The fort finished, Laudonniere sent some of his men up the river, who at several times run eighty leagues; always meeting with natives that courted their friendship. After some time many mutinies happened among the French, of whom several went away with two brigantines to the Spanish islands, and having committed some rapine were closely pursued and drove back to Florida, where four of them were hanged. Whilst these mutineers were abroad, Laudonniere sent some of his men up the river, who discovered as far as the great lake out of which it runs, and the mountain Apalache, in which the Indians said there were rich mines. The following winter the French having exchanged away all their commodities, the Indians forsook them, and they were reduced to great straits, being obliged to use force to get provisions. In the height of their distress, when they had thoughts of venturing to return to France in a small vessel scarce able to contain them, with very slender provisions; Mr. Hawkins beforementioned, who this same year had made another voyage to Guinea, and thence to the West-Indies to sell Blacks, and in his way home run along the coast of Florida, coming to the river of May found the French in this distress, and therefore sold them a ship upon credit, generously supplying them with all they wanted, which done, he sailed away and returned into England. The French were now preparing to depart for France, this being

An. 1565. When in August captain Jobu Ribault arrived with seven sail of French ships to take possession of that country. A few days after six great Spanish ships came upon the coast, and gave chase to four of Ribault's that were without the port, which being better sailors escaped; and Ribault made out with the other three after them, leaving Laudonniere in the fort with eighty five men, where the Spaniards attacked him, and made themselves master of the fort. Laudonniere with some of his men escaped aboard two ships they had in the river, in one of which he arrived in England, and thence into France. Ribault with his ships as soon as he was out of May river met with a dreadful storm, which wrecked them all on the coast of Florida, where abundance of his men saved themselves from the sea, but were afterwards destroyed by the Spaniards. Hackluyt, vol. III. p. 319. and 349. and Purchas, vol. IV. p. 1604.

An. 1567. Captain Gourgues sailed from France with three ships, and coming to the river river of May in Florida, revenged the death of his countrymen, killing all the Spaniards he found there, but did nothing as to discoveries. Hackluyt, vol. III. p. 356. Purchas, vol. IV. p. 1604.

An. 1576. Mr. Martin Forbisher with two barks and a pinnace set out from Gravesend for the discovery of a passage to Cbina and Catbay by the north-west, on the twelfth of June. Sailing about the north of Scotland, on the twenty eighth of July, and in 62 degrees of latitude, he discovered land, which he supposed to be the continent of America, called Tierra de Labrador, with abundance of ice about it. Within a cable's length of the shore he found an hundred fathom water, and not being able to anchor stood to the north-east, as the coast there lies, and by reason of the ice could not come within five leagues of the shore. The tenth of August he landed on a desert island: the eleventh in 63 degrees and 8 minutes latitude he entered a strait which is called by his own name; the twelfth he came to S. Gabriel's island, and anchored in a bay which he called Prior's sound. The eighteenth having sailed north-north-west, he came to Butcher's island, where landing they spied seven boats. These people came aboard and looked like Tartars, with long black hair, broad faces and flat noses, of a tawny complexion, clad in seal-skins, the boats also made of seal-skins with a wooden keel. The twenty sixth one of these men came aboard, and the boat going to set him ashore, was taken by those savages with all the men. Having staid a day in hopes to recover them, and no signs appearing, he sailed homewards, and arrived at Harwich on the first of October. Hackluyt, vol. III. p. 29, 57.

An. 1577. Mr. Forbisher sailed the second time on the twenty sixth of May with a ship of two hundred tons and two barks, and in them an hundred and forty men, upon the same discovery he had attempted the foregoing year. June the seventh he arrived at the isles of Orkney, and July the fourth at Friesland: the sixteenth he came to his strait discovered the last year, and much ice appearing durst not venture in with his ship, but went with two pinnaces, and took one of the savages ashore. July the nineteenth the ice driving away the ships, he run into the strait, and anchored in a bay which they called Jackman's sound: here he landed with most of his men, and having travelled some way and found nothing to satisfy his desires, he coasted a little in the barks and boats both east and west; and though he saw several people, could take none but a woman and her child; and therefore on the fourth of August came to that he call'd Anne Warwick's sound and island. Here he used all possible means to bring the natives to trade, or give some account of themselves, but they were so wild, that they only studied how to destroy the English. Forbisher this year did not run above thirty leagues up the strait, and the winter drawing on returned into England, having loaded his vessels with a sort of shining sand and stones, which he imagined to be gold; but it proved a fallacy. Hackluyt, vol. III. p. 32, 60.

An. 1578. The noise of gold pretended to be found, and the hopes of a passage encouraged people to prosecute this voyage; and fifteen sail of ships provided for it met at Harwich, carrying a wooden fort ready framed to be set up in the golden country discovered, and an hundred men that were to be left there. The thirty first of May they left Harwich, and the second of July came into Forbisher's strait, which they found choaked up with ice, and as they struggled to work through it, a sudden storm arose and so enclosed them with mountains of ice, that it was wonderful they did not all perish. One vessel of an hundred tons was lost, but the men saved; two others had not been seen in twenty days before, and four that were farthest out at sea best escaped the danger of the ice, clearing themselves of it in time. Being got out of this danger by the wind turning to the north-west, and into sea-room, they were driven down by the current to the southward of Forbisher's strait, and run into another about 60 leagues, without knowing where they were, the cloudy weather obstructing their making an observation. Returning out of it again, most of the scattered fleet met; and made for Forbisher's strait, in hopes of those golden mountains, but found others of ice to obstruct their passage. After many other difficulties Forbisher with most of the ships worked his way through, and on the thirty first of July reached his long desired port of the countess of Warwick's sound. Here they landed, and thought of erecting the house or fort brought from England; but part of it being lost in the ship cast away, and more of it, as also of the provisions not yet come, being in four ships, the design of inhabiting them was laid aside. The other ships that had been missing, after hard struggling with ice and storms, joined the fleet. Here they set their miners to work, and loaded abundance of ore, which done, they directed their course for England, whither they returned in safety. Hackluyt, vol. III. p. 39, 74.

The same year 1582, Francis de Ovalle sailed from Acapulco, and running to the westward westward about eighteen hundred leagues, came to the island del Engano, the farthest of those called de los Ladrones, in thirteen degrees of north-latitude: thence he held on his course westward two hundred and eighty leagues, to Cabo del Espiritu Santo, or the cape of the Holy Ghost, in the island of Tandaya, the first of the Philippines. He spent several days in the narrow channels among these islands, shaping his course diversly as they would permit; and coming out into the open sea run up into the bay of Manila, now the metropolis of the Philippine islands, lying in 14 degrees and a quarter. Returning out of this bay, he made over to the coast of Cbina, and arrived in the port of Macao. Here he furnished himself with necessaries, and turning again to the eastward passed through the islands called Lequios, whence he held his course east, and east and by north, never touching any where, or meeting with any land till he came upon the coast of California in 38 degrees and a half of latitude. From this place he ran south-east, and south-east and by south to cape S. Lucas, which is five hundred leagues from the north cape called Mendocino, whence he continued his voyage successfully back to the port of Acapulco. Hackluyt, vol. III. p. 442. This voyage is inserted because it is the first from New Spain to Cbina, and the first that found the way of returning to New Spain by the northward; for want of which knowledge, many ships that attempted to return from the Molucco's to America, were still beaten back, there being no possibility of returning the way they go, which is near the line, where the easterly winds continually reign.

An. 1583. On the eleventh of June sir Humphrey Gilbert sailed from the west of England with five vessels, and in them two hundred and sixty men, designing to plant a colony in some part of north America. On the thirteenth the biggest ship stole away by night, and returned to Plymouth, there being a contagious distemper among the men. July the thirtieth he came upon the back of Newfoundland, which is about fifty leagues from the coast, and has at least twenty five or thirty fathom water, and about ten leagues over, lying like a long ridge of mountains in the sea, for on each side of it there are above two hundred fathom water. He came upon the coast, and running along it put into S. John's harbour, where he anchored among abundance of fishermen of several countries, who were there before. Here he went ashore, and took possession. One of his ships had before played the pirate at sea, robbing a French vessel, and here his men run away with a ship laden with fish, and others hid themselves; so that finding too few men for his ships, some being sick, he put them into one of his vessels, and sent it home, remaining now with only three. August the twentieth he sailed from port S. John, and the next day came up with cape Raz in 46 degrees 25 minutes latitude. Turning from hence to the westward towards cape Breton, eighty seven leagues distant, they spent eight days in the passage; and coming among the flats, the biggest ship of the three was cast away, and nothing saved except a few men in the boat. Sir Humphrey Gilbert was not aboard the ship cast away: The other two left resolved to return home, but by the way the small vessel sir Humphrey was in perished, the other arrived safe at Dartmouth. Hackluyt, vol. III. p. 143.

An. 1584. Mr. Philip Amadas and Mr. Arthur Barlow sailed on the twenty seventh of April from the west of England in two barks, to discover in America. On the tenth of June they came among the islands of America, much more to the southward than they had designed. July the fourth they discovered the continent, and sailed along the coast four leagues till they came to a river on the thirteenth, where they anchored, and going ashore took possession. This place they afterwards found to be the island of Wokoken, on the coast of Virginia, in 34 degrees of latitude, and in it deer, rabbits, hares, fowl, vines, cedars, pines, sassafras, cypress and mastich-trees. The natives from the continent repaired to the ships, and exchanged several sorts of skins, white coral, and some pearls, for tin things, and other trifles. The country is fruitful, producing all things in a very short time. The natives called it Wingandacoa, and the English Virginia. Going ashore they were entertained with extraordinary civility at a little village, and heard news of a great city up the country, but saw it not. They made no long stay here, nor proceeded any further upon discovery, only just to the neighbouring parts in their boats, and returned to England in September, bringing two of the natives with them. Hackluyt, vol. III. p. 246.

An. 1585. On the ninth of April sir Richard Greenvil departed from Plymouth with seven sail; and after touching at the islands of Puerto Rico, and Hispaniola, on the twenty sixth of June came to an anchor at the island Wokoken in Virginia, where the admiral's ship was lost through the ignorance of the pilot. Here Mr. Lane was set ashore with above an hundred men to settle a colony, with all necessaries for that purpose. Then the admiral returned to England, and the new planters made made several discoveries up the country, finding it every where plentiful and pleasant. Here they continued a year, at the end whereof the natives conspiring to destroy them, and no relief as yet coming from England, they returned home aboard sir Francis Drake's ships, which happened to touch there after his expedition to the Spanish plantations. Hackluyt, vol. III. p. 251. Paribas, vol. IV. p. 1645.

The same year 1585, on the seventh of June, Mr. John Davis sailed from Dartmouth with two barks for the discovery of the north-west passage to China. July the nineteenth they met with much ice, and on the twenty ninth discovered land bearing north-east of them in 64 degrees 15 minutes latitude. Here they went ashore, and found a tractable sort of people, with whom they dealt for seals skins, and several sorts of leather. August the first they proceeded on their discovery to the north-west, and on the sixth came into 66 degrees and 40 minutes free from ice, and landed under a hill which they called mount Raleigh, where they saw no inhabitants, but many white bears. The eighth they coasted on, and the eleventh found themselves in a passage twenty leagues wide, and free from ice, along which they sailed sixty leagues; and searching all about found many islands and several harbours, with all appearances of a further passage, yet the winds proving contrary to proceed, they returned for England, and arrived at Dartmouth on the thirtieth of September. Hackluyt, vol. III. p. 98.

An. 1586. Mr. Davis sailed the second time on the seventh of May with one ship, two barks, and a small pinnace, upon the same discovery. The fifteenth of June he discovered land in the latitude of 60 degrees; but could not come near it for ice, till the twenty ninth he came to land in 64 degrees latitude, and went ashore on an island, where he traded very friendly with the natives for seals, stags, and white hares skins, and dried fish and some fowl. Here he continued some days trading with the natives, who were very thievish; at his departure he brought away one of them with him. He run into 66 degrees 20 minutes latitude, and then coasted southward again to 56 degrees, where in a good harbour he continued till September; and sailing thence in 54 degrees, found an open sea tending westward, which they hoped might be the passage so long sought for; but the weather proving tempestuous, they returned to England in October, Hackluyt, vol. III. p. 103.

The same year 1586. Sir Richard Greenville returned to Virginia with three ships to relieve the colony left by him there; which being gone, as was said before, he left fifteen men on the island Roanoak with provisions for two years, and then returned to England, Hackluyt, vol. III. p. 265.

This year also was begun the voyage round the world by sir Thomas Candish, which may be seen among the voyages about the globe after these West-India discoveries.

An. 1587. Mr. John Davis on the nineteenth of May sailed with three small vessels, upon his third voyage for discovery of a passage to the north-west. June the eighteenth they came to an anchor on the northern American coast, and the twentieth were in 67 degrees 40 minutes latitude in an open sea; and then steering westward ran forty leagues, where meeting with much ice, and the north wind driving them from their intended northerly course, they were forced to seek the open sea again. The twentieth they had sight of the strait they discovered the year before, and sailed up it 60 leagues; and having landed without finding any thing more than the year before, came out again to the wide sea: then they coasted along to the southward as far as 52 degrees of latitude, whence they returned home, without doing any thing of note, Hackluyt, vol. III. p. III.

The same year 1587. Sir Walter Raleigh provided three vessels to carry over to Virginia a hundred and fifty men to settle a colony there under the command of John White. They sailed from Plymouth on the eighth of May, and having spent several days among the Spanish American islands, arrived at last on the twenty second of July at Hatorask in Virginia; whence crossing over to the island Roanoak, they found the fifteen English left there the year before were killed by the natives. Here the new planters were set ashore with all their provisions, goods, and ammunition, and the ships returned into England, carrying with them the governor to sollicite for speedy supplies to be sent to the new colony, Hackluyt, vol. III. p. 280.

An. 1590. John White returned to Virginia to the place where he had left the colony, but found none of the men; only an inscription on a tree, signifying they were removed to Croatoan, another island on the coast, and many chests broke up, and some lumber belonging to them, scattered about the place. In going ashore here a boat was overfet, and a captain with six men drowned; the rest with much difficulty got aboard again, leaving behind them several casks they had carried to fill with fresh water. They had spent much time before they came hither, ranging about the Spanish islands; and the season being now stormy, they were forced to return to England, land, without so much as knowing what was become of the colony, Hackluyt, vol. III. p. 288.

An. 1602. Captain Gosnols sailed from Falmouth on the twenty sixth of March, and on the fourteenth of April discovered land in about 40 degrees of north-latitude; and having spent some days sounding along the coast, on the twenty fourth came upon Elizabeth's island, in 41 degrees 10 minutes, and four leagues from the continent. This island was not inhabited, but over-grown with trees and shrubs of all sorts, and in it a pool of fresh water, about two miles in compass, one side of it not above thirty yards from the sea, and in the midst of it a small rocky island about an acre in extent, all covered with wood, where the captain designed to build a fort, and leave some men. The thirty first he went over to take a view of the continent, which he found a most delicious and fruitful country, and the natives peaceable and friendly. Having taken this small view of the country, and the men refusing to be left on that desert place, he returned for England, Purchas, vol. IV. p. 1651.

An. 1603. Captain Samuel Champlain of Brouage sailed from the port of Honfleur in Normandy on the fifth of March for Canada. The second of May they came upon the bank of Newfoundland in 44 degrees 20 minutes of latitude. The twelfth they came upon cape S. Mary, and the twentieth to the island of the Assumption, at the mouth of the river of Canada. He run up it a hundred leagues to the little port of Tadoussac on the north-side of Canada, and at the mouth of Saguenay river, where they contracted strict friendship with the natives. He ran twelve leagues up the river Saguenay, all which way is a mountainous country, and the river deep and wide. Next they run up the great river of Canada as far as that of the Iroquois, and thence to the first great fall of the river, which tumbles down there about two fathom with an incredible fury; and the Indians told them there were ten more falls, though not so great, beyond the first. After discovering thus much, and getting information of several great lakes up the country, and of a boundless ocean at four hundred leagues distance westward, they returned to Tadoussac; and spending some days more in searching the great and lesser rivers, and getting intelligence of the country, they sailed back into France, Purchas, vol. IV. p. 1605.

The same year 1603. Two vessels of Bristol, and one of London, made their voyages to Virginia, in which there was nothing remarkable, except that the last of them run up into Chesapeac bay in about 37 degrees of latitude, where the captain going ashore, was killed with four men; upon which the rest presently returned home, Purchas, vol. IV. p. 1654, and 1656.

An. 1604. Monsieur de Monts having obtained a patent from Henry IV. king of France for peopling the countries of Acadie and Canada, he sailed for those parts with two ships well man'd, and Monsieur de Potrincourt with him. They were kept long at sea by contrary winds, and met with much ice; but on the sixth of May they put into a port in the south of Acadie, which they called Rosignol, because there they took a French ship, commanded by a captain of that name, and being confiscate for trading there contrary to the king's Patent. Then doubling cape Sable, the southermost of that country, they ran up to the northward in a large bay to that of S. Mary, and thence to a convenient harbour, which they called Port Royal; which Monsieur de Potrincourt demanded a grant of, to settle a colony and inhabit there, and had it given him. They proceeded still further up to cape Mines, so called because of some found there, and into the river of S. John; and then turning back, erected a fort in a small island twenty leagues from the said river, resolving to settle there, and calling it the island of Sante Croix, or the Holy Cross. It is small, but very fruitful, and lies as it were hid among many others. Here winter coming on, and the fort being ill seated, as exposed to the north, the men suffered very much through extremity of cold and deep snows; and being forced to cross a great river for water and wood, many of them were dangerously sick. This hard season being over, monsieur de Monts searched all the coast in a small vessel he built to discover a more convenient place to settle, and at last pitched upon Port Royal, where he left part of his men, and returned himself to France, Purchas, vol. IV. p. 1626.

An. 1605. and on the last day of March, captain George Weymouth with one ship sailed from the Dorons, and on the eighteenth of May came to an anchor in S. George's island on the coast of Virginia, where he found great plenty of fish; and two days after removed into an excellent port, which he called Pentecost harbour. Then he run up a great river twenty six miles, and found it fit to receive and secure any number of ships. The natives of this coast traded in a friendly manner for several days, but were found at last to be treacherous, as only contriving by their fair shew of kindness to draw the English into their power; who being aware of them in time, broke off the correspondence, and returned into England without making any considerable advantage of this small discovery. Purchas, vol. IV. p. 1659.

An. 1606. Monsieur de Monts and monsieur de Potrin-court sailed again from Rochebel with one ship of an hundred and fifty tun. The twenty eighth of June they came upon the bank of Newfoundland, and making the shore, coasted all along to Port Royal, where they had before left their colony, and anchored at the mouth of the harbour on the twenty sixth of July. Here they found but two Frenchmen, the rest being gone with their small vessel towards Newfoundland; but soon returned, being met by a pinnace belonging to this last-come ship, left to coast along close by the shore. Here they settled a-new, viewed all the country about for a more convenient seat for their town, were most obligingly treated by the natives, and planted, and had crops of all sorts of European grain and garden-stuff: yet after all, the colony was forsaken, not for any defect in the country, as may appear by what has been said; but because new measures were taken in France, and the supplies that should have been sent them were employed another way. Purchas, vol. IV. p. 1627.

The same year 1606, on the twentieth of December, three ships sailed from London, commanded by captain Newport, to settle a colony in Virginia; and passing among the Spanish American islands, on the twenty sixth of April came into the bay of Chesapeac, where they presently landed, and had some men hurt in a skirmish with the natives. The twenty seventh they marched eight miles up the country, and the twenty eighth went up the bay in their boats, where they always found shallow water; but returning, they fell into a channel six, eight, and ten fathom deep, which was a satisfaction, and therefore they called the point of land next it cape Comfort. The point at the mouth of the bay they called cape Henry. The following days they surveyed all the shores in their boats, being civilly treated every where by the Indians; and running up Powhatan river, found a place where their ships could lie moored to the trees in six fathom water. Here on the fourteenth of May they landed all their men, and fell to work to fortify themselves, resolving to settle their colony, as they did, giving it the name of James Town; which is the first plantation of the English in Virginia that continued, as it does to this day. June the twenty second captain Newport in the admiral was sent back into England. In the colony were left an hundred and four men with little provision, and therefore they were soon reduced to great extremities; many also dying of diseases peculiar to that country. But in their greatest distress, the natives, who before had been their enemies, supplied them with plenty of all sorts of victuals, which recovered the sick men, and was the saving of the colony. Every year after ships arrived from England with supplies, till the new town grew to a considerable body, and sent out other colonies to the parts adjacent, where they were thought necessary, till they made themselves masters of that northern part of America. The relation is too long any more than to be hinted as above, but to be seen at large in Purchas, vol. IV. p. 1705.

An. 1610. Mr. Hudson again undertook the discovery of a north-west passage, which had been laid aside for some years, and proceeded an hundred leagues further than any before him had done, giving names to some places, to be seen in the maps; as Desire provokes, Ile of God's Mercies, Prince Henry's Cape, King James's Cape, and Queen Ann's Cape: but he could proceed no farther for ice.

An. 1611. Sir Thomas Button, at the instigation of prince Henry, whose servant he was, pursued the north-west discovery. He passed Hudson's strait, and leaving Hudson's bay to the south, sailed above two hundred leagues to the south-westward, through a sea above eighty fathom deep, and discovered a great continent called by him New Wales; where after much misery and sickness, wintering at Port Nelson, he carefully searched all the bay, from him called Button's bay, back again almost to Digg's island. He discovered the great land called Cary's Swan's nest. He lost many men during his stay in the river called Port Nelson, in 57 degrees 10 minutes of north-latitude; though he kept three fires in his ship all winter, and had great store of white partridges, and other fowl, besides deer, bears and foxes.

An. 1612. Mr. Richard Moore was sent in April with one ship and sixty men to inhabit the Summer-islands, otherwise called Bermudas, long-before discovered by the Spaniards, who after some attempts to settle there, abandoned them; and were after accidentally found by sir Thomas Gate and sir George Summers, who were shipwrecked upon them, and lived there nine months, during which time they built a ship and a pinnace with the Cedar growing there, and in 1610 sailed away for Virginia, leaving only two men in the great island. A ship sent thither from Virginia left only three men in the island, who found there amber-greece to the value of nine or ten thousand pounds. Mr. Moore at his coming this year found those three men in perfect health. He settled a colony, and continued there three years, being relieved from time to time, till they amounted to above six hundred inhabitants, who built several forts, but had like to have been themselves destroyed by an infinite number of rats, which increased from a few coming ashore out of a ship, and continued for four years devouring all the growth of the country, notwithstanding all possible means were used to destroy them.

An. 1612. James Hall and William Baffin returned into England, having discovered Cockin's sound in 65 degrees 2 minutes latitude, and tried the mine at Cunningham's River, which they found to be worth nothing.

An. 1615. Mr. Baffin went again, and the chief thing he discovered was, that there is no passage in the north of Davis's Strait.

An. 1616. Mr. Baffin was sent the third time, and entered sir Thomas Smith's bay in 78 degrees latitude; and returned, despairing of finding any passage that way.

An. 1620. A ship sailed from Plymouth for New-England on the sixth of September; though we have not the commander's name, nor what force his ship was of. It is also here to be observed, that all the northern coast from about 60 to 40 degrees of north-latitude, was first discovered by Sebastian Cabot, and afterwards at several times by Cortereal a Portuguese, as has been set down in their proper places, and by sundry English and French discoverers; to particularize every one of whose voyages would swell a volume, and therefore only the principal discoveries and plantations are here set down, as most suitable to the nature of this discourse, and the intended brevity. This ship we now speak of, anchored in the bay at cape Cod in New-England, and in 41 degrees and a half of north-latitude on the eleventh of November. Here they put out their boat, and landed men, who went some miles into the country several ways without meeting any people, and only found some little Indian wheat buried, the boat coasting along the shore. This they continued for several days, seeking out some proper place to settle. At length on the twenty third of December, they pitched upon a place to their mind, and fell to work to building their houses, dividing themselves into nineteen families, that the fewer houses might serve. About this place they found no people, but were told by an Indian, who came to them from the next part inhabited, that the natives there had all died lately of a plague. This savage brought some of the neighbouring people to them, by whom they concluded peace and amity. The following year this new colony was reinforced with thirty five men from England, and supplied with provisions and necessaries, and called New-Plimouth in New-England. A war soon breaking out with another Indian prince, the English fortified their colony to secure themselves against all attempts of their enemies. From hence all other colonies were by degrees sent into other parts of the country; of which it were too tedious to give any further account, Purchas, vol. IV. p. 1842.

VOL. I.

An. 1631. Captain James sailing into the north-west, was much pestered with ice in June and July; and entering a great bay near port Nelson, he named the land New South-Wales. Roving up and down these seas, he gave names to these places discovered by him, viz. cape Henrietta Maria, Lord Weston's Island, Earl of Bristol's Island, sir Thomas Roe's Island, Earl of Danby's Island, and Charlton Island. He wintered there in 52 degrees 3 minutes latitude, and returned home the following year 1632. having discovered much beyond Hudson, Button, and Baffin. The Danes have attempted to discover in these northern parts, but there is nothing remarkable in their actions.

An. 1667. Zachariab Gillam in the Non-such ketch passed through Hudson's Strait, and then into Baffin's bay to 75 degrees of latitude, and thence southerly into 51 degrees; where in a river called Prince Rupert's River, he had a friendly correspondence with the natives, built a fort, which he called Charles Fort, and returned with success; having laid the foundation of an advantageous trade in those parts.

An. 1669. Captain John Narbrough, afterwards sir John Narbrough, sailed in the Sweepstakes a man of war of three hundred tun, thirty six guns, and eighty men and boys, with a pink of seventy tun and nineteen men, both set out at the charge of his majesty king Charles II. and his royal highness the duke of York, to make a farther discovery on the coast of Chile. On the twenty first of October the year following, he came to the mouth of the straits of Magellan, and through them to the South-sea, about the middle of November; having taken a most exact survey of that passage, which is made publick in his voyage. On the twenty sixth of November he went ashore on the small island called Neustra Senora del Socorro, or Our Lady of Succour; where he watered, but found no people. Holding on his course to the northward, on the fifteenth of December he sent his boat, with the lieutenant in her, ashore on the south side of port Baldivia, which is in 39 degrees 56 minutes of south latitude. Here the lieutenant and three others going ashore to a Spanish fort, were detained; and the ship sailed away without them. From hence captain Narborough turned again to the southward, and through the Strait of Magellan returned into England; where he arrived in June following, having been out above two years.

An. 1673. On the thirteenth of May F. Marquette a Jesuit, with only six other Frenchmen, set out in two canoes from the Lac des Puans, or the Stinking Lake, in the province of Canada in North-America; and passing through the provinces of Folle Avoine and Illinois; Indians in peace with France, sometimes carrying their boats by land, and sometimes being carried in them, they came at length to the great river Mississipi. They ran many leagues along this river through a desert country, their course always south, though sometimes bending east, and sometimes west. At the end of several days solitude, they came among savage Indians, were friendly received, and heard that the sea was within two or three days sail of them; which was the gulph of Mexico. Thus he discovered all that inland part of North-America along the river, from 38 to 34 degrees of north-latitude, lying on the back of Canada, Virginia, &c. down to Florida. The particulars of this voyage may be seen in Thevenot's small collection of voyages in octavo.

An. 1680, and 1681. Captain Sharp having been buccaneering in the South-sea, and not able to recover the strait of Magellan to return home, he ran further to the south beyond le Maires and Browers, till he came into 60 degrees of south-latitude; meeting with many islands of ice, and abundance of snow, frost, and whales, and called a small place he found the Duke of York's Island. Thus he came into the north sea a new way, and made it appear that the land in the straits of le Maire and Brower must be islands, and not joined to any continent. Introduction to the account of several late discoveries printed in 1694, p. 13.

Here we may conclude with the American voyages and discoveries, having run along from north to south on the east side of that new world, or along that commonly called the north sea; and back from south to north along the west side, or south sea. It follows next, as was done after the eastern discoveries, to shew the extent of this vast tract of land thus found, and what benefits the world has received by this navigation. The whole length of what has been discovered, is from 78 degrees of north-latitude, in which sir Thomas Smith's bay lies, to 60 degrees of south-latitude, in all a hundred and thirty eight degrees; which allowing twenty leagues to a degree, in a strait line amounts to two thousand seven hundred and sixty leagues, a thing almost incredible, were it not so well known, and stupendous that so great a part of the world should lie concealed so many ages; being never known since the creation, till about three hundred years ago. Now to descend to particulars; from 80 to almost 50 degrees of north-latitude being 30 degrees, and according to the rate above of twenty leagues to a degree, six hundred leagues; the extremity of the cold, which is there more fierce than in the parts of Europe under the like elevation, renders that part little regarded; and consequently not inhabited by any European nation, though much of it be peopled by savages, living there little better than brutes: and all the advantage made of those northern nations is the fishery of whales and morfes; the former for their oil and bone, and the latter for their teeth, which are finer than ivory. The next division beginning above 50 degrees of north latitude, and reaching to about 44, is Canada or New-France; running up the river of Canada above two hundred leagues into the continent, and possessed by the French, who have there several colonies, and trade with the natives for furs. Next to Canada is New-England, lying along the sea-coast north-east and south-west about seventy miles, subject to the crown of England, and their chief trade furs, flax, hemp, and some corn. After it follows New-York, the trade much the same with those spoken of. Then comes Pensylvania, Virginia, and Maryland, almost north and south for above a hundred leagues of English conquest, and the principal commodity tobacco. Carolina is next in course, being a part of the great province of Florida, lying between 29 and 36 degrees of latitude, and therefore about a hundred and forty leagues in length: it has been possessed by the English but of latter years, in the reign of king Charles II. from whom it took the name; and being so lately subdued, the returns of it are not yet great, but much is hoped from it. Florida is a vast part of the continent, reaching above two hundred and fifty leagues from north to south, and above four hundred from east to west, besides a large province of it shooting out into the sea, where begins the channel of Babama: part of it is subject to the Spaniards, and a greater part not yet conquered; so that it affords no great profit. But now follows the great and wealthy kingdom of Mexico, running above a hundred and thirty leagues almost north and south, and about the same length upon a turn it makes in the south part towards the east, including the great peninsula of Yucatan, tan, above three hundred leagues in compass. In this vast dominion, entirely subject to Spain, is to be found in great plenty all that is necessary and convenient for human life, except wine and oil; and from it Europe is supplied with great store of silver, cochineel, indigo, cacao, bairullas, cotton, mechoacan, and many other precious commodities. Whence to Porto Bello the coast runs partly near east and west, and partly almost north and south, above three hundred and fifty leagues of countries incredibly rich, and affording all the commodities abovementioned, more plenty of gold, and many other precious things. From Nombre de Dios to Cabo de Galera, taking it in a strait line, the coast runs east and west about four hundred and fifty leagues, all still Spanish, and abounding in wealth; particularly the pearl-fishery on the coast of Paria, and the rich emeralds up the inland. From cape Galera to Cabo de Cande, along the coast of Caribana, lying south-east and north-west about two hundred and fifty leagues, and thence to Caparare more southerly about a hundred and twenty leagues, in all three hundred and seventy; all this for the most part unconquered, and peopled by savage Indians. From cape Caparare to Cabo do Natal about four hundred leagues east and west somewhat southerly, and from Cabo do Natal to Rio de Janeiro almost north and south near four hundred leagues, and so to Lagoa de Pernaba a hundred and fifty leagues, in all nine hundred leagues; all this tract of land, commonly known by the name of Brasil, and subject to the crown of Portugal, yielding abundance of tobacco and sugar, infinite quantities of Brasil wood, which gives the name to the country, and of late years a gold mine found in it, which yields considerable treasure. From Lagoa de Pernaba to the river of Plate, about three hundred leagues south-west and north-east, under the dominion of Spain. From this mouth of the river of Plate, running up the continent on the back of Brasil, the Spanish dominions reach across to Peru, being at least four hundred leagues; and above as much north and south in the inland; being fruitful countries, almost overrun with flocks and herds of all sorts of cattle, whence they send abundance of hides to Spain, and much silver, which they have from Peru by way of trade. From the mouth of the river of Plate, to the entrance into the strait of Magellan, south-west and north-east four hundred leagues; all this country is inhabited only by savage Indians, and was never subdued by any European nation: therefore yielding no profit, though fruitful and good land. Terra del Fuogo, or terra Magella- nica lying to the south of the strait, is little known, and not worth conquering by reason of its coldness, and therefore no more needs be said of it. The strait of Magellan is about a hundred leagues in length, and coming out of it into the South-sea, from cape Victoria to Rio de los Gallegos, about two hundred leagues; all still the country of the Patagones, never inhabited by Christians, nor yielding them any benefit. But here begins the coast of Chile, extending above three hundred leagues; a country infinitely rich in gold, for which the silver is neglected, though it has plenty of it, and yielding the most precious natural balsam in the world; all subject to Spain, as is the whole coast on the South-sea up to 40 degrees of north-latitude, for which reason it will be needless to repeat it. Peru reaches four hundred leagues north-west and south-east, well known for its inexhaustible silver mines of Potosi and Porco. Next is the province of Quito, about an hundred leagues along the coast north and south. Then the firm land, or continent so called peculiarly, and provinces of Panama and Veragua, above an hundred leagues north-east and south-west, and north-west and south-east. After this follows the government of Guatemala, near three hundred and fifty leagues along the coast north-west and south-east; and then that of Mexico two hundred and fifty leagues, abounding in gold, silver, all useful woods, rich drugs, cotton, and many other precious commodities. Lastly, New Mexico reaching up to 40 degrees of north-latitude, being about four hundred leagues; a rich country in silver mines, and plentiful in cattle, corn, and all other blessings for human life. Having run along both sides of America, and given a particular of each division, as to extent, product, and by whom possessed, as far as the brevity of this discourse would permit; it is fit to note that all the lengths are here taken in a strait line, and not winding with the shores, which would make them double what is computed: and, as in such vast extents, not pretended to be measured to exactness, but according to the general computation of sailors. The total thus amounts to six thousand five hundred leagues, taking only the greatest windings of the coast, and this along what is conquered by Europeans; excepting only the seven hundred leagues of the land of the Patagones about the strait of Magellan, and two hundred and fifty or thereabouts, of Caribana, not so well subdued. And to sum up the commodities we have from these countries; the principal are gold, silver, pearls, emeralds, amethysts, cochineal of several sorts, indigo, anatto, logwood, logwood, Brasil, Nicaragua wood, brasi-lette, fustick, lignum visa, sugar, ginger, cacáo, bairullas, cotton, red wool, tobac-cô of various sorts, snuff, hides raw and tanned, amber-greece of all sorts, bezoar, balsam of Tolu, of Peru, and of Cbile, jesuit's bark, jallap, mechoacan, sarsaparilla, sassafras, tamarinds, cassia, and many other things of lesser note. It only remains now to add a word concerning the islands belonging to this mighty continent. The first of these beginning northerly, is Newfoundland, above three hundred leagues in compass, peopled by French and English, who have some colonies in it fruitful enough, were it well cultivated; yet it yields no commodity to export from the land: but the sea is an inexhausted treasure, furnishing all Europe with salt and dried fish; which yield a mighty profit to those that follow the fishery, and is a general benefit to all men. The next are the Bermudas, or Summer-islands, lying above three hundred leagues east from the coast of Virginia; the biggest of them is not twenty miles long, and not above two or three in breadth, the others much smaller: yet here is a strong colony of English, the land being delightful to live in, producing all things for human life plentifully, and the trade is some cochineal, amber-greece and pearl; it used to send abroad the fairest oranges in these parts, but they have failed of late years. Off the coast of Florida are the islands called Lucayos, the first discovered by Columbus; but they are small, and of no account. South of the point of Florida is Cuba, about two hundred leagues in length, and about forty in breadth in the widest place; a pleasant place, has gold and copper mines, and yields tobacco, sugar and cotton. East of Cuba lies Hisp-aniola an hundred and fifty leagues in length, and about sixty in breadth, producing the same commodities as Cuba; and both subject to Spain. Jamaica lies south of Cuba, about seventy leagues in length, and twenty in breadth, possessed by the English, and producing sugar, indigo and cotton. The island of Puerto Rico is less than Jamaica, yields the same commodities, and belongs to Spain. The Caribbe islands are many, but small; some of them possessed by the English, French and Dutch, others not inhabited: they produce sugar, indigo, cotton and tobacco, and run from the coast of Paria to Puerto Rico. The Leeward-islands lie along the coast of Paria, the most remarkable of them being Margarita, and Cubagua famous for the pearl-fishery.

La Trinidad is a large island before the gulph of Paria, near which there are many small ones, but not considerable. All the coast southward has no island of any note, till we come to the strait of Magellan, the south part whereof is made by Terra del Fuego and other islands, of which little is known. Nor is there any ascending again northward worth speaking of, till the mouth of the bay of Panama, where are the islands of Pearls, so called from a pearl-fishery there; they are small, and of no consideration in any other respect. The only great island on this side America is California, found to be so but of late years, running from the tropick of Cancer to 45 degrees of north-latitude, north-west and south-east, above five hundred leagues in length, and an hundred in breadth in the northern part, whence it runs tapering down to the south. It has hitherto yielded no great profit to the Spaniards, who have not had leisure to build colonies there till within these very few years, and not above two as yet. This is all that belongs to America; it remains to add some few voyages to the isles of Solomon, Terra Austrlis incognita, and the land of Tesso, or Jedso; which being properly no parts either of the East or West-Indies, and but little of them as yet known, they have been reserved to be spoke of by themselves.

An. 1595. Alvaro de Mendana with the title of governor and lord-lieutenant, set out from Peru for the islands of Solomon, whereof some uncertain knowledge was had before by ships that accidentally had seen some of them: he had four sail, with men and women, and all other necessaries to settle a colony. In about 9 or 10 degrees of south-latitude, and fifteen hundred leagues west of the city of Lima in Peru, he discovered four small islands inhabited by very handfom and civilized people.
Hence holding on his course still westward, he found several other more considerable islands, where he intended to have settled his colony, but was hindred by many misfortunes, and among the rest sickness. All that is extant of this relation, is only a fragment in Spanish taken out of Theve-not's second volume; which being inserted in this collection, it will be needless to add any more in this place, only that three of the ships perished, two were never heard of, a third cast away on the Philippine islands, the men saved; and the fourth, being the admiral, arrived at Manila, with the men almost starved: and thus this enterprize was disappointed.

An. 1600. Four ships sailing from Peru for the Philippine islands, were by northerly winds driven south of the equinoctial, where they fell upon several rich countries and islands, not far from the isles of Solomon: They called one place Monte de Plata, or Mountain of Silver, because they found

found plenty of it there. After which a captain of note went out on purpose, and saw these discoveries. This is all we have of it in Purchas, vol. IV. p. 1432. only he adds two petitions of captain Peter Fernandez de Quiros to the king of Spain, suing to be employed in conducting colonies to those southern parts, alledging the vast extent and riches of the continent, and great value of the islands, which he speaks of as an eye-witness, and by the report of natives he brought away from thence, as may be seen more at large in Purchas, vol. IV. p. 1422.

An. 1628. On the twenty eighth of October the Dutch set out eleven sail for India, among which was the Batavia, commanded by captain Francis Pelsart, which being parted from the rest was cast away on the rocks near some small islands not inhabited, and having no fresh water, in upwards of 38 degrees of south-latitude, but all the people saved on the islands. This want obliged them to build a deck to their long-boat and put out to sea, where they soon discovered the continent, bearing north and by west about six miles from them. This was on the eighth of June, An. 1629. And the weather being rough, and the coast high, they were forced to beat at sea till the fourteenth, when they found themselves in 24 degrees of south-latitude; and six men swimming ashore, saw four savages quite naked, who fled from them: they went to seek fresh water, but finding none, swam back to their boat. The fifteenth the boat made into shore, and found no fresh water, but the remains of the rain that lay in the hollow of the rocks, which relieved them, being almost choaked. The sixteenth they went ashore again, but found no water, the latitude here 22 degrees; the twentieth in 19 degrees, the twenty second in 16 degrees 10 minutes. Thus Pelsart sailed along this coast to the northward till he came among the Indian islands, and then struck over to Java, where he met two Dutch ships, which carried him to Batavia, whence he returned with a vessel to save as much as might be of the wreck. L'evenot, -vol. 1.

An. 1642. Abel Jansen Tasman set sail from Batavia in the island of Java with a yacht and a flyboat, and September the fifth anchored at the island Mauritius in 20 degrees of south-latitude. The eighth they departed thence south till 40 or 41 degrees, then bore away east somewhat southerly, till the sixth of November they were in 49 degrees. The twenty fourth in 42 degrees 25 minutes they saw land east and by north at ten miles distance, and called it Antony van Diemens lands, and after running along the coast came to an

anchor on the first of December in a bay they named Frederick Hendrick's bay: they heard some noise as of people, but saw none, and only the footing of wild beasts, and some smoaks. Departing hence, on the thirteenth of December they anchored in the country called in the maps New-Zealand; here they saw some natives lusty people, and half naked, who coming aboard on pretence to traffick, fell upon the men in the boat and killed four of them, for which reason it was called Murderers Bay. Here they seemed to be embayed, but on the fourth of January 1643, came up with the N. W. cape of this land, and finding an island there, called it Three Kings Island; and going thither to refresh, they saw some large men, but could not understand them. Hence they directed their course north-east, till in 22 degrees 35 minutes they saw a small island, which they could not come at, but called it Piilstreets Island. Jan. 21. in 21 degrees 20 minutes they called two islands, the one Amsterdam, the other Zealand: on the first they got many hogs, hens, and all sorts of fruit. The inhabitants were friendly, had no weapons, and seemed to know no evil, but that they would steal. In the latter of these islands they saw gardens with square beds and trees regularly planted. Leaving this place they saw many islands as they stood northward, and in 17 degrees 19 minutes they run among eighteen or twenty islands, which in the charts are called Prince William's Islands, or Hemskirk's Shoals. Directing their course now N. or N. N. W. after much foul weather, on the twenty second of March in 5 degrees 2 minutes south-latitude they had sight of land four miles west of them, being about twenty islands, called in the charts Ontbong Java, about ninety miles from the coast of New-Guinea. March the twenty fifth in 4 degrees 35 minutes they were up with the islands of Mark, found before by William Schbouten, and John le Mair: the natives are savage, and have their hair tied up. March the twenty ninth they passed by Green-Island, the thirtieth by S. John's Island, and April the first in 4 degrees 30 minutes they reached the coast of New-Guinea at a cape called by the Spaniards, Santa Maria, and run along the coast to the promontory called Struis Hook, where the land bends to the south and south-east, as they did to find a passage to the south, but were forced to turn to the west. April the twenty eighth they came to the burning island, where they saw a great fire come out of the hill, and sailing betwixt the island and the main saw many fires. At the islands Jama and Moa they got refreshment. May the twelfth in only 54 minutes of south-latitude, they sailed along the side of William Schouten's island, which seems to be well inhabited; and the eighteenth they came to the west-end of New-Guinea, and on the fifteenth of June return'd to Batavia, having finished the voyage in ten months, Thevenot, vol. 2.

An. 1643. A Dutch ship sailing to the northward of Japan, came upon a coast in 39 degrees 45 minutes latitude. Running up as far as 43 degrees, they saw several villages near one another, and say there are about them many mines of silver. The land in some places seemed to bear no grass, but the sea was very full of fish. In 44 degrees 30 minutes, they went ashore in a mountainous country, supposed to be full of silver mines. In 46 degrees the land resembled the coast of England, the soil being good, but the natives do not till it. In 48 degrees there are small hills covered with short grass. In 45 degrees 50 minutes is an island which the Dutch call Staten island, and beyond it the companies land, another island: in this they found a sort of mineral earth, that looked as if it had been all silver. In 45 degrees they observed, that though the land was not cultivated it yielded very good fruit of several sorts, the sea-shore was covered with rose-trees, and on the rocks many large oysters, but on the land they saw no beast but one bear. The inhabitants of this land of Eso, or Yedso, for so it is called, are all strong set, thick, with long hair and beards good features, no flat noses, black eyes, a fallow complexion, and very hairy about their bodies: the women are not so black as the men, some of them cut their hair, and others tie it up. They seem to have no religion nor government, every man has two wives, who serve him at home and abroad: they are very jealous of their women, love drinking, look like savages, but yet are very civil and obliging to strangers: their houses are only small cottages, and but a few of them together: they eat the fat and oil of whales, all sorts of fish and herbs, and rose-buds are their greatest dainty. Their clothes are some of silk and some of the skins of beasts. They use bows and arrows to kill wild beasts, and they spin hemp. They trade with the Japoneses, whom they furnish with train-oil, whales tongues smoaked, furs, several sorts of feathers, for which they receive rice, sugar, silk, and other coarser garments, copper-pipes, tobacco-boxes, and varnished dishes and vessels for their meat and drink, pendants for their ears, copper ear-rings, hatchets, knives, &c. The capital of the country is small, they call it Matsmay, where the prince or governor of the country resides, who every year goes over to pay his respects to the emperor of Japan, and carry him presents. This is what the Dutch discovered, but a Japonese told them this land of Eso, or Yedso, was an island, Thevenot, tom. 1.

An. 169 $\frac{1}{2}$. On the fourteenth of January captain Dampier in his majesty's ship the Roe-Buck, sailed from the Downs upon a new discovery, touched at the Canaries and isles of Cabo Verde, and the twenty fifth of March came to an anchor in Bakia de Todos Santos, or the Bay of All Saints in Brazil. April the twenty third he left this place, and the third of April saw the land about the cape of Good Hope. August the first having run from Brazil a hundred and fourteen degrees, he made in to the shore of New-Holland in 26 degrees south-latitude, thinking to put into some harbour; but finding rocks and foul ground, stood out to sea again till August the sixth, when he came to an anchor in 25 degrees at an opening, which he called Sharks Bay, where he could get no fresh water, but plenty of wood, and refreshed the men with raccoons, tortoises, sharks, and other fish, and some sorts of fowl. He sounded most of this bay, and on the fourteenth sailed out of it, coasting as the weather would permit to the northward, and then to the north-east, as the coast runs, where in 20 degrees 21 minutes he found several islands, and going ashore on some of them could get no fresh water, nor see any inhabitants so he continued along the shore as near as could be with safety, till on the thirtieth he anchored in eight fathom water, where he saw some of the natives, but could not take any. Looking for water none was found, and digging pits they got some that was brackish and not fit to drink. Finding no water or other refreshment on this coast, in the beginning of September he stood over for the island Timor, where he took in fresh water, and on the third of December arrived on the coast of New-Guinea, and had some commerce with the inhabitants of an island called Pulo Sabuti. Then passing to the northward, and to the easternmost part of New-Guinea, he found it did not join to the main land of New-Guinea, but was an island which he called New-Britain. Having discovered thus far, and being unprovided to proceed, he returned by Timor and Java, to the cape of Good Hope, an island of S. Helena. At the island of the Ascension his ship foundered, but the men were saved, and returned to England aboard the East-India ship called the Canterbury. Dampier's voyage to New-Holland, being his third volume.

The voyages round the world which, for so many thousand years as past from the creation till the discovery of the West-Indies, could never so much as enter into the thoughts of man, and which after they were performed gave just subject of admiration, do well deserve to be mentioned apart from all others, as being the boldest action that could be undertaken, and to be performed but one way, though several attempts have been made to find out others, as has been shewed in the fruitless voyages for discovery of the north-east and north-west passages: for this reason they have been reserved for this place, where something shall be said of all hitherto performed, but more particularly of the first, as the most glorious and honourable, because it shewed the way to all that followed. This wonderful enterprise was undertaken and performed after this manner.

An. 1519. Ferdinand de Magalbaens, or as we corruptly call him, Magellan, by nation a Portuguese, by descent a gentleman, and by profession a soldier and seaman, having served his prince well both in Africk and India, and being ill rewarded, renounced his country, disnaturalizing himself as the custom then was, and offered his service to the emperor Charles the fifth, then king of Spain. He had long before conceived an opinion, that another way might be found to India, and particularly to the Molucco islands, besides the common track by the cape of Good Hope followed by the Portugueses. This he proposed to the emperor with such assurance of performing what he promised, that he had the command of five ships given him, and in them two hundred and fifty men: with this Squadron he sailed from S. Lucar de Barrameda on the twentieth of September, the aforesaid year 1519. Being come to the river called Rio de Janeiro on the coast of Brasil, and near 23 degrees of south-latitude, some discontent began to appear among the men, which was soon blown over; but proceeding to the bay of S. Julian in 49 degrees of latitude, where they were forced to winter, the mutiny grew so high, three of the captains and most of the men being engaged, that Magellan having in vain endeavoured to appease it by fair means, was forced to use his authority, executing two of the said captains, and setting the third with a priest who had sided with them ashore among the wild Indians. This done, he proceeded on his voyage, and on the twenty first of October 1520, having been out above a year discovered the cape, which he called Cabo de la Virgines, or the Virgins Cape, because that day was the feast of S. Ursula, and the eleven thousand virgins; and there turned into the strait he went in search of, which from him to this day is called the strait of Magellan: it lies in 52 degrees of south-latitude, is about a hundred leagues in length, in some parts a league wide, in some more, in some less, but all narrow, and enclosed with high land on both sides, some bare, some covered with woods, and some of the loftiest mountains with snow. Having sailed about 50 leagues in this strait, they discovered another branch of it, and Magellan sent one of his ships to bring him some account of it; but the seamen being parted from him took the opportunity, and confining their captain for opposing their design, returned into Spain, spending eight months in their return. Magellan having expected beyond the time appointed, and finding they did not return to him, proceeded through the strait, and came into the South-sea with only three ships, having lost one in his passage, but all the men saved, and another as was said being stolen away from him. The last land of the strait he called Cabo Deseado, or the Desired Cape, because it was the end of his desired passage to the South-sea. The cold being somewhat sharp, he thought good to draw nearer to the equinoctial, and accordingly steered west north-west. In this manner he sailed three months and twenty days without seeing land, which reduced them to such straits, that they were forced to eat all the old leather they had aboard, and to drink stinking water, of which nineteen men died, and near thirty were so weak, that they could do no service. After fifteen hundred leagues sailing he found a small island in 88 degrees of south-latitude, and two hundred leagues further another, but nothing considerable in them; and therefore held on his course, till in about 12 degrees of north-latitude, he came to those islands which he called De los Ladrones, or of Thieves, because the natives hovered about his ships in their boats, and coming aboard, stole every thing they could lay hold of. Finding no good to be done here, he sailed again, and discovering a great number of islands together, he gave that sea the name of Archipelago de S. Lazaro, the islands being those we now call the Philippines. On the twenty eighth of March he anchored by the island of Butbuan, where he was friendly received, and got some gold; then removed to the isle of Messana, at a small distance from the other, and thence to that of Cebu. Magellan having hitherto succeeded so well, stood over to the island Matan, where not agreeing with the natives he came to a battle, and was killed in it with eight of his men. After this disaster the rest sailed over to the island Bobol, and being too weak to carry home their three ships, burnt one of them, after taking out the cannon and all that could be of use to them. Being now reduced to two ships, they made away to the south-west west in search of the Molucco islands, and instead of them fell into the great one of Borneo, where they made some short stay, being friendly received; and departing thence, with the assistance of Indian pilots arrived at length at the Moluccos on the eighth of November 1521, in the twenty seventh month after their departure from Spain, and anchored in the port of Tidore, one of the chief of those islands, where they were lovingly treated by the king, who concluded a peace, and took an oath ever to continue in amity with the king of Spain. Here they traded for cloves, exchanging the commodities they brought to their own content: when they were to depart, finding one of the ships leaky, and unfit for so long a voyage, they left her behind to refit, and then sailed for Spain as soon as possible. The other ship called the Victoria, commanded by John Sebastian Cano, and carrying forty six Spaniards, and thirteen Indians, took its course to the south-west, and coming to the island Malva, near that of Timor, in 11 degrees of south-latitude, staid there fifteen days to stop some leaks they discovered in her. On the twenty fifth of January 1522, they left this place, and the next day touched at Timor, whence they went not till the eleventh of February, when they took their way to the southward, resolving to leave all India, and the islands to the northward, to avoid meeting the Portugueses, who were powerful in those seas, and would obstruct their passage: therefore they run into 40 degrees of south-latitude before they doubled the cape of Good Hope, about which they spent seven weeks beating it out against contrary winds, so that their provisions began to fail, and many men grew sick, which made some entertain thoughts of turning back to Mozambique, but others opposed it. In fine, after two months more hardships, in which they lost twenty one of their company, they were forced to put into the island of S. James, being one of those of Cabo Verde, where with much intreaty they obtained some small relief of provisions; but thirteen of them going ashore again for some rice the Portugueses had promised to supply them with, were detained ashore, which made those that were left aboard the ship hoist sail and put to sea, fearing the like treachery might surprize them, and on the seventh of September arrived safe at S. Lucar, below the city Sevil, where after firing all their guns for joy, they repaired to the great church in their shirts and barefoot to return thanks to God. The ship that performed this wonderful voyage was called the Victoria, as was said before, the commander's name was John Sebastian Cano, who was well rewarded and honoured by the emperor. This was the first voyage round the world, which we shall soon see followed by other nations; and this was the discovery of the strait of Magellan, which made the voyage practicable. The other Spanish ship we mentioned to be left at the Moluccos to stop her leaks, attempted to return the way it came to Panama, but after struggling above four months with the easterly winds, most of the men dying, and the rest being almost starved, it went back to the Moluccos, where it was taken by the Portugueses; and the few men that survived after being kept two years in India, were sent to Spain in the Portuguese ships. Herrera, dec. 2. lib. The second voyage round the world was begun

An. 1577. By Mr. Francis, afterwards sir Francis Drake, with five ships and barks, and a hundred and sixty four men, who sailed from Phymouth on the thirteenth of December, and on the twenty fifth of the same month touched at cape Cantin on the African coast, in 31 degrees of north-latitude; on the seventeenth of January 1578, at cape Blanco on the same coast, and 21 degrees of latitude, and then at the islands of Cabo Verde. Departing thence, they sailed fifty four days without seeing land, and on the fifth of April came upon the coast of Brasil, where they watered, and proceeded to the mouth of the river of Plate in 36 degrees of south-latitude. Sailing hence, on the twenty seventh of April they put into a port in the latitude of 46 degrees, where Drake burnt a flyboat that attended him, after saving all that could be of use. On the twentieth of June he again put into a good harbour, called Port S. Julian, in the latitude of 49 degrees, and continued there till the seventeenth of August, when putting to sea again, he entered the straits of Magellan on the twenty first of the same month. What sort of straits these are was described in Magellan's voyage, and therefore needs no repetition. Here on an island they found fowl that could not fly, as big as geese, whereof they killed three thousand, which was good provision; and they entered the South-sea on the sixth of September. Hence they were drove by a storm to the southward as far as the latitude of 57 degrees 20 minutes, and anchored among certain islands; whence removing to a good bay, they saw many men and women naked in canoes, and traded with them for such things as they had. Steering away again to the northward, they found three islands, and in one of them an incredible quantity of fowl; but on the eighth of October they lost sight of one of their ships commanded by by Mr. Winter, which the rest supposed to be cast away, but it was put back by the tempest into the strait of Magellan, and returned home the same way it came. Drake with the rest sailed for the coast of Chile, and sending for water at the island Mocha, two of his men were killed by the Indians, which made him depart without it. This island is on the coast of Chile in 39 degrees of south-latitude. Coasting still along, he came to the bay of Valparaiso, where he found a Spanish ship with only eight Spaniards and three Blacks in her, whom he surpris'd and took, and then going ashore plundered nine houses, being all there were in that which they called the town of Santiago. At Coquimbo in 29 degrees 30 minutes of latitude fourteen men landing, one of them was killed by the Spaniards, the rest fled back to their ships. Not far from thence landing for fresh water, they met one single Spaniard and an Indian boy driving eight Lamas, or Peru sheep loaded with silver, which they took. Running on thence to Arica on the coast of Peru in 18 degrees 30 minutes latitude, he plundered three barks, in which was some quantity of silver, but not one man. Hence he advanced to the port of Lima in 12 degrees of latitude, and after rifling what little was in them cut the cables of 12 vessels that lay there, letting them drive wheresoever the water would carry them, there being no man aboard, as having never seen an enemy in those seas. Near cape S. Francis in 1 degree of north-latitude he took a rich ship called Cacafuego, and a little further another. Then he plundered Guatulco, and after refitting his ship in a small island run away to the northward into 43 degrees of latitude, where feeling much cold he returned into 38 degrees, and there put into a large bay on the coast of California, which Drake called Nova Albion. Here he was well received by the people, and continued some time, and sailing hence directed his course for the Molucco islands, seeing no land till the thirteenth day of October, when he discovered the islands de los Ladrones in eight degrees of north-latitude. On the fourteenth of November he fell in with the Molucco islands, and came to an anchor in that of Ternate, the king whereof came aboard Drake's ship, offering him all the island could afford; and he having taken in what was most necessary and could be had there, went over to a small island south of Celebes, where he grav'd his ship, and fitted her to return home, which took him up twenty six days. Thinking to return to the Moluccos, they were drove by contrary-winds to the northward of the island Celebes, till turning again to the southward for fear of the many small islands in that sea, the ship on a sudden sat upon a rock, where it was feared she would have perished; but lightning her of three tun of cloves, eight guns and some provisions, she got off. On the eighth of February 1579, they fell in with the island Barateve, where they refreshed themselves after their fatigues, and took in store of such provisions as the place afforded, the natives proving very friendly, and bartering their commodities for linen. Being well furnished with all necessaries, they left this place, and again made some stay at the island of Java, the natives by their civility inviting them to it. Thence they steered directly for the cape of Good Hope, which was the first land they came near from Java, yet touched not there, nor at any other place till they came to Sierra Leona, the westernmost point of Guinea, in 8 degrees of north-latitude, on the twenty second of July, and there recruited themselves with provisions. Departing thence on the twenty fourth, they arrived in England on the third of November 1580, and the third year after their departure. This relation is to be seen at large in Hackluyt, vol. III. p. 742. and in Purchas, vol. I. lib. II. p. 46.

An. 1586. Mr. Thomas, afterwards sir Thomas Candish, undertook the third voyage round the world with three small vessels, one of a hundred and twenty, the second of sixty, and the third of forty tuns burden, all fitted out at his own charges; and sailed from Plymouth on the twenty first of July 1586. On the twenty third of August he put into a bay on the coast of Africk, and destroyed there a village of the Blacks, because they killed a man with a poisoned arrow. After some days spent about this place, he sailed away south-west, and on the first of November put in between the island of S. Sebastian, and the continent of Brazil, in 24 degrees of south-latitude, where the men were set to work ashore to build a pinnace, make hoops for the casks, and fill fresh water, which took them up till the twenty third of the month, when sailing again on the seventeenth of December, they entered port Desire in 47 degrees and a half of latitude, and that being a convenient place for the purpose careened their ships, and refitted what was amiss. The third day of January 1587, they anchored at the mouth of the straits of Magellan, the weather being very stormy, which lasted three days, all which time they continued there, but lost an anchor, and the sixth day entered the strait. The seventh as they drew near the narrow part of the strait they took a Spaniard, being one of the twenty three that still remained alive, which were all then left of five hundred landed there three years before to guard the strait, the rest being dead with hunger. These had built a town, which they called king Philip's city, and fortified it, but they could make no works against famine, which consumed them all to those before mentioned, who except him that was taken were gone along the coast, hoping to get to the river of Plate. Candish having wooded and watered here, called this place Port Famine. The weather proving very boisterous and foul, he was forced to ride it out often at anchor, and therefore did not get out into the South-sea till the twenty fourth of February. On the first of March a violent storm parted the bark of forty tons from the other two ships, and they met not before the fifteenth betwixt the island of S. Mary and the continent of Chile, in 37 degrees and a half of south-latitude. Here they took in as much corn as they would have, and abundance of potatoes, all which had been laid up in the island for the Spaniards, besides as many hogs as they could salt, abundance of hens, and five hundred dried dog-fishes. The eighteenth they left this place, and on the last of the month landed at Punia de Quenuro in 33 degrees of latitude, but saw no man, though they travelled some miles, only spied some herds of very wild cattle; but the first of April going to water, the men were set upon by the Spaniards, and twelve of them cut off. Proceeding hence along the coast of Chile and Peru, they took some coasting vessels carrying provisions from one place to another. In this manner they ran along to the island Puna, in about 3 degrees of south-latitude, being a place famous for supplying all those coasts with cables. Here the English took what they found for their use, the island being inhabited by none but Indians, except some few Spaniards that lived in the chief town, who killed twelve of the English, but were put to flight, and the town burnt, as was the church particularly, and the bells carried away. This second loss of men obliged Candish to sink his bark of forty tons, that had attended him out of England. On the twelfth of June they cut the equinoctial line, and holding on their course to the northward all that month, on the first of July came upon the coast of New-Spain; where on the ninth they took and burnt a ship with seven men in her, and soon after a bark, whose men were fled to shore. The twenty sixth day they anchored at Copalita, in 16 degrees of north-latitude, whence they went with thirty men to Aquatulco a small Indian town, which they burnt and rifled. Then keeping along that coast, they continued ravaging the Indian towns, till they came to a small island in 23 degrees of latitude, and eleven leagues from the city Cbiamelan; where having watered, and staid till the ninth of November, they then stood over to cape S. Lucar, which is the southermost point of California, and beating about it till the fourth of November, met then with the S. Ann, being the Spanish galeon bound from the Philippine islands to the port of Acapulco in New-Spain. After a fight of six hours the galeon was taken and carried into the port called Puerto Seguro; where setting ashore the Spaniards, and taking out what goods they could carry, they burnt the galeon, and on the nineteenth of November sailed thence towards India. This night Candish, who was in the Desire, lost his other ship called the Content, and never saw her after. Being thus left alone he sailed before the wind, as is usual there, for the space of forty five days, and on the third of January 1588. came up with the islands de los Ladrones, having run about eighteen hundred leagues; on the fourteenth with cape Espiritu Santo, a great head-land of one of the Philippine islands to the westward in 13 degrees of latitude, and about three hundred leagues from the islands Ladrones. At the island Cabul he continued some days getting fresh provisions, and sailing amidst all those islands south-west and by south, on the eighth of February discovered the island Batobina near Gilolo, in 1 degree of south-latitude; whence he steered to the south side of the great island of Java, and touching there on the twelfth of March, traded with the natives for provisions, which were brought him in great plenty. On the sixteenth he set sail for the cape of Good Hope, and doubled it about the middle of May; having spent nine weeks betwixt the island of Java and this place, which is about eighteen hundred leagues distance. On the ninth of June he anchored at the island of S. Helena, about five hundred leagues distant from the cape of Good Hope, lying betwixt the coast of Africk and Brasil, in about 15 degrees of south-latitude. This island is generally touched at by ships going to and returning from the East-Indies, because of the conveniency of watering, besides the great plenty it produces of excellent fruit, as also abundance of fowl, swine, and goats, the place being extremely pleasant, but very small. Having taken in wood and water here, and made clean the ship, on the twentieth of June Candish sailed for England; on the twenty fourth of August he discovered the island Flores and Corvo, two of the Azores, and on the ninth of September after a terrible storm, which carried away part of his sails, put into the port of Plymouth. Hackluyt, vol. III. p. 803. and Purchas, vol. I. lib. II. p. 57.

An. 1598. The Dutch resolving to perform as much as had been done before by Magellan's ship, and by sir Francis Drake and sir Thomas Candish, they fitted out four ships under the command of captain Olivier d'Oirt, as Van Meteren calls him, or Oliver Noort, according to Purchas. The rest proceeded on their voyage upon the nineteenth of July; and to omit particulars of less moment, and their touching at places not material, on the tenth of December they came to the Prince's Island, or Ilha do Principe on the coast of Congo, in 2 degrees of north-latitude; where the Portugueses killed some of their men, and the Dutch commander in revenge assaulting their fort, was repulsed with greater loss. This made him desist; and sailing thence, on the fifth of February 1599. came on the coast of Brasil. Here they spent much time, seeking refreshment and water along the shore, and being much shaken by a storm, and abundance of the men sick, besides, that it was the winter season there, they put into a little island called S. Clare, on the coast of Brasil, in about 21 degrees of south-latitude. Here the sick men being set ashore, some of them presently died; the rest ailing nothing but the scurvy, were cured with eating four plumbs they found there. One of the ships being very leaky, was here burnt, after all that could be of use had been taken out of her. On the sixteenth of July they left this place, steering for Port Desire in 47 degrees; and after many storms put into it on the twentieth of September, carened their ships, and took abundance of fowl. Some men were here killed by the Indians. Departing hence on the twenty ninth, they came to cape Virgines at the mouth of the strait of Magellan, on the fourth of November; where they met with storms of wind, rain, hail, and snow, besides much sickness and contention among themselves, having been from home fifteen months, before they could get into the strait: so that it was the last of February 1600. before they came out into the South-sea. March the twelfth they lost sight of the vice-admiral, and sailed without him to the island Mocha, in 38 degrees south. Another ship missing the island of S. Marias, and being drove by necessity to make the continent for provisions, lost most of its men ashore, the rest putting to sea with the vessel. Being now in fear of the Spanish men of war, he directed his course with the two ships he had left for the islands de los Ladrones, which he had sight of on the fifteenth of September; and on the fourteenth of October discovered the island of Laxon or Manila, the chief of the Philip-pines. Near this island he met the two Spanish ships bound thence for New-Spain; and after a desperate fight, Noort sunk one of them; but at the same time the other took his second ship, and he made all haste away to Borneo, but made no stay there for fear of the natives, who attempted to cut his cable; and therefore sailing hence, he traded for pepper at Java, and at length returned by the cape of Good Hope, and isle of S. Helena, arriving at Amsterdam on the twenty sixth of August 1601. Purchas, vol. I. lib. M. p. 71. Van Meteren, lib. XXIII.

An. 1614. George Spilbergen, commander of five Dutch ships, sailed out of the Texel on the eighth of August, and entered the strait of Magellan on the twenty eighth of March 1615. but being drove out again by contrary winds, he re-entered on the second of April. In the strait they continued going ashore on the fourth side upon the land called Tierra del Fuego, known since to be an island, till the sixth of May; when they came out into the South-sea, which received them with storms, and on the twenty sixth came up with the island la Mocha, on the coast of Chile, mentioned in all the former voyages. Here they traded with the Indians, exchanging hatchets, and other utensils, as also coral, for large Peru sheep, which serve not only to eat, but to carry burdens. Landing at the island of S. Mary on the 29th, they had a skirmish with some few Spaniards, and got some booty of sheep. Ruaving along the coast, they touched at Valparaiso, cape Quintero, and other places; but finding the Spaniards every where had taken the alarm, they durst not do any thing ashore. July the seventeenth keeping along the shores of Peru, they discovered eight Spanish ships set out to engage them. That very night they engaged, and after a hot dispute, three of the Spanish ships sunk. In this action they had forty men killed, and sixty wounded. Drawing too near the shore at Collao the port of Lima, the Huntsman, one of the Dutch ships, was almost sunk with a thirty six pounder, which made them keep further off: and holding their course to the northward, they took the little town of Peita. Therefore August the twenty first they set out to sea again, and beat about in bad weather till the eleventh of October, when they put into the harbour of Acapulco in New-Spain, and there exchanged the prisoners they had taken for provisions. Which done, they run up into twenty degrees of north latitude, and on the twenty sixth of November stood over for the islands de los Ladrones. In January following, which was the year 1616, many of the men died of diseases. On the twenty third of the same month they discovered the Ladrones, and on the ninth of February cape
Espiritu

Espiritu Santo, the easternmost point of the Philippine islands to the northward; passing among which, they arrived at Ternate, the chief of the Moluccos, on the twenty ninth of March, which the Dutch in the island reckoned the twenty eighth; the fleet by following the course of the sun having lost a day, whereas they that sail round to the eastward gain a day. About these islands they continued some months, and arrived at Jacatra in the island of Java on the fifteenth of September, on the thirtieth of March 1617. at the island of S. Helena, and in July following in Zealand. Purchas, vol. I. lib. 2. p. 80.

An. 1615. Isaac le Maier a merchant of Amsterdam, and William Cornelison Schouten of Horn, resolving to find out a new way to the East Indies, besides those already known by the cape of Good Hope and strait of Magellan; at their own charges fitted out a good ship of three hundred and sixty tun and twenty guns, and a smaller of an hundred and ten tun and eight guns, in which they sailed themselves out of the Texel on the sixteenth of June in the afore-said year, resolving to find another passage into the South-sea, to the southward of the strait of Magellan; which their design they kept secret, till they came near the line, where they discovered it to the seamen, who were well pleased with the undertaking. To pass by all other particulars, as too like those in the foregoing voyages, on the ninth of December they sailed up into Port Desire, on the coast of America, in 47 degrees and 40 minutes of south latitude; where bringing their ships ashore to clean them, as they were burning reeds under the lesser of them, she took fire, and burnt till the tide coming up, quenched the flame; yet so that nothing of her could be saved, but a little wood for fuel and the iron-work. The thirteenth of January 1616. the great ship now left alone sailed out of Port Desire, and on the twenty fifth discovered the island they called Staten-land to the eastward, and the point of Tierra del Fuego to the westward, which they called Maurice-land, in almost 55 degrees of south latitude. Entering betwixt these two lands, they steered south south-west, till coming under 55 degrees 36 minutes, they stood south-west, and then south. Thus the twenty sixth they came under 57 degrees, and the twenty ninth discovered those they called Barnevelts islands. The third of February they were under 59 degrees 25 minutes, and the twelfth found the straits of Magellan lay east of them; and therefore being satisfied that they were in the South-sea, they called the new-found passage the strait of Le Maire. March the first they came near the islands of John Fernandez, in 33 degrees 40 minutes of south latitude, and at some distance from the coast of Cbile: but tho' they endeavoured it, could never come near enough to anchor, being still beaten off by the wind and current, and therefore steered away to the westward to prosecute their voyage; and in April they discovered several small islands inhabited by naked people, none of whom would come aboard, nor could they come to an anchor. These islands were in about 14 and 15 degrees of south latitude. Sailing on still westward, they saw many more islands in May, and had some trade with the natives, who attempted to surprize the ship, or at least the boat; but were soon scared away by the fire-arms, when they saw they did execution, for before they thought they had only made a noise. Finding no continent, and perceiving they were at least sixteen hundred leagues to the westward of Cbile or Peru, they steered to the northward, for fear they should fall south of New-Guinea, and perhaps not be able to clear themselves of the coast, the winds being always at east. Many more islands are mentioned in the journal, at some of which they touched and got refreshment; but on the first of July they anchored near the coast of New-Guinea, whence they sailed still along the shore, and amidst a multitude of islands, till they came into half a degree of south latitude, where they saw a small island off the shore of the land of Papous, and called it William Schouten's Island, after the captain's name, and the westernmost point of it the cape of Good Hope. September the 17th they arriv'd at the island Ternate, and thence in October to Jacatra, or Batavia in the island of Java; where the president of the Dutch East-India company seized the ship and goods. Whereupon William Cornelison Schouten the master, Jacob le Maire the merchant, and ten seamen put themselves aboard the Amsterdam, a Dutch ship homewards bound, and twelve others aboard the Zealand, and arrived in safety at Amsterdam in July; having discovered the new strait called le Maire, as was said before, and performed the voyage round the world in two years and eighteen days. Purchas, vol. I. lib. 2. p. 88.

An. 1643. Brewer, or Brower, went another way into the South-sea, by a passage called after his own name, which is east of le Maire's strait; but whether this was a strait with land on each side, or an open sea, is not known, his diary not being made publick: but most maps make it a new strait.

An. 1683. one John Cook sailed from Virginia in a ship of eight guns and fifty two men a buccaneering; and with him one Cowley, as master. On the coast of Guinea they they took a ship of forty guns by surprize, in which they sailed away to the South-sea, meeting by the way another ship commanded by one Eaton, who joined them to follow the same trade. They ran into 60 degrees of south latitude, and passed that way into the South-sea, where Cowley says they discovered several islands about the line. Thence they sailed over to the Ladrones, whence they continued their course, and anchored at Canton in China. Departing Canton, they came to the island Borneo, where Cowley, the author of this relation, with nineteen others, got a great boat in which they went away to Java. At Batavia the author, with two others, shipped himself aboard a Dutch vessel, and so returned to Europe. The relation of this voyage is shortned, because there have been so many voyages round the world before, and all of them performed in the same ship; whereas in this there was much shifting. Those that desire may see it at large in the collection of original voyages, published by capt. Will Hack, An. 1699.

Captain Dampier in his first book of voyages gives an account of this same last mentioned, but more at large, he being aboard with the same Cook; and therefore no more needs be said of it, tho' there may be many circumstances which this discourse cannot descend to: wherefore here shall end the voyages round the world, it being time to proceed to what remains.

After so long a discourse of voyages and discoveries, it may seem superfluous to treat of the advantages the publick receives by navigation, and the faithful journals and accounts of travellers. The matter is natural, and no man can read the one without being sensible of the other; and therefore a few words may suffice on this subject, to avoid cloying the judicious reader with what is so visible and plain, and to save running out this introduction to an unreasonable length. What was cosmography before these discoveries, but an imperfect fragment of a science, scarce deserving so good a name? When all the known world was only Europe, a small part of Africa, and the lesser portion of Asia; so that of this terraqueous globe not one sixth part had ever been seen or heard of. Nay, so great was the ignorance of man in this particular, that learned persons made a doubt of its being round; others no less knowing imagined all they were not acquainted with, desert and uninhabitable. But now geography and hydrography have received some perfection by the pains of so many mariners and travellers, who to evince the rotundity of the earth and water, have sailed and travelled round it, as has been here made appear; to shew there is no part uninhabitable, unless the frozen polar regions, have visited all other countries, tho' never so remote, which they have found well peopled, and most of them rich and delightful; and to demonstrate the Antipodes, have pointed them out to us. Astronomy has received the addition of many constellations never seen before. Natural and moral history is embellished with the most beneficial increase of so many thousands of plants it had never before received, so many drugs and spices, such variety of beasts, birds and fishes, such rarities in minerals, mountains and waters, such unaccountable diversity of climates and men, and in them of complexions, tempers, habits, manners, politicks, and religions. Trade is raised to the highest pitch, each part of the world supplying the other with what it wants, and bringing home what is accounted most precious and valuable; and this not in a niggard and scanty manner, as when the Venetians served all Europe with spice and drugs from India by the way of Turky and the Red Sea; or as when gold and silver were only drawn from some poor European and African mines; but with plenty and affluence, as we now see, most nations resorting freely to the East-Indies, and the West yearly sending forth prodigious quantities of the most esteemed and valuable metals. To conclude, the empire of Europe is now extended to the utmost bounds of the earth where several of its nations have conquests and colonies. These and many more are the advantages drawn from the labours of those who expose themselves to the dangers of the vast ocean, and of unknown nations; which those who sit still at home abundantly reap in every kind: and the relation of one traveller is an incentive to stir up another to imitate him, whilst the rest of mankind, in their accounts without stirring a foot, compass the earth and seas, visit all countries, and converse with all nations.

It only remains to give some few directions for such as go on long voyages; which shall be those drawn up by Mr. Rook, a fellow of the Royal Society, and geometry professor of Gresham college, by order of the said society, and published in the philosophical transactions of the eighth of January 1665-6, being Numb. 8. They are as follow:

1. To observe the declination of the compass, or its variation from the meridian of the place, frequently; marking withal the latitude and longitude of the place where such observation is made, as exactly as may be, and setting down the method by which they made them.

2. To carry dipping needles with them, and observe the inclination of the needle in like manner.

3. To remark carefully the ebbings and flowings of the sea in as many places as they can, together with all the accidents ordinary and extraordinary of the tides; as, their precise time of ebbing and flowing in rivers, at promontories or capes, which way the current runs, what perpendicular distance there is between the highest tide and lowest ebb, during the spring tides and neep tides, what day of the moon's age, and what times of the year the highest and lowest tides fall out: and all other considerable accidents they can observe in the tides, chiefly near ports, and about islands, as in S. Helena's island, and the three rivers there, at the Bermudas, &c.

4. To make plots and draughts of prospect of coasts, promontories, islands and ports, marking the bearings and distances as near as they can.

5. To sound and mark the depth of coasts and ports, and such other places near the shore, as they shall think fit.

6. To take notice of the nature of the ground at the bottom of the sea, in all soundings, whether it be clay, sand, rock, &c.

7. To keep a register of all changes of wind and weather at all hours, by night and by day, shewing the point the wind blows from, whether strong or weak: the rains, hail, snow, and the like; the precise times of their beginnings and continuance, especially hurricanes and spouts; but above all, to take exact care to observe the trade-winds, about what degree of latitude and longitude the first begin, where and when they cease or change, or grow stronger or weaker, and how much, as near and exact as may be.

8. To observe and record all extraordinary meteors, lightnings, thunders, ignes fatui, comets, &c. marking still the places and times of their appearing, continuance, &c.

9. To carry with them good scales, and glass-vials of a pint, or so, with very narrow mouths, which are to be filled with sea-water in different degrees of latitude, as often as they please, and the weight of the vial full of water taken exactly at every time, and recorded, marking withal the degree of latitude, and the day of the month; and that as well of water near the top, as at a greater depth.

This may suffice for sea-voyages; but in regard it may be expected something should be said for those who travel by land, a few instructions have been collected from experienced travellers, who are best able to direct such as design to follow them into remote countries. We will therefore begin with monsieur de Bourges, who with the bishop of Berytus made a journey through Turky, Persia and India, as far as Cochinchina. He advises such as intend for those parts so to order their affairs, that they may come into Turky in October, to avoid the excessive heats of those countries for four or five months before that time. If our traveller will hold on his journey to Persia, he must go with the caravan from Aleppo to Babylon, or Bagdat, which will take him up a month; thence he embarks upon the river Euphrates, which carries him down to Bassora, whence he proceeds by sea to Bander, where he may find convenience by land to Ispahan, the capital of Persia: From Ispahan the difficulties of travelling by land to India are almost invincible, and therefore the proper way is to repair to the port of Gomron, whence there is a constant and safe passage to Suratte, or any other part of India. All persons that travel in Turky must change their habit into that of the country, and must lay aside the hat, and wear a turbant, and the meaner the habit the safer they will be from extortions and robberies: They must endeavour to have a Turkish interpreter on the road with them, who may own whatever goods they carry, and protect them against any affronts that may be offered them; but above all, they must endeavour to be well recommended to the captain of the caravan, which will be their greatest safeguard. This recommendation must be from some of the christian consuls, but generally the best from the French, who are much regarded in those parts. Such as will not carry all their stock in ready money, must be careful to carry those commodities that will turn to best account, amongst which the brightest yellow amber, and the largest red coral, are in great esteem. These, tho' not wrought, are profitable; and to avoid the duties paid at several places, may be carried in a bag, or portmanteau on the horse the traveller rides, for those are not searched. The best money they can carry are Spanish pieces of eight, provided they be full weight, and not of Peru, which are not so fine silver as the others. By this money they will have seven or eight per cent. profit in some parts, and ten per cent. in others, and the same in French crowns. As for gold, the greatest profit is made of the Venetian and Hungarian, and it is very considerable. There is so great an advantage to be made by those who rightly understand the best coins and their value, that those who are well instructed in it can travel for a very inconsiderable expence. It is absolutely necessary to carry good arms to defend themselves upon all occasions, but more particularly cularly to fight the Arabs, and other rovers. Above all, it is requisite in Turky that travellers be armed with patience to bear many affronts the infidels will put upon them, and with prudence and moderation to prevent; as much as possibly may be, any such insolencies. They will do well never to go without provisions, because the caravans never stop to bait, and very often at night have no other inn but the open fields, where they lie in tents, and eat what they carry. When they travel with the caravan, they must take care never to be far from it, for fear of being devoured by wild beasts, or by the wilder Arabs. This in Turky, for in Persia it is quite otherwise; here we may travel in the European habit, and wear hats, which are better against the heat than turbants; the roads are safe, and the Persians courteous to strangers, especially the better sort. However, the traveller must watch the servants, and meaner sort of people of the country, who else will impose upon him in matter of payments, of buying and selling; and therefore his best way is, where there are missionaries to repair to them, who will assist and instruct him. He must carry no gold into Persia, because it bears a low price, and he will be a great loser by it: The best way is to change his money on the Turkish frontiers into Persian coin, or else to carry a quantity of good amber and coral, which will yield profit, as will also gold watches. In India Spanish gold yields some profit, tho' small, which the traveller may take notice of, in case he has no goods to carry that may yield a greater profit: This at Suratte; but further in India, and particularly at Gokonda, gold yields more, and especially old gold: however, at Siam again there is great loss in Spanish gold, and all other sorts, for there it is lower than in any other part of the East-Indies nearer to us, and still decreases beyond it, as in Cochinchina, Tonquin and Cbina. In India the way of travelling by land is commonly in carts drawn by oxen, and in some parts on elephants, but in Cbina the most common carriage is in palankenes, or chairs on mens shoulders, who travel swift and cheap.

These particulars may serve in relation to the eastern nations; and as for Europe, the methods of travelling are too well known to require any particular instructions, therefore it only remains to set down some general rules which may concern all travellers to observe. They are in the first place to consider, that they do not go into other countries to pass through them, and divert themselves with the present sight of such curiosities as they meet with, nor to learn the vices of those people for which they need not take the pains of going abroad, nor to observe their faults that they may have matter to rail when they come home. If they will make an advantage of their trouble and cost, they must not pass through a country as if they carried an express, but make a reasonable stay at all places where there are antiquities, or any rarities to be observed; and not think that because others have writ on that subject, there is no more to be said; for upon comparing their observations with other mens, they will often find a very considerable difference. Let them therefore always have a table-book at hand to set down every thing worth remembering, and then at night more methodically transcribe the notes they have taken in the day. The principal heads by which to regulate their observations are these, the climate, government, power, places of strength, cities of note, religion, language, coins, trade, manufactures, wealth, bishopricks, universities, antiquities, libraries, collections of rarities, arts and artists, publick structures, roads, bridges, woods, mountains, customs, habits, laws, privileges, strange adventures, surprising accidents, rarities both natural and artificial, the soil, plants, animals, and whatsoever may be curious, diverting, or profitable. It is not amiss, if it may be, to view all rarities in the company of other strangers, because many together are apt to remark more than one alone can do. Every traveller ought to carry about him several sorts of measures, to take the dimensions of such things as require it; a watch by which, and the pace he travels, he may give some guess at the distances of places, or rather at the length of the computed leagues, or miles; a prospective-glass, or rather a great one and a less, to take views of objects at greater and less distances; a small sea-compass or needle, to observe the situation of places, and a parcel of the best maps to make curious remarks of their exactness, and note down where they are faulty. In fine, a traveller must endeavour to see the courts of princes, to keep the best company, and to converse with the most celebrated men in all arts and sciences. Thus much for travellers; but that every man may have his due, as we owned the instructions for the eastern countries to be those given by monsieur de Bourges, so we must here confess, that most of these general rules may be found in monsieur Misson's travels. Having given an account of the advancement of navigation, and all discoveries made by help of it, of the countries so discovered, of the advantages the publick receives by the relations of travellers, and some directions for them; it now only remains to subjoin a catalogue and character of books of travels, for the information of such as are addicted to this sort of pleasant and profitable reading. The Descriptio Africæ, 8°. Descriptions Asie. De Lege Mabumetica, and De Rebus Mabumeticis.

These four by John Leo, a Spaniard by birth, and a Mabometan by education, but afterwards converted, who before his conversion travelled through the greatest part of Africk, and has given the best light into it of any writer, as Jobannes Bodinus affirms. He first writ them in the Arabick for his own nation, but afterwards translated them himself into Italian, and John Florianus into Latin. He gives an excellent account of the religion, laws, customs and manners of the people of Africk, but is too brief in martial affairs, and the lives of the African princes.

Epistolæ viginti sex de rebus Japonicis, or twenty six letters concerning the affairs of Japan, to be seen in several collections of this sort of letters.

Historica relatio de legatione regis Sinensum ad regem Japonum: or an account of the embassy sent by the emperor of China to Taicosoma king of Japan, An. 1596. and of the strange prodigies that happened before the embassy, Rome 1599. 8°.

Historica relatio de rebus per Japoniam, An. 1596. à patribus societatis durante persecutione gestis: or an account of the proceedings of the jesuits in Japan, in the year 1596, during the prosecution. These three by F. Lewis Froes, a jesuit, who lived forty nine years in the east, and thirty six of them in the island of Japan as a missionary. It is believed these relations were writ in Portuguese by the author, and afterwards translated into Latin.

De Abassinorum rebus, deque Æthiopiæ patriarchis, Lions 1615. 8°. The author was F. Nicholas Godinbo, a Portuguese jesuit, who divides his work into three books, and in it refutes the fabulous history writ by F. Urreta.

Itinerarium ab oppido Complutensi Toletanæ provincie usque ad urbem Romanam. A journal of a journey from the university of Alcala in Spain to Rome, by Dr. James Lopez de Zuniga, a pious and learned man.

Literæ annuæ. The annual or yearly letters out of Æthiopia, China, India, and other parts, give much light into the affairs of those countries, and are to be found in several volumes, and scattered in collections of travels; of all which it will be needless to give any account in this place.

Atbanasii Kircheri de societate Jesu China, monumentis qua sacris qua profanis, illustrata, sol. This is a complete history of China, and held in great reputation for some years, but of late its reputation has declined, since so many books of that empire have appear'd writ by missionaries, who have resided there many years, and discovered great mistakes in Kircher.

Jobi Ludolphi historia Æthiopica, sol. This history of Æthiopia is written by a German, who having gathered most of it from the writings of the jesuits, yet makes it his business to contradict them, from the information given him by an Æthiopian he was acquainted with in Germany, for he was never near Æthiopia himself; and his whole book has more of controversy, and of the Æthiopian language, than of history.

Relatio eorum que circa S. Cæs. Majest. ad magnum Moscorum Czarum ablegatos anno æræ christianæ 1675. gesta sunt, strictim recensita per Adolphum Lysseck, distæ legationis secretarium, 8°. Saltzburg 1676. In this account of an embassy to the Czar of Muscovy, we have an account of his travels through Silesia, Pomerania, Prussia, Lithuania, and Muscovy, to the court of Moscow, and of all things of note the author saw or heard of, being an ingenious person, and having a greater privilege than common travellers, as secretary to the embassy, Giorn. de Letter.

Joannis Sebefferi Argentoratensis Lapponiæ, id est regionis Laponum & gentis nova & verissima descriptio, 4°. Lipsiæ 1674. An account of Lapland, which though it be not by way of travels, well deserves a place here, because we shall scarce find travellers that will go into that frozen region to bring us a just relation of it. This however is authentick, as gathered from the Swedish writers, who are best acquainted with those parts.

Theodori & Joannis de Brye India orientalis & occidentalis, 6 vols. fol. Francfort 1624. This collection being three volumes of the East and three of the West-Indies, begins with a particular account of the kingdom of Congo in Africk, as lying in the way to, and having accordingly been discovered before India; this account translated from the Italian writ by Philip Pigafetta. Next follow five voyages of Samuel Bruzo of Basil, the three first to Congo, Æthiopia, and other parts round the coast of Africk; the fourth to several parts in the Straits, and the fifth to Portugal and Spain, &c. translated into Latin from the author's original in Higb-Dutch. The next are Linschoten's Indian voyages, voyages, translated from the Dutch, and containing a very full account of all things remarkable in those parts. Then three Dutch voyages to the north-east passage, and after them a great number of cuts and maps, besides very many dispersed throughout the book, and a considerable number at the beginning. These are the contents of the first volume. The second begins with a large account of Bantam, Banda, Ternate, and other parts of India, being a voyage of eight Dutch ships into those parts in the year 1598, translated out of High-Dutch. After that the description of Guinea out of High-Dutch. Spilberg's voyage, An. 1601. Gaspar Balbi's voyage, An. 1579. In the third volume Jacob Neck's voyage, An. 1603. Jo. Hermon de Bree, An. 1602. Corn. Nicolas, Cornelius Ven, and Stephen de Hagen, all to India. Verbuff's voyage to India, An. 1607. Dialogues in Latin and the Malayc language. Hudson's voyage to the north-east passage. An account of Terra Australis incognita, by capt. Peter Ferdinand de Quir; and the description of Siberia, Samoieda, and Tingoesia. Two voyages of Americus Vesputius to the East-Indies. A very strange relation of an Englishman, who being shipwrecked on the coast of Cambaia, travel'd through many of those eastern countries; and the description of the northern country of Spitzbergen: the whole illustrated with a vast number of maps, and other cuts. Thus far the three volumes of the East-Indies. The three of the West are composed of these parts. Vol. I. an ample account of Virginia: The unfortunate expedition of the French to Florida, An. 1565. Laudonniere's voyage thither, An. 1574. Two voyages of John Stadius to Brazil and the river of Plaje, where he lived among the Indians. Leri's account of Brazil. Villagano's voyage to South America. Benzo's history of the discovery of America. Vol. II. The second and third parts of Benzo's history of the West-Indies. Faber's description of several parts of America, where he travelled. Voyages of sir F. Drake, Cavendish and Raleigh. Dutch expedition to the Canaries. General account of America. Sebald de Weerr's voyage through the straits of Magellan. Noort round the world. Vol. III. Two voyages of Americus Vesputius. Hamor's account of the state of Virginia. Captain Smith's description of New-England. Schouten and le Maire's discovery of a new passage into the South-sea, called Strait le Maire: Spilbergen's voyage through the straits of Magellan. Herrera's description of the West-Indies. These are the contents of the six volumes, the whole illustrated and adorned with such a vast number of maps and cuts, representing all such things as require it, that the like is not in any other collection, nor is it likely that any will be at so excessive an expence. To be short, this collection is a small library, including all the voyages and discoveries of any note till the time it was published, when most of the remote parts began to be well known, and therefore is of excellent use and great value.

Delle navigationi & viaggi, Raccolse da M. Gio Battista Ramusio, Venice, 3 vol. fol. 1613. Ramusio's collection of voyages and travels, the most perfect work of that nature extant in any language whatsoever: containing all the discoveries to the east, west, north, and south; with full descriptions of all the countries discovered; judiciously compiled, and free from that great mass of useless matter, which swells our English Hackluyt and Purchas; much more complete and full than the Latin de Brye, and in fine, the noblest work of this nature. The contents of it as briefly as may be set down, are as follow. In the first volume, John Leo's description of Africk. Alvise de ca da Mosto's voyage, and that of Peter de Samtra to the coast of Africk. Hanno the Carthaginian's navigation on the coast of Africk. The same by Pizarro's secretary. Oviedo's account of a voyage up the great river of Maranon. Verazzano's discovery of north America. Jaques Cortier's first and second voyages to Canada or New-France. Federici's voyage to India, with a large account of the spice, drugs, jewels, and pearls in those parts. Three voyages of the Dutch to discover the north-east passage to China and Japan, in which they found the straits of Weygats and Nova Zembla, and the coast of Greenland running to 80 degrees of north-latitude. These, with many learned discourses and observations of the author's, are the contents of the three volumes.

Prima spedizione all' Indie orientali del P. F. Giuseppe di Santa Maria, 4°. Roma 1668. This author was sent by pope Alexander VII. to the Malabar Christians of S. Thomas, being himself a barefoot Carmelite, and has in this left a most excellent piece of curiosity. He gives a very particular account of the places and people he saw, of birds, beasts, and other animals, and of the philosophy of the Brabmans, their secrets, and of all the other Malabars, as also of the infinite number of their gods. Hence he proceeds further, to treat of the vast empire of the Mogul, of the pearl-fishery, of the Sabeans about Bassora, who pretend they received their religion from S. John Baptist; and concludes with the errors of the Jacobites, Nestorians, Greeks, Armenians, and other eastern sects.

Historia delle Guerre Civili di Polonia, progressi dell' arme Mocovite contro a Polacchi, relationi della Moscovia e Suetia, e loro governi, di D. Alberto Vinina Bellunese, 4°. Venetia 1672. Though the wars of Poland may not seem relating to travels, this work is inserted, as giving a good account of the Poles, Tartars, and Cossacks, their government, manners, &c. then follows that of Muscovy and Sweden, where the author travelled, and made his excellent observations.

Il viaggio all' Indie orientali, del P. F. Vincenzo Maria di S. Caterina da Siena, fol. Roma 1673. A voyage to the East-Indies, performed by F. Vincent Maria of S. Caribarine of Siena, procurator general of the barefoot Carmelites, and sent to India by the way of Turkey and Persia by the pope, together with F. Joseph of S. Mary, who writ also an account of his travels, which is mentioned above. This author divides his work into five books: in the first and last is a journal of all things remarkable in his travels thither and back again. The second treats of the affairs of the Malabar Christians. The third and fourth of all the nations of India, their manners, customs, wealth, government, religion, plants, animals, &c. The whole is so faithful, exact, and learned an account of all things remarkable in those parts, that scarce any other can equal it.

Istorica descrizione de tre regni Congo, Matamba, & Angola, & delle missioni apostoliche essercitatevi da religiosi Capuccini, compilata dal P. Gio. Antonio Cavazzi, & nel presente stile ridotta dal P. Fortunato Alamanini, fol. Bologna 1687. An historical description of the kingdoms of Congo, Matamba, and Angola; the authors were Capuchin missionaries, who compiled it by order of the congregation de propaganda fide, and have given a most accurate description of those countries; and all things of note in them; as also of the missions thither, which was the principal end of their painful travels.

Relatione della citta d' Atene, colle provincie dell' Attica, Focia, Beotia, e Negroponte, ne tempi che furono queste passeggiate da Cornelio Magni l'anno 1674. 4°. Parma 1688. An account of Athens, and the provinces of Attica, Focia, Beotia, and Negropont, which the author viewed, and took a particular account of, and for further satisfaction conferred with Mr. Spon, who had travelled the same parts, for his approbation of what he delivers. He treats very briefly of Syria, Chaldea, and Mesopotamia, and principally enlarges himself upon the city of Athens, the condition whereof he describes more fully than any other has done.

Relazione e viaggio della Moscovia del signor cavaliere D. Ercole Zani, Bolognese, 12°. Bologna 1690. This voyage to Muscovy is writ by a most judicious person, and who had spent a great part of his life in travelling, and deserves to be highly valued, as coming from such a hand; and the more, because we have but very imperfect accounts of that country.

Viaggio del monte Libano del R. R. Jeronimo Dandina, 12°. He performed this voyage to mount Libanus by order of pope Clement VIII. to inquire into the faith of the Maronite Christians; he describes the country, gives an account of the peoples doctrines, their manner of living, their books, learning, bishops, priests, and religious men. A work very curious and useful. It is translated into French, and the translator has added many useful remarks of his own.

Relazione del viaggio fatto a Costantinopoli, &c. da Gio. Benaglia, 12°. Bologna 1664. This is an account of count Caprara's embassy to the great Turk, the author being his secretary, and has many good remarks of that court, and of the Turkish army, taken by him upon the spot, and therefore well worth the observation of the curious, Biblioth. Univ. vol. XV. p. 75.

Relations de divers voyages curieux par M. Melchisedec Thevenot. There is no need to give a character of this author, any further than that he has received the general approbation of the learned, for compiling a collection of curious travels in two volumes in folio. The first contains Greaves's description of the Pyramids of Egypt, and Burattini's account of the Mummies. An account of the Cossacks, another of the Tartars, another of Mengrelia, and another of Georgia. Jenkinson's voyage to Catbay. An extract of the Dutch embassy to the Tartar. A relation of the conquest of the island Formosa by the Chinese; another of the court of the Mogol. Sir Thomas Roe's and Terry's voyage to the Mogol. A Greek description of the East-Indies. The Arabick geography of Abulfeda. The antiquities of Persepolis. The beginning of a book of the Chaldeans of Bassora. Relations of the kingdoms of Golconda, Tanassari, and Aracan, of the gulph of Bengala of Siam. Bontekoué's voyages to India. The discovery of Terra Australis. The sailing course to India. Instructions upon the trade of India and Japan. Beaulieu's voyage to the West-Indies. Accounts of the Philippine islands, of Japan, of the discovery of the land of Yedso. A description of the plants and flowers of Cbina. Ancient monuments of christian religion in Cbina. The second volume; the Dutch embassy to Cbina; the Cbinese Atlas. The state of India. The portraicture of the Indians. Acarete's voyage on the river Plate, and thence to Peru and Cbile. Journey by land to Cbina. The second book of Confucius the Cbinese philosopher. The history of Ethiopia; and of some countries about it. Travels to the province of Zaide in Egypt. The history of Mexico in figures explained. Tasman's voyage to Terra Australis. Instructions for the navigation from Holland to Batavia. Two embassies to the emperor of Catbay. A chronological synopsis of the Cbinese monarchy. Barros's Asia, or conquest of India. An account of the Christians of St. John. A voyage to Tercera. The elements of the Tartar language. A fragment concerning the isles of Solomon; another of the history of some eastern princes.

Thevenot has also composed one volume in 8°, in which is an embassy from the Czar of Moscovy to Cbina by land. The discovery of some countries in north America, and of the great river Mississippi. A discourse of navigation. The natural histories of the Ephemera, or fly that lives but a day, and the Cancellus.

Les six voyages de Jean Baptiste Tavernier en Turquie, en Perse, & aux Indes. These travels are printed in several sorts of volumes in French, according to the several editions, and have been translated into English. He is a faithful writer, and deserves full credit in what he delivers upon his own sight and knowledge; but in some relations taken from others, he was imposed upon, being a person of integrity, and not suspecting others would give a false information. His accounts are very particular and curious, and the extent he travelled very great; having taken several ways in his six journies. But above all, he gives the best description of the diamonds, mines and rivers where they are found, and manner of finding them; having been upon the spot, as being a great dealer in those precious stones.

Recueil de plusieurs relations & traites singuliers & curieux de Jean Baptiste Tavernier, divise en cinq parties, 4°. This is an addition to his voyages, in which he treats of the Dutch practices to exclude all Christians from Japan, negotiations of French deputies in Persia and India, remarks on the trade of India, an account of the kingdom of Tunquin, and the history of the proceedings of the Dutch in Asia.

Relation nouvelle de la Caroline, par un gentilhomme François, arrive depuis deux mois de ce nouveau paiz, ou il par le de la route quil quil faut tenir pour y aller le plus surement, & de l'etat ou il a trouve cette nouvelle contrée. A la Haye 1686. 12°. This is a modern account of Florida, its estate in the year 1684, and the best way to it. The book has a good reputation; and as Florida is one of those American countries we have not the best account of, this is a considerable light into it.

Relation du voyage de monsieur l'evêque de Beryte par la Turquie, la Perse, les Indes jusques au Royaume de Siam, & autres lieux, escrit par monsieur de Bourges Prestre, 8°. An account of the bishop of Berytus's journey by land through Turkey, Persia, and India, into Cbina, by a priest that went with him; very curious in the description of those countries and manners of the people, with instructions for travellers to those parts, Journ. des Scav. vol. I. p. 591.

L'Embassade de D. Garcia de Silva Figueras. This is a translation out of Spanish, and the account of the book is among the Spanish under the title, Embaxada, &c. to which the reader may turn; only he is advertised that he may see more concerning this translation in Journ. des Scav. vol. I. p. 205.

Les voyages de monsieur de Monconys. Monsieur Monconys's travels in three volumes, 4°. The first through Portugal, Italy, Egypt, Syria, and Constantinople. The second into England, the Low-countries, Germany, and Italy. The third into Spain. Besides the general account of those countries and particular places, they contain abundance of rare and extraordinary observations and secrets in physick and chemistry, and mathematical inventions. But the author dying before the work was fitted for the press, it is in some measure imperfect, and has many particulars of no use to any but himself; which there is no doubt he would have omitted, had he lived, Journ. des Scav. vol. I. p. 339, and 424.

Description des costes de l'Amerique septentrional, avec l'histoire de ce pays, par monsieur Denys, 2 vol. 12°. The first volume is a description of the northern coasts of America and the countries adjacent, with a map of them, rendered extraordinary diverting by several stories related. The second is the natural history, very curious and learned, Journ. des Scav. vol. III. p. 141.

Relation ou journal d'un voyage fait aux Indes orientales, contenant les affaires du pais, & les établissements de plusieurs nations, &c. 12°. This author set out on his voyage in the year 1671. He is worth reading for several observations not easily to be found in others; but most for his account of the settlements of European nations, yet all short.

Nouvelle relation en forme de journal d'un voyage fait en Egypt, par le P. Vansleb en 1672, & 1673. 12°. The author to what he saw himself, for the better information of his reader, adds all that is to be found remarkable in other late travellers relating to Egypt.

Voyage d'Italie, de Dalmatie, de Grece, & du Levant, aux années 1675, & 1676. par Jacob Spon, 12°. 3 vol. This work, besides the general observations of travellers, is singular for its curiosity in the search of antiquities, Journ. des Scav. vol. VI. p. 128, and 185.

Voyage de François Pirard de la Val aux Indes orientales, Maldives, Moluques, & au Brasil, &c. 4°. This is one of the exactest pieces of travels, and the most diverting hitherto made publick. M. Pirard the traveller furnished the materials, which were digested, and methodised by several very able men in France. Many who have travelled after him mention much of what he does, and yet he has some curiosities which others have not touched upon, Journ. des Scav. vol. VII. p. 85.

Ambassade de la compagnie des Indes orientales des Provinces unies vers les empereurs du Japon, An. 1641. fol. It is a perfect account of all that happened to the said ambassadors, and full description of the country, towns, cities, &c. with variety of cuts, Journ. des Scav. vol. VIII. p. 130. and Biblioth. Univers. vol. IV. p. 499.

Nouvelle relation d'un voyage de Constantinople, présentée au roy par le Sieur Grelot, An. 1680, in 4°. A curious account not only of that city, but of all places to it, with cuts drawn by the author upon the spot, Journ. des Scav. vol. VIII. p. 296.

Relation des missions & des voyages des eveques vicaries apostoliques, & de leurs ecclesiastiques en années 1676, & 1677. in 8°. This is a relation of what those preachers observed in their travels in Asia.

Les voyages de Jean Struys en Moscovie, &c. in 4°. In these travels through Muscovy, Tartary, Persia, India, the isle of Madagascar, and other places, being a vast extent of ground, and to be travelled many several ways, there are abundance of notable observations, not to be found in other books of this sort; the whole very instructive and diverting, Journ. des Scav. vol. IX. p. 260.

Relation nouvelle particulier du voyage des peres de la mercy aux royaumes de Fez & de Maroc, en l'an 1681, 12°. Besides what these fathers did, as the peculiar business of their religious profession, this book contains many curiosities relating to the king of Morocco, and the customs of the country, Journ. des Scav. vol. X. p. 354.

Relation de la riviere des Amazons traduit par M. Gomberville, sur l'original Espagnol du P. d'Acufia jesuite. This is a relation of the said father's voyage down this vast river; to which the translator has added a dissertation, the principal matters treated of therein being the towns of Manoa, Dorado, and the lake of Parima, Journ. des Scav. vol. XI. p. 107.

Relation du voyage de Venise a Constantinople de Jaques Gassot, 12°. This author, though he writ above a hundred years ago, is valuable for many curious observations not to be found in later travellers, Journ. des Scav. vol. XII. p. 139.

Relation du voyages des Indes orientales, par M. Dellon, two volumes 12°. The author affirms, he has inserted nothing but what he saw; much of what he relates has been delivered by other authors: but he is very particular, and out-does them all in his account of the coast of Malabar; and concludes with a treatise of diseases in those parts, and their cures, Journ. des Scav. vol. XIII. p. 121.

Histoire de la conquête de la Floride par les Espagnols, traduit du Portugais, 12°. This is a very exact account of that country, and all that happened in the conquest of it, writ by a Portuguese gentleman, who served in that war, and was an eye-witness of all that passed, Journ. des Scav. vol. XIII. p. 394.

Voyages de l'empereur de la Chine dans la Tartarie, ausquels on a joynt une nouvelle découverte au Mexique, 12°. It treats of two journies the emperor of Cbina made into the eastern and the western Tartary. The other part shews the settlement made by the Spaniards in the island of California, An. 1683. Journ. des Scav. vol. XIII. p. 446.

Relation de l'embassade de Mr. le Chevalier de Chaumont, a la cour du roy de Siam, 12°. He writes not like a common traveller, but like an ambassador, and is therefore more political, and treats of higher matters than others, though often descending to things of less moment worth the general observation, as the description of the country, customs and manners of the inhabitants, and other things of that nature, Journ. des Scavans, vol. XIV. p. 396. and Biblioth. Univers. vol. III. p. 521.

Journal du voyage du Chevalier Chardin en Perse, & aux Indes orientales par la mer Noire, & par la Colcbide, fol. Though so many travellers as have visited those parts before him, seem to have left nothing new for him to write of, yet in him are found abundance of rarities not to be seen in any other, and remarks no where else to be found, and particularly the exposition of several passages in scripture, which the author makes out by customs preserved in the east from the time of Moses till our day, Journ. des Scavans, vol. XIV. p. 535. and Biblioth. Univers. vol. III. p. 520.

Ambassades de la compagnie Hollandoise d'orient vers l'empereur du Japon, 2 vol. 12°. It is an abridgment of a volume in folio, printed in the year 1680, and is divided into three parts: the first is the description of Japan; the second an account of the embassy there; and the third of five other embassies. To which is added, a relation of the civil wars in Japan, Journ. des Scavans, vol. XV. p. 139.

Journal du voyage de Siam, fait par monsieur l'Abbe de Choisi, 4°. It is composed of several letters writ by this gentleman, who was sent by the king of France with the character of ambassador in case the king of Siam had embraced Christianity, as was hop'd; and does not only inform as to all particulars of that great kingdom, but of many others about it as far as Tonquin and Cochinchina, without neglecting in the way to treat very accurately of the Dutch colony at the cape of Good Hope, Journ. des Scav. vol. XV. p. 301.

Histoire des Indes orientales, 4°. It is divided into two parts. The first treats of the voyage to, and observations at cape Verde, of the isle of Madagascar, and several passages which happened in Argier and Constantinople. The second of two voyages into India, Journ. des Scav. vol. XV. p. 436. and Hist. des ouvrages des Scavans, vol. II. p. 307.

Histoire naturelle & politique du royaume de Siam, 4°. It is divided into four parts, which treat, 1. Of the situation and nature of the country. 2. The laws and customs of the people. 3. Their religion; and, 4. Of the king and court. Monsieur Gervaise the author of it resided there four years, understood the language perfectly, read their books, and conversed with the most intelligent persons, and therefore got good information of what he writes, having been careful to deliver as little as he could of what others had before made publick, Journ. des Scav. vol. XV. p. 612.

Relation nouvelle & exacte d'un voyage de la Terre Sainte, 12°. Contains an exact description of all the places where the principal passages of our Saviour's passion happened, and many other things well worth observing, being very short, and yet full enough, Journal des Scavans, vol. XVI. p. 204. and Hist. des ouvrages des Scavans, vol. III. p. 417.

Voyage en Moscovie d'un ambassadeur de l'empereur Leopold, 12°. An. 1661. He describes the great rivers, the chief towns on the banks of them, the manners, government and religion of the people, Journ. des Scav. vol. XVI. p. 232.

Description historique du royaume de Macassar, 12°. It is divided into three books, the first the description of the country, the second the manners and government of the people and kingdom, the third the religion. Journ. des Scav. vol. XVI. p. 532. and Hist. des ouvrages des Scavans, vol. V. p. 324.

Relation de la Nigritie, 12°. It contains an exact description of the kingdoms of the Blacks, their government, religion, manners, rarities of the country; with the discovery of the river Senega, and a map of it. By four Franciscan friars, who went thither upon the mission in the year 1689, from France, Journ. de Scav. vol. XVII. p. 311.

Voyage du Pere Tachard & des Jesuites envoyez par la roy au royaume de Siam, An. 1685. 4°. This is an historical, physical, geographical, and astronomical account, being taken by learned men, and great mathematicians. The first book is mostly astronomical observations in the voyage to the cape of Good Hope; the second a relation of the table-mountain, and many other things about the aforesaid cape; the third passages at Batavia and Macassar; the fourth of affairs of Siam, and others; the fifth continues the same matter; the sixth much natural history, concluding with the king of Siam's letters to the pope, king of France, and F. le Cbaise; the seventh the father's return home; and the eighth from thence to Rome, Journ. de Scav. vol. XVII. p. 415. and Biblioth. Univers. vol. IV. p. 472.

Second voyage du Pere Tachard & des Jesuites envoyez par le roy au royaume de Siam, 1689. 8°. This father returned from his first voyage to carry more missionaries; and this second voyage, which he divides into eight books, like the other contains many historical, physical, geographical and astronomical remarks, besides abundance of other observations and curiosities omitted in the first voyage, Biblioth. Univers. vol. XIV. p. 445.

Histoire de l'Eglise du Japon, par Mr. l'Abbé de T. 2 vol. 4°. It was writ by F. Solier, a jesuit, and published by l'Abbé, who refined the language. This, though an ecclesiastical history, contains all the diverting particulars to be found in books of travels, as being composed by those fathers, who were all travellers in that country. It is an excellent work, in twenty books, Journ. des Scav. vol. XVII. p. 486.

Journal du voyage fait a la Mer du Sud. avec les Flibustiers de l'Amerique, en 1684. & années suivantes, par le Sieur Raveneau de Lussand, 12°. It is a bucantering expedition, containing very much of robbery, with an account of the Isthmus of America, and countries about it, where the author with his gang travelled much by land, Journ. de Scav. vol. XVII. p. 721.

Histoire de monsieur Constance premier ministre du roy de Siam, & de la derniere revolution de cet estat. Par le P. d'Orleans, 12°. It is a relation of that gentleman's wonderful adventures in Siam, where he attained to be first minister to that great monarch in the year 1685. and those that followed, with the revolution of that kingdom, and the persecution that ensued against the Christians, Journ. des Scav. vol. XVIII. p. 373.

Du royaume de Siam. Par Mr. de la Loubere, envoie extraordinaire du roy aupres du roy de Siam, en 1687, & 1688. 2 vol. 12°. In this there are many particulars not to be found in other relations. The first volume divided into three parts; the first geographical, the second of customs in general, and the third of manners in particular. The second volume begins with strange fables and superstitions, proceeds to the practices of the religious men, and many other particulars extraordinary curious and remarkable, Journ. des Scav. vol. XIX. p. 256, & 269.

Relation du voyage d'Espagne, 3 vol. 12°. Treats of the country in general, of the situation of its towns, of publick and private structures, of palaces and churches, with their ornaments, &c. of the king's power, government, councils, employments, benefices, and their revenues; of the orders of knighthood, and the inquisition: with many pleasant adventures, in which there is much of the romantick, Journ. des Scav. vol. XIX. p. 364. It is writ by the countess d'Aunoi, and has much of the woman.

Nouvelle relation de la Gaspésie. Par le P. Chretien le Clercq. 12°. This is a complete account of the manners and religion of the savages called Gaspésians, carrying crosses, and worshipping the sun; and other nations of Canada in north America. It was taken in twelve years, the author residing there as missionary, beginning An. 1675, Journ. des Scav. vol. XIX. p. 395. and Biblioth. Univers. vol. XXIII. p. 86.

Premier établissement de la foidans la Nouvelle France. Par le P. le Clercq. missionaire, 2 vol. 12°. It is the complete history of Canada, or New-France, from the first discovery of it till this time, containing the discoveries, settling of colonies, conquests, and all other passages from those northern parts down to the gulph of Mexico, with the battles with the English and Iroquois, An. 1690, Journ. des Scav. vol. XX. p. 131.

Voyages en divers estats d'Europe & d'Asie, pour decouvrir un nouveau Chemin a la Chine, 4°. These travels were writ and performed by F. Avril, a jesuit, who spent five years traversing Turkey, Persia, Muscovy, Poland, Prussia, Moldavia and Tartary, and embarked in several seas to find out this way to China, to avoid the tedious voyage by the cape of Good Hope and India. The relation is physical, geographical, hydrographical, and historical, Journ. des Scav. vol. XX. p. 187.

Les aventures de Jaques Sadeur dans la de couverte, & le voyage de la Terre Australe, 12°. This is a very extraordinary account of Terra Australis incognita, infinitely exceeding all that has been writ of it by others; the author being cast upon that country after the loss of the ship he was in, and living thirty years among those savages. He therefore treats of the manners of the people, their religion, employments, studies, wars, of the birds and beasts, and other rarities, Journ. des Scav. vol. XX. p. 256.

Voyages historiques de l'Europe, 8 vol. 12°. The first of these volumes treats only of France; the second of Spain and Portugal; the third of Italy; the fourth of England, Scotland and Ireland; the fifth of the seven United Provinces; the sixth of the empire; the seventh of Muscovy; the eighth of Poland, Lithuania, Sweden, Denmark, Norway and Iceland. These volumes are travels into the most considerable parts of Europe, and contain abundance of singularities not observed by other travellers and writers, Journ. des Scav. vol. XXI. p. 93, 95, 276.

Relation du voyage, & retour des Indes orientales, pendant les années 1690, 1691, par un garde de la marine servant sur le bord de M. Duquesne commandant de l'Escadre, 12°. It has many curious observations during the voyage outward and homeward bound, and an account of all places the Squadron touched at, Journ. des Scav. vol. XXI. p. 177.

Les voyages du sieur le Maire aux isles Canaries, Cap Verde, Senegal & Gambie, 12°. In this are many particulars of those African countries, little known, and scarce to be found in other travellers, Journ. des Scav. vol. XXIII. p. 364.

Nouvelle relation de la Chine, en l'année 1668. par le R. P. Gabriel de Magaillans, de la Compagnie de Jesus, 8°. This was originally writ in Portuguese, and ought to have been among the travels in that language, had we any number of them. It was thought worth translating into French first, and from that into English, but was never printed in its original language. It has the reputation of an exact and faithful account, Hist. des ouvrages des Scav. vol. II. p. 203.

Relation universelle de l'Afrique ancienne & moderne, par le Sieur de la Croix, 12°. 4 vol. Besides the chronology and geography, it has the customs, manners, religion, trade, plants and other particulars of the continent and islands, and what the king of France has done against the Barbary Corsairs, An. 1688. A Lyon.

Le Bouclier de l'Europe, contenant des avis politiques & chretiens, &c. Avec une relation de voyages faits dans la Turquie, la Thebaide, & la Barbarie. Par le R. R. Jean Coppin, 4°. This father was first a soldier, then consul for the French nation at Damietta in Egypt, and lastly, a religious man. The design of his work is to stir up christian princes to make war on the Turk, and accordingly his first and second books are taken up in shewing of how great consequence that war is, the methods of managing it, the causes of the rise and decay of the Ottoman empire, and much more to that effect. In the following books he proceeds to his travels; first in Egypt, where he has many curious observations not to be found in other travellers, but more particular, in that he took the pains to travel the great desert of Thebaida, where few besides him have been in these latter times; and this is his subject of his third and fourth books. The fifth treats of Barbary, Pbenicia, and the Holy Land: and the work concludes with an exact description of the city Damietta, where he resided some years. His relation is faithful, and deserves all credit, especially in those things he delivers as an eye-witness. It was published at Paris in the year 1686, Biblioth. Univers. vol. V. p. 103.

Journal, ou suite du voyage de Siam, en forme de lettres familieres, fait en 1685, & 1686. par monsieur l'Abbé de Cboisi, 8°. It is the third account of the French embassadors sent to Siam; monsieur de Chaumont, and P. Tachard, both before mentioned, being the two others. It contains an exact journal of that voyage, has all the sea-terms, much of the same as F. Tachard, and several other remarks. He treats of the war in Bantam, of the island of Java, of Batavia, the power of the Dutch in India, of Siam, Tonquin, Cochinchina, &c. Biblioth. Univers. vol. VI. p. 274.

Histoire naturelle, & politique du royaume de Siam, par monsieur Gervaise, 1688. 4°. The author lived four years at the court of Siam, and affirms nothing but what he saw, or found in the best books of that country, as also by discourse with the best people there. He says little or nothing of what has been mentioned by other travellers to Siam, and adds much, which they, as being ing only passengers, could not observe. The work is divided into four parts: the first contains the description of the country; the second the laws, customs, manners and government of that nation; the third the religion; the fourth speaks of the king, royal family and court, Biblioth. Univers. vol. X. p. 516.

Relation nouvelle & exacte d'un voyage de la Terre Sainte, ou description de l'état present des lieux, ou se sont passées les principales actions de la vie de Jesu Christ. Paris 1688. 8°. This is a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, and therefore writ in a religious stile, and contains the account of all the holy places in Ralestine, and description of Malta; and is a good guide for such as desire to travel into those parts.

Voyages de M. de Thevenot en Asie & en Afrique. Paris 1689. 3 vol. 12°. It is to be observed, that whereas before mention is made of Thevenot's travels, that is a collection of other men, as appears there, but these are M. Thevenot's own travels, divided into three parts; the first of the eastern countries under the Turk; the second continues other eastern parts, proceeding towards Persia; and the third the East-Indies. It is one of the most curious and exact works of this nature hitherto published, and well deserving to be read by all that are curious of travels, Biblioth. Univers. vol. XIII. p. 246.

Voyage d'Amerique, histoire des aventuriers qui se sont signalez dans les Indes, &c. Par Alexander Olivier Oexmelin. Paris 1688. 2 vol. 12°. This was a surgeon sent over in the service of the French West-India company, and sold in America, where he lived several years. The author of the Biblioth. Univers. gives a great character of this work, and says, no man has yet given so good an account of the manner of living in those parts, besides very good descriptions, and all that is requisite in such a work; of which see more in the said Biblioth. Univers. vol. XVIII. p. 129.

Nouveau voyage d'Italie fait en l'année 1688. avec un memoire contenant des avis utiles a ceux qui voudront faire le meme voyage. A la Haye, 1691. 2 vol. 12°. Par monsieur Misson. This author gives a general account of all things observable in Italy, and therefore is the more diverting. He begins his travels in Holland, of which he gives a short account; then crossing Germany and Tirol, he runs down Italy by the Adriatick shore, and returns on the other side through Tuscany, Genoa, Piedmont, Switzerland.

Voyage en divers états d'Europe & d'Asie, entrepris pour decouvrir un nouveau chemin a la Chine. Par le P. Avril. Paris 1693. 12°. The first book contains the author's travels from Marseilles to Ezivan in Persia; the second from Ezivan to Moscow; in the third he gives an account of Tartary, but it was such as he received from others, for he was not in that country; and in the fourth, of his return to Poland, thence to Constantinople, and thence for want of health to France, Biblioth. Univers. vol. XXIV. p. 203.

Histoire de la revolution de l'Empire du Mogol. Par monsieur F. Bernier, 8°. This history of the revolution of the empire of the Mogul, contains the whole account of Aurence Zeb dethroning his father, with all the intrigues and wars on that account; the description of Agra and Delbi, capital cities of that empire, many particulars of that court, the doctrines, customs, &c. of the Indians, the Mogul's journey to Cachemire, and many other curious observations made by the author in his travels in that country.

Relation d'un voyage en la Mauritanie. Par le sieur Roland Frejus, 8°. The author of this voyage into Mauritania was sent by the king of France's order in the year 1666, to settle trade in the kingdom of Fez, and gives a very just, though brief account of his voyage and negotiation. There is added to it a letter of monsieur Cbarant, who lived twenty five years in Suez and Morocco, giving an account of the religion, manners, trade, &c. of those people.

Voyages en Asie, Afrique, & l'Amerique. Par monsieur Jean Mocquet, 8°. See this among the English, 8°.

Voyage par monsieur du Quesne aux Indes en 1691, & 1692, &c. See more of this among the English, 8°.

Voyages historiques & curieux en Allemagn, Bobeme, Suisse, Holland, &c. de monsieur Charles Patin, 8°. See this among the English.

Voyage aux Indes, de Dellon, 2 vol. 12°.

Histoire de la Chine sous la domination des Tartares. Par le P. Greslon de la Comp. de Jesus, 8°. Paris 1672. We have here a succinct history of China from the year 1651, till 1669, delivered by a missionary resident there many years; his principal subject is the astronomy of China, which gained the first admission to the missionaries; of which, and all its parts, and how used and practised there, he treats very ingeniously and learnedly, Giom. de Letter.

Voyage du Levant. Par monsieur de Loir, 12°. A voyage to the Levant in ten letters, containing all things remarkable in the islands of Archipelago, Ephesus, Smyrna, Constantinople, Scutari, Negropont, Greece, the Morea, and all the coasts to Venice; in which are all the ancient and modern names of places, and what authors have said of them.

them, compared with what was when the author travelled. A work no less learned than curious, Giom. de Letter. An. 1673.

Voyage d'Angleterre, par monsieur Sorbieré, 12°. This account of England is not methodical, but contains some observations worth reading.

Relation universelle de l'Afrique ancienne & moderne, par le sieur de la Croix, 4 vol. 12°. Lyon 1688. This is the fullest and most perfect account yet extant of that great part of the world, being a judicious and laborious collection of all the best that has been writ on the subject. Giom. de Letter. An. 1689.

Histoire de l'isle de Ceylan, par le capitain Jean Ribeyro, traduite du Portugais en François, 12°. Paris 1701. This short history of Ceylon, though writ originally in Portuguese, and published in the year 1685. is here inserted in the French translation, because the translator Mr. Le Grand has added to it several chapters, collected from the best authors that have writ of that island. It is divided into three books: the first is the description of the island, its government, religion, product, &c. the second treats of the wars there between the Portuguese, the natives, and the Dutch: and the third, of the errors the Portuguese committed in their conquest of India, and the power of the Dutch in those parts. Journ. des Scav. vol. 29. p. 389.

Nouveaux memoires sur l'estat present de la Chine, par le P. Louis le Comte, 2 vol. 12°. Paris 1696. F. Le Comte's memoirs of China have appeared in English; they have abundance of very remarkable passages and singular curiosities, and have been too much talked of to require much to be said of them. Journ. des Scav. vol. 25. p. 58.

Dernieres decouvertes dans l'Amerique septentrionale de monsieur de la Sale, mises au jour par monsieur le Chevalier Tonti, gouverneur du fort S. Louis aux isinois, 12°. Paris 1697. This is an account of a vast discovery in North America, being the whole length of the river Mississippi, from the French plantations in Canada down to the gulph of Mexico to the southward, and from the same plantation to the source of the said river northwards. Journ. des Scav. vol. 25. p. 311.

Relation d'un voyage fait en 1696 & 1697, aux costes de l'Afrique, detroit de Magellan, Brezil, Cayenne, & isles Antilles, par le sieur Froger. This is a relation of an expedition of six French ships fitted out during the war with Spain in those years; it is looked upon as very faithful, and adorned with a great number of maps and cuts of all sorts. Journ. des Scav. vol. 26. p. 164.

VOL. I.

Memoires du Chevalier Beaujeu, contenant divers voyages en Pologne, Allemagne, & en Hongries, 12°. Paris 1679. The author of these memoirs having travelled in Poland, Germany, and Hungary, undertakes to rectify many mistakes in the maps as to distances of places; he gives a particular account of these countries, and most especially of Poland, and all things relating to it. Journ. des Scav. vol. 26. p. 284.

Relation du voyage du Sieur de Montauban capitain des Flibustiers en Guinée, dans l'année 1695. This was a privateer voyage, which ended in the blowing up the ship; but so that the captain escaped, and got ashore on the coast of Africk, of which he gives some account; thence he got over to Barbadoes, and thence into France.

Relation curieuse & nouvelle de Moscovie, contenant l'estat de cet empire, 12°. Paris 1698. This account of Muscovy is composed by Mr. de Neuville, envoy from the king of Poland to the Czar, who during his residence there collected the best account of a way through Muscovy and Tartary to China, as convenient as any for travellers in Europe, which he says he was told by one that travelled it twice; but that the Czar at the request of the Dutch has prohibited merchants trading that way.

Journal du voyage des grandes Indes, contenant tout ce qui s'y est fait & passe par l'escadre de sa majeste, envoye sous le commandement de M. de la Haye, 12°. Orleans 1697. This is a voyage of a French fleet to the Indies in the year 1670. it describes Goa, and gives some account of those coasts, of taking the city of S. Thomas or Meliapor, and the losing it again to the Dutch and infidels, with the return of the French.

Voyage d'Italie & de Grece, avec une dissertation sur la bizarrerie des opinions des hommes, 12°. Paris 1698. This author set out from France in the year 1691. and gives such a description of the countries he passed through, and of the adventures that beset him, as renders it extremely diverting; concluding with a reflection upon the extravagant humours of men, whose behaviour he condemns in many particulars, which are rather pleasant and diverting than solid. Journ. des Scav. vol. 26. p. 535.

Spanish.

Historia del Gran Tamorlan. Itinerario, y relacion de la embaxada que Rup Gonzales de Clavijo le hizo por mandado del senor Rey D. Henrique tercero de Castilla. Sevil 1582. Fol. This is the first Spanish book of travels, at least of any reputation, now extant, and is of no less than 300-years antiquity; for tho' the book was published as above, the embassy was in the year 1403. in which the author spent three years, saw a considerable part of Asia, following Tamerlan's camp, and besides what he saw during those three years, had an ample account of all that mighty prince's wars: It is a book rare and of great value.

Comentarios do grande Alphonso de Albuquerque capitao general da India, collegidos por seu filho das proprias cartas, que elle escreveu ao rey D. Manoel. Lisboa 1576. Folio. This is a large relation of the actions of that great man, who was one of the first Portuguese conquerors of the East-Indies; and a particular encomium of it is given by Anthony Ferrer in his poems.

Naufragios de Alvar Nunez Cabeza de Vaca, y

Comentarios de Alvar Nunez Adelantado y governador de la provincia del Rio de la Platta. Valladolid 1555. 4°. The first was writ by Alvar Nunez himself, wherein he gives an account of his shipwreck, and unparalleled sufferings in Florida. The second was composed by his order by Peter Fernandez his secretary, and is an account of the province of the river of Plate, where he was governor: both curious and scarce.

Nuevo descubrimiento del gran Catayo, o Reynos de Tibet en el anno de 1624. Madrid 1627. It is writ by F. Anthony de Andrada a jesuit, who in it gives an account of his travels in the most remote eastern countries.

Verdadera description de la Tierra Santa como estava el anno de 1530. Alcala 1531. 8°. It is an exact account of the Holy Land at that time, writ by F. Anthony de Aranda, who travelled it all over as a pilgrim at that time.

El devoto peregrino viage de la Tierra Santa. Madrid 1654. 4°. The description of the Holy Land in a pious stile, for the help of pilgrims, by F. Anthony del Castillo, a Franciscan; who was superior of the monastery at Betlehem.

Relacion de lo sucedido a los Padres de la compania de Jesus en la India, y Japon, en los anos de 1630 y 1631. Valladolid 4°. An account of the travels and actions of the jesuits in India and Japan, by F. Anthony Collaco.

Jornada do Arcebispo de Goa D. F. Aleino de Meneses, &c. as serras de Malabar, & lugares em que moram os antigos Christaos de S. Thome. Coimbra 1606. Fol. It was writ by F. Anthony de Gouvea of the order of S. Augustin, who treats very curiously of the inland parts of Malabar, and Christians of S. Thomas there.

Historia general de los Hechos de los Castellanos en las islas, y Tierra firma del mar oceano, escrita por Antonio de Herrera. Madrid 1615. 4 vol. Folio. A most excellent and compleat history of the discovery and conquest of America by the Spaniards, not omitting to mention the discoveries made at the same time by other nations. It reaches from Columbus's first discovery an. 1492, till 1554. divided into four volumes, and those into eight decads, with a very just description of that vast continent.

Historia general de la India oriental, los descubrimientos y conquista que von hecho los armos de Portugal en el Brasil, &c. hasta el ano de 1562. Valladolid 1603. Folio. This tho' ancient is the fullest account there was till that time of the actions of the Portuguese in the East-Indies and Brasil, writ by F. Antony de S. Roman of the order of S. Benedict.

Historia de la conquista espiritual de la provincia del Paraguay. Madrid 1639. 4°. It is an account of the progress of the preaching jesuits in that province, and written by one of them, who was rector of some colleges in that country.

Itinerario da India a Portugal per terra ano 1520. Coimbra 1565. 16°. A journal of Antony Tenreiro's travels from India by land into Portugal. It was more rare in those days than now, yet there are good remarks to be found in it.

Viage desde Manila a la China. This voyage was performed by F. Augustin de Tordeillas, a Franciscan, but published by John Gonzales de Mendoza, an. 1585. being a voyage from the Philippine islands to China; which I have not seen, nor met with any further account of it.

Historia del descubrimiento, y conquista del Peru, de Augustin de Zarate. Sevilla 1577. 8°. The author was an examiner or controller of accounts in the king's household, and sent over to Peru to enquire into the king's revenue, during the rebellion in those parts, where he gathered materials for his history, which has always been in good esteem where known, as appears by its having been twice translated into Italian.

Historia da Etiopia alta, do P. Baltasar Tellez. Folio. He was a Portuguese jesuit, who collected this history of Ethiopia from the writings of the jesuits, who resided there. He is highly commended by D. Francisco Manoel in his epistles and his history, and no less by Georgius Cordofus in Agiologio.

Conquista de las islas Molucas, de Bartolome Leonardo de Argensola. Madrid 1609. Fol. This author was historiographer of the kingdom of Aragon, and the most accomplished master of the Spanish tongue in his time: So that his history is not only valuable for his excellent account of the Molucco islands, but for its language, wherein he has outdone most men.

Manual y relacion de las cosas del Peru, de F. Bernardino de Cardenas. Madrid 1634. 4^o. The author was a native of Peru, and bishop of Paraguay, so that his birth, education, and learning, qualified him to give a good account of that country.

Navigacion de oriente y noticias de la China, 1577. 8^o. It is a short but ingenious treatise of the eastern voyages, and some affairs of China.

Historia de Yucatan, de Bernardo de Lixana. The author was a missionary in the province of Yucatan, whose history he writes, but intermixed with much devotion.

Historia de las cosas antiguas que los Indios usavan en su infidelidad, por F. Bernardino de Sabagun. This history treats of the idolatry, rites and ceremonies of the Indians, and of their government, laws and politicks. The same author also writ La Conquista, or the conquest of Mexico.

Historia verdadera de la Conquista de la Nueva Espana, por Bernal Diaz del Castillo. Fol. The author of this history of the conquest of Mexico, served in it under Cortes, from the beginning till the last; and therefore speaks as an eye-witness, having been in all the expeditions of note, and received what he could not be present at from those that were. He says he finished his work in the year 1568. but it was not published till some years after.

Relacion de las grandezas de Peru, Mexico, y los Angelos de Bernardo de la Vega. Mexico 1601. 8vo. This is only a collection of rarities in those parts, as the title imports. The author was canon of the church of Tucuman in South America.

Sitio naturaleza y propiedades de Mexico, de Diego de Cisneros, 1618. The author was physician to the marquis de Guadalcasar viceroy of Peru, and gives a very good account of that place.

Decadas de Asia, de Joao de Barros. He finished three decades, in as many volumes, of the history of India; of which work the learned Nicholaus Antonius, in his bibliotheca Hispana, pag. 498. says it is a most complear work, which will last for ever to the honour of the compiler. His 4th volume and decade, which he left imperfect, was finished by John Baptist Labanba, historiographer to K. Philip II. But after that James de Couto undertook to continue the history from the third decade, where Barros ended, and writ nine more; so that the whole work consists of twelve decades, but of these only seven have been printed at Lisbon.

Relaciones del Pegu, de Duarte Fernandez. Of this relation I find no further account.

Relacion de la provincia de Tucuman, de

Fernando de Quintana. This relation is of good authority, and the author was one of the first that went over to inhabit that country.

Memorial y relacion las islas Pbilippinas, de Fernando de los rios Coronel. The author was a priest in good repute, and gives an account of the wealth, not only of the Philippine, but of the Molucco islands, representing at the same time what faults there are in the government of those parts to be redressed.

Verdadeira informacao do Preste Joao das Indias, de Francisco Alvarez. Lisboa 1549. Folio. The author, a man of great probity, was sent by king Emanuel of Portugal into Ethiopia, with his embassador Edward Gabao, and resided there six years returning thence in the year 1533. and during his stay there had time to collect this historical account, in which he gives a description of the country, of its trade, and all things that happened there during the stay of the Portugueses.

Relacao das provincias de Japao, Malabar, Cochinchina, &c. de P. Francisco Cordim. The author was a Portuguese jesuit, who had been in those parts; and his work was so well approved of, that it was thought worthy to be translated into French, and printed at Paris 1645.

Historia general de las Indias de Francisco Lopez de Gomara. This author wrote in a commendable stile; but his history is of no credit, being full of false relations, as is made out by all other authors that write of those parts, some of whom were eye-witnesses of the things he misrepresents, and others received them upon much better information.

Conquista del Peru, por Francisco de Xeres. Salamanca 1547. Fol. The author was secretary to Francis Pizarro the great discoverer and conqueror of Peru, and wrote this account of the conquest of that vast kingdom, as an eye-witness which he presented to the emperor Charles the fifth.

Commentarios de los reyes Incas del Peru. Lisboa 1609. Folio.

Historia general del Peru, 1617. Fol.

Historia de la Florida, y jornada que hizo a ella el governador Hernando de Soto. 1695. 4^o. These three by Garcilaso de la Vega, who calls himself Inca, as being the son of a Spaniard; who was one of the conquerors of the kingdom of Peru, by an Indian woman of the imperial race of the Incas, from whom he took that name. The history of the ancient Incas he received from the natives, that of the actions of the Spaniards from his father and others, who had a share in them.

Trafado em que se contam muitas e estensas as cousas da China, e assi do regno de Ormuz, pelo pelo P. Gaspar da Cruz. Eboræ 1569. 4°. The author, a Dominican friar, travelled as a missionary in India, Persia, and China, where he made his observations, and dedicated his work to king Sebastian of Portugal. Several authors of note make mention of him.

Historia del Estrecho de Magallones, 1552. Fol.

Navigacion del Rio Marañon. These three by Gonzalo Fernandes de Oviedo, who after many honourable employments in Spain, was sent governor of the city of Santo Domingo in Hispaniola, where he resided ten years, and compiled his history of the Indies mentioned in the first place, which he had divided into fifty books, whereof only nineteen are in the volume abovemention'd; to which is added one called, Of shipwrecks. The rest have not appeared, unless we allow his history of the straits of Magellan, the second here spoke of, to be his 20th book, which is published by it self. His account of the river Marañon is in the 3^d volume of Ramusio's travels.

Tratado de la Conquista de las islas de Persia y Arabia, de las muchas gentes, diversas gentes, y estranas y grandes batallas que vio, por Juan Angier. Salamanca 1512. 4°. The author, of whom we have no further account, assures he saw all he writes, which is all the character we can here give his work, but only that it treats of the conquest of the islands on the coasts of Arabia and Persia, and of several nations where he travelled, and the battles he was in.

Historia de las Cosas mas notables, ritos y costumbres del gran regno de la China. Madrid 1586. 8°. This history of the most remarkable things, and the customs and manners of China, was writ by F. John Gonzalez de Mendoza, of the order of St. Augustin, who in the year 1580 was sent into China by K. Philip the 2d of Spain, where he gathered the materials of his history, and composed it at his return.

Virtudes del Indio, de D. Juan de Palafox y Mendoza, obispo de la Puebla de los Angeles. 4°. This is a treatise writ in defence of the Indians by the good bishop, and gives an account of their disposition and manners, in opposition to those that represented them as brutal, and scarce endued with reason. This, tho' it seems not a book of travels, being the manners and customs of strange nations, and by a traveller to those parts, very well deserves admittance among them.

Ethiopia orientalis, e varia historia de cosas notavéis do oriente, do P. F. Joao dos Santos. Eboræ 1609. Fol. It treats of the eastern parts of Africk, where the author, who was a Dominican, resided eleven years as a missionary, making his collections on the spot, which he after methodized in his own country.

Historia natural y moral de las Indias, por el P. Joseph de Acosta. Madrid 1610. 4°. This history is so well known and generally esteemed, that little needs be said of it; the universal character of it being better than what it can here receive, being the history natural and moral of the West-Indies.

Description del nuevo orbe, y de los naturaléz del, por el P. F. Luis Jeronymo de Ore. Lima 1598. Fol. The author was an American by birth, a great traveller in those parts, an able scholar, and of excellent natural parts; all which render'd him capable to write well upon this subject.

Description general de Africa, por Luis del Marmol Caravajal. 3 vol. Folio. This is the fullest account extant of Africk, generally esteemed in all parts, and has been translated into French. The author being a slave at Morocco, there read and heard those accounts he afterwards published, of the interior parts of Africk which remain inaccessible to Christians. Ibnatus & Ambrosius morales, in their histories commend this work.

Historia de Ethiopia, y

Historia de la orden de predicadores en Ethiopia, por F. Luis de Urreta. 2 vol. 4°. Both these generally condemned as fabulous, and particularly by F. Nicholas Godinbo in his book de Abstinentium rebus.

Historia de las islas del Archipelago, China, Tartaria, Cochinchina, Malaca, Sian, Camboja, y Japon, por el P. Marcello de Ribadencira. Barcelona 1601. 4°. This history of those eastern countries was collected there by the author, who travelled the greatest part of them as a missionary.

Relacion del Nombre, Sitio, Plantas, &c. de regno de Sardenha, por el Dr. Martin Camillo. Barcelona 1612. 4°. This was a doctor of the civil law, who being sent by King Philip of Spain into Sardinia, to inspect all the courts there, travelled over the whole island of Sardinia, and took that opportunity to write this learned treatise of its name, situation, plants, conquest, conversion, fertility, towns, cities, and government.

Relacion del Gobierno de los Quixos en Indias. 1608. 4°. An account of the province called Los Quixos in South America, writ by D. Peter de Castro Eorle of Lemos. What more to say of it I do not find.

Relacion de Philippinas, por el P. Pedro Chirino. Roma 1604. 4°. The author of this account of the Philippine islands, spent the greatest part of his life, and ended his days there, so that he was well acquainted with what he writ; but a great part of it consists of the actions of the jesuits in those parts, he being of that society.

Primera parte de la Chronica de Peru, de Pedro Cieca de Leon. Antwerp 1554. 8º. It treats of the limits and description of the provinces of Peru, the founding of cities, and the customs and manners of the Indians. Only this first part is extant, the other four, which the author promises, and were historical having never been published; which is a great loss, for by the value of this first we may judge of the rest.

Historia da provincia de Santa Cruz, a que vulgarmente chamamos Brasil. The history of the province of Santa Cruz, vulgarly Brasil, by Peter de Magalbaens Gandavo. Lisbon 1579. 4º. It is commended by Antonius Leo, in his bibliotheca Indica.

Relacion dos reges de Persia y Ormuz, viage da India oriental a Italia por terra no anno de 1604. An account of the kings of Persia and Ormuz, and travels from India to Italy by land, in the year 1614. 4º. The author Peter Texeira a Portuguese, who performed the journey.

Itinerario de las misiones orientales, con una sumaria relacion del imperio del gran Mogor. An account of the eastern missions, and of the empire of the Mogol. Rome 1649. 4º. Composed by Sebastian Manrique, of which we have no other particulars.

Cortas de D. Hernando Cortes Marques del Valle, de la conquista de Mexico, al emperador. The original letter writ by Cortes the famous conqueror of Mexico, giving the emperor Charles the 5th an account of his expedition. There is no need to speak of the value of such papers, than which nothing can be more authentick, as being the relation of a commander in chief to his sovereign.

Corta do P. Gonzalo Rodrigues do sua embaixado a Etiopia, e do que la le succedeo com o seu Rey Claudio. A letter giving an account of the embassy of F. Gonzalo Rodriguez, sent by the king of Portugal to the emperor of Ethiopia. It is to be seen in F. Nicholas Godinbo de rebus Abyssinorum, lib. II. cap. 58.

Relacion del viage que bizieron los capitones Bartolome Garcia de Nodal, y Gonfalo de Nodal hermanos al descubrimiento del Estrecho Nuevo de S. Vincente, y reconocimiento del de Magalhanes. This is an account of a voyage performed by the two captains above-nam'd to the straits of St. Vincent, which we call strait le Mayre, and to view that of Magellan, in the years 1618, and 1619. Madrid 1621. 4º. It is an exact journal of their voyage and observations whilst they were out, which was 11 months; and they were both able seamen, who had served the king many years.

Viage a la santa ciudad de Jerusalem, descripcion suya y de toda la tierra santa, y peregrinacion al monte Sinai, por el P. Bernardo Italiano. Naples 1632. 8º. A journey to Jerusalem, the description of that holy city and country, and a pilgrimage to mount Sinai, performed by the author, a Franciscan friar.

Relacion de los Sagrados lugares de Jerusalem, y toda la tierra santa. The author F. Blaze de Buiza, a Franciscan, and collector of the charity gathered to pay the Turks the tribute for the privilege of those holy places. It is a curious relation, printed at Salamanca 1624. 8vo.

Tratado de las Drogas, y medicinas de las Indias orientales. Burgos 1578. 4º.

Tratado del viage de las Indias orientales y loque se navega por aquellas partes. Both these by Christopher da Costa, a native of Tangier, who spent many years in his travels in Africk and Asia; and was a doctor of physick, which enabled him to write that most excellent treatise first mentioned of these two, of the plants and drugs of the East-Indies. The second is of the East-India voyage, and of those seas.

Relacao da navegacao de Duarte Lopez a Africa, e Congo, no anno de 1578. Or Lopez his voyage to Africk, and the kingdom of Congo, which is to be seen in Latin in Theodore de Bry's collection.

Viage de D. Fraadrique Henriquez de Ribera a Jerusalem. Lisboa 1580. 4º. This is a pilgrimage to Jerusalem performed by this noble-man, who was marquis of Tarifa, and spent two years in it, setting out in November 1518. and returning in October 1520. when he left this monument of his piety and ingenuity.

Peregrinacao de Fernan Mendez Pinto. Lisboa 1614. Fol. Pinto's travels in India, so fabulous that the general consent of the world has exploded them, tho' some few have taken the pains to defend those chimeras.

Viage que bizo a Jerusalem Francisco Guerero. Sevil 1645. This is another pilgrimage to Jerusalem, by a demi-canon of the cathedral of Sevil, and can only be a repetition of what we see in the others above mentioned.

Gborographia de alguns lugares que stam em bum caminho que Fez Gaspor Barreiras, o ano de 1546, de Badajoz em Cassel la ate Milan en Italia. Coimbra 1561. 4º. The author gives an account of the places he passed thro' in his journey from Badajoz in Spain, to the city of Milan. But Andrew de Resende complains that he stole notes which he friendly communicated to him, and inserted them as his own.

Itinerario da India per terra, ate Portugal, com a descripçao de Jerusalem. Lisboa. 1611. 4°. This journey was performed and book writ by F. Gaspar de Sa, a Portuguese Franciscan, being a journal of his travels from India to Portugal by land, and a description of Jerusalem; but of this sort there are several, and this I do not find has any thing more remarkable above others.

Viage de Jeronimo de Santistevan de Genova por el Cairo a la India, y sa buelta a Portugal. A voyage by Jerome de Santistevan from Genoa by the way of Grand Cairo to India, and his return to Portugal. It is to be seen in Italian in the first volume of Ramusio's collection.

Itinerario de Esparca a las Philippinas, y de alli ala China, y buelta por la India oriental. This is a voyage round the world by F. Martin Ignatius de Loyala, a Franciscan, who took his way from Spain to America, thence to the Philippine islands, thence to China, and so round home by the East-Indies. It is printed in F. John Gonzales de Mendoza's history of China, with the author's name to it, in the edition of the year 1585. but the name is left out in that of 1586.

Jornada da terra Santa. Another holy land pilgrimage, by F. Nicholas Diaz, of the order of St. Dominick.

Itinerario da terra santa, e todas as suas particularidades. Another pilgrimage still to the Holy Land, by F. Pantaleo de Aveiro. Lisbon 1593. 4°.

Relacao de Pedro Alvarez Cabral da sua navegacao a India oriental. This Cabral was the next after Gama sent by Emanuel king of Portugal into India; and accidentally being drove thither by storms, discovered Brasil. This relation is to be seen in Italian in John Baptista Ramusio's collection.

Relacao de Pedro de Cintra, da sua navegacao a costa de Guinée, y a India. A voyage to the coast of Guinea and India, by Peter de Cintra, of which I find no more, but that it was translated into Italian by Aloisius Cadamustus.

Relacao do viage de Pedro Covillam de Lisboa a India per terra, e volta ao Cairo. 1587. This Covillam was one of the first sent from Portugal to discover India by land, before the way to it had been opened by sea; and this is the account of his travels thither, and back to Grand Cairo.

Viage que hizo a Jerusalem el P. F. Pedro de Santo Domingo, de la orden del mismo santo. This was a Dominican lay-brother, who gave an account of his pilgrimage; but enough of them. It was in the year 1600. and printed at Naples in 1604. in 8°.

Viage de Jerusalem de Pedro Gonzales Galardo. Another Holy-Land voyage printed at Sevil 1605. 8°.

Naufragio y peregrinacion en la Costa del Peru, del Pedro Goveo de Vitoria. This is an account of a shipwreck and travels in America by this Goveo in his youth, a book of no great fame, and therefore hard to find any account of it. Printed in 1610. in 8°.

Viage del mundo, por Pedro Ordonez de Zevallos. 4°. This, tho' the author calls it the voyage of the world, only shews a piece of vanity, for it reaches no further than America, a part whereof the author saw, and writes of.

Relacion del voyage que hizo a la India Tomas Lopez, el anno de 1502. This voyage to India by Lopez, is to be seen in Italian in Ramusio's collection.

Nuevo descubrimiento del gran Rio de las Amazonas. A new discovery of the great river of the Amazons, by Christopher de Acuna, a jesuit, who went upon that expedition by order of the king of Spain. Madrid 1641. 4°.

Relacion del voyage de los hermanos Nodales, de Diego Ramirez. This is a relation of the voyage made by the two brothers Bartholomew and Garcia de Nodal to the straits of Le Mayre; their own journal of this voyage was mentioned before, yet this relation is much commended by Anthony de Leon in his Biblioth. Ind. occident. p. 91.

Relacion del naufragio de la Nao Santiago, y Itinerario de la gente, que della se salvo el ano de 1585. This is an account of a Portuguese ship cast away, and of the great sufferings of those that were saved. It is a very remarkable relation, and printed An. 1602. in 8°.

Relacion del descubrimiento de las siete ciudades, de Fernando de Alarcon. The discovery of seven cities in the north America by Ferdinand de Alarcon, it is to be found in Italian in Ramusio's collection, vol. III.

Relacion del descubrimiento de las siete ciudades, de Francisco Vasquez Coronado. The discovery of the seven cities last mentioned by Coronado, and to be found in the same volume of Ramusio.

Tratado de las guerras de los Chichimecas. An account of those northern people in America, called Chichimecas, and the wars with them, by Gonzalo de los Casas, a native of Mexico, and lord of the province of Zanguitan in that country.

Relacion de lo sucedido a los padres de la compania de Jesus en la India oriental y Japon en los Anos 1600, 1601, 1607, y 1608. This account was first writ in Portuguese, and translated in Spanish, and has not very much but what relates to religious affairs.

Historia ecclesiastica del Japon desde el Ano 1602. hasta el de 1621. This is an ecclesiastical history of Japan for those years above-

above-mentioned, composed by F. James Collado, and printed at Madrid, An. 1623. in 4°. It was continued to the year 1622. by F. Jacintus Offanel of the order of S. Dominick, as was the other.

Historia evangelica del regno de la China del P. F. Juan Baptista Morales. This history of China has been always in good repute; the author was a Dominican and missionary first in Camboja, and then in China, where he suffered much, being put to the rack, twice whipped, and then banished. Coming to Rome he gave the pope a good account of the affairs of that country, whither he returned and spent there the remainder of his life, dying at 70 years of age in the province of Fokien. Thus much has been said of him, to shew that he was well acquainted with what he writ, and well deserves the general approbation he has met with.

Embaxada de D. Garcia de Silva Figueroa a la Persia. This ambassador was a man curious and knowing, and observed many considerable things, which other authors have not spoke of, and made learned reflections on what ancient historians have writ of the eastern countries. He gives an account of the manners and customs of the people, and description of all places in the way he went from Goa to Ispahan, the capital of Persia. The relation of the Persians taking Ormuz from the Portugueses, a description of Chilmimara the ancient palace of Persepolis, burnt by Alexander the Great when he was drunk. This is a book of great value in the original Spanish, the French translation being vitiated by the translator, so that there is no relying on it.

Conquista y antiquesdades de las islas de la Gran Canaria, su descripcion, &c. Por el licenciado Juan Nunez de la Pena. 4°. Madrid. The conquest and antiquities of the Canary islands, being perhaps the best relation we have of them, both as to their present state and antiquities.

English.

Hackluyt, a minister by profession, is the first Englishman that compiled any collection of travels now extant: He himself was no traveller, but only delivers what he could gather from others. His work was published in the year 1598, and reaches down to 1597; it is divided into three parts, composing one thick volume in Folio. The first contains the following voyages: 1. K. Arthur to Iseland, An. 517. 2. K. Malgo to Iseland, Gotland, &c. An. 580. 3. K. Edwin to Anglesey and Man, An. 624. 4. Bertus to Ireland, An. 684. 5. Othber beyond Norway, An. 850. 6. Oth-ber into the Sound. 7. Wolstan into the Sound. 8. K. Edgar round his monarchy, An. 973. 9. Edmund and Edward into Hungary, An. 1017. 10. Harald into Russia, An. 1067. 11. An Englishman into Tartary, Poland and Hungary, An. 1243. 12. F. de Plago's wonderful voyage, An. 1246. 13. F. de Rubricis's journal, An. 1253. 14. F. de Linta towards the north-pole, An. 1360. 15. Hen. E. of Derby into Prussia, An. 1390. 16. F. of Woodstock into Prussia, An. 1391. 17. Sir H. Willoughby to Lapland, An. 1553. 18. Chancellor's discovery of Muscovy by sea, An. 1553. 19. Burrough to the river Ob, An. 1556. 20. Johnson to the Samocds, An. 2556. 21. Burrough to Wardbouse, An. 1557. 22. Jenkinson to Russia, An. 1557. 23. Jenkinson from Moscow into Bactria, An. 1558. 24. Jenkinson through Russia into Persia, An. 1561. 25. Alcock, &c. by land to Persia, An. 1563. 26. Johnson, &c. by land to Persia, 1565. 27. Souham and Spark to Novogrod, An. 1566. 28. Jenkinson to Russia, An. 1566. 29. Edwards, &c. by land to Persia, An. 1568. 30. Banister and Duckett by land to Persia, An. 1569. 31. Burrough to Livonia, An. 1570. 32. Jenkinson to Russia, An. 1571. 33. Burrough by land to Persia, An. 1579. 34. Pet and Jackman to the north-east, An. 1580. 35. Horsey by land from Moscow to England, An. 1584. 36. Russians to the north-east. 37. Voyage to Siberia and the river Ob. 38. Vanquishing the Spanish armada, An. 1588. 39. Voyage to Cadiz, An. 1596. Thus far the first volume; the first 16 of which voyages are not of much moment or authority, and the two last are warlike expeditions, which were not properly placed among discoveries; the rest of the volume is filled with treaties, patents and letters. Thus it appears all these, except the two last, are northern voyages. The second volume contains voyages to the straits, coast of Africk, and the East-Indies. Of these the greatest part are pilgrimages to Jerusalem, many of very little moment, expeditions for the Holy Land, common trading voyages, that have little or nothing of curiosity, and sea-fights; all which being a great number, and of no moment, are not worth inserting here: the small remaining part are voyages to Guinea, and other coasts of Africk, and some few to the East-Indies; of all which there is a much better account in Purchas, and others, and therefore they are not inserted in this place. Besides, as in the first part, there are abundance of letters, discourses, patents, and such original papers. The third volume, not to mention many of no worth, has these considerable voyages, Sebastian Cabot's to north America, three of Sir † Sir Martin Forbisher to the north-west passage, two of Davis's to the north-west, Hore and Gilbert to Newfoundland; Grapple, and others to the isle of Ramea; three of Jacques Cartier to Newfoundland, Canada, &c. Roberval to Canada; Amadas, Balow, Greenvil, and others to Virginia; Verazzano, Ribault, Laudonniere, and Gourges to Florida; Marco de Nica, Francis Vazquez Coronado, and Antony de Espejo to Cibola, Culiacon and New Galicia; Ulloa, Alarcon and Drake to California; Ovalle to the Philippine islands, Lequeos, China, and back to Acapulco; Tomson, Bodenbam, Chilton, Hawks, Philips, and Hortop to New Spain, Peru and Panuco; Pert and Cabot to Brasil; Tison and Hawkins to the West-Indies; Hawkins to Guinea, and the West-Indies; Drake to Nombre de Dios; Oxnam, Barker, Drake, Michelson to Mexico, &c. Newport to Puerto Rico, &c. May to the straits of Magellan; Dudley, Preston, Drake, Sherley, Parker, to several parts of the West-Indies; Raleigh to the island Trinidad, and to Guiana; Hawkins, Reniger, Hare, Lancaster to Brasil; two Englishmen and Drake up the river of Plate; Drake round the world; Silva through the straits of Magellan; Winter into the south-sea; Fenton to Brasil; Witbrington to 44 deg. of south latitude; Candish round the world; Ship Delight to the straits of Magellan; Candish his last voyage. Thus have we briefly run over the contents of Hackluyt's collection, precisely setting down all in the first volume, to give the reader a taste of the author's method of heaping together all things good and bad, which has been abridged in relation to the second and third volumes, to avoid being tedious. The collection is scarce and valuable for the good there is to be picked out; but it might be wished the author had been less voluminous, delivering what was really authentick and useful, and not stuffing his work with so many stories taken upon trust, so many trading voyages that have nothing new in them, so many warlike exploits not at all pertinent to his undertaking, and such a multitude of articles, charters, privileges, letters, relations, and other things little to the purpose of travels and discoveries.

Purchas was the next great English collector of travels after Hackluyt, whom he has imitated too much, swelling his work into five volumes in Folio. The whole collection is very valuable, as having preserved many considerable voyages which might otherwise have perished. But to particularize with him, as has been done before with Hackluyt; his first volume is divided into five books. The first contains the travels of the ancient patriarchs, the apostles and philosophers, with the warlike expeditions of Alexander the Great, and other princes; to which is added an enquiry into languages, and an account of the several sorts of religions. The second book treats of navigation in general, the discoveries made by Henry prince of Portugal, King John of Portugal, Columbus of the West and Gama of the East-Indies: then follow Magellan, Drake, Candish, Noort and Spilbergen round the world, and le Maires discovery of the new strait of his name. The third book is filled with some private voyages to the East-Indies, and the first made by the East-India company, with descriptions, and an account of all those parts, their product, trade, government, religion, &c. but all, as delivered by the first that resorted there and made no long stay, imperfect, and far short of what we have had since. The fourth book contains the 8th voyage of the East-India company, capt. Saris to Japan; Finch to India; 9th, 10th, 11th and 12th voyages of the company; observations for sailors; Steel to the Mogul's court; Milward to India; Peyton to India; an extract of Sir Thomas Roe, ambassador from King James to the Mogul, his journal; Coryat's travels. The fifth book still continues upon accounts of the East-India, of all parts thereof, and from many several hands, upon differences between the Dutch and English, wars of the natives, engagements of the English and Portugueses, and many other passages and occurrences to the same purpose. The sixth book, being the first in the second volume, begins with collections of John Leo's history of Africk, and R. C.'s history of Barbary: then follow Nicholay's description of Argier; an expedition to Argier under Sir Robert Mansel; and some relations of Africk. The seventh book begins Jobson's voyage to Guinea; Battle's account of Angola is next, then Pigafetta's relation of Congo, Alvarez's voyage to Ethiopia; D. John de Castro from India to Suez; Bermudez the patriarch to Ethiopia, and Nunbes Barreto of the same country. The eighth contains several pilgrimages to Jerusalem, Christian expeditions to the Holy Land; Barton's (Q. Elizabeth's ambassador to the great Turk) account of his voyage and the adventures of J. Smith. The ninth book consists of Sherley's travels into Persia; Benjamin the son of Jonas his peregrination; Terrey's voyage to the Mogul; Barthema's to Egypt, Syria, Arabia, Persia and India; Collections of Asia out of Arabick; Meneses his account of India; Figueroa to Is-paban; J. de Santos to Ethiopia; Jobson on Gambra river; account of the Grand Signior's seraglio; Sanderson's voyages in the straits; Timberley from Cairo to Jerusalem; Newberry

Newbery of the eastern parts of the world; Fran. Pyrard de la Vol to the East-Indies. The tenth book has a collection of Spanish and Portuguese voyages out of Galvan; Trigautius his voyage to India; Letter touching Japan; Frederick's Indian observations; Balbi to Pegu; Fitz to Goa, and other parts of India; Pimenta's observations of India; Linschoten's voyages to India; relation of Ormuz; Sir Rob. Sberley to Persia; Coryate's travels; Lithgow Scot to the Holy Land, &c. Intelligence out of Turkey; Brown's Indian voyage; Dutch proceedings at Amboyna; and description of the bay of Todos os Santos. The third volume, book the first, contains as follows: W. de Rubricis travels into the east; relations of Bacon, and Balvacensis; Wendover of the Tartars; Mr. Paulus Venetus his voyages; S. J. Mandevile's travels; Extracts of an Arabick history of Tamerlan; travels of Chaggi Memet, a Persian; treatise of China, of F. Gaspar da Cruz; Pereira of China. The second book has, Sir H. Willoughby, Chancellor, and Jenkinson's voyages to the north-east; Extracts of Fernan Mendez Pinto's travels; Discovery and planting of the Philippine islands; Goes travels from Labor to China by land; Jesuits first entrance into China and Japan; Pantoja's account of China; Discourse of China out of Riccius and Trigautius. The third book, Fletcher's treatise of Russia; Edge's northern voyages; Barents into the north-sea; Gerart de Veer northern voyages; Iver Boty of Iceland and Greenland; description of Siberia, Samoieda and Tingoësia; Gourdon to Pecora; Logan to Pechora, and his wintering there; Pusglove to Pechora, and wintering there; Gourdon wintering at Pustozra; Voyages to Cherry island; Hudson's northern voyages; Discovery of Nicholas and Anthony Zeni; Quirino's shipwreck; Barkley's travels in Europe, Asia, Africk and America; Broniovius embassador to the Crim Tartar; Blesken's voyages and history of Iceland and Greenland; Angrim Jonas history of Iceland. The fourth book, Sir T. Smith to Cherry Island; Poole to Greenland; Baffin to Greenland; Fosterby to Greenland; several northern voyages; revolutions in Russia; Cofack's travels out of Siberia to Catay; Discovery of the river Ob; Cabot, Thorn and Weymouth voyages to the south-west; Hall to discover Greenland; Knight to the north-west passage. Other northern voyages. The fifth book, Herrera's description of the West-Indies, Acosta and Oviedo of the West-Indies, Mexican history in cuts, conquest of Mexico by Cortes, other particulars of America. The fourth volume begins with the sixth book, and in it as follows; the first book, Earl of Cumberland's voyage, Cabot, Pert, Hawkins and Drake's voyages and sea-fights, Carder living among the savages in Brasil, Candish's unfortunate voyage to the straits of Magellan, Knivet's adventures with Candish, Turner in Brasil, Parker taking Puerto Bello, Middleton and Geare to the West-Indies. Description of the island Trinidad, country of Guiana, and river Oronoko, by F. Sparrey. Leigh's voyages to Guiana, massacre of English in Guiana, Wilson's relation of Guiana; Harcourt to Guiana, description of the river of the Amazons. The seventh book, a treatise of Brasil written by a Portuguese; extracts of Leri's history of Brasil; Schuirdel's 20 years travels, Hawkins to the South-sea, Ellis of the same voyage, relation of an Englishman 13 years prisoner in Peru, Ursino of the coast of the firm land, and secrets of Peru and Chili; Notes of the West-Indies out of Peter Ordóñez de Cevallos. New discovery in the South-sea by Peter Fernandez Quiros, Lope Vas of American affairs; extracts of Benzo of the new world, and of Garcilasso Incas of Peru; Pizarro's conquest of Peru, occurrences in Peru after the conquest. The eighth book, Alvar Nunez of Florida, Soto to Florida, Discoveries to the northward of Mexico by Nuno de Guzman, Marco de Nica, D. Fr. Vasquez Coronada, and D. Ant. de Espejo; Casas of the cruelties of the Spaniards, Voyages and plantations of French in North-America, Gosnol to Virginia, other voyages to Virginia, Description of the Azores. The ninth book, Description of Virginia, and proceeding of the English colonies there, Wreck of Sir Thomas Gate, and account of the Bermudas; Argol from Virginia to Bermudas, affairs relating to Virginia, fight of an English and two Spanish ships, voyages to the summer islands, and history of them. The tenth book, discovery and plantation of New England, Chilton's voyage for North Virginia, extracts of Smith of New England's trials, other accounts of New England; New Scotland the first planting of it, Newfoundland the first settlements there, and account of the island; warlike fleets set out by queen Elizabeth against the Spaniards, the duke of Medina's for invasion of England, Squadron of the galleons of Portugal; the expedition to Portugal by Sir John Norris and Sir Francis Drake, supposed to be writ by colonel Antony Wingfield; expedition to Cadix, and the success against the Spanish ships, and in taking the town; the earl of Essex his fruitless expedition to the Azores, the conclusion of the work. The fifth volume is a theological and geographical history of the world, consisting of the description, and an account of the religions of all nations. This author like Hackluyt, as was observed at first, has thrown in all that came to hand to fill up so many volumes, and is excessive full of his own notions, and of mean quibbling and playing upon words; yet for such as can make choice of the best, the collection is very valuable.

A voyage to Surat in the year 1689, giving a large account of that city, its inhabitants and factory of English, describing Madeira, Santiago, Annoboa, Cablanda, Malamba, S. Helena, Bombay, Mascate, Mycate, the cape of Good Hope, and island of Ascension, the revolution of Golconda, description of Arracan and Pegu, an account of the coins of India and Persia, and observations concerning silk-worms. By J. Ovington, 8°. London 1696. This is the most modern English account of those parts, and by a person well qualified to make such observations.

Travels and voyages into Asia, Africk and America, performed by mons. John Morquet, keeper of the cabinet of rarities to the king of France in the Tuilleries, in six books with cuts. Translated from the French by Nathaniel Pullen gent. 8°. London, 1696. For so many travels the relation is too short, however there are things in it worth observing.

A new voyage to the East-Indies, in the years 1690 and 1691, with a description of several islands, and of all the forts and garisons in those parts, now in possession of the French; the customs, &c. of the Indians, by mons. du Quisne. It has also a description of the Canaries, and of Senaga and Gambia on the coast of Africk, with several cuts and a map of the Indies, and another of the Canaries. Made English from the Paris edition, 12°. London, 1696. Of the French factories in those parts we have no such account; and few better for the bulk, of all other places the author undertakes to speak of.

The voyages and travels of Sir John Mandevil Knt. shewing the way to the Holy Land and Jerusalem, to the Great Cham, Prestor John, India, and other countries; 4°. London, 1696. It is needless to say much of this book, as being so universally allowed to be fabulous.

Two journies to Jerusalem, the first an account of the travels of two English pilgrims, and accidents that befel them in their journey to Jerusalem, Grand Cairo, Alexandria, &c. The second of 14 Englishmen in 1669, with the antiquities, monuments, and memorable places mentioned in scripture; there are also ancient and modern remarks of the Jewish nation, the description of the Holy Land, captivities of the Jews, what became of the ten tribes, &c. Here is very much promised, but the performance scarce answers, the volume being too small, and looks more like a collection out of some real travels, than any true pilgrimage performed.

Travels through Germany, Bobemia, Switzerland, Holland, and other parts of Europe, describing the most considerable cities and palaces of princes; with historical relations and critical observations, upon ancient medals and inscriptions, by Charles Patin M. D. of the faculty of Paris, made English and illustrated with copper cuts, 8°. London, 1694. For those who are curious in medals this piece will be most acceptable; yet this does not lessen the value of the descriptions and other relations.

A new discovery of a vast country in America extending above 4000 miles between New France and New Mexico, with a description of rivers, lakes, plants, and animals, manners, customs, and languages of the Indians, &c. by L. Hennepin; to which are added new discoveries in North America, and not published in the French edition, 8°. The promise is very great, but there is little or rather no proof of such a vast extent of land, which no man has yet seen, and is all framed upon conjectures, or what is as groundless, idle relations of Indians; the other parts have more in them, yet only what is collections out of better authors.

A late voyage to St. Kilda, the remotest of all the Hebrides or western isles of Scotland; with a history of the island natural, moral and topographical, containing an account of the peoples religion and customs, of the fish, fowl, &c. As also of a late impostor there, pretending to be sent by St. John Baptist. By M. Martin gent. 8°. London, 1698. We have here the only history and account of this island, that ever perhaps appeared in any language; and being such, its reputation ought to hold good, till any better can appear to lessen it.

The history of the buccaniers of America, 8°.

A new account of East-India and Persia in eight letters, being nine years travels, containing observations of the moral, natural and artificial state of those countries, as the government, religion, laws, customs, soil, seasons, diseases, animals, vegetables, manufactures, trade, weights and measures, in the principal places there. By John Fryer, M. D. with maps and tables, London 1698.

A voyage to the East-Indies, giving an account of the isles of Madagascar and Mascarenbas, of Surat, the coast of Malabar, Goa, Gomron, Ormuz, and the coast of Brasil, &c. and of the religion, customs, trade, &c. of the inhabitants, also a treatise of distempers peculiar to the Eastern countries.

countries. There is annexed an abstract of monf. Renford's history of the East-Indies, with his propofals for improvement of the East-India company; written originally in French, by monf. Dellon, M. D. 8°. London, 1698. This work has been well received both in French and English.

A new voyage and description of the Ibimus of America, giving an account of the author's abode there, the form of the country, coasts, hills, rivers, wood; soil, weather, &c. Trees, fruit, beafts, birds, fish, &c. The Indian inhabitants, their features, complexion, manners, customs, employments, marriages, feasts, hunting, computation, language, &c. With remarkable occurrences on the South-sea and other places, by Lionel Wafer, with cuts, 8°. London, 1698. A work that has been well received by the publick.

A new account of North-America, as it was lately presented to the French king; containing a more particular account of that vast country, and of the manners and customs of the inhabitants, than has been hitherto published, 8°. London, 1698. We have here a French account of those countries, but more particularly what belongs to them, more exact than any other has delivered.

The new Atlas, or travels and voyages in Europe, Asia, Africa, and America, &c. 8°. London, 1699. A little volume, which seems rather some collections out of books and travels, than any real voyage.

An account of a voyage from Archangel in Russia, in the year 1697, of the ship and company wintering near the north Cape, in the latitude of 71 degrees: Their manner of living, and what they suffer'd by the extreme cold; also remarkable observations of the climate, country and inhabitants: with a chart describing the place where they lay, land in view, soundings, &c. By Thomas Allison commander of the ship. This is the latest relation we have of any such northerly wintering, and well worth comparing with such others as write of those northern parts.

A relation of two several voyages made into the East-Indies, by Christopher Fryke surgeon, and Christopher Schwartz, particularly describing those countries that are under the Dutch, 8°. London, 1699. There is nothing extraordinary in them.

An account of a Dutch embassy to the emperor of China, writ by one of those ambassador's retinue, Fol. It is a translation from the Dutch original, and contains a description of the country, and all places they passed through, with 200 cuts drawn upon the spot; It treats also of the government of China, and manners of the people.

The description of the island of Ceylon by captain Knox. He lived 19 years upon the island, being taken, and kept there all this while by the Dutch, and had the opportunity of seeing the greatest part, and being informed of the rest by the natives. He gives a particular account of his manner of living, and accidents that befel him till he made his escape, and then treats very fully of all things that relate to the island. The Dutch who are masters of Ceylon, have thought this account worth translating into their language, and it has found a good reception among them, which must add to its reputation.

Travels to Dalmatia, Greece and the Levant, by Mr. George Wheeler. He travelled with Mr. Spon, who published the same travels in French, but Mr. Wheeler remaining there behind him, has several curiosities that escaped the other, many medals and curious cuts of antiquities; so that his work seems the most compleat, or at least both together confirm one another.

Terry's voyage to the East-Indies, begun in the year 1615. 12°. He was chaplain to Sir Thomas Roe, ambassador to the Mogol from K. James the first, and gives an account of some things in that country omitted by Sir Thomas, in his relation; but a great part of his book is filled up with discourses of his own, very little to the purpose.

An account of several late voyages and discoveries to the south and north, containing Sir John Narbrough's voyage thro' the straits of Magellan, to the coast of Chile, in the year 1669. Capt. Wood's voyage for the discovery of the north-east passage, An. 1676. Capt. Tasman's round Terra Australis, An. 1642, and Frederick Martens to Spisberg and Greenland, An. 1671. With a supplement, containing observations and navigations to other northern parts; and an introduction, giving a brief account of several voyages. This collection has generally a good reputation, and seems very well to deserve it.

Collection of original voyages, publish'd by capt. Hack, 8°. It contains Cowley's voyage round the world, which is the same with Dampier's mentioned in the next place: Capt. Sharp's voyage into the South-sea, both buccanier voyages. The third is capt. Wood's voyage thro' the straits of Magellan, which is the same as Sir John Narbrough's before-mentioned: And the fourth Mr. Roberts's adventures among the Corsairs of the Levant; so that there is little new in them, the three first being in other collections, and the last a very indifferent piece.

Dampier's voyages in three volumes, 8°. The first a new voyage round the world, begun begun An. 1697. It describes the Isthmus of America, and several of its coasts and islands, the passage by Tierra del Fuego, the isle of Guam one of the Ladrones, the Philippines, Formosa, Luconia, Celebes, the cape of Good Hope, island and of S. Helena.

The second volume he calls a supplement to his voyage round the world, where he describes Tonquin, Achen, Malaca, &c. Their product, inhabitants, manners, trade, &c. The countries of Campeche, Yucatan, New Spain in America; and discourses of trade, winds, breezes, storms, seasons, tides, currents of the torrid zone.

The third volume is his voyage to New Holland, which has no great matter of new discovery, but gives an account of the Canary islands, some of those of Cabo Verde, and the town and port of Baya de Totos os Santos in Brasil. All the three volumes have cuts and maps.

A collection of voyages by the Dutch East-India company, being three to the north east, two to the East-Indies, and one to the straits of Magellan. Little can be said in behalf of this work, being no more than what is to be seen in several other collections. 8°.

An historical relation of the island of Ceylon in the East-Indies, &c. illustrated with cuts and a map of the island, Fol. The author who lived long in that country, gives a general description of it, referring the reader to the map; and then the whole natural history.

Lassel's travels through Italy, first printed in one volume 12°. then in two. He was there four times, and gives a particular and curious account of most things of note there.

Relation of the discovery of the island Madera, 4°. This is a discovery before it was peopled, and it continued lost again for several years, and has little of certainty.

Gage's survey of the West-Indies, 8°. This book has gained some reputation.

The discoveries of John Lederer in three several marches from Virginia to the west of Carolina, and other parts of the continent, begun in March 1669. and ended in September 1670. 4°. This is a small account of the author's, who was a German, and travelled further up the inland in that part, than any has yet done; is contained in about four sheets, published by Sir William Talbot, in which there is much worth observing.

Relation of the travels and captivity of W. Davies, 4°. A small pamphlet of a few sheets.

Account of the captivity of Thomas Phelps at Machaness in Barbary, and his escape. Another small 4° pamphlet.

The golden coast, or description of Guinea, in which are four English voyages to Guinea. A 4° pamphlet and has several pretty observations.

Herbert's travels into divers parts of Africa, and Asia the Great, more particularly into Persia and Indostan, Fol. These travels have always deservedly had a great reputation, being the best account of those parts written by any Englishman, and not inferior to the best of foreigners. What is peculiar in them, is the excellent description of all antiquities, the curious remarks on them, and the extraordinary accidents which often occur, not to mention other particulars common in the books of all other travellers, which would be too tedious for this place.

Brown's travels in divers parts of Europe, Fol. The author, a doctor of physick, has shewed himself excellently qualified for a traveller by this ingenious piece, in which he has omitted nothing worthy the observation of so curious a person, having spent much time in the discovery of European rarities, and that in those parts which are not the common track of travellers, who content themselves with seeing France, and Italy, and the Low-Countries; whereas his relation is of Hungary, Servia, Bulgaria, Macedonia, Theffaly, Austria, Styria, Carinthia, Carniola and Friuli; adding to these Germany, the Low-Countries, and a great part of Italy, of all which he has composed a work of great use and benefit.

The voyages and travels of J. Albert de Mandelsto, a gentleman belonging to the embassy sent by the duke of Holfstein, to the duke of Moscovy and king of Persia, Fol. These are also known by the name of Olearius's travels; the first part, which is of Muscovy and Persia, being altogether his, who was secretary to the aforesaid embassy: But then the following part, which treats of all parts of the East-Indies, is solely Mandelsto's, who left the ambassadors and Olearius at Ispahan, and proceeded to view those remoter parts. It is needless to give any other character of this work, than to inform such as are unacquainted with it, that it has generally the reputation of being one of the most accomplish'd books of travels now extant.

Blunt's travels to the Levant, is a very short account of a journey through Dalmatia, Sclavonia, Bosnia, Hungary, Macedonia, Theffaly, Tbrace, Rbodes and Egypt: The whole very concise, and without any curious observations, or any notable descriptions; his account of the religions, and customs of those people, only a brief collection of some other travellers, the language mean, and not all of it to be relied on, if we credit others who have writ better.

A description of the present state of Samos, Nacaria, Patmos, and mount Atbos; by Jos. Georgirenes, archbishop of Samos, 8°. This prelate resided long as archbishop at Samos, and saw Nicaria as being a dependance of his diocess; but being weary of that function, he retired to Patmos, where he continued some time, and after visited mount Atbos; so that all he delivers of these places is as an eye-witness, and indeed the most particular account we have of them. The description is very exact, and what he says of the Greek religion may be relied on, as having so much reason to know it. All that can be excepted against, is what he says of the people in Nicaria, conversing at four or five miles distance, which indeed is not very credible. The preface the reader must observe is the translator's, not the author's, which is requisite to be known.

A voyage to Constantinople, by monf. Grelot, 8°. translated into English by J. Philips. This, tho' perhaps in the relation may not contain much more than what may be picked out of other travellers who have writ of those parts, yet it exceeds them in 14 curious cuts, the exactness of which is attested by several travellers that have been at Constantinople, and seen the places they represent; besides that all the ingenious people of Paris gave their approbation of the work, and upon their testimony the K. himself having seen the draughts, thought fit to order the author to print it. So that we need not make any scruple, to reckon it among the best books of travels; for as far as it reaches, which is to Constantinople, the Propontis, Hellepont and Dardanelis, with the places adjoining, the remarks of the religion, worship, government, manners, &c. of the Turks, are singular.

A description of the islands and inhabitants of Færoe, being 17 islands, subject to the king of Denmark, in 62 deg. of north lat. written in Danish, and translated into English, 12°. The description is very particular and curious, and indeed more than could well be expected of those miserable northern islands; but the author was provost of the churches there, and had time to gather such an account, which is somewhat enlarged with philosophical observations on whirlpools and other secrets of nature. His character of the people is very favourable, and favours more of affection than sincerity; but the worst part of this small book, is first a collection of some romantick stories of the ancient inhabitants of Færoe; and in the next place, what is yet worse, a parcel of insignificant tales of spectres and illusions of

Josselin's two voyages to New England, 8°. In the first of these there is little besides the sea-journal and common observations, unless it be an account of necessities for planters. The second is a very particular description of all the country, its beasts, fowl, fish, plants and trees, the manners and customs of the English inhabitants, the time of their settling there, with many other matters well worth observing. Of the Indians he has very little or nothing. The relation is curious and faithful, but in many places where the author makes his own remarks, there are the oddest uncouth expressions imaginable, which look very conceited, but that is only as to his stile. He concludes with what he calls chronological observations of America, much whereof no way relates to that part of the world, and the rest is of no great use, especially for that there are several errors in it.

Josselin's New England rarities, a very small 8°. is a more particular account of the fowl, beasts, fishes, serpents, insects, plants, stones, minerals, metals, and earth of that country, than he has given in his voyages.

The adventures of M. T. S. an English merchant, taken prisoner by the Turks of Argier, and carried into the inland country of Africk, 12°. Containing a short account of Argier in the year 1648. of the country about it, and more particularly of the city Tremizen, where the author resided three years, going abroad with several parties which his master commanded, and relates some love intrigues he had with Moorish women, as also very strange metamorphoses of men and other creatures turned into stone. The relation is plain and without artifice. At the end are added directions how to turn it out at the straits mouth with a westerly wind.

Wysbe's relation of the river Nile, its source and current, a small Octavo. This is only a translation of a Portuguese jesuit's account who lived in Ethiopia some years, being the same that is given by F. Alvarez, and others of the society who lived there, and no doubt is very authentick, as delivered by an eye-witness, who was a person of probity. Other things relating to the unicorn, rhinoceros, bird of paradise, pelican and phoenix, he writes upon hearsay, which deserve not the same credit, particularly what he says that the rhinoceros has two horns, which we have seen in England to be otherwise; and of the great rarity of pelicans, which are also sufficiently known. But these are trifles: he discourses well of the reason of calling the Ethiopian emperor Prester John, on the Red-sea, and of the palm or cocotree.

Ray's travels, or his observations topographical, moral and physiological, made in a journey through part of the Low-Countries, Germany, Italy and France. He throughout it gives a very brief, yet ingenious description of every town he saw, observes some particulars of the customs and dispositions of the people; and curiously lays before us any thing that is rare in it self, or not known to us: but in his account of mineral waters, and of foreign plants, as one so understanding in those particulars, he outdoes any thing that could be expected from other travellers. He makes an excuse for the language, which he need not, it being well enough for plain notes of a traveller. Venice he describes more particularly than any other place; but of all universities, as being himself a scholar, he says more than of other towns. Of France not much, as having made but a short stay there. He closes his work with a Latin catalogue of plants he observed abroad, which either do not grow or are very rare in England.

He has inserted Willoughby's travels in Spain.

Thus have we run through all the books of travels of any note now extant, Latin, Italian, Spanish, French and English, placing each as near as we could in its own original language; and therefore those who miss any in the English, may look for them in the other languages, where they will certainly find them, if they were originally in that tongue. We have not made any particular catalogue of Dutch, because they are not very many, and all of them will be found, as they were translated into other languages. As for the characters given of books, in some places it is quoted where they were had; but if such authority be not quoted, it is because the books have been purposely perused and examined, where such account could not be found of them. Lastly the reader must observe, that in this catalogue, there is no mention made of any of the travels contained in this collection, which would be a needless repetition, they being all mentioned and characterized in the general preface.

R E A D E R.

TH E R E is no doubt but he who writes and aspires to the name of an historian, is obliged in the first place to shield and guard himself with truth, and the sincerity of what he designs to expose to the eyes of all men, otherwise he will gain the title of a fabulous author. S. Isidorus, lib. I. orig. cap. 40. says thus. History is a relation of a thing transacted, by which those things that were done in times past are known: it is called history either from seeing or knowing, for among the antients no man writ history but he who had been present, and seen those things that were to be writ.

If he who takes pen in hand is not an eye-witness, or is not fully inform'd of what he commits to writing, but only relies on and trusts to other mens accounts, which he credits without examining into them, his reputation will certainly be in danger, and the sincerity of his work be called in question. Thales being ask'd, How far distant is truth from fall-hood? answer'd, A wise man was of opinion, that as far as the eyes are from the ears. Cornelius à Lapide in cap. i. Isai. ingenuously says, That those things are undoubtedly true, which a man sees with his eyes, not those he hears with his ears. What the eyes see may be affirmed with safety, what is heard is told with mistrust and apprehension. S. Jerom epist. ad Desid. says, There is a difference in relating those things which are seen, and those which are heard, and therefore he that has seen may write more certainly. Being wholly governed by these principles, I resolv'd not to make account in this work of any thing but what I have seen, read, and has gone through my hands. The penalty he incurs who does not stick to truth in all particulars, is, not to be believed when he speaks true. Aristotle being ask'd, What benefit liars reap'd? answer'd, Not to be believed when they speak truth. S. Jerom epist. ad Jul. says, That credit is not given to liars when they speak truth. Ecclus. xxxiv. 4. speaks to the same purpose, What truth will be spoke by a liar? A Punishment justly due to such as are governed by their own fancies or imaginations, or aspire to gain applause by fictions and dreams. Laertius, lib. I. cap. 5. says thus, That this was the punishment of Cassandra, Priam's daughter, who practis'd the art of divination, not to be believed when she foretold the ruin of her country. This woman by her false stories got such an ill reputation, that she was not believed when she truly foretold the destruction of her country.

It cannot be denied, but that many false accounts have been sent into Europe, as well of China as other parts of Asia; for the missionaries themselves who are well acquainted with those parts, and are eye-witnesses, unanimously confess and affirm it. My own knowledge and experience, what I have seen and discours'd with others upon several occasions, are sufficient to make me agree with them, and assert the same; so that I shall with safety keep at a great distance from what some persons have published in these parts.

My design was to have first publish'd the antient and modern controversies that have been in the Chinese mission from its first beginning, till the year 1669, as being a more necessary and advantageous subject. But some persons thought this work ought to be immediately committed to the press, because some points in it help to make many difficulties more intelligible that are to be handled hereafter, as also because it treats of common affairs.

I do not question but the language is plain, and like a man that has spent twenty four years in studying strange languages, and those very different from any in Europe. The subject is uncommon, and therefore diverting, yet withal beneficial and profitable, which ought always to be aim'd at. S. Isidorus, cap. 40. of the above mentioned book, says thus, The histories of nations do not hinder the readers from making their advantage of what is profitable in them: for many wise men committed to histories the past actions of men for the instruction of the present.

The delight many take in reading history, as well as other things, cannot but be commended. Fasciculus Temporum, fol. 3. has these words: It is therefore very advantageous to know many histories, and be well acquainted with them, that we may be able to follow the good examples of others, and shun the bad. The Chineses teach the same doctrine. What I write may be applied to all those uses, this is all I aspire to; and tho' I attain not my end, yet my labour deserves to be stil'd profitable. Salvianus in præfat. says, At least it is not unprofitable to attempt to do good. And Plinius Jun. lib. II. epist. 5. has these words; And I would have these things so taken, not as if I had compass'd my design, but as if I had labour'd to compass it. And lib. VI. epist. 17. he says farther, And truly I am wont to honour and imitate all men that perform any thing in study. Do you therefore, reader, accept of my labour and good wishes, and wink at my faults.

1. IT is well known there is no such method to be found in what the philosopher Confucius taught, and his disciples writ after him, as other antient philosophers observe: they are all loose sentences, not confined to any particular subject: however, being but a mere translator in this particular, I follow his steps without deviating in the least.

2. So in translating the Chinese book called, The mirror of the soul, I observe the author's method, which is the cause that one and the same sentence is several times received: but in regard we sometimes see the same in European authors, I do not look upon it as an objection of consequence, or so considerable as to oblige me to alter its order, especially because my design is no other but to make known what light of nature a nation so remote from conversation and commerce with all others as China is, has had for so many ages. This we have taken notice is the cause why some points relating to one and the same virtue are divided into several parts; but in my opinion it is better not to deviate from the method those authors follow, whose doctrine we write, than to reduce it to a certain number of chapters.

3. It is to be observed, that other nations must not look upon those things as incredible, which are peculiar to any one in particular; otherwise only what we see in our own countries would be true, and all the rest fabulous, which is unreasonable. We must not be governed by passion, or private affection, but by reason, and the understanding, which we know does not comprehend all that is in the world. How many years did a certain philosopher break his rest to learn the nature of the ant, and at last made nothing of it? At Macasar, as I write in the sixth book, I saw a child that had twenty four fingers and toes, and was also an hermaphrodite, two distinct monstrous parts, perhaps seldom seen in the world in the same creature. The first part has infallible examples of its truth, one in 2 Sam. xxi. 20. where was a man of great stature, that had on every hand six fingers, and on every foot six toes, four and twenty in number. Another is in 1 Chron. xx. 6. where was a man of great stature, whose fingers and toes were four and twenty, &c. And though these seem to be but one and the same, yet they may pass for an example: but I know not that there is any in antient books of both these things together, and yet it does not follow that there is no such monster in the world. The same I say in other respects, for not to believe them argues no want of truth on their side, but it shews little knowledge and small acquaintance with the world. Those who are well read and curious, are safer, because they take better measures to go by; especially those who leaving their own country, have travell'd through strange countries, these have more lofty and universal ideas of things; they are less surpriz'd, and make a different judgment of what they hear or read, without rashly judging that doubtful and uncertain, which is new to them. True it is, he that writes submits his labour to the judgment of the multitude, who are wont to be more ready to condemn, because they are less capable of understanding. S. Thom. opusc. 27. writes thus, Thence it comes that many unexperienced persons upon slight consideration easily speak their mind. The only remedy in this case is, not to mind what they say.

I sometimes give my opinion in cases to appearance not belonging to my profession, where in I follow the doctrine of our Silvester verb. concil. tract. 2. and of Cajetan 2. 2. q. 45. art. 3. ad 3. Upon which you may also read the learned F. Sylveira, tom. 5. in evangel. lib. IV. cap. 4. quæst. 2. & 3. Besides, to speak to any business, it is enough that a man has knowledge and experience of it, which is absolutely necessary, according to Tully 11. de orat. That the main thing in counsel was to know the common-wealth. And Tacitus in Agric. expresses it yet better, Men acquainted with the manners and designs of the province. He who has gain'd especial and particular particular knowledge of some points by experience, may freely and without apprehension speak to them, especially where there are those who pretend to be heard like oracles, without any other reason for it, but that fortune has made them to be fear'd, so that no body dares oppose their opinions or fancies.

5. I now and then, as occasion offers, undertake to plead the cause of the Indians in the Philippine islands, as many more have done for those of America: this is tolerable, because grounded on compassion, mercy, and the inclination of our kings and their supreme council of the Indies, who love them as their children, and give repeated orders every day for their good, advantage, quiet, satisfaction and ease. There is no other fault to be found with those poor creatures, but that which S. Peter Chrysologus found in the holy innocents, whose only crime was that they were born. There is no reason for all their sufferings, but their being in the world; and it is worth observing, that though so many pious, gracious, and merciful orders have pass'd in favour of them, yet they have taken so little effect. Hab. c. i. says thus, Therefore the law is rent, and judgment came not unto the end, &c. So that though these wretches have been several times redeemed, yet they remain in perpetual servitude. Silvanus, lib. VI. de provid. says thus, All captives when once redeemed enjoy their liberty; we are always redeem'd, and are never free. This suits well with what we speak of. To which we may add that of St. Paul, 2 Cor. viii. 13. It is a subject deserves to be consider'd, and much authority and a high hand must make the remedy work a due effect.

6. F. Victorio Riccio, a Florentine, my companion in China, and a man of excellent parts, and rarely qualified for all business, especially for the Chinese language, in which, tho' doubtless the most difficult in the world, he made a mighty progress with much ease; in a short time writ one tome, containing an account of what relates to our mission from its first beginning, till the year 1665. we daily expect the means to print it.

7. I sometimes in this history name some persons, which is not by chance, but designedly; for tho' it be in speculative affairs, it is proper to attribute them to their own authors, and not lay them to others. Oleaster in Num. xxv. on those words, Now the name of the Israelite, &c. writes thus: It often happens the good name of a whole community is in danger on account of the vices of one member, as long as he that is guilty of those vices is not known; therefore for the most part it is convenient to know his name, lest the reputation of all men suffer for him. 'Tis true, there is no such danger upon this occasion.

8. I most readily submit all whatsoever is contain'd in this book to the censure and correction of our holy mother the catholic church, and of its universal head the pope, successor to St. Peter, and CHRIST's vicar, whose faith I preach'd and taught pure and untainted for above twelve years to the Gentiles of China, and other nations in those parts, where I have lived, and through the goodness of God hope to die.

BOOK I.

Of the Original, Name, Grandeur, Riches, and other Particulars of the Great Empire of CHINA.

CHAP. I.

Of the Name of CHINA.

1. THE utmost bounds of Asia, the noblest part of the universe, are the seat of the most glorious empire in all natural respects, the sun ever shines upon. We Europeans vulgarly give it the name of the Great China, and with good reason; for it is great in all respects; rich, fruitful, abounding in plenty of all things, and powerful, as will plainly appear by the short account I shall here give of it. But before I enter upon the matter, it will be proper to make known its name, and whence it is derived, for the more methodical proceeding, and to follow the example set me by many grave authors; who before they launch into the account of the great affairs of those empires and kingdoms they treat of, have first clear'd the original and etymology of their names.

China.

2. It is well known that the name China, (which the French and Italians pronounce Cina) is not the proper appellative of that empire, but a name given it by strangers trading thither. The Portuguese first took it from them; and afterwards the Spaniards in the Philippine islands. Father Julius Aleni a jesuit, in his book written in the Chinese tongue, speaking of this subject, says, That China, in the language of those strangers, signifies a country or kingdom of silk; which being there in such great plenty, those who sail'd thither to purchase this commodity, used to say, Let us go to the land of silk, or to China, which signifies the same thing. Don F. Gregory Lopez, bishop of Basilea, who now governs the church of China, a religious man of our order, and born in that empire, affirmed the same to me. Trigaucius, lib. I. cap. 2. and Kircher, fol. 3. seem to incline to this opinion: the first says, China is the antient Sericana; and the latter, that it was formerly called Sina and Serica.

tion, but China is the country of the Hippophagi, or horse-eaters, because horse-flesh is eaten throughout all that kingdom, as frequently as we eat beef. But I am of opinion it might more properly be called the country of dog-eaters; for though they eat much horse-flesh, they eat no less of asses, and very much more of dogs, as shall be said in another place. Others will have it, that the strangers trading in China, compounded this name of the two Chinese words, Cbi and Nan, which signify to point towards the south; and the merchants resorting thither, coming always upon the south coast, which the Chinese expressed by those two words above mentioned, these strangers made one of them, and called the country by that name. F. Antony de Gouvea, a Portuguese jesuit, was of this opinion: we several times discours'd upon this subject, and methinks it is well grounded.

4. F. Lucena, in his History, lib. X. cap. 3. says, the usual salutation of the Chinese is Cbin, Cbin; which the strangers hearing, they understood China, and so took that word for the name of the country. This carries some resemblance of truth to credit it, especially because the manner of the natives accenting Cbin, is almost as if there were an a with it, which made it easy to apprehend China, when they heard Cbin: And though it is true the right word those people use in saluting is not Cbin, but Zing, however in some parts the country people pronounce it Cbin. Certain it is the name was given by strangers; and though they might take it from some words of the country, yet they corrupted, and made it to signify that empire; and this imposition continues to this day, not only in Europe, but in the East and West-Indies, and many parts of Africa. This may be further confirmed by many examples still practis'd in our own and other countries.

NAVA- 5. The Chinese merchants that sail'd to RETTE. Manila, being ask'd, who they were, and what they came for? answer'd, Xang Lai, that is, we come to trade. The Spaniards, who understood not their language, conceived it was the name of a country, and putting the two words together made one of them, by which they still distinguish the Chinese, calling them Sangleys. Thus have we Europeans corrupted many other words in those parts: the name of the Philippine island is Liu Zung; the Spaniards corrupted the words, and call'd them Luzon. The city Manila is properly call'd Mainila, which signifies a marsh or boggy ground;
 our people left out the i, and there remain'd Manila. The island the natives term Minolo, the Spaniard calls Mindoro. That of Malindic, we name Marinduque, Cavit, Cavite, and so of many others. The name by which all Asia calls Japan, is Ye Pün, which signifies the rise of the sun, because this empire lies east of all that part of the world: the Europeans have corrupted the name, and call it Japan. The name of the kingdom of Coria, is Kao Li; and with us it is chang'd into Coria. Kiao Cbi was converted into Cochinchina, and Sien Lo into Siam.

6. The Portuguese corrupted many names in the East-Indies. The natives call an idol Pagabadi, the Portuguese speak it Pagode.
 That which we now name the coast of Cha-ramandel, or Caramandel, as the French and Italians pronounce it, and runs from the city of St. Thomas to Bengala, is by the natives called Toromandalun, and Toroman-dora; which denomination does not belong to any kingdom or country, but was the stile of the king who was sovereign of that tract when the first Portuguese came thither: they hearing the natives use that word to express their prince, after changing and corrupting it, took it for the name of the country. They also corrupted the names of Tragambar, Nagapatan, Fasanapatan, Madrastapatan, Paliacate, Musalapatan, and others, as I made out when I was in those countries. By all that has been said, it appears, that in probability the same may have happened to the name of Cbina, especially in regard that nation does not use or own it.

7. The usual and most common name by which those people call their empire, both in their books and discourse, is Cbung Kue, i. e. the middle kingdom. Formerly this denomination was peculiar to the Province of Hö Nan, which is almost the center of that empire. From hence in process of time it communicated it self to all that country. Others will have it, that the Chineses meant, their kingdom was in the middle of all the world, being ignorant of the rest. For this reason they also term it Tien Tien Hia.

Hia, that is, a world, or the greatest and best part of it. They also give it another appellation, and that common enough, calling it Hoa Kue, or Cbung Hoa, signifying, a flourishing kingdom, a garden, a grove, or delightful place in the middle of the world. During the reign of the emperor Xu this name was much in use, and is still in writing. It is very proper for that empire, because in truth it is all a beautiful garden, and a most delightful grove.

8. F. Kircher says, Cbina has no proper name of its own, but takes it from the emperor then reigning; yet afterwards, fol. 165. he mentions the names Cbung Kue, and Cbung Hoa, which are written as proper denominations, and not as deriv'd from emperors. I was more surpriz'd afterwards to read the same in father Trigaucius his history, lib. I. cap. 2. I cannot conceive how it comes to pass, that this father having spent some years in the mission of Cbina, and travell'd that country, as he writes himself, should not distinguish between the name of the empire, or kingdom, and that of a particular reign. The names of the empire are ever the same, and immutable; but the denominations of reigns vary according to the several families that govern: So those this author quotes, are the names or surnames of families that reign'd; as for instance, Tang signifies the time the family reign'd, which was call'd Tang Hia, when the family whose name or surname was Hia reign'd, and so of the rest: so that those are the names of reigning families, not of the kingdom; as when we say the Austrian or the Ottoman empire, &c. which only implies the reign of the family of Austria, or of the Ottoman race. And tho' we say the Austrian empire, it does not imply, that therefore the empire it self is call'd Austria, but Germany, where the house of Austria reigns: and thus I think this point is sufficiently clear'd.

9. As for Cbina being the same as Grand Cathay, I perceive Trigaucius is of that opinion, taking it from Paulus Venetus. Kircher, fol. 47. supposes the same thing, adding, that all his order agree in this point; but if he has no other ground for it but that, it being false, concludes nothing. Among those of his order in Cbina, some affirm, others deny, and others are dubious concerning it; and therefore it is no easy matter to resolve which of them to follow. It is possible that the name of Cathay is corrupted by the Europeans, which will make it a difficult matter to decide this point. The Muscovite calls Cbina, Kin, Tai; which name seems to have some resemblance with Cathay. I think it the wisest way not to decide a matter so doubtful,

Tien Hia

ful, and which tho' it has been handled in Cbina, cannot find any grounds to incline a man more to the one side than to the other; but to leave it dubious till some further light can be found to lead us into it.

10. In the history of Tamerlan the great, translated into Fronsh, it is written that he conquered Cbina, and that when he was out of this empire, the king of Cathay met him with two millions of men. Now according to this Cbina cannot be the same as Cathay. True it is, I do not look upon this account to be infallibly certain, for as NAVAMUCH as the Cbinese annals, which are very RETTE. exact, make no mention of any such conquest; nor can this be the same as was made by the western Tartar, because it is much later than that. The subject of this chapter requires no further information, nor do I think there is any to be had; but this is sufficient to know somewhat of the name Cbina. At the end of this book we shall again speak of what relates to Tamerlan.

CHAP. II.

Of the Antiquity of the Empire of China.

1. TH O' all men grant that the empire of Cbina is of very great antiquity, yet I find some disagreement among authors; and no small difference between the missionaries, who are doubtless the best judges in this case, as having receiv'd better lights from the Cbinese books, and convers'd with the natives. I am not ignorant that some have written that the empire of Cbina was founded before the flood, which I do not relate as a probable opinion, but as a dream or fiction, it being a contradiction of the holy scripture, Gen. chap. vii, and viii.

2. Nor will I here insert what F. Nieremberg publish'd concerning the original of Cbina, because he foists in so many, and such extravagant inventions, as cannot be outdone upon the subject. A sufficient proof hereof is, that all those of his society who live in Cbina, do make a great jest of all he writ concerning this matter. F. Antony Gouvea has a particular aversion to this author; he censures his writings severely, and looks upon him as unfaithful, and fabulous. If he was misled by informations, he is the less to blame; but what I chiefly observed was, that on the 29th of November 1661. the aforementioned F. Gouvea told me, that Nieremberg was in the wrong in writing, that the Cbineses had made F. Matthew Riccius a classick doctor. For tho' I and all the rest of us were satisfy'd of the mistake, yet I did not think they would have told it me so plainly. I further remark'd, that the good F. Gouvea looks upon the two apparitions (the same father says F. Matthew Riccius had of our Saviour, telling him, he would be assisting to him at the two courts of Cbina) as mere dreams; and he blames F. Julius Aleri as the author and inventor of these things. And this father being so well vers'd, and of so long a standing in that mission, he cannot but have perfect knowledge of all these affairs. But in my opinion the first of these stories is the most unlikely, for the Cbineses would not admit of S. Augustin himself as a classick doctor, much less of F. Riccius, who, it cannot be deny'd, was a famous man, and therefore does not stand in need of any forged honour.

3. F. Mendo, lib. I. chap. 3. writes thus: it is look'd upon as an undoubted truth among the natives of this kingdom, that the grandsons of Noah were the first that peopled it after travelling out of Armenia to seek some land that might please them, &c. In the 5th chapter he repeats the same, adding, that what appears plain in the Cbinese history, is, that ever since the time of Vitey, who was the first king, that nation has been reduced into one entire monarchy, &c.

4. As to the antiquity, this author is much in the right; but we must assuredly suppose, that the Cbineses never had any knowledge of Noah, nor of his sons or grandsons. It is generally agreed in their books and histories, that the first man they can give any account of, was Fo Hi; they have no manner of knowledge of any time before him, which they themselves daily own to us, when we discourse of this subject, and so it appears in their writings. I fancy too that there is no such word as Vitey in Cbina, nor is it known to that nation; it may perhaps be a corrupt word compounded of these two, Vi, Tai: but the name of the first emperor of Cbina, as I have already observ'd, was not Vi Tai, but Fo Hi, as is expressly mention'd in their books, and they all unanimously agree. And I am of opinion there are few among them, tho' they be peasants, but know this; for as we have knowledge of our first father Adam, so have they of Fo Hi. Nay there have been missionaries who would make Fo Hi to be Adam, but that cannot agree with the Cbineses, because their empire has continued from the time of Fo Hi till now.

5. The most receiv'd opinion is, that from this Fo Hi the first emperor of Cbina, till NAVA- till this present year 1675, are four thou-RETTE. sand five hundred and fifty nine years; and there being since the flood to this same 1675. year, according to the computation of the Antiquity. Roman martyrology, four thousand six hundred and thirty two years, it appears, that the Cbinese empire had its beginning seventy two years after the flood, others say one hundred and thirteen. This makes out the probability of what F. John Ruiz the jesuit wrote, who is follow'd by the fathers Longobardo and Balat of the same society, and is, that the great Zoroastres prince of the Bastrians, who was the first inventor of magick in the east, was also the founder of the empire of Cbina, and there left behind him his doctrine. There is some difficulty in this, for it seems most certain that Egypt was peopled first, which yet was one hundred and seventy years after the flood, as says A Lapide in xii. Genesis; see there, and Oleaster, Num. xii.

6. F. Emanuel Diaz a jesuit writ in the Cbinese language, that Ham the son of Noah went into Cbina, where he diffus'd his superstitious and wicked doctrine, which continues to this day. This makes not against what has been said above, but rather ver-fies it; for it is very usual to say, Ham and Zoroastres were the same man, as Berosus, lib. III. Burgensis, master Matthias, Garcia de Loaisa out of Isidorus, the Fasciculus tem- porum, the lord of Arauso, Kircher, and many others affirm, as shall be shewn in the second tome: see A Lapide, Exod. vii. 6, led in that part of the earth now call'd Arabia. This was the first nation that knew not GOD; because its prince and founder receiv'd not the worship of GOD, being curs'd by his father, therefore he left the want of knowledge of a Deity to his posterity. This agrees very well with what has been said above. Zoroas- tres was six hundred years before Moses, according to the same A Lapide. Others would have this empire to be more ancient,

but do not prove it.

7. What has been said makes out the truth of what is written by the fathers Ruiz, Sabatino, Longobardo, Diaz, Gouvea, and others of the society, viz. that the Cbineses from the beginning wanted the knowledge of the true GOD. Those who have writ and publish'd the contrary, have suffer'd themselves to be led away, rather by their inclination, than been govern'd by their understanding; as will plainly appear in the book of Cbinese controversies, where I handle this and other points very particularly.

8. It is therefore morally impossible absolutely to determine on what day, month, or year the empire of Cbina was founded;
but it is most certain that it is very ancient,
and that the antiquity abovemention'd is made out by their books: tho' I find some disagreement among the missioners in the computation, yet not so material as quite to take away, or much to lessen the antiquity we have spoke of. Read A Lapide in Gen. ix. 6, 18. the same the Egyptians affirm of their nation, the Cbineses say of theirs.

CHAP. III.

Of the Greatness of CHINA.

1. IN the first place, I give for granted that all the Cbinese names mention'd Mendoza. in his history by father Mendoza, nay, and by some other authors, are altogether de-prav'd and corrupted, and therefore not intelligible, even to us who have liv'd feveral years in that country, studied their language, and read their books: none of the names he writes is of the Mandarine language, nor can they be of any of the languages us'd in particular provinces, and therefore I shall never make use of any of them, but of those proper and genuine names us'd by the learned sect, and all the people of judgment and note in that country; and this does not infer but that many others of the commonalty do make use of them.

2. There has been much variety of opi-Latitude. nions touching the north latitude of the empire of Cbina. F. de Angelis of Lisbon extends it to 48 degrees; the Dutch stretch farther to 52. F. Nieremberg goes on to 63.

Orlandinus and Luzena stop not there; F.
Trigaucius, lib. I. cap. 2. places it in 42.
This is the opinion I follow and approve of, because all the missioners being assembled together in the court of Pekin, we discours'd upon this subject, and they who had liv'd there several years said, they had examin'd and found it to be so, adding some minutes; so that the wall which is the bound of Cbina stands in near 42 deg. 30 min. The most southern part is the island of Hai Nan (which signifies south sea) Tri- gaucius places it in 19 deg. of north latitude; but I following some others fix it in 18, and so that empire contains above 24 degrees of latitude. Thus its extent from north to south is above four hundred and twenty Spanish leagues, allowing 17½ to a degree, and according to the French who allow

allow 20 it is four hundred and eighty ; but according to the Dutch, who assign but 15 leagues to a degree, the space from north to south is three hundred and sixty leagues. As to the longitude, it is easier to differ about it, some allow it 20 degrees, others extend it to 27 ; however it is, that country is near square, and the Cbineses lay it down so in their maps.

3. By this it appears that Cbina is not so long as F. Mendoza represents it, lib. I. cap. 6. nor are the grounds he goes upon to prove his assertion solid; nor is it strange there should be mistakes at first, when the accounts from thence were imperfect; nor is it yet agreed upon to this day whether ten miles of Cbina make a league of ours; but on the contrary, the general opinion is, there goes thirteen or fourteen to a league.

Mil.

Provinces.

4. Cbina is divided into fifteen provinces, each of which in former ages was a large, rich and populous kingdom. I do not include in this number the kingdom of Tung King, which, tho' about three hundred and sixty years ago was a part of Cbina, yet is not so now, tho' it owns a sort of subjection to the emperor, and the king receives his investiture from him, as we saw it practis'd of late years. Some say the kingdom of Cochinchina was part of that of Tung King, and that when this latter revolted from Cbina, the governor making himself king, Cochinchina was then actually in rebellion, and had taken a king of its own. But I am confident in the opinion, that it was ever a separate kingdom: for in the reign of Cheu Kung, which is above two thousand years ago, Cochinchina was a distinct kingdom of itself, and its king sent presents to the Cbinese emperor; and I remember he calls the present by these names Chao Hien, which signifies a royal present, gift or offering.

Tung King.

Cochinchina.

Leao Tung.

Coria.

Bata China.

5. Some reckon Leao Tung as a province, but it never was one; it belonged to that of Xan Tunc, and the Tartars possessed themselves of it some years ago: nor do I here make any mention of the kingdom of Coria, nor of other islands which pay yearly tribute or acknowledgment; neither do I approve of what F. Luzena writes, that the Cbinese was master of Bata China, for which he has no ground but the name, whereof we have spoken before, and this is visible enough in that the histories of Cbina make no mention of that country. In the next place, since the Philippine islands, Borneo, Macassar and others known to the Cbineses, are larger, nearer, and much more worth than Bata China, and yet the Cbineses were never possessors of them; to what purpose should they go to conquer poor unprofitable lands very far distant from their own? besides, which way should the Cbineses steer their course to it? Bata China lies far south of the islands of Tidore and Terranate, as I shall shew in my last book, which is a troublesome and dangerous voyage, by reason of the infinite number of islands that lie in the way, and the many channels, currents and straits not known at this day to the Cbineses.

6. I am of opinion there is no ground at all for what the same author writes, viz. that the Cbineses sail'd to the island of Zeilan (or Ceylon) where he says many of them settled, whose posterity are now call'd Cbingalas; this he supposes only on account of the likeness of the names, and because the Cbingalas are men of valour. I have already said that nothing can be concluded from the names, because they are corrupted by the Europeans: and the Cbingalas being valiant men infers the contrary to what he would prove, for they could never inherit valour from the Cbineses who want it. What may be said in this matter is, that as the Indians of Manila call'd Pampangos are courageous and resolute, and the Tagalos their next neighbours have no heart; so in Zeilan, or any other province, there may be a spot of ground may produce braver men than any other, tho' they be contiguous, and this spot may be call'd Cbingala. If this be not enough, give me leave to ask to what purpose should the Cbineses go to Zeilan? what silks, garments or drugs could they vent there? what could they buy? no cinnamon I am sure, because they have a great deal, and that very good, in the province of Hay Nan, especially when they must leave behind them so many large kingdoms where they might dispose of their merchandise to content.

Cinnamon.

7. Others say the Cbineses were masters of Tutucurin, which country lies east north east of Zeilan, but I find no likelihood of truth in this. The Cbineses were never conquerors nor ambitious of possessing foreign kingdoms, and if they had been so they might have made themselves masters of many. Several Portugueses affirm that the Cbineses traded by sea as far as the kingdom of Narsinga, and the ground they have for it is, that near the city Calamina, or S. Thomas, there is an idol temple call'd the Pagod of Cbina, which I saw, and it nothing resembles those in Cbina, nor can they who have seen the Cbinese ships be persuaded this is at all likely. I ask'd an ancient native of that country who was a Christian, and a man of sense, whether they had any knowledge there of Cbina? He answer'd, they had not. I ask'd him concerning that temple: he told me the name of it was, Ta Se Le Na Pe Lo Mal, which are seven idols that are in it: he also said

NAVA- said it was call'd Cbina Patalon, which are RETTE. all expressions us'd in that kingdom.

8. It is perfectly imposing impossibilities upon us to maintain, as some Portugueses do, that the Cbineses sail'd as far as the island of S. Lawrence, or Madagascar; they had much better affirm they sail'd to Suratte and Cambaya, and thence to Estbiopia and Persia; but to Madagascar, to me seems not only morally but physically impossible. Any man would be of the same opinion that had sail'd those seas, and had experience of the terrible storms and boisterous winds they are subject to. If to this we add, that the Cbineses have no use of the Astrolabe, or cross-staff to take the meridian altitudes, nor are acquainted with the latitudes or longitudes, nor have any knowledge of the narrow channels, that their vessels are weak and want rigging, any man will rather credit what I now write. How would a Cbinese champan weather the furious storms about the islands of Mauricia and Mascarenbas? nay, tho' it could sail thither, what merchandise should it carry, or what should it do at Madagascar? I am of the mind that a champan is not capable of carrying water and provision enough for that voyage, and much less to serve home again, the return being more tedious and difficult. It is my belief that the Cbineses never went beyond the straits of Sincapura and Sonda; nor do I think they have any knowledge of them at this time. They sail'd to Manila long before the Spaniards went thither, which is not to be doubted, because the Indians affirm'd it; they also went to Siam, Camboja, Japan, and other places that reach'd not to the narrow seas: so that we must take the extent great or small of the empire of Cbina within itself, without going beyond its own borders, which, as I said before, contains fifteen great provinces, subdivided into 150 lesser, yet there is never a one of them but is much bigger than any of those of the Low-countries.

Provinc.

Cities.

CHAP. IV.

Of the fifteen Provinces in general, and the Cities of CHINA.

1. THE true and genuine names of the fifteen provinces of Cbina are as follow, Pe King, or rather Pe Cbi Li, Xan Tung, Xan Si, Xen Si, Ho Nan, Hu Kuang, Kuei Cbeu, Ju Nan, Zu Cbuen, Nan King, Che Kiang, Kiang Si, Kuang Si, Fo Kien, and Kuang Tung. This last is corruptly call'd by the Europeans Canton. Every one of them has several cities, towns and villages, and its bounds set out by a fair large stone with an inscription on both sides, bearing these words, here ends such a province, and begins the province N. In their books is the number of the cities and towns in each province, with the names of them, all which I had taken notes of, and would have inserted here but that I cannot find the manuscript. F. Mendoza has writ the whole, and perhaps I would have follow'd him in some things, had I not observ'd that he is mistaken in several particulars he mentions concerning the province of Fo Kien; he says, lib. I. cap. 8. there are 33 cities, and 99 towns in Fo Kien, which is an unpardonable mistake; for Fo Kien is one of the least provinces of Cbina, and all men there know it contains but eight cities; four of them are near the sea, I pass'd through them all, their names are Cbang Cbeu, Civen Cbeu, Hing Hoa, and Fo Cbeu the metropolis; the other four are in the inland. Another of those in the second rank is call'd Fo Ning, where we have had a church, Mendoza.

and there have been Christians many years since: the towns I think are not above 27, the villages and hamlets are innumerable, as they are in all other parts of Cbina. In all other provinces he makes the number of towns and cities much greater, so that adding together all his cities he makes 591, and of towns 1593, which is no way to be allow'd of.

Cities.

2. F. Trigaucius cap. 2. says there are 247 cities of inferior rank in Cbina, and 1152 towns, all which may and ought to be call'd cities, since there is no distinction in their walls. See Oleaster in Num. xxxii. ad lit. towards the end. What I could make out is as follows, there are 148 cities of the first rank which they call Fu, 239 of the second call'd Cbeu, 1149 towns which they term Hien, 11 cities of soldiers, in which those military men live, to whom they have given lands for their maintenance paying a small tribute, and with them live some vassals, for which reason they are commonly call'd cities of soldiers, and vassals, Kiun Min Fu; 493 castles upon the sea coast, some of them so populous it is much to be admir'd. We pass'd by one as we came from court, that resembled a great city for its vast suburbs, populousness, number of boats and trade; we were all surpriz'd and astonish'd at the sight of it. There are besides 2910 boroughs on the coast equivalent to towns, as the castles are

Castles.

are to cities. In these sea towns there are 1974 commanders, who have all their commissions from the emperor.

Villages.

3. Their boroughs, hamlets, and villages are so numerous that the Cbineses do not reckon them. Some of the villages are wonderful populous; about four leagues from Canton there is one very much noted, call'd Foxan, I have been several times in it, and all we missionaries were there together when we came away from court to our banishment: It is computed to contain as many people as the metropolis, to which some assign two millions of souls, others a million and a half. Every day in the year four great passage-boats sail from the metropolis to Foxan, all full of passengers, and every one carries 150, besides an infinite number of small boats hired by private persons.

Cities.

4. The difference between the cities of the first and second rank is, that the first have one body politick within them, which has its particular courts and government. Those of the second rank have none of this;

but some of the second are larger than others of the first, as there are towns bigger than cities. In every metropolis there are two distinct corporations: and besides this there is another notable mark of distinction, which is, that in every metropolis there are two beautiful towers in several places, each nine stories high. Every other city has one but seven stories high, and every town one of five.

5. All the capital and lesser cities and towns are encompass'd with high, thick, and beautiful walls. All the gates I have seen are plated with iron; the ditches are deep and handfom. There is scarce any city or town but what is regularly built, and seated on some mighty river, or lake. So they are to be founded, says S. Thomas opusc. de Reg. Princip. Now they being regularly built, the streets are wide, streight and even, very beautiful and orderly, wherein I am persuaded they have exceeded the Europeans. Thus much may suffice in general.

CHAP. V.

Of the several Families that have reign'd in CHINA.

1. THERE must needs be much difficulty in deciding some points relating to this empire, which has been founded so many thousands of years. As to the matter in hand there is no great danger of erring since I follow the Cbinese histories. Since the first five emperors there have been 22 reigning houses, or families; as if we should say the houses of Austria or Bourbon, &c. All these have made 238 emperors, besides some few whose reigns were very short. No mention is made of such as these, says Hugo Cardinalis in Judit. i. §. 2. I shall give some account of the greatest and most renowned of them in the following book. There was no proportion in the time of those families continuance, one lasted 400 years in a continued succession from father to son; another 500; a third to 600; and one extended to 800, which was the longest of any. The last before the coming in of this Tartar family, reigned somewhat above 260 years. All that while this empire enjoy'd a profound peace, but all was utterly subverted in a few years. We might say of Cbina as Philo the Jew, in his book quod Deus est immortalis, said of the Persian empire; Before the rise of the Macedonians, great was the prosperity of the Persians, but one day put an end to a mighty kingdom.

2. By what has been said, which is beyond all controversy, it appears, they did not rightly inform F. Mendoza, who gave, him an account of the emperors of Cbina. He handles this matter, lib. III. cap. 1. where he sets down so many names of emperors as is amazing. Among other things he says, there were 106 kings of the race of Vitey, who reign'd 2256 years. I have always said Fo Hi was the first emperor and not Vitey, and that the longest continuance of the crown in any family was 800 years, which all the school-boys in Cbina know, because it is written in their primmers; and therefore in these particulars I shall write not what others have written before me, but what I have read and received from the learned men of Cbina.

3. All the reigns we have spoke of were tyrannical, tho' the kings were natives, excepting only this family now in being, and another call'd Sung Cbao, which were both strangers, the latter coming from the West, and the other from the East. F. Mendoza writes that Sung Cbao govern'd 90 years, and us'd the natives tyrannically, making slaves of them: but he is out in both, for he reigned but 60 years, and gave such content, that the Cbineses even at this day applaud, and bestow high commendations on him. In process of time a long possession, and the love of the subjects, it is likely mended their title, as has happened in other countries and families. And Suarez, lib. III. cont. Reg. Angl. cap. 2. n. 20. says, It

A missioner was us'd to say, that all the emperors that ever were in Cbina were rightful and lawful, because it was settled and agreed that the strongest should carry it, and consequently every Cbinese in the empire had a title to it. I never lik'd this doctrine which he only grounded upon his own opinion and fancy, contrary to the general sentiments of that empire and its laws.

9. 2. Potestas illegitima dura legitima affabilis.

4. The family now reigning is call'd Zing Chao, that is a pure and unspotted reign. The emperor's name is Kang Hi, that is, joy, repose, peace, and tranquillity. It cannot be deny'd but that he governs with some severity: he is hated by the natives which is not to be wonder'd at, because he is a stranger, and his nation is look'd upon as barbarous by the Cbineses. This alone was sufficient to have made him odious, tho' there had not been besides such a mighty quantity of blood shed as was in the conquest; besides many cruelties and disasters that attended him. The Cbineses, if they were unanimous, might with great ease destroy him: but it seems God made use of the Tartar as an instrument to crush the pride of the Cbineses, as his divine Majesty has often done to other powerful kingdoms. Let such as are curious read S. Thomas, lib. III. cap. 7. de Reg. Princ. where he will find this plainly made out. In the 8th chapter the saint shews how God uses to punish those very men he has made use of as his instruments for the purposes above-mentioned; and so perhaps the Tartar may have his deserts in a short time. To this effect see ALapide in xiv Gen. v. 5. in xiv Exod. v. 1, 25. and Oleaster in xiv Numb.

Tartars
that conquer'd.

5. The missioners do not agree about the Tartars title, I shall discuss this point among the controversies; but it will be convenient in this place to make it known in some measure who these Tartars are. I find many suppose them to be the same that make war on the Poles, the Muscovites, and others in that part of the world, which is a gross mistake. The Cbineses call them Ta Zu, and divide them into the Eastern and Western, and so distinguish them by the two words Tung and Si, signifying East and West, tho' the eastern lie north-east of Cbina, which is little to our purpose, especially in regard the north-east is towards the eastern quarter. The Cbineses ever looked upon all these Tartars as a rude, wild, and barbarous people; and so when they would say a man is a Barbarian, they call him Ta Zu.

6. Here I take it for granted, that Muscovy is six months journey distant from Cbina, as we were given to understand by the ambassadors the Muscovite sent some years since to the Cbinese. In this interval there are deserts, high mountains, deep valleys, and mighty rivers, whence may be gather'd how far it is to those we call Tartars of Cbina, who inhabit near the great wall. It is agreed on all hands that their kingdom is small, mountainous, full of woods, but abounds in cattel and wild beasts. It is call'd Ning Kue Ta, by which the Cbineses express, a kingdom of mountains, rustick and wild people: they have no houses or buildings, the people live in dens and cottages; of late they have begun to build after the Cbinese manner. They were always robbers and continually infested Cbina, plundering towns and villages. They have great multitudes of horses, are themselves good horsemen, and skilful archers. These Tartars, so we will call them, never were possess'd of Cbina, as F. de Angelis has writ. He was also deceiv'd in placing them in 73 degrees of north latitude. As for their religion, the same author says, they acknowledge one God in heaven, and another upon earth; as also the immortality of the soul, which I suppose he took from F. Mendoza. But whence they both had it I know not, for even at this time, tho' that people is better known and discover'd, we can say nothing with certainty of them, saving that they incline of late to follow the sects of Cbina, and are much given to worshiping of idols.

7. This present Tartar who reigns in Cbina, and his father have been the most fortunate men in the world, especially if he that is now living knows how to keep what he inherited. But this is no easy matter, fortune is very inconstant; one day man is rais'd to the height of power, and the next he is cast down into an abyss of misery. Nothing that is violent is lasting; see Oleaster in xxi Num. in fin. exposit. moral. This world is like the ebbing and flowing of the sea, said Philo, lib. quod Deus est immut. I am very well satisfy'd no potentate in the world is greater than this. He is peaceably possess'd of the fifteen provinces we have spoken of, his own kingdom Leao Tung, a great part of Coria, whence he draws a good quantity of silver, besides many kingdoms that are tributary to him. I know no prince in the world that has such large dominions together, so many subjects, and such vast riches. It cannot be deny'd but the Mogul is a mighty prince, his empire very large; that he is powerful, and has kings that pay him tribute, as does he of Golocondar; that he is at this time, not only sovereign of his own kingdom, but of the empire of Nassinga; yet I am fully persuaded he has not half so many subjects as the Chinese, nor near the revenue: But be it as it will, my business is not here to make comparisons, but only to shew how great the Chinese is, and hereupon every one may make such judgment as he shall think fit.

8. Enough has been writ concerning the irruption of the Tartars into China, and how in so short a time they made themselves masters of it. F. Martin Martinez publish'd a small book upon this subject, I have it by me in Latin, and translated into Spanish. I have read neither, nor have I any inclination to it, for reasons I shall give hereafter: I suppose they agree in substance, tho' in some circumstances not very material, I find there is difference and disagreement. I will write what I heard of the court of Pe King, from the missionaries and others of the natives. To pretend to make monarchies eternal, is like sailing against the wind. Which of them was ever permanent? None. Read the sacred and profane histories, and it will appear, that to mount to the greatest height, is but to begin to fall. Even now in our own days we experience this truth, without being necessitated to have recourse for examples to the Affrians, Medes, Greeks, and Romans. It was a good saying of a modern author, much applauded by preachers: when any thing is lifted up to a great height, you may know its downfall and ruin is at hand.

9. China, which was nothing inferior to those monarchies we have mention'd, tho' less known to the Europeans, rose to the height of majesty, grandeur, and wealth; it is plain then, it could not plead a singular privilege beyond all the world. A little worm destroy'd and consum'd the verdure and spreading greatness of the prophet Jonas his ivy-tree. So a robber burnt, and pull'd up the delightful and flourishing garden of China, he was like a flash of lightning that fir'd and defaced all that beauty.

10. Certain it is the Chinese emperor hang'd himself upon a tree: and very credible persons told us at Pe King, as a thing out of dispute, that he himself first hang'd a daughter he had, and his first wife. Consider what a dismal spectacle that was! what trouble must it raise in the hearts of men to see such fruit upon three trees! so great a monarch and emperor, and empress and their eldest daughter hung by the boughs. O inconstancy of worldly prosperity! O wonderful changes of fortune! O uncertainty of all that is temporal! seven thousand pieces of cannon lay on the walls of that renowned and beautiful city, as the inhabitants affirm'd, and above NAVA- four millions of souls inhabited that mighty metropolis. The emperor liv'd within nine walls; numerous guards did duty at his gates, counsellors, ministers, and servants attended him in vast numbers, and nothing of all this could avail to save the lives of those wretched carcases.

11. It is universally allow'd that the robber spent eight days, tho' some say but five, in conveying the gold, silver, jewels, and other riches, from the palace in carts, upon camels, horses, and mens shoulders; and that nevertheless there remain'd considerable riches in the royal treasury, which afterwards the Tartar seiz'd upon. It is also agreed on all hands that infinite numbers dy'd, and there is no doubt but many were their own executioners.

12. Some blame the emperor for living too retir'd, they say he never went out of his palace. They also tax him with covetousness. His predecessors heap'd vast treasures, and he increas'd them considerably, and he knew not for whom he gathered. Others blame the eunuchs for not acquainting him with what was in agitation: I am of opinion they were all faulty.

13. Ufan Kuei general of the frontiers, a most faithful and loyal subject to his sovereign lord the emperor, but ill advis'd, to revenge the mischief that robber had done, crav'd aid and assistance of him that ever was a declar'd and mortal enemy of China; he invited the Tartar, and made use of a tiger to be reveng'd of a wolf. The Tartar joyfully embrac'd the offer, he immediately rais'd an army of 80000 horse, and swelling with it, trampled down all China, which he already look'd upon as a prey expos'd to his barbarous fury. He join'd Ufan Kuei, and with their united force they pursu'd the robber, slew an infinite number of people, recover'd the rich booty he carry'd; and tho' the rebel with some of his followers escap'd, yet the Tartar remain'd victorious, and more proud and arrogant than before. In order to put in execution what he had before contriv'd, he resolv'd to go to Pe King, and entred the court, the gates being laid open to him; where making use of force, he possess'd himself of all, without any better title than mere tyranny and usurpation. Ufan Kuei was quite asham'd and confounded to see how he was impos'd upon by the ill measures he had taken; for what could be worse than to call in thousands of robbers to reduce one? and his force being inferior to the enemies, he durst not encounter him. What afterwards happened in the conquest of the whole empire, the slaughters, the blood that run about the fields, the robberies, the outrages, the miserable cries and complaints which pierced were put to death, vast numbers flew themselves to avoid falling into the hands of the savage Tartars. Many cities and towns were left desolate. The men fled to the mountains, and thought not themselves secure in the caves. The women, who are as reserved and modest as the strictest nuns in Europe, ran about the fields weeping and tearing their hair, flying from the scourge that pursued them. Many virgins cast themselves into rivers and wells, thinking, through a mistaken zeal, it was lawful, by that means to shun their shame and the loss of their chastity.

14. That thunderbolt overrun all Cbina with fire and sword, and left not a foot of land unconsum'd; so that in the year 58, when I entered upon that mission, the Tartar was absolute lord of the whole, except a few holes which he soon subdued. There were such multitudes of men slain at the taking of some cities, and particularly the capital of Fo Kein, that the dead bodies heap'd together equal'd the height of the wall, and serv'd the Tartars instead of ladders to mount up and possess themselves of the city. This was affirm'd to me for a truth, when I pass'd through that place, and they shew'd me the curtain of the wall, which was of a considerable height, that the dead bodies had been heap'd against.

15. In Cbina were verified the words of the first chapter of the first of Maccab.

 that of the fifth chap. y. 11. fits in this place, She that was free, is become a slave. Let no man confide in his own power, or forget to stand upon his guard, because he is rich, great and mighty. It is absolutely necessary to be diligent and watchful, especially when the enemy is at hand; too much precaution or diffidence cannot be hurtful, too much security may. The Cbines even in my time liv'd in hopes that Usan Kuei would still stand up for his country, his credit, and reputation, and endeavour to make amends for those losses and destructions caus'd by his oversight, and ill conduct; but now considering his great age, their expectation is vanish'd. I could not but think he has been the cause of infinite mischiefs. The Tartar was ever upon his guard, and jealous of this commander; thrice he endeavour'd by fair means to draw him to court, which had secured all danger that might be in him. He in not going, behav'd himself with more wisdom than he had done before. We shall speak of the Tartar in another place; thus much suffices at present. But because this did not satisfy a great friend of mine, who thought it requisite I should enlarge upon this point, I resolv'd to do so, and write a particular chapter upon this subject, which is the last but one of the last book; there the reader will find what was omitted in this place.

CHAP. VI.

A farther Account of the Grandeur of the Chinese Empire.

1. FOR the more regular proceeding, we will here treat of the two courts now frequented and famous in Cbina, without meddling with others in several provinces where many antient emperors resided.

2. The southern court, for this very reason call'd Nan King, is most renowned in those parts, tho' the emperors have not these many years resided there. I never was within it, but have oftentimes heard some missionaries, who liv'd there several years, and other judicious Christians talk of its greatness. As we went from court to banishment, we came to an anchor very near to its first wall, where we lay some days. The wall is high, beautiful, and of a goodly structure, and the first I ever saw of that fort. It has no battlements as is usual, but runs in the nature of a scollop-lace, as is us'd in some buildings in Spain. The whole is very graceful to behold, and the Cbineses say its circumference is a hundred and sixty of their miles, which, according to some of the missionaries computation, make sixteen Spanish leagues, and according to others thirteen or fourteen. At the first entring upon the mission they allow'd ten Chinese miles to a league of ours, afterwards upon better consideration they assign'd thirteen, and some fourteen; and tho' we should allow fifteen, the compass of the wall would be very great.

3. I have mention'd, that every metropolis has two towers nine stories high. One of those at this court is so beautiful and sightly, it may cope with the fairest in Europe. There is some, but no great distance betwixt the first and second wall, by what we could discover through the gate; and the concourse of people is extraordinary.
 Those who were acquainted with it, and particularly F. Emanuel George who had liv'd there several years, said, that the second wall which is it that immediately compasses the city, was a common day's journey a horseback in circumference, which according

according to the custom of that country is about eight leagues betwixt sun and sun; and so this father said, that a man going out at one of the gates at sun-rising, and compassing the city, would come to the same gate at sun-setting.

4. The number of people living within the two walls, according to the reckoning of the Cbineses, is above eight millions, and herein the missionaries agree with the natives; but allowing only seven millions of souls, or something less, it is certain that no two cities in Europe, Africk, or America, can compare with this for number of inhabitants, considering the Cbinese and Spanish million are the same. It must also be observ'd, in pursuance of what has been said before, that the number here mention'd is not ascrib'd to the city alone, but to it and the two separate towns corporate which are within it; but the whole is included within the two walls.

5. Among other remarkable things there are at this court, one is a vast prodigious bell. F. Felician Pacheco saw, and took particular notice of it, and assured us, that tho' one half of it was bury'd in the ground, yet that which rises above the earth is so high, that if two tall men stand one of each side, they cannot see one another. Another wonder is, that there are nine hundred ninety nine fishponds within the walls, in which they breed fish to supply the natives. There is the same number in the city Kan Cbeu in the province of King Si; but we could not discover the mystery why they must not be a thousand, and yet I doubt not but the Cbineses have something to say for it. And yet notwithstanding these fishponds, the city lies upon the mighty and renowned river, which they call The son of the sea, against whose streams we saw the porpoises swim above forty leagues up the river, so that none need admire there should be fish enough for such a multitude. Upon this river they yearly celebrate a festival in their boats, richly adorn'd and set out to the honour of an antient Mandarin, who is highly respected throughout all that empire, as I shall write in another place. It happened but a few years ago there started up such a furious gust of wind, that five hundred boats were cast away, a miserable object of pity and compassion.

6. In all courts of judicature throughout Cbina they have a drum, either bigger or less, according to the preheminance of the court, and they beat it when there is any hearing. That which is in the supreme court of this metropolis is so large, that the head is made of an elephant's hide, and the drumstick is a great piece of timber hanging to the roof by strong ropes. They say it is incredible what vast quantities of merchandise, silks, cottons, and other curiosities are to be had here, in such abundance, that whole fleets might be loaded at very reasonable rates. In this city they make flowers of wax, with the colours so exact and lively, that we could not choose but admire them; and till they told us they were made of wax, we could never guess at it.

7. Six missionaries of us came together on Saturday the 27th of June, being the eve of the feast of St. Peter, to the northern court, signified by the name Pe King, of which many ridiculous falsehoods are written by Romanus Mendoza, Nieremberg de Angelis, and others. We saw a strange confusion and wonderful multitude of people. From the first gate we walk'd above two leagues to come to the eastern church of the fathers of the society. It is call'd the Eastern, to distinguish it from that which father John Adamus had in the West. This metropolis has three walls: the first which encompasses the other two, as the fathers who liv'd there told us, and we our selves perceived, is five leagues in circumference, little more or less, and not as Pinto, and the authors above-mention'd write of it. Mendoza, lib. III. cap. 2. says, it is a whole day's journey upon a good horse, and a man must ride hard to cross from one gate to another, without including the suburbs which are as large again; and yet he declares he speaks of the least. The Cbineses impos'd upon him: I am satisfy'd none of those that go over to Manila have been at Pe King. In short, what I write is the very truth; and tho' I may as well as others err in some small matter, as for example, in half a league, yet I cannot deviate so grossly. Nor could the fathers of the society be mistaken, who had liv'd above twenty years in that city.

8. The second wall runs directly athwart from east to west; it is higher than the other, and so broad that two coaches may go abreast on it with ease. Within these two walls, towards the south, the Cbineses live at present; there are the shops, tradesmen, and mechanicks; a man may there find all he can wish or desire, at the same rates as in any other part of the empire. On the north side live the Tartars, the soldiery and counsellors, and there also are all the courts of justice. The third wall is in the shape of a half-moon, and incloses the imperial palace, the temples of their ancestors, gardens, groves, fishponds, and other places for pleasure. This also is on the north side, and is almost a league in circumference. The Cbineses reckon nine walls from the first gate to the emperor's apartment, and so tell it as a piece of ostentation, that their emperor lies within nine walls.

The Chinese observes the custom of other antient monarchs, A Lapide in Gen. xxvii. v. 36, 37, and 35. Only the viceroys, counsellors, great mandarins, and officers, can go into the palace. Among twenty four missionaries that met in the metropolis the year 1665, only father John Adamus, who was professor of mathematics, had ever been within the palace. Afterwards about 68 and 69, the three that remain'd there went in, being sent for by the emperor.

9. They report the apartments and rooms are very stately and noble, especially the emperor's bed-chamber; but I never heard there were seventy nine, as bishop Maiolus writes, wherein he follows Mendoza in his second chapter quoted above; nor are there any rooms of gold, silver, or precious stones, as the same author says, and F. Lazena affirms. How could these things be hid from us who liv'd so many years in that country, and some time at the court, enquiring diligently, and examining into the most remarkable things there? The Chinese history tells us, the arch'd roof of an antient emperor's state-room was of gold, which I do not find any difficulty to give credit to; and I am satisfy'd he that now reigns might have the like if he pleas'd. Nor are there tiles of gold, as others have reported, but they are glaz'd yellow, which is the emperor's colour; when the sun shines on them, they look like gold, or polish'd brass. The petty kings of the blood royal use exactly the same; and they are on the temples of deceas'd emperors. There are other tiles blew glaz'd, which I have seen on some temples, and look very graceful. I have sometimes seen the tiles with which the floors of the palace are laid, they are square, and as large as the stones on the floor of S. Peter's church at Rome; some were glaz'd yellow, and others green, as smooth and glossy as a looking-glass, and must doubtless be a great ornament to a room.

10. When Xun Cbi father to the present emperor died, they turn'd out of the palace six thousand eunuchs, and I conceive they expell'd as many women, for every eunuch has a woman to wait on him. The emperor has as many concubines as he pleases; but the empire is obliged to furnish him as many as there are towns and cities in it. There are twenty four kings at the emperor's court, but they are only titular, and have no subjects, as among us the titular bishops in partibus infidelium: the emperor maintains them all. The missionaries call them petty kings, and they are generals of the army. There are as many Generals major generals, whom they call Cusan, these are introduced by the Tartar, the Chinese had none of them. When any service is to be done, only two or three of these receive the orders, and they convey them to their men, who are always in readiness; and they immediately march, and with great secrecy execute the commands they have receiv'd. Among many other things excellent in the Chinese government, one is, their great care in scouring their high-ways from vagabonds and robbers. Robbers. As soon as ever there is the least rumour of thieves being abroad in any part of the country, immediate notice is given to the next town, thence it is carried to the city, and if requisite to the metropolis, whence they instantly send out officers and soldiers, who using their utmost diligence, never return home without their prisoners. This is the duty of those that have the power of government, says S. Thomas, lib. II. de Reg. Prin. cap. 2.

11. I find very extravagant and strange things in the authors abovemention'd, concerning the ceremonies us'd by the emperor at the reception of ambassadors; I do not set them down, because I would not countenance dreams and chimera's. The Portuguese and Dutch whose ambassadors have of late years been at Pe King, are eye-witnesses of what is practis'd there; and therefore why should we give credit to fabulous relations? Mendoza and Mayo write, that the emperor shews himself at certain times through glass-windows. Another says, he us'd to show his arm at a window. All this is subject to a thousand contradictions, for the emperor has no glass-casements, nor his rooms windows, nor is there one place where the people might assemble, and tho' there were, the subjects might not go into it. The same I say in respect of the soldiers they tell us are upon his guard. Romatus writes seventy thousand men; Mendoza allots ten thousand that day and night guard the palace without, besides many more in the courts, at the gates, &c. What I can say to it is, that the emperor might well have that, or a greater number; but he has not, nor is he so jealous of his subjects as that author makes him.

12. The emperor keeps six thousand horses in his stables, as I heard at court, and is able to keep many more. He has also twenty four elephants; these are carried to the palace with rich trappings every new and full moon, which are the times when the magistrates go to pay their respects to the emperor. An indifferent river runs through the midst of the court, being let in under the wall, and runs through the Orchards, orchards, gardens, and groves, causing a continual spring. At small distances there are curious bridges over it: the best of them, which is almost joining to the yellow wall, was our road to the courts, and to F. Adamus his church. Besides all this, there is a bell at Pe King, which, as those fathers said, weighs more than the four biggest in all Europe, which they say are in England. F. Adamus weigh'd it, and it came to one thousand two hundred quintals (which is sixty tuns). Within the hollow, which is all full of writing, he counted ten thousand great letters; F. Kircher has the cut of it in his book, p. 222. The use of bells in China is of great antiquity: it was first brought into the Latin church about the year 600, and into the Greek in 865, according to Suarez, lib. II. contra Reg. Ang. cap. 16. num. 13. There is also another great and famous bell hanging in a lofty and beautiful tower, which serves to strike the several watches of the night, and has an excellent sound. In the year 1668, the news came to Canton, that it had rung of itself; some believ'd, others gave no credit to it: if true, China has a bell like that of Belilla in Spain.

13. There is in Peking a very noted tower, call'd of the mathematicks; in it are sundry very ancient instruments, with admirable graving on brass-plates; with them they observe eclipses, and other observations belonging to this science. Some mathematicians always watch a top of it, who observe the motions of the stars, and remark any thing particular that appears in the sky, whereof the next day they give the emperor an account. When any thing unusual occurs, the astrologers meet, and make their judgments whether it portends good or evil to the imperial family. I was told in that city, that the number of its inhabitants amounts to four or five millions. Its situation is on a plain, as is all the country about. I ever heard it agreed, that the emperor's table was made up of fifteen, each answering its particular province, in the dishes and different meats it bears. In China they do not use table-cloths, nor other utensils common among us: The tables are beautiful, many of them varnish'd as fine as looking-glasses. They touch not the meat with their hands, but make use of little sticks about a foot long, with which they carry it neatly to their mouths: some are made of sweet wood, some of ivory, others of glass, which are in great esteem, and were invented by the Dutch; but now the Chinese make them curiously. Great men have them of silver, and only the emperor of gold, as are the dishes and other vessels serv'd up to his table. The Roytels have them of silver tipped with gold. This way of eating has always been among the NAVA-Chinese, the Japoneses learn'd it of them. RETTE. F. de Angelis was mistaken in applying this to the latter. Table-cloths and napkins, and a great deal of soap might be sav'd in Europe, if this fashion were introduced; we missioners like it very well.

14. The Tartars use the same sort of sticks, but their tables are little and low like those of Japan, and they sit not on chairs, but on cushions and carpets; which is also the custom of Japan, and other neighbouring kingdoms. Many of the ancients did the same, and others lay down to eat; so says Valerius Maximus, and S. Thomas, lect. 1. in 2 Joan. That it is an ancients custom to eat sitting, may be gather'd out of Gen. xliii. v. 33. So authors affirm, see Corn. à Lapide and Monobius. In the following chapters we shall treat of other matters.

15. Here we might discuss a point common to other nations, which is, whether we must call the Chinese, the Tartars that govern them, the Japoneses and other nations in those parts, Barbarians. The original use of the word Barbarian is various; Barbarians according to Erasmus all strangers and foreigners were formerly call'd Barbarians: cruel, fierce, ill-bred, and unlearn'd people went under the same name. The Greeks it is certain look'd upon other nations as Barbarians, tho' Strabo says, the Latins were under the same predicament with the Greeks.

16. S. Thomas starts the question upon i. ad Rom. lect. 5. and upon i Cor. xiv. lect. 2. and upon iii. ad Colos. Cajetan in i Cor. xiv. resolves the question in few words, saying, a Barbarian is something relative, and no man is absolutely a Barbarian, because of all kinds of men communicating together in language, &c. Here he takes the Barbarian in the sense St. Paul speaks in, which makes him be look'd upon as a Barbarian, who speaks a language quite strange and unintelligible, so that the English are Barbarians to the Spaniards, and the Spaniards to the English, Irish, &c.

17. But S. Thomas resolves the doubt more nicely, and says those are properly Barbarians who are strangers to human conversation, and who are strong in body, and deficient in reason, and are neither govern'd by reason, nor laws. Whence it follows that the blacks who live in the mountains of the Philippine islands, the Chuchumecos of Mexico, those of the islands Nicobar, Madagascar, Pulicondor, and the like, and others near the strait of Anian, are Barbarians in the strictest sense; and that the Chinese, Tartars, Japoneses, and other people of Asia are not so, for all these live politickly and orderly, are govern'd by laws agreeable to NAVARRETTE. reason, which those islanders above nam'd have not: nor ought a nation to be call'd barbarous because it has some customs that are contrary to reason, as may be seen among the Japoneses, who look upon it as an honour to cut themselves with their Catana's, or swords; for if we allow of this, there will be no nation exempt from some share of barbarity. The other European nations look upon the Spanish bull-feasts as barbarous, and think it a barbarity for a gentleman to encounter a mad bull. How can the law of duel, so much in request among persons of quality, be exempted from barbarity? The Chinese look upon those men as barbarous that wear long hair, tho' it be their own, wherein they agree well with S. Paul, it is a reproach to him, he terms it a disgrace, shame and scandal. The Germans were formerly guilty of the barbarity of not looking upon theft as a sin, according to S. Thomas 1. 2. q. 94. art. 4. which the Chinese, Tartars, Japoneses, and others, may even the Indians of the Philippine islands, could never be charg'd with, but they always abhor'd that vice. Some in Europe thought simple fornication no crime, and others believ'd the same of sodomy; so says S. Thomas 1. 2. q. 103. art. 3. q. 94. art. 6. and Cajetan upon Acts xv. in which the Chinese, Japoneses, and others are included.

18. What I most admire is, that but a little before I came to Rome there was some body offer'd to maintain and prove that voluntary pollution was no sin: who could imagine such a thing? Or who would not allow this to be barbarity in the highest degree among catholicks, after God has communicated so much light and learning to his church? In short, the case stands thus, that all nations and people look upon themselves as wise, politick, and judicious, and yet they call one another as they please, without being guilty of any sin reserv'd to the pope to absolve.

C H A P. VII.

Begins to give some Account of the Chinese Government.

Government.

1. THERE is a viceroy in every metropolis; in the province of Nan King which is large there are two, and three in that of Xen Si, because it is greater; every one of them has the cities, towns and villages belonging to his government assign'd him. In some cities there are supreme governors, whose jurisdiction is not subordinate to the viceroy's, but they are absolute in civil and military affairs, and upon all occasions. There is also a king's treasurer who receives all the tribute of the province, which is paid in the finest silver. There is besides a judge of criminal causes, and a civil who has three deputies subordinate to one another, and all depending on the judge. Each of the two corporations there are in every metropolis has its civil judge, with his three deputies, as above. In the capital cities on the coast there is a great mandarin, who has charge of the sea; besides these there are many in particular employments. The name mandarin was given them by the Portugueses, who deriv'd it from their own word mandar, to command. We the missionaries, though speaking in the Chinese tongue, give every one the proper name and title belonging to his office and quality, yet in our own tongue call all officers of justice mandarines, and so I shall generally use the word throughout this work. Where there are navigable rivers, which is in very many parts, there are mandarines who look to the boats that belong to the emperor, and to the publick.

Mandarines.

Canton and Fo Kien are govern'd by royte-Roytelets, who in quality are above all those we have mention'd, but not in authority, tho' they take upon them more than is proper: there is no body to curb them, and they bear heavy on the subjects.

2. The multitude of military officers, as Military colonels, majors, captains, &c. is endless, officers. they also are included under the title of mandarines, and in the Chinese language have that of Kuon, as well as the rest.

3. The scholars, who are not subject to the common magistrate, have mandarines of their own over them: in every metropolis there is one great one like a school-master, and two under him, and so there is in every other city and town; they live within the universities: we shall say more in another place concerning them, and other things that relate to their studies.

4. The greatness of the metropolitan cities and some others is wonderful. I have already given some account of Nan King. The next to it is the capital of Che Kiang, call'd Hang Cheu: some modern authors will have it to be the same the ancient Europeans call'd Kin Cai: having been in and view'd it with particular care, I will here write some part of what I saw. When I and my two companions were carry'd prisoners to the court, we went thro' the principal street of this city, which is near four leagues of ours in length from east to west; some say it is longer, and allow two leagues to the suburbs on both sides; so that from the coming into one suburb till the end of the other they make it a day's journey for a sedan: the street is strait, wide, and all pav'd with free-stone, which is very beautiful: at every fifty paces distant or thereabouts is a stone arch, as curiously wrought as those I have seen at Rome. On both sides were an infinite number of merchants and shopkeepers, dealing in all things that can be thought of. The throng of the people was so great, that the chairmen were continually crying out to them to make way. About the middle of that street they told us the news, that the father of the society residing there was made a prisoner. The next day we three were convey'd to another goal, but our affairs being transacted at court, we had no other trouble but the spending of that little we had been saving all the year, and the want of liberty; and because all our suffering was on a good account, that is, the preaching of the gospel, it was so far from afflicting that it was a great comfort to us.

Prisons.

5. Before we leave this metropolis, it will be convenient to go through with what we have begun concerning our imprisonment. As for the good government, quietness, ease, and cleanliness of the goal, I do not question but it exceeds ours in Europe. As soon as we were brought into the first court we spy'd the head goaler, who sat in great state on his tribunal-seat; he presently ask'd for the criminal judge that sent us to him his mittimus, but him we had not seen, for he was not come to himself yet after a great feast he had been at the day before, and one of his deputies sent us to prison. Then the goaler began to examine us concerning our coming to Cbina, upon what intent it was, what we liv'd upon, &c. We answer'd him with a great deal of freedom and ease; the consequence whereof was that they put us in through another little door which was lock'd, and had a porter at it; we went on through a lane, and they brought us to an idol temple. I don't know that in the prisons in these our parts there is any church of God so great, so spacious, so clean, so neat, and so much frequented by the prisoners, as that is. In all the goals, dungeons and courts of justice throughout the empire, they have temples richly adorn'd, and cleanly, where the prisoners, and such as have law-suits make their vows, offer candles, oil, silver, perfumes and other things: some beg to be deliver'd out of goal, others good success in their suits; but those wooden and earthen images neither hearing nor seeing, they give no relief to their suppliants. At night they turn'd us through another lesser door into a court, and then convey'd us into a great hall, quite dark and dismal, without any window, and so full of people, that there was hardly room for them all to stand; this was call'd the little prison to distinguish it from the dungeon, which was far enough from thence. Here we continued forty days, having always light at night, and there was an overseer who took care no noise should be made. All men were wonderful submissive to him, so that there was no roaring, or noise, or quarrelling, but all as hush as if it had been a regular monastery, which we did not a little admire. In the day time we went to the idol temple, and to a great court that was before it, there we sun'd ourselves, which was no small comfort. Sometimes we discours'd upon the subject of our holy religion, and answer'd the questions that were put to us, and then proceeded to convince them of the error of their idolatry and superstition; but they were so grounded in their follies, that tho' they own'd they lik'd our doctrine, yet they would presently go offer up their prayers to their idols. There were rooms enough in two lanes to be let to people of some note, who were in for small faults; there they live quietly and with conveniency till their business is over. There are also some houses in which marry'd people live, who keep the watch in the night; they walk about those lanes and courts continually beating drums and blowing little horns, so that it is impossible any man should make his escape, tho' the place itself were not so secure.

6. The women's prison is apart, and has a strong door in which there was a little gate, through which they gave them necessaries. We took particular notice and observ'd that no man ever went to hold discourse there. The modesty of the Cbineses in this particular is not to be parallel'd in all the world, and no less the reservedness and precaution of the women. All things necessary for clothing and diet were carried thither to be sold: the barber goes in to trim, the cobbler to mend shoes, the taylor to alter clothes, the coalman, the woodmonger, the butcher, the seller of rice and herbs, and all other sorts of trades; so that there was every day a formal market kept there. There are also cooks, who for a small allowance dress the meat very cleanly. There is a good well, which all make use of to dress their victuals, drink, and wash their linen. Thus the whole resembles a well govern'd body politick. Every afternoon the head goaler with his clerk view'd the prisoners, calling them over by their names, and finding them all there, lock'd them up till next day.

7. To those that were poor they gave every day a portion of rice, half of it they eat, and with the other half bought wood, salt, RETTE. of, because without it many would be exposed to miserable want, there being no way to beg by reason they are not even with the ground, and quite out of the way for people to come at them. All the while we were there, more came in than went out: some had their thighs all gaul'd with lashes, others their ancles disjointed by the wrack, which is commonly us'd and with great severity in that country. One day we went into the dungeon, which is dismal enough, without it was a large court, and in the middle a temple like that of the little prison: all those that were there had fetters on, and their colour was unwholsome, because the place is very damp. In the day time they shew'd them some favour, suffering them to come out into the sun, where they air'd and lous'd themselves. They once brought a parcel of them from thence into our prison, so that we had not room left to sit down: for eight nights I lay under a cane bed, in which were two comrades: I slept well, tho' the boards were my quilt, but I dreaded lest the canes should break, and I be beaten as flat as a pancake.

 These hardships oblig'd us to hire a room, where we spent the rest of our time with more ease. What we admir'd was, to see how devoutly and incessantly those wretches begg'd of their idols to deliver them from their sufferings. Every day they lighted candles, burnt perfumes, made a thousand genuflexions, knockt their heads on the ground and wept before them; others gave themselves to mental prayer, others sang, and particularly one who had been there four years; this man took upon him to be sexton, he swept the temple, cleans'd the altars, look'd after the lamp, begg'd of the others for oil and candles, and earnestly exhorted them to ask the assistance of those devils, and mov'd them so to do by his example, for he was almost continually at prayers. He utterly debauch'd one we had just gain'd to embrace our holy doctrine, persuading him, if he persist'd to implore their gods they would deliver him out of goal; the wretch it seems was not of the elect. We also observ'd with how much courtesy, civility, and respect those people treated one another, and the same they us'd towards us. This is a thing incredible in our parts. If two Cbineses, Japoneses, or Tunquines were brought into our prisons, how would the other goal-birds use them?
 What tricks would they play them? How would they force them to pay garnish?
 Nothing of this sort is practis'd there, but they treated us with as much respect, as if we had been some persons of note among them. In this and many other particulars, that nation beyond all dispute surpasses the rest of the universe. Another thing we made our remark of, which is much practis'd by all that nation, and was, that when any prisoner dy'd, having perform'd their ceremonies there upon the place, they put him into a coffin, but would not carry him out at the door by any means: they have a superstition in this particular, and therefore on the inward side towards the dungeon they had a gap fit for the purpose made thro' the wall into a small orchard, thro' which they thrust him out.

8. At length the day of our departure came. The cause of detaining us so long was, because they expected all the missioners that were in that province, to carry us together to court. The officers carry'd us before the judge of one of the two corporations, before whom our business lay.
 The father of the society had been fetch'd out of prison two days before, they had taken from him his house and church, and he was upon bail in a little loft he had over the gate. To make the way shorter they carry'd us on the outside of the walls. As soon as we were without them, we discover'd the finest lake in the world; two sides of it were hemm'd in by most delightful and verdant hills and mountains, on the sides whereof were many temples, palaces, and country houses wonderful pleasant to behold. The vessels on the lake were many, of sundry forms, and all graceful. The lake as near as we could guess was about six leagues in compass, and reach'd within ten paces of the wall on the south-side: it was in a plain full of vast fields of rice. We came tir'd to the judge's court, having walk'd almost two leagues, and waited for him two hours: during that time a multitude of men came about us, with whom we discours'd concerning our holy faith. The mandarin did not come, and a clerk who was employ'd in our business bid us go to dinner, for he would answer for us: we travel'd almost two leagues more, all this while without breaking our fast. At length we came to the good jesuit, who was much indispos'd, yet we all rejoiced and eat together, and without resting I was carried in a sedan to hear the confessions of no small number of Christians, men and women, who waited for me in a house.

9. Some persons too had confess'd in person, repairing thither with much fervor to that effect: among them was a taylor whose name was Julian, a most exact Christian, tho' too subject to scruples, and therefore very often repeated his confessions.
 Some of the prisoners ask'd this man one day, Whether he was a follower of our holy doctrine? He courageously answer'd he was. Then said they, How can you being a taylor keep so holy a law? He answer'd, Gentlemen,

Gentlemen, when I cut out clothes, I do not keep the value of a thread; and for the fashion I demand no more than is reasonable, and what will keep me. This is it the law of God enjoins, so that neither this nor any other trade need hinder the fulfilling of it. They were astonish'd at his courage and resolution, and we being by were much edified. This poor man suffer'd much from ill Christians, and some apostates: they would go to his house and threaten, that if he did not give them some silver they would impeach him, and for quietness sake he satisfied them all. Next day they carried us to the river, and put us into a little boat, yet big enough for us four, three servants, and six officers. The soldiers travel'd a horseback by land, always in sight of the boat, and were reliev'd every two or three days journey: they were satisfied we would not attempt an escape, so that they took no great care of us all the time we were upon the water; and tho' we travel'd with them two hundred leagues by land, we had never cause to complain of the least incivility or affront offer'd us; and yet we never gave them a farthing, which indeed is very remarkable among infidels. The civil officers would have given us some trouble, thinking to get silver from us, but were disappointed.

10. When I write particularly of the persecution, its original and causes, other things to the purpose shall be added. Now to return to the metropolis Hang Cbeu, I must observe that having gone through a great part of it with my two companions, the throng of people was so great, that we could scarce make way through the streets. We saw not one woman, tho' we look'd about very carefully, only to be satisfied of the great retirement of those women. Would to God the hundredth part of it were observ'd among us sober Christians; and scholars of repute told me, there were above six millions and a half of people in this city; and the millions of Cbina are the same of those of Spain. The Bonces, or idolatrous religious men, according to some, are above fifty thousand, and according to others far exceed thirty thousand. They all live upon charity, only some till a parcel of ground to help to maintain them. A temple was built within these few years in this city, which cost fifty thousand crowns in silver; the Chinese crown is worth ten royals, as well as the Italian. The pillars of this temple are very high, straight, and thick; and for the more security, the founder cas'd them with brass-plates as bright as gold. The house and church of the society was great and magnificent, and for that reason, as some of the fathers at times told me, was a help to forward the persecution. We saw it all that afternoon we came thither, we offer'd up our prayers in the church, and took particular notice of it. It had three isles, with each three pillars, besides two that join'd to the wall of the frontispiece. Yet F. Mathias de Amaga in his Annua writ it had three hundred, a pretty difference. This should have been inserted above, but it makes not much to the matter.

11. The she bonces, or nuns, are also very numerous, I forgot to ask the number. This city is so well stored (and there is none but what is so) that seventy thousand soldiers coming to it in my time, they all liv'd upon what was then actually in the shops, and sold about the streets, without raising the price of any thing, or causing the least scarcity in the city, no more than if only twenty men had come to it. There is another particular thing (tho' these are all common in Cbina, only varying according to the greatness of the place) which is, that six thousand countrymen come in every day with their cover'd tubs to carry out the human dung. A notable forecast! I had forgot to mention that the Mahometans have a sumptuous temple in this city, the gate, frontispiece, and tower over it, as beautiful and lightly as the best in Spain.

12. There is another renowned city in Cbina call'd Su Cbeu, we came to it the fifth day after setting out from the last. Under its walls is a great river, along which we sail'd; an arm of it runs through the heart of the city from one gate to the other. This place is not inferior to Hang Cbeu, for its greatness, trade, and commerce, but is not so populous. We cross'd thro' the middle of it, and lighted on the church the society had there, where five fathers were confined by the viceroy's order, that they might be sent to court with the rest: we made a halt there of five days, being well entertain'd and caref'd by those pious men, and indeed we stood in need of it. The reader may rest him too before he enters upon the next chapter, observing that this city pays two millions a year taxes, by which it is easy to guess at its riches and trade.

NAVARETTE. I. IT is the common receiv'd opinion of Aristotle, S. Thomas, Albertus Magnus, and many more, that the monarchical form of government is the most perfect: The Chinese are of the same opinion, and therefore do very much value themselves upon theirs being such. They generally say, that as in heaven there is but one sun which overlooks the world, from whom the other stars borrow their light; even so in their country there is but one head and emperor, who gives light, governs and directs all its actions and motions. But in regard a man cannot alone attend to all things, it is requisite he have ministers and officers to serve him. Jethro gave this advice to Moses, and it is the method all the monarchs of the world have hitherto follow'd, tho' some have excel'd others in the manner and order of governing. That which the Chinese did, and the Tartars at present observe, may vie with the best in Europe.

2. The first and supreme council the emperor has in his imperial city for governing that vast monarchy, is answerable to that we call the council of state, and is therefore call'd Kuei Fuen. It is held within the palace, and the Ko Laò sit in it, that is, the antient men of the empire, masters and supreme counsellors who attend the emperor. They sit at a round table; to them the emperor commits the petitions that are presented to him. The antientest divides them equally among them all; every one considers those that fall to his share, and writes his opinion: then they are return'd to the emperor by the antientest of the board. If he approves of the answer, he signs them; if not, they are sent back, and order'd to be duly consider'd. Under the Chinese government there were seven Ko Laòs, the Tartar added seven more; so that at present they are fourteen, seven Chinese and seven Tartars. The number of counsellors were doubled after the same manner in all other councils. It is well worth considering in this place, the emperor's and these mens mighty care and trouble. There is no business of consequence in all the empire but goes through their hands: and therefore for dispatching of all affairs, they must attend every day in the year without making any holidays, times of respite or vacation, which is an unsufferable toil. True it is, this assiduity is very advantageous to those that sollicite them, for their suits are decided in a very short time, they conclude their business and go to their homes, without being put to such excessive charges as is usual in other countries. Read Oleaster in xviii. Exod. where you will find how indispensable a duty it is to hear those that have suits depending at all times.

3. The second council is call'd Han Lin, Han Lin, and is compos'd of the doctors of the imperial college. These are chosen by the emperor himself; when they are examin'd they live at court, but every one in his own house: they are assisting to the government, canvassing and resolving such things as by the emperor's order are laid before them. From this board they are chosen to be great mandarines, but till then have no command.

4. The third is call'd Tu Cha Juen, and Tu Cha this consists of visitors; when the emperor sends to visit the provinces which is very usual, he chuses the fittest persons out of this number; he gives them his seal, which they carry fastned on their right arm; they are as terrible as so many thunderbolts, and many of them do their duty to admiration. The mandarines quake when a visitor comes.

5. The fourth is call'd Tai Li Zu; this Tai Li is the tribunal that assigns suitable punishments to enormous crimes.

6. These two last and the president of the criminal court make up another call'd Zan Fa Zu, whose business it is to weigh Zan Fa and consider, whether the punishment assign'd by the criminal court be just or legal; and when once they have confirm'd it, there is no appeal or demur.

7. The sixth is call'd Tung Zing Zu, to Tung them it belongs to peruse the petitions that Zing Zu are to be represented to the emperor; if they approve of them they are prefer'd, if not they tear them.

8. There is another of great authority call'd Ko Tao, who have it in charge to Ko Tao correct, and check the mandarines, who behave themselves ill or negligently in their employments. If the emperor does not his duty, or gives ill example, or indulges himself too much in plays or sports, or does not regulate his palace, or permits excess in apparel, &c. the members of this tribunal reprove him over and over. They are properly monitors, and execute their office to the letter of the law.

9. Besides these there are the six famous courts, among whom all the business of the empire is divided. The first is Li Pu, Li Pu the court of offices; as soon as any employment falls, the members of this court give give the emperor a petition, presenting two or three candidates, and he chuses one of them for the place. As soon as appointed, they prepare his orders, and deliver them to him if present, or else send them if he be absent, and he goes away to his employment. Those that are prefer'd pay nothing for their offices.

Hu Pu. 10. The second is Hu Pu, a court of Exchequer, takes care of all the revenues of the empire, of the receipts and expences the emperor is at. The royal treasures of the metropolitan cities are immediately subordinate to this court.

Li Pu. 11. The third is Li Pu, the court of rites and ceremonies, whose care it is to examine the doctrines that are preach'd, the business of ambassadors, to regulate court-funerals. The court of the mathematicks is subordinate to this; here our cause was try'd.

Ping Pu. 12. The fourth is the court-marshal, Ping Pu, which regulates all affairs relating to the army. It has some further jurisdiction, for we were turn'd over to it in order to our banishment, and we appear'd before it. They assign'd officers to attend us, boats to carry, and a guard to go with us.

Hing Pu. 13. The fifth is the criminal court, Hing Pu.
Kung Pu. The sixth Kung Pu, the court of works, which has the charge and care of raising and repairing ports, castles, walls, bridges, &c. Each of the courts has two presidents at this time, the one which is the chiefest a Tartar, the other a Chinese; the assessors as many Tartars as Chineses, as was hinted above. Each of them have four great rooms, in which several mandarines of inferior quality to those in the court sit, and transact affairs of less moment.

14. The ground each court takes up is too much. The shape and structure of them all is the same, all the difference is, that some are bigger than others. They all look towards the south, with their backs towards the north where the emperor resides. Every court has three doors, on which are painted horrible giants, ghastly to be look'd at, all to terrify the multitude. That in the middle is very large, and none but mandarines, or persons of great note come in at it. The two little ones are on the sides of it, at which those that have causes depending, and the commonalty come in. Before it is a great court big enough to bait bulls in. In it are three causeways, each answering to one of the doors; but that in the middle is rais'd above a yard higher than the others, with a stone arch, and another gate in the middle of it. On the sides are a vast number of rooms, under piazzas, for clerks, solicitors, and other officers. A temple is never wanting. Opposite to the doors are very orderly great halls, and within them others as good; courts are kept in both of them.

15. There are at court two thousand four hundred mandarines, the emperor allows them all rice and pay in silver. By what has been already said, it is easy to guess what a number there is throughout the empire. Every province has its mandarin at court, who is in the nature of its protector and solicitor-general. And if the holy Ghost in the fourteenth chapter of Proverbs, says, in the multitude of the people is the honour of the king; then doubtless that of the emperor of China is wonderfully great: and if we reckon the vast multitude of his subjects, we shall be convinced there is nothing wanting that can make him one of the greatest potentates in the world, and that he is far from being liable to the disgrace the scripture mentions in the same chapter, in the small number of the people is the dishonour of the prince.

16. I will conclude this chapter with the relation of the state with which the emperor goes out of his palace, as it was told me by F. John Balat a jesuit, who himself saw the late emperor, when he went to F. Adamus his church. In the first place, the doors of all the houses in the streets through which he is to pass are all shut, and the people retire, so that not a soul is to be seen; and if any were, they would be severely punish'd. Before him come out a horseback all the petty kings, ko lads and great mandarines, who ride close to the walls, that the whole streets may lie open. Next follow twenty four colours of yellow silk, which is the colour of the emperor's livery, with golden dragons embroider'd on them for his arms. Then come twenty four umbrellas of the same colour, with treble coverings, which are very lightly; I have seen several of this sort and make. After them are twenty four great rich fans, of which I have seen some, and they would be much valued in Europe. Behind these marches the imperial guard, which is very numerous. These and the rest we shall speak of wear a yellow livery richly wrought, and lightly helmets of the same colour. Four and twenty men in the same garb carry the emperor's chair, or palanquine, which is of great value; and at certain distances the like number stand as relays. Then follow many musicians, and after them pages and footmen. This in writing seems little, but is prodigious to behold, as that father said.

knowledge of any other god, or nobler object, than the material heavens. What others have writ, tho' some persist obti-nately in it to this day, is not so much as probable; in the controversies this point has its peculiar place. This then the Cbineses suppose and say, heaven punishes the wicked, and rewards the good; gives crowns, and takes them away, not through any intellectual virtue it has, but naturally and of necessity: for this reason they worship

Theology.

it as the supreme Deity, and only the emperor sacrifices to it, as to his father. The sun they say is his brother, and the moon his eldest sister. They give the earth the title of mother, and therefore the emperor sacrifices to her. Next to heaven the Cbineses think there is nothing like their emperor, to extol whom they give him the title we have mention'd. They also call him great majesty, great father, common father of the empire. This last name is very proper. King Theodorick, of whom Caf-siodorus makes mention, lib. IV. epist. 42. was wont to say, the prince is the publick and common father.

2. In a book of great account and famous in the school of letters, these people call their emperor Lord of heaven, earth, spirits and men, and that with those very letters the same thing is attributed to GOD in our holy faith. I charg'd them with in-consistence thus, if the emperor be the son of heaven, and sacrifices to it as to his father and superior; why do they make him superior to, and lord of heaven? We might say to them as Theodorick said of Darius, their judgment being infirm, they attribute those things to their king, which are only proper to GOD. More might be said of the title the Mogols give their sovereign, which are strange and singular, as are those the king of Ceilon has; it is no wonder that people who have no knowledge of any thing beyond this world should so do, when other parts have shewn such an example. S. Augustin complains of this, when he says, that either through too much submission, or a destructive spirit of flattery, men have been free to give to princes that which was not just and proper.

Veneration of the emperor.

3. I have already observ'd, that the petty kings, magistrates, and great mandarines, come every new and full moon to pay their respects to the emperor. They kneel three times, and touch the ground with their heads. If the emperor comes not out to them, they perform the same ceremony to his imperial throne. They know this is due to that place, which is not to be question'd, as we shall make out in another place. They go to perform this ceremony in their festival apparel; they wear the distinctive mark of their employment and quality on their breast and back, which are richly embroider'd with gold. I saw several in the metropolis, as they were going home after the ceremony was ended.

4. The imperial crown the emperor wears upon some occasions, is beautiful and mysterious. Its shape, as I saw it several times in some temples, is round and somewhat long;
there hang at it twelve strings of pearls, four of them over the eyes, which signify that the emperor's eyes must be shut that he may not see those who have causes before him; and that he will neither favour the rich nor pity the poor; nor be led by affection for his friend, or hatred to his enemy.

Crown.

5. Four strings of pearls fall over the ears, which they expound thus, that the judges ears are to be stop'd to the intreaties of great ones, and to the tears of the suitors; and he must only give ear to reason, law, and justice.

6. The last four strings hang behind, to express with how much judgment, foresight, premeditation, and stayedness princes ought to weigh their resolutions, and how they are to be vers'd in the affairs of the government. The Cbineses are singular in both respects, they take care that their emperor give himself to study and practise learning. It is a plain case, that if the prince be ignorant, tho' he have learned ministers, he will make many false steps.
This is the signification of the strings of pearls that hang behind. The government of man cannot but be without fault and mistakes (it is a plain case, our foresight is uncertain;) counsellors and learned men make the miscarriages the less, and the Cbineses are well stock'd with them, as we have seen already. Many men refuse to take advice, and consult others even in cases of difficulty, but must of necessity come to ruin.

7. The salutation us'd to the emperor is included in these two letters Vuan Sui; that is, may your majesty live thousands of years.

Years. It is the custom throughout the whole empire, to have a little board set up in the temples before the altars, on which those two letters are written, and they make great obeifance to it. In every metropolis: there is such a little board laid upon a table, to which the magistrates pay their respects at certain times; but they do not light candles, or offer flowers, perfumes, or any thing else to it; so that this worship is altogether political and civil, which must be taken notice of, because of what may be said in another place.

8. F. de Angelis writ, that in every metropolis there was the image of the emperor; perhaps he means this little board. Mendoza is under the same mistake, lib. III. cap. 1. of his history. When they speak of him, it is very usual to say, the royal or imperial palace, taking the thing containing for that contained, a custom us'd in Europe upon many occasions. From this way of talking of the Cbineses, some speculative persons would infer, that they use the same figure in naming of heaven, and that by that name they mean our God. This point belongs to another place, but I shall only offer one thing here, which Bentancor hints at in his loquacious apology, and is, that if the Cbineses are of a contrary opinion, as indeed they are, what credit will they give to half a score strangers who endeavour to persuade them it is not so? In short, the Cbineses grant the premises, and not only deny the consequence, but ex professo, and in particular treatises to that purpose, they endeavour to prove, tho' poorly, that there is no God, nor any thing more noble or worthy than the

Heaven we behold. So that the ignorance and folly of the Cbineses in this particular, exceeds him David speaks of, saying, Psal. xiv. The fool has said in his heart, there is no God. For this man was asham'd to speak it with his mouth, as being so palpable a truth; but the Cbineses without any shame deny it with their lips, in their hearts, and in their books. The difficulty we find in converting them to God, sufficiently proves our assertion; read Cajetan in xvi. Act. Apost.

NAVARRETTE.

9. When they speak to the emperor, they generally make use of these two letters, pi aia; that is, I speak to the steps of the imperial throne, words full of submission, expressing that they dare not apply to him even by the name of majesty. When the emperor names himself, it is as if he said, a person of little worth, who does not deserve that honour. The Cbineses are very full of ceremonies, very humble in words, and very proud in their actions.

Ceremonies.

10. None must ride in sight of his palace, nor of those of the petty kings, all men alight and bow their knees to the ground. Some temples of ancient emperors, and that of the Cbinese philosopher, enjoy the same privilege. This was formerly us'd in Europe in passing by churches, and meeting priests in the street. It shall be mention'd in another place, let it suffice now to give a hint of it as a laudable custom, tho' difficult, or rather impossible to be observ'd at present by reason of the frequency of both, and because devotion is grown cold.

CHAP. X.

A farther Account of the Grandeur of the Emperor, and his Court.

1. THERE is so very much to be said upon this subject, that something must of necessity be forgot, and good order inverted. The emperor has nine thousand nine hundred and ninety nine great boats for his own and the court's use: all the missionaries have observ'd, that the number was not complete ten thousand, and wanted but one, which I doubt not the reader will reflect upon, and therefore I will not delay giving him satisfaction as to this particular. We ask'd the meaning of this mysterious number; and the answer was, that the emperor who order'd those boats to be made, gave command for ten thousand, and accordingly it was perform'd. When they were all made, to find out how much iron had been us'd, he caus'd one to be burnt; which done, the iron was ga-

ther'd and weigh'd, and thus he found out how much iron went to the making of them all, and so the number we have mention'd remain'd. His successors would not alter the number, out of respect to that emperor, so that there are always ten thousand wanting one. I cannot but commend the emperor's industry, doubtless imagining his officers would make their profit of that work, as is usual in all places. Good God! what a vast quantity of iron, tar, hemp, and other necessaries are kings cheated of in the building of ships, galleys, and other vessels. It is incredible, and I would not write it if I were not well inform'd in the matter; it would be very convenient sometimes to burn a small pink, I am satisfied they would save more in iron than the cost of the vessel that was burnt.

NAVA-
RETTE. 2. The boats we have spoke of serve to carry rice from the southern provinces to court: they make a voyage once a year all upon rivers; when the waters are low, they are sometimes detain'd several months. Every boat carries six hundred bushels of rice, the remaining part of the vessel is for the use of the master and sailors, who stow other merchandise, the freight whereof pays them, besides their daily allowance of rice, and other small things they receive upon the emperor's account. Besides these he has eight hundred greater vessels, all very lightly, and varnish'd red, with dragons painted on them that have five claws: these serve to convey to the court the stuffs, silks and other rarities that the several provinces produce for the use of the court. There are three hundred more with dragons of three claws on them, which are far beyond all the others, and are for the service of ambassadors, the great men of the empire, and such like employment. I know no prince equal to the Cbinese in this particular, and yet the best and greatest part of this is, that all these things are look'd upon as trifles. Besides all this he keeps his fleets at sea, which are very numerous. When the Tartar fought the Cbinese of Cabelle, which was about the year 1660. he put eight hundred ships to sea. True it is, they are neither so large, nor so strong built as ours, but they are like pinks, and he might have put out many more if he had pleas'd. The enemy set out twelve hundred, and gain'd the victory, as being the better seamen.

Fleets.

Ships.

3. Leaving aside the shipping at present, because we must speak of them again, let us return to court a little. During the time we continued at court, which was three months (tho' some staid not so long, and others longer) we went abroad but seldom, being order'd so to do by the judges, yet they did not absolutely forbid it. Those few times I went abroad (we went all together to the court of rites and ceremonies, and it was above half a league from the church) I observ'd some things which the others took notice of too. I pass'd sometimes by the palaces of petty kings of the royal blood, who for this reason had glaz'd yellow tiles; these and his other kindred the emperor stiles Kin Cbi Pao Je, that is, golden branches, and precious leaves. The buildings are low, but as they said who have seen them, and I myself afterwards saw at Canton, very beautiful and airy, with fine courts, gardens, and other pleasant conveniences. The streets of the imperial city are, as I have instanced before, wide, numerous and long; so that it would be a great trouble to do any business, had not the forecast of that people

been so singular, that at every corner of a street, or little square, of which there is a great number, they have beasts of carriage ready saddl'd and bridl'd to hire to those that go from place to place; so that any man who has business, or goes a visiting, or to take his pleasure, may upon very easy terms be furnished with an ass, mule, or a calash that will carry three or four. The owner goes along with him and looks to his beast, whilst the other is about his business, or a visiting; and thus is he carried back, and for a very small expence does his business, and saves being tired. This convenience is to be had in such abundance, that if a man would have fifty, or a hundred, or more beasts, they shall be brought to his door in less than half an hour. That day we went out to banishment, being twenty five missionaries and thirty Christians that attended us, we were all furnish'd in a moment; and that afternoon we travel'd five leagues with ease, and in a short time; the country about the imperial city being all smooth as one's hand; the asses are excellent cattel to travel upon. I can find nothing in Europe to compare the multitude of people to what is afoot and on horseback about the streets. The Tartar women wear boots, and ride aftride like men, and make a notable figure either afoot or a horseback, but are very modest in their garb; their sleeves are somewhat wide and cover their hands, their garment black and hanging on the ground, their hair breaded without any other head-dress, tho' many of them wear on their heads those caps we all use there.

4. We met with one very pleasant thing in the imperial city, which is abundance of ice; an infinite quantity is consum'd, and yet it is not worth above half a farthing a pound. The manner of using it is not the same as among us, but they take a piece as clean and transparent as the very crystal, which is put into a basin, and over it they pour some fair water, so by degrees it dissolves, and the water is so very cold there is no drinking of it: This drink is wholesome in that country, and very convenient because of the vast heat. Thus other nations us'd to drink with ice. Dr. Monardes writ a treatise upon this subject. They have not got the way in Cbina of making the ice cisterns as we do in Europe, but it is very pleasant to see cart-loads of ice at every corner of a street, and men going about to offer it as you go by. Tho' this be a truth well known to all missionaries, yet F. Martin Martinez in his Cbinese Atlas had the face to write, that the Cbineses of the imperial city do not drink their liquors cool: his own brethren laugh'd at this and many other things he writ; writ; it will be fit the reader take notice of it, that he may read this author cautiously, and that he be inform'd, that one night after supper this question was put before the whole company: F. Magallans a Portuguese, and F. Bullo a Sicilian, were the persons that propos'd it, saying, the question is, who was most misinform'd concerning the affairs of Cbina, Marcus Venetus, or F. Martinez, allowing they were both much in the wrong? Several opinions were given upon this subject, but F. Bullo clear'd the doubt, and said, both of them writ many mere chimera's; F. George found three in only what relates to the court, and many more daily come to light; and if he that is taken in one story is suspected ever after, what must he be who is catch'd in so many? F. Adams his saying, which I quoted in the preface, is pat to this purpose; to back which I will here insert a passage, which all the East-Indies and Macao can testify, and there are those that remember it at Lisbon, as was affirm'd to me in that city in the year 1672.

Impositions

5. A missionary returning out of Cbina into Europe, brought with him a Christian Cbinese servant, whose name was Andrew, in the Cbinese language it is pronounc'd Gan Te Le, for they have no letters that will answer the name nearer: This man was all the sport and merriment of the ship: the father came with him to Lisbon, pretended he was the king of Cbina's son, and as such carried him to King John the fourth, who ask'd him, What is your name? (he might have said your highness's name) the Cbinese answer'd, Gan Te Le: Rise up Don Andrew, said the king, (now the emperor of Cbina's son bows his knee to none but his father) I make you a nobleman of my household, and knight of the order of CHRIST, and taking off his royal cloak, threw it over sir Andrew's shoulders. A very little honour he did him, if he took him for the king of Cbina's son; for what addition was it to him to be one of the king of Portugal's noblemen? After this the father carried him to Venice, and made him known to the senate, who treated him honourably, and gave him a senator's gown. He return'd to Macao now a great lord, who when he came abroad was a servant and cook. Such is the course of fortune. When I came from Cbina sir Andrew was in Cochinchina, he sold the cloak and gown, and to get his bread ply'd as a porter. Thus he return'd to his natural being, for nothing that is violent can be lasting. Others made great princes of some merchants that came from Japan a few years since, which made a mighty noise throughout Europe, I read it in a paper of good repute.

And but of late years a great missionary NAVARRETTÉ brought a servant whose name was DOMINICK, and had been baptiz'd by the religious of my order, whom he serv'd, and after them the Franciscans: the missionary made him pass for a man of quality in Italy and Germany; he gave out he was an able physician, whereupon he was much respected, and the emperor himself did him such extraordinary honour, that one who was then present at Vienna, and very well knew the Cbinese and the missionary, assur'd me that the emperor spoke to him with his hat in his hand: doubtless they pretended he was a king, or son to the emperor of Cbina. F. Mathias de Amaya wrote an annual letter full of such romances, that those of his order would not suffer it to be read before us. He speaks of the three hundred pillars I mention'd above, and says the towns upon the coast destroy'd in the province of Fo Kien when the Tartars drove the Cbinese up the country, amounted to the number of a hundred thousand. All this is doubtless look'd upon in Europe as gospel. This is imposing upon Europe according to F. Adamus; let us leave it thus till another opportunity, and return to the imperial city.

6. Pe King is furnish'd with very good Pe King fruit, as plums, apples, peaches, pears, grapes, and abundance of fish and flesh at reasonable rates. Another thing we admir'd at, which was, the multitude of barbers Barbers very expert at their trade, and extraordinary cheap; they go about the streets taboring on a little sort of flat instrument in the nature of a drum, by which they are known, and those call that have occasion for them: this is practis'd throughout all Cbina. What is particular in the imperial city is, that every one of them carries on his back a stool, basin, water, fire, and the rest of his utensils; so that when any body comes to him, whether it be in the street, or market, in the open air, or under shelter, in a moment he sets up his shop, claps down his stool, takes out water, shaves the head all to a lock that hangs behind, orders the eye-brows, cleanses the ears with curious instruments for that purpose, stretches the arms, strokes the back, and plays other monkey tricks; after all they give him about a penny, or commonly less; then making many obeysances, he gathers his tackle, and falls again to beating his tabor. Before the coming of the Tartars there was little use for barbers, because the Cbinese never shav'd their heads, yet not for that chimerical reason F. de Angelis assigns: he says the Cbinese believe If they are asbeists, how can they hold this opinion being on? they shall be taken up to heaven by the hair, and therefore they preserve it; but that the bonces hold the contrary opinion, of in Cbina. There are besides in the imperial city, and throughout all Cbina, very many who exercise no other trade but cutting the nails of the fingers and toes. The people of Cbaramandel have the same custom, but it is a part of the barbers trade: these men carry tabors, but bigger than those the barbers use, and a little stool, but are very dext'rous at their business: they use no siffers, but little chizels, and they leave neither nail, loose skin, nor corn, without the least trouble.

 At one stroke they take off all the superfluous part of the nail: the purchase is small, and suitable to the trade. There are many other particulars which would take up much time. By what has been said, and shall be added hereafter, we may give a guess at the ingenuity and curiosity of that people.

CHAP. XI.

Of the Emperor's Revenue, Expences, and other particulars.

1. THE empire of Cbina being so large, and so prodigiously populous, as we shall declare in its place, the emperor's revenue must of course be very great, tho' the taxes are easy, and there is no duty upon any thing that is for eating or drinking, which makes them so cheap. Notwithstanding all this, a person of undoubted credit reports, that after all charges borne, and the salaries and pensions to petty kings, counsellors, magistrates, officers (whereof there are above eleven thousand of note) and the army paid, their comes yearly sixty millions clear into the treasury.
 This seems to me an excessive revenue, especially knowing, as I do, that the emperor always kept a million of foot in garrison only upon the great wall, and there is no doubt but there was another million dispers'd about in the cities, towns and castles before mention'd. F. Martin said the whole revenue amounted to a hundred and fifty millions: he exceeds many of his brethren in the sum. F. de Angelis says it rises to sixty millions. I mention'd above, that the city Zu Cbeu yielded two millions a year: another in the same province call'd Sung Kian pays one million: the town Lan Ki, where I resided some time, raises sixty thousand ducats; another whose name is Xang Hai, half a million. If all the rest were answerable to these, there's no doubt but the revenue must swell to a vast pitch, but they have not all so good a trade. I made out by their books, and have the paper still by me in Cbinese characters, that the tax upon plough'd land alone amounts to twenty six millions: the duty on salt, silk, cloth, and other things is worth sixteen millions: The income by customs, toll and boats is very great, as I was in-form'd by an understanding Cbinese, but not certain, and rises or falls every year.
 The poll tax paid by all from twenty to sixty years of age, tho' inconsiderable in respect of every person, yet rises to a great sum. The ground-rent of houses is very considerable: so that we need make no difficulty of assigning him yearly above a hundred millions of fine silver. Then reckoning what the mandarines steal, not from the emperor, but from the subjects, the sum will be considerably advanced.

 The Cbineses of Manila were the authors of what Mendoza writes, lib. III. cap. 4.
Trigaucius reckons in his time above fifty eight millions and a half of persons that paid Taxes, which is a vast number.

2. Of late the revenue sunk above five millions a year, the reason of it was, because the Cbineses of Cabello, vulgarly call'd Kue Sing, and at Manila known by the name of Marotos (who never would submit to the Tartars, and afterwards took the fort in the island Hermosa from the Dutch) had the command of the sea and towns on the coast, where they rais'd as much money by taxes as paid the expence of their war, and the fleets they kept against the Tartars. Besides they secur'd the trade of silk and other merchandise in Cbina, which enrich'd them, and was a great loss to the emperor. He reflecting on his own damage sustain'd, and meditating how to weaken the enemy, sent absolute command to destroy all the open towns and houses that were near the sea, and for the people to retire three leagues up the country or more, according to the situation of each of those towns. This was executed with the utmost rigour, for when the time assign'd was elaps'd, they barbarously butcher'd all that had not obey'd. Very many were kill'd, but many more utterly ruin'd, having neither town, house, or goods; and the emperor lost his yearly revenue.

3. The Tartars contrivance, tho' costly, was soon successful, for the marotos hearts fail'd them immediately, and they were so cast down, that they have never been able to lift up their heads since; so that the Tartars made no more account of them, persons to return to their towns, commanding the mandarines to be assisting to them, and to furnish them with oxen to till the ground. This year 1675, there came news to Madrid that the Chineses of Cabello, who live in the island Hermosa, had possess'd themselves of some provinces of China, but it wants a confirmation. It is a justifiable and politick practice to lose a finger, or cut off an arm to save the head and whole body. To venture all to save a part is certainly pernicious; therefore it was a prudent and wise action of the Tartar to secure his empire, and overthrow the power of the enemy, with the loss of some few persons, and a small part of his revenue.

4. For this reason I shall ever commend the great wisdom and understanding of Don Sabiniano, Manrique de Lara, when he found himself threatned by the insolent Maroto, or Kue Sing. That proud haughty people aspir'd to have those islands pay them an acknowledgment and tribute, which was of dangerous consequence, considering how small a force there was in them at that time; but the governor's courage and conduct made amends for all. He to secure the head and main body of what was committed to his charge, with the general consent, advice, and approbation of all people concern'd, dismantled the forts of Tidore and Terranate, and convey'd the artillery, garrisons, and christian inhabitants to Manila, so strengthening the head to be in a condition to oppose those that should presume to invade it; and the consequences had been more advantageous had this been done some years sooner. But the policy of maintaining those places, at the expence of much Spanish blood, with great charge to the king, and loss of many ships, prevail'd then. And why, others better know, I can give no reason for it; but certain it is the profit did not pay the cost.

Alms.

5. Let us return to our Chinese, or Tartar-Chinese. The alms the emperor gives every year, is one of the most magnificent things can be said of him; it exceeds four millions, an action worthy the greatest monarch in the universe. What I most admir'd in it, is, that the present emperor's father having been petition'd to apply that sum to his own use, on pretence that the exchequer was low, being exhausted by the wars, he answer'd, that since his predecessors had given a testimony of their piety, by distributing such large alms, he would neither cut off, nor retrench it. What could any catholick prince have done more glorious? In all towns and cities there is a number of poor maintain'd at the king's cost, a hundred in some, sixty in others, according to the greatness of the place. I pass over all that Mendoza writes in the tenth chapter of his second book: and tho' at the latter end he says, that those of his order, RETTE, and the bare-foot fryars, are eye-witnesses that there are no beggars about the streets; yet I avouch, that the rest of us who have liv'd longer in that country, have seen the contrary, and given alms to many that have come to beg it at our doors. As to what he says concerning blind men, that they work in the mills, where they get their bread, I own it, and have seen many of them.

Blind.

6. The judges receive the taxes, as shall be said hereafter, and give every poor body his allowance; sometimes the manner of it is singular and pleasant. There are always some of those who pay the taxes so very faulty, that they can very hardly be brought to it with good lashing; others it is likely there are, who do not pay because they have it not. Now to oblige them to pay, it is an excellent method and course to give part of these taxes to the poor, and deliver them the mandarines note to recover it. As soon as they have their order away they go to the house of the party, produce their commission, and take possession of the house as if it were their own; there, like absolute lords and masters, they command meat, drink, beds, and whatsoever they please till they are paid. It is utter ruin and destruction to abuse them, or touch a hair of their heads; so that to save much trouble and charge, those people sell or pawn what they have to pay: and thus the judge, by the insolvency of the beggars, raises the duty he could not get with all his power and authority.

7. There are many poor besides those the emperor maintains; they are proud, troublesome, and saucy, and not satisfy'd with any thing. They have their judge that is their protector in every city and town, and they all pay him contribution out of their gettings. Whosoever any of them is brought before a court, this man appears, protects, defends, and pleads for them; and it is strange to see that judgment is always given for the poor, which makes people stand in awe of them; no body dares so much as give them an ill word, but rather will let them have any thing they ask for. Sometimes if they get not what they demand, they threaten they will starve themselves at the door, that their death may be laid to him who denies them what they ask. Both missionaries and Chineses tell of strange encounters they have had with them. For my own part I must confess, that giving them good words and a little rice, I always got rid of them without being put to any trouble. Some there are that go about the streets praying, without begging of any body; but when the people hear them pray,

they

NAVARRETTE. they bring out their alms and give them. Others go about with dogs that dance and play tricks, particularly the blind men use this as they do in Spain. Others carry about monkeys which exercise their faculties. Others have frightful snakes which they show, and get alms. All this agrees well with what Mendoza writes.

8. Those who have read the books, or heard an account of christian doctrine, ask us, whether there are any beggars in Europe? We answer cautiously, saying, there are some whom God has left, that the rich may have wherewith to bestow their charity. Notwithstanding this evasion, they look askew and say, if all men in your countries follow this doctrine, there is no doubt but they are all as strictly united in love, as if they were one man's children; and consequently the rich man will share his wealth with him that wants, and so all men must have enough. Whatsoever we can say to them, they hold fast to this argument; and in truth it was so in the primitive church, when all things were in common, and none wanted necessaries. The allowance of the mandarines is very scant. Mendoza and de Angelis write the contrary, without any ground for it. This makes many of them suffer their palms to be greas'd, yet a great number preserve themselves untainted who live with great moderation, at which the Chineses are much edify'd. In other parts there are large salaries, and yet they grasp all they can; but this is the difference betwixt them and other nations, that if in China they once find any thing of bribery, the head infallibly falls for it; in other countries, tho' they be manifestly known to be guilty of taking bribes, they are conniv'd and wink'd at, and they dare confess and receive the holy sacrament. The soldiers pay is rather too great for that country, every private centinel has three crowns of silver a month; if he be a single man, he may maintain himself and save half. The army is not so great now as it was some years since, so that the expence is less. I was told the emperor spent sixty millions a year; it is a prodigious expence, but I insert it here, that every one may judge of it as he pleases.

1. THE emperor of China was ever provident in laying up a treasure, a necessary precaution to be able to relieve the publick, and the subjects in their necessities; so says S. Thomas Opus. 20. quoted above. But this must not be done, as the Chinese emperor who preceded the Tartar did; he gather'd much, and was very covetous, so that it only profited the robber, who seiz'd the royal city, and set fire to the palace. I mention'd before what vast riches he carry'd away, yet when the Tartar came he found a great quantity. After the palace was burnt, F. Adamus went into it to behold where Troy town stood, and walking through the rooms, found a manuscript book in our ancient character on vellum; and as F. Francato to whom it was sent told me, it contain'd text and comment; the character of the text was small and unintelligible, that of the comment was larger, and some of it might be read; The subject was divinity; it often quoted S. Augustine and S. Thomas, and no other author; but it is not known when or how that book was carry'd to China, and presented to the emperor.

2. When the robber first and after him the Tartar enter'd the imperial city, there were seven thousand pieces of cannon mounted on the walls, so we were inform'd in that metropolis, and I mention'd it above; but there being nobody to play them, it was the same thing as if there had been none: I shall come to this subject in another place. The emperor wanted the love of his subjects, and eunuchs, who betray'd him; what then signify'd the cannon? what signifies a mighty army of resolute soldiers, and well provided, if they want faith and loyalty? I said before how broad the walls of the imperial city were; they are all of brick, and much higher than the antient ones we see in Europe. The gates are very large; and all plated with iron, as are those of the other cities I have seen; but nothing avails where there is no loyalty.

3. It is a great honour to the Chinese emperor, that he can bring into the field a million or two, or more men, and maintain them for years, without any breach of the known liberties of the empire, or raising the prices of commodities, or laying new taxes; and if they had apply'd themselves to war, as they have done to learning, who is there in the world that could oppose them? God Almighty took off their edge from military exploits, and gave them no inclination to enlarge their dominions, perhaps that they might not give laws to the universe.

4. I ever liked the Tartar and Chinese soldiers, though heathens, many degrees beyond beyond those of our countries. Those that guarded us to the imperial city, were not like them that had the great martyr S. Ignatius in custody. I met ten thousand of them just as I came in upon that mission, I pass'd through the middle of them; and to say the truth, by their courtesy and carriage they look'd to me more like Christians, and very religious gentlemen, than infidels. Being upon my journey, I came to lie one night at a little fort, in which were about fifty soldiers. It is incredible how courteously they treated me; their commander quitted his chamber, which was a very good one and warm, considering the cold season, for me to lie in; and though I us'd all my endeavours, I could never prevail with him to suffer me to stay among the other passengers in whose company I travel'd. Would any have done so among us? Such a thing might be, but is hard to be believ'd.

Canal.

5. The river that is cut for the emperor's boats, and an infinite multitude of others in that country, reaches within a small distance of the imperial city. This is another, and no small wonder, it is above two hundred leagues in length; for one hundred the water runs away to the north, the other hundred it flows to the south. We sail'd the whole length of it when we came away banish'd from court. Being come to the middle of it, we found a great idol temple standing on the bank, and near it a good spring, which there divides itself into two small brooks, one turning to the north, and the other to the south. This water is not enough for large vessels, so that at times they are forced to stay for the rains; and there are sometimes five hundred, sometimes eight hundred boats stop'd there till the rain falls. This happened in the year 1665, when we were going up to the imperial city. To supply this defect, and endeavour to make it navigable at all times, they have found a useful but costly expedient, which is, that on the south side, where is the greatest want of water, they have eighty strong sluices. Two strong stone walls come down from the land at equal distances, which drawing on still closer and closer, reach to the middle of the river, where they form a narrow passage only capable of one large boat at a time; this passage is clos'd with mighty sluices. At every one of these there is a mandarin, with a great many men to help the vessels thro'. When the sluices are shut, that little water which runs in betwixt them in half a day, rises above a fathom and a half; then they suddenly throw open the flood-gates, and the vessels rush out as swift as an arrow out of a bow, and make all the way they can, till the water again failing them, they are forced to repeat the same thing again. As res.

s kept r. fo. s. under such discipline notes

some boats fall down, others are going up; NAVA and this being more difficult because against RETTE. the force of the stream, such a number of men join to hale them with ropes, that it is wonderful to see how swift they drag a vessel of above eighty tun against the current of that impetuous torrent.

6. They observe great order, and have their precedency in passing. The king's vessels no doubt have the first place, and among them the worthiest, and those that carry ambassadors or persons of note. Many too that ought to come last, buy a good place. It is ridiculous and worth observing, to hear what shouts, and noise of little drums and horns there is when any great vessel goes through, especially if it be at midnight, as we did sometimes. These delays make the voyage tedious. We spent six months and twelve days between the court and Canton, which was time enough to sail from Goa to Lisbon. When there are great rains, the water gushes out in several places, and breaks down the banks that should keep it in. To prevent this mischief, there are always abundance of people employ'd in several parts to repair them with turf, fascine, and piles.

7. There is no doubt but the cutting of that river was a prodigious expence, and they are at no small charge in keeping it in repair; but it is as certain, that the land-carriage would be more intolerably dear than it is by this conveniency. Great art was us'd in cutting of it, for it is all full of turnings and windings to stay the current of the water. It is an incredible number of boats of all sizes that is continually going upon it; and the same may be seen in other places upon other rivers. The multitude we saw in this voyage was so great, that the missionaries who valued themselves upon their knowledge in the mathematics, computed it, and maintain'd, there were enough to build a bridge from Macao to Goa, which are distant nine hundred leagues from one another, or more, as some will have it. There are those who affirm, there are more vessels in Cbina than in all the rest of the known world. This will seem incredible to many Europeans; but I who have not seen the eighth part of the vessels in Cbina, and have travel'd a great part of the world, do look upon it as most certain. There is another thing very wonderful all along the way we have spoke of, which is, that there is great plenty of all sorts of provisions, not only at reasonable, but at very inconsiderable rates; and the passengers being without number, the prodigy is the greater. A good pigeon is sold for a half-penny, a large fat pullet with eggs for three half-pence, and where there is more scarcity, for two-pence; a pound

RETTE. things, and sometimes less; beef, hares, pork, and other sorts of flesh at the same rate; and very often they came to the boats to offer these and the like things to sale.

8. Before we got off this river it began to freeze, and some days they were forced to break the ice to be able to make way; and if we had been stopp'd a fortnight longer, there had been no avoiding travelling by land, which would have been mighty troublesome to us. When the cold weather and frost came on, we all took notice of a notable contrivance, and peculiar to the ingenuity of the Chinese, for earning their bread; which is, that to secure their fishing in the rivers and lakes, and to be able to cast their nets safe from the terrible frosts that are frequent in those parts, they make a case of buffalo, or horse hides well Fishing habits. sew'd, with the hair on the inside, boots at bottom, and gloves and sleeves of the same all in one piece. Into this they go with their clothes, shoes, and stockings on, then girding it close about their waste, they fasten it upon one shoulder. In this manner they run into the river up to their arm-pits, then cast their nets; and having drawn them, they slip off the case, having all their clothes on, and not a drop of water comes through. We were all eye-witnesses of this, and did not a little admire it. We saw others in boats with the same cases over them, and holding the oars with those gantlets, they row'd as swift as thought.

CHAP. XIII.

1. THE wall of China so famous among all authors, may deservedly be called the only wonder of the world. It is little above twenty leagues from the imperial city of Pe King. We being prisoners in that city, it was then no time to take our pleasure, or go to see it. I will write what I have been told several times, especially whilst I was in the said city, and will set down what others have writ concerning it. It runs along four provinces from east to west. Kircher assigns it nine hundred Italian miles in length, which make three hundred leagues of ours. F. de Angelis allows it five hundred Spanish leagues. Another Italian gives it one thousand two hundred Italian miles, which make four hundred leagues of ours. Mendoza, lib. I. cap. 9. allots it five hundred leagues: but he is in the wrong when he says four hundred of them are made by nature; and in telling the world, as F. de Angelis does, that it begins in the province of Canton. This mistake was occasion'd by their ignorance in the Chinese language. The province we call Canton. Canton is spelt thus Kuang Tung, which signifies large, and stretched out east. The country where the wall begins is in writing call'd Kuang Tung, that is, bright east, and is not the name of a province. The sounds are different, the accent of the one is single, the other is not (I suppose he means one is a monosyllable, the other a dissyllable.)

Wall. 2. What I could make out is, that it is three hundred and sixty Spanish leagues in length, thirty cubits high; and the cubits of China are larger than ours, and its breadth is above twelve cubits. It rises and falls according to the ground it runs over. In the province of Pe King it breaks off for some space because of the mountains. There are many towers upon it for the centinels, and some gates to pass through, but secur'd with strong castles. All this monstrous pile was rais'd in five years, and two hundred and five before the incarnation of our Redeemer. The whole empire sent three men out of every ten, who working in sundry places at a distance, finish'd the work in so short a time. The whole wall is of hard stone, without any lime or sand, but so closely knit and neatly join'd, that the smallest nail cannot be drove in betwixt the joints. The emperor Cing Xi Hoang order'd it to be built after that manner. The new Rome, built by Constantine, was finish'd in five or six years. Byzantium, extended almost a league in circumference without the walls, which was a stately and magnificent work, but not to compare with the structure of this wall. On that side of Leao Tung where it begins, it runs a quarter of a league into the sea; the foundation was laid on a great number of ships full of iron bars sunk there.

3. Who can chuse but admire this structure, especially if they consider all these circumstances we have mention'd? The wall the emperor Severus built for the Britains surpriz'd the world, and yet it was but one hundred and thirty two Italian miles in length, as Spondanus writes Anno 212. But what is this to that in China? The army the emperor of China kept to guard his wall, consisted of a million of men, others say a million and a half. As in Spain we send criminals to Oran and the galleys; so here they are sentenced to serve at the wall. This punishment was also allotted for sodomy; but if all that are guilty of it were to suffer by that law, I doubt China would be unpeopled, and the wall overgarison'd.

4. The building of this great vast and monstrous wall, the vast expence they were at in erecting it, and the great charge in keeping it up, are plain demonstrations of the *Chinese*s want of courage: for if they were men but of indifferent resolution, they might with less than a million of men sent beyond the wall, though only arm'd with sticks and stones, in a small time destroy all the neighbouring kingdoms, and make them tremble that are at a great distance from it. The *Chinese*s are only fit to study, to trade, to make curiosities, and to cheat, but not to fight. Now they say the Tartar has broken down half a league of the wall; perhaps he designs to have a clear passage, for fear any thing should happen amiss to him. False men and tyrants never think themselves safe.

Temper.

River Hoang Ho.

5. The yellow or red river is another remarkable thing, and is therefore call'd Hoang Ho. It springs in the west, runs many leagues without the wall, fetches a great compass about it, and returning again crosses through China till it comes into the province of Nan King, where it falls into the sea. Its course is above eight hundred leagues, it is very rapid, and from its source keeps a bloody hew, without changing, or altering its colour in any place. When we went to court, we sailed on it two days and a half, and were surpriz'd and astonish'd to see its whirl-pools, waves and colour: its water is not to be drunk, and therefore we laid in our provision before-hand. Afterwards we observ'd a secret in nature, till then unknown to us, which was, that the watermen and servants fill'd a jar of this water, and putting into it a little allum, they shak'd about the jar; then letting it settle two hours, it became as clear and fair as could be wish'd, and was so delicate, that it far exceeded the other we had provided, though it was extraordinary good. In Canton I learn'd another easier and wholesomer cure for it, and it is only putting some small grains which make fish drunk (and in Spanish are call'd coca) into a jar, and the water will clear in a very short time. The city Fang Cheu, to secure itself against the inundations of this river, which are very great, built a wall above two fathom in thickness, very high, and twenty four Spanish leagues in length. Sometimes the river swells so high that it reaches the top of this wall. The people take care of themselves before-hand; for if once it gets over, it certainly drowns all the country in an hour.

Water turbid how clear'd.

6. It is a dispute among the Chinese philosophers, why the water of this river should always keep its colour from its source, without ever altering. The reasons they give for it are ridiculous. All the missionaries of us there were dubious about it, and had many arguments upon the subject, some whereof were concerning the whirl-pools. As to the first difficulty, I think there is no reason to be given for it, but that the earth it runs over is soft, and of that colour, and the current being rapid, it mixes with it. The cause of the second effect is, that some places are very deep, into which the currents fall with much violence. But it is very strange that in so great a distance there appears not the least alteration, either in the colour or the whirl-pools, tho' there are other clear and crystalline rivers very near to it. In the year 1668, it overflow'd the banks, the mischief it did was no more than usual upon such occasions; towns, villages, and country-houses were bury'd under its sand and mud.

NAVAV-RETTE.

7. There is one thing very remarkable in the province of Kuci Chu, that is a bridge of one only stone, and is twenty fathom in length, and three in breadth. F. Michael Trigaucius a jesuit, and my companion in persecution, had noted this down as a rarity; he told me of it, and I thought it worth writing. The manner of carrying that stone, and placing it on to pieces of wall, very high and broad, built on both sides of the river, was no small subject of discourse. Of all the men in the world, the *Chinese*s only are the fittest to conquer such difficulties. They have excellent contrivances, and a ready wit for all worldly affairs.

Bridge of one stone.

8. For fear I should forget it, I will here insert another thing which is prodigious and great. When I was at Macaçar, talking with prince Carrin Carroro, son to that great lover of the Spaniards, and unfortunate prince Carrin Patin Galoa, he told me they had not long since kill'd an alligator seven fathom long, and three fathom thick, in whose belly they found three mens heads, some daggers, bracelets, and other things the moorish men and women use to wear in that country. This prince kept some of the teeth, which were monstrous. I who have seen many, believe this was a terrible one to behold. He added, that he and several others knew an herb, which if a man carried about him, he might with safety come close to one of those creatures, play with, and get a top of it without any danger. He invited a Portuguese gentleman who was by, and me, to see the performance; we thank'd him for the favour, but those people being Moors, we presently consider'd there might be some superstitious practice in it. Since I have read much in F. Raphael de la Torre, I am inclin'd to believe there may be an herb may have such

Bridges. 9. But to return to the bridges of Cbina, on account of that I have mention'd of one stone. When I came into that kingdom, I went through and saw others, which for the greatness and structure may vie with the best in Europe. The first I saw had no arches, and I fancy'd the Cbineses knew not how to build them; but afterwards I met with so many, and those artificial, that none in Europe exceed them. Many of them are so high, that their ships pass under with all their sails aboard. They have also many stately bridges of boats, I took notice of some of them; but when I beheld the renowned bridge call'd Lo Fong, because of the port of that name that is near it, I stood amaz'd, and quite forgot the others I had before observ'd with much care and curiosity. This bridge is two leagues from the famous city of Ciuen Cbeu, in the province of Fo Kien, whose walls may compare with the best in the world for strength, beauty, and greatness. The bridge is laid over a navigable arm of the sea, where abundance of people were wont to be lost. This moving Cai Fong, governor of that part of the country, to compassion, he caus'd it to be built. It is in length thirteen hundred and forty five of my paces, and those large ones. The cubes or peers it stands upon are above three hundred. The intervals betwixt them for the water, are not arch'd, but flat, each cover'd with five stones lock'd into one another, above eleven paces in length. The sides of it are adorn'd with graceful banisters, with globes, lions, and pyramids on them at equal distances, which make it very graceful to behold. The whole work and ornament is of a blue stone, so steep colour'd, that at first sight it looks black; and tho' founded in the deep sea, there is neither lime nor iron about it, only the stones are mortis'd one into another; and yet in many ages it has not been in any danger of falling. There are on it five stately towers at equal distances, with strong gates and guards of soldiers. As I was going over it they told me this story; that formerly when they cross'd this arm of the sea in boats, a woman with child went aboard, and the master of the vessel foretold her, that she should be deliver'd of a son, who would come to be a great mandarin, and so powerful, that he would build a bridge there at his own charge. They say it fell out so, and he prov'd to be the same Cai Fong we have spoke of. Let it pass for a tale, tho' it is well known there have been heathen prophets.

10. When first I came into Cbina, I met with a very diverting river. I sail'd down it five days together; the channel is deep, and on both sides of it are vast fields of rice, which requires to be always swimming in water; and therefore when they want rain, they draw it up from the river with an infinite number of mills they have for that purpose, which are all kept a going by the stream, so that they move continually, and throw up the water, which is convey'd as the countryman thinks fit, without any toil of his. By reason of this multitude of water-works, the river is call'd the river of water-works, Che Ki.

11. In our way to the imperial city, and province of Nan King, we saw another odd invention for drawing of water, which we could not but admire and laugh at. These sort of mills stood in a plain upon the flat ground, and were full of sails made of mat, as is usual in that country; and the wind twirling them about, they flew like lightning, and drew abundance of water without being attended by any body. Here we concluded, that those who say there are carts in Cbina carry'd by the wind, as does F. de Angelis, doubtless meant these mills, especially considering they call a cart and one of these mills by the same name in Cbina; and it is only distinguishable by the genitive case join'd to it, saying a cart of water, of mills, of oxen, &c. And unless it be made out thus, there is nothing to be said for it, though Mendoza vouches it, lib. I. cap. 10. In the island of Kai Nan, which is the most southern part of Cbina, there is another great rarity, which is, that the fishermen who go with their nets dragging of shell-fish, draw out of the mud a sort of crabs, which as soon as they come out of the water into the air, immediately turn into stones, together with the mud that clings to them. They are sold all over Cbina, and are medicinal; but particularly they are good to clear the sight, and take away inflammations in the eyes; to this purpose I gave a piece of one I brought over to the most reverend father F. Peter Alvarez de Montenegro, confessor to his majesty.

CHAP. XIV.

1. THE empire of Cbina has such plenty and even superfluity of all things, that it would take up many volumes to treat of them in particular. My design is only to give some hints of what is most remarkable, which will suffice to make known how bountifully God has dealt with those people who know him not, giving them all they can desire, without being necessitated to seek for any thing abroad; we that have been there, can testify this truth.

2. I am very well satisfied there is more silk made there every year, than in several other parts of the world that deal in the same commodity; and I believe half Europe might be supply'd from thence, and yet enough remain for their own use, tho' the consumption there is great, as well in clothes as other things. One thing among the rest I observe in Cbina, which I could wish were followed among us, which is very little or no change in their apparel, men and women always go in the same fashion. The women's for some thousands of years never was alter'd in the least; that of the men had also continued thousands of years, the same throughout all the fifteen provinces. The Tartars chang'd, and doubtless mended it, and that will hold as long as they do. The dress of the Chinese and Tartar women, tho' different, is very modest, and they may both be patterns to the best of Christians. They abhor our fashion even in the pictures that go from hence, so that both men and women when they see their necks and breasts bare, hide their eyes, and sometimes we are asham'd to shew them. God expresses his displeasure against the change of apparel, in the first chapter of Zephaniab, I will punish the princes, and the king's children, and all such as are clothed with strange apparel. It looks like a farce, or rather like childrens play, to see every day a new fashion, and the last still the worst. The Japoneses, Chinese, Tunquines, Cochinchincans, Siamites, Bengalans, Golocondars, Moguls, Persians, Turks, Muscovites, and others, always have the same garb and apparel, and only we change every day. Who can decide which are in the right, and which in the wrong?

3. It is prodigious what a quantity of coarse, finer, and most delicate cotton-webs there are in Cbina, and all very lasting: There is also abundance of ordinary, indifferent, and curious hempen-cloth as fine as the hair of the head. This their summer apparel is made of, and is very light and graceful. There is some flax in the province of Xen Si, but they do not spin it, and only use the seed to make oil of. F. Martin was deceived in what he writ concerning their linen. F. Trigaucius in like manner writes, that Cbina abounds in wine and flax. If he means the wine made of rice, he is in the right; but as for our sort there is no such thing. There is enough of a very good and fine sort of flax, which they make of a sort of trees like our plane trees. They us'd to carry much of it to Manila; but that which we properly call flax, I am positive the Chinese do not work it. Mendoza is in the wrong. Trigaucius owns the truth, lib. I. cap. 3.

4. In the province of Xan Tung there are wild silk-worms, which work their webs in the trees where they breed, and good strong stuffs are made of them. In the northern parts, all that can afford it, make use of lamb-skins to line their clothes, to defend them against the cold. They also make breeches, stockings, and blankets of the same. Breeches are very antient in Cbina; according to Lyra, in ix. Genes. Semiramis invented them. Who was the first inventor in Cbina I know not. The women wear black breeches, but over them petticoats. In the southern parts where the cold is not so intense, skins are not so generally us'd, but they quilt the clothes curiously with cotton and coarse silk, which is lighter and warmer. They have boots of all sorts, of cotton, of silk, of neats-leather, buck-skins, and horses-hides, which are the best and most valued. There are some as thin and soft as a sheet of thick paper: they fold into any shape, and then being pull'd out, are beyond the finest cordovan. Others are made with the rough side outwards, and very beautiful. They are excellent tanners, their soles last twice as long as ours. Their stockings are generally white, but all of an equal wideness; in winter they have them thick, or quilted, or as every one likes. Their clothes being all stop'd, they must have something to keep their necks warm in winter, for which they make use of collars made of the skins of foxes, hares, rabbits, cats, and other beasts. Cbina has many mines of gold and silver, tho' of late years they do not work in them, for very good reasons which I have read in their books. Abundance of silver has gone over from Manila into Cbina, but much more from Japan; at present they carry a great deal out of Coria. It would be a great saving to Manila if they

Colonel Don Laurence Lafo design'd it, and there are some of the plants to this day at Binnan. Very much is made in Tunquin and Cochinchina, and in Manila; because the publick is neglected, they neither mind this, nor other advantages.

Metals.

5. Much gold is gotten in the northern river of Cbina, which they make use of in some sorts of works, and sell it to strangers. It produces iron, brass, copper, and all other metals in great plenty. There is great abundance of wheat, rice, barley, beans, and several other sorts of pulse very cheap. In the year 1664, I bought wheat for three ryals (eighteen pence) which was brought to me to the door to chuse, very clean and good; and rice, every grain as big as a kernel of a pine-apple, at five ryals (half a crown) the bushel. In Xan Tung the same year they sold wheat for one ryal (six pence) the bushel. Tho' there are no olive trees, they have oil of several sorts for three half pence a pound. That made of a small seed call'd Afonjoli, is much us'd by the Chineses for making of puff-past fritters, and some other such dishes they dress. Very good oil for lamps is in great plenty. That country abounds in all sorts of garden-ware. Parsley and burrage there is none. The Europeans have carry'd endive and hard cabbages. The cucumbers and melons are not like ours. Several sorts of pompions and calabasses, an infinite number of water-melons, and others not known among us, are in vast quantities there. In the southern provinces there is as much sugar-cane as they can wish. Throughout the whole empire they smoke much tobacco, and so there is abundance sowed: I have bought it for a penny a pound dry to make snuff. The Japan tobacco is most valued in those parts. Wine of grapes they use none, nor do they know how to make it, tho' they might have it very good, because their grapes are excellent. What they generally use is made of rice, it is very pleasant and palatable, red, white, and pale. The quince wine is very delicate. The Chineses drink all their wine very hot; they like the taste, and will take a cup too much. They do not look upon drunkenness as any shame, but make a jest

Garden-ware.

of it. They are not without ancient and modern examples for what they do. Alexander the great, and Cambyfes are a couple that may stand for a great many; for modern precedents, let them but go towards the north, and they cannot miss; and if they draw nearer to the south, they will find some, the more is our shame. The emperor banish'd him that first invented wine in Cbina; and their histories tell us, he shed many tears condoling the mischiefs that invention would cause in his empire. When I was at Rome in the year 1673, there came thither two Armenian fathers of my order, with the emperor of Persia's secretary, and letters from him for his holiness, in answer to those the archbishop of Armenia, who was also a Dominican, had carry'd four years before. These fathers said, that the emperor was a great drinker, and that he asking whether there were good wines in Rome? and being told there was, he said, if so, then your pope it is likely is always drunk and besides himself. The Armenian reply'd, sir, in Rome and those countries men drink wine, but they do not allow the wine to get the upper hand of the men. The Persian was satisfy'd. But observe what an unreasonable reflection he made, tho' so natural to his vice; because he would be drunk with wine, he concluded the monarchs in our parts must do the same. This makes good the saying, that he who is drunk thinks all others are so. His father was more zealous for his law, for he commanded abundance of vineyards to be destroy'd. It is a difficult matter to establish the precept of Plato in Cbina, and other places, viz. that soldiers should drink no wine. The Turks observe it, and follow the example of the Chineses in carrying no women to the war. We had the news in Cbina of the numbers there were in the armies that went into Portugal. Nor would Plato allow princes, judges, or those that have publick employments, to drink wine, nor even married men, when they are to have to do with their wives, lest they should get children like themselves. Much has been writ against this beastly vice, and to no purpose; I shall speak something to it in another place.

CHAP. XV.

Of some Trees peculiar to CHINA.

1. GOD is wonderful in his creatures, and stupendous in the multitude, diversity and beauty of them; the variety of only plants he has created, were sufficient for ever to express his great power and infinite wisdom. The trees, flowers, fruits, and plants I my self have seen in my life time, are so very numerous, they would more

Trees. more than fill a large volume. There is a tree, or rather a shrub, in the Philippine islands, which is very strange, but withal mischievous; it commonly grows near other trees, and twines about them: they that cut wood fly as far as they can from it, and if they neglect so to do, they pay for't with terrible pains. There comes from it a sort of thick milk, which at the first stroke of the ax flies up to the eyes, and they drop out on the ground, and the man remains not only blind, but full of most vehement pains for the space of eight days. I saw this misfortune befall a man, to my great trouble and affliction.

2. At Guistin, a town in the island Min-doro, I saw a tree, of which the curate of Luban had told us, that every leaf of it which fell to the ground, immediately turn'd into a mouse. Being come to the said town with other companions that were upon the mission with me, I enquir'd among the Indians concerning the truth of that report. They avouch'd it to be so, and added, that if any of the wild mice came within the shade of that tree, they died upon the spot. The tree is beautiful to look to, and of a very fine green. I happening to relate this in Cbina, F. Balat the jesuit said, that in some parts of the lower Germany there were certain trees on the sea-shore, the leaves whereof falling into the water, were converted into ducks. I afterwards read the same in F. de Angelis, and at Rome credible persons of that country assured me it was true.

Kuei Xu. 3. Let us go over to Cbina, which is our principal subject. There is a tree there called Kuei Xu, pretty large spreading, and handsome to look to; it always grows on the banks of brooks, as do the willows in Castile. It bears a fruit about the bigness of a hazle-nut, of a dark green colour; it blossoms about the middle of December, and looks as white as snow; in the middle of it appears something of the blackness of the kernel, which is very beautiful: the green that is over it withers away by degrees, and then all that was within it appears. The white looks like tried tallow. They gather it about the latter end of December, or beginning of January, melt, and make excellent candles of it, resembling white wax, without any ill scent. They last very long in winter, but not in summer; tho' they keep all the year, and serve us very well. It is impossible to discover how great a quantity of these candles is consum'd; but it is wonderful great the first fifteen days of their new year, and all the rest of the year in the temples of their idols the expence is incredible. The natural colour of them, as has been said, is white; but they adorn them with several colours, flowers, silver and gold, as with us we set off the paschal NAVA-candles. The common price of them is RETTE. three half-pence a pound, but they that buy it off the tree save the one half. After the making the candles, from the grounds that remain they extract oil for the lamps. It is a very profitable tree, and no way costly to the owner. If we had it among us, oil, tallow, and wax would be very cheap. It has been disputed among the missionaries whether mas may be said with those candles: I guess there is no precept for their being made in wax, in which casuists agree; and bating the mystical signification of it, I find no reason why we may not make use of them.

4. There is no want of wax in Cbina, but they use it in medicines, not to burn; the price of it is not the same in all places, yet it is no where above two ryals (a shilling) a pound. The emperor, and petty kings burn wax, but not of the common sort; it is made by great wild bees, and is naturally white without using any art to it; the candles made of it are much better than ours. They last long, and when lighted, are so transparent that the wick is seen through them. F. Adamus us'd these in his church very freely, for the empress dowager supply'd him. In the northern provinces they also make use of tallow candles; an infinite quantity of them is consum'd, and they are very cheap. In the Philippine islands there is abundance of wax; the mountains are full of swarms of bees, who make it in the trees, where the natives take it. The trade of it to New Spain is very considerable, the profit very great, for it costs less than two ryals (twelve pence) the pound, and is sold at Acapulco for a piece of eight. This was so in my time.

5. There is another tree in Cbina very much wanted in the gardens of Spain and Italy. It is call'd La Moli Xui, is not very large, but sightly, and greatly valued by all people. It bears no other fruit but only a little yellow flower, so sweet and fragrant, that I know nothing in Europe to compare it to; though very small, it may be perceiv'd a quarter of a league off. The learned men and scholars take great care of this tree, which blossoms in January, and the flower continues some months upon the tree. They usually wear it on the lock of hair that hangs behind.

6. The women are also much addicted to wear flowers on their heads, some of gold, some of silver; and some natural, which are very plentiful; and rather than lose the custom, they use the flowers of mallows, which they sow in their gardens for this purpose, and to eat. I have eaten them sometimes, and find they are good;

NAVARRETTE. we have none but what grow wild. It is very comical to see some old women of threescore and ten almost bald, and full of flowers. We saw one at the beginning of the year 1668, as she pass'd by in haste from her own house to a neighbour's, that made us laugh heartily. And it is to be observ'd, that it was never known in Cbina that they hooted men or women, however they are clad. The same is observ'd in the country whether you travel by land or water, and they never fail of their usual civilities. These things very often made us stand amaz'd, and we could not but remember the rude scoffing, and insolent expressions commonly us'd in our countries, in cities, upon the road, and in other places, to gentlemen, elderly persons, modest maids, and churchmen; and notwithstanding all this those must pass for Barbarians, and we be look'd upon as very much civiliz'd. In winter some people go abroad in such strange odd figures, that a man must be very much mortified to forbear laughing. Nevertheless the good carriage, modesty and civility of those people makes them pass by all, without any exterior demonstration.

7. There is also something singular in the tree they call Moei Xu, it bears a little four fruit, which women and children eat; being dry'd and put into a brine, they sell it for a medicine, and give to sick people, because it sharpens the appetite. The tree is very large, and what I particularly observ'd in it, is, that it blossoms about Christmas, when it freezes hard, and the snow falls and lies upon the ground: I admir'd at it very much the first time I saw it, which was in the year 1663, on the 23^d of December. All the field was cover'd with snow, the tree hanging with jewels, and that flower shew'd its beauty in the midst of it all, vying in whiteness to outdo the snow.

8. The camphire tree the Cbineses call Chang Xu, is vastly big and beautiful to behold. The camphire the Cbineses gather from it is somewhat coarse, the finest and best of it God allotted to the island of Borneo. The wood of it smells very strong, of which they make tables, chairs, and other household-goods. The sawdust of it strew'd about the beds, drives away the punaices or bugs, which swarm in some parts; and five leagues round where these trees grow, there is not one to be seen, which is very strange. All the Cbineses take a particular delight in killing these nasty insects with their fingers, and then clapping them to their nose, an unaccountable and loathsome pleasure. A priest who had been some considerable time in Borneo and seen it, told me the manner how they gather the camphire. In the dawn of the morning those islanders go out with clothes and sheets, which they spread under the trees: before the sun rises, a liquor sweats out through the pores of the stock of the tree, and the branches; it moves and shakes about just like quicksilver, and then they shake the boughs as much as they can, whence there falls down more or less of it according as it came out, and to the motion of the tree, there it consolidates; and having gather'd it, they put it into canes, where they keep it. As soon as the sun appears, all that is left sinks into the tree again. That people have an extraordinary affection for their dead, and therefore keep them several days in the house before they bury them, taking comfort in having them. To prevent their putrifying with the great heat of the country, they make use of camphire after this manner. They seat the dead person on a low chair open below, and from time to time they blow into his mouth a cane of camphire, which goes down into the body, and in a short time works out at the other end. Thus they preserve the carcases many days without the least corruption. In the province of Canton there are many cinnamon trees; the cinnamon is good, so that they do not stand in need of that of Ceilon. But Cbina produces no cloves, nor nutmegs, as Mendoza writ. In the northern parts there is ebony; but they that would have abundance of it, very good and cheap, must go to the Philippine islands, where they will find mountains cover'd with it. The Cbineses highly value the sandal of Solor and Timor, and it costs them a great deal of plate. Of the red, which is less valued, there is some in the Philippine islands. There are more than enough of all sorts of oaks, and pinetrees. The consumption of pine in ships, boats, and buildings, is immense, it seems wonderful that all the woods are not destroy'd; no small quantity is spent in firing, and it looks like a miracle that it should hold out for all uses.

9. In the north where wood is something scarce, God has provided coal-pits, which are of great use. There are infinite quantities of canes as thick as those of Mamila and Peru in all parts of Cbina, but more in the southern provinces. These canes are a great help to the Cbineses and Indians. The latter build their houses, and make other uses of canes. The Cbineses make tables, chairs, beds, presses, boxes, chests, and whatsoever they please. When we came banish'd to Canton, in two days time we furnish'd our selves with all necessaries, finding all those things I have mention'd ready made in the shops. The cane-chairs, table, table, bed, &c. lasted me four years, and I left them never the worse for wearing. The bed cost a ryal and a half (nine pence) the table a ryal (six pence;) three quarters of a ryal (four pence half penny) every chair the rest bought at the same rates. It is a great pity we have not in these parts that plant for all those uses I have mention'd, and to make scaffolds, arbours in gardens, poles for orchards, and many other things. NAVA-SOME are so big, there must be two men to carry one. The hearts or pith of them in vinegar, is an excellent thing for sick, or healthy persons to eat. In Manila they call it acbor. The young ones that sprout up when very small make an excellent boil'd salad, which is very pleasant, wholesome, and gently laxative.

1. I Have seen abundance of flowers, and more sorts of fruits; if I could remember all, this chapter would be longer than those before. They have great store of jasmins in China, which they plant in the nature of vines; they look after them carefully, and sell them in nosegays, which affords them good profit. The sampagu, so deservedly famous at Manila, and other parts, is so in China. It certainly excels the jasmin, they have it in pots, and it is a great commodity, being carry'd about to several provinces. There are wonderful properties in the root of this flower; and those very opposite to one another. They say that part which grows to the east is a mortal poison, and that which grows to the west the antidote against it; this I was told in Manila, where there is great plenty of it.

2. There is in China a sort of rose-tree, not to be distinguish'd from ours by the eye, which every month in the year puts out new roses, nothing differing from those we call a province rose. That which the Chineses call queen of flowers, in their language meu tan, is certainly the beautifullest in the world, and ought only to be handled by kings and princes. Its smell is very delightful, and it is thick of reddish leaves, which will divert even melancholy it self. That country abounds in sun-flowers, very fragrant lilies, much celebrated by their philosopher, pinks but of little scent, and other flowers usual among us. There are vast quantities of that they call cocks-comb, which is very beautiful, and a great ornament to gardens. Rosemary, laurel, olive, almond-trees, and others common in Europe are not known there. The honey-suckles of China, which grow wild in the northern provinces, may vie with those that are nicely rear'd in gardens in Spain, and are taller than they. In the province of Fo Kien there is a great deal of good origany, or wild marjoram, and much majericon grows about the fields.

3. In the Philippine islands I several times saw a particular sort of rose, tho' at Rome Rose. I was told some parts of Italy afforded it; to make it altogether wonderful, it wants the smell. They place a nosegay of them on an altar in the morning, till noon it preserves its whiteness, which is not inferior to snow; from ten till two it changes by degrees to a glorious red, and at five turns to a most perfect colour. I and others affirm'd it was an emblem of the mysteries of the rosary, and with good reason because of its three colours.

4. To come to the fruits, I dare avouch there is not a man in Spain that has seen and eaten so many sorts as I have done. In New Spain, which affords all that our country has, I eat of the plantan, pine-apples, mameis, anona, chicozapote, aguazates, and others. At Manila, Masaca, Caile, and other places, the plantans are much better. Others call them planes, but they are mistaken. There is none of the plane-tree, or its fruit in Mexico, or the Philippine islands, but in China there is; it differs much from those vulgarly call'd plantans. The pine-apples are also incomparably better. Among the great variety there is of plantans, those they call the bishops are best, the next to them are the dominicans. Those the Indians call cambing saguin, that is, goats-horn, because of their shape and make, exceed all others in sweetness and scent, but that they are too cold. The great ones they call tumduque, roasted, boil'd, or otherwise dress'd, are an excellent dish. Some other sorts there are dangerous to eat much of them, but being dress'd they lose some of their hurtful qualities. The flavour, taste and sweetness of all we have mention'd, does without dispute exceed that of all the fruits in Europe.

5. The ate which is very common at Manila, and throughout all that Archipelago, even as far as India, is doubtless one of the prime fruits of God's creation in the universe. It is like a little pine-apple, when it grows ripe on the tree, and there distils from it the most excellent kind of rose-NAVA-rose-water. No fruit that ever I saw has such a relish, sweetness, and odour, it is highly valued in all parts.

Dorion.

6. There is none of the dorion at Manila, it is possible there may be in the neighbouring islands, and on the mountains. It grows in Macassar, Borneo, and other places; all men value, and many say it excels all other fruit; this I can say, that it is admirably good. Many observe that at the first bite it exhales a little smell of onion, and therefore they do not like it so well as others; I own I perceiv'd it, but it is gone in a moment, and there remains a sweet delicious taste. They look upon it to be of a hot nature. Its shape is like a little mellow streak'd; as they are cutting it upon those streaks, there lies betwixt every two a several morsels of a white meat, and within it a pretty large stone. Every one has six of these several parcels, and each of them makes three or four good mouthfuls. At Macassar they keep them dry'd in the smoke; we bought them sometimes in that island, and always lik'd them very well, they are fit for a king's table.

Macupas.

7. The macupas of Manila may vie in colour and taste with our pippins; they are excellent for sick people, because they are watry and cool, and they are extraordinary, either conserv'd or preserv'd. The milinbines, or carambolas, in my opinion are beyond the macupas; there are of them sweet and sour, when ripe they smell exactly like quinces; an excellent conserve is made of both sorts of them. The most famous are those of Terranates, whence plants were carry'd to Manila; there is nothing finer for a sick body that is very thirsty; its colour is very green, and when thorough ripe a quince colour. These are to be found in the southern parts of Cbina.

Pabos.

The pabos of Manila are made great account of in that country, the tree is very slightly, the conserve of pabo very dainty; being kept in brine it serves instead of olives, and is very good with rice, which is the bread of those parts. They are much us'd, and with good success to get sick people a stomach; when ripe they are pleasant, tho' extreme sour, they are like the mangos I shall speak of hereafter, and I take them to be a species of it: The santoles is the fruit so much admir'd by the Indians; they are in the right, but it is eaten boil'd, and otherwise dress'd, never raw. They are also preserv'd dry or wet, or made like marmalade, and is good always. The tree is very large, and the fruit bigger than an apple, its colour purple.

Santoles.

Capotes.

Anonas.

Papagas.

8. The black capotes and anonas have thrive very well in Manila, where there are a great many sorts of oranges in abundance, and so of limons. The papagas is a wholesom and pleasant fruit, they call it the jesuits fruit. I ever lik'd it boil'd or raw, they are good cut into a salad before they are ripe, or preserv'd. The tree is all soft and sappy, and casts a root with great ease tho' it be upon a rock. It bears a great deal of fruit, not on the boughs but the body, and in a very short time.

9. That which the Portugueses call xaca and we nangcas, is the largest fruit I think there is in the world. Some of them weigh half a hundred weight. F. Kircher assigns this fruit to Cbina, but he was misinform'd. There is of it in India, the islands and Manila. They cut it with an ax; within it are many nuts as yellow as gold, and in each of them a kernel. This roasted is very savory, and the kernel delicious. The Indians dress it very well with the milk of the cocoa-nuts. This fruit grows on the body of the tree, and not on the boughs, for they could never bear it. The xambos of Malaca are in great vogue, they grow at Manila, but not so large. They are round, something bigger than a common plum. The stone is loose and stands off from the fruit, its taste and smell is like a fragrant rose.

10. The Portuguese highly commend the Indian mangos; they grow at Macassar, Camboja and Siam, where they say the best are to be had. I know not how to describe them. The tree is very large and tall. They when ripe are yellow; the inside of some of them is all eaten, but of others only chew'd and suck'd, the rest remaining in the mouth like a rag. Both sorts are good, but rare in pickle. They are hot, and bite, and therefore they drink water after them; and the boys when they have fill'd their bellies with them, pour a pitcher of water over their heads, which running down about the body, prevents any harm they may take by eating so many. Let us leave other sorts not in such esteem, tho' good, and go over to Cbina, where there are some very rare, besides those known in Europe. I will only say something briefly of the lecbias longanes, and cbiqueyes, which are the most remarkable.

11. The lecbia, which the Cbineses call licbi, is in that country accounted the queen of fruits, and they are in the right, for I know none better, unless the ate exceeds it. And for the most part those things that are excellent are rare; there is such abundance of lecbias, only in two provinces along the coast, that it is wonderful, and yet they are not valued the less. They are small, being a little bigger than a large walnut, the shell green and thin, within it is as white as snow, with a stone as black as jet. The taste, flavour, and delicacy of of it is to admiration; they usually put them into cold water before they eat them; they say they are of a hot nature: When they have eaten as many as they can, they drink a little water, and have a stomach to eat more. The tree is large and handsome to look at. I found them out in the mountains of Batan, near Manila, that year Don Sabinian Manrique de Lara came governor thither, but being wild they were not so large as those in China. Mendoza calls them plums; they deserve a better name.

Longanes.

12. The longanes, which the Chineses call lung jen, that is, dragons eyes, because the stones within them are just like the eyes of a dragon, as the Chineses paint them, were doubtless better than the lechia, if it had but so much meat, being sweeter and more fragrant. But tho' the meat is little, it is of much substance, abundance of it is eaten, and it is sold dry throughout all the empire. It is valued as a good medicine, and being boil'd, makes a pleasant and nourishing broth.

Xi Cu,

or Chiqueyes.

13. The chiqueyes known in Manila; because the Chineses carry some thither, and call them xi cu, tho' the Portugueses give them the name of figoaque, are of several sorts, or imperfect species, but all delicate. Some there are small in the shape of an acorn, but much bigger; they have no kernel, the shell alike in all of them, is like the rind of an onion; the flesh yellow and very soft when they are ripe, so that making a little hole at the top, they suck out all that most sweet and pleasing taste to the palate. There are other large ones bigger than burgamy pears, of the colour of a fine red poppy, so delightful to the eye, that it deserves to be bought for its beauty; before they grow soft they shrink considerably; but when they have lain a day in water they come out as fair as a pippin.

These two sorts are ripe about September, NAVARETTE there is such plenty that the streets are full of them, so that they are very cheap. There are others very precious and larger, greenish and flat, ripe in December, it is charming to see and eat them. These two last kinds have kernels enough, but they are small, they dry them in the sun to keep. Every one is as broad as the palm of a man's hand, they last a great while, and are delicious; and being steep'd one night in wine eat delicately. These breed a powder over them like sugar, which is sold by it self, and being put into water in summer makes a pleasant drink. Abundance of chiqueyes were carry'd to Manila in my time, but none of this last sort.

14. There are many kinds of oranges in China, some better than others, two sorts of them are common in Portugal. One species of them the Chineses make into dry flat cakes like the chiqueyes, which are excellent good, cordial, nourishing, and well tasted. They are valued at Manila, and carry'd to Mexico as a great dainty. There are vast quantities of chestnuts, hazlenuts, walnuts, and azufaisas (a fruit uncommon, in Spain not known to us) they have a vast trade for these dry fruits. The guabagas the Chineses carry'd from Manila have throve there to satisfaction. I do not question but olive and almond trees would take well, for I know no better land in the universe. Their apricots are not inferior to the best in Spain. Peaches, pears, and quinces are as plentiful as may be. There are but few cherries, yet some I have eaten, but the Chineses value them not. I never saw any heart-cherries, but there are many other sorts of fruit, of which we have no knowledge in these parts. Let this suffice for fruits and flowers.

CHAP. XVII.

Of the living Creatures China affords.

Elephants.

1. IN the province of Jup-nan there are very good elephants bred. The emperor keeps twenty four at Peking, as was laid before. There are also many at Tunquin. It is reported of the king of that country that he keeps four thousand tame ones, he makes use of them in his continual wars with the king of Cochinchina. The king of Cambouja has many, and he of Siam more and larger. I shall speak of them among the controversies of the white elephant that died at Siam, and of his royal funeral pomp, being accompany'd by above thirty thousand priests of the idols, for this account belongs to that place. A Portuguese inhabitant of Macao, who was an honest man, and a good Christian, told me he had seen an elephant's tooth that weigh'd above Elephant's three hundred weight. What a mountain of teeth flesh must that be which carry'd six hundred weight in only two teeth! There are wonderful ones at Mozambique. I shall speak more at large in another place.

VOL. I.

2. The tigers in China are very numerous, large, fierce and bloody; it is incredible what numbers of people they kill and devour every year. A Christian Chinese who had liv'd some years at Macao with the jesuits, and with me when I came first to the mission, told me that they were in troops

NAVARRA- of a hundred, or two hundred together at RETTE. one certain place on the road from Canton to Hai Nan, that travellers durst not set out unless they were one hundred and fifty strong, and that some years they had destroy'd sixty thousand persons. I neither avouch nor deny this, but only relate what I heard from that man. I made some objections, but he persisted in what he had said. If this continued long, Cbina would soon be unpeopled. Some I have seen, one of them in truth was bigger than a great calf. A religious man of my own order who died upon the mission, told me he had seen one leap a wall as high as a man; and catching up a hog that weigh'd about a hundred pounds, and throwing it over his neck, he leap'd the wall again with his prey, and run swiftly away to the wood. In winter they come out to the villages, where there is no safety for man or beast; and therefore in country-houses, or villages that are not inclos'd with walls, and are near the sides of mountains, or in valleys, all men are at home betimes, and every one secures his door. I was some days in a place where they did so, and they would come to the door before it was dark, howling so dreadfully that we were not without fear in the rooms. The Cbineses do not take much pains to catch them, some gins they lay for them, and value the skin, of which they make a sort of coats which the captains wear, with the hair outwards; they look handsomely, and keep out the cold.

Leopards. 3. There are leopards, and ownces, but no lions, and many believe there is no such beast. Two brais lions were part of the present the Dutch made the emperor in the year 1665. There being leopards, it is hard to believe there should be no lions, but they own the one and deny the other; and perhaps those they speak of are no leopards.

Bears. Bears there are in abundance. In the province of Xang Tung, there is one species of them, which the Cbineses call men-bears, hiung sin. F. Antony de Santa Maria saw them; they walk upon two legs, their face is like a man's, their beard like a goat's.
 They climb the trees nimbly to eat the fruit; unless provok'd they do no hurt, but when anger'd they come down furiously, fall upon the people, and strike two or three times with their tongue, which is very odd, carrying away with it all the flesh it touches. The aforesaid father often said it, as did father John Balat a jesuit, and both of them had liv'd years in that province. Sure they are of the nature of the Lamia, Jerem. Lament.
 iv. 5. 3. of whom St. Jerome says, They have a human face, but a beastly body.

Musk-an- 4. The provinces of Xen Si and Xan Si mals. breed abundance of those animals the musk comes from; in that country they are call'd xe. Their books describe it after this manner; the body is like that of a small deer, the hair resembles that of a tiger or ounce; when hard drove by the hunters, it climbs upon the rocks, where it bites off the muskbag which hangs at its navel, thinking thus to save its life by quitting the treasure to the hunters, but it soon dies. This account of the book agrees with the common opinion. The kingdoms of Tunquin, Cochin- china, Comboxa, Laos, and others have vast numbers of these precious beasts; and if the Europeans through their covetousness had not enhanced the price of this commodity, it would be of small value, for there is great store of it in those parts, but that of Cbina is counted the best. In the year 1669 it went about a begging in the province of Canton at fourteen ducats in silver, consisting of twenty ounces, and no body would buy it. This was of the best sort, and they say so excellent, that the merchants make two ounces or more of one, and sell it in Europe as choice. F. Mendoza writ some things upon this subject, which I find no ground for; 'tis likely he was impos'd upon by him that gave him the information, especially if he was any of the Cbineses that live at Manila, as plainly appears by other things he mentions in the sequel of his history.

5. There is another creature in the same province very like that we have spoke of,
 it seems to be an imperfect species of it, for it only differs in that it has no bag, all the rest is exactly the same. This beast is sold to eat. As we came away from court, our men bought one; it is wonderful what a scent the flesh exhal'd when it was roasted, for it diffus'd itself all over the vessel, and into all the cabbins; when eaten, it tasted like the highest preparation of musk, and the smell was such as did not offend the taste, but if stronger there had been no eating of it for the perfume.

6. The Cbineses talk and write much concerning the unicorn, they commend and look upon it as an omen of prosperity.
 They paint him very beautiful, but after all it seems to be much like the story of the phoenix. They write of him that his body is like a deer, his tail like a cow's, and his feet like a horse's; that he is of five several colours, the belly yellow; has only one horn, with flesh about it, is two fathom high, a merciful beast, and the emblem of all felicity.

7. In Siam and Comboxa there are baba- das, vulgarly call'd unicorns; the Cbineses are acquainted with their qualities, and therefore value any thing that belongs to them. Those of Mozambique are very famous. The little horns of the females before the males cover them are most valued;
 they

they make small account of the great horns there. Concerning this beast you may read Oleaster in Num. xxiii. & à Lapide.

Lang.

Poi.

8. There are two other strange and remarkable creatures in Cbina, the one is called lang, its fore feet are very long, and the hinder ones short. The other is nam'd poi, or poi, whose hind feet are long, and the fore feet short, whence it follows that they cannot go singly apart from one another. Their Maker taught them how they should go from place to place to feed and seek their sustenance. Two of them joyn, and one helps the other, so that one sets down the long fore feet, and the other the long hind feet, so they make one body that can walk; thus they get their food and live. The Cbineses call miserable poor wretches that cannot live by themselves lang poi, to signify that they want some assistance to get their living. This is not unlike a lame and a blind man, one finds eyes, and the other feet, and thus they help one another, and walk.

Jang.

9. In the mountains of the province of Nan King, there is a beast call'd jang. It is like a goat, has ears and nose, but no mouth, and lives upon the air. I am not ignorant that many authors hold against Pliny, that no creature can live only upon air; yet others side with this grave author, and maintain the fame of the cameleon, as do all the Cbineses in general of the beast here mention'd, of which none can say what some urge against the cameleon, for it has no mouth as that has; so that we must of necessity have recourse to Pliny's opinion, or deny this account which I myself read, and is generally receiv'd and allow'd in that country. Read A Lapide, Levit. xi. v. 29, 30. where he speaks of the cameleon, and other creatures.

Horses.

10. Cbina breeds many good and able horses; vast numbers are continually carry'd thither out of the western parts, but they geld all; their saddles are somewhat different from ours, they have good bridles and stirrups. They have abundance of pads, some very small and finely shap'd. The Tartars are excellent horsemen and archers; they let fly an arrow, and running a full speed, take it up again with the end of their bow, and some with their hand. In the southern parts there are camels enough, in the kingdoms of Golocondar and Narsting infinite numbers. There they make use of NAVA-camels for carriage, as we do of mules. RETTE. Cbina abounds in mules, asses, buffalos, oxen, sheep and goats. The swine are so numerous, that their flesh is eaten fresh all the year about throughout the whole empire, and is very good, and as wholesome in summer as in winter; a great deal besides is salted up. One would think it impossible for these creatures to breed so fast.

Swine.

11. Insects and vermin there are enough in Cbina, but not so much as in Manila, India, and other places. I will in this place treat only of one which is very singular; in another place I will speak of those of Manila and India. This is call'd jeu ting, Jeu Ting, pie lung, or xeu kung. It is a sort of lizard to which they have given the name of the wall dragon, because it runs up them, and it is call'd the guard of the palace on the following account. The emperor us'd to make an ointment of this insect, and some other ingredients, with which they anointed their concubines wrists; the mark of it continues as long as they have not to do with man; but as soon as they do, it utterly vanishes, by which their honesty or falsehood is discover'd. Hence it came this insect was call'd the guard of the court, or of the court ladies: a strange and singular quality. Here it is fit to remember what I said above out of master Torre, that a wise and learned man must not when he hears such things rashly attribute them to superstition, or art magick, but believe there may be some secret vertue answerable to such an effect, whatsoever it be. What I write was told me by a Cbinese Christian who was a very able scholar, his name Clement, and in his own language Chu Fi Cbi; he was then expounding to me the Cbinese words abovemention'd. It were a great happiness if all marry'd men had that ointment, it would make them safe, and they would have nothing to fear; and if the women had such another for their husbands, it would be some comfort to them, though they would be at a considerable charge in furnishing themselves with it. The Cbineses paint dragons and serpents very frightful to look at, which they do to terrify the multitude. They are very mysterious in these particulars. The commonly believe any thing, and therefore they quake where there is nothing to fear.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of some Birds and Fowls of CHINA.

Eagles.

1. THE bird the Cbineses make most account of is our eagle, which they call the bird of the sun; and perhaps from what is vulgarly said, that it looks full at the sun. When it appears, they say it denotes good luck. According to their

NAVA- their learned men, one appear'd at the birth RETTE. of their philosopher. Their books tell us, the body of it is like a crane, the neck like a snake, the tail like a dragon's; that it rests not upon any tree, nor eats fruit: that there is a male and female (therefore it cannot be the phoenix, as some missioners imagine) and they sing to a charin; no man living in Cbina ever saw it, but they hold it for certain there is such a creature. There are abundance of fine pheasants very cheap, the feathers are worth more than is given for them, the usual price is a penny a pound.

Pheasants.

2. There is a very beautiful bird in the province of Xen Si: F. Michael Triguchius used to say, that the tail feathers which are extraordinary gaudy, are a fathom in length.
Turkeys are not yet brought into Cbina, but they have encreas'd mightily in India, Pegu, Bengala, Golocondar, and other parts.
They carry peacocks from Siam, for they do not breed in Cbina, but abundance of them do in some parts of India. They are also found in the island of Madagascar.

Peacocks.

Cranes.

3. In Cbina there are very many cranes; they are a bird that suits with any country, hot or cold. At Manila which is extremely hot there are abundance; they easily become tame, and are taught to dance. I never eat their flesh, but have heard it much commended. I look upon that as a mere chimera, which A Lapide in Levit. xi. v. 13. p. 658. col. 2. mentions out of Paulus Venetus, concerning the bird rue that takes up an elephant. I was six months in Madagascar, Surat, and other parts, and never heard any thing like it.

Bird-
fighting.

4. There are certain little birds in Cbina in great esteem, they are like linnets, they breed them in curious cages, not to sing but to fight with one another; those that have been tried are of great value. The Chineses also fight cocks; but that is more us'd in the Philippine islands, and several kingdoms and islands of the East-Indies, where it is a great recreation, and much money is won and lost at it. The same is practis'd in some parts of Europe, as doëtor Laguna writes, where he treats of this bird.

Fishing
with sea-
crows.

5. Many of the Chineses breed up seacrows to fish with, and sell them from one province to another. It is the prettiest pastime in the world, I think, to see the manner of fishing with them. I will write what I saw myself, and observ'd at leisure. Ten or twelve little boats, at the first dawning of the sun, appear'd on a spreading and soft flowing part of a mighty river; just as I was sailing that way, I itopt to see the sport. Every boat had four or five crows at the head, they were stretching out their wings, and picking themselves. Being come to the place they design'd, the boats drew up in a large ring, and they began with their oars to make a regular noise; then one or two of the crows leap'd off from the boat and div'd, catch'd a fish, and every one return'd to his own boat without ever mistaking, being led by the sound of their masters oars. Thus they plung'd into the water, and return'd to the boats, which was a great diversion to all that attentively observ'd them. Those that caught large fishes, brought them in their beaks, and the fishermen took them in their hands; they that took small fishes, swallow'd them, and when they were come out of the water into the boat, the men laid hold of them; and holding down their beak, gave them a gentle stroke on the neck, whereupon they immediately cast up all the fishes they had in their craw. Thus they went on till they fill'd their baskets with fish, which was not long a doing, and then they went away up the river to their homes, carrying the crows on the prow as they had done before. What I admir'd was, that when a crow had plung'd into the water, and came up at a great distance from his own boat, and near another, he immediately went away to his own without regarding the rest.

6. When they come home, they pick out the smallest fish, and give them to eat; thus their masters feed them, and maintain their families with the large and middle fish.
There is a great deal of difference between seeing and relating of it. I must say again, it is one of the prettiest diversions in the world.

7. There is no end of the geese and ducks they have in Cbina, for though infinite numbers are consum'd, there are never the fewer. The capital of Canton alone, according to Ortelius, spends fourteen thousand a year, and in my opinion, and that of others, twenty thousand, besides beef, pork, goats-flesh, hens, capons, fish, eggs, and other things. As we came from the imperial city, we sail'd by the side of a lake of so great an extent, that as far as the horizon terminated our sight, there appear'd nothing but water, and a confiderable part of it was cover'd with these fowls. The Chineses catch them very artificially. They go into the water with their heads thrust into calabashes, and walk so slowly, that it looks as if nothing moved but the calabash upon the water: being come up in this manner to the goose, or duck, which they can see thro' the holes in the calabash before their eyes, they lay hold of it by the feet and pull it under water, where they wring the neck, and put it into a bag they carry for the purpose; then go

Bird

go out again as softly as they went in, without disturbing the rest. This way of catching them is more profitable than diverting, they that do not understand it, would think the ducks dive for food, as they do every moment. These fowl are dress'd several ways; they are frequently boil'd, and their broth is look'd upon as very nourishing: they are very good roast-ed, and in souce; but they are incomparably better salted and dry'd, there's no gam-mon can compare with them; and they are a dainty provision by sea, or for travellers at land. Infinite numbers of them are sold after this manner. Besides these they breed abundance in their houses, which are more valued because they are tame, though it is hard to distinguish betwixt them by the fa-vour and taste. Leaving other common birds, let us proceed to others foreign to China.

Bird of Paradise.

6. There are some so strange, that they require particular mention should be made of them. The first is that which at Ter-ranese, and in other places, the Europeans call the bird of paradise; its body is small, something less than a blackbird. It has neither feet nor wings, which seems incre-dible; but there being so many that have seen them, there is no doubt to be made of it. I have often view'd them carefully, but could never find any sign of feet they had; that they have no wings is more visi-ble to every body. I have been told for certain there are two at Madrid, those who have seen them can testify the same. The beak of them is somewhat thick and large, fit to catch gnats, which is their food; their feathers are thick and beautiful, their tail very long, of several colours, and as fine as can be imagin'd. They never light, nor can rest upon the ground, as may easily be conceived, be-cause they have no feet. Their fixt abode is in the region of the air, for which reason they are called birds of paradise. They light upon trees, and by the help of the wind, and their natural motion, they fly from one to another, making use to this purpose of their slightly tails. If the wind fails then they presently fall, and their bill being heavy, it is the first that lights upon the sand, where it sticks so that they can-not stir, but are taken with ease. The guts being taken out, the people dry and keep them many years, only to admire their beauty. A Campango captain of Ma-nila presented me with a couple of them at Macassar; and I immediately gave them to a great lady, who had done me very considerable courtesies. Some are kept at Manila, and serve to deck the altars; that of our Lady and of the Rosary has some extraordinary fine; they look very glorious, and are beyond all nose-gays. I en-quired after their nests, and how they hatch'd their eggs: they answer'd me, that the hen laid her eggs upon the cock's back, and there hatch'd them. I made several objections, but they could give me no more satisfaction; it is certainly so; it seems in-deed impossible, but it is easy to him that made all things. Behold, God is great, and we know him not, Job xxxvi. And if we go about to search into the manner, how the limbs, fingers, eyes, nose, ears, &c. of a creature are form'd in its mother's womb, and how it is nourish'd and grows daily, with many other particulars that happen there, we shall be quite at a loss, and more astonish'd than we are at the bird of para-dise.

VOL. I.

NAVA-RETTE.

7. At Macassar there are a great many of a sort of bird they call cacatua, they are all white, some bigger than hens, their beak like a parrot; they are easily made tame, and talk. When they stand upon their guard, they are very slightly, for they spread a tuft of feathers that is on their heads, and look most lovely. The Portu-gueses carry them to China, and those peo-ple give good rates for them.

Cacatua.

8. In the islands there are innumerable parrots, and paroquites; but those of Ter-ranese carry the day from the rest. I saw one at Manila that cost two hundred pieces of eight, and would certainly have been worth two thousand at Madrid. It sang so distinctly that it deceiv'd me twice, and others oftner.

Parrots.

9. Along the sea-coasts of many of the islands, there is a very singular bird call'd tabon, the place where it lays its eggs is call'd Tabonan. What I and many more admire is, that it being no bigger in body than an ordinary chicken, tho' long legg'd, yet it lays an egg larger than a goose's, so that the egg is bigger than the bird it self; and no man living would judge that the egg could be contain'd within it. In order to lay its eggs, it digs in the sand above a yard in depth; after laying, it fills up the hole and makes it even with the rest; there the eggs hatch with the heat of the sun and sand. When the chickens are hatch'd by natural instinct, they break thro' the sand upwards, and so get out of that dungeon their dam put them into; then they walk directly to the sea to seek for weeds to feed on. This creature might well say, My father and mother have left me, but the LORD hath taken me to him. That natural instinct God gave them is their life and food. Another thing in it is wonderful, which is that they are not stifled when they come out of the shell with the heat and weight of the sand, how they breathe till they get out, and how they have the strength to break thro'

NAVA- thro' so great a weight. They are prodigies of the Almighty's working.

10. The Indians to find out these eggs go about sticking sharp canes into the ground; when they find the sand light, they stop, and throw it up something above the length of a man's arm, and there they find them. They are sweet and of a pleasant relish, one of them is enough to satisfy a good stomach; the staler the egg the better it is. One morning having lain upon the shore, and near to the place whither these birds resorted, we repair'd thither carefully, and making a noise, a great company of them came out of their holes, in which we found many eggs, some hot, some cold, some white, some of the colour of the sand, which are the stale ones. I had before eaten of the latter, and now eat of those that were fresh and warm, but in truth the stale ones were better. There were among them some with chickens, and observ'd that the Indians lick'd their chops when they eat them; they courted me to eat, and prais'd them, but I could not endure to look at them, and it went against my stomach to think any body should eat them. Once they press'd me so much, that at last, not without much dread and aversion, I resolv'd to taste one; I did so and made an end of it, very much dissatisfied that I had not eaten a great many of them. I must own, that since I was born I never eat any thing more delicate, more pleasant and palatable, and I am convinced there is nothing in the world to compare to it. After this I seiz'd all that were found with chicken. I saw no locusts whilst I was in Cbina, but they have them at times; I know not whether those people eat them, as the In- dians of Manila do; so did the Jews and other nations, says A Lapide, in Levit. xi. v. 22.

11. In the island of Calimaines, belonging to Manila, and in others of that Archipelago, there is a sort of swallows not much unlike ours, they swim upon the sea, and build their nests in the rocks along the shore. These nests are mightily valued in Manila among the natives, and much more in Cbina, where they give great rates for them. Those birds make them of the foam of the sea; when dry they look like a piece of ash-colour'd clay, but being boil'd with flesh they are excellent meat, and very nourishing, as they all say. Marry'd men, and those that have weak stomachs use it; it is no good food for those that are dedicated to God's service; but it is wonderful so delicious a morsel, as they who eat it think can never be sufficiently commended, should be made of such matter. America produces great variety of flighty birds. These they call cardinals, because they are all red, and are charming to the eye. Those of the conception, so call'd because they are clad like the nuns of that order, are also extraordinary beautiful. But the gayest and finest bird I have seen, is the king of the Copilotes, which I saw several times in the port of Acapulco, and never had enough of looking at him, still more and more admiring his beauty, stateliness, and grace. There are also most delicate nightingals in Cbina, they are bigger than ours, sing to admiration, and are kept in curious cages. They breed many black-birds, prize their note, and indeed with good reason.

CHAP. XIX.

1. THERE is no doubt but all we have and shall write, is a great motive to excite us to praise our LORD, and discover his infinite power and wisdom: for the more man knows of the creatures, the more occasion he has to bless and magnify his Creator. It is not in vain that Ecclasiasticus, cap. xlii. requires us to remember the works of the LORD, Be mindful of the works of the LORD. Remember then what God has created, it is a plain case, the end is to bless and praise his divine Majesty. We have sufficient matter for it, in that which God has so bountifully bestow'd on the heathen Cbineses, and perhaps he has given them so much that they may have the less excuse for their ignorance of his Godhead. But now to talk of the subject of this chapter, I must inform the reader that the Cbineses, especially those of the learned sect, are great lovers of fishponds for their recreation, which is a good and commendable diversion. The fish they keep in these ponds are small, but the very perfection of beauty; they call them kin ju, gilt-fishes, because they are gold-colour'd, tho' there is some difference among them; some have two tails, others three, some have black fins, others red, and others gold-colour'd. The colour of some of them is like a rich brocade, of others like a fine damask. One of them put into a glass, as I have sometimes seen, is a most extraordinary beautiful sight.

2. There are abundance of great ponds in Cbina, to breed fish to sell. I have already ready taken notice that there are nine hundred ninety and nine within the walls of the metropolis of Nan King, and the same number in the city Kan Cbeu. We could not find out the mystery, why they must not be one thousand, but the Cbineses have ridiculous notions concerning even and odd numbers. The fish in them is large and good, but not to compare with that of the sea, or rivers. The whole kingdom being cut across by rivers, and full of lakes and ponds, there is vast plenty of fish, a great deal is sold alive, being kept in tubs or troughs full of water. What they don't sell, the owners put again into the ponds, to draw it out as they have occasion. The spawn carried about in little jars from one province to another to sell.

3. In the metropolis of Xan Tung there is a great idol temple, and in it a fish-pond that has a thousand springs bubbling up; these form a river, which at a small distance carries many vessels.

4. In the province of Xen Si there is a lake of salt-water, whence all the northern provinces are supply'd with salt.

5. We pass'd by three very large lakes in our way from the imperial city; we have already spoke of the first; that has an infinite number of ducks and geese. The second has nothing remarkable. The third is in the province of Kiang Si, in the midst of it is a vast rock, upright, and very high, and on the top of it a temple of bonzes. A narrow, steep, and uncouth path leads up to it. That habitation to all appearance must be very painful. It is call'd the place of the penitent bonzes. At the bottom is a little pair of stairs reaching to the lake, where one of the bonzes stands to beg of the boats that pass by. This is all they have to live upon, but no vessel passes without giving something, tho' it be but a little rice. A league farther is another less rock, with another temple on it, and bonzes, who live after the same manner. Short of Canton there are certain rocks of a vast height, and shagged, rising out of the same river we sail'd on. In the midst of them is a large breach or cleft, and within it a stately temple. Stairs cut out of the rock come down to the water; about two fathoms above the surface appears a large handsome balcony, well painted, that overlooks all the river and the boats that pass by, of which they beg. We went not up to the temple, but they told us it was well worth seeing and admiring, as well as its situation. F. Kircher mentions a lake in this province of Canton, but I saw it not, nor can I tell where it is, perhaps it may be on the west side, whither neither I nor any of us went.

6. At Cbao Hien, a town in Fo Kien, NAVA- there is one thing very remarkable, of RETTE. which it will not be amiss to speak in this place, tho' it be neither fishpond nor lake, but a mountain all hollow within. There is in that country a printed book, which is only an account and description of that mountain; I will here relate what is most material concerning it. Our Cbinese father, and F. Copley of the society went into it. The mountain is half a league in length, all a hard rock, and quite hollow within. There is a door at one end to go in, and another at the other to go out. Close by the first lives a man, whose business it is to guide those that desire to see what there is within. If they go in in summer, they clothe themselves very warm, because it is rather cold than fresh within. In winter the heat is so great, that a few clothes will make a man sweat. At the entrance is a narrow lane, and at the end of it a large room built by nature; in the midst of it is a large pillar, which reaches not up to the arch, and so like a great burning wax candle, that all men take it to be one, therefore they call that room cho tang, that is, the room of the candle. The two fathers said, the very drops that fall from a candle were so natural upon it, that they could hardly persuade themselves but that they were true. The flame and snuff of it were so exactly to the life, that they had much ado to believe all they saw was not real. A few paces further is another room call'd pu sa tang, that is, the hall of the idols, because all the idols they have in Cbina are there carv'd by nature, and so like and excellently done that none can chuse but admire them. Then follows another room by the name of the room of heaven, tien tang; in the roof of it are the sun, moon, and stars, so beautiful and bright, that our father told me he stood long in doubt thinking what it might be, for he was satisfied the sun could not pierce into that place, nor the stars shine with him. At last he ask'd, whence that light came, and yet to this day he cannot conceive the manner of it, or what it was he saw. He says, the water that dropt from the walls and run about the ground was as cold as ice, tho' it was in the month of July that he went in. He protests that every word they spoke there resounded like the eccho of a canon; and when one of them call'd out aloud, they thought heaven and earth had been coming together. There is another greater mountain near to this, of which old men tell wonderful stories. The town, to save the expence they were at with mandarines, and other great men that went to see it, wall'd up the gates strongly.

NAVA-
RETTE. 7. All Cbina abounds in rivers, brooks, running lakes, and springs. The most famous river is that they call the son of the sea; they say it has no bottom: it is very large, and runs above five hundred leagues from east to west before it falls into the sea. They travel almost all over the southern provinces by water, which is a great conveniency; sometimes a few robbers appear, but it is seldom. Not many years since they robb'd the fathers Fabri and Augeri, both jesuits, of things of considerable value, and wounded the first of them dangerously. The noise this made was great, the booty was worth four thousand ducats, and it was given out for thirty thousand, and that it was a present to the emperor. Advice was sent to court, no small search made; afterwards they took the ringleader of the robbers, and that very day twelve month they cut off his head. A few years after, as those very fathers and others of the same society affirm, the Chineses rais'd a temple in honour of that robber, so that he is now become an idol, perhaps because he was a great master of his trade; to make that out in Cbina, which Laët. Firm. de instab. 5. cap. 2. says of others, Therefore they adore their enemies, and appease murderers with sacrifice. The roads are never without wells or springs of excellent water for travellers, and generally by the well is a fine earthen dish to drink out of, and no body dares carry it away; if that were among us, all the earthen ware in Cbina would not be enough for one fountain. Besides, along the roads, about a league distance, and sometimes not above half a league, there are excellent resting-places, with good seats, and well covered with tiles. Here travellers meet, rest them, chat, and are shelter'd from the sun in summer, and from the rain and cold in winter. There are also at every step on the roads very decent, cleanly and convenient places where passengers ease themselves; and even to make water there are places no less decent. The ascents and descents of steep mountains are so handsomely cut out in steps, that nothing can be finer. There is scarce a stream, or a little brook without a handsome stone bridge; and if there happens to be none of stone, they build it of excellent timber. It cannot be denied but that the Chineses are curious, and provident in what relates to the publick good. They make these things their peculiar care, and in truth they prosper in their hands, for the people being numerous, there are enough to mind every thing. I have seen a road mended in so short a time that I stood amaz'd; such a work would not be finish'd in Spain in a year, nor perhaps in many.

8. I made a step from the rivers and fountains to the high-ways, the distance between them sometimes is not great. But to return to the springs: I must take notice there is one at Macassar, that has given me and others enough to talk and think of. This spring is on the sea-shore; when the sea flows it dries up, and as soon as it ebbs it abounds with excellent water, which all that sail by that place take in for their store. I was ask'd my opinion concerning this spring, and had some answers which did not well satisfy my own curiosity. What I thought might be likely was, that the source of that water did not lie deep towards the sea, which when it flow'd, the weight of the water which loads and oppresses the sand stopt the passage of the sweet water, and therefore at flood the spring was dry, but upon the ebb the sand grows loose, and much of the weight that lay upon it goes off, which makes way for the sweet water to glide thro' and flow into the hollow of the spring. If this be not satisfactory, let others give a better reason for it.

Spring that ebbs and flows.

9. Travelling in the island of Mindoro, I met with another strange little spring, which was on the shore too, but so close to the sea, that the flood came over and beyond it. When the tide ebb'd, the Indians made a little hole with their hands and took up fresh water, when the salt was quite about it. That port is very dry, and it would go hard with those that travel that way, had not God furnish'd them with this little spring.

10. I will conclude this chapter with Cbina, acquainting the reader, that it is not destitute of hot baths. There are some in several parts, and the natives make use of them as they have occasion. There are baths in most cities and towns to wash themselves when they are in health: they say they are very curious, and that such as will are washed and cleansed at a small expence.

CHAP. XX.

1. THE subject I treat of is so full of variety, it is no wonder if I forget many things, some I am sure I must. As I was about to begin this chapter, I remember'd I had said nothing of the Cbinese woollen-manufactures, and it is requisite to give some account of them. The Cbineses having so much silk and cotton, have no great occasion for wool. However they weave very pretty stuffs, not so close as the Spanish serges, but thinner; they make them white, and somewhat sad colour'd, which is reckoned a grave sort of garment, lin'd with silk, with some other trimming. They make abundance of felts of several colours. It is a notable thing to see how they make a whole suit of one piece, breeches, caps, and other things. So they make carpets a fathom and a half, and two fathom long. They neither use nor weave any other sorts of cloth. When the Dutch some years since presented the emperor with scarlet, and other fine cloths made in Europe, he ask'd, how, and what they were made of. Being told the manner of it, he said, his subjects could make it, and therefore there was no need to bring it from so far. And I doubt not but if the Cbineses give their mind to it, they will compass it. They have delicate wool, and work it so fine, that it looks like pure silk. Now let us proceed to something else.

2. In the metropolis of Xen Si there is abundance of salt earth; which being boiled, they extract from it very white salt, and the poor people dress their meat with it without boiling. Near that city is a town, about which the land produces three things: one is the soap they use there, called kien, they know nothing of ours. After it has rain'd, if the sun shines, there rise out of the earth certain bladders of thick froth, which are gather'd to wash and whiten linen. The second is salt-petre; and salt the third. Out of twenty pounds of earth put into a jar, and wrought after their manner, they get twelve pounds of salt, and three of salt-petre. There is a wonderful consumption of it in Cbina, especially for gun-powder. The quantity of it spent there is so great, that some missionaries are of opinion it is more than all Europe together expends. The greatest consumption is the first and last months of the year, particularly in squibs and fireworks, which for shew and ingenuity much exceed ours. The Europeans do not mistake the Cbineses way of rejoicing. The beginning of the year 1668, some masks NAVAPAS'd by our door, and we all thought the curiousness and gait of their clothes a noble sight, well deserving our praise, and even admiration. At the time of their full moon, and three days before, and three after, is the festival of the lanthorns, which seems to me and others the finest in Cbina; and I am almost in the mind to say, there is not a more pleasant, a more sightly, and more universal solemnity in the whole world. If such a thing were done at Madrid, I don't doubt but people would flock from all parts of the kingdom to partake of the divertisement. Their lanthorns are nothing like ours in Europe, they are very large, and of a thousand several shapes and curious figures. Some are made of the glass they have there, with delicate fine workmanship about them. There are some of two, three, and four hundred ducats apiece. Many are made of thin silk, painted with variety of colours and figures of men, women, birds, flowers, and other things; besides men a horseback continually riding round within them. In others there are cocks fighting, with all their motions very natural; in others fishermen and gardeners; and in others soldiers giving battel; all so lively that it is surprizing. Many are made of paper of several colours, and curiously cut; some in the shape of roses and other flowers; some of fishes continually gaping and beating in their fins and tails; some with many puppets: in short, there is a wonderful multiplicity and variety. In the year 1663, I went abroad at eight at night to see this sight, and before I came to the great street, I stood astonish'd, or as we call it, quite besides myself with admiration: when I got into the great street, my senses and faculties fail'd me. The street was a league in length, which I walk'd always under lanthorns, and scarce one of them but had something singular. I said to the catechist who went along with me, Clement, we have gone by above twelve thousand lanthorns. He laugh'd heartily, and answer'd, father, they are above thirty thousand. With what we afterwards saw, they certainly exceeded eighty thousand. In the temples of their idols there were still greater curiosities. The Cbineses themselves, tho' us'd to that sight, were surpriz'd, and many stood gaping like utter strangers.

3. Those in the metropolis of Hang Cbeu are the most famous of all Cbina. In the year

The Cbineses themselves, tho' us'd to that sight, were surpriz'd, and many stood gaping like utter strangers.

Festival of lanthorns.

NAVA year 1665, when I was in that city, I lay in the prison, and therefore could not see them, but those the prisoners set up before the temple that is in the goal, rais'd mine and my companion's admiration, both for the multitude, as also for the curiosity and orderly placing of them. That night I went out to see the lanthorns, I curiously made some observations. The first was of an infinite multitude of people, but not one woman, for it would be look'd upon as a grievous sin if one were seen. The second, that tho' there was a great deal of jostling and hunching one another as they pass'd in the croud, yet I saw no offence taken, or ill language given, they made sport and laugh'd at all. The third, that there being a great many shops full of variety of fruit and cold banquets, no man presum'd to snatch away so much as a chefnut; so that the sellers were as easy as if it had been noon day. The modesty with which those infidels are bred, and the niceness of their carriage at all times is very remarkable.

Civility.

Festivals.

4. They have also their festivals at other seasons of the year; sometimes they keep holiday in honour of one star, sometimes of another; one day to one idol, and another to another. There are several brotherhoods in societies to this effect. Every quarter of a town has its peculiar patron. One general solemnity is kept throughout the whole empire on the fifth day of the fifth moon. This day they go out upon the rivers in boats finely deck'd and adorn'd, to solemnize the festival of a certain great magistrate, who was very zealous for the publick good. They report of him, that an emperor refusing to take his advice, he cast himself into a lake and was drown'd. Against this festival they provide a sort of cakes, and other meat, which they throw into the water in honour of that magistrate. Others say they do it, that he may have something to eat. I have before made mention how one year above five hundred vessels went out from Nan King, upon the river they call the son of the sea; but a sudden gulf of wind rising, they all sunk to the bottom, not one escaping. In regard of this magistrate we may say, we have in Cbina another Lycurgus, of whom Tertullian in his apology says, that he kill'd himself, because the Lacedemonians had mended his laws. And we may still more properly compare him to Abitobphel, who hang'd himself because Abfalom slighted his counsel and follow'd that of Hushai, 2 Sam. xvii.

5. F. John Balat the jesuit told us, he one year in the imperial city saw the publick procession of the players, and affirmed, it was one of the finest sights in the world. On the 11th of April 1663, there pass'd before our door a general procession of many idols, so rich, sightly, orderly, and well contrived, as we had never seen the like. We all concluded it would have been very surprizing in any part of Europe. The figures were all alive, and consisted of about twenty four boys, every one borne on men's shoulders upon carriages richly adorn'd, and they most gorgeously clad, accompany'd by abundance of flags, streamers, and musical instruments. Every boy represented a several idol, and acting the parts of so many several statues; their garb and colours were also different. One was in the middle of a perfect rose, all of lively colours; another upon a serpent; some sitting, others standing upon both, and others upon one foot. Some carry'd spears, others bows in their hands; and one of them had a vial, out of which issu'd a wonderful flower. It is impossible to conceive the finery and gaity of their clothes, feathers and garlands.

6. The private diversions of Cbina are for the most part plays, eating and drinking. Cards are also common among them, the Moors carried them thither. There are great gamesters among them; when they have lost what they have, they make vows to their idols to play no more. Some in a passion cut off the tips of their fingers, to disable themselves, and be incapable of shuffling the cards. There are abundance of dancers, active tumblers, puppet-players, and musicians.

Diversions.

7. One thing we observ'd which is remarkable, and never fails every year, tho' it is more general in the southern than the northern provinces, which is a strange influence of some constellation, never known in our parts; for all garments grow damp and mouldy, and all stains that ever were in them, tho' never so old, appear again, tho' they have been several times wash'd, whether they are silk, cotton, or leather. This lasts for some days, and if they are not carefully air'd, hung in the sun, and often clean'd, they are utterly spoil'd. It is pleasant to see what care all men take during those days of their apparel, beds, caps, boots, and other things. Much has been written concerning the customs of this nation, something shall be said in the following books. Methinks those words of the Proverbs, xxx. v. 12. may be well apply'd to it, There is a generation that are pure in their own eyes, and yet is not wash'd from their filibines. Yet there are Europeans who think there wants but little towards the canonizing of all Cbina.

Mouldiness.
Stains.

8. The common people are very superstitious, which is most certain; and none of them can indure to undertake any thing, without drawing their lots first to find out how it will succeed. F. de Angelis was very right right in this particular. They are vain observers of the heaven, of the earth, the notes of birds, the barking of dogs; of dreams, and many other things. There is no temple without two like large castanets, with some characters on them, which they esteem very mysterious. After many genuflexions made before the idol, they cast that instrument on the ground several times, till the characters they wish for turn up; then they look upon the calendars which are fix'd on the walls, and by them make out their guesses at the success they are like to have.

9. That nation is wonderful sharp at contriving of law-suits, and exquisite at concealing the mortal hatred they bear any man for several years; and when an opportunity offers, they vent it to their hearts content. It often happens in law-suits that the defendant hangs himself, only to ruin and be reveng'd on the plaintiff; for when he is hang'd, all his kindred repair to the judge, complaining that he had hang'd himself to avoid the the trouble and vexation the plaintiff put him to, having no other remedy left him. Then all join against the plaintiff, and the judge among them; and they never give over till they ruin him and all his family. I must add that the Chinese sell their sons and daughters when they please; they use it frequently. The Slavonians had the same custom, and kill'd them too if they would. Read A Lapide in Gen. iv. v. 1. the Persians kept them as slaves.

BOOK II.

Of the Nature of the Chinese Government, of their Sects, and of the most remarkable Passages in their History.

CHAP. I.

Of the several Degrees of People into which this Monarchy is divided.

NAVA-
RETTE.

1. I Do not at all make any doubt but that the nature, method, and disposition of the Chinese government is admirable, and may be a pattern or model to many in the world. In regard all is so excellently order'd, that the whole empire looks like one well govern'd family; the *Chinese*s call it a noble house, or family, Kuei Kia. Nevertheless they are defective in one very material point, as to the several states or degrees into which they divide their people, which is, in making no mention of the soldiery, as all monarchies that ever were in the world have done, and we shall mention in another place. It is a plain case, says S. Thomas in xi. ad Heb. lect. 7. that the soldiery is very necessary, and an essential part of the kingdom. These are his words, Among all outward acts of moral virtues the acts of fortitude and justice seem to be the chief, because they principally relate to the publick good. For by fortitude the commonwealth is defended from the enemy, but by justice it is preserv'd. The *Chinese*s cannot say they do not stand in need of defending themselves, for they never wanted enemies, and, they have always maintain'd mighty armies, as appears by those that guard the wall. Yet for all this in their accounts of their government they make no mention of the martial men. Not only experience, but S. Thomas also, Opusc. 20. lect. 2. cap. 1. teaches us that the northern people, as the more sanguine, are fittest for war. God himself after creating all things taught us this policy, Gen. ii. v. 1. the words are, Thus the heavens and the earth were finish'd, and all the host of them. Read Oleaster upon these words.

people.

2. They divide all their people into four states or degrees, which are these, Zu, Nung, Kung, Zang, that is, scholars, husbandmen, handicrafts, and merchants.

SECT. I.

Of the Scholars.

1. The scholars of China are the noblest and most respected people in that empire, they are the knights of the belt, or rather the Pbarisees, their sciences reach no further than morals, history, rhetoric, and something of astrology, which they study for pastime, not ex professo, for only those that aspire to be among the court-mathematicians make a study of it. Their philosophy is full of errors and extravagancies.

2. They have the three degrees in use among us of batchelor, licentiate, and doctor. Our most learned Passerinus, Tom. III. de statibus, q. 187. a. 1. n. 1137. speaks of the first original of these degrees, which is very ancient, there the reader may see it. He that arrives to be a batchelor, is no longer subject to the civil magistrate, but to the university, as it is us'd among us in such places. But tho' he has taken his degree, yet is he examin'd every three years, besides the ordinary yearly examinations; and if they do not improve every year, they punish them severely. Some they whip, others they turn down to a lower school, and others they degrade, and make incapable of being graduates for ever; which makes them pore on their books all their life-time. The same laws are in force among us, but they are not put in execution. See Silb. v. Doctor. § 5. where, after laying down the qualifications of a doctor, he concludes thus, if afterwards he grows useles he must be degraded by the doctors, &c. Our Passerinus says the same, num. 1143. But it must be understood he says, when he becomes useles through his own fault, not if it happen through sickness or any other accident. This method of examining scholars continually, is of excellent use to keep them them out of idleness, and to prevent the vast increase of them. The emperor Jus- tinian, to obviate these inconveniencies, took away the royal revenues from several cities that had schools. Francis the first of France was much blam'd for having founded many universities, because they vastly increas'd the number of students, and so there was a want of soldiers, husband-men, and handicrafts. Narbona handles this point very well.

3. The lord Quiapo de Llano, being president of the university of Valladolid, was much concern'd that his majesty did not save the expence he was at in that university to supply the publick wants; for if the college of S. Gregory were incorporated into the university, there would be good schools of philosophy and divinity at a very small expence. The same method might be us'd in other universities. The method had been practis'd in China before now, were they under the same circumstances.

4. One that valued himself upon his politics, and good humour, us'd another argument, saying, that the number of scholars was very prejudicial to the soldiery, because since they encreas'd so much, we see many more doctors and licentiates for their number, made knights of the military orders, than there are of captains, majors, and other military officers. To conclude, he added, either let the number of scholars be restrain'd, or else let them give soldiers doctors caps, for they will as well become martial men, as the military honours do civilians and canonists. He discours'd excellently upon this subject, and spoke very surprizingly and much to the purpose. There are notable wits in the world.

5. Philip the third of happy memory was about taking away some colleges in Portugal from the fathers of the society; the warrant was sign'd; one of them that had been present at the time it was agreed, discover'd the secret to those concern'd, who had recourse to the queen, she to the king, and thus the execution was stop'd. F. Antony de Gouvea a Portuguese, and superior of their missionaries in China, told me this, nam'd the party that discover'd it, and acquainted me with other circumstances relating to the affair. Let us return to China. The bachelors of the first rank who hold their degree twenty years, are privileged, and free from further examinations, so are those that rise to be licentiates, and of course the doctors.

6. During the reign of the family Sung, which is six hundred years ago, was the time when learning flourish'd most, the schools were increas'd, twenty bachelors were allotted to every town, forty to each city, and fifty to every metropolis. These NAVATE. they call Lin Seng, that is bachelors that RETTE. have allowance from the king. After that they added sixty to a town, and a hundred and twenty to a city. They are stil'd Ceng Seng, that is additional bachelors. Afterwards they gave leave for all that would to take their degrees. These are distinguish'd by the name of Fu Hio, which signifies bachelors clapt to the school, so that there are three degrees of them. They either advance or put them back upon their examinations, according as they perform. Those who are privileg'd are call'd Kung Seng, and there are three sorts of them, one known by the name of Pa Kung Seng, which implies that they were such able rhetoricians, and their compositions so good and elegant, that they thereby merited their degree, without being oblig'd to wait the time that others do, which is a mighty honour in that nation. Others are styl'd Cie Fuen Kung, and are those we spoke of who hold the degree of bachelors twenty years. The last go by the appellation of Ngen Kung Seng, denoting they are bachelors privileg'd by the emperor's favour. The sons of carmen, butchers, hangmen and players, are incapable of taking any degree, and so are all bastards.

7. One good thing there is among others in the schools of China, which is that there are very few play-days, there are not eight Scholars play-days. throughout the whole year, and no vacations at all. They are continually at it, and consequently there are men admirably vers'd in their laws, history, and morals, upon which they compose most ingenious and polite discourses, prov'd and adorn'd with all imaginable elegancy and learning. It were well the scholars of Europe were like Scholars carriage. theirs, for they are the gravest, the modestest and the most orderly people in China. So that when they see a man in the street with his eyes fix'd on the ground, and very modest, all men know he is a student. The same gravity and stayedness is seen even in school-boys. I often saw and observ'd this with no little surprize. The Tartar has not shewn much favour to learned men, but has humbled them in some measure. We Europeans lik'd it very well, because they are vastly numerous, and proud, yet no hindrance to the army, for there are people enough for both uses, and to spare.

8. The books daily printed in China are Books. numberless. The conveniency for it is very great; paper is so extraordinary cheap Paper. that I have bought above five hundred and fifty sheets for two ryals and a half, (fifteen pence.) There are a thousand several sorts of paper, some coarse, some indifferent, and some extraordinary fine, yellow, red, and

NAVA- and of several gay colours, whereof they RETTE. make most curious figures for their houses and temples. All the paper the emperor uses is yellow, no man besides him must use it. All the orders, bills and books that come abroad in the emperor's name are upon that paper. They have had printing among them, according to Trigaucius and others, above one thousand six hundred years. They do it with boards, those of pear-tree are best. They cut the letters on them, and when the book is printed the author keeps the tables, and then for a very small expence repeats as many impressions as he pleases. Having no alphabet, they cannot print as we do, but are forced to cut the letters of what is to be printed every time.

Poesy.

9. Poetry is of great antiquity in that nation; I think what Lactan. firm. de div. opific. l. VII. cap. 22. writes of other countries, may well be apply'd to Cbina, viz. That in them poesy is of more antiquity than their historians, orators, and other writers. That which A Lapide writes in, xi Genes. v. 7. that the elements of the first tongue, &c. remain'd in all nations, cannot be verify'd in the Cbinese language, because it is destitute of elements. Their history in like manner is most antient, and exact. There are imperial annals of the empire, and several abridgments of them, for the attaining an easy knowledge of all things without much trouble. They may serve as patterns to all other people in this faculty. Every metropolis has its peculiar history, and so every province, city and town. Every author very particularly sets down all the product of his country, what famous temples there are in it, their antiquity and founders, the tombs of note, the renowned men, the rivers, mountains, vallies, and every thing else worth remembring. Every town and city has curious maps of its territory and extent, by these the governors and judges of towns, villages, open countries and highways, easily know the bounds of their jurisdiction. All this relates to the learned men, who have one quality they do not deserve to be envy'd for, which is a hellish pride, fix'd in their very marrow and bones; and this is the reason they look upon those of the other nations of the world as scarce men. The Greeks accounted all other nations barbarous, and the Cbineses look upon us and them as such. This is the effect worldly learning produces. So are the words of St. Paul understood, But learning puffs up. Lira writes thus upon the first of Ecclesiastes: In much wisdom (that is, human) is much anger, for such wisdom puffs up, and pride puff'd up is easily provok'd to anger. This is verify'd in the Cbineses, and God grant it be not in others who are under better circumstances.

Scholars proud.

10. I must lay it down as out of dispute, that the body of the learned is a sect the ancientest, and most particularly Cbinese, professed by the scholars, as shall be said in another place; and it has the property of other ancient sects, which is to despise all others, and oppose them as false and pernicious. Lactan. firm. de divin. pram. lib. VII. cap. 7. writes against this, and says, for we do not so overbrow philosophy as the academicks do, &c. but we teach that there was no sect so far out of the way, nor any of the philosophers so vain, but they discern'd somewhat of truth. It is therefore an incredible error in those who when they approve of any sect, damn the rest as false, and vain, and arm themselves to fight, &c. There is no doctrine but what has something of truth, says S. Thomas 2. 2. q. 172. art. 6. As it is impossible to find any thing that is absolutely destitute of good, so it is impossible to find any doctrine and learning, which does not sometimes intermix truths among falsehoods. If it were not so, sects and heresies would find no followers; but such is the vanity of the Cbineses, that with them nothing is of any value, or has the least shadow of truth or reason, besides their sects and doctrine.

11. I will say something in this place concerning the examinations of scholars, leaving other points to be handled among the controversies. In every metropolis there is one like a first professor, who has charge of all the schools of the province. This man spends most of the year going about to all towns and cities, where he yearly examines all the bachelors; such as advance he rewards, the others he punishes, as we said above. The students that have a mind to it are examin'd, and if they deserve, do take their degree. They are very regular in this particular, as to precedence of first, second, third, &c. which they look upon as a great matter of credit and reputation. Not all the bachelors, but only those who for their learning have got sufficient reputation to aspire to the degree of licentiates, resort to the general examinations, which are every three years in the capital cities of provinces; there usually meet four or five thousand or more. It is easy to imagine how great their colleges must be. That of Canton has five thousand little chambers, or cells, with a chair and table in every one. These rooms are so contriv'd, that the viceroy who is in a tower hard by has them all in his view. On the eve they all meet the viceroy, magistrates, examiners, and many mandarines of the province who come to assist the others. At every one of these examinations fifty are advanc'd to the degree of licentiates. As those that are to be examin'd come in, which is the day before examination, they search them even to their shoes and the seams seams of their garments, to find out whether they carry any written paper about them; if it be found upon any of them, they whip him severely, degrade him of his bachelor's degree, and turn him out. When they are all, every man in his little cell, they place a centinel upon every two of them, who is to take care that none of them talk to one another, nor to any body else. Those that attend the viceroy take care of the same. If any thing of this nature be discover'd they make a noise on a great drum they have by them; the guards presently look out, and having found where the fault lay, they immediately punish the offender according to the crime. The magistrates who are examiners give them by word of mouth their themes, which are generally upon the moral virtues of patience, humility, &c. When they have all heard them, they immediately begin to write, extol the virtue, prove their assertions, confirm them by histories, similies, &c. according to the best of every man's skill: Having finish'd their composition, they close it up curiously, writing their name and country upon it; but they take care to put a cover over it, that it may not be read. Then it is deliver'd to those appointed for the purpose, and carry'd to a room of mandarines who read and examine it. Such compositions as deserve to go up to the second room, are laid aside, the rest are thrown out; of five thousand, the one half are rejected in this first hall. Those that are chosen, go up to the second, where after being view'd, about half those go up again to the third. Being come hither, where the magistrates examiners are, they pick out fifty of the best and most elegant among them, with precedency, as first, second, third, &c. Then they look upon the names (this is the manner of all examinations) call those that have merited to take their degree, and write their names upon large tables which they hang in some publick place to be seen by all people. By vertue of this very action they become graduates without any further ceremony; even as Eleazer, by only the ceremony of clothing without any other unction, or consecration, became high priest, Num. xx. 21, 26. If they find any more compositions worthy of the degree, they write the names of them they were made by, commending them, and declaring, that if there were more allow'd to take their degrees, they deserv'd it, which they account a great honour. They are three days lock'd up about this business. The emperor is at the whole expence, which is very great; and to say the truth, I do not name it here, because no European will believe it. After this the viceroy, examiners, and other great mandarines receive those that have taken NAVA- their degree with much honour, entertain RETTE. them at a solemn banquet, and give every one a silver porringer, a blue silk umbrella, and a sedan, which is there carry'd upon men's shoulders. After receiving all congratulations, every man returns home with more honour than he came abroad. When the tables are hung up, there are a great many stand by ready to carry the news. As soon as they have read the names and countries of them, one goes away one way, and another the other, travelling day and night to get the reward of their good tidings. He comes into the town making a great noise, and the kindred of him that has taken the degree reward him bountifully for his journey. All the whole city, or town, makes publick rejoicing for the good fortune of their townsman. When he comes home, every body visits, joys, and offers him something according to their ability. What they give at this time is silver to bear his charges to court. Every licentiate is oblig'd to repair presently to court, where he makes his appearance, and his name is registred in the imperial books, that he may be made use of in the government when there is occasion. They that will rise to be doctors give notice they are examin'd before the emperor: he himself assigns them their themes, and chuses those he likes best. He that is first nam'd among them, obtains the greatest honour imaginable. Some of them are appointed for the imperial college, and of which I gave an account in the first book; others return to their own homes, where they must expect with patience till employments are given them.

13. Their manner of bribing is not always the same, but that most us'd is, to go out two or three days journey to meet the examiner: if they find their business like to take, they agree for five hundred ducats or more. Then they agree upon the mark to know the candidates composition, by which is commonly a dash or stroke, in one particular place or other; or else the examiner makes known to him the subject, that he may have time to study upon it, and add some particular letter, which when NAVA- he sees upon examination, he passes it, RETTE. and allows his rhetorick; so he gets the degree by his money, and not by his learning. Now this being not to be transacted only between them two, it is hard but something of the matter will be known; and if he that has thus taken his degree, is not look'd upon as an able scholar, they suppose the bribery, and they accuse him who promis'd to raise him by his merit.

Schools.

In Jacob's time there were schools and scholars. A Lapide in Gen. xxv. 27.

14. The schools are very antient in Cbina, they were far advanced long before Plato's time. Learning and the empire it seems began together. In Europe it is of later date. Spondanus, tom. 2. an. 535. observes it of Rome, and says, there were no Christian schools in that metropolis of the world till that time. As to which particular it is as well worthy observation, as to be admired, that there were not hitherto doctors at Rome, to teach divinity publickly in the schools; by which you may the more plainly discern the purity of the apostolical fountain incessantly flowing there, &c. yet afterwards, lest she should seem to have rejected learning, and avoided being examin'd, she also fairly propos'd the doctrines she taught to be discuss'd in the schools, especially upon account of the hereticks, against whom the catholick managers were oblig'd to prove all points of Christian faith to be true and solid by all sorts of arguments. The articles of our holy religion were preserv'd in those first ages with holy simplicity, without the multiplicity of disputes that afterwards ensued, and continue to this day. Malice grew strong, and the number of enemies increas'd, so that it was absolutely necessary to oppose them. Seneca has an admirable sentence, which may well be applied to our times: In ancient days men were better; since learned men appear'd, good ones fall short, for we are taught how to dispute, not how to live. If it were not so, one would think as the number of learned men increases so considerably, life ought to mend daily. We have already given a brief account of the learned men of Cbina. Let us now go over to the next rank of people in that nation.

SECT. II.

Of the Husbandmen, and Husbandry.

Husbandry 1. The Chineses say, the emperor's principal care ought to be for the husbandmen, and to allow them as large privileges as may be, because all the empire subsists by their labour and industry. The same, and for the same reason ought to be done in all parts; and if this were practis'd in Manila the land would be more plentiful, with no small increase to the king's revenue. Many in those islands will not work, because all they reap goes away in duties; if they do not sow, they don't reap, and so are free from them. So say the Indians, and so have I heard it said. F. de Angelis says the Turks do the same. We need not admire them; nor is it reasonable we should follow their example, but rather that of the Chineses; for they act very orderly in this and several other cases.

2. The husbandmen of Cbina are mighty numerous, and as to rank are prefer'd before merchants and mechanicks. They work without ceasing, and if they had the feeding and wine those of La Mancha in Castile have, no men in the world would outdo them at their business. They are continually about their lands; if they have any time to spare, away they go immediately to the mountains to cut wood, to the garden to look to their herbs, or to cut canes, &c. so that they are never idle. The land in Cbina never lies fallow; generally the same ground produces three crops in a year; first, rice; and before it is reap'd, they sow fitches; and when they are in, wheat, beans, or some other grain: thus it continually goes round. They manure it as much as may be, there is no dung but what is put to this use. Human dung is sold, and the countrymen go about the streets, crying, who will exchange this commodity for wood, oil, or herbs? all which they carry with them. To carry it away decently, they have small tubs very close cover'd. They carry them ingeniously on their shoulders; and thus the houses are cleans'd every day, and get something. They often cleans'd the prison I and my two companions were kept in, and the goaler was well paid for it. A great many go about the streets with baskets, and little iron shovels, picking up all the filth there is, whether it be dogs, swines, or any other creature's dung, so that all places are constantly kept clean. Besides this, as I hinted before, there are neat and decent places in cities, towns, and in the country, for all necessities; and so on the roads. The owners of them make use of all they find there, in their gardens and fields.

3. When they take up the rice from the first bed and transplant it, they use an extraordinary art to give it strength, which I would not dare to insert here had I not seen and examin'd it. They that kill swine, which most men do, carefully keep the hair. The husbandmen buy it, and when they plant rice, put a little of it made up like a ball into the ground with the plant. This they say strengthens the rice, and gives vertue to the earth. When the plant is grown up and begins to ear, they scatter unslack'd lime about all the rice-fields. This lime they say kills the worms, burns up the weeds, and at the same time fattens the land.

land. We could not but admire every time we saw this practis'd, but experience shews it is as they say. By this means the rice-fields are so clean, that I have sometimes walk'd thro' them looking for some small herb, and could never find any; which seems incredible, so that the rice draws all the nourishment from the ground; and there is such tall lovely rice to be seen, that it is very surprizing.

Urine.

4. At certain times it is usual to sprinkle the rice and herbs, or water it with man's piss mix'd with some of the excrement. We Europeans thought this a riddle, because in China corn, rice, and all sorts of greens are nourish'd, fed, and kept alive by piss, which among us burns and destroys all plants.

5. In regard the rice requires to be always swimming in water, in such places where there are not rivers, brooks, or springs, whose waters they contrive a thousand ways to convey into the fields, they have wells and great ponds made by hand to keep the rain, which generally falls in May in the southern provinces. When their ponds are full, the husbandmen are pleas'd, because that water will serve them if it should rain no more. This they use to water their ground with great ease, and have admirable engines for that purpose. I have often seen, and diligently observ'd them, yet I cannot describe how they should be made. They have been carried to Manila, and the Dutch have them at Jacatra; I believe there is not a better invention in the world for draining of wells, springs, or ponds. If it does not rain about Mzy, then begin the prayers, processions, and fasts, which are strange and astonishing. The magistrates and judges meet to consider of means how to appease heaven, and like blind guides run into follies. The conjurers act their devilish parts. The idolaters have recourse to their idols, the schoolmen to the mountains and valleys; and all of them are restless, and more diligent in making their application to devils and idols, than we are in praying to God upon the like occasions. In all publick necessities they make use of the same remedies.

Publick devotions.

Rite.

6. They gather rice twice a year, once in June, and the next time in December. The southern provinces have more plenty of rice than the northern; tho' there is great abundance of corn, yet more of this in the north. There is not a foot of waste land in all China; and if it were not all till'd, the product would not suffice to maintain such multitudes. The husbandmen are generally poor people, and have but a small parcel of land they farm from others: The general rule is that the landlord pays taxes and has half the crop, the husbandman tills the ground and has the other half for his pains. There is not a NAVAGHORN, bone, or feather, but what they burn RETTE. to make ashes to manure their ground. Horace and Cicero wrote much in praise of husbandry. See A Lapide, Genes. xlix. §. 15. Manuring.

7. Husbandry is of great antiquity in China; one of their first emperors, by name Xin Nung, was the first that taught it. They sacrifice to him at this time, and he has magnificent temples. Idolatory.

Of the Handy-crafts.

1. A great deal might be said of this rank of people. There are in China handy-craft workmen of all sorts that can be imagined, and such numbers of them that it is prodigious. The curiosities they make and sell in the shops amaze all Europeans. If four large galleons were sent to the city Nan King, to that of Cu Cheu, to Hang Cheu, or any other like them, they might be loaden with a thousand varieties of curiosities and toys, such as all the world would admire, and a great profit be made of them, tho' sold at reasonable rates. All things necessary to furnish a princely house may be had ready made in several parts of any of the aforesaid cities, without any farther trouble than the buying, and all at poor rates in comparison of what is sold among us. The Chineses are very ingenious at imitation, they have imitated to perfection whatsoever they have seen brought out of Europe. In the province of Canton they have counterfeited several things so exactly, that they sell them in the inland for goods brought from Europe. F. de Angelis was much in the wrong in affirming they have rare painters among them, for they are and ever were very mean ones. They paint flowers, birds and trees indifferently, but fall short in the shadowing. They very much admire our paintings, tho' they are but ordinary ones. It is true, that some of them who have learn'd at Manila and Macao have prov'd great artists. The filigran the Chineses make at Manila, which they learnt of the Indians, has astonish'd the Europeans. They now begin to imitate it in some measure in Italy. In Canton they make very good spectacles, prospective, burning and looking glasses, so like ours that it is hard to know them asunder. Not long before I came from thence we understood they made them of pebbles ground small, for want of fine sand which they have not. The tools mechanicks use are much like ours, except here or there one. The tailors use no thimble, but only a rag ty'd about the ball of the thumb, and that serves them: they for the most part sew standing, only leaning against a table on which their work lies. There are abundance of weavers. In Canton, where there was a free trade with shoemakers go about the streets with all their tools about them; they go where they are call'd, mend shoes, and sole them for half a ryal (three pence) and they will last a year or two with those that do not go much. I know not after what manner, or what it is they use to tan so rarely. Smiths walk about after the same manner, and carry their little bellows, which are much more convenient, and as useful as those in Europe. They call them, and they will make nails, or any thing else. There are others whose trade is to mend broken earthen ware, which they do by nailing together the pieces with bits of brass; the dish is strong, and the crack scarce perceivable. Many carry about apparel to sell; others flesh, fish, herbs, so that no body needs go abroad for provision. There is meat ready dress'd to be had at any time of the day, and at all rates, in every city, or town, or even in the villages that lie in any frequented road: besides, there are many considerable eating-houses, where if any man will have a dinner for half a ducat, for one, two, three, or more, in an hour's time they will send it home in good order, cleanly, and on the finest earthen ware. The inns of Italy, or other parts, do no way outdo them.

Eating-houses.

Porcelane.

2. I will here briefly treat of the earthenware of Cbina, concerning which many groundless stories are reported in these our parts. It is neither made of egg-shells, nor of sea-snails, as Mendoza writes: nor is it buried under ground an hundred, nor yet twenty years. All the earthen ware that is us'd in Cbina, and all that has been brought hither, is made in a town of the province of Kiang Si, call'd Cbao Hien: Only the earth of that place is proper for it. They cleanse it very well, paint it of several fine colours; and after being bak'd, it comes out transparent, and no dish, plate, or basin has any knot. Of late years some in the province of Fo Kien attempted to counterfeit it, but what they made was not to compare with the other; and the emperor, at the request of those of Cbao Hien, commanded the others to desist. That of Japan is good, but still inferior to the other; besides it has one great fault, which is, that boiling water cracks and breaks it, and it does not that of Cbina. The gilding and varnishing of Japan is beyond that of Cbina, though their gilders and varnishers are very skilful, and daily improve, particularly in painting of trees, birds, and flowers on the several works they make. The Cbineses make abundance of fine paper-flowers, but those made of silk are better. At Nan

King they make them of wax to such perfection, that we were amaz'd at them, as I observ'd in another place.

3. The Cbineses are great lovers of perfumes, spend much money in them; and therefore there are a great many who live by making sweets to burn. They use them in the temples of their idols, and about their dead. There are several sorts of them, some better than others. Of the ordinary ones which are wonderful cheap, they make things in the shape of a fardingale, mark'd out at distances as far as can burn in an hour, and so they make them for eight or twelve hours, or more or less. They hang them up in the temples, every man according to his devotion; others use them in their houses to watch, or rise by in the night; for looking upon the scores that remain, they know how many are burnt, and by that how many hours they have slept, and how long it is to day.

4. We may reckon the multitude of physicians they have among their handicrafts, and if they please we will allow them to pass among the men of learning. I forgot to give them a place there, and it is but reasonable they should have a good one, and we should all allow it them, for we all stand in need of their worships. Honour the physician for the need you have of him. There are good ones in Cbina, and some very expert at discovering the indisposition by the pulse. Yet the greatest part are mere farriers, for tho' the Cbineses are so fond of their life and health, especially the great ones, yet they have taken no care, nor made regulation for this faculty, tho' so necessary; so that tho' there are examinations, and degrees to be taken by scholars and soldiers (for these are made bachelors, licentiates, and doctors, and are severely examin'd, tho' their degrees are much inferior to those of the learned men) yet there is nothing at all for physick. Any man that will take upon him to be a physician, does it without controul. The physicians themselves are apothecaries, and therefore when they visit their patients, they carry a servant loaded with their medicines. When he has felt the pulse at leisure, he leaves what he thinks proper and goes away with the money. They never bleed, cup, give glisters or purges. They know nothing there of potions, their greatest cure is a regular diet, which is very agreeable to Galen: the greatest medicine is abstinence. S. Thomas, opusc. 60. art. 10. quoting Galen's words, says, the body of a man is oftener found to fall into mortal diseases through excess, than through want: So that it requires to be dieted. The first thing they do is to forbid fish, flesh, and eggs; they allow rice broth, rice boil'd thin, some herbs salted, and upon the recovery goose-eggs salted; as also salt-fish dry'd and roasted. This same method they observe in Japan, Tunquin, Cochinchina, and all other kingdoms even as far as India and the Moguls country. Very little rhubarb is us'd in China, tho' there is so much of it that it is not sold for above half a rial (three pence) a pound. They use more of that they call fo lin, and we China root.

5. The practice of physick is of great antiquity in China. One of the first five emperors introduced it. His books are preserv'd to this day, with some others that treat of the nature of herbs. True it is, his successors have advanc'd this faculty but little or nothing. F. Copley, of whom we have elsewhere made mention, is a violent asserter of the Chinese physicians, here and there one is of his opinion; he is about translating some of their books for the improvement of Europe. The Chinese neither study, nor know any thing of philosophy; this being so very necessary an assistant to physick, how can there be any able physicians without it? In truth, there all depends on chance; they hit right perhaps by experience, not by their learning. They never see, nor ask for, nor understand the water. In some slight indispositions they use cupping; their manner and application of them I like better than ours. They are made of brass, have a little hole at the top, which they stop with a little wax; when they lay them on, they put a small lighted wick, made to stand upright, on the place appointed; then they clap the cupping-vessel upon it, it draws well; and then unstopping the little whole with a needle, the air goes out at it, and the cupping-vessel of itself gently comes off the flesh. There are many good surgeons, who do their business very well without all that variety of instruments us'd among us. An infinite number goes about telling fortunes, and so of musicians. Some blind women, purposely blinded by their parents, go about with gittars to get their bread. Others playing on instruments, calculate nativities, and pretend to understand physiognomy. During the rice-harvest many go about the fields playing to the reapers; and they having the rice and corn at hand, pay them in that coin. They are not a few who assign fortunate places for sepulchres; they observe the position of the place, that it looks towards the south, and other circumstances that may make it have a communication with the dragon they feign to be under the earth. Hence comes all honour and riches to their children and posterity, and this they call fung xui.

6. It remains here to speak of the China root, passing by many other sorts of drugs that country produces. There are two sorts of it, one perfect, which is fine and white, and sold in China for four times the price of the other. I guess none of this comes to us, it grows in the northern provinces. The other is a very imperfect sort, they call it the root of the earth; it grows in the provinces of Fo Kien, Canton, and others in the south, it is of a ruddy colour, there is abundance of it about the fields, it costs only the taking up and carrying home. Both sorts grow under ground, and have nothing above but some little sprigs with very small leaves, by which it is found out. This last sort is it they bring into Europe. In India it is very dear. I have seen that sold at Malaca for eighteen pieces of eight, which in China did not cost two. The Portugueses at Macao of late years fell into the way of preserving this root. The Dutch and English bring some of this preserve into Europe, it is very delicious. In the year 1674, discoursing on this subject with doctor Requena, he told me an Englishman had given him a little of it.

NAVARRETTE.

7. It will be proper to say something of the most famous root call'd jin sen. It is valued above all things in China; it grows not there, but in the neighbouring countries on the north-side. The Chinese call it a medicine that raises the dead. The name is well due to it, for its admirable effects. It is much like small radishes without leaves; they sell it at an extravagant rate, generally for its weight in gold; and when scarce, double. Its particular quality is to comfort the stomach, and strengthen the whole body, so that it seems to inspire new spirits and life. When a man is quite spent with weakness, let him take a decoction of this root to the quantity of the weight of a silver rial (a six-pence) and he presently recovers more strength than if he had eaten a pullet. It is a wonderful thing how much virtue there is in so small a thing. The great men exceed in the use of it, in order to indulge themselves more freely in sensuality. Much more might be said in this place, but thus much will answer my design.

Jin Sen.

S E C T. IV.
Of the Merchants.

1. The number of traders and merchants in China is excessive. Whatsoever town or city a man comes into, there seem to be more sellers than buyers. They are all very obliging and civil; if they can get any thing, tho' never so little, they don't slip the opportunity. They are the very antipodes of the Japoneses, for these are rough, disobliging, and positive; when they once say a thing is worth twenty ducats, they will not abate a cross, tho' you argue it with them a twelve-month.

From all antiquity the Cbineses have been forbid trading with foreign nations; but the people being covetous, have of late years by their money purchas'd leave to go to Japan, Manila, Jacatra, Siam, and other places within the strait of Scicapura. This has given many Cbineses the opportunity of settling in those countries. In my time it was most rigorously observ'd that none should go to sea, not so much as the Por- tugueses of Macao, nor no ship of other nations should be admitted. This was observ'd during the time we were in custody, and they twice turn'd away the Dutch without suffering them to buy or sell. The Cbineses say they want nothing that foreign countries afford, and they are in the right. This is a good piece of policy. The same might be done in other kingdoms, but they do it not, because they will not.

CHAP. II.

Money. 1. IT will not be amiss in this place to treat of the Cbinese coin, and others I have seen. The current coin of Cbina is plain silver without any stamp, but it goes by weight. It pass'd so in Abraham's time, Oleaster in Gen. xxiii. For which reason all buyers or sellers carry about them a little curious Roman beam, we call it the Stilyard; with which they weigh what they receive and pay. They reckon by crowns, every one worth ten rials plate, like the Italian crowns. They divide a rial into ten parts, as the Romans do into ten bayoques; that tenth part they subdivide into an hundred, but most commonly into twenty, the others are so small they do not weigh them. There is some silver very fine, in which they pay their taxes to the emperor, and no other is allow'd of for this use; there is another fine sort, another that is current, some coarse, and some coarser still, which is the cause of many cheats, to which most of the commonalty are much addicted. The leisure the Cbineses take to weigh half a farthing in silver, is intolerable to the Europeans. They make pigs of silver of what weight they think fit, to send up the taxes to court; usually they weigh fifty crowns, and they are curious in this particular, as in all other things. There are abundance of founders in every city and town, who are all or most of them very expert at stealing the silver, and making up the weight with other metals. They have great shears of several sorts to cut the silver with, which all men are provided with, especially the merchants and traders; and because when it grows dusky it is hard to know silver, and bits of it are apt to drop down when it is cut, therefore as soon as the sun sets all the shops are shut up.

2. There is another brass coin round, and as big as a Spanish quarto (something broader than a farthing) in the middle of it is a square hole, which serves to hang it on a string by; it is more generally us'd in the imperial city than in any other place. The emperor's name is engrav'd upon it, but the value of it is not certain; in some places it rises, and falls in others, but in all parts where I have been, the brass sold by weight is worth more than when coin'd. It was sometimes propos'd at Manila to make use of it for small expences. I have seen this project in print, its being good is cause enough why it should not be practis'd. It would be advantageous on several accounts, and it were no small benefit, that by this means his majesty would be furnish'd at easy rates with metal to cast guns.

3. I am persuaded the Cbinese coin is the ancientest in the world. The first we Europeans have any knowledge of, is that which they say Terab, Abraham's father, coin'd at the request of king Ninus, and the first pieces of it were those thirty for which Judas sold CHRIST, so says Albericus de Rosate in lib. de contr. empt. and quotes Capola, Felicianus de Solis, and others. The coin of Cbina was invented and made by one of the first five emperors, who according to their annals without doubt liv'd before Terrab. Spondanus writes they began to coin money in France about the year 549 after CHRIST, it was a gold coin with the effigies of their kings, not of the emperors, as others were. Aristotle in the fourth of his morals distinguishes the several species of coin. S. Thomas quotes him, lib. II. de regin. princip. cap. 13. and says, Moneta implies, Monens mentem ne fraus committatur; & numisma, quia nominibus principum, effigieque designatur. Whence it follows that the brass-money of Cbina is numisma, and the silver which is weigh'd must be Moneta.

4. At Macassar they use a royal coin, for it is gold, they call it bulay and copones, it is us'd as low as the value of half a rial (three pence) and has their kings arms on it. True it is, for small expences, as buying of herbs, cocos, fish, &c. they have another little brass coin, which they call abejarrucos. In Camboxa the current coin is of silver curiously cast. The stamp on it is a cock, and therefore the Europeans call it by the name of gallos, or cocks. At Siam they use very fine silver, known by the name of ticals, in the midst of it is a small Sigueyes.

Money of bells.

small stamp with the arms. For small change they use some fine little shells, they call sigueyes, brought to them from the coast of India and Manila, of which there are vast quantities in the island Luban. I heard in Cbina, they were given to the king, I am satisfied his majesty will be little or nothing the better. This sort of money passes at Suratte, whither the sigueyes are carry'd from the Maldivy islands. The same is us'd throughout all Guinea, according to Monardes, fol. 134. In Japan, Tunquin and Cochinchina they use silver-money.

Fanones.

5. At Malaca I saw five several sorts of coin, pieces of eight; rixdollars a finer silver than the pieces eight; crowns of a lower alloy; caxa, which is only one third silver, is like the tarjas of Navarre, current in all places where the Dutch are. The fifth is copper: at Columbo they have the same five sorts of coin, and the roupies besides, the silver whereof is perfectly fine. At Cbamandel they use fanones, which are of gold, seventeen of them make a piece of eight, and one fanon makes one hundred and ten little pieces of copper-money; there are also pagodes of gold, one of them is worth two pieces of eight. At Goa there are seraphims of coarse silver; S. Thomas's of gold, each of them is a crown of ours. They are call'd S. Thomas's, because they bear the effigies of that holy apostle. There are also tangas and abejarrucos.

Pagodés.

Seraphims

St. Thomas's.

6. Spondanus in his second volume writes, that Spain is so exhausted, that for want of gold and silver it makes use of copper-money. What I can say to it is, that where-soever I have been, which is a considerable part of the world, I have seen our pieces of eight in great esteem, and I know they are so in Turky, Babylon and Persia. The Cbineses value them at a great rate, for whereas they reckon but ten degrees or carraets of fineness in silver or gold, which answers to our twenty four; they allow the pieces of eight to be nine carraets and a half fine. Yet for all this we see brass-money in Castile, which amazes all the nations in the world.

The French missionaries in Cbina said, they did not doubt but that there were more pieces of eight in France than in Spain; and affirm'd, there went out of the port of Marseilles above six millions of theirs in pieces of eight to Turkey, and other parts where they trade. How then can the Turk want strength to make war upon us? What misfortune has the French of the West-Indies? Even as much as Genoa and Venice. A pamphlet that came from Portugal into Cbina, rail'd much at the falling of the money in Castile; adding, that strangers brought in brass-money, and carried away the silver. This has been a grievance these many years, and it is very odd that no remedy should be apply'd to so grievous a disease. S. Thomas, speaking of the falling of money, says in the same place we quoted above; He must be very moderate (that is, the person at the helm) in altering or diminishing the weight or metal, because it turns to the peoples loss. Here he cites pope Innocent reproving the king of Aragon upon this account.

7. F. Faber, a French jesuit, discoursing with me concerning the plate that is every year carry'd out from Marseilles, told me, what disputes and controversies there had been in France about justifying that action, and bringing them off with a safe conscience who had a hand in it. He said the laws of the kingdom were very severe against it, and the ill consequences of it considerable; however he own'd his society maintain'd the action, and satisfied all persons in that point, because the laws made against it were not so binding in conscience. Those of the society in Manila say the same thing in regard to the factors in that city. In these cases I look upon it to be safer to have regard to the publick good, than to the benefit of private persons: besides that the intention of the legislators is sufficiently express'd without allowing any the least interpretation. The coin of Cbina has drawn on this discourse, it may be allow'd of as a diversion, and change of subject.

CHAP. III.

Treating of the Chinese Government.

ment.

1. Something has been said, tho' briefly, of the four ranks of people, into which the Cbineses divide all their multitude. These again they place under five states or orders, viz. the emperor and subjects; parents and children; husbands and wives; elder and younger brothers, and friends. The whole Cbinese government tends to make these five states or orders live regularly, and in decent manner; and to say the truth, if this can be perform'd, there is no more requir'd towards keeping a kingdom in peace and unity, which is the end we ought most to aim at in this life. The Cbineses design is, that every person keep within the bounds of their vocation and calling, without exceeding the limits prescrib'd them. All their doctrine and books tend to prescribe rules and methods to practise what they aspire to. This is the ultimate end of all the labours and writings of the great Cbinese doctor Kung Fu

RETTE. FuCu. Tokings and emperors they prescribe the love of their subjects, compassion, mercy, and fatherly affection; for this reason they call him father, and common father of the empire. To the subjects, fidelity, loyalty, and obedience to their emperors, kings, magistrates, and governors: tho' they see the sword hanging over them, they are not to be deterred from speaking the truth, or performing their duty. To parents meekness, and upon occasion to use severity towards their children; to instruct, and chastise their failings, to do with them as S. Paul directs in his sixth chapter to the

to parents.

Ephesians. To children, that they be obedient to parents; disobedience to them is the greatest sin the Chinese know, as shall be said in another place. Parents usually accuse their children before the mandarines for disobedience, when they have not the heart to punish them, because they are grown up. The punishment inflicted on this account is very severe. In those places where there are no mandarines, they have recourse to the elders, who have authority to punish this crime. Generally the punishment is inflicted in the presence of the parents, and lasts till they say they are satisfied, and plead for their child. The practice in this case is comical, for any one takes upon him to be plaintiff, and complains that such a one is not obedient to his parents, and sometimes it falls out that the parents themselves maintain the contrary, and are at charges to clear their sons.

Wives.

2. They prescribe many rules for husbands and wives, some of them shall be mention'd in their proper place. The wives in China are half slaves, their subjection extraordinary; they do not know that God made woman of man's rib, and took her not from his feet. They are reclusé in the highest degree, their modesty and reservedness is not to be parallel'd in all the world; they out-do all others upon earth in continual labour and industry. They write very much concerning the respect and courtesy due from the younger brother to the elder, and the love of the elder towards the younger. Little is said of sisters, because they make small account of them. Only the males inherit, the females are cut off; and so if they do not marry, when their father dies, they are left to the mercy of the brothers, or other relations. The missionaries discoursing one day about persuading maids to preserve their virginity, and become devotees, as is practis'd among us (the fathers of the society have made many, we had but few) I propos'd something of what has been said, and concluded with these words: Let your reverences secure them a dish of rice, or as we say a morsel of bread to keep them alive, and let it be so;

but if this can never be secur'd, to what purpose should we engage ourselves in affairs of very dangerous consequence? What must a young maid well born do alone in a room or house, under a vow of chastity, without any thing to maintain her, but her labour; under a confinement never to go abroad, or being able to beg, tho' she be in want? And if she fall sick, who must look after her? That vineyard is not yet at a growth to spread along the walls.

3. They give very pretty documents to friends, as shall be shewn in its place. They include mandarines and masters in the first rank or order, and therefore they call the viceroys fathers of the provinces, the governors of the cities, and the judges of the towns. The reverence and respect they pay their masters is scarce to be imagin'd, it lasts not only whilst they are scholars, but all their life-time; so that the ceremonies they use towards them are continual, and this they do tho' the scholar arrive to great preferment, and the master still continue a private person. I every day approv'd more and more of this respect, they far out-do the Europeans. The Chinese call the distinction and good order of these five states mention'd, ta tao, which is, great learning and wisdom. They also assign five virtues, prudence, justice, mercy, fortitude, and fidelity. For the attaining and practising of them, they set down nine general principles to those that are in authority, which are to compose and regulate themselves, to respect virtuous persons, to love their family, to reverence their superiors and great counsellors, to be in unity with ministers of state, and be of the same body with them; that is the meaning of the word ji, to cherish, love, and support the subjects, to treat strangers who come from far countries with kindness, (this they perform but ill at this time) to give great honour to the petty kings, and suffer handicrafts to come from other nations. They comment largely upon this, and bring their reasons from convenience for it. They have reason enough not to admit of strangers, as having no need of them for any worldly affairs. Narbona advises princes not to prefer strangers to places of trust, or to their councils, because they are ignorant of the constitution, and void of affection, and because the subjects always resent it. He is much in the right, yet he is not minded. The Chinese shew'd it sufficiently in the case of F. Adamus the jesuit; for as much as he did rise, and the emperor favour'd him, so much their envy and hatred to him increas'd, and they never gave over till they ruin'd him, and all us with him for his sake. This is the fate of those that build upon sand. The Chinese found fault with him, for that he was very great

When they go loaded with half a dozen or more dogs to the shambles the sport is still better; for the noise those so carry'd make, brings out all the dogs in the town to take their parts, and attack their mortal enemies. Asses flesh is valu'd above any other. They also eat horseflesh, buffalo, cats, mice, and other sorts. I myself eat of a horse, dogs, and mice, and in truth I lik'd them very well. The Cbineses value the sinews of deers feet brought to them dry from Camboua, Siam and other places. The elephants trunk they affirm to be a mighty dainty, and a bit for a king; the same they say of a bear's paw.

5. Let us return to the matter in hand. All matters of moment that are transacted in the empire are communicated to the supreme governors and viceroys, who make them known to all the subjects, after the manner as was set down in the beginning of this chapter. Thus there are daily to be seen writings, set up in publick places, containing the business in hand at court, which has been laid before the emperor. Our case was managed after the same manner, and by this means it was known in the meanest village and farm-house that there were preachers of the word of God in Cbina. True it is, this information came late, and after they had reprov'd and condemn'd that doctrine. In the year 1663 the Dutch went up to court by the way of Fo Kien, and immediately news was brought to Canton of their arrival, and a particular of the presents they made the emperor, which are valued at sixty thousand ducats. They sent advice from Canton of the arrival of an ambassador from Portugal, and soon after the whole empire had notice of his coming. But the emperor complain'd of the smallness of the present, which was immediately made known to him, tho' it was worth above thirty thousand ducats.

6. The several degrees, and the rank of superior and inferior courts, and magistrates, is very well settled and establish'd, so that there never is nor can be any trouble, or dispute about precedence, as happens very often among us, especially in the Indies and Philippine islands, which gives much scandal to new converts, and infidels. It often happens that a very mean soldier, and sometimes one of them that is banish'd from Mexico, rising to be governor, contends with a bishop, and holds his own stiffly; and unless the poor bishop gives way, or parts with his right (either through too much humility, or a destructive flattery, as saint Augustin said) to prevent the mischief may ensue to his flock, presently all is in an uproar, and that which began on a frivolous occasion, ends either in taking away his temporal revenue, or banishing the bishop. The Cbineses order things better, every man positively knows what place and respect is due to him, and the certain extent of his jurisdiction, so that there is no room for any controversy on this or the like subject.

7. Every three months a book of considerable bulk is publish'd in the imperial city, which contains an account of all the emperor's revenue, and the names and surnames of all the mandarines in the empire at that time, with their rank and precedence, according to their employments. These books are dispers'd abroad every where, and by them they know every one's post, and how they are subordinate to one another. It is the custom of Cbina, when any thing is laid to the charge of mandarin, which is not an offence that merit their being totally laid aside, to put them down to a meaner employment; and so it sometimes falls out, that he who but the other day was viceroy of a province, is now reduced to be governor of a single town. The supreme governor of a province, who has charge of the whole, is the chief man in it, and as such all kneel to him, and touch the ground with their heads; only the viceroy is exempted, who makes a shew of bending his knees. He, the emperor's treasurer, and the judge criminal, after paying their ceremonies, may sit down and eat with him. If the supreme governor is impeach'd when he is call'd to give account of the discharge of his office, he kneels down before the judge without boots, or the habit of a mandarin. We saw this done in the province of Canton An. 1668, to one who afterwards hang'd himself for mere rage.

8. All the affairs of metropolitan and other cities are under the like subordination, and generally pass through all their courts. The emperor order'd we should be maintain'd, whereupon we presented a petition to the supreme governor, who gave command, that what the emperor had allow'd should be given us; the order went down to the viceroy, who pass'd it; from him it went to the emperor's treasurer, then to the judge, and lastly to the judges of the two corporations which are within the walls. These gave their answer, which went up to the supreme governor in the same manner as it came down. All this mystery was made to pay us five Maravedies (about a half penny) in silver, which the emperor allow'd every one of us. They paid it in coarse silver, and not above half the value, for the officers of courts of justice are wicked all the world over; the difference is, that those in Cbina are very courteous, courteous, give good words, and are satisfied with a small matter. In every government there are six clerks offices which are answerable to the six courts in the imperial city, whereof we spoke in the first book, each takes cognizance of its own particular affairs. There all orders that come from NAVA-court are kept. Every two months the imperial Treasurers send up an account to the court of exchequer of what has been laid out of the revenue.

CHAP. V.

A Continuation of the same Matter.

Mandarin's diversions.

1. THE method the mandarines use to be able to justify themselves in the discharge of their duties is very regular. It is a clear case they never go out of their houses, unless it be to pay visits, to invitations from persons of note, and about the execution of their office; they don't use, as we do, to go abroad a walking to take the air, or for pleasure. All their diversions consist in some treats, and plays acted whilst they eat and drink; upon which occasions the custom is thus. When the guests are all come together, the principal actor delivers a book of several plays to the master of the house, who gives it to his chief guest, to chuse the play he likes best. He names it, and it is acted, which shews no small skill in the actors. When the play is ended, he that chose pays for it, and gives some silver to the waiters and cooks. To say the truth, they pay dear for their dinner. Men of great note will lay out fifty ducats, others less, and some only ten, or twelve. The Chineses are great lovers of plays, but the mischiefs they cause fall heavy on them. Scipio Nasica, mention'd by the author of Fasciculus temporum, fol. 31. order'd, that they should not by any means erect a theatre in the city, because, he said, it was a pernicious thing to a warlike people, as breeding sloth, and encouraging lewdness. In our parts we mind nothing.

Plays.

tainments.

2. In the year 1668, the petty king of Canton invited us to drink a glass of wine (so they term it.) This was a mighty kindness, in regard we were confin'd by his emperor. We thought it not decent to go all of us, it was agreed four should go, and I was one of the number. We presently consider'd whether he would not have some sort of sport, because it was then newyears-tide. We had a good dinner, and some musick which oblig'd us to spend about six ducats, and truly with much regret, for our stock was then very low. These are unavoidable accidents; we could no way refuse so great an honour, which besides procur'd us no small ease and enlargement in our confinement. Those who will behave themselves like gentlemen, must take the expence upon them, if they would have the honour and credit it brings along with it; but this requires a good purse, which we missioners want.

3. Every day, morning and evening, the mandarines sit in court in their own houses, except those of the imperial city, which are in a place apart; all the courts are after the same manner, as I observ'd before. Yet there is no imperial law to oblige the mandarines to sit every day. No certain times are prefix'd them, nor at what hours they shall go to the bench, or come off; tho' a missioner of a certain religious order asserted the contrary at Rome, to bring about not what was most convenient, but that which he desir'd and had a mind to.

justice.

4. The greater the mandarin, the seldomer he sits. The supreme governors and viceroys sit only twice or thrice every moon, unless some matter of great moment occur. All the missioners that ever were, or now are in China, know what I write as to this particular to be true. What can we say or do if this be otherwise represented to the head of the church? When the chief mandarin comes to sit in court, they fire three great chambers; before that the musick and waits play, and trumpets sound, upon certain little towers near the gate before the court. They also ring a bell every half hour. When the court rises they do the same, save the ringing of the bell. If the supreme mandarin is absent, the next to him has the same ceremony perform'd. Whilst he is in court his officers attend him, standing in two ranks at some distance from him. The executioners wait, some with cleft canes, others with shackles. The martial mandarines, instead of canes use cudgels, round at top and square at bottom, thicker than a man's leg. The executioners stand below where the criminals are, at a good distance from the mandarin; as those were from king Pbaraob who saw and spoke to him: for this reason Moses excus'd himself from going into Egypt, saying, Exod. iv. I am of a slender voice, according to the Septuagint. St. Augustin upon this place, quest. Read Hu-16. Perhaps the royal state did not allow them to talk near at hand. The emperors of China, and their ministers, have always observ'd this method, either to make themselves the more dreaded, or to appear the

5. The mandarin being ſeated, and his officers placed, upon one cry made, the three outward gates are opened; and before the people that have buſineſs come in, a crier goes about the inner court with a written tablet, crying (for example) let thoſe come in who have petitions to prefer. When theſe are diſmiſt, the crier again makes proclamation, ſaying, let thoſe that are ſent up from towns come in. Then I went in with the officer that had charge of me; and being on my knees, it was propos'd I ſhould be ſent to the metropolis. I begg'd to be allow'd a veſſel, becauſe I was poor. He granted it very courteouſly. This was the greateſt mandarin in the city; I went out again and return'd home. He ſat in much ſtate, a great table before him cover'd with ſilk hanging down to the ground; he had by him pencils to write with, and black and red ink. They ſign and ſeal with red. There lay a great many little ſticks in a wooden varniſh'd caſe; theſe ſerve to denote the number of laſhes they will have given to criminals. Every little ſtick ſtands for five laſhes; if they deſign twenty they throw down four of them, and ſix for thirty. The executioners ſnatch them up, and lay the wretch on his face upon the ſtone; drag down his breeches to his heels, where two ſtand to hold him down, and two more at his head. The executioner facing the mandarin, diſcharges the cane with all his ſtrength upon the thighs. The ſtanders-by count the ſtrokes aloud, and at every five comes on a freſh executioner till the number is compleat. There is a difference in the ſtrokes, and in the canes; the greater the mandarin, the thicker and heavier they are: to this purpoſe they put lead into them, ſo that the ſtroke is terrible. There lies no appeal in caſe of whipping, and very few eſcape it. When they have a mind to it, they kill a man at four or five ſtrokes. The mandarines can put no man to death, without ſending up to court about it; but it is common to laſh men to death. The executioners can order it much

as they pleaſe, for the great ſtreſs lies in ſtriking in one place or another, in turning or bending the cane, wherein they always do the will and pleaſure of their mandarin. They hold up ſome men's teſticles, and fix them on a ſmall cane; on them they let fall the ſtroke, and the ſecond or third the patient infallibly dies. If he who is to be whipp'd has ſilver, he generally compounds with the executioners, and then they let fall the cane ſo, that it may make a great noiſe and do little hurt; and the better to carry on the cheat, the perſon ſuffering roars out hideouſly.

6. As terrible as this puniſhment is, there are ſome who hire themſelves to receive the laſhes for others; ſo that in ſome places there are people who keep ten or twelve of theſe men that hire themſelves. Thoſe whoſe cauſe is depending, and fear they ſhall be laſh'd, have recourſe to the chief of that ſociety, give an account of the danger they are in, and aſk for one to go along with them, giving ſecurity to pay four or five ryals (two ſhillings or half a crown) for every laſh. The bargain made, he appoints one of his men, who goes with the criminal to the court: the executioners are ſpoke to, and when the mandarin orders the whipping, or rather baſtinadoing, the other takes the place, and receives the ſtrokes for money. This may be eaſily done without the mandarin's perceiving it; firſt, becauſe of the many executioners there preſent; and in the next place, which is the beſt reaſon, becauſe the mandarin is at a great diſtance; and as ſoon as he has thrown down the ſticks, during the execution, talks of other affairs, drinks cha, and ſmokes tobacco. When he has been laſh'd, his chief takes great care of him, has him dreſs'd, and makes much of him. Thoſe that have been baſtinado'd are generally ſent to goal; there are thoſe that dreſs them very well, but they pay for it.

7. The manner of wracking the ankles is yet more cruel, many die of it; two dy'd in Canton, an. 1668. F. Magalanes, a Jeſuit, underwent it in the imperial city, in ſuch a barbarous manner, that he had no ſhape of feet left; his offence was, that they found in his poſſeſſion a quantity of ſilver belonging to a mandarin, who had been beheaded for ſome crimes. For this purpoſe they make uſe of a large pair of tongs with two dents below, into which they uſually put rubbiſh, and bits of tiles. The ankles being fix'd there, they cloſe above, ſtriking with an iron hammer; and every ſtroke preſſes the instrument together, ſo that after a few ſtrokes the bones are diſjointed, and the feet remain as flat as a pancake, as I have ſeen ſometimes whilſt I was in prison; and truly it was enough to break one's heart.

was

Mandarin's retirement.

8. When the trials are over, the mandarine goes in and seals his door with his own name, so it remains safer than if it had been secured with twenty padlocks. By the side of it is a wheel (like those of nunneries) and attendants to run of errands without; that way all the mandarin has occasion for is deliver'd in, and no body from abroad goes in, nor any within goes out; so the door is only open'd when the mandarin himself goes forward or backward. The gates of the courts are shut at sun-set; the greater the mandarin, the more strictly this is taken care of. Till the next day there is no looking to have them open'd.

Mandarin's state.

9. When they go abroad, it is with excessive state and grandeur; the attendance is suitable to the quality of the mandarin. The supreme governor of Canton, without all doubt, goes abroad in more state than any king in Europe. Before him go two men with two brass-basons, on which they very leisurely strike nine strokes, which are heard almost a quarter of a league off. The governors of towns have but three strokes one after another, others have five, and others seven. Viceroys and supreme governors have both of them nine. Besides those two we have mention'd, three other couples go a good distance from one another. Then follow in two ranks the badges or ensigns of their post or employment. This is like the custom of the Romans, as S. Thomas says upon those words of S. Paul, in Rom. xiii. For they carry not the sword in vain. He says, But he speaks according to the custom of princes, who as it were to betoken their power, carry'd the instruments for punishing, that is, the bundles of rods to lash, and the axes or swords to put to death. Read Corn. à Lapide on that place. They carry broad swords, axes, canes bloody with bastinadoing, and many chains dragging, the noise of which alone is irksome. Six men go by two and two, and a distance between them, crying out as loud as they can, but very leisurely, giving notice the lord mandarin is coming, and by this means the streets are clear'd. Those who bear the ensigns are richly clad, and carry at distances three fine silk umbrello's, of three folds each, of the colour that belongs to the employment. Then follows the sedan, in which the mandarin sits very gravely; it is carry'd by four, six, eight, or twelve, according to his quality. I have already said the emperor is carried by twenty four, NAVA- and those of the petty kings by sixteen. RETTE. Whilst the supreme mandarin is in town, the rest, if they go abroad, do not carry the basons out of respect to him. In Cbina they observe the same method the Romans did. S. Thomas in John x. v. 41. left. 6. says thus upon these words, He did no miracle. This custom was observed among all the antients, viz. that the inferior power did not make use of the ensigns of its authority before the superior; for which reason the consuls laid down their ensigns when they came into the presence of the dictator. This the Cbineses observe in beating the basons, and firing the chambers. In the imperial city it is more strictly observ'd, for even the counsellors of state go without much attendance or grandeur, out of respect to the emperor. Their sedans are round, open at top, slightly, handsomely adorn'd and set off. The mandarines sit in them with the greatest modesty imaginable. If at any time an inferior mandarin perceives that another his superior comes along the same street, he immediately alights out of his chair, and gets into a house, or strikes into another street if there be any near. All those that have the emperor's seal, which are many, ever carry it before them, wheresoever they go, though it be eight days journey, or farther. The seal is in a gilt urn, cover'd and carried upon men's shoulders next to the mandarin's chair. When they visit, there is a table with a carpet placed by the mandarin's chair, on which the seal is set.

10. That which Herodian, lib. III. writes of Lucius Septimus Plautonianus, may very well be said of the state of the mandarines of Cbina: his words are these, Wheresoever he went he was so stern and terrible, that he was not only not sought for by any, but even those that met him accidentally turn'd away from him; for some persons walking before gave notice that none should stand near, or presume to look upon him, but should all turn away and look upon the ground. The same is done to a tittle by the Cbinese mandarines. They proceed with great deliberation before they take away any man's employment. There is no doubt it ought not to be taken away for every failing. Oleaster observes it, Numb. xii. GOD the supreme legislator did not depose Moses or Aaron from the dignities he had rais'd them to, tho' they had offended him; and Aaron in most grievous manner.

Of the Chinese Ceremonies and Civilities.

NAVA-
RETTE.

Civility.

ONE of the great troubles we missionaries of Cbina undergo, is to learn the ceremonies of that country. Some look upon it as a needless, tiresome, and impertinent business, but in truth it is not only convenient but absolutely necessary towards conversing with that courteous and polite people: According to the saying, when you are at Rome, do as they do at Rome. Which proverb the Cbinese nation has, but more at large. The doctrine they call li ki speaks thus: "When a man comes into any precinct, he ought to ask what is forbidden there, that he may not offend the lord of it; when he comes into a house, he must ask for the master of it, to thank him for the courtesy and civility he receives there; the contrary is opposite to good breeding. When he comes into a kingdom, he must enquire into the customs and manners, for otherwise he will offend the people, who will imagine he blames and condemns them, so that all men will shun and avoid him." Now since, to attain the end the missionaries aspire to, it is necessary that instead of avoiding, the infidels should seek for and converse with them, it follows that to imitate their customs, and use all their ceremonies, is very necessary and advantageous. CHRIST our LORD left us a good example in this case, of whom S. Thomas upon S. Matth. says, that of his three callings to his disciples one was, to familiarity. This being procur'd by following the customs and ceremonies of the country, way is thereby made to discourse of the grand affair of the soul, which is it that carries us to regions so far distant from our native soil.

2. The Cbinese ceremonies in point of civility are very numerous and diverse; they have several printed books that treat of this matter. I give it for granted that polite carriage and courtesy are virtues, and a part of prudence, on which subject you may read S. Thomas, 2. 2. q. 50. and in other places. The Cbinese books teach what we are to talk about with a husbandman, and how to converse with him, how with a student, a licentiate, a doctor, a little or great mandarin, what words are to be us'd in naming them, what must be said and discours'd at the first visit, what at the second, what questions are to be ask'd, how the upper hand is to be given or taken, where the visit is to be receiv'd, and where leave to be taken. They observe so many niceties in this point, that to say the truth, it requires a great deal of patience to be thoroughly inform'd in it, and much resignation to spend the time that is requisite in studying it. The fathers of the society have a book that handles this matter, and sets down the questions usually ask'd at visits; it came to my hand, and I and others made our advantage of it. One of the usual questions is, how many children have you, sir? I was inform'd that a father meeting with an eunuch ask'd him, How many children have you, sir? at which he was much out of countenance. It is a plain case that all questions don't suit with all sorts of persons. A mandarin ask'd one of my order, How many wives have you, sir? now the civil name for a wife and a church being the same, tho' the words going before vary, he understood the Cbinese inquir'd concerning churches, and he answer'd, three. Yet afterwards he found his mistake, and they came to a better understanding. There are very few but what have made false steps in this particular, nor is it to be admir'd, for it is well known, the Cbinese language has the most double meanings of any in the world. Lanzun.

3. That empire being of so great an extent, there is some tho' but little diversity in their ceremonies. In the northern provinces the right-hand is most honourable; in the southern the left. Among the Romans the left-side carried the preference; this same custom lasted some years in the eastern and western church. Hence it came that in the pontifical bulls S. Paul is on the right, and S. Peter on the left, as the more honourable place. The same was observ'd in the councils of Nice and Calcedon, as Spondanus writes ann. 525. num. 17. Ceremonies.

4. S. Thomas upon Galat. i. vers. 1. speaking of the place S. Paul has in the bulls, gives another reason for it, these are his words: In regard this present life is signify'd by the left, and the next by the right hand, for as much as this latter is spiritual and heavenly, and the other temporal, therefore Peter, who was call'd by CHRIST whilst he was yet in mortal flesh, is plac'd on the left-hand in the pope's bull, but Paul, who was call'd by CHRIST then glorify'd, is plac'd on the right. Modern authors give other reasons for it. In short, there is no matter, tho' never so minute, but what the Cbineses have writ upon, and practise punctually. What the missionaries most admire is, that the very same compliments which are us'd at court, are practis'd in the very words, not only in the cities and towns, but even in all the villages, hamlets and country-houses there Compliments.

Civility. there are throughout all the empire, so that it is all a mere court, and its inhabitants all courtiers. - The reason of it is, because all men study this point; and therefore it appears, and I have often seen it, that a child of eight years of age performs all points of civility as nicely as a man of fifty, which is very strange. Lads at nine or ten years of age observe the same method among themselves, as gravely as if they were well in years. Our Hugo Cardinalis asks, why Isaiab was so eloquent, and Amos on the contrary so blunt? He answers, that Isaiab had been a courtier, and man of fashion, as we call it, but Amos was a shepherd, bred in the field, and a mere countryman. This distinction is to be found in those countries and in Europe, but not in China. The mechanicks, plough-men, and porters, are all men of fashion, for they are all very full of civility, and express themselves in the same words, as they do in the capital cities.

Visits. 5. In visiting, too many ceremonies are us'd. In the first place they take red paper, of which there are several sorts, and abundance of every one of them; on it they write the name of him that is to make the visit in very mysterious characters. This paper is sent in to the person intended to be visited, by it he knows the quality of the person, and what respect is due to him, and either receives, or excuses himself for not admitting the visit. The refusing a visit is sometimes look'd upon as civility, and is answer'd by such another paper. The receiv'd custom of all China, is to carry a present, at least the first visit, at the new year, and every man's birth-day, there is no avoiding of it. The Persians observ'd the same towards their kings, according to Hamon on Mat. ii. epist. 17. and others: it was very usual among the ancients for the subjects to offer gifts to their kings; so Seneca, no man can salute the king of the Parthians without a present. He goes on talking of the inviolable law the Persians had to this effect.

Presents. 6. In China this custom is very ancient in regard to all the mandarines, the present is writ down on another red paper in very great order, and in choice characters. There must be at least four several things presented, and six, eight, twelve, or more to persons of greater quality. Having seen the paper, he receives the whole or part, and sends an answer suitable to what he takes. Afterwards he pays the visit, and returns a present of equal value. Sometimes they send it in silver, they are very careful that their present be curiously order'd and set out.

7. We, as being strangers, must of necessity present foreign things, and not such as the country affords, which requires some care and charge. This is in some measure unavoidable, both in regard it has been so establish'd, and to the business we have there in hand, which must of necessity be carry'd on after this manner, till it be resolv'd to do it as it was us'd in the primitive church, or as S. Francis Xaverius did in Japan. And if that vineyard were advanced and improv'd by this method, by silk clothes, sedans, and servants, the labour were not ill bestow'd; but our grief is the greater because we find no good comes of it. F. John Balat of the society, a very observant religious man, and laborious missionary, lamented the expence of many thousands of ducats his order had been at in Japan, Ethiopia, China, Tunquin, and Cocinchina, without any addition to the conversions of those parts. God grant a way may be made for all to go freely to labour in that vineyard; for if the presents are continued, and of such great value, as I have seen them, few orders will be able to maintain missionaries in those parts.

8. In the province of Canton there was a Christian, whose name was John Li Re Ming, in no greater circumstances than a mere bachelor, who told us, he had need of a thousand ducats a year to lay out only in presents.

9. There is no return for the birth-day present. There is not a Chinese tho' never so poor but keeps his birth-day, with all the greatness he is able. All the children, kindred, neighbours and friends, know every man's birth-day; a mandarin's is known by all under his jurisdiction; that of a viceroy, or supreme governor, by all the province. It is an ancient custom to celebrate birth-days, but not for private persons, nor is it so universal as in China. Pharaob celebrated his, and so did Herod. Constantine did the same, as Spondanus writes ann. 353. num. 11. By reason the Chinese are excessive in this practice, we might apply to them the words of S. Augustine, serm. 12. in verb. Dom. in Matth. Silly men rejoice at many birth-days of their own, and their children; O wise man, if your wine shrink in your vessel, you are troubled, you lose days and rejoice.

10. The Chinese out-do us in many particulars, one is, that there is never a one of them, great or small, rich or poor, but exactly remembers his age, the day and hour of his birth, and those of his parents, brothers and relations. The reason they give for it is very sufficient. One thing they say is, that they may rejoice for having liv'd to that age; the other, to be troubled because the day of their death draws every day nearer. Among us we shall find abundance of people, who never remember their age, either to give God thanks

11. Upon the day of the new moon, which is their most solemn festival, the petty kings and court-magistrates, with the emperor a happy year; the great mandarines send their deputies from the capital cities to do the same, and they repeat the ceremony on his birth, and wedding-day. Every province once in three years deputed some person to salute the emperor in its name.

apart.

12. The women keep their birth-days, but the men are never with the women in any rejoicing whatsoever.

Reconciliation-
ceremonies.

13. They have also particular ceremonies to make friends and be reconciled. One very much in use, is to take a cock, to draw blood from his comb, and the parties to drink it. This they perform in a temple with great solemnity. Another is to draw blood from their breasts, and each of them to drink the other's. The practice of the Egyptians was to tie the thumbs of those that were to be joyn'd in friendship; then they prick'd them with a lance, so both their bloods mix'd. That action was to signify that both their lives became as one. They gave it for granted that the life was in the blood.

14. In the time of the old law, according to S. Thomas in 1 Cor. xi. lect. 6. there was a custom not unlike that of China, as shall be explain'd more at large in another place: Among the ancients, says he, it was a custom to spill the blood of some creature offer'd in sacrifice, to confirm the contract, Gen. xxxi. Exod. xiv. A Lapid upon those places here quoted, treats of this matter, as does our Oeaster.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Marriage-Ceremonies.

1. THERE are whole books in China, and those no small ones, that treat of this subject, and an infinite number has been writ upon it. Before I enter upon the matter I will here set down the obstacles that make matrimony void, mention'd in their books. One is, if the woman be talkative, and given to prating; for this alone is sufficient to turn her out of doors, and dissolve the matrimony, tho' they have been long marry'd and have children. If this were allow'd in Europe, there's no doubt but many marriages would prove null, and it would be a great curb to restrain women from being so free of their tongue. The second is disobedience to the father and mother-in-law. In China the sons that are marry'd always live with their parents so that their wives are obedient, and live in great subjection to their father and mother-in-law. They endure much misery by this manner of life. The third is if they steal any thing in the house. The fourth, if a woman has the leprosy after she is marry'd. The fifth, if she proves barren. The sixth, if she is jealous; a great mortification to a woman that is naturally subject to this passion. The men in China are more subject to it than the women, for they always bear with the concubines living altogether, but these acknowledge the chief lady as their sovereign; and it being usual for one to be better beloved than the others, they never are without discontents amongst them, and some hang, others throw themselves into wells. When the first wife has no children, she herself courts the husband to take a concubine, and thus she secures herself from being turn'd off. Sarah gave the same advice to Abraham, Gen. vi. §. 2. but upon a more noble motive. Rachel did the same, Gen. xxx. Others deliver'd their women slaves to their husbands, and took the children to themselves, as the Chinese women do.

2. By reason of these impediments, and the great ease in parting with their wives, especially among the common sort of people, many of whom pawn them in time of need, and some lend them for a month, or more or less according as they can agree; it has been a great dispute, whether it is really a matrimony or not, as us'd in China. So that the missionaries of the society with good reason doubted, whether they might be allow'd as natural, or only as conditional contracts. They consulted their college at Rome upon it, and their divines resolv'd that the marriages of the men of learning were valid, but not those of the common sort. Another time they answer'd, that neither of them were good. I saw and read both their resolves in China. We again argued the case among us all, were divided, and could not agree.

3. After our disputes were over, I found the case argued in the Chinese philosophy, Tract. 52. fol. 2. the question is put, Whether the wife may be turn'd out of doors? The answer is, "That Zu Zu the son of their philosopher Confucius, turn'd his wife out several times, and that others whose names are there mention'd did the same. The people of this time, says the book, look upon it as an unseemly thing; the ancients did not so, and they were men of more sincerity and virtue. When a woman has any quality that is “ not good, it is but just and reasonable “ to turn her out of doors. It puts the “ question again: the ancients turn’d away “ their wives because the house was full of “ smoke, or because they frighted the dog “ with their disagreeable noise: was this “ reasonable? It answers, the ancients were “ hearty, sincere men void of malice (in all “ countries the ancients were best, for vice “ daily increases) they dissolv’d the knot “ of matrimony without a word speaking.”

 This was rather barbarity than sincerity.
 Men of honour and gravity turn’d away their wives for small faults, without expecting till they committed great ones. By this we may know how good those people were.
 Frighting the dog in the husband’s presence was a sufficient cause it seems to discard the wife; nor was it requisite to this effect that any person should be acquainted with her failing. The question is put further in the book. “ When the wife is “ turn’d off, can the husband marry an“ other? The answer is in the affirmative.
 “ and it further says, persons of note, such “ as the emperor, petty kings, and man- “ darines, who have concubines to attend, “ and offer sacrifice to them when dead, “ ought not to marry again, in them the “ knot is indissoluble, others may.

4. By what is here writ by the Chinese themselves, it is easy to infer what opinion they have of their marriages. The missioners of the society, tho’ there have been some differences among them, agree, that the marriages of Japan, Cochinchina, and other places, are not to be accounted as a natural contract. In the empire of Co- chinchina, as I was told by the Capucine fathers at Madrastra Patan, all men marry till they are weary of their wives, and for no longer. The same is done in the island of Madagascar; nay they go farther, for the women leave their husbands, whenso-ever the fancy takes them. In another place I mention the Jews divorce, upon which the reader may see Silveira, tom.
 VI. pag. 161. n. 51. and pag. 162. n. 58.

 Marrying sisters.

5. Peter de Morales Pimentia, an inhabitant of Macao, and solicitor for that city in their affairs of Goa, told me before a great deal of company, on the 16th of Feb.
an. 1660, that a missionary of Cochinchina, whom he nam’d, gave a Christian Japanese a dispensation to marry his own sister. She died after the marriage was consummated, and he again granted the man a dispensation to marry another sister. This case shall be handled in the second tome. The greatest difficulty is, allowing there may be a dispensation in this case, as some will have it their way, whether there was sufficient cause to use that power with a new NAVA- convert, shop-keeper; especially among the RETTE.

 Christians and infidels of Macao who were all scandaliz’d at it. These sort of maririages are us’d in Siam, that king is mar-ry’d to his sister. Other nations have practis’d the same.

6. The marriages of the Tartars now possessing Cbina are as disputable as the others. I desir’d this case might be argu’d in our disputes; they would not consent to it, the reason I know not. What we know is, that the emperor, father to him now reigning, put away his first wife, and sent her into her country when she was big with child. In the year 1668, the two fathers who remain’d in the imperial city, sent us an account by letter, that a Tartar man and woman, who were husband and wife, parted, and both of them marry’d again. After this they told me F. John Adamus was of opinion the marriages of that nation were not valid; and that writing to those of his society, he said, that the Tartars marry’d till they had a mind to take another wife; and that great men us’d to change wives, and marry one another’s. It appears these are conditional marriages, contracted after the manner of the country, under a condition which is directly opposite to the very being of matrimony.

7. F. Torrente a jesuit, talking of Tun- quin, told me, that he going to hear the confession of a new made Christian, was inform’d by others, that his wife who was a Christian having left him, he had marry’d another Christian woman. The father told him he could not absolve him. The man reply’d, father N. absolves me, your reverence may do so too. Then do you confess to him, said the father, for I will not absolve you. This Christian went with the father to the imperial city, where the other father was, whom F. Torrente acquainted with what had pass’d between him and that Christian, and why he did not absolve him. The other father answer’d, your reverence may hear his confession, and leave him in his simplicity. That is no simplicity, but an error, reply’d F. Tor- rente, and I will not hear his confession. I commended F. Torrente for this action, and his behaviour in this case.

8. He told me further, that the French missionary who was at Tunquin, had sent an account to one of his order how all the Christians told him, that when the fathers of the society were in that kingdom, they allow’d the Christians who were there mar-ry’d to infidel women to part from them, and marry Christians. Father Torrente told me, all have not permitted it, some have.
 If the marriages of that nation were void, there is no difficulty in the case.

NAVA- 9. F. Adrian Grelon also told us, that RETTE. those of his order in France were once of the opinion, that the French soldiers, who were marry'd in their own country, going over to New France, might marry there again, causa conservandæ continentiæ, in order to live continent. It is necessary to mention all these particulars, that the learned may give their sense upon it, the most material points shall be handled in tom. II. Let us proceed: the Chinese ascribe the having of children to the obedience they owe to their parents; as if this were a thing in their power, or that depended on them. They ground this opinion upon a sentence of their second philosopher Meng Zu, who left it written, that the greatest sin of disobedience, is to want children. (I suppose he means the punishment of the sin.) The Chinese are so strongly grounded in this doctrine, that because of it they receive concubines, some that they may have children, others that they may have more. But in truth the main drift is to satisfy their loose appetites. The petty king that liv'd in Canton, as the people there said, had above sixty sons. How many his concubines were I know not, there is no number assign'd, every one takes as many as he can keep. Sure this petty king was very obedient to his parents. This error is sufficiently impugned in our books, and they like the reasons, but improve little upon them.

Polygamy.

Sodomy.

10. Discoursing one day with a considerable mandarin upon this subject, he told me, he had ever thought it most consonant to reason, to have but one wife, which he had ever observ'd. One of the greatest obstacles to the conversion of those people, is the liberty they allow themselves of keeping concubines. The fathers of the society told me, that one of their order, for the removing of this impediment, had propos'd, his holiness should be mov'd to grant a dispensation to the Chinese Christians to have several wives. Divines and casuists must resolve whether this be practicable. More shall be said of this matter in the second tome. See A Lapide in Gen. xvi. §. 1. where he follows the common receiv'd opinion with S. Thomas. Every turn they tell us, by these and other means the way to their conversion is made easier; God grant it be not rather obstructed.

11. Sodomy is frequent in China, yet not so much as in Japan, as I have been inform'd. There have been other nations in the world that did not look upon this hellish vice as any sin. So says S. Thomas, lib. II. q. 94. art. 6. the people of Crete were of this opinion. The Romans so far countenanced it, that they had publick stews of this sort, which the emperor Alex- ander, son to Manea, who had been Origen's disciple, could not suppress. The Israelites were infected with this vice, Asa 1 Kings xv. banish'd it. According to S. Thomas, in prim. ad Rom. lect. 8. this vice had its beginning with idolatry in the time of Abraham. Those who look'd upon it as no sin, were such as believ'd that nothing is naturally just, and of consequence can be unjust, but is only so by the obligation of a human law; and by this rule no sin was regarded, as being against GOD, Arist. 5. Ethic. So it was with other vices, to which the Chinese are equally addicted. It is said of Jason in the second chapter of the first book of Maccabees, he presum'd to place the chief of the youth in stews under the very castle.

12. The unhappy and unfortunate prince Carrin Patin Gaola drove these wicked people, who went in womens clothes, as they do at this time in the kingdom of Caile, from Macassar. In the time of the Chinese emperors, there were publick stews of boys in the imperial city Pequin. The Tartar suppress it, yet it continues still at Jang Cbeu; they go gay, but dress like other men. They don't marry, as those do I saw at Caile, sixty leagues from Macassar, in the same island, where they told me, there were men would rather chuse to marry those monsters than women. Good GOD, in what darkness they live who know thee not! And how unthankful are we, who only through thy mercy know thee, for this benefit!

13. We know there have been men so brutal, as to place their ultimate felicity in sensuality. Aristippus was one of them. The Nicolaists follow'd the same maxim, according to Spondanus, an. 68. n. 5. and many at this time are of the same opinion, most visibly those of the kingdom of Champa, situate betwixt Camboja and Cochinchina. Those people wear the figures of the secret parts about their necks, as singular relicks, which they worship and adore.

14. Leaving aside these things and such like, which may make known to us the miserable state of man, and the wretched condition he falls into, when the supernatural light fails him, let us proceed upon the subject of this chapter. I doubt not but I have deviated too much, but not upon vain and frivolous things, so that I am the more excusable.

15. The marriage-ceremonies are too many and impertinent, if perform'd according to the book which is a ritual, call'd kia li, order'd by the emperor to be kept throughout the whole empire. I must in the first place lay it down as a certainty, that from all antiquity in China no son ever did, or hereafter will marry without the consent of his parents. We see the contrary trary daily among stanch Christians. In the next place, I give this for a general rule, that the bride and bridegroom have never spoke to, or so much as seen one another till they meet in the house where they are to live together. These things never fail, unless it be among some poor peasants. It is also very usual for the parents to make matches for their children whilst they are yet very young; nay sometimes when the wives are with child they agree, if they prove boy and girl, they shall marry. This they call chi so, which signifies, to mark out bellies. The same custom is us'd in Narvinga, as I was told at Patalon.

Marriage of dead.

16. In the province of Xan Si they have a ridiculous custom, which is to marry dead folks. F. Michael Trigaucius a jesuit, who liv'd several years in that province, told it us whilst we were confin'd. It falls out that one man's son, and another's daughter die. Whilst the coffins are in the house (and they use to keep them two or three years or longer) the parents agree to marry them; they send the usual presents as if they were alive with much ceremony and musick. After this they put together the two coffins, keep the wedding-dinner before them, and lastly, they lay them both into one tomb. The parents from this time are lookt upon not only as friends, but relations, as they would have been had their children been marry'd living.

Marriage-ceremonies.

17. The first thing they do, they go to the temple of their ancestors, there they acquaint them particularly, how such a one their grandson of such an age, designs to marry N. &c. therefore they beg their assistance for the performance of it. The wife's parents do the same. In China, the Philippine islands, and other kingdoms, the husband brings a portion to his wife, which her parents keep. But sometimes they give the daughter part of it. Lycurgus king of Macedon ordain'd that women should marry without any portion: That wives should not be chosen for money. S. Thomas speaks of it, Opusc. de Reg. Princ. This was very convenient, more shall be said of it in another place. When the bridegroom's parents send the portion, it is carry'd in the greatest state they possibly can. Before it goes the musick, then follow the tables each carry'd by four men, in a very decent manner. Upon one of them are pieces of silk, pieces of cotton on another, fruit on a third; meat, dainties, and plate on a fourth. The shew and noise is much more than the substance.

This is buying of them. See A Lapide in Gen. xxix. ver. 18. & in Exod. iv. 10. 25.

18. On the 28th of August, whilst we were still all of us in the imperial city, the emperor sent the dowry and present to the daughter of one of the four governors, whom he afterwards marry'd. He sent her an hundred tables full of several things, and NAVAs sorts of meat, two thousand ducats in pigs RETTE. of silver, one thousand in gold, one hundred pieces of silk of several colours, with silver and gold flowers, one hundred of cotton. This is their custom, and I don't question but he was able to have sent her twenty or thirty millions.

19. They make choice of a fortunate and lucky day to send the portion, and be marry'd on. The president of the college of mathematicks has the care of appointing these days, not only for marriages, but for every thing they take in hand. F. John Adamus of the society of Jesus, held his Missioners. employment a long while; several stories went about among those of his order concerning this matter. It shall be handled in another place, and we will shew how the good father clear'd himself from the imputation.

20. Having notify'd the day the marriage is to be solemniz'd on, their ancestors departed, the bridegroom's parents send a kinsman, or some grave person, to conduct the bride. They carry a close sedan, with flags, squibs, musick, and brags-basons, more or less in number according to the quality of them both. Being come to the bride's house, where she is ready drest, expecting that time, she takes leave of her kindred; her parents give her good advice (which I writ at Rome, where I translated much relating to this subject, and left it with the holy congregation de propaganda fide) she gets into the sedan, where she finds a little rice, wheat, and other grain, to signify that the bride carries along with her abundance of goods; and that her husband's estate and income shall increase by her going to him. As the bride goes into the chair, they usually break an egg (this ceremony is not set down in the ritual) to signify that she shall be fruitful. In my time a Christian father to one that was going to be marry'd, seeing this ceremony performed, in a passion threw the egg against the wall, saying, Why is my daughter a hen that she should lay eggs?

21. The bride being come to the bridegroom's house, which is richly adorn'd and set out, the father and mother-in-law receive her with all possible state and kindness. Then they perform the obeysances, the bride and the bridegroom in the court make theirs to heaven and earth, and then to their kindred and acquaintance. Next follow the entertainments. The men eat in the forepart of the house, the women in the inner. At night they convey the bride into the bridegroom's chamber, as the Spartans and others us'd to do, according to A Lapide in Gen. xxix. v. 23. On the table she finds sizers, thread, cotton, and

NAVA- other things, which is to denote to her that RETTE. she goes to work, and not to be idle. An excellent practice, and good advice. The Romans when they carry'd the bride with great solemnity to the bridegroom's house, took along with her a spindle, a distaff, flax or wool, to the same intent as the Cbineses do, A Lapide in Gen. xxxiv. v. 1. The father-in-law that day sees his daughter-in-law, and never sees her face again till she is dead, if she happens to die before him. This seems incredible, it being well known they live in the same house; but it is very certain, and the greatest persons are most exact in observing it. In small villages perhaps they are not so nice. It is never to be suppos'd that the father-in-law sets his foot into the daughter-in-law's chamber. If ever the daughter-in-law goes abroad, the father-in-law hides himself, or goes out that he may not see her.

 retired-
 rejs.

22. All relations are not allow'd to talk with a woman alone; it is allow'd to cousins that are younger than they, but not to those that are elder. Those that are younger, they say, will not presume to be bold with them; but those that are elder, may perhaps take the advantage of their superiority, and pretend to that which is not just or lawful. Sometimes in the year the wives go out to visit their parents, this is the extent of their divertisements and recreations. When they perceive themselves to be with child, they repair to the temple of their ancestors, acquaint them with their condition, and beg their assistance in order to a good delivery. After they are brought to bed, they return to the same temple to give thanks for their happy delivery, and beg of them to keep and preserve the child. Some time after that, they carry the child, and present it in the same temple, thanking the dead for having preserv'd it till then, and desiring they will prolong its life, and bring it to age of maturity. More shall be said on this subject in the second tome. Hence we may gather whether the Cbineses ask any thing of the dead, or not. F. de Angelis was much in the right in this point; he says in his history, that the Cbineses adore their dead; whoever sent him that account to Lisbon, knew it very well. Much shall be said of this matter hereafter, and I shall give some hints in the following chapter, thus much may suffice for this.

C H A P. VIII.

Of some Ceremonies the Cbineses use with their dead.

1. THE rites and ceremonies the Cbineses use towards their dead, are most exactly set down in the book quoted in the last chapter, and in other classick authors. Neither do these books, nor I neither, speak of the ceremonies the other sects have brought up, but of those peculiar to the learned sect, tho' it be of no great consequence if they should be all mix'd here together. However I will endeavour to distinguish those belonging to the bonzes for the more clearness.

When hang becomes to accompany
 their dead
 husbands.

2. I must observe in the first place, that it is the custom of the Tartars, when one of them dies, that one of his wives must hang her self to bear him company in that journey. In the year 1668, a Tartar of note dy'd in the imperial city, a concubine of seventeen years of age was to hang her self to bear him company. She was well born, and had good relations, her kindred were much troubled to lose her, and without doubt she was more concern'd her self.
 They presented a petition to the emperor, begging of him that he would dispense with that custom receiv'd and establish'd among his nation. The emperor did it to the purpose, for he commanded that custom should be no longer in force; so that it was quite abolish'd and abrogated.

3. The Cbineses have the same custom,

2

but it is not common, nor approv'd and receiv'd by their philosopher. In our time the viceroy of Canton dy'd, some said he poison'd himself; being near his death, he call'd the concubine he lov'd best, and putting her in mind of the love he had bore her, desir'd she would bear him company. She gave him a promise, and as soon as he dy'd, hang'd her self. This is much us'd in India, as I will write in another place.

4. Among the Cbineses it is very usual, when the sick person is in danger, to call the bonzes to pray for him, or her; they come with little basons, small bells, and other instruments they use, and make so great a noise as might hasten his death.
 Nevertheless they confess that diverts them, and eases their distemper. If the disease increase, they say his soul is gone out; and therefore three or four of them go abroad in the close of the evening with a large bason, a drum, and a trumpet, and walk about hastily, seeking that wandring stray soul. They make a little stop at the crossing of streets, play on their instruments, and then go on. I saw it several times, for they always stop'd by my church, because it was the corner of a street; but I could never hear they found what they look'd for. The bonzes use to go into the fields fields upon the same errand; they walk about singing, praying, and sounding their instruments, among the bushes and brambles, turning on all sides; and when they find some humble bee, or great wasp, they say it is the soul of the dying person. They carry it safe, and with a great deal of noise and joy, to the sick man's house. I have been told they put it into his mouth; I suppose they pretend so to do, I never saw it, but have heard it several times.

5. According to the Chinese ritual, when a man is ready to die, they take him out of his bed and lay him on the ground, that he may there end his days; for their philosophy teaches, that since he began to live on earth, it is reasonable he should end his life there. Formerly, as soon as ever the child was born they laid it on the ground, according to that of Solomon, Wisd. vii. I being born, fell on the earth. Philo Jud. lib. VI. de opific. says, it was done that the child by that exterior show might own it self the product of the earth, and acknowledge it as its mother, from whom it had receiv'd its first being. Laertius, lib. VI. says, It was to express how it was to return to earth, and that the same earth should be its tomb; She is the universal parent, and truly our sepulchre. Which same thing S. Bernard seems to imply, serm. de S. Mart. On the earth we have our rise, on the earth we die. This is the custom of the Chinese at this day.

Funeral rites.

6. As soon as he is dead they put a little stick into his mouth that it may not close; we shall presently shew the reason of it. This done, one of the family, with the dead man's garment in his hand, gets at the top of the ridge of the house, and stretching out the garment, calls aloud on the dead person's soul, desiring and intreating it to return to the body. If the person departed be a man, he calls the soul by his name; if a woman, he uses the surname, not the proper name. Then he comes down, and stretching out the garment, spreads it over the dead body, expecting three days to see whether it rises again. If he does not come to life, and I never heard of any that did, tho' to make good their ritual they might have feign'd it; then they go about putting him into the coffin. This ceremony is very antient, it is mention'd not only in their philosophy, but in Confucius his books, which they call kai ju. It wants not for some to give it a good word among the missionaries, as shall be said in its place. It is kept and observ'd to this day; but in some places they perform it at the door of the house.

7. Next they put into his mouth gold and silver coin, (to this intent they keep it open) rice, wheat, and some other small things. Rich and mighty men put in pearls. NAVA-RETTE. This ceremony, as well as the others, is in their books and rituals we have spoke of. They dress him in his best clothes, which they keep carefully whilst living against they are dead; the devil takes them very richly and warmly clad. In washing them they use strange ceremonies before they put them into the coffin: there is no body but Coffins. has one, and there are some of delicate woods, of twelve, twenty, fifty, a hundred ducats a piece, or more. In every city and town there are many coffin-shops, where they are to be found of all sizes. The great mandarines sometimes shew their charity in giving a dozen or twenty to poor people. There are very many who whilst they are yet living, endeavour to get a coffin, and make a treat the day it comes home. They keep it in sight for several years, and some now and then use to go into it, yet they do not mend their life. It is a custom or law for the emperor to have his coffin some time in the palace. The Tartars, people of Cambosa, and Eastern-Indians, bury the bodies, and keep the ashes. If any poor Chinese happen to have no coffin, they do the same by him. In the coffin they lay a small quilt, bolster and pillows, coals, and wicks for lamps, which Funeral rites. are there made of rushes; all these things serve to suck up the moisture of the carcase: they also put in sizers to pare their nails. Before the Tartars time they put in combs to comb their hair: since they brought them to cut off their hair they have no need of a comb, and therefore leave it out at present. F. Brancato a jesuit told me this; and from this change I deduced this argument: if they have left off putting the comb into the coffin, because they have lost their hair, it follows they thought there was some mystery in it. They place the parings of the nails they cut off from the deceas'd as soon as expir'd, in little purses in the four corners; then they cast their lots, and lay in the body with great shouts and cries.

8. Before they bewail the dead, they place a porringer in the middle of the room where the coffin is; having perform'd some ceremonies, they break it, saying, they open the gates of heaven, and then begin the lamentations; and if what the bonzes say were true, then their pleasure and joy ought to commence. Having nail'd up the coffin, which is done with abundance of ceremonies, they make a sort of an altar on it, and in the midst of it, in a small tabernacle they place the name of the party deceas'd, adorn'd with candles, burning perfumes and flowers; this shall be farther explain'd in another place. There is a great deal goes to the condoling; but after it they go where the dead body is, kneel down

NAVA- down before the coffin, and strike their RETTE heads against the ground with much devotion and tokens of sorrow. The Franciscan fathers and we could never condescend to do this ceremony. F. Antony de Gourvea, superior of the missionaries of the society, told me in the province of Canton, once I did it; that was the only time, I never would repeat it. Another of the society writ to ours thus; My hair stands an end to think that a priest of the true God should prostrate himself at the feet of a heathen carcase, whose soul I am positively assur'd is burning in hell; and this just after saying mass, when I believe the sacramental species were still in his breast. I heard of F. Julius Alein, that being reprov'd by a Christian of ours for performing the said ceremony, he again turn'd over the Chinese books, and not liking it, he sold the clothes he had for that purpose, never after daring to practise it.

9. And tho' it be true that most of the society have condescended to practise this ceremony, yet the reasons we have alledg'd are sufficient to prevail with us not to follow them, being grounded on the doctrine of the most learned Suarez, lib. II. cont.
 reg. Ang. cap. 5. num. 4. We may give civil worship, says he, to our departed benefac- tors, or renowned men, tho' we are not as-sur'd of their salvation, at least whilst it is not demonstrable that they are damn'd. I know Sanchez has the contrary, as I shall say in another place, which concerns me but little, because he speaks not to a case under those circumstances we write of. Nor is it to me that there are Christians, who give a more than civil honour to a dead elephant, and who think it may be done to a dog, cat, or other things, as shall be said in its place, for all this includes no small difficulties.

Funeral
rites.

10. As soon as any person is dead, the next thing is to make a stick, which they call Cbung; the design of it is, that the soul may have something to rest or kneel upon.
 The rituals, and books of Confucius above quoted mention it. This staff is hung in the temples of the dead. They also make those tablets, which we call of the dead.
 These are more mysterious; the Chinese call them the thrones and seats of the soul.
 This point has been three times sent up to Rome, and every time been condemn'd there, except only when one represented it much otherwise than indeed it was. I shall speak of them more at large in the second tome.
 It cannot be deny'd neither, but that the Chinese suppose the souls of their deceased friends to be there, and that they are fed and maintain'd by the steam of those things they leave there, since our adversaries own it, as shall be made out.

2

11. Funerals are attended with musick, and much magnificence. The Jews us'd musick at theirs, as Josephus, cap. xv. writes: so S. Mat. cap. ix. S. Mar. cap. 15.
 and S. Luc. cap. viii. speaking of the daughter of the ruler of the synagogue; but they took it from the Gentiles according to Spon- danus, an. 32. num. 18. And it seems very needless, according to Ecclus. cap. xxii. v. 6.
Musick among mourning is like a troublesome relation. True it is, Manocius and A La- pide write, it was doleful musick.

12. The bonzes go along with several instruments. Being come to the tomb, they offer sacrifice to the spirit of that place, begging of it to be kind to the new comer.
 I should be glad F. Antony de Gourvea's history were publish'd, that what I write might be seen there. After the funeral, they offer before the image of the dead person, and his tablet, for several months, a certain number of times every month, and every day flesh, rice, herbs, fruit, broth, and such like things. And F. Gourvea says, the Chinese believe the souls of the departed come thither to eat. We ever were of this opinion, for we have read it in the Chinese books, and had it from their mouths.
 I afterwards read the same in the manuscripts of others of the society, as I shall mention in its place.

13. Mourning is mightily observ'd in Chi- na, for parents it certainly lasts three years; for children, cousins, &c. longer or shorter according to the nearness of the relation, which is all ordain'd and settled in their rituals, and there is no man but what observes it with the greatest nicety. When a father or mother dies, if one or more of the sons are mandarines, tho' he be a counsellor of state, or general of any province, and live very far from home (for no man can be a mandarin in his own province, lest the love of his country, kindred or friends, should weigh more with him than justice) they presently acquaint him with it, and prefer a petition at court, begging leave for him to go home and lament his father's death. So he quits his charge, and for those three years does nothing but stay at home to perform the duty of the mourning. The three years expir'd, they give him another employment, but sometimes he stays for it. Corn. à Lapide speaks of this point on Ezek. i. §. 1. but it must be understood as has been said already, and as Trigaucius writes in his history. The Tartar dispenses with some. In my time he dis-pens'd with the supreme government of Canton; 'tis true, the dispensation cost him thirty thousand ducats. The three years mourning was chang'd for one month's, and he did it to keep his post, which is worth to him above three hundred thousand ducats

Bar,
place.

ducats a year besides his salary, and this without the oppression I have seen in other places.

14. All men were oblig'd to wear three years mourning when the emperor dies; but of late this has been chang'd into a few days. I was there at the time of the mourning for the father of him now reigning, but cannot well remember whether it lasted four or five days. During these days the mandarines of every town, city, and metropolis meet in some public place, where they fast, weep, and perform the ceremonies usual when a dead body is present. I am doubtful whether it be allowable for the Christian mandarines to keep those fasts. In its proper place we shall speak of what has been decreed in this case.

rites.

15. If the dead man was a person of note, the bonzes make great processions, the mourners follow them with candles, and burning sweats in their hands; they offer sacrifices at certain distances, and perform the obsequies, in which they burn statues of men, women, horses, saddles, other things, and abundance of paper-money. All which things they believe in the next life are converted into real ones, for the use of the party deceas'd. But the Cbineses kill no human creature to bear the dead-company, as I have already observ'd, whoever writ the contrary in Europe, was, or would be deceiv'd.

16. In case the soul should go to hell, the bonzes have found out ways and means to fetch it out from thence. They have also found the way of bulls of plenary indulgences, and bulls for the dead, some of them cost fifty ducats. How well S. Thomas expresses himself upon S. Matth. chap. v. telling us the devil still continues in his first design of aspiring to appear like to God. This is palpably evident in Cbina. In Muscovy it is the custom to put a note into the dead man's hand, containing, that the bearer was a Muscovite, kept his faith, and dy'd in it. This they send to S. Peter, upon sight whereof, say they, he presently gives them free admittance into heaven, and assigns them a better place than he does to Roman catholicks.

17. The Moors of Macassar usually have four boys very well clad at the four corners of the bier, which is very large. Every one of them carries a fan, and fans the dead body, which is to cool the soul, because of the great heat it endures in the other world. This I my self have seen.

Burying
places.

18. I have before taken notice that all the Cbineses are bury'd without the towns, a custom, other heathens have observ'd, NAVARRETTE and so did the Jews, as says Corn. à Lapid in Num. xxix. v. 16. and on St. Luke, chap. vii. v. 12. I find some, and particularly Spondanus, abhor the custom of Christians of burying in the churches, because of the ill vapours may rise thro' the earth and be infectious, but it would be in vain now to persuade the contrary.

19. The Cbineses are extraordinary careful of keeping their sepulchers clean, and pulling up any weeds that grow about them. They often visit them, weep, offer meat, and burn seal'd paper. F. Gouvea in his history positively affirms, that the Cbineses believe the souls are near about their sepulchers. The antient Europeans were of the same opinion. Lactan. lib. II. de orig. error. says it. As the multitude believes the souls of the dead walk about the sepulchers, and relicks of their bodies, &c. There were three several opinions in those times concerning the soul, says the same author, cap. 16. de opific. Dei. Some thought the blood was the soul, because when that fail'd, man dy'd. Others said the soul was the fire, Because whilst the soul is present, the body is warm, when departed, it grows cold. Others, and among them Varro, said it was air. This is the opinion of the Cbineses, who with their philosopher allot a very refin'd slender air, of which they say the soul is form'd. They also affirm it is a celestial part belonging to heat, in which particular the Cbineses close with both the opinions we have mention'd. This shall be further explain'd in another place. Faustus made our soul corporeal, this suits with what has been said; but he maintain'd another folly, which in substance is much the same the Cbineses hold, and said, There was nothing incorporeal among creatures. So writes Spondanus, an. 520. tom. 2. On the day of the new moon is their commemoration of the dead, and so is the winter solstice. The kindred meet in the temple of their fore-fathers in their best apparel; there making many genuflexions, they offer fundry sorts of meats and drinks; and prayers and petitions are made directly and immediately to those dead persons. What has been said may suffice for a general information as to these affairs. What remains shall be made out in its place, and the principal points wherein the missioners disagree, shall be declar'd. I must in this place acquaint the reader, that in Cbina the mourning is white, and not black. So it was in Spain before the death of Prince John, as says F. Mariana.

Mourning.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Sects, Temples, Fasts, and other Particulars of China.

NAVA- I. THO there be three thousand sects RETTE. in Cbina, yet all of them being deriv'd from three, and reducible to them; to all the temples and other things pertaining to them, are reduced to the same originals.

Seas three thousand.

2. The principal, ancientest, and most honourable sect is that of the men of learning. Some missioners have said, the Cbineses have much of the Jews; and one more curious than the rest took notice, that this nation has above forty Jewish ceremonies. Certain it is, the Jews came into that nation many ages since, tho' there are some that deny it; it is no less certain that Cbina is much ancienter than the dispersion of the ten tribes, that nobody may say Cbina was peopled by the two tribes that were left. This learned sect professes down-right atheism, as shall be prov'd at large in its proper place. This is made out by the gravest, and most learned missioners of the society, whom their historian father Lucena follows, and by the Cbinese doctors themselves, who, as men learned in their own doctrine, are better judges of the sense of their books than the Europeans, more skilful and unbiass'd, and ought to be of more reputation in their own affairs than strangers; unless perhaps any one without regard to demonstration, will give more credit to his own imaginations than to the known truth. There were some in the province of Canton translating a Cbinese book, and father Gouvea superior of their society, said to me, they translate and write what they fancy and dream. It is therefore certain, that in what relates to Cbina, we are to follow the opinion and judgment of the Cbinese doctors. Therefore S. Thomas said on Jobn vii. lect. 2. It is to be allowed that his judgment is to be stood by, who is expert in any art, to prove whether a man be good at that art; as for example, his judgment is to be taken who is skilful in the French tongue, to know whether another speaks French well. And that to be judge in this affair, he must lay aside passion, envy, hatred, and affection. The learned Cbineses outdo us in all things.

Literati, Atheisti.

3. This is also grounded on the words of Lactantius de fals. relig. lib. I. cap. 2. Whom then shall we believe if we do not give credit to those that praise? he that believes these lies, let him produce other authors for us to credit, who may instruct us who these gods are, &c. If we do not believe the learned Cbinese, who makes such account of his sect, that he extols it above the skies, will it be fit to give credit to one that came but the other day into Cbina, and expounds things contrary to the sense of the classick doctors of the nation, and contrary to all the ancients of his own order and religion? there is no doubt but this would be a great oversight. In reference to this, it was daily said during our confinement, that in the matter of explicating Cbinese characters, more regard is to be had to one Cbinese, than to thirty missioners. Allowing this for granted, which is very useful, I proceed.

4. Doctor Michael, as F. Nicholas Len gobardo a jesuit writes, very much lamented, that the Cbinese learned men had been defective in their sect, in not inventing some reward, and punishment after death, for keeping the people more in awe.

5. Euripides in Plut. de placit. lib. I. cap. 7. says, It is a fiction of legislators to pretend some deity governs the globe of the earth to endeavour thereby to keep the people in awe. Seneca 2. Nat. quæst. lib. XLII. expresses it better and more fully, where the reader may see it. The ancients and other sectaries of Cbina observ'd this method, only the learned men of that empire were deficient in this point.

6. The learned sect talks too much of the temporal reward and punishment. The temples properly belonging to it, are those they dedicate to their dead, which was begun by the emperor Xun, who is of great antiquity, and very renown'd in that nation. The philosopher Confucius, of whom the Cbineses say (as the Holy Ghost said of Solomon) that there never was before, nor will be after him so wise a man, has temples dedicated to him in all towns and cities. Ching Hoang, that is, as vulgarly expounded, the tutelar genius, has temples throughout the empire. The bachelors adore a star, which they call Vuen Chang Sing. The licentiates worship the north, and call it Kuei Sing. The magistrates give the same honour to Confucius. There are many other temples belonging to the learned sect; some of them shall be taken notice of as occasion serves. The temples dedicated to the spirit of fire, to the god of the waters, whose name is Lung Vuang, are common to all. The soldiers have their god Mars.

7. The second sect is call'd Tao, professes much of art-magick, is properly Cbinese, and as ancient as the former. They report of its founder, that he was born grey, and sixty three years of age. His mother was deliver'd of him at her side, and dy'd in child-bed. This somewhat resembles what

what Henricus Summalix in his Paradisus anima, quotes out of Albertus Magnus, cap. 5. For these reasons the Cbineses call that man Lao Zu, that is, old son. He liv'd in the time of Confucius, and is commended by him in the books call'd Kia Ju. This alone might suffice to make some men less admire Confucius. This sect has very many temples throughout all Cbina, they do not profess such poverty as others do; some of them marry, others have coadjutors, who succeed them in their religious preferments. They let their beards grow, and in processions wear copes of the same make as are us'd in the catholick church. What father de Angelis writes, viz. that the provincials of this sect are carry'd in chairs of ivory and gold, is a mere invention. They have a great superior, in the nature of a general, formerly he went in the apparel of a mandarin, at present he has the privilege of such a one, and no more.

Foe, or sect of idols of India.

8. The third sect is call'd Foe; we name it the sect of the idols of India. It was brought into Cbina about sixty years after the birth of our Saviour. The founder of it his name was Xe Kia, he was born very many years before. This curs'd sect has so spread, that it certainly far exceeds the Mabometan. From India it pierc'd as far as Japan, without leaving any island or part of the continent all that way exempt from it. This hellish infection has seiz'd the Laos, Lequios, Tibet, both Tartaries, Siam, Camboxa, Cochinchina, Tunquin, and all the Archipelago of St. Lazarus. The first principle they assign and know does not go beyond the materia prima, wherein it agrees with the two former, tho' it differ in the names and terms. This is the opinion of most solid missionaries, of the Cbinese doctors, and of their classick authors, of which more in its proper place. For this reason 126 years ago, there started up a sect of the legislators we have spoken of uniting them all, and making one of the three. This last sect has its temples, on whose altars they place the three accursed sectaries afore mention'd. The worst of it is, that nine years since a Christian at court publish'd a book in which he parallels and calls our holy religion by the same name with all those three we speak of.

Sect of the Legislators.

Bonzes.

9. There are innumerable temples of the third sect, all very stately, clean, and neat; some have five hundred, some eight hundred, and some a thousand bonzes. These are very much given to praying, in some places they pray continually day and night. They have also their places of devotion on mountains, in woods and vallies, whither infinite numbers of people resort at certain times, and to say the truth with more devotion, modesty, and decency, than is seen in our parts. There are every where hermitages with hermits, as well on mountains, as in vallies, and most uncouth places. There are also in lonesome places houses to breed up novices, where they live mighty retired. For food as long as they live they are forbid flesh, whitemeats, and fish, also wine; they live upon nothing but rice, bread, herbs, and fruit. An infinite number of their laity as well men as women keep this fast, many of them handicrafts, labourers and sailors, who never break it either on account of hard labour, sickness, or age.

RETTE.
Hermits.

Abstinence.

10. It is truly amazing to hear what accounts they give of the lives of some of them, and of those of Camboxa and Siam; the very fathers of the desarts seem to fall short of them; and for abstinence it may be said they outdo that of other ancients mention'd by Henricus Summalix in the fifth and seventh chapters of Paradisus anima of B. Albertus, and of others Corn. à Lapide on Gen. ix. 21. speaks of.

11. Among the rest of the famous idols of Foe's sect, there is a woman they call Kuon In Pu Sa. Some say she was daughter to a king of India: Others that she was a Cbinese maid, who liv'd on the mountains near the city Macao. Doctor Paul a Cbinese put it out in print that she is our blessed Lady; the ground for his opinion he says is, that the image has remain'd there ever since the preachers out of Syria preach'd the gospel in that empire. When they were all dead, the Cbineses made an idol of it. It is possible it might be so, but very able missionaries of the society make a doubt of it, and they like that book as ill as I do. The most likely, as the Christian men of learning make out, is that there never was any such woman, but it is a fiction. The meaning of her name is, that she sees the wants of those that bear devotion to her a thousand leagues off; that she hears their prayers at the same distance, and most readily supplies them. They represent her with a great many hands, one image of her in Canton has twenty four to signify the great favours she does, and her extraordinary liberality. The multitude have a great deal of devotion to this monster.

Kuon In Pu Sa.

12. This same sect has another idol they call San Pao, it consists of three equal in all respects. Doctor Paul above mention'd sets it down as an emblem of the blessed Trinity, which he might as well let alone. F. de Angelis a Portuguese mentions these two things, and enlarges upon them too much without any reason.

13. The same sect uses holy, or rather curf'd water, and other things, which doctor Paul says the bonzes took from the law of God which formerly flourish'd in that kingdom.

NAVA-kingdom. Other heathens used it, as says RETTE. à Lapide on Num. xix. 11. There are also temples to which men and women resort to beg children. In these temples there are usually many wooden and earthen little boys, without their privy parts; the reason is, because the women when they resort thither to perform their devotions in order to obtain children, take these boys in their hands and bite off those parts and eat them. Some keep them as relicks.

14. In the kingdom of Tibet, where the pope of that part of the world resides, whom they call the great Ramafel, there are the nastiest relicks that can be expressed. That man is held in such mighty veneration, that all his excrements great or small are honoured as relicks. In China they are valued at a high rate; the devil treats his people like filthy swine. F. Kircher pag. 51. writes some things which require more proof: 'tis a mere story that F. Adamus hindered the emperor of China from going forth to meet the great Ramafel, or Lamasse; nor was the Tartar emperor of China in the year twenty nine. F. Adamus was not sufficiently esteemed or accounted of by the father of the emperor now reigning, to save bowing and submitting to an ordinary bonze; and is it likely he should have interest to do what was said above? besides that in such cases, they consult the court of rites and ceremonies, which answers according to the precedents they can find, and that is infallibly done; now how could F. Adamus have any thing to do there?

15. It is above four hundred years since ^{M. bonze} the Mabometan sect came first into China, ^{lana.} but has for the most part continued among them that brought it; but they marrying are vastly multiplied, they are above five hundred thousand, and have stately temples. We saw one at Hang Cheu so slightly, and with such a noble front, as might show well in Rome. The Mabometans study the Chinese sciences, take their degrees, and rise to be civil and military mandarines; but as soon as any of them has taken his degree or becomes a mandarin, they look upon him as an apostate from his faith: so that the Mabometans esteem the learned sect incompatible with theirs, which acknowledges one true God to whom they assign the same attributes as we do, tho' they admit of intolerable errors. Every temple of bonzes has a cock belonging to it, which ^{Bonze} they keep to be ruled by him, and rise at midnight to matins. A Lapide on Deut. vi. v. 7. writes of the crowing of this fowl.

CHAP. X.

A Continuation of the same Subject.

1. A Considerable part of what properly appertains to these chapters, is spoke of in several parts of my works; therefore I shall here set down and give hints of such things as are most common. There is one very usual fast among the young people of China, which lasts only three years; this is perform'd to requite their mothers for the milk they gave them, and to repay the blood they spilt at their birth. This fast they observe most rigidly, infomuch that no accident or excuse whatsoever can countenance the breaking of it; the manner of it is the same before mentioned in the last chapter, viz. to abstain from flesh, whitemeats, fish, and wine. The women, who in all parts are more devoutly given, signalize themselves for fasting in China, and bring up their children to it; so that there are abundance who live to old age, without having ever eaten any thing that comes from a sensitive living creature, except the milk they sucked of their mothers. When any of these have a mind to become Christian, it is a very difficult matter to dissuade him from the superstition of that fast. There has been a very great variance between the missioners of the society touching this point which shall be observ'd in its place.

Abstinence.

2. But notwithstanding the general tenderness of women, especially of mothers, for those they have bore in their womb, yet there is the greatest cruelty imaginable among the Chinese women towards their daughters. Very many of them, as well ^{Daughters} rich as poor, when they are deliver'd of daughters, stifle and kill them; those who are something more tender hearted, leave them under a large vessel, where they let them die in great misery and pain. I saw one that had been three days in that condition, it cried and groan'd so as might move a stone to compassion, and only a few boards parted her from her cruel mother's bed. I saw her father, her grandfather and her grandmother, who often pass'd by the vessel; and she that had peirced my heart with her cries, could make no impression upon those monsters. I begged the child, they granted my request, sometimes they refuse so charitable a request; we lifted up the vessel, the child lay on her back crying to heaven for relief, her feet and arms drawn up, her back lay upon hard stones in wet and mud. I was amazed to see it had lived three days and three nights in that condition: her colour was so high it look'd like the very blood. I carried her away, baptized her murder'd.

her, called her Mary, and gave her to a Christian woman to nurse. Within a few days it appeared how much harm that miserable way of living had done. All her sinews contracted, and God who preserv'd Moses in the osier basket, kept this innocent babe three days under the vessel, to take her to heaven within a month after she was baptized. She might very well say, my father and my mother hath forsaken me, but the Lord hath taken me to him. Many have been saved after this manner in China: a book there is in that nation exclaims very much against this barbarity; there is also an imperial law, which forbids it, but all to no purpose. The Christians agreed there were about ten thousand female children murdered every year within the precinct of the city Lan Ki, where I lived some time: how many then must we imagine perished throughout the whole empire? But who will wonder at this, since we know the same was practised in Spain upon both males and females, only upon the beastly motive of satisfying their lust? the third council of Toledo, Can. 17. has these words, That parents in some parts of Spain murder their children through the desire of fornication, and for want of tenderness, &c.

Nuns.

3. The Chinese nuns called Ni Ku, are great fasters; they live retired in their monasteries, but sometimes go abroad to beg. Every one goes with her companion, they wear the same apparel as the bonzes do, and make their obeisance like men, not like women. The Chinese have no good opinion of either the he or the bonzes, and therefore make no account of them. In the neighbouring kingdoms it is quite otherwise, all men respect and honour them.

Killing an animal a sin.

4. All the sects we have spoken of, except the first and the Mabometans, look upon it as a sin to kill living creatures. Many of the antients were of the same opinion. See S. Thomas opusc. 5. 5. in opusc. 8. §. 3. he writes that, the Facians do not eat flesh, but altogether abhor it. On the contrary, Paul 1 Tim. iv. S. August. lib. I. de civit. Dei, cap. 20. says, That the killing of beasts to maintain human life is not unlawful. This I verily believe, but it is a doctrine that won't pass in China. S. Thomas 2. 2. q. 64. art. 4. particularly impugns this error, as do his disciples. The Chinese sectaries plead humanity and compassion, thinking it a cruel thing to take that life they cannot give. According to that of Prov. cap. xii. v. 10. A righteous man regardeth the life of his beast, but the bowels of the wicked are cruel. Lira on this place says, The Jews were cruel, and therefore the law sed them to have compassion, not only towards men but towards brute beasts. But it is very well worth remarking, that they should endeavour to shew themselves so NAVA-merciful to beasts, and be so cruel to their own daughters, murdering them inhumanly, as has been said.

See A Lapide, on Gen. ii. ver. 28.

The same says A Lapide in many places, and Oleaster.

VOL. I.

5. In India they have hospitals, to cure all sorts of irrational creatures, and they let men die without assisting them in their sickness; such is the compassion of sectaries. One thing well worth observing, has been taken notice of in the fasting sectaries, which is, that at entertainments they presently make known their devotion, and so they serve them only such meat as they can eat; but if a Christian is invited upon a fasting-day, instituted by the church, he holds his peace, and eats all that is laid before him, without daring to make known the obligation he lies under. Before they are Christians they are very zealous for the devils fasts; after their conversion it is very hard to bring them to keep only nine days the church obliges them to. The Indians do much better, tho' their sustenance is but mean and small.

Converts.

6. Fasting is much accounted of in China. When they enquire into our holy doctrine, the first thing they do is to inform themselves of our fasts; we to make things the easier, tell them there are but a few, and those easy, and it is certain they don't like it. There are sundry opinions touching this point, and it is no easy matter to reconcile them. I always liked the sentiment of Layman, lib. IV. trac. 8. cap. 1. where speaking of fasting he says, Therefore it is to be introduced among nations newly converted to the faith of Christ, as Navarrus observes, and Toletus, lib. VI. cap. 9. num. 1. All have not taken this course: the branches that have spread from these sects are many, as I observed before. Some are more reserved than others, some have stricter fasts, and observe rigid silence. When our holy faith was condemn'd, the supreme governor of Canton presented a petition against the bonzes; upon which it was ordered, that only twenty should be allowed in every town, forty in cities of the first rank, thirty in those of the second. But when we came to Canton, they were all undisturbed in their houses and monasteries.

Fasting.

Bonzes.

7. All the bonzes profess chastity, there have been some special cases. On the second of April, 67. we were told the petty king of Canton had condemned eleven to be burnt alive, for having taken them in sin, in which there was a complication of murder. It is reported of an empress of the last reigning family, who had a kindness for the bonzes, that she granted them a dispensation to have to do with women during three days, without committing any offence, or being liable to punishment; they also profess poverty, but not that of the gospel.

NAVARETTE. pel. If a bonzo has a good opportunity offered him to eat, drink, rob, or murder, he lets it not slip, for they are great hypocrites. We may well apply to the bonzes of China, what S. Augustin says, in serm. 21. ad frat. Blessed are the poor in spirit, but not those that counterfeit poverty; such as they are hypocrites, outwardly professing poverty, but refusing to endure any want. Such men in all their actions seek for the respect of honour, the glory of praise to be feared by their betters, and be worshipped like God; they covet to be call'd saints by all men; they extol poverty and abstinence only in words, but they design not to touch them with their finger. They outwardly clothe their bodies with despicable garments, but next their skin are clad in purple; they give out they lie upon ashes, but refuse not lofty palaces; they shew a heavenly face abroad; but we doubt not they have hearts like wolves. Such were those Sa-rafates, concerning whom F. Hierome writ to us three times, whose race is most carefully to be avoided. They in fine were in Egypt, living in the clefts of rocks, clad in swines skin and oxes hides, only girt about with ropes made of palm-tree leaves, wearing thorns about their beels fastened to their girdles; and coming out of their caves bare-footed, and goared with blood, they went to Jerusalem to the feast of Pentecost; and entering the holy of holies, zealously preached up the observance of poverty and abstinence; then they hastily pulled their beards, in the presence of men, without any mercy; and having thus gained renown, and made their profit, they returned to their own abode, rejoicing and feasting in solitude more than we can express. The bonzes of China are here well describ'd, all they do tends to gain renown and profit, without having any other end or prospect.

CHAP. XI.

In which the Sect of Foe is fully explicated.

Foe. 1. HAVING said something in general of this sect, it remains to declare what is peculiar and abstracting from others in it. Concerning that of the men of learning we shall speak in another place. This will be useful for the information of those that go over to those missions in these points; that they may be furnish'd with arguments against them, which will make them able upon occasion to handle with ease these confus'd matters so strange to Europeans, giving it for granted, that this sect is the greatest enemy we have to deal with in Japan, China, and many other kingdoms.

Sixty. Xe Kia. 2. This hellish sect, as I observ'd above, came into China about the year 2899 of the Chinese empire, 3109 after the flood, and sixty after the birth of our Saviour. Its founder in Japan is call'd Jaca, in China Xe Kia; when they made an idol of him, they nam'd him Foe. He was born in the Mid-India, which kingdom the Chinese call Tien Cho Kue. His father's name was Cing Fan Vuang, his mother's Mo Je: they say she conceived in a dream, imagining a white elephant enter'd her by the mouth; he was brought forth at the left side, his mother died in labour. As soon as he was born, they write, he walk'd seven steps, and with one finger pointed up to heaven, and with another to the earth, and said, I alone am holy and noble in heaven and on earth. Some say he was son to the devil, who bringing seed from some place, infused it into the mother in the shape of a white elephant. This is the reason that those kings make bloody wars for him.

3. F. John Adamus arguing against this sect, and repeating the words its first author spoke as soon as born, gives it for granted to be as we said in the last place, and adds, that the devil enter'd his body, which made him break out into that hellish blasphemy. Some Europeans tell us, his birth was in the twenty ninth year of Solomon's reign. At seventeen years of age he married three wives, by one of them he had a son, whose name was Lo Heu Lo; at the age of nineteen he forsook the world, and became an anchorit; twelve years he led that life, learning from four immortal men, so they call the hermits who lead a very exemplary life; at thirty years of age, looking on the morning star, he obtain'd a comprehensive knowledge of the being of the first principle, which rais'd him to the degree of the idol Foe; he preach'd his doctrine forty nine years, and died in the seventy ninth year of his age. Before his death he said, during more than forty years I have not made known the truth of what I know; for I have only preach'd the exterior, and most demonstrable part of my doctrine, by means of several comparisons, all which I look'd upon as false, not the interior which I judg'd to be true. Therefore he then declar'd, that the first principle, or beginning and ultimate end, was no other than the materia prima, or chaos, which they express by these two letters kung and hiu, signifying a vacuum or emptiness, and that there was nothing further to be sought after or hoped for. He had eight thousand disciples, out of which he chose five hundred, and then one hundred out of

of them ; lastly, he took the tenth man of those, whom they now call the ten great ones. These after the death of their master writ his doctrine in above fifty thousand several gatherings ; I suppose they were of palm-leaves, or that they call nipa, as they write to this day in India, which I have often seen and observed. Ta Mo a famous idol in China, whose principle seat is on the mountain Vu Tang Xan, in the province of Hu Kuang, is lineally descended from those ten, and is the hundred and twenty eighth from them. They report of him, that he was nine years in contemplation with his face to a wall. These contemplations on the vacuum or chaos, which are directed to imitate that first principle, they call taking the degree of an idol, and then returning to the vacuum, or nothing whence they came.

Three hundred.

4. Either by reason of the likeness of the name, or I know not for what reason, I have heard it said of this Ta Mo, and it is printed in the Chinese language, that he was the apostle S. Thomas, who they affirm was in China. The fathers Luzena, de Angelis, and Mendoza follow this opinion, I look upon it to be more than improbable. I have a word to this same point in another place, what has been said may suffice for the present ; and it is the opinion of F. Gouvea, and convincing, that Ta Mo came into China above three hundred years after the incarnation of the Son of God, as appears by the opinions of very learned men given me under their hands. Nor is it to be believ'd, that when the holy apostle had come to China, he would so soon depart that country, leaving so plentiful a harvest without gathering it, or sowing the seed of the word of God, as even they of the contrary opinion affirm. And if the apostle was in China, he was none of Ta Mo. I have read much on this subject, but I find no ground they of the contrary opinion have.

Foe.

5. Xe Kia in his will left his doctrine to his much lov'd disciple Mo, or Kia Je, charging him to begin it with these words, we almost saw it, without shewing any other reason. His body being burnt without eagle-wood and sandal, his disciples divided his relicks, and shar'd them among mens spirits, and dragons of the sea. They sent the king of Ceylon a tooth, which F. Gouvea says at last fell into the hands of D. Constantine of Braganza. F. Luzena affirms the same, but without making any mention of Foe, or Xe Kia. They tell abundance of false miracles wrought by this cursed man ; and among the rest, that he has been brought forth into the world eight thousand times, the last in the shape of a white elephant. This alludes to what I said above.

6. In their books they take notice of another ancient idol call'd OMi To. He places paradise in India, which they call a quiet and calm country. Those who call upon this idol, they say, obtain full remission of their sins. It is wonderful to see how incessantly many call upon him, they name him oftner than we do God, CHRIST JESUS, or the blessed Virgin. Some for a long time after they are baptiz'd, have much ado to break themselves of that bad custom.

RETTE. O Mi To.

7. The books they call fang pien, give only this and Xe Kia the title of idols, because they represent the first principle. The rest, tho' they are the same thing as the first principle, are only stil'd Pu Sa, that is a step less. They represent only some attribute of that first principle ; as for example, the goddesses Kuon In, above mention'd. Those they call Lo Hoan are in the third rank.

Pu Sa.

Lo Hoan.

8. The substance of the exterior doctrine, which Xe Kia looks upon as false, is, that there are idols, which make satisfaction for men and save them ; and being mov'd by compassion and pity, were born to shew the way to heaven to those souls that are born in the other world, where Foe is still upon a flower. Their glory consists in thirty two figures and eight qualities, which glorify a man. This sect has five commandments : the first, not to kill any living creature ; the second, not to steal ; the third, not to commit fornication ; the fourth, not to lie ; the fifth, not to drink wine. It has six works of mercy : the first and chiefest, to do good to the bonzes ; to erect temples for them in honour of their idols, and always to call upon them, which is sufficient to obtain pardon of their sins. To burn for the dead paper-money, pieces of silk and cotton, to serve their souls in the other world, and that they may have wherewith to bribe the goalers and porters of hell. The burning of paper came not from the bonzes, they have appropriated it to themselves ; the original of it shall be set down in another place. If they do not, as has been said, they assign six ways they shall go to hell, where they shall continually be coming again into the world, as men, beasts, devils, rich, poor, &c. All this the interior doctrine rejects, and so do the bonzes. The purport of the interior doctrine is, that as before my parents were born, there was nothing but the vacuum, which is the being of all things, and gave us that which we have ; so after death all things return to, and are reduced to that vacuum, or nothing, without leaving any other distinction betwixt creatures, but the bare figure and qualities they have. As for instance, the water that is in several vessels

of

NAVARETTE. of sundry shapes, round or square, &c. The learned men in their philology make use of this same simile to make out their doctrine, which in effect is the same as the interior doctrine of the bonzes. They also make use of the simile of the moon, which shews its figure in the water, or a glass, and it looks like a moon, but is only an image or resemblance, and mere nothing. So they say of creatures, that they are nothing but the first principle, which is the being of them all, whose substance they set down as a rule, has no understanding, will, virtue, power, &c. Yet they describe it pure, subtle, ingenerable, infinite, incorruptible, and most perfect. They place beatitude in this life, through meditation and mortification; so that their bliss is obtain'd by meditating on that first principle, and reaching to the height of contemplation, wherein a man is as it were beside himself void of reflection, and without any operation of the understanding, and further than this he has nothing to seek or hope for.

Beatitude.

9. To speak of the transmigration of souls, which error has infected all Asia; those of this sect say it happens four several ways; two of them true, and two false. The first false way, which belongs to the exterior doctrine, feigns six places in several parts of the world, where those men that die according to what they have acted in this life, are born over and over again in the shape of those who inhabit those places, till they are again born into this world, and afterwards come to obtain the perfection of the first principle. After this dying a second time, they go to paradise converted into idols Foe, without returning any more to those six places. This error supposes a set number of souls. Other ancients held it, whom S. Thomas opposes; see part. 1. quest. 90. The second manner feigns, that when a man dies, according to his actions, he is converted into one of six things, a beast, a fish, a bird; an angry, a hungry, or a heavenly devil.

10. The first true way is, say they, that the first principle so often spoken of, is in continual transmigration from one thing to another, taking several shapes thro' four several ways of coming into the world; that is, the womb, eggs, seed, and conversion of one thing into another. F. Antony Gourvea, the ancientest missionary of his society, and their superior, says the learned and sect of Tao hold the same in their in jang, matter and form, li and ki. Which I look upon as an undoubted truth; and that it may appear how much F. Longobardus, a grave missionary of the society, is in the right, in saying, the Cbineses hold the same errors as other ancients did; I observe, that as the Cbinese men of learning call cold in, which is a word of the feminine gender; and heat jang, which is masculine: so did the ancient Europeans, as S. Thomas takes notice of Job xxxviii. call cold a female quality, and so the text names it, by the name of the womb, which belongs to the woman; but heat a male quality; and so he makes use of the name of the father about the generation of dew and rain, Laetan. Firm. said the same long before, lib. II. de orig. error. cap. 10. The second way, and that which is peculiar to this sect, is the continual rowling of the understanding, will, passions, and inward affections of man about his objects; and so when the understanding, or inward appetite is in action towards some object, then they say the heart is produced or brought forth; and when it desists from that operation, they say it dies. In this sense they affirm the understanding does all things, that is, that when it looks after them they are done; if it does not take care of, or think on them, they have no being. After the same manner as logicians speak of the ens rationis, whose being consists in the understanding's being fix'd in consideration; and it ceases to be when they no longer think on it. They reduce all objects relating to the state of man to ten heads; six are as it were hells, which belong to the secular state; the other four are like heaven, and appertain to the monastick state.

CHAP. XII.

The End of this chimerical Confusion.

1. THIS chapter is added to conclude with what this sect teaches, which will make it the more intelligible, and the chapters of this book not so long. It teaches, that our understanding, will, or appetite, which they call sin, are continually employ'd, and rowl upon six objects or ways, and this employment or restlessness they call bell. Those hermits Spondanus treats of, ann. 170. num. 5. said almost the same thing; and ac-

Hell.

ording to the object the understanding is employ'd upon, the person is said to be in such or such a hell, and to become like the inhabitants of it. All insensibility and mortification in regard to these objects it calls beaven; he that goes to this place is born a foe, resembling the first principle in imitating it. Of the six ways they call lo tao, the first is that hell in which they assign three places of pain, which are the three passions, anger, covetousness, tousness, and ignorance; they are properly the furies of this hell, which they name San To, that is, three venoms or poisons. When a man is born into this world, they say, he is born into hell with his head downwards; that is, he is born from his mother's womb; and so all noble persons are born in hell, viz. in this life, in which there are eight sorts of torments, life, old age, sickness, miseries, calamities, poverty, sorrow, and death. Another hell is term'd Ngo Kuei, signifying hungry devil; man is born into this, when he is inwardly troubled for the miseries he endures in this life. The third is term'd Cbo Seng, a brute beast; it signifies rude men who act like beasts, and are ignorant of what they ought to know. The fourth is Sieu Lo, an angry devil; which is when men are passionate and quarrel, these are in the hell we have mention'd. The fifth is Jin Tao; that is, to be born a man, signifying the uneasiness of compliments, and the customs of the world. The sixth is Tien Tao; that is, heavenly way, which belongs to kings and princes, who are born in heaven, when they are in pleasures among musick and pastimes.

2. To escape these six hells, four steps are to be ascended, which are the four philosophers of this sect. The first Xing Vuen; that is, a beginner that travels through faith, and is one that stands upright before the image of Xe Kia, whose business is to conceive that all things are nothing. The second Vuen Kio, one advanc'd; he also is commonly represented standing, as the former, and his business is reflection and meditation; those of this rank are call'd Lo Haon, that is, men that meditate. The subject of their meditation is twelve; twelve steps man makes from his birth till he dies. The third Pu Sa, that is, perfect, or consummate, who can advance no further, but with bowels of compassion employs himself in instructing men. These sit on the left side of Xe Kia, almost even with him, and have a sort of beads. The fourth is Foe, that is, the most consummate idol, who employs not himself in outward things, in all respects like the first principle, absolutely perfect, which state is being in paradise, united with the vacuum, or nothing, or with the refin'd, thin, and imperceptible air, and become one and the same thing with it.

3. It only remains in this place to set down some sayings of the doctors of this sect; and because they all in effect express the same thing, I will only write the sayings of two or three. Pi Xi says I receiv'd my being from the incorporeal medium, or from nothing (he means the matéria prima) and as all things came from it, so did man. The soul and understanding of themselves are nothing. Good and evil are also nothing, they have no place to exist in. Xi Ki says, to do good works of itself is nothing, and so to do evil; my body is like the lather of a wash-tub compacted together, my soul is like the wind. The chaos produced a white nature, without substance or solidity; therefore all things are but mere appearances, they are nothing but outward shape.

4. By what has been here said, we may frame to ourselves some idea of the extravagancy of this sect, if such wild chimeras can furnish us with any settled notion; but to this end I have made it as plain as possible I could. Perhaps our LORD may stir up some body to write against it; I doubt not but it would be very advantageous. The missionaries have writ much, but still more is wanting. I never could approve of the opinion of some men, who say, it is not proper to spend time in arguing against follies. I say I could never approve of it, because the holy doctors of the church spent much time in refuting other absurdities, very like, and not inferior to these. Among them particularly S. Thomas did so, and it was not mispent, but well employ'd. Besides, what reason can there be not to spend time in discovering and exposing these follies we have mention'd, since they are the means the devil uses to gain innumerable souls?

5. If we observe the first principle assign'd by all the Chinese sects, we shall find they do not much vary from other ancients, against whom the saints writ much. Hesiod treated of the chaos, and not of the cause which produced it, as Lactantius observes, de fals. rel. lib. I. cap. 5. The ancient poets placed the chaos in the beginning of the world, and said it afterwards separated and divided into many things, as the same Lactantius tells us, cap. 9. lib. II. de orig. error. The learned men of China maintain the same. S. Thomas, opusc. 8. says, that Thales Milesius assign'd water for the first principle; Diogenes the air. Something of both may be found in the Chinese sects. Heraclius would have a refin'd or subtile air to be the first principle, so will the Chinese men of learning. Empedocles assign'd the four elements; the Chinese allow five, and make them the immediate causes of all things, tho' at long run they reduce all to air, or a rarify'd vapour.

6. S. Thomas, opusc. 15. cap. 9. says, For the first philosophers set it down as a maxim, concerning the nature of things, that it was only a change from one being to another. And therefore they assign'd as the first principle, A matter without any cause, for their understanding did not extend beyond the distinction betwixt the substance and the accidents. All this NAVARETTE. this is plainly the doctrine of the sects we have spoken of. But others proceeding somewhat further, search'd into the origin of substances themselves, assigning some substance as the cause of their being; but because they could not frame a conception of any thing but bodies, therefore they resolv'd substance into some principles; yet such as were corporeal, laying it down as a rule that bodies were fram'd by the gathering of others, as if the origin of things consisted in only gathering and dispersing. Which doctrine the Chinese men of letters directly hold, as shall appear when we treat immediately of this sect. Later philosophers advancing further, reduced sensible substances into essential parts, which are matter and form; and thus placed the being of natural things in a sort of transmutation, according as the matter is alternatively under several forms. The Chinese draw somewhat to this notion, but after a manner very confus'd, for they have no thorough knowledge of matter and form, actual and possible existence. Then since the errors are common, it is not unreasonable, that as the ancients were oppos'd, so also the moderns be.

7. I us'd to say to the Chinese, as Lactantius does, de div. præm. lib. VII. cap. 2. The cause of all errors in philosophy was, because they did not comprehend the reason of the world, which contains all wisdom; but that is not to be comprehended by our own reason, which they attempted to do of themselves without a master. And he concludes thus; Wherefore of necessity all sects of philosophy must deviate from truth, because they were men that set them up; nor can they have any solid ground or stability, as not being supported by any oracle of the word of God. What has been said may convince any unbiass'd person.

8. Here we might discuss a point of great moment, which is, whether those sectaries we have mention'd were sav'd, or whether we may doubt of their salvation? In the second tome, which is the proper place, what was said to this point in China shall be declar'd. I never made any difficulty to maintain they were damn'd, as I affirm of Mahomet, Calvin, Luther, and others of the same heaven. I know those of the contrary opinion all hang by one another, and say the same of those we have mention'd, as they do of Foe and others. But I follow the opinion of S. Peter Marimenu martyr, mention'd in the Martyrology on the twenty first of February. He lying sick at Damascus, some Mahometans came in to visit him. The saint told them that those who did not profess the law of God went to hell, as Mahomet had done. The infidels kill'd him for these words, and he was a glorious martyr. Why might not he be so, who should say the same of Foe and others?

9. Lactantius, lib. VI. cap. 9. de vero cultu, speaking even of those who live a good moral life according to nature, whom some in Canton deny'd to be damn'd, has these words; But let us grant it may be, that any one person of a good wit and natural inclination, can be possess'd of real virtues, as we have been told Cymon the Athenian was, who gave alms to the needy, treated the poor, and cloth'd the naked: yet when that only thing which is the greatest, viz. the knowledge of God is wanting, all those good qualities are superfluous and vain, so that he labour'd to no purpose in obtaining them: for all his righteousness is like a human body without a head. In confirmation of what has been said we may add what S. Augustin writes to the same purpose, Traët. 43. in Joan. which is the homily read Feria 3. infra oct. pent. That neither these nor those enter'd through the gate into the sheepfold. Tho' they were sectaries, they had followers, and disputed much concerning vices and virtues. I will here insert what S. Chrysostom, tom. 5. oration. de sigil. says, It is better to despise false tenets, than by answering to lay them open.

10. Tho' there have been many Chinese who have liv'd good lives according to the laws of nature; yet there is little likelihood they should be sav'd, since they came not thro' the door into the sheepfold: much less Xe Kia and others like him. It is well known how that nation has oppos'd the law of God; and we have found by a long experience what an aversion they have against it. Corné à Lapidé discoursing on Jerem. xlii. v. 18. quotes Moseius upon this subject, and says, That nothing so much obstructed the conversion of the Chinese to Christianity, as the vices and scandalous lives of some Christians. This being writ before our order, or that of S. Francis enter'd upon that mission, I can neither contradict, nor seem to countenance it. In my time there was no talk of any such thing; tho' I was not ignorant what a wicked action a convert of F. Brancato had done in perverting a good Christian woman, and others of his family. It is impossible, but there should be miscarriages among new converts, especially considering we see so many where the faith is well establish'd.

11. I take it that the difficulties occurring in that and other missions, proceed from another cause. S. Thomas on Rom. xv. says, It is a difficult thing to convert those who are altogether ignorant to the faith. And tho' the Chinese, as to what relates to this life, know too much, yet in what belongs to the soul and next life they are most ignorant, as F. Arias writ; and of the same opinion was F. Pantosa cited by Morales, which we missionaries can well testify. Read Sylveira, tom. VI. on John. xii. p. 614, 615, and 616.

12. The

12. The same author on Apoc. viii. upon these words, And all green grass, &c. says, By this they are signify'd who adhere much to worldly vanity, whom the verdure of the world has too much deluded and attracted. By reason of this adherence they are unfit for conversion, tho' not altogether under an absolute inability; for tho' now and then some men, who were before plung'd in vanity, be converted, yet it is seldom and with much difficulty. See Oleaster on Exod. xxxii. ad mores.

Pride.

13. There is no nation under the sun more proud, vain, and given to the world than the Chinese. CHRIST said to the Jews, John v. v. 44. How can ye believe which receive honour one of another? S. Thomas, lect. 6. Therefore they could not believe in CHRIST, because they proudly seeking their own praise and glory, that is, to be extoll'd above other men, &c. Whence Tully, man is to have a care of glory, which takes away all liberty. Read Cajetan upon this point, where he concludes, that these men can never or scarce believe. The pride of the Chinese men of learning, and the contempt wherewith they look upon the rest of the world, is well known to us who have had to do with them; therefore it is no wonder we should speak of it. How can ye believe? &c. See Sylveir. tom. II. cap. 3. q. 5. num. 24. where he has other explications, which all make to this purpose.

14. Other reasons may be alledged, but they make rather against us than those infidels. The fathers, Canavari, Balat, and others agree, that the preaching of the gospel in that mission was deficient: In the second tome the grounds they go upon shall be set down. F. Claudius Matet, with NAVA- some others, declare, that the law of GOD RETTE. is not sufficiently made known in any one city of China. It is no wonder then that they are not converted; and if to what has been already writ, we add what F. Bervieft us'd to say, which I shall mention in another place, those idolaters will be still more excusable.

15. Some say the Chinese would certainly be converted if they saw any miracles wrought. I answer, we can assert nothing upon future contingences. The Jews saw many miracles, and yet they continued obstinate; so did Pharaoh and many more. Besides, some mention several miracles GOD has wrought in this nation, and yet they have not produc'd the effect those persons imagine will follow. In another place we shall insert F. Lubeli's answer to this point.

16. When the Chinese talk'd of miracles, I answer'd them out of S. John Crysostome, and S. Thomas. Afterwards I observ'd Sylveira takes notice of it, tom. II. cap. 2. num. 113. People believe for two reasons; some because they have seen miracles, others only by preaching: but they who only believe for the sake of the doctrine, are more commendable, as the apostles. These last are the more intelligent and piercing, the others more rude and ignorant; and therefore I told them, there was no need of miracles for them, who have sense and judgment to understand the doctrine, the reasons and grounds of it. I hold, as did St. Gregory, in 30 Moral. cap. 8. that the working of miracles is no infallible sign of the sanctity of the minister.

C H A P. XIII.

Some Particulars of the History of China.

1. THE Chinese say, that past actions, or accidents, give man light how to behave himself in those present, and to provide himself against the future; they add, they are a mirror in which man ought to see himself. Our renowned Spaniard, S. Isidorus speaking of history, says the same thing. This it is that mov'd me to publish in the following chapters of this book, the most remarkable passages I cull'd out of the Chinese history, when I read it to be inform'd in the affairs of that empire, and to improve my self in the language and character.

Historians.

2. I must allow the Chinese authors to be sincere, and to have set down passages as really they were; they write one for their own people, not for other nations, so that neither affection nor hatred moves them to add, or extol what was not truly so. The Chinese value themselves much upon keeping their words, even those that are spoken in sport and pastime they would have to be of some weight. To corroborate this rule they bring a singular example, mention'd in their annals. The prince went out one day to walk in the palace-garden, his preceptor and some little pages much about his age attended him; he began to play, and said to one of them, I make you king of such a place. The master started up immediately, saying, What does your highness? the prince answer'd, I speak in jest. There is no jesting among princes, nor no idle words, reply'd the preceptor; your highness has made this boy a king, it must be so, that it may not be said your highness talks in jest, and not in earnest. The business was debated, and was resolv'd, the page should be a king, lest it might be said,

NAVA-RETTE. said, that the prince's words were vain and of no effect.

3. The actions, examples, and doctrine of that nation will make out the truth of the divinity of S. Thomas. 2. 2. q. 10. art. 4. as also Chrysoft. hom. de fide & lege naturæ, S. Hierome ii. ad Gal. and S. Augustin in many places, viz. That infidels may do some actions morally good. The saint also says, that GOD rewarded the Romans, by giving them so large an empire, for being strict observers of justice. In his epist. 130. he affirms the same of Polemon, and I believe he would have maintain'd the same of the Cbineses, had he known any thing of them. And tho' in some places the holy doctor seems to suggest the contrary, his meaning is, that infidels seldom do actions really good, for want of the true and right intention, which in them is commonly corrupt. We missionaries may be allow'd our judgment in this case, and tho' we cannot be positive as to the good or evil intention, yet we may guess at it by the concurring circumstances we see. According to them, it would be a rashness upon several occasions, to judge their actions did not proceed from a right intention.

4. If any more modern proofs be requir'd, we have some very convincing at this time in the kingdom of Siam. I question not but there are many more in these parts, would to GOD I were in the wrong. It is a saying of the Holy Ghost, that he shall undergo troubles and persecutions; who sincerely gives himself up to the service of GOD. There are in that kingdom certain bishops missionaries, with some secular priests their companions, all men of known virtue, very exemplary for poverty, humility, and other circumstances of edification, unblamable in their duty of preaching the gospel, which all that part of the world highly extols. Nevertheless, for their good, and that of others, GOD has rais'd them certain opposites, members of Satan, who leave nothing that belongs to them which they do not belpatter. They give out their virtue is counterfeit, that they may lead the people after them, and gain applause; that they are Jansenists, and more to this effect. When I was discoursing concerning this matter with cardinal Bona, whose soul I hope is in heaven, he was out of patience, and lifting up his eyes to heaven, said, Is it Jansenism, to be poor, to pray, to exhort the faithful so to do, to lead an exemplary life, and preach like the Apostles? O that we were all such Jansenists, the world would without doubt be in another condition than we see it is!

5. What has been said may be an instruction to us; to look upon the actions of our neighbours, tho' they be infidels, without taking upon us to judge of their thoughts and intention in acting. This part belongs peculiarly to GOD; man must not presume to inroach upon his province. This doctrine also conduces to give us to understand, that as GOD will have what is good in virtuous men made known for the edification of others, so he is pleas'd the virtue of the infidel should be discover'd to the same end.

6. The first man and first emperor of that monarchy, the Cbineses take notice of, was Fo Hi. Before him the Cbineses confess Fo Hi they knew nothing of the world, or what was done in it; and tho' others name another, who preceded him, whom they call Puon Ku, who they say separated heaven from earth, yet the sect of the Literati, or Literati the learned, who are the wise men of that nation, all agree in what I have said.

7. Fo Hi was also the first that sacrificed Sacrificing to heaven to heaven, offering to it the blood of beasts. I look upon it as most certain that the Cbineses have ever worship'd and ador'd the sun, moon, stars, &c. and the fathers Longobardo, Ruir, Gouvea, and others of the society, whom F. de Angelis follows, are of the same opinion. Some of our modern interpreters will have it, that Fo Hi in offering sacrifice to heaven, did it to GOD, who resides in it as in his palace, so that they take the thing containing for that contained. To confirm this their conceit, they mention the king of the upper-part, very much celebrated by the sect of the learned. In the first place I might well say with S. Cyril, lib. II. in Joan. cap. 34. that contentious men are not so stiff in holding true doctrine. But the words of Lactantius de fals. relig. cap. 11. where he speaks of the poets, suit better in this place: but they spoke of men, but set off those whose memories they extoll'd, they call'd them gods. And then lower: hence men come to be deceiv'd, especially, because thinking all these things to be feign'd by poets, they worship what they know not, for they are ignorant of the extent of poetical licence, and how far they may go on in their fictions; whereas the business of a poet consists in this, that he changes those things which have really been, into other shapes by odd representations, yet with some grace. We shall write concerning the Cbinese king of above in another special book. What has been said is very much to the purpose, of the praises and encomiums the Cbineses bestow on their emperor Vuën Vuang, who they affirm attends on the right and left side of the king of above, from whence he takes care of the advancement of his monarchy.

8. What I say is, that the Cbineses from all antiquity never knew any thing more noble than the material heavens we behold.

So say their books, and their learned men own it, and they it is certain know more of this matter than the Europeans that go thither; for they are the masters and teachers of their sciences, and understand their own books incomparably better than we do. It being so natural to man to acknowledge some first cause, Fo Hi's judgment tended towards it, but he mis'd the mark, as many others did. Whether Fo Hi descended from Ham, according to the opinion of F. Emanuel Diar, or from the great Zoroastres, as the fathers Longobardo, Ruir, and others of that society will have it (I have already observ'd that it is a common opinion that Ham and Zoroastres were one and the same man) he came to Cbina without any knowledge of the true God, as F. Gouvea also testifies. Lyra on Gen. x. says, The Gentiles were the off-spring of Japhet, the idolaters of Ham; and the worship of the true God came from Shem, tho' all his children were not good. Corn. à Lapidè in Gen. x. v. 25. says, that Noah liv'd till Abraham was fifty eight years of age. Therefore Noah saw the tower of Babel, he also saw almost all his posterity deprave their ways, and turn away to idolatry; therefore Noah saw the world full of men, and those wicked, he saw and sighed at it. On Gen. xxxv. v. 2. he writes thus: by this it appears there were idols and idolaters in Jacob's family, &c. Let the origin of Fo Hi be consider'd, and it may be judg'd whether he know God, or not. We certainly know Zoroastres was the inventor of art-magick. Pliny, Justin, S. Isidorus, S. Augustin, and many others affirm it, he was six hundred years before Moses. A Lapidè in Exod. vii. v. 11.

Whether the Chinese could have an invincible ignorance of God, belongs to the second tome.

Agriculture.

9. Not long after Fo Hi, Xin Nung came into the empire, he shew'd the people how to till their land, brought the plough and other instruments of husbandry. This man to the Chinese is instead of the goddess Ceres, or of the god Sterculius, of whom Lactantius de fals. rel. c. 20. writes thus: Sterculius who first brought up the way of dunging the ground.

Xun. Temples and sacrificing to the dead.

10. There followed other emperors, of whom they say little. Xun was the eighth of them, but the first that erected temples to offer sacrifice to the dead. This shall be largely handled in the second tome. Xun is much applauded by the Chinese, and by their philosopher Confucius. Mention will be made of him upon some occasions.

Sacrificing to the hearth.

11. The petty king Li Yao offer'd sacrifice to the hearth, that is to the spirit which they feign presides over the kitchen-chimney, and begg'd prosperity and long life of it. He persuaded the emperor to embrace this idolatry, telling him, if he worship'd the said spirit, he would soon get the medicine to prolong life, and the art of converting yellow sand into gold. NAVA- From this time forward superstitions daily increas'd in Cbina. This was many years before the sect of India was brought into the country. A famous missioner of that country in a book he printed an. 1663, endeavours to justify the sacrifice we have spoke of, and reduces it to a mere civil action; I know many mislik'd the book, and F. Antbony de Gouvea often told me he abhor'd it. That sacrifice was instituted 2800 years after the foundation of the empire. The ancient Europeans had some tincture of this error. See Lactant. cap. 20. Hence it is the Chinese to this day give a great deal of respect and veneration to the hearths, or places where their meat is drest. They take a great deal of care they should be clean and neat, and they will upon no account do any undecent action on, or near them. To make water there is look'd upon as a great disrespect, and a profaning of the place where the cook-spirit presides and has his abode.

12. I think it convenient all should be known; said Lactantius, cap. 23. de fals. relig. But the first step to wisdom is to know what is false, the second to know what is true.

13. At the same time an ambassador of the emperor Vu Ti, call'd V Vu, was prefer'd with great solemnity to be an idol, by the name of Cbing Hoang, that is, keeper of the walls and ditches, or guardian angel of the city; from such ancient times were those they call in Cbina tutelar angels of cities and towns chosen from among men.

Tutelar angels.

14. To these the governors recommend themselves, that they may execute their charges uprightly, and resort to their temples twice in every moon. F. Trigaucius writ upon this subject, lib. I. cap. 10. Lucena in his history says, there were spirits of this sort in India. The ancient Europeans had them: Theodorus, lib. VIII. contra Græcos, says, In like manner they worship the guardians of towns, and tutelars of places. This plainly makes out that the errors in Cbina are the same that were in Europe, as I have already observ'd. This subject shall be handled in the second tome, and at the end of this. Concerning these spirits there have been several disputes in Cbina, even before the Franciscans and our order enter'd upon that mission, of which we shall speak at large in another place. For the present it suffices to know that all the guardian angels of cities and towns they have to this day in Cbina, were men, whose employments, names and families are known to all men there. They every year celebrate their birth-days, then how can they be angels?

NAVA- 15. In the second year of the reign of RETTE. the emperor Cbang Hoang Ti, a proclamation was issued out forbidding the mandarines to wear rich clothes. The emperor gave for his reason, that the exterior ornament, tho' it seems good, is evil; to covet outward ornament and gaiety, and be inwardly vicious, is a thing abominable. The man- darin who is upright and just, seeks after virtue, not fine clothes. The people is not govern'd by the outward appearance in garments, but by the virtue which exerts itself in good actions. This I will have observ'd, says the emperor, and the excess there has been in this particular rectified, that my subjects may live at ease. This were a good proclamation among Christians. The Europeans out-do the rest of the world in fine apparel, they will not be convinced that clothing had its origin from the shame caus'd by sin; it was rather instituted to make us weep than appear gay.

16. The method of making gold, mention'd above, has distracted and beggar'd many Chineses; they have made several trials, and have produced nothing but losses and troubles. They suspected some of the missioners, especially the ancient ones, knew and practis'd this art, so they continued to have the same conceit of those that had scarce a moderate maintenance, Corn. à La- pide on the AS has writ concerning this subject, and some ages before Albertus Mag- nus; and to this day there are those who maintain it practicable, Torre Blanca is one of these. In the year 1673, I lighted on a Portuguese at Rome, who was so thoroughly satisfied he should in a short time make millions of pistoles, that I could never dissuade him from his design. A few years since, several met for the same purpose at Naples, they spent much money, and at last the workmen ran away, one of them was still living in India in the year 1670, when I was there.

Bribes re-
sued.

17. Fang Chin a mandarin of note, and in great favour with the emperor, was very upright in his employment, and an utter enemy of bribes. This man got a mandarin's employment for his friend Vuang Nie. He in return went one night to visit him, and as an acknowledgment for the kindness receiv'd, offer'd him eleven ounces of gold. Fan Chin was offend'd at it, and said to him, Don't you who are my friend know me? how came you to do this? Nie answer'd, That makes me come by night, no body sees or knows it; to receive so small a trifle is not any thing of consequence. Chin reply'd, Heaven and earth see it, you and I know it, here are four witnesses, and can you say no body sees or knows it? Nie was convinc'd and took back his gold, without daring to say any more to that point. No body saw us, said those youthful elders to Sufanna; they made not so much reflection as the man- darin Chin. There is much to observe in this action, that a heathen was not govern'd by worldly respect, nor did he regard whether he was seen or look'd upon, he only minded justice, and his duty, as a good minister. He took the advice of Frederick the third, who was wont to say, Do not that in private, which you would be asham'd to do in publick. It is the same S. Bernard teaches us, speaking of our angel guardian.

Fang Chin has few disciples in the world at this time. Not only heaven and earth see and know the bribes many men receive; but all the world is a witness to them, and yet they are not asham'd, nor draw back their hands. Oleaster on Gen. xi. v. 7. speaks excellently to this purpose. This latter sort of men seem to be of Cicero's opinion, who said, The sweetest thing in the world is to receive. It is better to follow our Saviour's rule, It is happier to give than to take. It might also be a subject of reflection, that if this Gentile thought heaven and earth were witnesses sufficient to deter and make him abstain from receiving that small sum of eleven ounces of gold; what ought a Christian to do upon the like occasion, since through faith he knows, that God himself is looking, not only into his actions, but his very thoughts? It would be some advantage to us, if it were consider'd and observ'd that heaven, earth, and other creatures, shall be witnesses and severe accusers against us on the day of judgment.
See Corn. à Lapide in Gen. vii. v. 9. in fine.

18. We might also here take notice, that the good counsellor conscience did not in this place forget Chin; she suggest'd to him, that he ought not to take any thing for having done the duty of his office:
Their conscience bearing witness for them, &c.
God gives all men this judge and witness, says S. Basil, in princip. Prov. That a cer- tain tribunal is erected in the secret part of the heart, where all things that are to be done are weigh'd as it were in a balance. See S.
Thomas, opusc. 60. art. 14. where he brings the words of S. Bernard very proper to the same purpose.

19. Chin had another very particular accident befel him. His friends observ'd he purchas'd no linds as others did; that his children were clad and fed like very ordinary people, and that he had neither horses nor sedans in his house. They told him it was convenient he should raise his house, make his family great, and get employments for his sons and grandsons. He who was of another mind answer'd them, There is no riches or estate like the uprightness, integrity, and disinterested carriage of a magistrate.

magistrate. It is much better for my posterity, that those who are unborn should say, I was thus qualify'd, that I preserv'd my self from being corrupted, that I administred impartial justice, and faithfully serv'd my emperor, than that I should leave them great estates, and mighty treasure. By these means I shall leave them rich, noble; and with honour, and they want no more. Here the saying suits well, A good name is better than many riches. But where is this doctrine put in practice at present? who is there that does not raise an estate if he can? who is it that does not seek preferments, not only for his children, but for his kindred if he can? who does not aspire to a title of honour, if it be to be purchas'd for gold or silver, tho' got the LORD knows after what manner? If all ministers were like the heathen Cbin, Cbina would be in another condition. And had Cbin been guided by that light which God has so freely bestow'd on others, what would he do, what would he say, how would he act?

Idolatry of Chao Lie.

20. The emperor Chao Lie was very careful in offering sacrifice to heaven, earth, his predecessors departed, and his subjects that dy'd in war; he shew'd himself very religious in all his actions, but it was in a false and idolatrous religion. He was merciful in his government. It is just and reasonable kings should do good for the souls of those that die in war. It is unreasonable the soldier should labour and fight till he loses his life, and when he has lost it there should be no care taken for his soul. Some accounts went over to Cbina, in which they blame the negligence and remissness of our nation as to this particular. I am satisfied of the neglect of the French in Madagascar, above four hundred of them were left dead in the field fighting with the Blacks, and as yet the first mass is not said for them. The missionaries that liv'd there, and I among them, did what charity requir'd at our hands. A resolute and brave commander belonging to the aforesaid emperor, whose name was Kuang Fu, came to be an idol, and the god Mars of Cbina; he is not the same I mention'd in another place by the name of Tai Kung.

Kuang Fu made Mars.

Chao Lie.

21. Chao Lie being at the point of death, gave the charge of the prince his son, who was then very young, to a most faithful counsellor of state, call'd Ko Leang; he recommended the youth to him, and said, if my son does not approve himself capable of governing, do thou take his place, for such is my will and pleasure. The counsellor wept, admiring the mighty confidence the emperor repos'd in him; and promis'd to use all his endeavours to serve the young emperor, and continue the crown in his line. Then the emperor call'd the prince, and said to him, When a man has liv'd to fifty years of age, he cannot complain that heaven has given him a short life, much less I who have liv'd to sixty. I might only be concern'd for my subjects, and brothers; but I trust you will protect them. Be of good heart, prince, and take this advice from a father who tenderly loves you. Commit no sin tho' ever so small and inconsiderable, and do not omit to perform any virtuous action tho' never so slight. Do not follow the example of your father, but imitate the virtue of the great Ko Leang, whom I leave as your counsellor, friend, and father; together with the crown, I leave you virtue, which makes the subjects submissive and pliable. Read Oleaster, num. 27. ad mores in fin. cap. The least good thought is pleasing to God. Read Sylv. tom. VI. cap. 10. in Mat q. 7. num. 36.

NAVARETTE.

22. What could S. Lewis King of France have said more to the purpose to his son and heir? if to be a king and monarch, is to be father of the subjects, Chao Lie sufficiently shew'd he was so to his, since it was such a trouble to him at his death to leave them. If to be zealous for the publick and kingdom be ever commendable in a prince, Lie gave abundant proof of his zeal, by preferring it to the natural love he bore his son; and therefore he said to Leang, If my son prove not fit to govern, do thou take his place. He had no respect to flesh and blood, but to the good of his people and subjects. And if goodness and justice raises a prince above mankind, as Plato said, lib. II. A king is a certain human God; and Seneca, Through piety and justice princes become gods: what was there wanting in Chao Lie towards deserving of such glorious titles? and if the king be the soul of the kingdom, The king is in his kingdom as the soul in the body, and God in the world; as the doctors say, and S. Thomas writes, opusc. de reg. princ. lib. I. cap. 12. Who does this better answer to than to Lie, who at the last period of his life was more sensible of his people's being left expos'd without a head, than of the distemper he languish'd under. And we look upon him as a father; who ever gave a son better advice? he bids not commit a fault, tho' ever so small. More of this in another place.

23. He also charges him not to omit any virtuous action, tho' never so small. He was not satisfy'd that his son should be good, he would have him attain to perfection. What pity it is the emperor had not the knowledge of God! as every fault is hurtful, so every good action, though light and inconsiderable is profitable and advantageous; and if done in a state of grace, is meritorious of life everlasting. If you doubt it, consider what God himself has NAVA- has promis'd to him that gives a draught of cold water to the needy for his sake.

24. If we regard the confidence a good king ought to have in his ministers, who is there in the world that can equal Chao Lie? he intrusted Leang with the whole empire, and left it to his own judgment whether he would not appropriate it to himself. The saints admire S. John Baptist's sincerity, when the Jews putting it into his power to declare himself the Messiah, he refus'd it when he might have assum'd that honour. Lie puts the empire into the power of Leang, he constitutes him judge of the prince's sufficiency, and leaves the whole decision of the business to him. A singular confidence of the emperor's, and wonderful loyalty in Leang. A good example to confound those ungrateful, disloyal, and false men, who usurp what they only had committed to them in trust. What matter is it tho' they live great and high, when their treachery and baseness is eterniz'd in the memory of man? what would this infidel say had he heard of your actions?

Example of moderation. 25. The history of Leang says further, that he having always been a counsellor, father, master, and friend to the new emperor, ever seeking and studying the advantage of the crown, he fell sick and died in the army. Before his death he writ a letter to the emperor, in which he said; I leave eight hundred mulberry trees, and fifteen acres of land in the city Ching Tu, which is enough to afford my children a moderate maintenance, and they need seek for no more; therefore I beg it as a favour that your majesty will be pleas'd to give them nothing. Rich and mighty subjects, Sir, are full of turbulent thoughts. Oleaster handles this point very well in Num. xvi. ad mores in princip. cap.

26. Enough might be said of Leang's letter, and his poverty, after having had such a hand in the government. The reader may without much trouble make his reflections on it, and consider whether he does, or ever did know any person that can equal this heathen. To excuse in some measure such as are directly opposite to Leang, we may alledge what S. Thomas says, Opusc. 28. cap. 7. Wonderful actions are not to be brought as precedents, because weak men can better admire and commend, than imitate them. But the truth is, they might imitate this heathen if they pleas'd; they neither want the power, nor divine assistance, but they overabound in covetousness and ambition. What has been said, is like to what is written of Daniel, cap. v. §. 17. Leang was not so singular, but he has had his equals in the world. Marcus Atilius Regulus, after he had been in mighty employments, and had great opportunities to grow rich, yet was extremely poor, tho' he had a wife and children. Corn. à-Lapide writes the same of others, in Gen. xlvii. §. 16. I think we should find but few modern examples in our age that can bear company with those we have mention'd. Not that they are under less obliging ties, or want better light to walk by, but because being blinded with worldly affairs they suffer themselves to be led away, without considering they by those means draw on their own perdition. I do not say there are no upright and unbiass'd people, I could name some I have known in this place who have given a good example, as to this and other particulars, but they are few and rare. Precious things are always scarce in comparison of those that are mean and base. So good and virtuous men are scarce in comparison of the wicked. There is an infinite number of fools, says the Holy Ghost.

27. Prince Sui had a mind to build a tower to divert the sight, by the curious prospect of some groves. Vuang Ki a counsellor of state, presented a memorial to this effect: the ancients taking the simile from the water, taught the people this doctrine; the water serves the ship to sail on, and to sink it. The emperor is the ship, the people the water; whilst there are people the ship may sail, and the same water may sink it. Your highness may consider you are the ship, and your people the water; if you oppress them too much with taxes, and unnecessary charges, as it now maintains, it may sink you. The people is like a horse, it is rul'd by the bridle, without it the rider is in danger. If you rein him too hard only for sport, it is to be fear'd he will get the bit betwixt his teeth and become unruly. Your highness will do well to remember these two comparisons. The prince was convinc'd, and laid aside his design.

28. These are good similes, if we made our advantage of them. How much has been spent in the world on extravagant pastimes; how grievously has the people been oppress'd on the same account? consider, great men, that ye are ships and want water to sail; too much and too little water are equally fatal to vessels. If you hoist your sails (besides that you may fall short of sailors) at half run you'll be aground for want of water; a ship without water makes no voyage. We will set sail! let us have gardens, houses of pleasure, water-works, high towers, rich liveries, bull-feasts, plays, riding, and other pastime. I allow all this; but first take a view of your estates, territories, and kingdoms; take the depth of the water, sound, see how many fathom there are. Look upon the villages which are destroy'd, and towns unpeopled; see the miserable condition of your subjects, and you will Oleaster quoted here observe that he pretend much poverty they are pay debt or give aim, but not to game, or indulge luxury, &c. Christian will be satisfy'd there is not water enough for you to sail. See Oleaster in Exod. x. ad mores.

29. The Cbineses commonly ask, whether there are any poor in our countries? we answer, there are some whom God keeps among us to exercise the charity of the rich. This was hinted at in the first book; See Oleaster in Deut. xv. However they answer, that all being Christians, the rich of necessity must distribute what they have among the poor, and so all must live well. This is what those heathens say, grounding it upon what they hear and read concerning our holy faith; but they don't know how it is in these parts, and what extravagancy there is in expences. If they knew it, there is no doubt but they would bid us return to our own country to preach, as one who had been at Manila told me: what do you come hither for? (cry'd he as loud as he could) go preach at Manila, for I know very well how things are there, we have no need of you here, we know our duty. I must confess he put me out of countenance.

30. Not long before, as one of my order was preaching to some honest infidels, a merchant just return'd from Manila came in; he began a discourse concerning his voyage and trade, and said, I'll go no more to Manila, but to Japan I will. One reason is, because at Japan there are more commodities to lay out my money upon. Another, because the people of Japan are better than those of Manila. Those who were in company before fixed their eyes upon the father, who they knew came from Manila, for the merchant knew him not. I was quite out of countenance (said that religious man to me) and as cold as ice; NAVARRETTE. I return'd home without the least courage or heart to prosecute what I had begun. I could make many reflections upon this passage, let it suffice at present that in the judgment of the heathen, the Christians of Manila are worse than the infidels of Japan. They are likely by example to forward the conversion of that vast number of Gentiles that resorts thither. All we missionaries say, it is God's special providence that the Cbineses don't know what is done in Christendom, for if they did there would be never a man among them but would spit in our faces. It has been sufficiently observ'd and declar'd that none are converted in those parts where they converse with our people, that is at Macao, and Manila; and if it happens any one does, he proves so bad, it were better he had never been baptized. In the year 1669, a Cbinese merchant well known at Macao, as well to the citizens as to the fathers of the society, after he had dealt with them above sixteen years, being too well vers'd in the Portuguese language, and having been often exhorted to receive baptism, for he was an honest man, and we all had a kindness for him, fell sick to death at Canton, when we were all there. A father who was his acquaintance went four times to his house, he spoke to the point he went about, but being sent away he return'd home sad and disconsolate. The rich man dy'd and was bury'd in bell. What has been written may suffice to humble the vanity of those who boast they go to people those countries, that they may contribute to the conversion of souls. Let us go on to another chapter.

CHAP. XIV.

A Continuation of the same Subject.

1. THE prince who forbore raising a tower for the reason mention'd in the last chapter, order'd an edict to be set forth, in which he commanded none but persons well qualify'd should be chosen into places of honour and trust. Vuang Chang one of the council of state presented a memorial of this purport. There must be no precipitation in electing of ministers of state, if there be, such election will not prove good. The plant that springs up fast is not lasting, in the morning it is gay, and at night withers. The cypress and pine which grow but slowly preserve their greenness, tho' the snow and cold dew falls upon them. Therefore I beseech your highness that you will be cautious in chusing of ministers, and take time to consider on it. Your highness will do well to raise those that humble themselves and withdraw out of the way, and to make account of those that are not covetous, to esteem those brave, who are of an easy and good temper. Railing and commending proceed from love and hatred, and cause good and ill fortune. If I be censur'd, it is proper to examine my life and actions. If I am guilty of what is given out, they that take notice of it are in the right; if I am not guilty of it, no account is to be made of their censures, for being false it will vanish as clouds do before the wind. The proverb advises, to wear lambskins to keep out the cold; and to be cloth'd in innocence, and lead a good life to avoid being censur'd. This, sir, is the way to curb ill tongues. See Oleast. in Exod. xviii. A Lapid in Exod. xxiii. 5. S. and Cajetan in Exod. xviii. 5. 21. Oleast. in Num. i. Sylv. Tom. 6. pag. 495. quest. 4. 3. pag. 500. num. 46. Caius Tiberius made no account

NAVA- account of ill tongues, and us'd to say, RETTE. In a free city tongues ought to be free.

2. This heathen left us excellent instructions to the two points he handles, and seems rather a Christian long vers'd in the schools of virtue. The first point shall be handled in another place. As to the second, the great Sixtus the third pope, could speak no better to it in his famous epistle, when a heinous crime was most falsely laid to his charge, it is set down in 11. q. 4. inter verba, his words are these, Brethren, we are not to decline to the left, on account of the accusations, or reflections of malicious persons, or the opinion of those that commend us; but amidst commendations or affronts, we must look into our selves, (the heathen we speak of says the same thing) and if we do not there find the good that is said of us, it ought to cause us much trouble; and again, if we find not there what the ill men say of us, we ought greatly to rejoice. For what signifies it, tho' all men commend, if our conscience accuse us; or tho' all men accuse, if our conscience clears us? For what is it slanderers do, but blow upon dust, or throw dirt in their own eyes? Thus groundless reflections vanish like the clouds. Let him that has not seen this epistle read it, for it is very elegant, and affords much comfort upon such occasions.

Money.

3. In the reign of the emperor Hoei Hoang Ti, all offices and places of trust were fold openly; then one Lu Pao writ a treatise call'd Cien Xe Lun, that is a discourse and argument concerning the virtue of money, reflecting on the emperor and his ministers; and he said thus, speaking in the person of money: I am like heaven and earth, my name is square-hole, (the brass coin has a square hole in the middle, and tho' this was writ above two thousand years since, the same continues to this day without altering the shape, or rising or falling) I am honour'd, tho' void of virtue; I am obey'd, tho' I have no power or authority; I wait at the imperial bed-chamber door, like a peer; I go without any opposition into the privatest parts of the palace; I ease the afflicted, I raise the dead, (that is, those that are condemn'd to death) I humble and debase the nobility; I raise mean persons; I kill the living in war, law-suits, and strifes; without me there is no victory; I lay open the goals in spite of the keepers; I abate hatred, and suppress anger and revenge; fame and renown is increas'd by me: I live lovingly with the great men at court, the nobility and commons; no man is weary, or has enough of me, all men carry me in their hands; from first to last I am well clad and close kept (this he says, because in Cbina they carry their money in curious square cloths fast knotted) at present there is no body in greater power or favour, I am the only concern of all people. A sharp thought; he expounds all he has said, but I need not explain it any further, for any man may with ease see into the meaning of it. The poet express'd it in few words: In mundo summus rex est hoc tempore nummus. Albertus magnus mentions it 1 Polit. cap. 7. And all things are obedient to money, says the Holy Ghost. S. Augustin. 7. de Civit. cap. 12. says, the ancients call'd Jupiter, pecunia, or money, because all things are his.

4. Here it is to be observ'd, that in so many thousand of years as have pass'd since the foundation of that empire, and always under paganism, employments were never fold but at this time. The Chineses abhor this abuse. S. John Chrysostom laments the mischiefs that ensue of selling places of trust. Honours are become venal, a thousand mischiefs arise from it, and yet no body takes care to correct, none to reprove it, but this way of traffick has found admittance, and is follow'd. S. Thomas in his opusculum to the dutcheffs of Brabant, handles this subject, so does Tapia in his Catena Moralis, and others. The French complain of their king for introducing so much of this practice, tho' it be upon such conditions, as may in some measure justify it; yet they say, not deserving, but rich persons carry all preferments, which ruins the publick. Be it as it will, what is good every where ought to be imitated; what is bad ought never to be propos'd as an example to follow. If this thing be bad in it self, will this man or the others practising make it allowable?

5. I will not omit to insert in this place a false imputation laid upon our late king of happy memory, by his enemies. F. Anthony Gourvea a jesuit often us'd to tell me of it, he said and positively affirm'd, that even the bishopricks of Spain were dispos'd of for money, and brought examples of his time to make good his assertion. But this falshood is disprov'd by the great multitude of learned, pious, and most religious prelates there have been in this age, and are still living, who may vie with those of the primitive church. This truth is further made out by some of them generously refusing to accept of great dignities, and others, who did not admit of their promotion to the greatest churches till oblig'd to it by the supreme head. If any thing of this nature was done, I am persuas'd it was by those of his nation (Gourvea was a Portuguese) and no others, or some persons perhaps aspir'd to it by that means, as was done at Manila by Dr. Cabrall, from whom four thousand pieces of eight were taken with this intent, as master Girony Cueva told me in the presence of the same doctor, which he own'd. But it will be convenient venient we make our benefit of the doctrine of Sixtus the third, and the counsellor Chang, against slanderers. I only desire F. Gouvea to read the paper, four and twenty of the commons presented to his Portuguese king Alonzo, where he will find things that ought to concern him nearer. We are all oblig'd, not only to eschew evil, but even those occasions that may be a motive or ground of evil.

6. The emperor Vu Ti was a great admirer of idols, his counsellor Tan Cbin made it out to him that the idols were nothing (this is a proposition of St. Paul's, An idol is nothing in the world, but the Chinese speaks not in the same sense as the Apostle) and that all things in the world happen by chance (this is as bad as idolatry:) to be great, or mean, rich or poor, is all accident, even as the blossoms of a tree when shook by the wind, some fall in the dirt, and some in clean places; those that light upon clean spots are kings and noblemen, those that tumble in the dirt are the multitude. Hence comes the distinction betwixt nobles and commons, rich and poor, kings and subjects, and not from the idols. There is no pure spirit without a body, the spirit is the matter and basis of the body: spirits are nothing but the motions and actions of the body. The spirit is in the body in the same nature as the edge is in the sword; there is no destroying the sword, and leaving the edge without it. How then can the soul remain without the body, or the body without the soul? the body dies and the soul dies with it, for it was nothing but the actions and motions of the body; so there is no reward nor punishment, nor idols, nor spirits, nor any other life; all the bonzes teach is a mere fiction.

7. F. Anthony Gouvea in his manuscript history, which was read in the presence of us all when we were confin'd in Canton, says, Tan spoke like a follower of the sect of the Literati, or learned men, which knows nothing of an immortal soul, or another life; there is nothing but living and dying, with good fortune or without it, which is all mere accident; when body and soul are dead, there is an end of all. What they call spirits are the corporeal souls of those that die, which eat and drink, and walk about the mountains and graves. Many believe not much of this, because since by the doctrine of their sect, the soul is nothing but air; Ki or Li, that is, the motion of a living body; as soon as this died, the soul vanish'd and dissolv'd into shadows, as the Latin poet said of a soul, Fugit indignata per umbras. This is the wisdom of atheists and wise ideots. Thus far F. Gouvea. This is to satisfy all men, that it was not only the two religious orders (S. Do- minick's and S. Francis's) who conceited the sect of the learned held these opinions we have here mention'd, and that it was not without good grounds they asserted it, as has been given out in some parts. More shall be said to this point in the second tome, it was sufficient to give a hint of it in this place.

8. Tan Cbin in his way follow'd the example of those hereticks, of whom S. Thomas often says, that to avoid one inconvenience they fell into others greater. Tan undertook to argue against the idols, and to this purpose ran into all those errors we have mention'd. He that walks in the dark without the light of faith, must needs stumble and fall. Many ancient Europeans profess the same errors as this heathen. Pythagoras and Epicurus deny'd the providence of God. Read Lactan. de fals. Relig. lib. I. cap. 2. Like those who the book of Wisdom tells us said, He walks about heaven, and regards not our affairs. Thales, Milesius, Democritus and Pythagoras maintained, that all things came to pass of necessity, and by an unavoidable fate. Democritus and Lucretius taught, that all ended with the body. Decianus, and others, that the soul was not distinct from the body. The Sadducees deny'd any other life, own'd no immortality of the soul, angels, or any spirits; nor any other thing which they did not comprehend by sense and reason; says Becanus de Sectariis Synagogæ cap. 12. q. 8. Tertullian lib. I. de anima cap. de morte says of Seneca, that he was of opinion, death was an end of all things. Zeno said all things were accidental, as says S. Thomas opusc. de fato. I look upon it as most certain, that there is no error maintain'd in China, but what has been in other countries, as appears by what has been said here, and is well prov'd by F. Longobardus a jesuit in the treatise I shall insert in my second tome.

9. The above-nam'd emperor was so taken with the idols and their doctrine, that he kept many bonzes within his palace, put on their habit in private, and pray'd, and perform'd the other ceremonies with them. The learned men opposing this religion both by word and writing, the commonalty became so averse to it, and conceiv'd so mean an idea of the bonzo priests, that tho' the emperor promis'd honours and preferments to those that would wear the habit of bonzes, yet no man embrac'd it, looking upon that as the meanest and most abject condition in the world. The emperor to compass his design, set forth an edict, pardoning all persons whatsoever that were under sentence of death, upon condition they should become bonzes, and as such serve the idols. The criminals accepted of the offer, but it being rather through constraint than out of any

The emperor hearing of it, order'd search to be made for them; and that they should be secur'd, and to prevent their flying for the future, he commanded their heads to be shav'd, laying an injunction under severe penalties that the bonzes, to be known from other men, should ever be shav'd. It was always thought convenient that we missionaries should not be habited or appear like the bonzes. Read Oleaster in Num. vi. ad mores.

10. This is the origin of the Chinese bonzes wearing no hair, and the end or design was that we have mention'd, not that fiction F. de Angelis writes. Hence it is, that when any bonzo presents a petition to a mandarin, he signs with these words, cién feng, that is bonzo imprison'd, alluding to the emperor's imprisoning those that fled. From that time they increas'd very much, and daily multiply.

11. The empress was also displeas'd at her husband's familiarity with the bonzes: to ridicule and laugh at them, she invited them to an entertainment of flesh, but so disguis'd that they might not know it. The secret was discover'd, they all started and would not eat, they caus'd those dress'd meats to be buried near a dead body: sometime after they gave out that garlick, onions and leeks sprung up in that place, and the bonzes in hatred to the flesh from which these sprung, eat none of them. So said F. Brancato an ancient missionary of the society.

12. About this same time the history of China gives a very singular account of Kao Fuen, one of the council of state, which is thus: he having serv'd five emperors for the space of fifty years, was not found to have committed the least fault or slip in the execution of his office. This heathen was very much addicted to virtue, sparing, humble, upright, and uncorrupted; and tho' he enjoy'd revenues on account of his employments, yet he ever had the poverty in which he was born before his eyes, and died at ninety eight years of age. Great pity that such a man should not have the knowledge of God! But if he observ'd the law of nature, he could not fail of the assistance of his Maker. S. Augustine, lib. I. de lib. arbitr. cap. 6. expounding those words of Psal. iv. The light of thy countenance, &c. says thus, That a notion of the eternal law is imprinted in all-men whatsoever. And lib. II. cap. 10. certain lights of virtues, to wit, that we ought to live uprightly. S. Basil, whom we quoted in another place, That there is in us a sort of natural judgment, by which we easily discern good from evil. These were the causes Kao Fuen liv'd and acted with so much integrity. We shall not find many such counsellors as this throughout the world. It cannot be denied but that it is very extraordinary, that such men should be found in countries where the wicked do so abound. S. Thomas, opusc. 18. cap. 7. says of Abraham, Abraham's virtue was very great, for that he possessing riches, had his mind estrang'd from them; and great was the strength of Sampson, who without any arms, but only the jaw-bone of an ass, slew many of his enemies. For in truth he does wonders who living among riches, does not give up his heart to them: therefore it is Ecclesiast. so highly commends those that are rich after this manner, Blessed is the man that is found without blemish. The rich man (says the saint) appears to be very virtuous, and perfectly fix'd to God through charity, who contracts not the blemish of sin through the love of riches, who is not carried away after the desire of gold, &c. Kao Fuen preserv'd himself so many years poor, humble, and uncorrupted, among so many covetous and so many proud men as are in China. It is very rare. S. Thomas in Job i. lect. 2. has these words concerning pride, It usually springs from the abundance of temporal things. Kao had an estate, revenues, and great places, and yet liv'd poor, and humble. Few are to be found among Christians that will imitate him.

13. In the reign of the emperor Tang Hoang Ti, a rebel took a captain whose name was Xing Jeu Su; he commanded him to write to a brother he had who was governor of a city, to deliver it up to him: and if you do it not, said he, I will this moment put you to death. Jeu Su writ to this effect, I poor-spirited and base man fell into the hands of these robbers, and perform'd not the duty of a subject, since I lost not my life in defence of the place the emperor intrusted me withal; be you true and faithful to the emperor tho' it cost you your life. The rebel took the letter, read it, and having a while consider'd on it, said to him, Thou art an honourable, noble, and loyal gentleman, thou deservest not death, but a thousand lives; thou hast won my heart by thy worth, valour, and loyalty; I will treat thee like an intimate friend, not as a prisoner; thou shalt eat at my table, drink out of my cup, and all I have shall be thine. This is the effect of goodness and virtue, that even the greatest enemies discern, value and honour it. Would to God others who are under much greater ties, would prove so loyal upon such occasions. Some news were carried out of Europe into China, but such, as it were better no memory of them were left to posterity. Bresidas requires in a commander, valour, courage and fortitude; I know not why Jeu Su may not be well entitled to them.

14. In the reign of the emperor Tai Zung, there was a king in Canton so powerful and haughty, that he disown'd his sovereignty. The emperor order'd levies to be made to subdue him. Ngoci Chin, one of the council of state, presented a memorial to the emperor, advising to send an embassador to treat with him in a peaceable manner, by which they might save charges and bloodshed: it was done accordingly, and the king or roytelet was so pleas'd at the honour the emperor did him, that he immediately sent his son to court with a rich present, paying homage anew to the emperor, and so all was pacified and made easy. This is a good policy.

15. In short, the emperor was thankful for the good advice, and rewarded the counsellor that gave it with five hundred pieces of silk. I heard at times some rigorous proceedings against domesticks and strangers censur'd. What I most wonder'd at was, that in China a missioner, complaining of I know not what affront that had been given certain embassadors of Naples, his native country, he said, If Naples had any of the royal family, as Portugal had, it would not have been so. I own I thought it strange to come from a missioner.

CHAP. XV.

Actions and Sayings of other Emperors.

1. THE emperor Tai Zung caus'd all the materials for building a stately palace to be brought together: afterwards he consider'd further upon his design, and having maturely consulted with his pillow, he broke out into these following words, The emperor Ju employ'd many thousands of men in draining the waters, which in his time had over-flow'd the country, yet no man complain'd, because the profit and advantage was common to all. The emperor Chin built a palace with the sweat of his subjects, who complain'd and groan'd grievously, because the benefit accru'd only to the emperor, and not to the people. I considering this late and fresh example of my predecessor Chin, tho' I have all things in a readiness for building of a palace, do desist from my design, and lay aside my inclination to this new structure. The subjects understanding how their lord and emperor had argued with himself, and the resolution he had taken, they so wholly addict'd themselves to his service, and with so good a will, that by their industry the royal treasure, and the publick good was much advanc'd. The emperor argued very discreetly and wisely, but had been more commendable for doing it before he brought together the materials, which would have sav'd his subjects no small trouble.

2. The foresaid emperor went on and said; I have heard that the Barbarian of the west, call'd Hia Hu, accidentally got a stone of very great value; to secure it, he convey'd it into his bowels, and rent them to this effect. Those who heard of it laugh'd at, and made a jest of him, because he lost his life to secure a stone, valuing that jewel above his own being. Covetous kings and emperors are like him, they lose their dominions by gathering treasures by tyrannical extortion. Now what is this but tearing their bowels to secure the jewel, and so losing their life and crown? The same is done by the mandarines that are corrupted, they receive the bribe and lose their lives.

3. Covetousness is a mighty evil, it ought to be kept at a great distance from kings and princes. Samniti said, I had rather rule over those that have gold, than to have gold myself. S. Thomas, 3. de regim. princ. relates these words of Marcus Curius; Tell the Samnites that Marcus Curius had rather rich: and remember, I can neither be overthrown in battel, nor corrupted with money. Fabricius said the same. There are few Curii and Fabricii at present. Caius Tiberius Nero was advis'd to lay heavy taxes on the provinces; such are the projects of this world, such was the advice they gave to Jeroboam: he answer'd very discreetly and honourably, It is the part of a good shepherd to shear his sheep, not to devour them. Another said, the king was made for the kingdom, not the kingdom for the king. There is a medium betwixt both extremes, by keeping the law of God. Let it be well consider'd what burden the people is able to bear, and what the present necessity is; the necessity must be understood to be absolutely pressing, not such as is contriv'd; that is, it must not be caus'd by superfluous, extravagant, and unnecessary expences.

4. It is but reasonable to lay a burden upon him that has strength to bear it; but it is a madness to place the weight upon him that is not able to carry himself. The Chinese oblige all persons, from two and twenty to sixty years of age, to pay taxes, supposing they are not able to bear that burden either before or after. This is something like the duty of fasting impos'd NAVARETTE. by the church. To take a morsel of bread from him that has but two to feed four mouths, is not sheering but devouring the sheep. And what good can it do the love-reign, but breed ill blood, and oblige him to disgorge? Holy Job cap. xx. seems to say as much; His meat in his bowels is turn'd, it is the gall of asps within him. He bath swallow'd down asps, and he shall vomit them up again, God shall cast them out of his belly. Which verifies what Eccles. says of the covetous man, chap. v. Riches kept for the owners thereof to their hurt. Read Oleaster in Num. xxi. he speaks admirably to the purpose.

5. In the reign of this emperor, which was six hundred and thirty six years after the incarnation of CHRIST, the light of the gospel came into China. It continued two hundred years in great vogue, followed by many, and favour'd by this and other emperors, as appears by the stone found in the province of Xen Si. What seems to make against a thing so plain in our opinion, is, that tho' the Chineses are so very exact in their annals and histories, yet not the least memory of it is found there. This makes not only the heathens, but even the Christians doubtful in this case. For this reason, when the persecution was begun, the governors and our enemy, supposing it to be an invention of the missionaries, they sent trusty persons to that province to enquire into it; what the event of it was we did not hear. What we are assured of, allowing the said story to be authentick, is, that those servants of God did not escape without some trouble and persecution, tho' eight emperors favour'd them. F. Kircher speaks much to this purpose, p. 1, 2. and again p. 34.

Information necessary to a prince.

Eccles. vi. 34. If thou love to bear, thou wilt be wise.

6. Tai Zung, who was one of the famous emperors of China, ask'd the counsellor Chin beforemention'd; What it was that made a prince famous and renown'd among his subjects, and the contrary? He answer'd, That emperor who hears all men, is famous and renown'd; he that gives ear only to one man, is wicked, and cannot govern well. The reason of it is, because a favourite to secure his post, speaks what is pleasing to the prince, concealing the grievances of the monarchy and subjects, persuading him they are rich and in plenty, tho' they be starving; so that many kings have been ruin'd by being thus impos'd on. But when the prince hears all men, he cannot be deceiv'd nor flatter'd, for there are always some open-hearted and unbiass'd persons, who make the truth known, tho' many endeavour to conceal it; for there are always some zealous for the publick good, and careful of your majesty's honour. You are in the right, an-swer'd the emperor, and added; All men say, the emperor is in so high a station, and has so much power, that he needs fear nothing. I am of another opinion: the emperor ought to fear heaven, as a son does his father, who can punish, take away his crown, and bestow it on another. (This is the common opinion of the Chineses, and the usual way of talking in that country. The ancients call'd Saturn the son of heaven, Lactan. de fals. relig. cap. 20.) On earth he fears his subjects, whose eyes are always on the emperor, censuring and railing at his actions, whence ensue the turmoils and revolutions of states. Therefore it is requisite he live cautiously and with much moderation, always apprehending lest he does not perform what heaven requires at his hands, and his subjects expect. The counsellor commendeth his discourse, and exhorted him to act according to it. I think both of them spoke very discreetly. The saying of Rodulphus the founder of the Austrian family, agrees well with Chin's opinion: Come to me all men, for I was not call'd to empire to be shut up in a chest. He was for seeing and hearing all men. Ferdinand the first gave admittance to all men; and seeing once they stop'd a woman who desir'd to come to speak to him, he said, If we exclude the poor from our presence, what will become of us before the tribunal of God? A mighty expression, and admirable words! Bernulaus writes it. Moses spent the whole day in hearing the people. The emperor fear'd heaven, because he knew no other deity or god. Those who thro' the divine mercy have obtain'd a great share of light, have greater cause to fear and consider that God is their father, their king, their lord and master, who as he gave them crowns and scepters gratis, so he can take them away and inflict them on others, and besides, bestow everlasting punishments on the soul. Therefore it is said, that the first thing a king ought to conceive, is, that God is absolute lord of all things; and it is most certain that all things prosper with him that truly serves and honours him. My holy father S. Thomas has excellent lines to this purpose, lib. I. de reg. princ. he makes out his assertion by what happened to Solomon, for whilst he continued to worship the true God, his kingdom and glory still advanced. He fail'd in that particular, and soon found a general decay in all respects. The same happened to his son. In order to govern well, it is absolutely necessary to give ear to all men. There are some that have but one ear, which proves of very dangerous consequence; God gave two, and both ought to be made use of. We have heard with our ears, said David. I hear with both ears, ears, let both play their part, and let neither be stopp'd when the other hears. Others have never a one, for they hear with neither. And what is worst of all, others will not have them, for through a conceit they have of themselves, they fancy they know and understand all things: these are most likely to commit mistakes.

7. At this time there were great swarms of locusts in China. The emperor went out into his gardens, and taking up some of them spoke these words; The people maintain themselves on wheat, rice, &c. you come to devour and destroy it, without leaving any thing behind; it were better you should devour my bowels, than the food of my subjects. He went to swallow them; and some that stood by telling him they were venomous, he answer'd, I value not my life when it is for the good of my subjects and people; and immediately he swallow'd them. The history tells us, the locusts that very moment took wing, and went off without doing any harm that year.

8. Strange was the love this heathen bore his subjects, the consequence was wonderful. Why may we not say, God rewarded the compassion of this emperor, and his zeal for the good of his people? If it was not so, what can we attribute that prodigy to? We know for certain, there is no good action but what God rewards, as shall be said in another place; why then should that pass unrecompens'd? The emperor expos'd his life for his people. This is no more than a wise man said, viz.

Execution of criminals.

A good king is the publick servant. The king is for the kingdom, and not the contrary. To shew his tenderness yet further, he afterwards made a law, that the magistrates should fast the day that any criminals were executed, that neither flesh nor wine should be put upon his imperial table that day, that no plays should be acted at court, nor there should be no musick, or other demonstration of joy. He said, It was a matter of high consequence, and a subject of much compassion, to take away any man's life tho' his crimes deserv'd it. The law was observ'd as long as he liv'd.

Vigilance.

9. Governing an empire, said the good emperor, is like curing a distemper; if he that is upon the recovery is careless, or exceeds, he relapses with great danger of his life. The monarchy now enjoys peace, the Barbarians on the frontiers are quell'd, a happiness rarely known in past ages; if relying on this calm I grow negligent or unruly, a relapse will ensue, and the late rebellions will be renew'd with greater danger of utter ruin. Therefore no day passes but I am upon my guard, for fear this present prosperity should have an end. For this reason I desire you my NAVY-COUNSELLORS, that at all times, and upon all occasions, you give me your advice, and reprove me for all the errors you judge I commit. Could Philip the second have spoken better?

10. He preferr'd Li Xi Zu his counsellor to a great employment, and he presently fell sick to death. The physicians said, that the hair of the beard reduc'd to powder (a strange medicine) and drank in wine, were the only remedy to cure that distemper. The sick man was much troubled to hear that prescription; (for the Chineses put a high value on their hair and beard, a great madness when his life lay at stake) the emperor heard of it, he presently cut off his beard, which being administer'd to the sick man, he recover'd. When recover'd, he went to return thanks; and the emperor said, I did it not for your sake, but for my own and the empire's, who stand in need of such ministers as you are, therefore thank me not for it. The Chineses make great account of the emperor's cutting off his beard to recover his counsellor in that extremity; and if it was such a man as he represented him, he acted as might be expected from his zeal for his people. It cannot be deny'd but a good minister is highly to be valued, a prince cannot do too much for him.

11. He left excellent instructions to his son in his will. In the first place he said to him; raise and make petty kings of your own family. This in China is excellent policy, perhaps it may not be so in other places; the more the emperor is supported by kindred, the safer he is. Secondly, Seek wise and virtuous men to employ in your councils and places of trust. A hard and difficult point; men change in high posts, and princes cannot divine; No man is bound to divine, says the civil law. There are many, says Tacitus, an. 3. who seem unfit for preferments, and yet being once rais'd to them, they discharge them with much zeal and uprightness. There are others who seem to be men of great parts and ability, and afterwards prove vicious and unfit for government. They conceal their vices at first, but having attain'd to the preferment, they return to their old customs. Others are contrary to these. Otho having been a loose liver in Rome, when prefect of Lusitania, alter'd, and govern'd very well. All men thought Galba worthy of the empire, and yet he was a wicked emperor; Tit. Liv. lib. I. hist. Quintus Fabius Maximus was extraordinary lewd, and when rais'd to dignities extremely modest; Budaus, in l. fin. chart. 147. Thirdly, Examine those that are to be mandarines. Fourthly, Receive all memorials that

NAVA- that are to give advice. Fifthly, Remove from about you all slanderers and flatterers. Sixthly, Have a care of haughty and proud men. Seventhly, Honour those that are moderate and sparing. Eighthly, Reward the good, and punish the bad. Ninthly, Have special regard to the husbandman's labour. Read Oleaster, in Num. i. ad mores & cap. ii. Tenthly, Keep your soldiers always well disciplin'd, that you may not be surpriz'd by unexpected accidents. Thus you will establish your crown. After this the emperor dy'd, leaving behind him instructions and doctrine that all men may benefit by. What European could leave better precepts with all the learning that is among us?

CHAP. XVI.

Other Instances still upon the same Subject.

Hien Zung's bearing of reproof.

1. THE emperor Hien Zung had a counsellor who was so upright, that he reprov'd him for every fault. The emperor dreaded him on this account, and was very melancholy and drooping. The other counsellors said to him; Ever since Han Hieu (this was the counsellor's name) has taken upon him to give your majesty memorials of advice, you are melancholy and lean. Will it not be convenient, sir, that you give him some employment, and under that pretence send him from court, and so your majesty will be eas'd of him? The emperor answer'd, It is true, I am melancholy, and fallen away, I don't disown it, but my empire is fat and flourishing. Hieu's counsels, which by reason they are continual, sharp and quick, waste and perplex me, make the empire thrive. By my putting them in execution, the government is kept up, tho' I be somewhat impair'd. Other counsels that are given me, suite with my taste and relish, I shall grow fat if I follow them, but the people will grow lean; but Hieu's resolute and open-hearted remonstrances make me live in security, and advance my interest, tho' they somewhat weaken me; therefore I will always have him by me, not for my private satisfaction, but for the general good of my subjects.

2. Many arguments are generally alledg'd to prove that a minister of state ought not to be too rigid, and that he must not press too hard upon the prince (few are troubled with such ministers) that publick affairs must take their course, &c. but they may take such a course as may ruin all. I am for the practice of Hien Zung. Oleaster in 24 ad mores, writes with admiration, how usual it is to flatter the prince's inclination.

Emperor ploughs and reaps.

3. This emperor instituted a ceremony which continues to this day. He would go out to his orchard, there he plough'd the ground himself, sow'd corn, and when ripe, reap'd and carry'd it in. He commanded his sons and nobility to do the same, and gave two reasons for it. The first was, that the flower and bread being us'd in the sacrifices they offer to the emperors departed, it was not proper any other but the emperor should sow and reap that corn, which shew'd his respect and submission to his progenitors. Observe here how great account the Cbineses make of the sacrifices to their ancestors, neither the emperor, nor any other man of any worth does the like for any person living. The second reason was, to make his sons and nobility sensible of the pains and labour the husbandman takes in tilling the earth, and gathering in its fruits, on which all men subsist. Hence, said he, will ensue a moderation in expences, and privileges will be granted to them that live expos'd to the weather in the fields. It were good to bring up this ceremony, that some persons might not keep so many beasts, and that lords might have compassion of their vassals.

4. The emperor Ta Zung order'd, that nothing which was rare and singular should be offer'd to the emperors, such as beasts, jewels, stuffs, &c. brought from far countries; and he turn'd out of his palace, all he found there of this sort. He said, the revenues of the empire were not to maintain beasts, or clothe the emperor, but to maintain the subjects, and clothe the soldiers and the poor. This expression, in my opinion, would have become a S. Lewis, or a S. Ferdinand.

5. A curious map delicately drawn was presented him, which he refus'd to receive, saying, The fruitful and abundant year, when my subjects have plenty of sustenance, is the map I love to divert my eyes on. The best map in my opinion, is to find wise, discreet, and virtuous men to put into employments. This heathen was very nice. Many will commend him, but I should be glad if it were but a few would follow his example. A Lapide, in Gen. xlix. v. 15. has something to this purpose, see it there.

6. He said to one of his counsellors, I would fain retrench unnecessary expences, and save charges, that my people might live in quiet and ease; but to the end my design may succeed, I must begin at my self. He did so.

Xi Zung provides for his people in a famine.

Infant- princes.

7. This agrees with what Tacitus writes in the life of Agricola: Beginning by himself and his family, he retrench'd his own family first, &c. Cassiodorus Lib. X. Var. Epist. 5. says, We will begin good order in our own family, that others may be abash'd to do amiss, when it is known we do not allow our people the liberty of transgressing. Lycurgus king of Macedon reform'd the commonwealth: yet so that he made no law to bind others, till he had first practis'd it himself. Bias said he was a good king, who himself first gave obedience to his country's laws. Read Eccl. chap. x. v. 21. All depends on the head, said the philosopher. S. Thomas speaks of it in Joan. xxi. lect. 3. where he has good doctrine to this purpose. To save forces is a great means to save charges. S. Greg. Nazian. orat. 9. says, Wars proceed from ambition, from wars taxes, than which nothing is more severely condemn'd and blam'd in the divine judgment. Arms must be taken up when there is no other remedy. The emperor Marcion said, Whilst we can be in peace, let us not bring on war. War is a cantery, a bitter purge, which does harm, and no good, unless apply'd in the utmost extremity.

Xi Zung provides for his people in a famine.

8. In the reign of the emperor Xi Zung, there was a famine in the southern provinces, he order'd a course should be taken to relieve that want. His council answer'd, it was impossible to relieve all that wanted, because they were an innumerable multitude. The emperor said, my subjects the people are my children, I am their father; what father is so inhuman, that he will not relieve his children, when he sees them starving? what do I value my revenues and treasures, but to supply such wants as these? The counsellors hearing this noble resolution, took such effectual care that all might be reliev'd, without leaving any one person in distress. A glorious action, which would be highly applauded in the holiest king or pope the world ever had.

Infant-princes.

9. The emperor Tai Zu's mother being near her end, call'd her son and ask'd him, Whence had you the empire? he answer'd, From my forefathers merits. It is not so, said the empress, (and she was in the right, for her husband had usurp'd it tyrannically from his predecessor, which violence her son call'd merit.) Hear me now, son, when you die leave your brother your heir; and so when he dies let him leave his younger brother; for that empire which has an emperor who is at age, and can enter upon the government, is safe; but if it falls into childrens hands, they neither can, nor know how to govern it, so that it is expos'd to danger. Her son did so. The empress was a discreet woman, and seeing that her predecessor having left a child but seven NAVA-years old his heir, he was dethron'd, she RETTE. feared lest the same might happen to her son, if he should leave an infant-prince his heir.

10. This is not a precaution to be practis'd in all places. We have in our days seen great monarchies left to infants. That of Spain to Charles the second now reigning, whom God preserve. That of Cbina to the present emperor, who was but five years of age, took upon him the government at thirteen, and in my time discharg'd himself of it to the general satisfaction of all people. They substituted one year, as the custom there is, that he might begin to govern at fourteen. The emperor of Japan was left but young.

11. The counsellor Zao Pu presented a Constancy memorial containing, that it was requisite of a counsellor. to change the mandarines, to raise some, and put down others. The emperor was offended at it, and answered, I will not do at present as you advise. Pu reply'd, The reward or punishment of it depends not on your majesty's consenting to, or opposing it, but on the right and reason of the thing. A resolute expression, yet justifiable. No man ought to govern himself by his will and pleasure. Reason and judgment ought to give laws; the will is blind and incapable of direction and government. When the Pharisees said to our LORD, Matth. xii. We will see a sign from thee; Cajetan takes notice of the word, we will, and says, observe the rashness. It is a rashness for man to suffer himself to be led away by his will, to act according to it, without regard to the rules and law of reason.

12. The emperor was in disorder (for great men do not love to hear such naked truths) and in a pet retir'd to his apartment, (another would have vented passion after another manner.) Pu followed him to the door, where he waited a great while with much resolution and constancy, and without fearing to displease his lord, so he did the duty of his office. The emperor was pacify'd, and approving of his minister's zeal, perform'd all he had advis'd; telling him there at the door where he found him waiting, that he was well pleas'd at the zeal he had shewn. I know not which of them deserves most commendation, whether the emperor for his patience, or the counsellor for his constancy. Esoy said to Solon, Kings are to be spoken to as little as possible, or in as soft a manner as may be. Solon answered, Not so, but it must be either with much integrity, or not at all. So did Pu. He that is so bold exposes himself to much danger. Tacit. lib. I. hist. It is a thing of much trouble to persuade a prince to

13. A few days after he presented another memorial against a counsellor, it took no effect; he repeated it another day, to no purpose; he try'd again the third time. The emperor in a passion tore the memorial. Pu very calmly gathered all the pieces, and putting them in their places pasted them together, and so offer'd it again to the emperor. He yielding to the minister's resolution, did as he desired. Here it is worth discussing, which deserves most commendation, whether the emperor's patience, or the counsellor's resolution. Let the wise decide it.

care of his soldiers. 14. Cien Vu, the emperor's general, was in the kingdom of Cho with a mighty army. One day it snow'd, and the emperor be- thinking himself of the cold and misery his soldiers endur'd, said, It is not reasonable that I should be in my palace clad in silks and fables at my ease, faring well and sleeping heartily, and that my soldiers should be in the field, standing under all this snow that falls, and perhaps many of them have not wherewithal to cover their nakedness. This said, he took off his fables, and causing a vast quantity of skins and garments to be got together, sent them to the army. The soldiers rejoicing that their lord the emperor was so mindful of them, gave great acclamations, swore either to conquer or die in his service, and overthrew the enemy.

15. The action had been great in Charles the fifth: what the soldiers perform'd, well deserv'd the emperor's kindness, perhaps without it the victory had not been obtain'd. He purchas'd it with the garments and skins he sent. There is no doubt but soldiers are much encourag'd when they feel the effects of such a remembrance. Reward is a great heartner, says the philosopher in the third of his morals. Those seem to be bravest in battel, among whom cowards are unregarded, and valiant men honour'd. This is the same as Lisander said, when they ask'd him, Which commonwealth he best liked? he answered, That which gives brave men and cowards what each of them deserves.

ation. 16. This emperor, in order to reform the people, began with himself and his court, according to what has been said above. His daughter the princess was refractory; to bring her to his beck, her father said, What is done and practis'd at court is an example the whole empire looks upon; if they see virtue there, all men imitate it; if they discover vice and extravagancy, they all follow the same course. I receive the revenues and taxes of the empire, not to spend them in costly clothes and excess, but to maintain the army, the civil officers, and to supply the people's necessities. The princess submitted immediately. This was excellent doctrine. If the crown-revenues, taxes, and incomes, were only employ'd in this manner, much good would come of it. The ninth synod of Toledo observ'd the same method the Chinese emperor did, in order to the reformation it design'd, and has these words: In regard he does not rightly judge his subjects, who curbs not himself first by the rules of justice, it has seem'd a proper expedient to us, first to moderate our own extravagances, and then to mend the faults of the subjects, &c. The council of Trent de reform. takes the same course. S. Epbrem Syrus among other matters handles this point, tom. I. de vit. spirit. num. 36.

17. This emperor overthrew the family Hsi de Tang; the king Lo Vuang submitted to him. The emperor seeing him prostrate at his feet, said to him with tears in his eyes, Alas, what miseries and calamities does a war cause! what murders, robberies and insolencies have been committed in the court of Tang! alas what pity! then he presently order'd a great quantity of rice to be distributed among the conquer'd people. The Chinese histories highly commend this compassion, and with great reason. He was little puff'd up in his victory and triumph. Read to this purpose what Oleafer writes in Num. xxi. ad mores in fine.

18. The emperor Tai Zung brought eighty thousand volumes into his library, which was divided into three large rooms richly adorn'd. Observe how much had been printed at that time in China, for all the books were in that language, and writ by Chinese authors. How much must they be increas'd since then? Ptolomy Philadelphus got together sixty thousand volumes, but they were of several nations and countries. Others say they were seventy thousand, gather'd out of Chaldea, Egypt and Rome. Vincentius his library had a hundred and twenty thousand volumes: that of Pergamus two hundred thousand. The Fasciculus Florum tells us a library of four hundred thousand books was burnt in Egypt in the time of Hyrchanus. A noble library, and great disaster! but what I affirm is, that there never was a library like that of China, of one only kingdom, and at present it might be made three or four times as large. The emperor was so addicted to reading, that he every day turn'd over one or two volumes. They are not so large as ours in Europe. A counsellor told him it was not convenient to take so much pains, or spend so much time in reading. The emperor answer'd, Reading is not troublesome, but profitable and diverting: This year I would read read a thousand volumes. Books teach how to govern, they give instructions for peace and war, without books we are all in the dark; this makes me so fond of them, because I desire to know how to govern my monarchy.

19. Histories by representing to us the punishment of vice, deter us from it; and by shewing the reward of virtue, excite us to practise it. So said the emperor Basilius to his son, exhorting him to read them. But that is true which Tacitus teaches us, lib. VI. hist. viz. That a prince's knowledge is not to serve to exert his learning, but to make him know how to govern, and to shew resolution in adversity: let him know as much as is necessary and no more; and that must be such a knowledge as is necessary to govern well, not a notional learning to distract him; or let him learn holy things, as Robert king of Sicily did.

20. Tertullian apolog. cap. 5. calls Trajan, a searcher into all that was curious. Athanas. lib. VIII. cap. 16. calls him a mighty lover of learning. The same may be said of Tai Zung for the reason above. Let the prince that finds his inclination lie this way check himself, as Julius Agricola did. Let him not follow the example of king Alonso the wife altogether. Spondanus, tom. II. says of him, that he read over the bible fourteen times with its comments: A wonderful thing in a man that had so much care and business upon his hands! A. Lapide mentions the same ex panorm. encom. S. Scripturæ sect. 2. num. 60. Periander said, Meditation is the life of a wise man, and to a learned man to think is to live.

21. In Cbina they are very careful to bring up the emperors to study, because it is very necessary for that government, otherwise they cannot understand the memorials: they use so much rhetorick, such tropes and figures in them, that the emperors must be very understanding to dive into the meaning of them. When all we missionaries were confin'd in the province of Canton, a learned Christian form'd a memorial for us, to be presented to the supreme governor; it was so full of bombast and hyperboles, that none of us understood it, till we had heard it explain'd: he call'd the emperor, the heavenly palace, the governor we spoke of, the tribunal of heaven, and said they lifted up their eyes to him, as we did to heaven. Strange extolling of them, and humbling of us, under unusual similes and figures! they take great pains, and study these things very hard.

22. The Chinese nation is much addicted to learning, and inclin'd to reading. I have met men on the road in sedans or palankins on men's shoulders, with a book in their hands. In cities I have often seen mandarines in the same manner. The NAVARRI tradesmen and shop-keepers sit behind their counters with books before them. To encourage the children to learn, in their primmers they have particular examples, and the cuts of men that rise to great preferment by their learning. Among the rest there is one of a man that kept cows; he rode upon one of them, as is usual in that country, with a book laid on her horns that serv'd instead of a desk, and so he studied all the day. After some years he grew so learned, that he took his degree, and came to be a great mandarin. They tell of another, who was so poor that he could not buy oil for his lamp to study by at night; and because he would not lose time in winter, he us'd to go out to study by the light of the snow. Another gather'd abundance of glow-worms, and studied by their light. There was another poor man had a little room which was parted but by a slender lath-wall from a rich student; and knowing the place where his table and light stood, he made a hole opposite to it, and studied by the light that came through it. These men and others they bring as examples, they all rise to high preferments. There have been abundance of authors among them, but none of them has writ of so much as the ancients of other nations. Aristarchus writ above a thousand commentaries upon several subjects. Chrysippus wrote above seven hundred volumes. Dydimus Alexandrinus, as Hesychius affirms, wrote three thousand five hundred books. Dionysius Grammaticus three thousand five hundred. Trismegistus thirty six thousand five hundred and twenty five. This authors affirm. The Chinese are much addicted to reading of their own histories, and to say truth, they are much in the right. Cicero said, History is the witness of time, the light of truth, the life of memory, the mistress of life, the record of antiquity. See Marquez, lib. I. of his Christian governor, cap. 4.

23. Prince Juen Kie rais'd an artificial mount with great expence and labour of the people, he feasted the mandarines upon it, and they were astonish'd at the work; one of them, whose name was Chao Tan, hung down his head, and seem'd penfive and sad. The prince ask'd him the reason, and he answer'd, Sir, my eyes will not bear to look upon a mount made of blood and sweat. Is this a mount of blood and sweat, said the prince? When I was in my village, answer'd Tan, I saw and heard the oppression of the people, who were forc'd to contribute silver towards this work, many wrought without being paid their hire, multitudes were lash'd, their complaints went up to heaven, the blood how can your highness think much, I should call this we stand on a mount of blood and sweat? Let it be immediately demolish'd, said the prince full of concern, let it be all laid level, let not one stone be left upon another, nor any memory of this structure. I order'd a mount of pastime and diversion to be rais'd, not a mount of extortion to my subjects. A mount of so much blood is no place of diversion, but a scandal to all the world; the very foundations shall be taken up. It was perform'd accordingly.

tion of it made no amends for past harms.

Other memorable Passages of Emperors and others.

Counsel to 1. THE emperor Xin Zung was an ene-Xin Zung. my to idols, and caus'd abundance to be destroy'd: Y Kien a counsellor presented him a memorial of advice, wherein he said, 1. Your majesty may be pleas'd to shut out sectaries and idle people, who introduce false doctrines, and outward prayers, in order to get preferments and revenues. (Who doubts but it is destructive to monarchy to allow of several sects? God preserv'd Spain. F. James Faber in Canton said and maintain'd, that it was better there should be hereticks publickly allow'd in France, than an inquisition in Spain; I find no reason that he had for it, but the natural affection to his country.)

2. Your majesty may be pleas'd to forbid and punish bribery, which disturbs the peace and government. 3. Not to admit of flatterers, in whose words there is no truth, and less in their actions. Of these Rodulphus said, That flatterers were not unlike to wolves; for as these devour asses by tickling and scratching them, so flatterers make use of fawning and endearing words to ruin princes. They are the plague of kings and kingdoms, says John Sarisber. It is lawful to flatter him whom it is lawful to kill. 4. Let your majesty order lewd women to be banished. 5. Do not admit of eunuchs, as favourites. (From them generally have begun the rebellions.) 6. Do not burthen the people with much labour, taking up the time they should employ in husbandry.
7. Moderate expences, for no revenue can suffice for those that are needles. 8. Let no offices be bought or sold, which will open a way to much extortion, and pre-ferments will be bestow'd on rich, not on deserving men. The emperor made great account of these counsels, and commanded them to be practis'd. All these instructions are agreeable to reason, and have been hinted at in other places.

2. The casting down of idols by Christians in lands of infidels is difficult, and meets with some inconveniences, as has been found by experience upon some occasions. F. Gourvea made his complaint to me, that there was some disturbance about this business at Xang Hai, where F. Brancato resided several years. The twenty sixth canon of the council of Illiberis, or Granada, has these words: If any man break down idols, and be there slain, in regard it is not written in the gospel, nor ever appears to have been done by the apostles, it has been thought fit that he be not receiv'd into the number of martyrs. True it is, S. Theodorus, whose feast is kept on the ninth of November, suffer'd martyrdom for having burnt a temple of idols; and S. Marcellus bishop suffer'd martyrdom in Apamea of Syria for having overthrown a temple of Jupiter. On the sixteenth of June the fathers of the society in Canton read of five martyrs, who suffer'd in the island of Salsete, and one of them died for having overthrown an idol temple. I doubt not but some would despise this action in another, and call it imprudent. The emperor Xin Zung, as soon as he was crown'd, ask'd a counsellor, which was the first thing appertain-ing to the government? He answer'd, To establish good laws. He ask'd again, Are such an emperor's laws good? The other reply'd, Sir, do not imitate that emperor, who had no virtue, but rather the em-perors Jao and Xun, whose laws and lives were both good. The council was good too, but had been better if he had said, that the love, fear, and dread of God was the first thing. Had the counsellor known God, I doubt not but he would have said it. S. Cyril Alexandrinus de recta fide, That a glorious piety towards God is the ground-work of regal honour; and that princes addicted to piety, overcome and subdue their adversaries without any labour.

3. The seventh year of this empire was a great dearth, a terrible famine and mortality ensued. An eunuch who govern'd some provinces caus'd the miseries and calamities of the people to be painted, and sent the piece to the emperor, writing along with it to this effect; Sir, be pleas'd to look upon that picture, and by it you will understand the condition of your subjects:

jects: if your majesty applies some remedy, heaven will soon send rain; if not, my head shall pay for it. The emperor lamented the misfortune of his people, slept not that night, the next day took off all taxes and duties. At these news the people took heart, and to make their joy the fuller, there fell so much rain, that the land was glutted, and the scarcity ceas'd.

Intelligence.

4. The viceroys and governors in Cbina take special care to acquaint the emperor with all that happens within their governments, whether good or bad. If there happens a famine, dearth, floods, &c. presently word is sent to the emperor. Thus he hears of all the misfortunes of his subjects, and the news is sent from court throughout all the empire. In the year 68 there were mighty earthquakes in the province of Xan-Tung; advice was sent to court, and soon after the news came from thence to Canton.

Earthquake. 1668.

Peace.

5. The emperor Xao Zung was once ask'd, When the empire would enjoy peace and quietness? he answer'd, When the mandarines pencils are clean, and when military officers don't fear death. He spoke discreetly, and like a man of sense in both particulars. There they write with pencils as we do with pens; the peace and tranquillity of the publick depends much upon magistrates carrying their pens fair, and taking no bribes. The second point is of no less consequence. It is well known the northern people fear death less than the southern; the reason of it is, because they are more sanguine, and therefore fitter for war. Epaminondas said, death in war is most glorious. This emperor ask'd Cbao Si-zen the general of his forces, What rules do you prescribe to your soldiers to make them always victorious in battle, as you ever are? My rules, sir, said he, are piety, fidelity, prudence, courage, and severity, these virtues make soldiers invincible. He gave them good weapons. Brasidas requires three things in a soldier, will, fear and obedience: Three other things in a commander, wisdom, valour and watchfulness. Aratus was wont to say, it was the part of a soldier not to value his life. Read Liv. Dec. 1. and Cæsar apud Valer. l. II. c. 8.

Mats.

6. The emperor Tai Zung refus'd to accept of some very curious mats certain peasants presented him. In the Philippine islands, Japan, Cbina, Camboxa, and other places, especially in Ceylon, there are some so fine, so curious and delicate, that they may well be presented as a rarity to the greatest princes in Europe. The treasurer told him that was a mere trifle, that he need make no scruple of accepting them. But the emperor who was wise and nothing covetous, answer'd, How shall he have the command of himself in great temptations, who cannot overcome the small? an excellent expression. The saying hits well in this place, trust not a dog with meat, that uses to lick ashes. There was a strange example of this sort at Manila, the man got the name of the just judge, his memory will be lasting in that island, his name was Major Andrew Perez Navarro, he was my great friend, and would not accept of so much as a little fruit for all the world. But Tai Zung certainly outdoes all men living, or that ever will be; for he being supreme lord was above his own and his predecessors laws, and accountable to no man, which are the considerations that often restrain inferiors from holding out their hands to receive.

NAVARRA RETTE.

7. This emperor went out into the fields, Husbandmen took the prince with him, and seeing the husbandmen busy at their labour, said to him, Son, take notice how much pains these poor men take all the year about to maintain you and me. This is the reason I always have been careful to favour these people, because without their labour and sweat, you nor I should have no kingdom nor empire. This saying deserv'd to be extoll'd, had it come from the mouth of any European prince. Another time seeing the storks and other birds building their nests, and looking to their young ones, he said to the prince, Don't you mind with how much tenderness and affection these birds bring up and feed their young ones? do you take example by them, and be careful to assist those that gave you your being.

8. In the third year of his empire there was an extraordinary dearth. The emperor cloth'd himself in sackcloth, put on straw buskins, went to a temple, where sacrifices were offer'd to the mountains and streams of rivers; in the day time he stood in the sun without any shelter, at night he lay upon the bare ground. After three days the history tells it rain'd plentifully. It is likely God look'd upon the compassion the emperor shew'd for his people.

9. Writing of buskins, I bethought myself of what I have often seen in Cbina, which is, that on the roads, at a league or two, or sometimes less distance, there are men who weave buskins for the people that travel afoot; so that those who come to these places, if their buskins are torn or out of order, change them, or buy new ones, and need not carry more than they have on. Hundreds of them may be bought by the way at four-pence half-penny the pair.

10. The emperor V Zung design'd a progress into the northern provinces: a counsellor whose name was Mao Ki, oppos'd it, saying, it was not convenient. The emperor in a passion laid hold on his sabre, and said, Pass the order for my journey immediately,

11. To take off the mandarin's cap and robe before the emperor or his ministers, is as much as to own himself worthy of death.

12. I forgot in the foregoing paragraph to observe, that according to Cornelius à Lapide and Menocius, the custom of putting on sackcloth upon publick calamities, is of great antiquity. The first, say they, that us'd it, was Jacob upon the imagin'd death of his son Joseph. It is an ancient practice in Cbina, and frequent in holy writ, where we find many kings us'd it in the publick necessities.

CHAP. XVIII.

Other Passages like to those we have already mention'd.

Xi Zung's liberality in a famine. 1. IN the reign of the emperor Xi Zung, there was so great a famine in the northern provinces, that men eat one another. The emperor reliev'd his people with a great sum of money; the effect of his compassionate heart, said St. Gregory; for never does he who is truly compassionate, deny his neighbour that which is necessary. There is the same difference, says S. Thomas, lib. I. de reg. princ. betwixt a legal king and a tyrant, as is between the shepherd and the hireling; read more of it there. Xi Zung acted like a good king, a good father, and a good shepherd, laying open his bowels to maintain his people.

Vuen Ti's preference of the people. 2. The emperor Vuen Ti was no less compassionate; he understanding that the sacrifices offer'd to heaven, earth, and spirits, were only to ask blessings and prosperity for him, put out an edict, commanding they should first beg his subjects happiness, and his afterwards. The governor of Manila was not so humble, for he us'd his utmost endeavours to have special mention made of him in the collect, & samulos tuos, which is sung in the mass. The case was bandy'd backwards, and forwards, not without some distaste. This happen'd before I came to the islands. This emperor was a great lover of husbandmen, and of those that broke up ground to sow; he forgave all taxes for the first years, and then made the duties easy. A good provision and form of government, to make provisions plentiful. Read S. Thomas on the first to Hebr. Lett. 4. where there is much to this purpose. It would be an excellent method for converting of thousands of heathens that live in the island of Mindoro, near to that of Manila, to forgive them some years taxes, and ease them of their personal duties. These burdens withhold them, and delay their conversion. S. Gregory the pope us'd the same method with heathens, and Jews, as I shall observe in the second tome. It is pity, that tho' it lies so conveniently, no care is taken of a thing that so much concerns the service of God and the king. I have heard positive orders have been given to this effect; I know not why they are not put in execution. Some reasons were brought for not practising this method with the Cbinese infidels of Manila, but they will not hold in respect of the Indians.

3. The emperor Vu Ti being left very young, two counsellors govern'd for him. The history tells us that one of them, whose name was Ho Kuang, going constantly into the inward part of the palace, talking and discoursing with the empress and ladies, on account of his employment, for the space of twenty years; yet the least objection could not be made against his carriage, nor was there ever any ground for jealousy of him as to the women. A thing to be admir'd, not only in a heathen, but in any very good Christian. Concerning Je Tan, who was the other counsellor, the history says, that during ten years he continued in the same employment, he never lifted up his eyes from the ground, or look'd the empress, or any lady in the face. When he was upon business, he never stood near the empress or ladies, but at the greatest distance he could, hearing very sedately what they had to say. This it is the Cbinese heathens did, whom among us they look upon as barbarians; perhaps some wicked perverse wretch may call this modesty and reservedness, barbarity. The legend admires in S. Lewis Gonzaga, and with good reason, that he never look'd the empress in the face, tho' he serv'd her two years. No doubt it was great modesty; yet comparing all circumstances, and the professions of both of them, it plainly appears it cannot compare with Je Tan's modesty, without reckoning upon the principles from which they proceeded. No less reservedness is requisite to come off clear and untainted from such conversation.

These are dangerous encounters, the way to come off victorious is to fly and keep far from them, A Lapid. in Gen. xxxix. v. 12. These two counsellors deserve great commendations. What S. Gregory admires in Job, There was a man in the land of Uz, might be apply'd to the two heathens we speak of. S. Thomas his observation on Rev. ii. is not amiss here: I know where thou dwellest, where the seat of Satan is. Nor that of Job c. xxx. I was the brother of dragons. And it might be said to them with S. Paul, Phil. ii. v. 25. In the midst of a deprav'd nation, &c. Let the reader turn to S. Jer. in Flor. Verb. Malum, and to S. Bernard, Ep. 24. ad Hugonem.

4. The emperor Kuang Vu going out a hunting, was so intent on his sport, that when he return'd to court the gates were shut. The officer that commanded at one of them was call'd upon, and answer'd, according to the duty of my office I cannot open the gate at this time. The emperor hearing the answer, went away to another, which was open'd to him without any difficulty. The next day he that refus'd to open presented a memorial to the emperor, to this effect. The great emperor Vuen Vuang (they all look upon him as a great man and a saint) spent not his time in hunting and sports, being always employ'd in the affairs of the government. Your majesty employs not only the day, but a great part of the night in hunting, that is not the way to preserve the empire, and answer the business your subjects come to court about.

5. The emperor received the memorial, and perceiv'd he reprov'd him for coming so late, being the cause that out of respect to him the gate was open'd, which according to the inviolable practice ought not to have been done at that time of night. He thank'd him for his advice and reproof, and order'd him a hundred pieces of cotton as a reward for not opening the gate; then punish'd him that did open, turning him down to a meaner employment. This action was approv'd of by all the court, as was the memorial, and they all applauded his courage and resolution that presented it. The very preachers will not dare to say so much in Europe.

6. This emperor taking his progress through the southern provinces, remitted a year's taxes to the inhabitants of the town of Nan Meu; the inhabitants thank'd him for the favour and grace, and pray'd him to continue it for ten years longer. The people were no fools. The emperor answer'd:

The life of man is like an earthen vessel NAVA-RETTE. that is not durable, or firm, to day he is well and in good health, and to morrow is dissolv'd to nothing; how can I remit ten years taxes when I don't know whether I have one to live? The truth of the matter is, said the clowns speaking like themselves, that your majesty does not care to lose the taxes this town is to pay for ten years, and therefore you put us off with the uncertainty of your life. The emperor laugh'd, and remitted another year. A notable calmness and affability in a heathen emperor. S. Thomas opusc. 17. cap. 13. says, that meekness, affability and bounty win the hearts of men. There are four sorts of men who easily gain friendship, the bountiful, the powerful, the meek, and the affable. Affability and meekness, though but counterfeit, work the same effect. Holy writ tells us, 2 Sam. cap. xv. v. 7. that Absalom us'd those endearments to the people, that he endeavour'd to win the hearts of the children of Israel. Another version has it, he stole the hearts, &c. To signify that by his counterfeit endearments, and affected kindness he stole and made himself master of all their hearts. It cannot be deny'd but these virtues are more visible in superiors. What was it but meekness and a mild government that gain'd such renown to Moses that great leader of God's people, and the pattern and mirror of all princes that ever were or shall be? And what is it Christ proposes to us in order to imitate him? not his mighty power, not the wonders he wrought, not the prodigies he shew'd, not his long fasting, and continual prayer, not the poverty and want of all things he endur'd in this world; he only requires of us that we imitate his temper and meekness. Learn of me, for I am meek and humble of heart.

7. One of the emperor Ming Ti's brothers was a petty king, who came to court to kiss his hand. The emperor lodg'd him in his palace, and in discourse ask'd him; what is it you most delight in at court? the petty king answer'd, my greatest delight and pastime is, to act rightly; virtue is the thing I take the greatest pleasure and satisfaction in. The emperor was well pleas'd at his answer, and favour'd him highly. One heathen made this answer to another, 'tis fit it be known to the whole world, and that we Christians be confounded at it. The petty king valu'd not himself upon spending his time in play, musick, hunting, sports, &c. his only care was to act uprightly, this was all his diversion.

9. Any body that had not known these emperors were heathens, would certainly by their actions have taken them for good Christians. We may learn compassion from the emperor Vuen Ti, tho' a heathen.

Laelius said, We ourselves understand, that a sense of affection is bred in us by nature. It is natural to man to love others, and to pity their misfortunes. The daughter's love for her father is very well worth observing, and more remarkable in China, where there is more indifferency betwixt fathers and daughters than in any other country.

1. IN the reign of the emperor Cbing Tang, there was no rain for seven years together. According to computation this happen'd in China, at the same time that the seven years famine was in Egypt, which the Scripture speaks of Gen.
xli. v. 54. And the famine prevail'd all over the earth, 1131 years after the flood, and above a thousand after the founding of the Chinese monarchy. The diviners advis'd to mix human blood in the sacrifices that were offer'd to heaven and earth. The emperor answer'd, I ask water of heaven that my people may live; if I kill men for the sacrifices, it is contradicting my self, killing those for whose lives I pray. A very good answer. The emperor fasted, cut his hair and nails (the *Chinese*s put great value upon them both) he put his chariot into mourning, and clothed himself in white lambskins. Thus he went out into the field with a devout, penitent, and serious countenance. Then fixing his eyes on heaven, he ask'd six questions of it. First, Whether there was any miscarriage in his government? Secondly, Whether his people and subjects did not perform their duty?
Thirdly, Whether due decency and modesty was not observ'd within the palace?
Fourthly, Whether there was any extrava-gancy in apparel? Fifthly, Whether there was any frauds in buying and selling?
Sixthly, Whether the dances and sports were unseemly? If there be any thing in these particulars, or any other, said he,
which is a crime against heaven, I take it upon my self, here I am, and here I offer myself up to heaven to punish me, so my people may live. It looks as if he had acted king David, when he saw the angel with the sword in his hand. Having perform'd this famous and compassionate action, not heaven, but the Creator of all things sent him abundant rain. The action was strange, and the event yet stranger.

2. Chang Ngo a great mandarin, as an acknowledgment because the emperor Cheu had given him a considerable employment, offer'd him a very beautiful and modest woman: she would not consent to actions that were against the course of nature, for which the wicked emperor caus'd her to be kill'd. Chang Ngo did not approve of the action, but it cost him his head, which was order'd to be struck off immediately.

Cheu was one of the two cruel and wicked emperors there have been in China; and it is strange that in so many thousands of years those infidels should make mention but of these two. Nor is the bravery of that woman to be little admir'd, since she durst withstand the will of a cruel, wicked, and heathen emperor. It is a very common thing in China to make presents of women, especially to persons of note, and great mandarines.

3. A subject of good note, whose name was Pi Kan, mov'd by his zeal for the public good, argued thus with himself; It is want of loyalty, when the emperor is cruel and a tyrant, that no body should reprove him. It is want of courage to be silent for fear of death when the emperor is faulty; and it is the part of a brave soul to tell him his faults. If he is told, and will not give ear, it is he is to blame. It is the greatest loyalty to tell the truth, and to die for it. Upon this he resolv'd to go into the palace, and having found his opportunity, said to the emperor we speak of, heaven will deprive your majesty of the crown it has given you, if you do not mend your life. It is fit your majesty cleanse your heart of so much filth, leave off your cruelty, and change your behaviour. Your majesty wants to restore that decency to your family, which you have banish'd from it; if you do so, heaven will be pleas'd. A noble, resolute, and courageous speech of a subject to a cruel and tyrannical emperor: this may compare, servatis servandis, with what S. John said to Herod. The emperor grew enrag'd like a tiger, and said to those about him, This Pi Kan takes himself for a saint; I have heard say, the saints have seven holes in their heart, I am resolv'd to see whether it be so or not. He commanded him to be immediately cut open, and his

his heart taken out. The emperor acted cruelly, but his successor highly extoll'd Pi Kan's zeal, and for his sake honour'd his family. Had he been a Christian, that might well have fitted him, which Eccles. xlviii. says of Elias, In his days he fear'd not the prince, and that in his life he did wonderful things.

4. The emperor Vu Vuang being sick, prince Cheu Kung made a solemn sacrifice to the souls of his forefathers, and to that of the emperor Vuen Vuang, whom he inform'd and gave to understand, that he offer'd up his own life that the emperor might live. This prince is much applauded among the Chinese, and highly commended by Confucius. He found out in these parts the use of the loadstone in sailing, and liv'd about the year 1919 after the flood. It seems the use of the sailing compass is very ancient there. It is not so among us; Monardes in a dialogue upon iron, fol. 133. says, That a sailor born in the city Melfi in Italy was the inventor of it.

6. Cheu Kung sending his son Pe Kin as a petty king into the kingdom Lu, ask'd him what he design'd to do there? He answer'd, He chiefly intended three things; 1. To be very careful to observe himself. 2. To be diligent and vigilant in performing his duty to the subjects. 3. To be very resolute and bold. The father approv'd of what he said, and added, a vigilant care and circumspection is an ease to him that governs, and his diligence secures the subjects ease, and they being satisfy'd, think not of rebelling. To keep a watchful eye over himself, is, when a ruler is fearful, and does not suffer himself to be puffed up, apprehending that fortune may change. Therefore he uses his subjects well, and the greater his moderation and care of government is, the more they love him. When wicked men rail, it is best to make a virtue of it, correcting what is amiss, and bearing with their tongues till the people are convinced by experience: this is to have a resolute and stout heart. In short, son, govern yourself well, and you cannot govern your subjects amiss, all depends on the first part.

7. There are four sorts of persons, says S. Thomas, opusc. 71. cap. 3. that ought to be very cautious and careful: a priest in penance, a judge in giving sentence, a physician in looking to his patient, and a rich man of his treasure. The saint speaks NAVARETTE. The Chinese are very careful in examining and calling to account those that have been publick ministers. The method many of their visitors have taken, is well worth observing and imitating. They go to the province they are sent to, and there travel incognito from one city to another, enquiring and prying into the manner of the government. Being well inform'd, on a sudden they make themselves known at the metropolis, where they perform the duty of their office uprightly, and without corruption. It is plain, that those who proclaim their business all the way they go, seek and covet what the Chinese are so fond of, which is gold and silver.

8. I knew an officer that had no regard to his duty, who was us'd to say, I fear no body, whosoever comes, I'll lay him over the face with two hundred thousand pieces of eight. But in truth he was deceiv'd, and mistook his reckoning, for he died in a dungeon, yet after receiving the sacraments, for he was a Christian.

9. The emperor Cbing Vuang ask'd of one of his wise men, What virtue it was that oblig'd the subjects to love their emperor? He answer'd, It was love and confidence in them. The words of Cbrysost. hom. 13. ad populum, suit well in this place. Would you be prais'd? Praise another. Would you be lov'd? Love. Would you have precedence given you? Give it first to another. The wise counsellor said further, That the imperial edicts should be consider'd and look'd over before they were made publick, with as much care as he would do if he were to go over a frozen river. How cautiously and circumspectly does a man set down his feet? How regularly does he tread on such a place? The same care your majesty is to use in enacting laws. The emperor lik'd the advice, and so do I. The Tartars themselves, tho' they have the Chinese under, do not practise the saying, Sic volo sic jubeo; on the contrary, whatsoever they order, is first consider'd in several courts, and so they stop the mouths of the subjects.

Laws.

10. The emperor Siven Vuang grew lewd. The empress throwing off her jewels and rich clothes, said, Your majesty gives yourself up to vice, and forgets virtue; forsakes the staidness and state which belongs to the crown, and indulges yourself in feasts and pastimes. Your majesty must understand that these are the grounds of rebellions and insurrections. Vice is a venomous spring and lake, whence the poison of treason flows. The emperor gave ear to her, and the history says, he mended upon it, and made an absolute reformation in his life. She spoke more than could be expected from a heathen woman, and Queens and great ladies are more favourably heard than other persons; and what they say is better taken, because it is manifest it proceeds from love, and not from any private interest. The emperor Theodorick's wife acted her part well with him; You are to consider, husband, said she, who you were, and who you now are; for taking this often into consideration, you will not prove ungrateful to your benefactor, and you will both legally govern the empire you have received, and worship him that gave it you. Thus Bernulaus.

Ingratitude.

11. In the reign of the emperor Siang Vuang, prince Tung Ul, by reason of some troubles, retir'd to a neighbouring kingdom, and continu'd in banishment for some time. Afterwards returning towards the court, he found himself so spent that he was ready to die with hunger. Kao Zu Cbui, one of the five servants he had, cut off a piece of flesh from his own arm, and gave it him to eat; by which means he recover'd strength and reach'd the court. When he was settled and in prosperity, he rewarded the four servants, but not Kao Zu whose flesh had sav'd his life. Strange forgetfulness and neglect in a prince! Diogenes being ask'd, What it was that soonest grew antiquated amongst men? Answer'd, A good turn. See Corn. à Lapide in Num. xx. v. 3. Kao with good reason resenting this wrong, pasted up a paper in the palace, containing these words. A stately dragon quitted his den, and went into far countries; five snakes follow'd him. After some time he was at the point of dying for hunger, one of the snakes reliev'd him, giving him a part of his body to eat. The dragon recover'd strength, which brought him back to his first den. Being there at his ease and pleasure, he gave the four snakes places where they might live comfortably, only the snake that had fed him with her flesh was left without a den basking in the wide desert. The middle was read, the prince presently understood it, and being much concern'd that he was so much to blame, order'd Kao Zu to be brought to his presence, with a design to bestow something considerable on him. But Kao fearing the prince would be inrag'd at what he had writ, absconded, and was never heard of. In this part he was unfortunate: he ingeniously made the prince sensible of his oversight; but because there is no man loves to be told of his faults, especially the great ones, he wisely fear'd, and so shun'd the danger that might have threaten'd him. The dragon is the arms and device of the Chinese emperors, which is the reason Kao Zu made use of that emblem. The counsellor Vuen Hsu told Ngoci-

Su, that he was a good king. How do you know it, said the royalet? He answer'd, A good king. When a king is good and virtuous, his subjects are loyal and true. The words the counsellor Lin Cho spoke to your highness are honest and sincere, therefore your highness is a good king. The petty king was convinc'd by the argument, but not puffed up, or vain.

12. The petty king Vu Hsu having taken a view, of his dominions, found them all well fortify'd, at which he was very well pleas'd. Cai Te his counsellor told him, Let not your highness rely upon that; for the strength of kingdoms consists in the virtue of those that govern them, and not in the walls or ditches that surround them: he prov'd it to him by many examples, whereof there are but too many in Europe.

13. Agefilaus being ask'd, why the city Sparta had no walls? answer'd, Cities must not be secur'd with timber and stones, but by the valour of the inhabitants. The walls, and seven thousand pieces of cannon that lay on them, did not save the city Peking from being plunder'd by the robber, and afterwards taken by the Tartar. We may apply to the Chinese those words the same Agefilaus spoke, when they shew'd him some mighty walls; 'Tis very well, but fit for women, not for men to live within. Agess seeing the high and strong walls of Corinth said, What women live within this inclosure?

14. King Hang Ju took the mother of Vuang Ling a great commander, but a rebel to his sovereign; he sent messengers with her, thinking by her means to draw the son to his party; she calling aside the soldiers that conducted her with tears in her eyes said, bid my son not to swerve a jot from the loyalty he owes his prince; and that he may not be perplex'd about me, and become a double dealer through the love he bears me, to his own and my discredit, I will be my own executioner: then she took a sword from one of those that stood about her, and kill'd herself before it was possible to prevent her. They all admir'd so heroick an action, and the cause that mov'd her to do it.

15. The emperor Kao Zu was very familiar, he went out once to meet his officers who were discoursing together, and lovingly ask'd them, What is it you talk of? A petty king among them answer'd; We were saying, that tho' your majesty was rais'd from an ordinary degree to be emperor, by the valour of your soldiers, yet we now find that none but your kindred and friends are prefer'd, which if you continue to do, the crown cannot sit fast. What remedy do you prescribe then, said the emperor? Who is your majesty's greatest enemy, said the petty king? Ung Cbi, reply'd ply'd the emperor. Then, sir, quoth the others, make him great, and raise him to the degree of a petty king; for when once it is known throughout the monarchy, that your majesty not only lays aside all animosity and hatred, but that you honour greatest enemy, all men will rejoice, and rest satisfy'd they shall not be punish'd for being disaffected to the family Han, but on the contrary, they will hope that since your majesty prefer'd and honour'd Ung Chi, you will not take revenge on them for what is past, which will cause them all to love and submit to your majesty. The emperor did as he was advis'd, to the great satisfaction of all men, and with good success for securing the crown to his family: his progeny held it above five hundred years.

16. The petty king's contrivance and advice was excellent, but it was most rare that an emperor should practise it upon his greatest enemy. We might say of this infidel as Rupertus said of Joseph, lib. VIII. in pentat. cap. 40. Modesty and an humble mind continues in the victor and triumpher together with the height of honour and glory. Besides, what Joseph did was to his own brothers, the heathen emperor to his greatest enemy. To love an enemy is the utmost extent of love, says S. Thomas, opusc. 61. The heathen seems to have endeavour'd to out-do this, since he added honours and preferments. He did what is said in the fifteenth chapter of Proverbs; But in so doing, thou wilt heap burning coals upon his head. A mighty method to purchase friends. Alonso king of Aragon us'd to say, Justice makes friends of good men, mercy of the wicked. Being ask'd another time, What it was that best brought an enemy under? he answer'd, The reputation of meekness, and being easily appeas'd; see Corn. à Lapide in Gen. l. v. 21.

Succession.

17. This emperor earnestly desir'd to leave the crown to a son by his second wife, his subjects oppos'd it as much as in them was. Four counsellors of state, every one eighty two years of age, went in to speak to the emperor, carrying the son of the first wife along with them; they all went in a very grave and solemn manner. The emperor was surpriz'd at it, and ask'd them their meaning: they began to repeat their services, and shew their gray hairs. The emperor understood what they aim'd at, and was in a passion. They said, your majesty refuses to give ear to your ministers, it is a sign the empire is near expiring; to lay aside the prince that is rightful heir for the sake of a son by the second wife, is contrary to the laws of the empire, all that ever did it were ruin'd; we beseech your majesty to take our lives in token of our loyalty, The emperor perceiving how resolute and upright his ministers were, alter'd his resolution, and spoke no more of that matter. The power of reason is great, it overcomes even the most passionate.

NAVARRETTE.

18. The counsellor Siao Vu presented a memorial, shewing reasons for easing the people of some imposts. The emperor took it ill, and commanded him to be thrown into prison. A petty king repeating what services Siao had done, told the emperor, that what he did was design'd for the publick good, and not for any private ends, and therefore he rather deserv'd a reward for that action. The emperor immediately commanded Siao to be brought before him; and being come, said, I acted like a tyrant, who kills those subjects that acquaint him with the miscarriages there are in the government; when I refus'd your prudent advice, you shew'd your zeal, loyalty and wisdom; I will have the fault I committed in imprisoning you be made known to all the world, that my guilt and your innocence may appear. I know not whether this emperor can be parallel'd in this particular. No man loses his credit or reputation by owning his fault or oversight; they are accidents great and small, nobles and commoners are subject to. Senec. ad Lucil. says, As I am a man, I think myself exempt from nothing that is human. The words of Innocent the third, in cap. qualiter & quando de accusationibus, are very proper to the subject, confessing of faults and correcting them, they are these; Be not ashamed to rectify your mistakes, ye that are appointed to correct the faults of others; for the same measure ye measure to others shall be measur'd to you by the upright judge.

Emperor acknowledges his fault.

Contempt of the world.

19. When Kuang Vu had taken possession of the empire, he bethought himself of a school-fellow of his, whose name was Hien Kuang, and caus'd diligent search to be made after him in order to give him some considerable employment: they found him not, but discover'd a man clad in lambskins angling by a river side: the emperor fancied it might be he, sent a coach with much attendance and equipage to bring him to court; and tho' the man did all he could to avoid it, there was no disobeying the emperor's order. He came to the suburbs of the imperial city, expecting till next day to make his entry. The emperor hearing of it, rose betimes and went to meet him at his lodging. Hien Kuang was then asleep in his bed: the emperor came in smiling, and said, Rise friend, for it is not fit that he who is to receive such favours at my hands should sleep so much. He rose very leisurely and calmly, and spoke thus, The holy emperor Fao could NAVARETTE. could not persuade his philosopher Cbao Fu to succeed him in the throne; to what purpose is it to put a man so reserv'd, that he looks after nothing but virtue, into employments and command?

20. Notwithstanding his excuse, he offer'd him the greatest employments about the court, but he rejected them all, and begg'd leave to return to his village, where he spent the rest of his life angling with his rod. This heathen left us a great example of the contempt of worldly honours, which others so hotly pursue. His memory is preserv'd till this day, for the people of his village erected a tower in honour of him in that place; giving it the name of Tiao Tai, that is, the angler's tower. I pass'd by the place, and saw it. The officers who had me in custody told me the story, and afterwards I read it myself. There are examples peculiar for all purposes in China. This we have spoken of is singular for that nation, where ambition and avarice are more predominant than in others. Hian Kuang might say with S. Peter and his companions, We have left all things; but he wanted the best and chiefest part, which is, We have follow'd thee. Crates and others were deficient in the same, as S. Jerome says, lib. III. in Mat. xix. But we may apply to him what the same saint writ ad Paulin. pres. de instit. monach. That Socrates the Theban, a mighty rich man, when he went to play the philosopher at Athens, threw away a great mass of gold, thinking he could not possess virtue and riches at the same time. That suits yet better which pass'd betwixt Diogenes and Alexander, Albertus Mag. mentions it, politic. cap. 1. Alexander offering Diogenes great things if he would return with him to court, whereas he was in a desert, and observ'd the course of the stars; he answer'd, he could offer nothing like the delight of philosophy. The words of Elianus are good; Alcibiades shew'd his liberality in giving, Socrates in not receiving.

21. It is well worth observing, that Kuang Vu when rais'd to the imperial throne, should remember his friend, this is not usual with men who are lifted up to high places. Gajetan comments upon those words of our Saviour spoken to S. Mary Magdalen, S. John xx. Go to my brethren, &c. He says thus, That by his example we may learn to be more loving to our friends when we are pre- serv'd to some higher station. Kuang did so. And tho' honours change manners, yet it seems so great a post and so noble a crown made no alteration in him; he still preserv'd his former affability and plainness. S. Bern. lib. de consid. says, There is no jewel higher than courteousness, to wit, in all the pope's ornaments; for the higher he is above the rest, the more glorious he looks even above himself by humility. Some men think humility, affability, and sweet temper are incompatible with high dignities; but it were well they would consider that without it all honour is fading, and only more or less of vanity. When Otbo the third rose on a sudden to be the first of the electors, Villegius, that he might not give way to vain-glory, us'd to say to him, Mind what you are, remember what you were. It is humility that secures, establishes, and supports high dignities. The same Otbo was wont to say, I am a man, I think myself exempt from nothing that is human. Gilimor being a prisoner, laugh'd and said, I see the uncertainty of fortune, in that I who but now was a king, am now a slave. King Francis of France being Charles the fifth's prisoner, us'd to say, 'Tis my turn to day, to morrow it will be thine. This consideration is a great help towards bearing the vicissitudes of this world with a manly resolution.

22. Another notable passage happened between Hien and the emperor, which was, that being so very familiar, the emperor would needs they should lie together as they had done in their youth: when in bed they would call to mind things past, which diverted them, tho' Hien ever paid all due respect to his sovereign. It fell out that he accidentally set his foot upon the emperor's, just at the same time, says the history, that the astrologer who watch'd on the mathematical tower observ'd that the star they call ke, that is, the guest, removed from its place, and stood over that they call ju zo, which signifies imperial throne. Airang. Next day the astrologer gave an account of it: the emperor reflected on what had happen'd, and smiling discover'd what had pass'd between his friend and him; adding, There is nothing to fear, for between us all is friendship. I write what is in the history, whether true or false.

people.

1. THE history tells us, that the emperor Jao, who is one of the ancientest and most renowned of the Chineses (I thought it not necessary to be regular in speaking of them) when he saw any subject in want would say, he was the cause of that misfortune. If any man was cold for want of clothes, he blam'd himself.

The

The history adds, that the people supply'd and serv'd him in all things without any pay, and did their duty in all respects without any punishment inflicted, which proceeded from the tender love they all bore him. He behav'd himself towards his people as a loving father does towards his children, and the people towards him as dutiful children towards a parent. A good emperor and good subjects. O that we might see the same at this time throughout all Europe. We see in some places the kings are fathers, who love, honour, and raise to high posts some subjects their children; and these ungrateful, base and disloyal men, oppose, and draw their swords against their lawful lords and sovereign masters. Alas, if the rebellions and insurrections of Europe were known in China, what would those infidels say?

2. We may say of Fao's subjects, what Pliny did of Trajan's; They lov'd him as if they had not fear'd, and they fear'd as if they had not lov'd him. This love oblig'd the subjects to attend the emperor's service; where love is wanting, all is wanting. Things cross and difficult seem easy to him that loves, says S. Thomas, opusc. 7.

3. Certain peasants saluted him, saying, Heaven grant your majesty much riches, many children, and a long life. He answer'd very unconcern'd, What is it you wish me? to wish me much riches is to wish me much care; many children is much to fear; a long life is much trouble, and many diseases.

Compassion 4. They write of the emperor Ju, that he would weep and be very much troubled, when he was to sign any dead warrant. Those about him would say, If he is wicked and deserves the punishment, why is your majesty concern'd? He answer'd, My heart is my subjects, theirs is mine; I am their father, they my children; how then can I chuse but be troubled at their misfortunes, tho' they deserve them for their offences? A very tender and compassionate answer. Ju said further, To live in this world is being as it were lent out, or left in trust; when a man dies, he returns to his first being. A good expression, had he not err'd as to the principle, beginning, or first being to which man returns, which in his opinion was nothing.

Ministers. 5. Cheu King favourite to Cbing Vuang said to him, Your majesty will do well to stick close to your subjects, to shun flatterers, follow virtue and justice, employ virtuous men in the government, and then you'll be a good emperor. He said all that was requisite in these few words: Tai Kung said to Cheu Kung, The government will be as it should be, if virtuous men are honour'd, and those that deserve well rewarded. Another time he said, Though all the people be good, yet if he that is next the prince is bad, your majesty may conclude all is lost. An excellent expression! this doctrine is not unlike to that of RETTE. Boetius, cited by S. Thomas, opusc. 3. §. sexta petitio, No plague more likely to do harm than a familiar friend. What else is an ill minister and wicked favourite, but a sort of venom and plague that infects the whole kingdom, and the greatest monarchy?

6. The emperor Kang Vuang was wont to say, To fatigue the people and subjects, to save the emperor's taking the trouble upon him, is contrary to the practice of the great emperor Vuen Vuang. This proposition is not a little mystical. Dignities, honours, crowns, scepters, &c. are a heavy burden; if the sovereign lays the weight upon his subjects, and takes to himself the honour, glory, and satisfaction of that life, he does not discharge the trust repos'd in him. It is natural, that he who receives the benefit, bear the burden, says the rule 55. in sexto. They are deceiv'd who imagine they enter upon a place of trust to give themselves up to pleasure and pastime. Let them read the third chapter of Exod. and they will find it.

7. Jueng Hiang punish'd a minister of state severely; a friend of that minister reprov'd the emperor, who answer'd, Do you forsake the emperor, and side with your friend? He reply'd, If my friend does not obey the emperor, I will quit my friend, and follow the emperor. If the emperor acts contrary to justice, reason and law, I will follow my friend and oppose the emperor. Boldly said. The emperor was more provok'd at the answer, and said to him, Unsay what you have said, and you shall live, else I will immediately order you to be put to death. Fu, that was his name, said, A just and upright man is not to flinch for fear of death. A counsellor may inform, reprove and direct his emperor. Tu Pe (that was the name of him that had suffer'd) committed no fault, why then did your majesty order him to be kill'd? The emperor was struck dumb, seeing so much resolution.

8. Kin Vuang punish'd one for being disobedient to his parents, and said, It was a principal point in a kingdom that children should be obedient to their parents; and by inflicting that punishment, he taught all children to be observant of that virtue. The Chinese master sigh'd, and said, It is not reasonable, that the superior who is void of virtue, should punish the inferior for wanting of it. The greatest justice is to teach obedience, by giving a good example, nor by punishing. When the superior does not instruct by his example, the fault committed is his, and not the inferiors. This good method the philosopher took to tell Kin Vuang he ought to be obedient to his parents; he was guilty of disobedience,

The

NAVARETTE. ence, and Confucius and others had taken notice of it. The Chinese have very notable written examples of childrens duty to their parents; we missionaries need not preach upon this subject, or give them any instances of ours. Among the rest there is one that tells us, that because a son was obedient, the wild cattel in the mountains would come and plow the fields where his parents set him to work, and the birds of the air would come down to rake them with their bills. They write of another who going to fetch water for his mother from a pond, fell into it through mere weariness, and slept a long time on the water without sinking. That nation looks upon these, and many more stories of this nature, to be as certainly true, as we do those which God wrought for S. Isidorus, S. Maurus, &c.

Refusal of the crown. 9. King Kiu Zo appointed his son Xo Zi his heir. The father dying, he would not admit of the inheritance, but generously resign'd it to his elder brother Pe Y. This brother refus'd it, saying, They ought to stand to what their father had order'd. The younger alledg'd that tho' his father had appointed him heir to the crown, yet it was but reasonable his elder brother, whose birthright it was, should enjoy it. Pe Y urg'd, It was unreasonable to contradict their father's orders. Zi answer'd, There was as little reason to oppose the decrees of heaven; and since heaven had made Pe Y the elder brother, it was justice he should succeed his father in the throne. He reply'd again, That obedience to parents was a natural duty, and as such ought to be observ'd. The younger rejoyn'd, That heaven ought to be obey'd in the first place as being the supreme father. Thus the two good brothers argued, not to possess, but to yield up the kingdom one to the other; and at last to reconcile this difference between them, they both agreed to resign to another younger brother, there being no other way to reconcile that difference.

10. The heathens of China have furnish'd us with an answer to S. Ambrose his question, lib. V. cap. xv. Exod. What man can you find, who will voluntarily lay down his command, quit the ensigns of his dignity, and of his own free will of the first become the last? Here are two heathens, holy faint, who of their own free will perform'd what you thought so difficult. Such an action would be much look'd upon among Christians, as it was in S. Celestine to resign the papacy. The magnanimity of the invincible Charles the fifth, in voluntarily abdicating two of the greatest monarchies of the world, will be in like manner ever applauded. But the circumstances we have mention'd make our example singular. It was afterwards ask'd of the Chinese master, What sort of men these brothers were before they resign'd he kingdom to one another, and whether when they had both given up their right to the other brother, they had not repented of what they had done? He answer'd, They were good and virtuous men both before and after, and that the virtue of piety mov'd them to do that action. The elder would shew himself obedient to his father, and the younger to heaven. This was the reason they never repented, because the motive they had being good and virtuous, there could never be place for repentance, which can only proceed from something that is a fault.

11. It is also written of these two brothers, that they earnestly desir'd all men should be good and virtuous; and that if they saw any wicked vicious man, they hated his crimes, but not his person; for they said, that man might mend and be good another day. When a wicked man amended his life, they thought no more of his past crimes, nor threw them in his face, but only look'd upon what was present.

12. The names ceremony, deacon, feria, fasti, and many others, the church took from the Gentiles. See Micheli Marquez. Deacon signifies minister. Mercury was so call'd, as being the minister of the gods; and it is the same thing the Chinese call Zi Fu; that is, he who attends and administers to him that sacrifices to the dead. The martyrology us'd in the church was taken from the heathen fasti, as Baronius observ'd. It were endless to write all that may be said to this point.

13. I will conclude this book with a strange and odd passage the Chinese history makes mention of, which is thus: In the province of Xan Tung there was a mandarin, so upright, just and uncorrupted, and so loving and kind to the people, that he took care of them as if they had been his own children; for this reason he was belov'd, serv'd, and obey'd by them with singular affection and readiness. This produced an extraordinary and reciprocal confidence betwixt them, and a mighty respect and submission of the people to their head and ruler. It fell out of course, that according to the duty of his office he punish'd some, and imprison'd others. Those that were imprison'd could not follow their husbandry, so that they neither sow'd nor reap'd. The mandarin was concern'd at the misfortune of those poor men, and bearing them great affection, he resolv'd to give them the liberty of going out to sow, upon condition they should return to goal as soon as they had done their work. They went out, plow'd and sow'd, and all of them to a man return'd to prison the same day. The same thing they did at harvest-time. He continu'd to do the same thing every year, as long as he continu'd in his employment, and not a man ever fail'd of returning to prison. I am of opinion the like has not happen'd in the world.

Containing some political and moral Sentences of the Philosopher Kung Fu Zu, or Confucius.

S. Antonius, 4. p. tit. II. cap. 4. sufficiently proves, that the morals of the ancient philosophers and Chineses were very imperfect and defective, and that the authors thereof were not sound and true. All the five paragraphs he writes in the place above-cited, are very well worth reading, for the multiplicity of learning he inserts, and for the light he gives the reader and missionaries to prevent their being led away by outward appearances, and the eloquence of the heathen books. In this place the saint explains the three sorts of philosophy, whereof mention shall be made in another place. And in Sec. 5. he says with S. Augustin, with whom cardinal John Dominick agrees, that the prophets were, before the philosophers, from the first of whom the latter took what they writ, that has any relation to our religion. And he explains how we ought to understand the words of Trismegistus, Monas genuit monadem, &c. And those of Virgil, jam nova progenies caelo dimittitur alto. And below that again he says, so many things are to be found in Plato's books spoken concerning the word of God, but not in that sense the true faith acknowledges. All this is very material to what shall be written in the sixth book. The fifth chapter following, in which he treats of the origin of idolatry, and the multiplicity of gods the Gentiles worshipp'd, is proper for the same purpose, and not a little useful to missionaries, when they read heathen books, in which there is usually danger, as the saint says he found himself. Origin speaks to this point, Sec. 4. cap. 4. above-cited, where he quotes the proverb, A great philosopher is seldom a good catholic. This subject has been handled in the nineteenth chapter of the second book.

It is to be observ'd concerning the philosopher Confucius, that tho' he was not the founder or inventor of the learned sect; yet because he explain'd, made it more intelligible by his doctrine, and explicated it, they gave him the title of their head and lawgiver. So writes F. Anthony de sancta Maria, a Franciscan missionary, in a manuscript of his. In the same manner, as the angelical doctor S. Thomas has gain'd renown above all divines, and obtain'd the name of prince, and angel of the schools, for having explain'd, digested, and divided divinity into parts, matters, questions, and articles; for the same reasons the learned Chineses have given their philosopher Confucius the title of their prince and master.

Confucius.

CHAP. I.

Of the Birth and Life of this Philosopher.

Confucius.

1. K Ung Fu Zu, whom in our parts we vulgarly call Confucius, is the greatest oracle in China, and more celebrated and applauded there; than S. Paul is in the church. In order to give some account of him, I will here set down the principal passages of a book there is in that nation, intituled, A description of the wonders and miracles of Confucius. The book is full of cuts, with the exposition and account of every one of them. F. Trigaucius, lib. I. cap. 5. assigns the birth of this man to be five hundred fifty one years before the incarnation of the Son of God. Others of his society, whose opinion I follow, affirm, that he was six hundred forty five years before the coming of our Redeemer. So that this present year 1675 is 2320 years since his time. And tho' such distant antiquity buries the greatest things in oblivion; yet this philosopher lives at this time as fresh in memory of the Chineses, as if he had been born but yesterday.

2. The first cut in the book is a large, beautiful, and stately tree, whose branches stretch out largely on all sides, hanging thick with stars instead of leaves; under the shade, and at the foot of this tree, stands the philosopher Confucius; his hands are on his breast, and on his head a swelling or bunch somewhat large, the inscription runs thus; eulogies of the most holy master

NAVA- master our predecessor, whose virtues were RETTE. sufficient to bring to light the ancient doctrines concerning heaven and earth, well purg'd, explain'd and purify'd. A doctrine that honours and crowns the ancients and moderns, who gave laws to future ages.

3. The second cut represents an ancient countrywoman, under another starry tree of the same shape and form as the last was describ'd. Her employment is to offer perfumes in a fire on an altar. There is also the figure of a maid-servant, and two little boys attending her. The inscription is thus; A description of the prayer on the mountain, call'd Ni. It is explain'd in this manner: The holy mother whose name was Jen Xi, offer'd her vows, and pray'd on the mount Ni Kin. When she went up to the mount, the leaves of the trees lifted and curl'd themselves up; when she went down, they bow'd to the ground. The first they did in token of joy and satisfaction, the latter signify'd submission and respect. She conceiv'd, and went with child eleven months. (S. Thomas, opusc. 28. art. 4. about the end, says, he saw a woman, who was deliver'd of a great boy the eleventh month of her going with child. Aristotle says he saw one who was brought to bed the fourteenth month. Thus it appears, Confucius might well be eleven months in his mother's womb.) Confucius was born of her; on his head he brought into the world with him a bunch, or swelling, in the shape of that mountain, and this is the reason why he had the name of that mountain, which is Ni Kin, given him for his surname. They very often call him so in the Cbinese books.

4. The third cut represents an unicorn, casting a book out of his mouth in the presence of a woman. The inscription explicates it thus: A little before the philosopher Confucius was born there appeared to his mother a wonderful and extraordinary unicorn, which cast before her a small book, as it were of alabaster, in which were these characters; Son of purity and rare perfection, who coming of a mean race, will come to be a wonderful man and most religious prince. His holy mother Jen Xi (the Cbineses write holy mother, with these two characters, Xing Mu; so they call this woman we speak of, a great idol, that was an emperor's concubine, and the empress dowager. The ancient missionaries took those two letters to express the blessed virgin Mary, which their successors and all Christians had follow'd) was surpriz'd at the vision; the unicorn let fall from his horn a piece of stuff of most beautiful colours, and dropping it upon her hands, vanish'd.

5. The fourth cut contains two wonderful serpents, and four venerable old men. The inscription is Confucius was born after night fall, and at the time of his birth two prodigious snakes were seen in his mother's chamber; five venerable old men descend'd from above, who were five-bright shining stars.

6. The fifth cut is of heavenly musicians. The inscription contains: In the room where Confucius was born, sweet harmony was heard, and heavenly singing in the air, the voices expressing, That heaven it self congratulated and rejoiced at the birth of a holy son, and therefore celebrated his nativity with musick come from above. It adds, that after the child was born, strange things were seen in the room; and on his breast were five characters signifying, This child shall give peace to the earth, by the good laws he shall prescribe and establish on it.

7. The sixth cut is of his infancy, and expresses, that he being but six years of age, carry'd himself among other children with such modesty and gravity, as if he had been sixty; and that whilst they were employ'd in sports suitable to their age, he with a religious countenance was busy in making little altars. As to this man's stature and shape, they say, he was tall and brawny, of a grave countenance, and very humble of heart, and in his words and actions: His eyes sharp, and so bright, that they look'd like two stars; and he so discreet in his actions, that he seem'd to know all things. Being sixty years of age, after he had govern'd some provinces very prudently and uprightly, forsaking all employments, because he found the government was wicked, poor, and contemptible, he travel'd throughout the empire, preaching virtue and natural justice to all men. In some places they affronted, in others they beat him, all which he bore with meekness, and an even temper: And they say of him further, that he was merriest when most despised; and when they turn'd him out of any town, he would place himself under a tree with a smiling countenance, and play on a little guitar he carry'd about with him.

8. One of the last cuts tells us, that when he was seventy one years of age, having by that time made out and explain'd the Cbinese doctrine, he retir'd home to his house, where he liv'd in the exercise of prayer, fasting, and alms-giving. As he was kneeling once, with his face lifted up to heaven towards the north, he saw a rainbow descend from above, which put a writing into his hands, carv'd on a substance, which look'd like the purest gold, and very transparent, but does not declare what was written. He receiv'd it, and dy'd at the age of seventy three. He is bury'd bury'd in a stately sepulchre in the same town where he was born. When we were carry'd prisoners to court, we pass'd within four leagues of it: F. Francis de Sancta Maria, a Franciscan had been there before and seen it. Among other trees, he said, he saw one without any bark or branches, wall'd in with brick and lime half way; there is a tradition that Confucius when he was a youth us'd to study in the shade of that tree.

9. The histories of China tell us, that the emperor Cin Xi Hoang (he reign'd three hundred years after the death of this philosopher) who was a mortal enemy to the sect of the learned, caus'd many scholars to be burnt alive; and the same he did by all the books of Confucius, and other masters, which treated of moral virtues. He also attempted to destroy the sepulchre we have spoken of, caus'd the one half of it to be ruin'd, and they say there was a stone found with these words on it: The emperor endeavours to destroy my sepulchre, and annihilate my ashes, but he shall not compass it, for he shall very soon end his life. So they affirm it fell out. This emperor was to the sect of the learned, as Dioclesian was to the church. The lineage of Confucius, by one only son he left, has been propagated and continued to this very day in the direct male line, without any failure in so many ages: And tho' there have been wars, rebellions and tumults, which utterly overthrew vast numbers of cities towns, and other places, yet Confucius his town, his house and family have ever continued. He that liv'd in the year 1668. was the three hundred and third grandson. They ever enjoy'd the privilege of nobility and revenues, they have been ever honour'd and respected by all men, they are lords of their country. When we came away banish'd from court, we were told that the Tartar had either taken away, or retrench'd the revenue of him that was then living. He is no great lover of learning, or learned men. I know not whether there be many families in the world ancients than this.

10. The Chinese make the same account of this philosopher's doctrine, as we do of the gospel. Some attribute to him a knowledge infus'd, but he himself confesses he had none but what is acquir'd. I have heard learned Christians say, that no beast, bird, or insect, ever came within the inclosure of this tomb, which takes up a large space of ground, nor was there ever found any excrement, or other filthy thing within that place. I discours'd concerning this subject with some missionaries, who do not agree to it, nor did F. Antony take notice of this particularity; but by this it appears that the scholars, tho' they become NAVA-Christians, have still their master in their RETTE. very bones, which is not at all to be doubted. However all agree that no man came near this man for elegancy, sharpness, and brevity of stile.

11. Some missionaries there are who make a prophet of this man, and this is printed in Latin; but others more ancient of the same society, laugh at and condemn this notion. Even as in our parts there are Tbomists, Scotists, &c. so in China among the missionaries in one and the same order there are Confucians, and Anticonfucians. The eulogies, encomiums, and praises, with which the Chinese extol and magnify their master, are beyond expression. The same Christ said of the Baptist, Among the children of women there has not been a greater than John, &c. the Chinese say of their philosopher which is as much as can be said. I shall treat at large of the worship and veneration they pay him in the second tome, where it shall also be prov'd that he was an absolute atheist.

12. Here I will only observe two things. Confucius an atheist. The first, that in order to prove his atheism, an unanswerable argument is made of the doctrine of S. Thomas, Leſt. 6. in cap. x. Joan. upon the words, believe my works. The faint forms this argument; For there can be no such convincing proof of the nature of any thing, as that which is taken from its actions, therefore it may be plainly known and believ'd of Christ that he is GOD, forasmuch as he performs the works of GOD. Then I argue thus; Therefore it evidently appears that Confucius was an atheist, forasmuch as he taught the works of atheists: Since as even those of the contrary opinion allow, he knew nothing of an immortal soul, or a reward or punishment in another life, and much less of GOD according to the opinion of his own disciples. The second is, That Confucius us'd the same expression which Lactantius relates, Lib. III. de fals. relig. cap. 20. Socrates made use of this famous proverb; What is above us is nothing to us. But this is not to be taken notice of in religion. F. Longobardus the jesuit most learnedly makes his observations on this particular, and more shall be said to it in the sixth book.

13. Who would imagine but that the Chinese seeing so many wonders as concurr'd in the conception, birth, and life of their most loving master, and all those circumstances we have mention'd, would not lift up their thoughts or heart to consider there was some great Deity that caus'd and directed them? They are so far from it, that they persist in asserting that all things came to pass naturally and accidentally, and nothing can persuade them to the contrary.

G g

It

NAVA- It is hard to say in Cbina, that all we have RETTE. mention'd above is mere fiction, for then they answer, It is likely all we write is so too. In these our parts it is very rational to think all those stories false and mere invention.

Rodriguez 14. I cannot agree to what F. John Ro- driguez says in his art of the Japoneses language, lib. III. p. 234. viz. that Confucius was descended from some of the ten tribes of Israel, which Shalmaneser carry'd into captivity, and placed among the Medes and Syrians. F. James Fabre, contrary to the opinion of others of his society, denies to this day that ever any Jews reach'd Cbina.
 I gave an account before in a foregoing book, how Cbina was ancients than the captivity of the ten tribes.

15. It cannot be denied but Confucius had his failings and sins, which the Cbineses are sensible of. Read F. Morales, fol. 215. Morales. where it is plainly own'd both by his people, and very learned men.

16. What has been writ above, is only a repetition of what the Cbineses have printed; and since they believe it as they do, I know not why they should not look upon their master Confucius as a saint, and the greatest of saints: it were a madness rather, when they confess the first part, to deny the second. It cannot be denied but that he writ very good things, as will appear by the account shall be given of him.

CHAP. II.

Some Sayings of Confucius.

1. A Great deal of what this master writ is already translated into Latin by F. Prosper Intorceta; but several of his society like not the first volume. F. Antony Gouvea, superior of their mission, told me, that their fathers residing in the northern provinces, would not give it their approbation; and tho' I did, said he, it was with reluctancy and against my will, for I am of another opinion contrary to what is there written. These are the very words of that grave and antient father.

2. As I was talking in Canton concerning some opinions printed in that book, which are opposite to the ancient and modern missionaries of that society, F. Fabre, superior of that mission, said to the author; father Intorceta, I did not read that book when I gave leave to print it; but had I known it contain'd what has been said here, I would not on any account have suffer'd it to be publish'd.

3. This is the reason why they would give the Franciscans and us the second volume to read, which F. Intorceta, and three others of his standing had translated, tho' they had said before, we should all give our opinions of it; but I had sufficient intimation, that their own body did not at all approve of it, and F. Gouvea and F.
Emanuel George utterly condemn'd it. As to the first volume, the translator is not so much to be blam'd, for he did it the first year he entred upon the mission; it was too much precipitancy, to take upon him so soon to translate a language so difficult and strange to Europeans. True it is, another had done the most considerable part before.

4. In the first book, whose title is, great science or wisdom. Confucius says, the wisdom of great men consists in cultivating the inward faculties, in making as it were a new people by their example and exhortations, and in following the rule of reason in all things.

M. This is as much as to say, that the speculative part is not sufficient to render man perfect, but it is requisite the practice go along with it, and that virtue be made known by actions: it also imports, as may be gather'd by the meaning and connexion, that he who has the charge of souls committed to him, must first take care of his own, and then of those of others.

5. M. In all business and affairs there is the first and principal part, and another which is secondary, and less considerable:
 as in a tree, the root and stock are look'd upon as the prime part, the branches and leaves as of less moment. To be virtuous, and endeavour to advance, and attain to perfection in virtue, is the prime and principal part of man; to labour that others may be good, is the secondary and less considerable part.

6. M. The emperor, and all his subjects, even to the meanest commoner, are bound, says Confucius, to adorn themselves with virtues, and to live holily and virtuously.

7. M. If the prime and principal part, says he, be amiss, how can that which is but secondary, viz. the government of the subjects, be right? if he takes no care of his own person, which is the first thing he ought to look to, and bends his thoughts upon that which is of an inferior quality, viz. the government of others, it will be absolute inverting all good order.

8. He goes on. M. The Emperor Tang had these words carv'd on the vessel in which he bath'd himself: Let thy perpetual
and

and continual study be to renew thy self inwardly; each day thou art to renew thy self, and ever to endeavour this renewing by the practice of virtue.

The comment expounds, that the said words include the time past and to come, and that it implies he must repent of crimes committed, and have a full purpose and resolution not to fall into them again. That this emperor continually did so, and that he might not omit it whilst he was bathing, he had the words abovemention'd carv'd upon the bathing vessel, which put him in mind of this commendable exercise. This heathen was most singularly virtuous; had he attained any knowledge of GOD, he might vie with the best in Europe. Confucius and others write of one of his disciples, that he never committed the same sin twice. A bold saying of a heathen: he so heartily detested it, that he utterly forgot it, and only was careful to avoid it for the future.

9. The book entitled, Kang Kao, says, (Confucius proceeds) Take great care to renew the people, and break your rest that they may live well and uprightly. This is what follows after a man has renew'd himself.

10. The comment expounding this renewing, says, it consists in wiping off the stains of sin, and returning to the same state as before committing it; as when a cloth is wash'd, the spots are taken out, and it becomes white and clean as it was at first.

11. The emperor Vuen Vuang, says he, attain'd to the highest pitch of perfection. As emperor, he reach'd the top of piety; as a magistrate, the supreme degree of observance; as a son, the furthest extent of obedience to his parents; as a father, the greatest love and affection to his children, and the utmost point of fidelity and sincerity towards his neighbour.

12. He proposes this emperor as a mirror and pattern of virtue: the whole empire gives him great praise and commendation; and certainly, according to their histories, he was singular, and liv'd up strictly to the rules of right reason. It cannot be denied, but by that nation he is look'd upon as a very holy man.

13. I can hear and decide law-suits (says Confucius) as well as any other; but what most concerns us is, to order it so that there may be no suits. If it was as practicable as it is convenient, the courts would be shut up, and pens would take up some other employment.

14. Zeng Zu, Confucius his disciple, says to this purpose: wicked men cannot determine, or put an end to their law-suits, therefore it is convenient to subdue the hearts of the people, as well by punishment, as good turns and instructions, exhorting them to mutual love and concord, which they that govern are oblig'd to do.

15. Zeng Zu will have these two methods observ'd towards the subjects, that they may live lovingly together, and have no suits nor controversies. That of punishing the Chinese sufficiently make use of towards their people, this is the cause they stand in such awe of the mandarines, and that they have no quarrels or fallings out, not that they want courage, or inclination; this sufficiently proves the assertion. The Tartar takes the best course, he pardons no man that is faulty. See A Lapid in Exod. iv.

The same author proceeds:

16. Wicked men when they are at liberty act wickedly, and there is no crime they will not attempt; when they see virtuous men they conceal their evil inclination; and feign themselves faints: but men know them, as if they saw into them. What then does their dissembling avail them? Therefore it is said, that such as a man is inwardly, such he will appear outwardly; and this is the reason why a virtuous man takes such care of his interior part.

17. Zeng says further on: If the interior part be disturb'd by any passion, when a man looks he does not see, when he hears he does not understand, when he eats he does not relish his meat: therefore the proverb says, men blinded with affection, are not sensible of the vices of their children; and blinded by avarice, they know not the greatness of their riches. It cannot be denied but that passion blinds men: therefore it was Publius Æmilius said, It is hardly allow'd the powers above to love and be wise. It takes away the use of reason, and even distracts: there are examples enough of it in all parts.

18. He goes on. As a mother embraces and lovingly hugs a new-born son in her arms, and eagerly satisfies her desires, made known only by looks and tears; even so is a king to behave himself towards his subjects, relieving their wants tho' they make them not known by words.

19. Many have written that the king is to be the father of his kingdom, but it is certainly much more, that he must behave himself towards it like a mother, and be a loving and compassionate mother to his subjects. If the king, says he, is covetous, it is certain the whole kingdom will be disturb'd, which will be because all men will follow the example of the head. Bias call'd avarice the metropolis of vice. He that would be acquainted with its deformity, may read Corn. à Lapid in 6. 1. prim. ad Tim. y. 9, 10.

C H A P. III.

Containing other Sayings and Sentences of Confucius.

NAVA- I. THE emperors Fas and Xun govern-RETTE. ed with piety and affection, says he, and the subjects imitated them in those virtues. The emperors Kie and Cheu govern'd tyrannically, and the subjects imitated their wickedness; for inferiors are not so strict in following the laws, as the example given them: therefore if the emperor have virtue in him, he may require it of the rest; but if there be none in him, how can he blame his inferiors for being without it?

2. If the emperor (says the book of verses) does the duty of a father in his palace towards his children, of a son towards his parents, and of a brother towards his brothers, he will give example to all the empire, and all the subjects will imitate him.

3. Do not that to your inferiors which you dislike in your superiors; and what you blame in your inferiors, do it not to your superiors: what you abhor in your predecessors, leave not as an example to your successors; and what you detest in them that are gone, set it not as a precedent to them that are to come: what you judge ill in those that are on your right-hand, offer not to those on your left, nor à contra. And to say it in a word, do not that to another which you would not have done to yourself. This is call'd a good rule of government.

4. He is in the right in all he says: what is good is to be imitated in any man; what is evil is to be hated in all men. Observe whether such a one, or such a one did well in such or such an action; if he did well, let him be brought as an instance to be imitated; if ill, let him be an example to shun the like. The verses say, a kind and affable king is a father and mother to his subjects.

Phineas,
S. Peter,
S. Paul,
and others had holy anger.

5. This is a good proposition, but it is to be observ'd, to be angry upon a just occasion is no breach of meekness. Some men would have superiors mere stocks. S. Thomas on Rev. ii. Many evils spring from too much meekness and forbearance. S. Gregory, Let there be love, but not to fondness; let there be piety, but not more than is requisite; let him that is sparing of both be commended for one of them, so that severity may not be too rigid, nor meekness vicious. Seneca quoted by Hugo in Gen. i. Be kind to all men, remiss to none, familiar with a few, just to all.

6. He goes on. If the emperor has the love of his subjects, he is an emperor, and has an empire; if he loses this love, he loses his crown: so that his first duty is to be watchful to acquire virtue; when he has that, he will possess the affection of his inferiors; when these are for him, he will enjoy lands; when he enjoys lands, he will be rich; and being rich, will have all that is necessary for his private use, and to secure his crown. Virtue is the prime foundation, riches are but the superstructure. If the emperor makes riches his chief aim, he will move the people to rebellion, and make way for theft and rapine. Therefore to heap riches unjustly, is to destroy and ruin the subjects. On the contrary, to distribute riches with discretion, is gaining of the people. It is certain ill-gotten wealth never comes to any thing.

7. The aforesaid book goes on thus. An author says, that only empire is not lasting or permanent, because it fails when there is no virtue in the head of it. Hence it follows that a virtuous emperor perpetuates his crown, and a wicked one loses it. This doctrine is very agreeable to holy writ, Ecclus. viii. v. 10. says, The kingdom shall be transferr'd from nation to nation, because of injustice, wrongs, slanders and deceits. The Scripture is full of instances of this truth.

8. Kuei Fan, a petty king, was wont to say, I prize or value nothing in this world but my duty to my parents, and love and meekness towards my subjects. Mo Kung, who was king of Cin, was wont to say, (all this is doctrine taken out of the book Ta Hio) If I had an upright and sincere counsellor, open hearted and peaceable, free from the destructive vice of flattery, who would love men of worth and parts, and would heartily respect men of learning and wisdom, I should think I had enough to defend my kingdom, and perpetuate my crown. O what mighty advantages my kingdom and subjects would reap by such a man! On the other side; if my favourite, or prime minister is envious, and does not bestow preferments on wife and virtuous men, nor make use of them, he may ruin all. O what mighty mischief such a man would cause in my kingdom! I would remove him as far as possibly I could from me, and not suffer him to live within my dominions. Therefore it is Confucius says, that only a wife and pious king knows how to love men, and how to hate them: to love the good, and hate the wicked.

9. He wrongs a good and virtuous man, who sees and does not prefer him, and when he has done it, is not sorry that he did it no sooner. He sins and does ill, who seeing a wicked man in high place, does not pull him down, and when down remove him at a distance.

10. It is not agreeable to human reason to love that which all men hate, or to hate that which all men love. It is always suppos'd that what all men do is good and real, tho' it is no infallible rule. In the first chapter §. 5. of Tobias, When they all went to the golden calves, this man alone shun'd their company. All men paid religious worship to Nebuchadnezzar's statue, but the three youths would not consent to follow the example. There is an infinite number of fools. For the most part the fewest in number are in the right, therefore it is the apostle advises us, not to suit our selves to the world, and particularly to the unruly multitude.

11. He goes on. If a man plac'd in a high post endeavours to be an example of virtue to his inferiors, he will secure his dignity; but if he proudly despise others, he will lose it. A strange example of what I now write was seen in my time at Manila.

12. The minister that is compassionate, and a lover of his people, makes himself respected, and is beloved of all men for the riches he dispenses among them: but the wicked ill man who oppresses his people, lives and dies hated by them all. It is ever found experimentally true, that when the king is compassionate, and a lover of his people, they make a suitable return of love, and are faithful to him, being truly loyal to their king; the business of the crown is done to content, and takes its due course. The people that love their king, in time of peace preserve his treasure, and in time of war defend it, as if it were their own.

13. Sardanapalus left forty millions of gold, Tiberius sixty seven, David one hundred and twenty: and the author of the holy court, tom. IV. p. 79., speaking of him, says, he offer'd to the building of the temple two thousand one hundred and twenty three millions, a sum to all appearance incredible. Solomon gather'd very much, and very much is implied by the words in Ecclesiastes ii. §. 8. I gather'd me also silver and gold, &c. The Hebrews, Greeks, and Romans took the same care. So do the Tartars and Chinese. The present emperor's father, two years before he died, sent an alms of thirty thousand ducats to some places, where the harvest had prov'd bad. His grand-mother was more liberal, for she sent one hundred and fifty thousand. It is not bestowing charity, or relieving of subjects, that runs kings into debt; for the subjects once oblig'd, upon occasion will give their hearts blood to support their sovereign. This is it the NAVA-CHINESE master means, when he says, That RETTE. in peace the subjects keep the royal treasure, and in war defend it as their own. S. Thomas, lib. I. cap. 10. opusc. ut supra, says the same: When the government of kings is pleasing to the people, all the subjects are as guards to support it, and he needs not be at any charge with them; but sometimes in cases of necessity they give kings more of their own accord, than tyrants could have forced from them. This verifies that of Solomon, Prov. xi. There are (viz. kings, says S. Thomas) that scatter their own (doing good to their subjects) and yet grow richer. And there are (to wit, tyrants) who take what is not theirs, and are always in poverty. An excellent expression.

14. A great mandarin of the kingdom of Lu us'd to say, Those who maintain coach and war-horses, do not deal in poultry and swine; and if they do so, they hinder the people of their profit, to whom that trade belongs.

15. There were some great men, who through covetousness would stoop to mean and scandalous trades. This doctrine is very fit for governours, magistrates, commanders, officers and others, who monopolize in their provinces and circuits, wine, oil, vinegar, Indian wheat, and all other mean commodities; and by so doing, besides the breach of the king's orders, they taint and vilify their blood, which they so much glory in, and boast of; taking upon them, without any scruple, all the mischiefs they bring upon the poor people. It happened at Mexico, not long before I came to that city, that some gentlemen and merchants meeting on account of a brotherhood, a gentleman stept out, and very proudly said, It was not proper that the gentlemen should walk indifferently among the merchants in the procession, but that each rank should go by itself distinct from the rest. A merchant stood up and said: I like what Mr. N. has propos'd, for it is not proper that the merchants who deal in velvet, rich silks, cloth of gold, &c. should mix with the gentlemen, who trade in Indian wheat, roots, long pepper, and such like things. This was all true, and they were fain to take it for their pains. All the world grows more deprav'd every day. The learned men of China look'd upon merchandizing as a shame and dishonour; yet of late years even the great mandarines are fallen into it. They are in some measure excusable, because having no other estates or revenues but the emperor's allowance, which is small, and their expenses great, they must of necessity find some other support, which is by trading, not in oil, vinegar, and such like things, but in

NAVA-filks and precious wares. But why should RETTE. they who have but too much pay, income, and estate of their own, foul their hands with those things that do not belong to their profession? The merchants in France told me, trade was much exalted in that kingdom, for even the king himself was concern'd in it. I do not speak of churchmen in this place, for there are an hundred impediments that render them incapable of this business. Besides the bull of Urban the eighth, there are three others of Alex- ander the seventh, Clement the ninth, and Clement the tenth.

16. Sovereigns, says the Chinese, do not harbour in their houses, or protect wicked tax-gatherers; if any one does, let him understand it is better to harbour and entertain a thief, than such a one. A thief wrongs a few, but a wicked receiver wrongs all. A certain person said, kings did not advance their kingdoms by their personal interest or profit, but by their goodness and love to their people, and the loyalty of their subjects. If a king employs himself in gathering riches, this doubtless proceeds from the iniquity of his ministers.
 If it happen that such as these govern the kingdom of heaven, and of men, great troubles and calamities will ensue. And granting there be some good ministers, yet how can they hinder the ill government of the bad?

17. The design of Confucius, and the scope of all his doctrine, tends to make a good ruler; and his principle is, that he who knows how to govern himself, will govern his family well; he that can govern his family, will know how to govern a kingdom; he that governs a kingdom well, will know how to maintain and keep an empire in peace. On the other hand, he that cannot govern himself is good for nothing. So says S. Greg. lib. IV. moral. cap. 20.

For it is hard that he who knows not how to order his own life, should judge of another man's. And Cato, That he is a bad prince, who knows not how to govern himself. And St. Paul, 1 Tim. iii. He that knows not how to rule his house, &c. Read S. Thomas and Cajetan to this purpose. It appears by this and other books, that his aim is to have men live well, love virtue, and hate vice. Pythagoras his design was the same, and he according to chronology was contemporary with Confucius. For Pythagoras according to S. Thomas, lib. IV. de reg. princ. liv'd two ages before Aristotle. And Confucius, according to the fathers of the society, liv'd a hundred and sixty years before Aristotle; so that the difference is but small. S. Thomas, lib. IV. cap. 21. says of Pythagoras out of Justin, that, He daily prais'd virtue and run down vice, and reckoned up the disasters of cities that had been ruin'd by this plague; and he persuaded the multitude into so earnest a desire of frugal learning, that it seem'd incredible that any of them had been given to luxury. At one time he taught some of them (the youth) Continency, then others modesty, and application to learning. Then after much more to the purpose, he concludes: By which it appears, that in his polity all his designs and endeavours tended to draw men to live virtuously; which Aristotle also teaches in his politics. Nay and all true policy is destroy'd if once we swerve from this end. Confucius practis'd and aim'd at the same thing.

CHAP. IV.

Other Sentences of the same Author, set down in his Book call'd Lun Ju.

1. IN this book, which is divided into treatises, there are some sayings of Confucius, and of his scholars, all tending to the same end we spoke of above. I will here insert those I think most to the purpose. The masters I will distinguish by the letter M, and those of his disciples by the letter D, which will prevent any mistake in the reader.

2. M. It is incredible that a man should be obedient to his parents within doors, and not be so abroad to his superiors and magistrates. It is so too, that he who opposes his superiors, shall not be a lover of broils and tumults.

3. D. I examine my heart every day, says Meug Zu, to three points. First, whether in transacting any business for the advantage of my neighbour, I did it with all possible care, and a sincere mind. Secondly, whether when I converse with my friends and companions, I behave my self with fidelity and truth. Thirdly, whether I benefit or not by what my master teaches me.

4. Most excellent doctrine! there have been other ancients who were careful of examining their consciences. Seneca writes of Xistus the stoick, that at night he retir'd to his closet, and acting the severe judge over himself, took a strict account of all he had done that day. Answer for thy self man, said he, what vices hast thou corrected in thy self this day? what is it thou hast mended thy life in? how hast thou fought against sin? how hast thou employ'd thy time? Certain it is, says Seneca, that the consideration of the account man is to call himself to, regulates and moderates his actions.

actions. What did Seneca? he tells us, At sun-setting I retire to discourse with my self concerning my own affairs: I search over the whole day by my self, and weigh over my sayings; I bide nothing from my self, I pass over nothing: I let nothing escape me, I forgive my self nothing. Cicero says of himself, that he every night call'd to mind three things: What I thought in the day, what I said, what I did. He examin'd his thoughts, words and deeds. Virgil in Epigram. owns he did the same.

5. M. It is requisite for the good governing of a kingdom, that the king under hand and by the by look into all business. It is his duty to be faithful and just in distributing rewards and punishments. He is to be modest and stay'd in his words. That he may abound in riches, let him love his subjects, as a father loves his children; and if he must employ his people, let it be at a time that may not obstruct their tilling.

6. Faithful in keeping his word with his subjects, this is contrary to the doctrine cardinal Ricblieu would have established in France; I was told it by grave fathers of the society, and Frenchmen of great reputation, so that he would not have the king oblig'd to keep his word with his subjects and inferiors.

7. M. If a man loves wife and learned persons, as precious things are lov'd; if he uses his utmost endeavours to serve his parents, and ventures his life in the service of his prince, and is just and faithful in his dealings and conversation with his friends; tho' all the world should say of him that he has not study'd, I will always defend and maintain that he has been conversant enough in the schools.

8. M. If a man want stayedness and gravity, he will have no authority over others. And tho' outward modesty and gravity be very requisite in a publick person, yet the main stress lies upon that which is within him, that is, upon his sincerity and the fairness of his carriage.

9. M. Have you sin'd? mend then, be not daunted at the difficulties that appear in forsaking vice, it behoves you manfully to oppose them all.

10. M. If superiors and governors exactly observe the funeral ceremonies at the interment of their dead, and appear careful in sacrificing to them, the virtue of piety will advance and increase in the subjects and meaner sort.

11. M. Affability is much look'd upon in conversing and dealing among men. The first emperors were possess'd of this virtue, and it help'd them to compass all their affairs whether great or small.

12. D. If the engagement made be agreeable to reason, it ought to be fulfill'd; if NAVATHE service done to another is conformable RETTE. to the law, and the honour given him is due, it ought all to be perform'd, and no other motives ought to obstruct it.

13. D. The man that endeavours to follow the dictates of reason, does not seek satiety in meat, eats to preserve life, and so makes use of food as it were of a medicine. He seeks not his own ease and conveniency in this life, he is diligent in business, sincere in words, he does not rely on his own judgment, but rather humbly desires learned men to govern and direct him. He that acts after this manner, may safely be call'd a lover of virtue.

14. M. Be not concern'd for that you are not known by men, be troubled because thou hast not known men. The curious reader may see S. August. Conf. 8. cap. 19.

15. M. The king that governs his kingdom virtuously and justly, is like the north-star, which being fix'd it self, is the rule the rest go by.

16. M. If the king governs only by the laws, and only inflicts punishments and penalties, it will follow that the people will be obedient to him for fear; but this government is not lasting of it self. If he governs virtuously and lovingly, it will follow the subjects will be obedient to him through affection, and will be asham'd to do amiss.

17. M. If you desire to know a man, examine three things in him. First, what it is he does. Secondly, to what end he does it. Thirdly, what it is he fixes his heart and mind upon.

18. M. The king that is void of virtue, and yet conceited, will easily incline to vice, and by that means will endanger losing his crown. If a king of great wisdom and abilities, thinks himself ignorant; if being virtuous and deserving, yields to others, thinking better of them; and if being strong and powerful, he judges himself weak and low; then will he secure his crown, and preserve his parts and good qualities.

19. M. The perfect man loves all men, he is not govern'd by private affection or interest, but only regards the publick good, and right reason. The wicked man on the contrary loves if you give, and likes if you commend him.

20. There are too many in the world who act and are govern'd by passion, and private affection. We were confin'd in the metropolis of Canton, four years the Christians had been destitute of priests, those of the metropolis of Fo Kien sent for one of those fathers that absconded, he heard their confessions, preach'd to, encourag'd them, reduced

NAVA- reduced some apostates, baptiz'd many, ad-RETTE. minister'd the sacrament of the holy eucharist, and did all that belongs to the duty of a good minister. Another missioner to whom that church belong'd before the persecution had notice of it, and having complain'd feveral times two years before, because our religious Cbinese had perform'd the same function among his Christians, he now writ to the principal Christian, who call'd the said father, and chid him for what he had done for the good of his soul, and of the rest. Is this taking care of the publick good, or acting for private interest? It is to be observ'd that the sacristan would not lend a chafuble to say mass, and that tho' all the Christians had confes'd at that time, he alone would not.

CHAP. V.

Other Documents of the same nature.

1. M. He that studies, and does not meditate, ruminare and reflect, must needs forget and remain as ignorant as at first. He that meditates and considers, if he does not study, and labour that his study may be agreeable to good and wholesome doctrine, will always continue full of doubts, and be subject to many errors.

2. M. He that governs himself, and guides others by ill doctrines, forsaking those of holy men, is the cause of much mischief.

3. It is the doctrine of his ancient em-perors he calls the doctrine of holy men, or saints; this name they bestow on them, and look upon them as such. All others but these are look'd upon by their learned men as heretical. More shall be said to this purpose in another place.

4. M. It is true knowledge for a man to affirm he knows what he knows, and flatly to declare he is ignorant of that he knows not.

5. This answer the master gave a conceited disciple of his own, who ask'd him concerning this point, and it is much the same as the yea, yea, and nay, nay, in the gospel, without using any double meanings or equivocations. Which is agreeable to what S. Augustin teaches tom. III. in Inchir.
cap. 57. see more there.

6. M. If when you hear several things you doubt of some of them, do not make known your doubt, but keep it in your heart, that by study you may dive into the truth. In other respects talk cautiously and considerately, and by that means few faults will be found in your words. If you observe, in what you see in the world, that something is not suitable to your inclination, do it not, and be diligent and careful in all your actions, and in so doing you will have but little to repent of; and if your words do not offend others, and you have nothing to repent of in your actions, high places and preferments will drop into your hands, and there will be no need of your seeking after, or making court for them. He deduces a consequence suitable to the principles of his policy.

7. M. A petty king ask'd him, What he must do to keep his subjects under? He answer'd, Put good and virtuous men into employments, and turn out the wicked.

8. M. A governor ask'd him, What means shall I use, that the people may honour, respect, and not defraud me, or contemn my orders, and that they may love one another, and addict themselves to virtue? He answer'd, If you manage your people's concerns with gravity and modesty, they will honour and respect you; if you are obedient to your parent, and bountiful and compassionate to all men, your people will be faithful and obedient to you; if you reward good men, and give a good example in your behaviour, you will bring your people to live in peace.

9. M. If you offer sacrifice to a spirit to whom sacrifice is not due from you, it is acting the flatterer.

The literal sense of this doctrine shall be handled in another place. Here we must observe the words of the commentator Chang. Ko Lao, which are, that Confucius his design is to teach us, that no man ought to meddle in that which does not belong to him, nor must he dive into that which is above his condition and capacity.

10. M. If you perceive or understand that a thing is good, just, and holy, and that in reason it ought to be done, and yet you will not do it, either for fear, or any other human motive, you are not brave, nor a man of courage.

11. M. In that great sacrifice which only the emperors offer every five years in the temples of their predecessors departed;
 I own, that tho' I like the first ceremonies, for which reason I am present at them with satisfaction; yet from the time they begin the ceremony of pouring the wine on the ground, with all that follows till the end, I have not the face to look on them, tho'
 I be present, because it is all done with little reverence.

12. This seems to have been a pontifical sacrifice, for the emperors play'd the priests; wine was offer'd nine times, and it was pour'd on the ground as often. The design

sign of this ceremony was, to invite the souls of the dead to be present at the sacrifice. They practise the same to this day, which some missionaries call policy. Of this in its proper place. Here we only observe the reverence Confucius himself had, and required in others that assisted at those sacrifices. This is good for us that say and hear mass.

13. D. The disciples report that Confucius sacrificed to his friends departed, with as much gravity, staydness and reverence, as if they had been there really present.

All these sacrifices only respected the airy souls which the living imagin'd met in the temples. Notwithstanding this was so gross an error, yet that man was so modest and full of respect in that place.

14. M. When I do not behave my self with reverence and devotion at sacrificing, it is the same thing as if I did not sacrifice.

15. What was said before, answers the design of this sentence, and hits them, who when they hear mass are prating and observing all that comes into the church, with less respect than when they are talking to a man of any worth. These are very criminal oversights. We find that new converts outdo the old Christians in this and many other particulars. The Indians in the Philippine islands, and the converts in Cbina, hear two, three, or four masses, if there are so many, with all imaginable respect and modesty, and both knees on the ground. Solomon put both his knees to the ground, 3 Kings, cap. x. v. 54.

16. D. Whensoever Confucius enter'd into the great temple dedicated to prince Cheu Kung, where he was to offer sacrifice by the duty of his place, he enquir'd into, and inform'd himself particularly concerning all the ceremonies, that he might not err in the sacrifice, which he said was most agreeable to reason.

17. I have several times observ'd, that some churchmen make it a piece of policy not to regard ceremonies. They are exact in learning the Chinese compliments, which are many and troublesome, and yet they look upon it as a matter of less moment to acquaint themselves with those that belong to their profession. Oleaster, in mem. handles this subject.

18. M. If superiors are affable to those under their charge; if they are too stately in their behaviour, and if they do not shew sorrow and concern at their death, how will it appear that they are wise and virtuous?

19. M. The prudent and perfect man has regard only to reason and justice; if a thing is just, he infallibly puts it in execution.

VOL. I.

caution; if unreasonable, he forbears to do it. He is not fond of his own opinion and conceit.

20. M. A virtuous man thinks on nothing but what is good; he that is vicious and wicked, is wholly taken up with earthly things. A good man, in his bodily affairs, has regard to the laws, which he does not break for his own private advantage. A wicked man only regards his interest, without taking notice of the laws. He that only regards his own profit, and acts for his advantage, must of necessity find enemies.

21. M. A virtuous man is not troubled because he wants an employment, or preferment, he is concern'd that he has not the parts requisite for an employment. He is not sorry that he is not known by men, but because he is not so qualify'd as to be known by all.

22. M. A good man, when he sees any virtuous person, immediately endeavours to imitate him; if he sees a wicked one, he examines himself whether he is guilty of that failing, and labours to correct it.

23. M. Children ought to reprove their parents faults with affection: if they take not the reproof, let them repeat it with respect and reverence; if they find they take it ill, let them bear it patiently, without being offended at them.

24. Brotherly reproof, either among equals, or to superiors, or inferiors, is much applauded in Cbina. Confucius makes it a duty towards parents, in which case there is no doubt much prudence and caution must be us'd, because it being a spiritual alms, must be so bestow'd that it may profit, and not do harm. If a father be somewhat haughty, all is lost.

25. M. Ill men cannot hold out long in poverty, for through impatience they fall into thefts and robberies. Nor is their joy and satisfaction lasting, for their crimes are discover'd, and they receive due punishment. But good men patiently and quietly persevere in virtue, in which they place their confidence, and not on riches.

26. M. If a man seriously and solidly embraces virtue, it is certain he will not sin.

27. M. A perfect man does not only patiently bear with poverty, and a mean condition, but he never swerves from virtue. In adversity he always values himself upon being near to that which is good, and not separated from it.

28. M. That learned man who aims at perfection, and is ashamed to wear mean clothes, and feed on coarse diet, does not deserve I should discourse with him concerning perfection and virtue.

29. S. Thomas, opusc. 19. c. 8. fully proves the duty of wearing mean apparel, especially

NAVA- especially in those who preach up humility, mortification and penance; which ought to be done by all that get into the pulpit, after the example of CHRIST our Lord, S. John Baptist, Elias, &c. All the difficulty is, whether this doctrine binds the missionaries in Cbina, or not. Some, and chiefly the modern divines, affirm the negative; they positively maintain that country requires we should clothe our selves like gentlemen, and behave our selves like marquisses, according to the opinion of F. Augeri. Yet others, and they ancients, of the same family, hold the contrary opinion; and even among the younger there are some, as the fathers Lubeli and Torrente, who abhor the first opinion; they several times told me so. Certain it is, the two last preachers in the world shall be cloth'd, as S. John says, Rev. xi. I will give to my two witnesses, &c. clothed in sack-cloth. The comment says, preaching penance, and teaching it by their example. And another; and according to their example must ye preach. And what is yet more, it is certain they will not change their apparel tho' they go into Cbina. Read Humbertus, c. 1. p. 3. erudit. relig.

30. M. The ancients were very brief in words; they were ashamed their words should go beyond their actions. All their care was how to act, not how to speak. A virtuous man must be slow in words, but diligent in actions.

Other Sentences and Sayings of the third Treatise of the Book Lun Ju.

1. M. Nang Jung my disciple is such a man, that when the kingdom is in peace, he preserves his post; and when the kingdom is in an uproar, he is so discreet and of such sweet behaviour, that he always comes off free and in peace with all men.

2. It was no small discretion to know how to save himself in time of war or peace. Confucius lik'd this man so well, that he gave him his daughter to wife. He fulfill'd that of Eccl. vii. y. 27. Give her to a wise man.

3. M. A certain governor of the kingdom Lu, was so circumspect in his duty, and did all things so considerately, that before he would put any matter in execution, he would weigh it within himself three times, or oftner. Confucius told him, it was enough to pause upon business once or twice, and that would make it more easy.

4. M. He tells of another governor, who in time of peace govern'd very discreetly; and when any uproars were, feign'd himself a fool and mad; yet in private he gave the king good advice, to reduce the people, and bring them under.

5. M. They ask'd him, what it was he wish'd, and desir'd? He answer'd, That all ancient men enjoy peace and quietness; and want neither food nor raiment; that there be no breach of trust, but fair dealing among friends; that youth be well taught and instructed; and whatsoever men wish themselves, I wish they may obtain. This is what I covet, wish and desire.

6. M. It is a great misfortune, that I have not yet known any man who truly is sensible of his faults, and heartily repents of them.

7. M. Those ought to look upon themselves as weak men, who tho' they make use of all their strength, cannot go through with what they have begun.

8. M. A virtuous and perfect man does not study to gain renown and grow rich; a base and ungenerous person does.

9. Few virtuous men will be found at present in Cbina, or the rest of the world. Sciences are now become arts to get bread, and grow famous by. And God grant preachers do not cast an eye this way, which will be intolerable.

10. M. Who can go in or out of the house, but at the door? why then don't men endeavour to do their business by the way of the door, which is reason and justice?

11. The Tartars, Chineses, and Moguls, are very circumspect in not carrying women to the war, not to avoid the sin, but because they are sensible how opposite sensuality is to the end of war. I was told at Suratte, that the Subagi Mogul was extraordinary careful that no woman should be in his army; and if he happened to find one, he immediately turn'd her out, first cutting off her hair and ears.

12. M. If the sincerity and plainness of the heart exceeds the outward ornament, a man will appear ignorant and savage. If the exterior ornament and polite conversation exceeds the candor of the mind, a man will be like an orator, whose whole care is on his words, and not on the substance of the matter. But if the outside and sincerity of the mind be equal, then will a man be perfect.

13. I believe the outward ornament is not taken care of so much in any part of the world as in Cbina. Whatsoever they do or say, is so contriv'd, that it may have a good appearance, please all, and offend none.

none. Doubtless that nation outdoes all others in modesty, gravity, good words, courtesy, civility, behaviour and good conversation; would to GOD their insides were as good.

14. M. All men naturally are upright, and are born adorn'd with a light, which teaches them to follow good, and eschew evil; but if sinning, they darken this light NAVVA- and live, it is a great happiness to escape RETTE. death.

15. M. Those who only know the value of virtue, are not to be compar'd with those that love it; nor those who only love it, with those that practise it.

CHAP. VII.

Of Confucius his Doctrine contain'd in the fifth Treatise of the Book Lun Ju.

1. M. I am a publisher, not the inventor of the doctrine I preach and teach the world. I love and honour the doctrine of the ancients, in which I resemble, tho' unworthily, the venerable Pung, upon being whose disciple I value my self.

2. The author Pung liv'd almost a thousand years before Confucius, who valu'd himself very much upon being reckoned disciple to him, and others of the ancients. Confucius observ'd what Eccles. teaches, cap. viii. ŷ. 9, 11, & 12. and therefore said, his doctrine was not his own. He hated novelty, and only look'd upon what was ancient as true and solid.

3. M. It is the part of a master to read silently, and meditate over and over on what he has read, and never to be weary of studying and teaching all men, without exception of persons. This being so as it is, how can I presume to say, I am qualify'd for the degree of a master?

4. Confucius confesses himself unworthy of being a master; in this he expresses some humility, his disciples do not follow his example. There is an infinite number of masters and doctors in China; it is true, their examinations are severe, and that they are most mighty careful and circumspect in this particular: were it so in all the universities in the world, there is no doubt there would be a less number of graduates. In order to give their degree to fifty or sixty masters, there usually meet six or seven thousand bachelors, chosen out of many more. Degrees are the reward of those that study.

5. M. That I have not employ'd my self in acquiring virtue; that I have not employ'd my self in asking, and in discoursing upon what I have study'd; that I have not observ'd the good things I have heard; that I have not amended my faults, is the cause of my sorrow and trouble.

6. M. He says, his disciple Jen Jung is such a man, that if kings put him into any employment, he accepts of it without the least reluctancy, and does his best in it to the utmost. If they slight and turn him out of his place, he goes home without any concern, and lives there quietly and peaceably. I and my disciple have this good quality.

7. D. The disciples say, Confucius their master was very circumspect about three particulars. 1. Of the facts he kept to sacrifice to his dead ancestors. 2. In war, when he serv'd there, or his advice was ask'd about military affairs. 3. In sickness; when well, he took great care of his health; but when sick, his care was extraordinary.

8. D. They also tell us of Confucius, that he was so eager at study, that he forgot his meat; and when he was satisfy'd about some difficult point, he was so overjoy'd, that he forgot all his troubles. He was so besides himself, with the exercises of learning and virtue, that he did not reflect, or consider on his great age.

9. It is no difficult matter to make out this truth, so that it is no wonder Confucius should be so much besides himself on account of his study. Of my self I must own, that when in China I apply'd my self to learn the mandarin language, I did it with so much application, that I sometimes went to bed with my spectacles on my nose, and the best of it was, that the next day I could not find them till after dinner, tho' I sought about for them very carefully: At another time I was a quarter of an hour looking for my spectacles, and had them all the while on my nose; I was a little impatient, my companion came to me, and I complaining that I could not find them, he very pleasantly took them off my nose and gave them me.

10. D. They also say he was a mighty lover of musick, at the hearing whereof he would be in a rapture and besides himself.

11. The musical instruments in China are neither so various, nor so good as ours: They have no organs, nor any knowledge of them; they who have seen them at Macao admire them very much; in my time a little one was carry'd to the emperor: F. Matthew Riccius presented another in his time. Spondanus says, the first that ever was in Europe, was presented to the emperor Pepin in the year 766.

12. M.

NAVA- 12. M. I am not wise, says he, from my RETTE. birth, but because I ever lov'd and honour'd the doctrine of the ancients, and because from my infancy I apply'd my self to the study of it, that is the reason I at-tain'd it.

13. This point has been touch'd upon above: By this it appears that Confucius his being born learned is false, tho' all the learned men affirm it; observe the reason he gives of his attaining to learning.

14. M. Some said virtue was very difficult, and requir'd much labour to attain it. Confucius answer'd, It is near and easy enough for those that have a mind to it.

15. M. Once when they rail'd at him he said, I am happy and fortunate; for if I happen to commit a fault, there is presently some body to proclaim my crime, so they help me to amend it.

16. M. A perfect man is not disturb'd or perplex'd at the changes of this world; a sinner and wicked person is ever restless.

17. M. Tai Pe, says Confucius, may be call'd a man of extraordinary virtue; there was nothing wanting that might make him so, nor could he receive any addition; he generously resign'd the crown, and that so privately, that his people knew nothing of his design, to give him the praises due to such an action.

18. King Tai Vuang, who lived seven hundred years before Confucius, had three sons; Tai Pe was the eldest, Cung Jung the second, and Ki Lie the third. The father attempted to usurp the empire; his eldest son oppos'd him, because he would not be disloyal to the emperor (a right noble son.) For this reason, and for that Tai Vuang had a great affection for his youngest son, the first and second met and agreed to leave the world, and privately retire into some remote region. They did so, and went away to the country call'd King Man, where they liv'd the rest of their days poorly and meanly. The Chinese master highly commends the elder for this action, and the second brother who bore him company deserves no less praise. The two youths were well convinc'd of the instability of worldly affairs. What wars and tumults would this have caus'd in another place? God forbid such a thing should happen in Europe.

19. M. If a man serves and does not do it as he ought, he brings himself into trouble, and is uneasy to him he serves. If a stout man wants discretion, he will cause tumults and discord: If a just and upright man is not prudent, he will prove harsh and severe.

20. The Chinese master treats of the obedience due to parents, which tho' it be the most remarkable thing in China, yet some are faulty in this respect, especially when parents in their life-time divide their substance among their children, and leave themselves to their mercy. S. Thomas opusc. 7. Præcept.

4. §. 2. condemns this manner of proceeding, and urges against it the words of Ec-clus. c. vi. Give not thy son, thy wife, thy brother, and thy friend power over thee in thy life-time; and give them not thy possession in thy life-time, lest thou repent thee. Many *Chinese*s at this time repent them of what they did for their sons, being experimentally made sensible of their ingratitude, and the ill return they make to those that gave them their being. This is seldom seen in our parts; in the Speculum Exemp. there is one much to the purpose, John Basiliius Sanctorus brings it.

21. D. He that is qualified to be tutor to a young king, and his parts fit to be intrusted with the government of a kingdom, and behaves himself faithfully and loyally in both respects, without being discourag'd or dismay'd tho' there happen to be tumults and rebellions; he, I say, may justly be term'd a generous and perfect man.

22. Some examples of this sort have been written already. S. Thomas opusc. 61. c. 1.
§. de prudentia, says, four things must concur to make a man steadfast in any thing;
a bashful fear, fear of punishment, hope of praise, and hope of profit: And there are four things that make a man perfect;
to worship God, to love his neighbour, to do as he would be done by, and not to do that to another which he would not have done to himself. The perfection the Chinese speaks of wants the first of these qualifications, which is the chiefest.

23. D. Those who have the power of government ought to be magnanimous and patient.

24. He is much in the right. I will here set down those four particulars S. Thomas mentions opusc. 61. c. 2. as requisite for a king to govern well; To govern his subjects with fatherly rule, to purchase friends by merit, to shew himself placable or affable to any that sue to him, to execute justice on delinquents with mercy. He assigns four other circumstances for the government of prelates, afsiduity in duties of their office, decency in their actions, exactness in their government, meekness in reproof. The faint goes on discour-sing curiously on what is requisite to every employment.

25. M. It is not easy to find any in this world that will labour and study eagerly many years, and not regard any thing that is temporal.

CHAP. VIII.

Other Sayings of Confucius and his Disciples.

1. MO how great was the virtue of the emperors Xun and Ju! they rul'd this world, and thought not themselves great; they only priz'd virtue, and only valu'd themselves upon loving their subjects!

2. The emperor Jao excluded his son Tan from the succession, and left the crown to Xun; this man was a peasant on the mountains call'd Lie Xan; he fled from honours and preferments, and they pursu'd him. He wept much, because with all his endeavours he could not gain the love of his parents, of a sister-in-law, and a younger brother: His sister-in-law, attempted to kill him, and tho' he knew of it, he never complain'd of her. Being made emperor, he quite forgot that and other wrongs he had receiv'd. An excellent temper, good nature, and rare inclination! but it was a mighty pity he should want the knowledge of God.

3. Confucius prosecutes his praises, and says, he was a father and mother to his subjects, reign'd sixty years, and dy'd aged a hundred and ten, after he had taken a progress throughout the whole empire. He was the eighth emperor.

4. Their histories tell us great matters concerning Ju: The greatest action he did was to drain the land: all the plains were overflow'd, either with the waters of the universal deluge, or some other particular inundation that happen'd in that country, as well as in other places. About the year

See first was about the year 23. of Jacob. ALA. ride in Gen. xlvii. ver. 27. The second in the sixteenth year of Moses.

2258 there was one in Acbaia call'd Ogygeum; about 2550 was that of Deucalion, which drowned Thessaly; such another might happen in China: However it happen'd the good emperor Ju made drains and trenches to carry off that water into the sea, which render'd the country habitable. Concerning this emperor Confucius says,

5. M. I find nothing that deserves blame in the emperor Ju, he was sparing in diet, very religious in his sacrifices to the heavenly and earthly spirits, his apparel mean, but rich when he offer'd sacrifices, his palace moderate; but he was very careful in digging ponds and trenches to hold water that might be useful in time of drought, and to carry it away when there were floods. He was a true despiser of himself, and a sincere lover of his people.

6. The emperor Xun passing by his son Xang unregarded, left the empire to Ju; he hearing what employment was design'd him, fled and hid himself, but being dis-cover'd and found out by the king, was NAVA-placed on the throne (this is like what happen'd to S. Gregory the great.) Among his other good qualities one has been mention'd in another place, which was, his care and ease in hearing all men. That all men who had any business to communicate to him might have an opportunity, he caus'd a vast drum to be made and placed in the porch of the palace, ordering those that had occasion to beat it, and as soon as any did he immediately came out to hear him. One day it was beaten ten times whilst he was at dinner, and he rose from table as often to hear what they had to say; a strange action, and great disrespect of those men of business! Another day when he was in the bath, they beat the drum three times, and he as often put on his clothes and went out to answer those that beat it. This is not to be parallel'd in the world. He forbid the use of wine under severe penalties, and banish'd the inventor of it. His reign was fortunate and happy. The histories tell us it rain'd gold three days together in his reign; I suppose the Chineses thus express the plenty and riches of that age.

Read Olevast. in Exod. xviii. concerning Moses, to the same purpose.

7. Tho' so many ages are past, the custom of having a drum in the palace is still kept up, but it is not to be beaten so easily as we have spoken of: He that presumes to beat it is to receive forty lashes, that no man may dare come near it unless his business be of great consequence. And because some die of the forty lashes or Bastinadoes, he that intends to beat it often carries his coffin with him. The Chinese who rais'd the persecution against us beat it, but they forgave him the lashes for the great service he did. Many of that nation value themselves so much upon being accounted true and loyal subjects, that notwithstanding the penalty they expose themselves, that they may give notice of something that is considerable, and if they die in the undertaking they are very well pleas'd, because they carry that honour along with them to hell. What was said above, that those who are rais'd from mean place to authority grow proud, is disprov'd by these two emperors. There is no general rule without some exception.

8. Ju had another quality, which was his religious zeal, tho' unlawful, towards spirits (these belong to the learned Sect) Val. Max. quoted by S. Thomas, lib. I. c. 14. says, Our city ever thought all things ought to give precedence to religion, even in those things

RETTE. shew of majesty.

9. D. They say the master had remov'd four things from himself. 1. His own will, for he was not govern'd by affection, or private inclination. 2. The love of his own profit, therefore he was always indifferent to all things that might happen to him. 3. Being fond of and positive in his own opinion. 4. Self-love.

10. These are good qualities for religious men. Those who are positive in their opinions have cold brains, says the trial of wits, a quality the Sicilians are much addicted to, as I have been told, and found by experience. That Confucius did love himself, I make no great doubt; else why so much care of his health, in curing his diseases, in not eating any thing ill dress'd or tainted, and not drinking wine sold in taverns, because it is commonly naught? The philosopher Ethic 4. says, A virtuous man loves his life so much the more, by how much the better he knows it to be. This love is so natural, that S. Augustin said of S. Peter, old age took not from Peter the love of life.

11. D. There was one who would commend Confucius his doctrine, and sighing, said, My master's doctrine daily appears to me more admirable and mysterious; I use all endeavours to dive into it, and it daily seems to me more profound; I think to take a full view of it, and it is so spiritual that it immediately vanishes. He is singular in all respects, in teaching he is methodical, in persuading to virtue he sweetly prevails; his method makes me exercise all virtues, and his brevity makes me practise all I have learn'd that is good. I am so taken with his doctrine, that tho' I would I cannot lay aside my books; and tho' I have employ'd all my wit to attain it, I cannot find out how to comprehend it.

12. The disciple commends his master too much, tho' he has left us little or nothing to benefit by in natural philosophy, and less in what relates to God; in which particulars the disciples have been as faulty as their master, without advancing the least step forwards, wherein they nothing resemble other ancients. For from the beginning, says S. Thomas in prolog. super Job, they reach'd some small matter of truth, but afterwards as it were step by step they came to some fuller knowledge of the truth. The Chinese are at this day as blind and ignorant as they were above two thousand years ago, nay rather more, since, according to the opinion of very grave missionaries (but not according to mine) those very ancient ones had knowledge of God, and some insight into eternity, all which those that have succeeded till this time have been destitute of.

13. M. He makes use of this simile to prove, that we must hold on to the end in the way of virtue. If I had a mind to raise a mount, and should leave off after much labour, when I only wanted one basket of earth to finish all, it is a plain case all my toil would be vain and fruitless. And if I design to raise a mount on a plain, tho' it rise but little every day, if I persevere, it will certainly be finish'd; if I give over, the work will remain imperfect.

14. The Chinese use many similes and parables, as the people of Palestine did. It is a very convenient method to explain ones meaning, says S. Thomas, and he proves it opusc. 60. art. 14. where he has excellent doctrine to the purpose.

15. M. Honour and respect is due to young men, because they may come to be holy and learned; but if when they come to forty years of age, they are neither wise nor learned, there is little hope they will prove so afterwards.

16. M. May reproof, tho' it be harsh, be rejected? It is very reasonable to correct those faults we are told of. Can that reproof which is given in a florid rhetorical stile fail of pleasing? If a man is reprov'd and does not mend his faults, the fault will be his own, not his who admonishes and reproofs.

17. We missionaries in China are put to no trouble to persuade the Chinese to brotherly reproof, it is well establish'd among them, and they are satisfy'd it is a duty.

18. M. He that is free from covetousness and envy, may live in any part of the world, and serve any employment.

19. M. A prudent man is not surpriz'd at any accident, because he provides for them; the perfect man is troubled at nothing, because he is conformable to heaven in all things. The resolute and valourous man fears not, tho' he see death before his face.

20. The rest contain'd in this and the following treatises, all of it almost tends to the same end as has been seen; its scope is to dispose and order those five ranks or states, which the Chinese master assigns to a kingdom, and which are, king and subjects, parents and children, husband and wife, elder and younger brothers, and friends. Its drift is also to direct the learned, the husbandmen, traders and mechanics, to live in peace and unity.

21. I observ'd in the first chapter of the second book, that tho' all nations in the world make special account of their soldiery in all their books of politicks, yet the Chinese do not mention them in theirs, tho' they have made use of them for some thousands of years. Plato and Socrates divide the commonwealth into five ranks of people, people, viz. princes, counsellors, soldiers, handicrafts, and husbandmen; Romulus into senators, soldiers and commons. See S. Thomas, lib. IV. de reg. princ. cap. 11, & 14. In the fifteenth he says, All polities make mention of warriors, because all cities and countries are preserv'd in their splendor by warriors, and the commonwealth decays for want of the use of war, &c.

22. I know not what reason the Cbineses NAVA- had, when they treated so much about the RETTE: establishing of their monarchy, to omit and make no mention of a thing so material. The art of war is much improv'd in that kingdom at present; the Tartar holds it in esteem, but it is not to compare with the military art in Europe.

CHAP. IX.

Of some Sentences taken from the Doctrine call'd Xu King.

1. XU King signifies a law, or written doctrine, it is a book of vast antiquity, is explain'd in the fifth of this volume, and contains several sayings of ancient emperors, I will here set down some of them.

2. "He that comforts, makes much of, cherishes and maintains me, is my king and lord; he that hurts and wrongs me is my mortal enemy."

3. By this he explains the duty of kings and superiors towards their subjects; and it implies, that then a man deserves the name and title of king, when he cherishes and makes much of his subjects, and that of a tyrant and enemy when he treats them ill. S. Thomas, opusc. 71. cap. 6. says, four faults attend a tyrant, He breeds division among neighbours, oppresses the wise, drains the rich, and beats down the mighty. See Oleaster in Gen. xli. She cry'd to the king for bread.

4. "He that is very virtuous, neither jests, nor is unmannerly, no man dares play upon, nor be disrespectful to him. His modesty, steadiness and gravity, does not allow of the first, nor give way to the latter."

5. "Do not oppose the emperor Xun, says one, nor truth nor virtue for a vain-glorious end; and do not contradict what all men do, to follow your own opinion and fancy."

6. Some men have the spirit of contradiction, and look upon it as unbecoming them if they do not oppose all the world; the beautiful sun-beams cannot escape their reflexions and arguments. The emperor Xun was the same to the Cbineses as St. Paul is to us. His sayings are oracles, and great patterns of virtue; they will have all his actions honour'd, and no way cavil'd at. To this purpose you may read S. Thomas at the end of the sixth chapter of Job.

7. "Whether you meditate, talk, pray, or do any other thing whatsoever, says one, you ought to be very attentive and careful, without admitting any distraction."

8. "Be not sparing or niggardly in correcting thy faults, said an emperor; be generous in eschewing vice, and forgiving thy enemies. Be compassionate towards all men, and love them from thy heart. Let all this come from thy self, do not expect to be pray'd or sued to."

9. "He that looks for a prosperous event, must find out and make use of lawful means: he that would follow reason and the laws, must not put off the repentance of his faults till the end of his life."

Both these hints are very good and holy. 10. "The emperor Tang was wont to say, I am the cause of all the sins of my people."

11. This was a very humble and compassionate emperor, he attributed the faults of all the limbs to the head. Others might say so with more reason, and it is true, that Regis ad exemplum totus componitur orbis: Read A Lapide in Gen. xlv. §. 16. who has much very good to this purpose.

12. "Virtue, says one, has no peculiar place, a man may be every where good and holy. Entertain no foul thoughts, and you will not smell their stink."

13. "He that leads his life carefully and watchfully, will have no troubles in this, or the life to come."

14. "He that is without a great sin will live free from many sins."

15. "Let the minister (says an emperor) who attends a king help him to be virtuous, he must not neglect this a moment. Christians may observe this heathen's doctrine."

16. "Another tells us, kings are oblig'd to honour virtue, and virtuous men; they ought rather to lose their kingdom and life than fail in this particular."

17. "That king who becomes a mirror and pattern of virtue in his kingdom, has a right and title to ask assistance and long life of heaven."

Plato said, kings committed more sin by their ill example than by the faults they were guilty of.

NAVARETTE. 18. "Do not aspire (says one) to appear wise and learned, forsaking the ancient and sound doctrine of the first kings."

19. Whensoever the Chinese fall upon this subject, they insist much upon this point; to which purpose the reader will find choice materials in Arriaga, tom. II.

20. "He that governs, let him govern before the kingdom is in an uproar; once in rebellion it is hard to govern. He that governs the commonwealth, let him do it before the danger comes, when once it comes there is much difficulty in applying a remedy."

Oleaster teaches the same divinely in Num. xi, and xiv. Read it there.

21. "The prince's favourite, says one, presently grows proud, it will be convenient for him to think what a fall he may have."

22. "Three sins, says the Chinese, will not admit of any diminution by circumstances, and do not deserve pardon. The first is, to make the people mutiny. The second to destroy the ancient doctrine of the saints. The third, to make any innovation in ancient customs and manners."

23. "We must bear with our neighbours failings, says the Chinese. This is the seventh work of mercy."

24. "He that has patience, and will attend, will finish his business." Very well said. Read Cajetan in Luke xxi. and Syl. tom. VI. p. 510. q. 8.

25. "Let him that governs be constant; he that writes brief and sincere." Read M. Arriaga, tom. II. lib. II. c. 1. §. 1. concerning brevity in writing. Apollonius was ask'd, Who are the best of men? He answer'd, They who are briefest in discourse.

26. "What doctrine is that which does not descend from the ancients, or why has it the name or title of doctrine?"

27. "Superiors ought to be merciful, and to take compassion on the misfortunes of their inferiors, relieving them in their distresses."

Much has been writ upon this subject, and very much is said to it by our B. Humbert. de erud. relig.

28. Chinese began betimes, and were some ages before us in teaching the truth of what is daily preach'd among us, and printed by casuists and divines.

29. "They write of a counsellor that was always in fear, and full of doubts and scruples on account of his employment, and that he used to rise out of his bed at mid-night to consider how he should discharge his duty."

30. By what has been said we may gather and make out how ancient the knowledge of the light of reason is in Cbina, and how strictly many of that nation have liv'd up to it.

CHAP. X.

Of other Sayings and Sentences which I read and took notice of in China.

1. Treating of those who addict themselves to virtue, a certain book has these words: "If they open their mouth to speak, devotion evaporates, and the spirit flies away; if they move their tongues, they fall into censuring, or at least idle words follow."

2. The Chinese call man a tree with the wrong end upwards. Others have said the same thing, so did Socrates, bomo arbor inversa. A certain token he was created for heaven and not for earth. S. Augustin serm. 55. ad frat. writes the answer Ovid gave the tyrant, Met. lib. I. when he ask'd him, Why did God make you? He answer'd, That I may contemplate on heaven, and the Deity of heaven. For man is made on earth, not for the earth, but for heaven; and he was made of earth, nor for the sake of the earth, but for the sake of heaven. Here the saint exclaims: Who among the faithful, brethren, could have said more, or upon better grounds? I know not.

The Chinese confess something of this nature. The brutes, they say, look to the earth, and therefore their face is turn'd that way, but man looks towards heaven, and therefore was created upright, as tending thither.

3. "Few in number do not overcome many, nor the weak the strong, says the Chinese."

4. "When many are overcome by a few, it is either the work of heaven, or want of courage, or treachery."

5. "The counsellor's heart is by the emperor's side, in the same manner as a sheep stands by a tiger."

This sentence is much celebrated among the Chinese, and sufficiently verify'd among them, especially since the Tartar government. They further add to enforce it, that when the dragon, that is the emperor, is angry, there is no place for a subject to hide himself in. This is something like that of holy Job, The lion roars, who will not fear? And that of Ecclus. xvi. v. 14. The anger of the king is the messenger of death. The same is in Prov. xix. As the roaring of the lion, so is the anger of the king.

6. "The

6. "The lamb kneels down when he sucks, thanking the dam for the sustenance he receives from her. For the same reason the crow maintains his parents when they are old. If man is not grateful to his benefactors, he is worse than the brute beasts. Enquire of the beasts and birds, says the holy Ghost, that you may learn of them.

The Cbineses make great account of this sentence, to recommend gratitude to those who do us kindnesses and good turns; that nation loudly condemns the vice of ingratitude.

7. Meng Zu the second master of Cbina says; Tho' there are bad and sinful men, if they fast and mend, they will come to be good.

8. "Time passes away more swift than an arrow flies when sent from a strong bow; it hastens on years, and spurs on death." S. Ambrose in Psalms, Thou sleepest, and thy time walks, nay it flies.

Wicked false doctrine cannot overcome that which is good and true.

9. They report of one Lu Pan, who is now the patron of carpenters, to whom they sacrifice when they begin a building; that he was rare and ingenious in architecture, and that he made birds that flew, and horses that ran.

10. They tell of an ancient petty king, who was so brave, that he would fight hand to hand with a tiger, and kill him.

11. One man receiv'd a great kindness of another, and the benefactor going to the house of him that had been oblig'd, who was an inn-keeper; he to be grateful for the benefit receiv'd, after entertaining him well in his house, when it was time to go to bed, put his own wife into the room to him. She was twice dismiss'd, and he put her in the third time, and shut the door on the outside: A base and ungenerous way of requiting kindnesses! The guest perceiving how it was, desir'd her to go to bed and sleep; he sat up all night studying and writing verses, without speaking a word to her, or once looking her in the face. Among other verses he made after their fashion, some were to this effect: this man knows not me, nor do I know his wife. If I be not true to my wife, she will not be so to me. If I transgress with my neighbour's wife, my neighbour will transgress with mine. In the morning, when the chamber door was open'd, he watch'd his opportunity, and fastning the verses to the door, stole away privately, without being seen by any body. This agrees with what I quoted out of S. Augustin, The pagans are become teachers of the faithful. What Christian would not be applauded for such an action?

VOL. I.

12. "They say flatterers carry honey in their mouth, and a sword in their heart; their mouth is sweet, and their inside bitter; they have liquorice in their mouth, and wormwood in their bowels." It all imports as much as, Wolves in sheeps clothing. Pliny the younger says, When a wicked man feigns himself good, he is worst of all.

13. "They report Confucius was wont to say, Is there any that exhorts others to the practice of virtue? If there be, the best method is, to give a good example: he that uses such exhortation is sure of his reward; he that does the contrary, is sure of punishment.

14. "The second tyrant is worse than the first, and the third more cruel than the second.

15. "The Cbineses have that rule of Seneca, He that will be belov'd, must rule with an easy hand. And that of Ammianus, He that rules, must shun all things that are too hard, as he would dangerous rocks.

16. "And that of S. Chrysostom; As to be always learning, is a token that no progress can be made; so always to seek a proof, is a sign of a resolution never to believe.

17. "He that gives, ought in reason to give according to his quality and place.

18. "A slave must not be too tenderly kept.

19. "Women are not to manage business.

S. Thomas says the same, lib. IV. de reg. princ. cap. 5. & 6. The master of the family minds business abroad, women attend the affairs at home. No nation in the world observes this so strictly as the Cbineses. No woman is employ'd upon business out of doors upon any account whatsoever; nor does it appear whether there is any woman, or women in the house. They are absolutely incapable of inheriting, or any sort of trade or dealings.

20. "They who teach, and as masters impart their learning to others, must be humble.

21. The Cbinese has that proposition of some authors, Fast. temp. fol. 31. pag. 2. There is a sort of miserable victory, which is when the conqueror comes off with few or no soldiers; so that boldness is very hurtful when it is not govern'd by foresight.

22. "As also that of Varro; He will teach nothing that is great, who has learnt nothing of himself.

23. "And that of Augustus; It is a great extravagancy to catch fish with a gold hook; for the loss of the hook cannot be repair'd by any success in fishing.

24. Concerning changing or continuing of governors, they say the same that Tiberius

NAVARRIUS did upon the same account; "I saw RETTE. "a man driving away the flies that were upon a sick man's sores; and the sick man rebuk'd him, saying, some that are thirsty will come and suck, now these that are full fill up the place." The sick man was much in the right; but it is true too, that there are some so covetous that they will always suck, without ever being satisfy'd, or satiating the hellish appetite of avarice.

25. Hecaton the stoick said, All that is good is difficult; a common proposition among the Cbineses. All we Europeans have observ'd, what a general consent and agreement there is among all the learned Cbineses in the doctrine of their sect; which ought to be observ'd in all places, especially in morality, and those things that relate to the soul.

CHAP. XI.

In which some Hieroglyphicks of the Chinese Characters are expounded.

THE first Cbinese letters or characters began by painting of things; in process of time they shortned it, leaving only a part of the thing to signify the whole. The letters or characters now in use were invented whilst the family Han possess'd the empire, at which time the Son of God became man. The number of letters they use is excessive. The dictionary I had, and lost in my travels, which was that commonly us'd, contain'd thirty three thousand three hundred and seventy five letters. There is another ancients and fuller, which contains seventy thousand. It is a dismal thing for us that study there, to think on this vast multitude of characters, it quite disheartens a man, did not our LORD on the other side encourage us. It is true, that he who can make good use of twenty thousand is a good scholar. I, whilst I was in Cbina, through GOD's mercy, attain'd to the knowledge of above ten thousand, which inabled me without much difficulty to compose five volumes concerning our holy faith; whereof, according to the letters that came in the year 1674, four are printed by this time. Every letter or character is ingenious and artificial; for the better conceiving whereof, I will in this chapter expound the meaning of some of them.

1. The word to express ancient and antiquity, is Kieu; this is writ with the same character as the mouth, and over it the letter that stands for ten, which implies, it is a thing that has been deliver'd down by ten several mouths successively, which is a sufficient antiquity.

To express a mouthing bawling man, they write the letter that stands for nine, and under it that which is for the mouth, to signify he talks and roars as if he had nine mouths. They also write the letter that serves for the mouth, and under that which signifies great, to express he has a great mouth in a figurative sense, that is, he talks much.

Happiness and felicity is express'd by the same letter as the mouth, with the letter that stands for master over it; for, say they, what greater happiness can there be than the mouth of a learned master? We might here apply that of Prov. x. v. 13. In the lips of a wise man, &c. And that of the fourteenth chapter, He shall be filled with good things of the fruit of his mouth. Which is happiness enough.

Among the characters that signify a king, one is compos'd of that which serves for the mouth, and over it that which is for guiding, directing, and putting into the way: which imports, that kings are to guide the people by their example, and to rule and direct it by their words and laws; but the example must be first, and next the words must follow, which is the reason the mouth is plac'd below.

The moveables and goods of a house are express'd by the letter of the mouth four times repeated, and that of the dog in the middle of them; they say, dogs guard them, barking and biting, that is, the household-stuff.

A square with the letter of the mouth, and that of arms in the middle of it, stands for a kingdom. This denotes that it must be fortify'd on all sides, and maintain'd and defended by arms and good councils.

To live in some particular place, is writ with a hand on one side, and the earth on the other; which implies, that he holds fast by that earth.

Sitting is signify'd by the letter that signifies the earth, and over it that which stands for stopping or staying; that is, a man stays upon the earth.

2. Walls are express'd by the letter of earth, then that of strength or valour, and that of arms: this imports, that earth, valour, and weapons, defend the city.

To write weeping, they make the letter for eyes, and that for water, which is very plain.

The sea, they write with the letter for water, and that for mother, that is, mother of the waters. It is also call'd the pool of heaven, to which all rivers flow.

To signify what is plain and visible, or to explain and make easy, &c. they write the letters of the sun and moon.

Companions

Companions and school-fellows are express'd by two moons of an equal growth.

3. Money is express'd by the letter of metal on the side, and that of arms twice one over another. An author says, I have often consider'd upon this letter, it has double arms, which are weapons to take away the life of man; so that it is money which kills us; but rash men, without taking notice of this danger, run all after it.

Fidelity is written with the letter man, and words, or a mouth by his side, to imply that man is known by his mouth and words, and that he who keeps not his word is no man.

They have many letters that signify to give, the most usual is a hand busied about a man.

Inconstancy and lightness is express'd by the letter man upon mountains, vainly aiming to get into the clouds.

To signify sun-rising, they make the letter tree, and sun over it, because when he rises he is first seen upon the trees. For his setting, they invert it, that is, hide him under the tree.

For a bargain or contract, they make the letter nail, and that of words by it, to denote, that the word is as fast as if it were nail'd.

4. For black, they write the letter fire, and smoke above; for white, the letter of the sun, and a point over it, which signifies brightness.

A prison and dungeon they express by the letter man between four walls.

Theft is written with the letter desire, and that of household goods. To desire what is in another man's house belongs to theft, adding the letter hand, the meaning is plain.

Arrows they write with the letter for body, and the arrow by it; this means, that the body casts the arrow.

Prayer is signify'd by the letter XI, which imports to make known, by that of man, and that of mouth; this they explain thus, that man's mouth, by what it says, makes known to the departed spirits what he desires or aims at. Others say it is not a mouth that is placed next to the letter man, but the character of rejoicing (these two are very much alike) and it imports, that prayer rejoices the spirits.

The opposition of the moon is represented by a counsellor looking at the emperor, and bowing to him. The emperor is the sun, the counsellor the moon.

A magistrate, gentleman, or nobleman, that serves the emperor, is signify'd by the letter to drag, and a heart; this implies, that kings and emperors drag men, bringing them to their beck.

5. Night they express by the letter to leave, because the labour of the day is left off, and the body takes rest. They say a virtuous man has four times, the morning to hear good doctrine and instructions; noon, to ask and enquire into what is necessary; the afternoon to retire, and think of perfecting his life; night to rest his body. Another book expounding the same letter says, That we must not stay till evening, much less till night, to serve a great lord, but must begin in the morning.

To express death, they have a letter compos'd of entering and hiding; he that dies, enters, I enter the way of all flesh. And he remains hid and conceal'd to this world. It may have another meaning, viz. That man enters into this life, and in a short time is hid in the next: As Seneca said, I enter'd upon condition that I should go out. I was born, and came into the world under an obligation of going out, and being hid.

A barren woman is written with a letter of a stone and a woman by it; that is, a woman of stone, barren, that does not break.

To signify counterfeiting, or falshood, they write three women; well express'd.

To quarrel, is signify'd by the letter that stands for nails and hands, and a stroke from top to bottom, which imports to put out; because quarrelling is only putting out the hands, and making use of them and the nails against another.

6. Woman is written with the letter of submission or subjection, and the word is joined to that of man; it is pronounc'd fu jin, to denote she is to be subject to man, whom she is to serve; and by the letter for woman, is that of broom, signifying that the wife must work in the house, even to cleaning and sweeping of it. That the wife may be the more subject, they brought up the custom that the husband should pay the portion. The people of Crete seem to have aim'd at the same thing, according to Lycurgus his law. S. Thomas mentions it, lib. IV. cap. 18. He would have maids marry without a portion, that wives might not be chosen for the sake of money; and men might keep them the better within bounds, being under no obligation of portion. They took care of all. Cabassucius, in not. concil. writes the same. Read Sylv. tom. I. lib. I. cap. 5. num. 27.

Learning, wisdom, and knowledge, is written with the letter mouth, and that of arrow joining to its side; which means, that he who pierces into things, and sharply expounds them, is wise, learned, &c.

Mother is written with the same letter as suckling, and the breasts but cover'd with a stroke

NAVA-
RETTE.

NAVA- a stroke across them. This, say they, denotes the modesty and decency women ought to use in their apparel, for they must not shew their breasts upon any account, which the Chinese and Tartar women observe very strictly. Would it were so in our parts.

We have never a Pythagoras in Europe, to prevail with the women of our times, to do what he persuaded them to do in his. S. Thomas, lib. IV. cap. 21. mentions it, Pythagoras obtain'd, That the women should lay aside garments set off with gold and other ornaments suitable to their quality, as incentives to luxury, and should carry them all to the temple of Juno; where he persuaded them to offer all to her, affirming, that virtue was the true ornament of ladies. Less would content us at present, and we should be satisfy'd if the clothes, carriage, and behavior were like the heathens and idolaters, Chinese, Tartars, and other women of those parts of the world; certain it is, such modesty is not to be found in Europe.

7. To use and habituate oneself, is writ with two wings, and the letter for day under, to imply, that flying every day makes it customary and habitual.

Among other letters which signify to govern, one is Chung; it is writ with a mouth and a stroke across it, which signifies to pierce, and denotes that he who governs must pierce and look into the orders he gives. It also signifies, that he who rules, must fix in the center of justice, without inclining to one side or other.

They also say, the stroke across is a sword in the mouth, to signify, that if the orders he gives are wicked, and his judgment unjust, he deserves a sword should be thrust down his mouth and cut his throat.

To conquer, is writ with the letter for a man standing, and by it that of arms, that is, to go with sword in hand.

A soldier on the frontiers, is signify'd by the letter for a man sitting, and that of arms: this means a soldier that is settled and does not march.

A greedy hungry man, is express'd by the letter of heaven, and a mouth under it, to imply, he would swallow and devour heaven.

There is another character for a king, the word is Vuang; it consists of three strokes cross'd by another, which signify heaven, earth, and men, to denote that a king is to be like them all; he is to be the common father of all men, to cover and protect them, as heaven does; and to be like the earth, which bears and maintains all men. The king is to do the same with his people, as man; he is to look upon himself as such, to esteem all others as his brothers; and to remember the king is to die as well as his subject. The Chinese say the same of the earth that Pythagoras did, when he call'd her A common mother; the earth is the mother, and the sun the father of all that are born on the earth.

Man who in speaking is call'd nan, is written with the letter that stands for a plough'd field, and under it that of strength, to signify that man was born to labour; Man is born to labour, Job v. and to seek his sustenance with sweat and toil; In the sweat of thy brow.

Fear and dread, which they term ngoi, in writing is express'd by a tiger's head, and claws under it, which causes fear and terror.

Mercy, among them call'd ven, is signify'd by a man in prison, and underneath a dish to eat in; this imports that prisoners must have alms given them, and be maintain'd, which is a work of mercy.

The silk worm they write, making the letter for heaven, and that for worm under it: that is, calling it a heavenly worm, or worm of heaven; which notably expresses how beneficial God has made it.

It were easy to dilate upon this subject, but what has been said may suffice to express the inventor's fancy, which was certainly very singular.

The End of the Third Book.

BOOK IV.

Of the Chinese Moral Doctrine.

HAVING hitherto, tho' briefly, given an account of what is most material in the Chinese empire, and made some mention of the remarkable actions and sayings of emperors and their ministers, from which the reader may reap any benefit; I resolv'd in this fourth book to give an account of the Chinese book that nation calls Ming sin pao kien, i. e. the precious mirror of the soul; or, the precious mirror that enlightens and diffuses a brightness into the heart, and inward part of man. The said book is made up of sentences of several authors, and of several sects; the whole subject is morals, and I doubt not but any man may find enough in it to make profit of. A very good Christian of ours, and an able scholar, whose name was John Mieu, speaking of this book, said, As S. Thomas chose and gather'd what he lik'd best out of holy doctors to compose his Catena Aurea; so the author of this book extracted out of all our authors, what he thought most conducing to make known the way of virtue. This was the first book I read in that country, and which I took a great fancy to, because of its plainness and brevity. In the translation I observe the rule of S. Hierom. ad Pamach. de optimo genere interpretandi; That the Septuagint did not translate word for word, but sentence for sentence. The saint affirms the same thing of Symmachus on Jer. xxxi. That he did not render word for word, but sentence for sentence, and sense for sense. S. Thomas opusc. 1. in principio observes this method, and approves it in these following words: It is the part of a good translator, that in translating those things which belong to the catholick faith, he preserve the sentence, but alter the manner of expression, according to the property of the language into which he translates. I will endeavour to follow this course, and trust to so sure a guide, tho' I am satisfied my language will not reach the Chinese propriety of expression, nor their elegancy, which this nation has in an extraordinary measure for explaining and delivering their conceits. I will observe the author's method, tho' I will not always set down the authors he quotes, because it makes nothing to our purpose, and to save the trouble of words, which are harsh to Europeans, and hard to pronounce.

VOL. I.

It cannot be deny'd but that it is commendable in the missionaries to study heathen books, since the primitive saints and fathers did so; and sometimes this employment is absolutely necessary. S. Thomas handles this point elegantly upon Boetius de Trinit. §. deinde quaeritur, ad 3. sic proceditur, & in opusc. 19. c. 11, 12. there the reader may see this matter prov'd. I will only insert in this place, what the saint takes from the comment on Dan. i. S. Jerom also has it in the place above quoted, But Daniel proposed in his heart, &c. He that will not eat of the king's table lest he be polluted, would never have learnt the wisdom and doctrine of the Egyptians if it were any sin: he learnt it, not to follow, but to judge of and disprove it. How could we in China oppose abundance of errors those heathens hold, if we did not read and study their books and doctrine? It were absolutely impossible. It is also useful to make our benefit of what truth there is found in them, as says S. Jerom ad Pamach. Monach. If you happen to love a captive woman, to wit secular learning, &c. S. Thomas mentions it to this purpose in opusc. 19. quoted above. So that after clearing and cleansing the Chinese doctrine of what is destructive in it, we may reap some profit and advantage by it. The saint to the same purpose takes the words of S. Augustin 2. de doctrin. Chris. where he says, If by chance the philosophers, especially the Platonists, happen to say any thing that is true and conformable to our faith, it is not only not to be fear'd, but to be taken from them for our use, as from those who have stood wrongfully possess'd of it. Which was signified to us by the riches the people of God carry'd away from the Egyptians, as doctors expound it, and our Hugo declares in Exod. xi. v. 2, 3.

Besides, there is more in the heathen doctrine, says S. Thomas in the twelfth chapter quoted above, which is, that it often proves a powerful argument ad hominem against sectaries, and serves to confound and put catholicks out of countenance. In short, it is a very allowable employment (unless the ill end it is directed to corrupt it) if it be design'd for the benefit of the hearers, because by this means sometimes our adversaries are more easily and more effectually convinced and instructed, &c. The testimony of an enemy is of great authority.

RE

NAVARRITY, says S. Basil, hom. 15. de Chrif. RETTE. gener.

For these reasons I have given, I resolv'd to translate this little book, which in truth has among the Gentiles the same place that the devout à Kempis has among catholicks. I slightly pass over the dogmatical precepts of sects, because it is a subject that requires to be handled by it self, and the main points of it have been discuss'd in my controversies, in the second book of this volume, and in the fifth more shall be said. In this place I treat only of the morals, to which I will add some quotations out of our books relating to the same subject, to make this the larger and more copious, and that the reader may pick out what he likes best.

After having writ and observ'd what has been hinted above, I reflected that F. James de Morales of the society of Jesus, handles the point at large in his treatises. But what I have alledged in this place, with what I write in several parts of my controversies, and shall urge hereafter, is sufficient to prove and make good my assertion.

CHAP. I.

In which the Heathen endeavours to encourage Man to follow Virtue.

1. HE enters upon his design, laying down the reward of labour, an excellent medium to compass what he aims at: reward disposes the will, quickens its desire, spurs it on to slight dangers, and overcome difficulties, and sometimes makes impossible attempts seem easy. Read Sylveir, apoc. 1. v. 19. q. 34. num. 253. But if this encouragement fails, and the hope of reward is taken away, man cannot stir one step. Therefore the Chinese says, "When the recompence fails, the heart sinks, the gaul is chil'd, the strength decays, and the spirits grow too weak to lift a hand."

The Chinese observe the same method Moses did. Our Hugo on Gen. i. asks the question, Why Moses began so high? The reason is this, That which is difficult, burdensome and harsh, is hard to be observ'd, if no reward is propos'd to him that keeps it, &c. He proposes the reward to make the harshness of virtue easy, he proposes the punishment to banish idleness and sloth.

2. The Chinese philosopher says, "Heaven will reward the virtuous man with wealth and happiness, it will chastise the wicked with troubles and misfortunes."

3. Another author. "Heaven will send a thousand blessings upon him that acts well, and a thousand mischiefs on him that does ill."

A thousand blessings and evils imply all blessings and evils, the phrase is our own: Job uses it, c. ix. S. Thomas expounds it, lect. 1. The Chinese use the number 100 in the same sense.

4. Another. "He that lays up and heaps virtues, finds and reaps virtues; he that gathers wickedness, will find and reap wickedness."

That is to say, whatsoever a man sows, the same he shall reap.

5. "It is requisite and necessary to think

" well on this, for heaven is not deceiv'd.
" Bear in mind, that virtue and vice have " their reward, which no man can escape,
" tho' he fly high, or into far countries.
" You are the best witness whether you " do well or ill: the beginning of the re" ward or punishment is within you, you " need not ask it of your neighbour: Do " not doubt of its coming, all the question " is, whether it will be to day or to mor" row? Withdraw into your chamber,
" search your heart, mark out your life,
" and silently consider by your self with " care what you have acted. Do not for" get, that what is good has a good re" ward, and what is evil a bad one. En" deavour always to use virtuous exerci" ses, and heaven will protect you; but " if you are foolish and stiff-neck'd, you " will receive the punishment you deserve.

6. The Chinese proceeds thus. "Endea" your always to go on in the right way,
" and to live with an upright and sincere
" heart, and so doing you need not doubt " but heaven and earth will be favourable
" to you."

7. Another says: "That house or fa" mily which gathers virtues, will doubt" less have plenty and even superfluity of " wealth; that, which heaps vices will a" bound in misfortunes and troubles."

8. The emperor Chao Lie being at the point of death, said to the prince his son, (this was mention'd in another place, but here more exactly) "My son, you must not venture to commit a sin because it is small, nor omit doing a virtuous action because it is inconsiderable." This was as if he had said to him, Lead your life so cautiously that you may not commit one venial sin; for if you are not cautious how you fall into lesser sins, you will easily come to wallow in grievous offences: According to that of Ecclus. xix. v. 2. He that makes no account of small things, things, will fall by degrees: And to that which devout à Kempis writes, lib. I. de imit. Christ. cap. 11. If you do not overcome small and light things, when will you conquer those that are harder? "And do not forbear any thing that is good, tho' it seem to you but a trifle, said the emperor to his son, because when you have made small things habitual, the greater will daily grow easier to you. In short, my son, you are to understand that all sin whatsoever is heinous, burthensome and hurtful to the soul, and any virtuous action is profitable and beneficial." What better advice could S. Francis or S. Dominick give their children, or what could they say beyond this?

9. Another author says. "If but one day pass away without meditating on virtue, it is enough to give way for all vices to sprout up.

10. A Chinese says, "Courage and resolution is requisite for the attaining of virtue, and every day this bravery must be renew'd. Ears that hear good words avoid falling into three sorts of sins.

The first part is not unlike to, The kingdom of heaven suffers violence, Mat. xi. v. 12. that is, those that take up the generous resolution of walking in the paths of virtue. A learned Christian expounded the second part to me, saying, It was meant of sins of thought, word, and deed. It is not virtue, unless the courage encreases with the difficulty, says S. Bernard quoted by Hugo Gen. xxvi.

11. The same Chinese adds, "To do acts of virtue is like climbing a mountain, to sin is like coming down from above." This sentence is express'd three several ways in the Chinese books, but they all tend to the same, which is, that to act virtuously is difficult, and to act viciously easy. The difficulty lies in hitting the mark, 'tis easy to miss it; this is the opinion of the heathens. It is princely to labour: to indulge luxury and sloth is servile, said Alexander the great.

It is not much to be wonder'd that virtue should seem difficult to those that have liv'd without the knowledge of GOD, without a spiritual law, without hopes of a reward, without fear of punishment, as the Chinese have done. Original sin made them and all others subject to this misfortune.

12. A grave doctor of theirs says, "It is requisite that virtue be coveted and desir'd, and so that no man rejoice at vice, or delight in it.

The Chinese word tan is very comprehensive, it signifies covetousness, to covet, a covetous man, one that thirsts after and is anxious about obtaining any thing, it is to seek it with care and anxiety. NAVARRETTE.

13. A disciple of the master Confucius says thus, "Virtue of it self is profitable and beneficial, vice of itself is hurtful: therefore a good man makes the first his business, and shuns the mischiefs the latter causes; which he does, not to gain the fame and reputation of being a good man, but to avoid the shame caus'd by sin.

14. "Virtue is to be look'd upon (says another) as if a man hunger'd and thirst-ed after it.

A king of Africk gave a Portuguese leave to take out of a mine as much gold as he could in a day for himself; the man got up early in the morning, and began presently to labour courageously, and with a covetous mind; and tho' the labour and toil was great, he felt nothing considering the gold he gather'd. Noon came, and he felt no hunger: a servant he had carry'd him his dinner, and he call'd upon his master, saying, Sir, it is late, come hither and eat a bit: the Portuguese was in a passion, and answer'd, Thou mad foolish fellow, is this a day to eat or drink? the king has given me this time to make my advantage of it, and get riches to serve me as long as I live, and would you have me lose it by going to dinner? stand out of my way, and don't talk to me of eating, or any thing else. He continu'd his labour till night, and return'd home rich. I was told this story in India.

15. The Chinese proceeds: "In hearing that which is evil you must be as if you were deaf; you must be deaf to hearing of detraction, and ill tongues. Good doctrine!

16. The same author. "Though a man exercise virtue all his life-time, it cannot be said, he has virtue to spare; but if he sins only one day, his wickedness and vice will over-abound.

17. Another said: "He that values himself upon being virtuous, must not slight the least atom of virtue he sees, nor give way to an atom of vice.

18. "It is not profitable (says another) to lay up gold and silver to leave to our sons and grandsons, because it is not certain they will know how to keep and make their benefit of it. To gather books to leave them by will is uselefs, and to no purpose, because you know not whether they will apply themselves to learning. There is nothing so safe and good as to lay up a treasure of virtue, this will be the best revenue and inheritance you can leave them. If your heart be upright, you live well and fortune favours you; your honour and reputation

NAVA- "putation will be great, and reach you RETTE. "betimes. If you live well, tho' fortune "smile not, you cannot want an honest "livelihood: if you have good fortune,
"and lead an ill life, it will be hard for "you to be easy. An ill life and ill for"tune bring on troubles, miseries, and po"verty even to old age.

The Cbineses make great account of fate and fortune. Josepbus, lib. III. antiq. c. 9. says of the Esseni, They affirm'd all things were in the power of fate.

19. The authors of these sentences are not always several men, many of them belong to the same. One of them says, "Those children who inherit from their parents loyalty towards their king, and deference to their superiors, are rich and powerful, though they have not bread to eat. Those who inherit cheats and tricks shall not prosper. He that enters upon business, and comes off from it with humility, is brave. He that shields himself with virtue is meek and good. Where is it he will not live well who is just and free-hearted? Be not an enemy to any man, for it may fall out you may meet your enemy on the way, and it will be hard for you to escape him.

He seems to have much reason in all he says. The same points come over again hereafter.

20. Another writes: "When any man does me a good turn, it is fit I should deal fairly with him, and shew my self grateful: and if any man misuses and hates me, it is fit I use him well and love him. If I love and use all men well, who will hate me? no man.

Excellent instructions for loving our enemies! The Cbineses write much upon this subject.

The saint says, Virginity is a virtue in common with the infidels, which cannot be deny'd. The Greeks and others held it in great esteem, according to S. Jerom, as Spondanus writes, an. 21. What S. Augustin writes serm. 47. ad frat. concerning the Roman Tarpeia is wonderful: This woman was a heathen, and finding her self tempted to sensuality, she put out her eyes that she might live chaste as she desir'd, and forsaking all the pleasures and pastimes of this life, confin'd her self to live upon bread and water. She did not hope for eternal bliss, says the saint, and yet she us'd such rigid means to preserve the jewel of virginity. This treasure is not valu'd or prefer'd in Cbina, nor in other countries of that part of the world. But strange things have been done there by married women to preserve their fidelity to their husbands. It is but a few years since one, to be rid of the importunity of a mandarin, cut off her nose.

21. "A virtuous man, says a grave doctor, is master and pedagogue to him that is not so. A wicked man furnishes a good one with matter of merit.

22. "The soft out-does the hard, says the Cbinese, the weak the strong; therefore the tongue which is soft lasts a great while, and the teeth, tho' hard, break and fall to pieces.

The meaning of this is, that a good and virtuous man with his patience and forbearance overcomes the obstinate and harden'd sinner, and a sweet and tender heart triumphs over the vanity of the proud. This was visible in the apostles, whom CHRIST sent as sheep among wolves, yet they by patience and sufferings overcame the cruelty of tyrants. This was a new kind of war, and an unusual manner of fighting, said S. Chrysofom, Homil. 34. in Matth. The same has appear'd in many children and tender virgins, and of late years has been seen in Cochinchina, and what is yet stranger, in Japan, though there have been no priests in that country of late years; for in the year 1663, on the day of the Ascension of our Lord, two hundred and fifty suffer'd martyrdom; and every year since thirty, or forty, as I am most certainly inform'd.

What is there more violent and strong than the passion of an angry man? yet one sweet tender word disarms and conquers it. A soft answer breaks anger. Who would not imagine that a hard and angry word should check a furious man? yet it is not so. A hard word breeds contention, Ecclus. xv. And if we should say the softness of a sinner's tears softens the anger and wrath of GOD, it were easily made out; at present let it suffice to reflect on those shed by S. Peter, S. Mary Magdalen, and others.

23. Another says, "The merciful and compassionate man shall live many years, the cruel and wicked shall soon end."

24. One of these Cbinese moralists said: "Virtue is compar'd to the nature of water; if it be oppress'd, it rises; being convey'd into aqueducts, it runs over hills, and crosses mountains; sometimes it is square, and sometimes round; here it runs streight, and there crooked, it does the will of him that conveys it in all respects.

25. The Cbinese again: "The chief thing requisite in children is, that they be upright and obedient; if they be good and bountiful to their parents, their children will be so to them. When a man does good to others, he does it to himself. It is requisite to act well every day, and it is necessary at all times to express what is within by good works. To do good is the first quality of heavenly men.

26. Another Chinese: “ Good and evil, reward and punishment, have no peculiar gate or way of their own, man by his actions draws on the one or the other of them. If he acts well, he purchases reward and happiness; if ill, he brings on himself troubles, misfortunes, and the punishment of his sins. Virtue and vice have their recompence, which follows them, as the shadow does the body. Therefore when any person resolves to follow virtue, tho’ he have not actually put it in execution, he immediately is sensible of the reward; if he resolves to be wicked, he presently finds the mischiefs that proceed from vice, tho’ he have not yet practis’d what he resolv’d. But if when he has transgress’d in any things, he repents him of his fault, he recovers those advantages which he had forfeited by sin. This is according to the saying, That evil is converted into good.

27. “ Another of them says, heaven and earth are just, upright, no excepters of persons, their spirits examine our actions, nor will they bestow blessings on us for offering them great sacrifices, nor will they punish us for omitting them. Whoever is in high place or dignity, let him not rely too much upon it. Whoever is great and rich, let him not rejoice too much in those goods. Let no man despise the poor and needy; for dignities, preferments, riches and poverty, are ever rolling from one to another, without being ever fixt or permanent. All dependance is in virtue. He who is once good, tho’ he obtain not the reward of his good works, yet evil will fly from him; and he that is once wicked, tho’ the punishment of his crimes do not immediately reach him, yet all happiness will presently leave him. He that lives well is like the plants in a garden in spring, which imperceptibly grow and increase every day. He that lives ill is like a grindstone, its decay is not to be discern’d, and yet it hourly grows less. To do hurt to another for one’s proper benefit, must be carefully avoided. Tho’ virtue be never so small, endeavour to advantage another by it; tho’ sin be never so inconsiderable, dissuade men from committing of it. Let your meat, drink and cloathing be suitable to your condition and ability. If you do so, you will certainly live easy. Do not go about to be told your fortune, nor trouble your self with casting lots. To do ill to men is ill fortune; to do them good is good fortune. Heaven’s net is large, its reward and punishment will come speedily.

VOL.

This book is made up of authors of all NAVA- the sects in China; and tho’ it is true, they RETTE. all in the main agree in the same principle, yet they differ in some measure in the manner of delivering themselves, and exhorting others to virtue. He calls heaven and earth upright, and not guilty of making any exception of persons; for as we say of GOD, That he causes his sun to rise upon the just and unjust; so the Chinese says, heaven equally covers all men, and the earth, which they call the common mother, equally maintains all. In the first he speaks of the light of nature, which those people say, heaven infused into man. GOD infused it into them and all of us, that we might see our actions. The law is light, says the vi Chap. v. 23. of Prov. St. Paul, Rom. i. calls it a witness, Their conscience bearing witness, &c. Which the Chinese had some sort of knowledge of, for in their philosophy they say, That man has two hearts within him, which meet and fight, because one abhors what the other desires. This is agreeable to that of the apostle: I find in my body another law opposite to the law of my mind.

28. Another says: “ Those that are rarely qualify’d, are good without being taught; those who are indifferent, being taught, presently improve, and easily apply themselves to virtue; those who are dull, tho’ they be taught and instructed, are never the better. He that is taught and does not improve, if he be not a brute, what is he? To know good is a great blessing and happiness; to be wicked is a great misfortune.

The author goes on: “ Happiness consists in the eyes not seeing ill things, the ears not hearing undecent words, the mouth uttering no bad language, the feet walking in no unlawful ways, having no friendship with any but virtuous persons not taking any thing that belongs to another, flying from wicked men as we do from snakes and vipers. Unhappiness consists in speaking deceitful and false words, in suffering our senses to stray, in coveting what is not ours, in disguising evil, in desiring sensuality, and rejoicing at the harms of others, in hating good men, and in breaking the laws with as little regret, as if a man broke a water-pitcher. To be happy, is to be virtuous, but one day is not sufficient to obtain this. To be unhappy is to be wicked and vicious, if a man is so but one day, it is enough for all the world boldly to call him wicked.

The king of the kingdom Zu, which at present is the province of Xan Tung, was ask’d what pearls and precious stones there were in his kingdom? He answer’d, The virtue

NAVA- virtue of my subjects is the jewels and pre-RETTE. cious stones of my kingdom, this it is I regard, this I value and prize, not those that are found under ground.

Really this king, tho' a heathen, may be master to many catholicks. The commentators write, there were very precious things, and of great value in that kingdom, but that the king minded nothing save that his subjects should addict themselves sincerely to virtue.

29. The great master Confucius says: "Virtue is to be seen in another, as we may believe ours is not equal to it; the vice and failing of our neighbour is to be seen, as a man would put his hand into boiling water. A virtuous man must be look'd upon, with a will and desire to imitate him. A wicked man must be look'd upon, after examining one's own heart, and seeing whether the fault we spy in our neighbour is not to be found there."

Excellent doctrine! How carefully will he do it, that is to put his hand into boiling water? if he can avoid it, no doubt but he will, and when in, how hastily will he draw it out? The same rule is to be observ'd, not to pry into other mens lives.

As to what has been writ concerning reward and punishment, most certain it is, the Chinese speaks not of what is in the other life, but of this. That nation never had any knowledge of the other, nor is there any account of it in their books. This point belongs to the controversies, where it is made out at large, and to the ensuing book. The Chinese hold the same opinion with Job's Friends: S. Thomas Lect. 2. upon the fourth chapter of it, says thus, Where it is to be observ'd that this was the opinion of Eliphaz, and the rest, that misfortunes of this nature do not fall upon any man, but as a punishment of sin, and on the contrary prosperity to be the reward of righteousness. And this, says the Chinese, falls out accidentally or naturally. The same saint, Lect. 3. on Job iii. says, the Jews held the same opinion. Lect. 1. he says after S. Gregory, that GOD scourges men five several ways: But the Chinese conceive nothing further than that hard fortune naturally attends the wicked, and prosperity the just. So that there is no manner of argument to be deduced from their books to convince, or make them own a reward and punishment in the other life.

Whilst I was writing this book in Canton, a manuscript book was brought thither compos'd by a Christian Chinese of the Literati, or learn'd; he defends the law of GOD, but proves more than is requir'd of him, and does not make use of found arguments. I will here set down two instances. He proves the incarnation of the Son of GOD thus: Two of our emperors, the one call'd Cie, the other Sie, were conceiv'd without the help of man; then it follows CHRIST might be conceiv'd after the same manner. Concerning our blessed Lady he argues thus; Our empress Kang Juen conceiv'd and brought forth without the help of man; even so might our blessed Lady. Another queen conceiv'd with eating the eggs that dropt from a swallow; so might our blessed Lady without the help of man. This to me seems an ill defence of a good cause. Some would have the Chinese chimera's to be figures of our holy mysteries, but there is no manner of ground for it, especially if we allow of what S. Augustin teaches, and S. Thomas quotes, Lect. 2. on Rom. i. That the prophecies concerning CHRIST began to be written by Ishaiab and Hosea, after Rome was in being; Under whose empire CHRIST was to be born, and his faith to be preach'd to the Gentiles. What has been writ of the Chinese was thousands of years before. I do not treat of this subject in this place, but of their morals; which besides their being very ancient, contain some very good things. Concerning the manner of proving matters of faith, read Cajetan on Acts xvi.

CHAP. II.

Which treats of Reason, and the Light of Nature.

1. THE second Chinese philosopher, of whom I am to speak in this and some other chapters, was born three hundred years after Confucius. When we were carry'd prisoners to the imperial city, we came to pass the heat of the afternoon at the place of his birth, which is a village in the province of Xan Tung, not far from Confucius his native town. We went into his temple, after crossing a large court or church-yard, shaded with beautiful, lofty, and very ancient cypress-trees. This seems to be one of those the scripture calls groves, Deut. xii. Oleaster and others expound it streight trees. The Chinese have much of this, they are set regularly, and kept in good order. Within the temple was the statue of this master on an altar, after the same manner as other idols are. Over him was a large inscription in stately gold letters, to this effect; This is Meng Zu, the second man of this empire in sanctity. His posterity terity continues to this day, are lords of that place, and have the title of mandarines. He writ much moral philosophy. All agree he was a man of great parts, but somewhat sharp and cynick. His books are of great authority in that nation, insomuch that the scholars, or learned men are often examin'd by them.

Among other remarkable stories they tell of him, take this that follows. The emperor Leang Vuang had certain groves and gardens that were a league and a half in compass, at which this master us'd to rail very much. The emperor came to hear of it, for there is no want of informers in Cbina. The emperor sent for him, and being come into his presence, put this question to him; worthy and venerable master, is it true, that you are concern'd, and find fault with my gardens taking up so much ground? It is, sir, answer'd Meng Zu. If he had deny'd, and it had been prov'd upon him, he had certainly lost his head. I know, said the emperor, that my predecessor Vuen Vuang had gardens three leagues in compass, and yet no body rail'd at it. Meng Zu reply'd, Vuen Vuang's groves were as large as your majesty speaks of, and yet they were small; those your majesty has are but half the compass, and yet they are too big; so that there is reason to rail at and find fault with these, and there was none to do so by the others. How d'ye make that out? said the emperor. The master answer'd, Tho' those gardens and groves took up so much ground, the gates of them were open and free, and the subjects had leave to fish in the ponds, cut wood, gather fruit, and make use of the game; and the number of subjects being so great, very many could not come to furnish themselves in the imperial groves, therefore I say they were too small. Those your majesty has, tho' they take up less ground, are shut up, and it is forbid upon pain of death to fish, hunt, cut wood, or gather fruit in them; so that no subject has any benefit of what is within them, therefore, I say, they are too big. And since your majesty is the people's father, Why do you lay snares against your childrens lives? What else is it, to make a law that none upon pain of death come in to fish, hunt, &c. but to lay snares to catch your children? The emperor was struck dumb, and had not a word to say for himself. What answer could be made to so excellent an argument? Oleaster speaks to this purpose on Deut. iv. ad mores in principio. But nothing prevails on the great men of Europe, tho' they value themselves upon their Christianity; it were well if the keepers they place in their forests would not strip passengers, as I saw them do.

As concerning this philosopher's religion; I suppose he was of the sect of the learned, and as much an atheist as the rest of them; for in his books there is not the least appearance of his having any knowledge of God, the immortality of the soul, or reward or punishment in a future life. Whence it follows that the philosopher Confucius was no less ignorant as to these points, because Meng Zu having studied and learnt his doctrine, it is certain if he had found any thing in it concerning God, an immortal soul, &c. he must have mention'd it in his writings.

2. We may with good reason say of this, and the rest of the Chinese doctors, what S. Augustin writes, lib. III. quæst. evang. cap. 42. They may therefore not absurdly be supposed to be lepers, who being destitute of the knowledge of the true faith, profess variety of erroneous doctrine, for they do not conceal their ignorance, but expose it as great knowledge, and lay it open in haughty discourses. But there is no false doctrine without some mixture of truth, &c. This is the same Lactantius writ, lib. VII. cap. 7. de divino premio. And we know how much the ancient Europeans err'd, and the Greeks, who were the wise men of the world, from whom wisdom and knowledge was convey'd to the rest, as S. Thomas asserts, Leet. 6. in i. ad Rom. I know not upon what pretence we should endeavour to clear the Chinese from the same failings. S. Augustin, de ver. relig. cap. 2. places Socrates, tho' so eminent a man, among the idolaters. S. John Chrysostom does the same, in iii. ad Rom. S. Athanasius, orat. cont. idol. says the same of Plato, who usurp'd the title of divine. Many hold the same opinion of Aristotle, Seneca, and Cicero; to which purpose you may see F. Arias, tom. I. fol. 426. What wonder then that the Chinese should fall into the like misfortunes? But farther, you'll say, the Chinese have writ incomparably, and are men of great parts. Still, I say, they have not writ better, nor so well as the others we have spoken of, nor are they to compare to them for wit and judgment. And we know S. Chrysostom says, Good doctrine often comes from an ill man, as a base soil produces precious gold. See S. Thomas, Leet. 2. in iv. Joan. and upon Boetius, de Trinit. quæst. 3. art. 2. And Corn. à Lapide, in Rom. i. v. 27. with what shall be said concerning Xenocrates.

3. The Chinese hold this man in great veneration; and that they look upon him as a saint, appears by their dedicating temples to him; this is an undeniable argument of the godhead they assign'd him. S. Augustin, serm. Arian. cap. 20. uses this argument to convince hereticks, that the Holy Ghost is God. If the Arians did but read,

NAVARETTE.

NAVA- read, that the temple of Solomon was built RETTE. of stones for the Holy Ghost, they would not make any doubt of his being GOD, since the being of a temple belongs to the supreme adoration, call'd Latria; how then can they deny the Holy Ghost to be GOD, since he has the noblest temple? S. Ambrose, lib. III. de Spi-ritu Sancto, cap. 13. handles this point at large, and concludes thus; GOD therefore has a temple, creatures have none. Bede on 1 Cor. cap. vi. deduces the same consequence; How then can he be no GOD who has a temple? S. Anselm on the same; The Holy Ghost is most plainly declar'd to be GOD; because unless he were a GOD he would have no temple. Read S. Thomas 2. 2. quæst. 83. art.
 2. ad 3 & 1. p. quæst. 27. art. 1. where he says, To have a temple belongs only to GOD.
 Hence we may infer, that since in China there are many temples dedicated to Confucius, where they also worship this second master, and other doctors, they assign them holiness and a godhead. This and other points of the same nature are handled at large in the controversies.

The first proposition deliver'd by this second master in this present chapter, is this; " Those who follow the rule of reason, and act according to it, will secure and perpetuate themselves; but they that act against it, shall perish.

5. There are many things in the Chinese books, which may be easily interpreted to our meanings, if we mind the sound and superficial sense of the words; but it is not convenient to print it in their language.
 It is but a few years since a little book was printed and publish'd in that mission, which I believe no man but the author lik'd.

6. Another Chinese doctor says thus;
 " He that adheres to the rule of reason, does not desire or expect any profit, and yet every thing is profitable and advantageous to him. He that follows the will and humour of another, seeks his interest, and aims at advantage, and sometimes meets with trouble and loss before he attains it.

7. Another of the Chinese has this sentence; " To contrive business is in the power of man; to bring it to a conclusion is the work of heaven. Man desires this thing, or that; but heaven does not always comply with his desires.

8. Another: " Heaven hears all; tho' the business be never so private, it will not be conceal'd from heaven. Do not trouble yourself to ask where heaven is;
 it is neither high nor far off, you have it in your heart, it knows your thoughts tho' never so inconsiderable.

9. To the same purpose another Chinese says; " What private discourses pass between men, heaven hears as plain as if they were thunder; it sees the hidden wickedness of the heart, as if it were as visible as a flash of lightning.

All this is literally meant of the conscience, and rational instinct, whose ears and eyes are sharp and piercing, that it sees and hears whatsoever man says or does, though never so private, as plainly as if it were known to all the world. This doctrine alone makes heathens afraid, and forbear committing faults.

10. A grave author says; " He that de-ceives and wrongs his neighbour, deceives and wrongs his own heart; and he that deceives and wrongs his own heart, de-ceives heaven. Can one's own heart and heaven be deceiv'd? One man seeks to deceive another, let him be satisfy'd he deceives himself. Do not say, heaven sees not; be assur'd you cannot deceive it; and that neither you nor any other man can excuse the faults you commit.
 Exhort all men to live well, wrong no man. The wicked man imposes upon, and cheats the good; but heaven is not impos'd upon. Man fears men, but heaven fears no body.

By these expressions they curb men, and restrain them from running into vice; and accordingly we see many of them live modestly and cautiously, and with such circumspicion and fear of falling into any grievous sin, that one would think they were afraid of being accountable to GOD for their actions. It needs not be made out, that he who defrauds, or wrongs his neighbour, does more wrong his own soul; for it is most certain the sin sticks upon his soul, and the mischief it brings cannot be repair'd by nature, being infinitely greater than any it can cause to another man.
 This heathen asserts, there can be no excuse made for our sins; S. Paul, Rom. ii. teaches the same. If the apostle, cannot convince, let the heathen confound you.

11. Another says; " If you act wickedly to purchase fame and honour, and men do not punish you, be assur'd heaven will. He that sows pompions, reaps pompions; and he that sows wheat, will reap wheat: heaven's net is very large, and tho' thin, no man can slip thro' it. Tho' the husbandman plow deep and sow in season, that alone will not produce and ripen the corn, heaven must help it with sun-shine, rain, and dew.

12. Another author says; " To endeavour to benefit oneself to the detriment of another, can never go unpu-nish'd.

All gain and advantage must be compass'd without wronging a third person, otherwise

otherwise it is rather a theft than lawful gain, rather tyranny than conveniency and advantage. S. Augustin, serm. 3. ad Grät. speak thus; It is an excess of wickedness to endeavour to grow rich out of the slender means of the poor and widows: Therefore, brethren, honest gains are to be lov'd, but extortion to be abhor'd. This is very pat to rich men, who engross all commodities, not allowing the poor to lay out their small stock to support their families. The Chinese call such men tigers without teeth. The tiger that has teeth, say they, eats leisurely, relishing its food; but that which has none, devours and swallows all whole: rich men are for swallowing all. In other places they call them crocodiles, or alligators; tho' this fierce and bloody creature has too many teeth, yet it wants a tongue, which makes it swallow its food immediately, without holding it any time in the mouth. I have known some of these in my time; there was a mighty alligator at Macassar; he was poison'd not long since in the island of Solor. He had lost many thousand ducats, yet in his will he left six hundred and eighty thousand pieces of eight, and had no heirs but a nephew and a bastard daughter. What was this wretch the better for having gather'd so much money? What benefit had he of the toil wherewith he got it, of the dread with which he kept it, and of the trouble it was to him to leave it behind for others to enjoy? Read Oleaster in Num. xxi. ad mores in princip. His doctrine is admirable, as is that of Ecclus. xi. v. 20.

13. The Chinese master. "He that offends heaven, has none to beg pardon of."

All the expositors make it out, but of NAVA-heaven itself. It somewhat resembles that of 1 Kings ii. But if a man shall sin against God, who shall pray for him? This proposition some missioners make their ground to prove that Confucius had knowledge of God: the contrary is most certainly true, as shall be made out in the controversies where this subject is handled at large, and it will appear by the fifth book. I will only say in this place, that as to this and other points, we must rather submit our judgments to the opinion of his disciples, than be govern'd by our own speculative notions, according to that of Lactantius, Whom then shall we believe, if we give not credit to those that commend? The words of cardinal Lugo, disp. 1. de Euch. sect. 3. num. 4. is very proper to this purpose, and to some other points. In disputes concerning the signification of words, no stress can be laid any otherwise, than in the expressions and manner the authors and teachers of those words us'd. See S. Thomas to this purpose, lect. 2. in Mat. vii. The most that can be infer'd from that proposition, is, that he acknowledg'd a Deity in the material heaven, and not in statues of clay or metal; wherein he agreed with others of the ancients according to S. Thomas, lect. 7. in Rom. i. And in this he condemns the wise men of the heathens, who tho' they never believ'd there was any deity in images, as the followers of Heracles believ'd, nor did believe those things to be true which were fabulously reported by the poets, yet they gave divine worship to some creatures. Yet for all this I do not clear him from very many other superstitions, nor do some grave and ancient missioners of the society.

CHAP. III

That Man ought to be conformable to the Disposition of Heaven, and not to rely on his own Power and Ability.

THE Chinese with only two characters of theirs, which are xun ming, express almost all that is contain'd in the title of this chapter, which implies as much as, that fortune and fate are inevitable, and that we must be submissive and subordinate to them.

1. Therefore one of them says, "Life and death have their certain determinate bounds; riches and wealth are in heaven."

2. The second master. "To work, or cause to work, to go, or command to go, to stop, or make to stop, none of these things can man do of himself. The birds drinking a drop of water, or eating a grain of corn, is all settled and determin'd before-hand. The ordering and

VOL. I.

"contriving of business is long since fix'd. Since it is so, why do men labour and perplex themselves for the things of this world? The things of this world do not depend on human contrivance, they are all regulated by the fate of heaven."

It is our duty to work and labour, and not to be misled in this particular by this heathen. He that created thee without thee, will not save thee without thee, said S. Augustin. And S. Jerom, Labour is to be follow'd, solicitude to be taken away. We are not to leave all to God, as the Chinese would have all left to heaven.

3. One of them says, "There is no wisdom like good fortune: there is no discretion like being lucky. Let no man think by his ingenuity to escape the troubles

O O

NAVA-RETTE. " troubles of this world, and let none imagine with little more or less industry to make themselves fortunate in it.

4. Another Chinese doctor. " When you see him that scorns, and bears you ill-will, do not hate him. When you see profit before your eyes, do not imagine it will presently fall into your hands. The first proposition is good and holy, the second against covetous persons.

5. Master Confucius. " He that knows the fate of heaven, is not moved or restless when he sees profit before his eyes, nor does he hate death when it is near. Whether you go fast or slow, the race of this life must have an end.

This is a good help to those that would prove Confucius had knowledge of God. This philosopher has few disciples in the doctrine he teaches in this place. There is never a Chinese that is not disturb'd and restless if he has the least profit in sight. The last part of this document may serve those who are wholly resign'd to the will of God, and have their accounts made up.

6. Another of them says, " The ignorant, the deaf, the dumb, the wise, the noble, the discreet and strong may all be poor. The sun, moon, time, day, hours and minutes are settled; consider then, whether these things depend on man, or on fate. Fate and reason have their limited time.

Only the outward appearance of a rich man, without his being really so, gain'd esteem among the courtiers: the same is done in China, as well as other places, and something beyond them.

CHAP. IV.

Of the Obedience of Children to their Parents.

1. THE book of verses, which is one of the ancientest for instruction in China, speaks thus; " My father begot me, my mother with sorrow brought me forth, and suckled me; if I will repay what I owe them, all heaven will not suffice.

2. The master Confucius. " I receiv'd body, skin, hair, and all from my parents; not to wrong these things is the beginning of obedience: to labour to gain honour, and leave a name to posterity to make them renown'd, is the end of this virtue. What belongs to obedience is, whilst my parents live, to honour, pay them the greatest respect, and maintain them with satisfaction, and cheerfully: When they are sick, to be sorry for their sufferings, to grieve at their death; and when I offer sacrifice to them, let it be with all possible attention and devotion. He therefore that loves another, and not his parents, is opposite to virtue and reason. A man of honour must value himself upon being obedient to his parents, and loyal to his king. He is oblig'd to serve his brothers, and be respectful to his superiors.

Upon account of the first words in this paragraph of Confucius, the Chinese ever made great account of their hair, and never us'd to cut it; till the Tartar oblig'd them to part with it: They wore it put up and fast bound in a curious pouch made of horse-hair, and account those Barbarians who wear their hair loose. The Chinese do not cut their beards neither. Diogenes says it betokens man, virtue, courage, and resolution. Sicbius, that it is a sign of perfection. Eucherius, that it denotes valour. Rodulphus adds, that it also signifies wisdom. In those that shave all off it may express the contrary. All things are inverted in Europe.

He expresses the sacrificing to parents by the word Ci, which is us'd for all sorts of sacrifices, concerning which I treat at large in the controversies. The devil will act the ape in all things, and endeavour to appear like God. We have bulls for the dead, and indulgences; this fiend has brought up the same in China. In religious orders it is customary to give letters of brotherhood to their devotees and benefactors, which are beneficial to the faithful. They were in use among the monks of China, and the Cistercians in the year 1118. as says Spondanus upon that year, num. 13. The devil has set up the same in China. Many of the faithful are usually buried in the habit of some religious order; this too the devil has taught them in China. The holy custom of burying priests in their priestly vestments had its beginning, says Lyra on Levit. x. Because that Nadab and Abiud were buried in the priestly garments, the custom came in force of burying the priests of the new law in priestly vestments.

The Chinese transgress in excess of obedience towards their parents; many Christians fall as short.

3. Let us go on with another Chinese. " He that has parents must ask them leave when he goes out of doors, when they return they must make their appearance, and tell whither they go. The son ought to be employ'd in some business. When

" he

“ he is bid to do any thing, let him not “ excuse himself ; whilst his parents live, “ let him not go away into far countries:
 “ if he travel, let it be upon case of abso“ lute necessity. It is not convenient chil“ dren should be ignorant of their parents “ ages: one reason is, that they may re“ joice at their long life ; the other, that “ they may be sorry, because age brings “ them the nearer to death. Whilst the “ father lives, let the son observe his ac“ tions ; when he is dead, let him imitate “ his virtues, and wear mourning for him “ three years without intermission.

All this that has been written the Chinese observe, and are far beyond the Europeans in knowing the age of their father, mother, uncles, brothers, and other kindred: there is not one of them, tho' not full six years of age, but knows it ; all from the highest to the lowest can tell their own age, the month, day, and hour when they were born. They look upon us missionaries as undutiful, because we have left our parents, and travel'd so many leagues ; and they think ill that we do not stay at home to serve and relieve them, but we give them reasons enough for what we do. Because they keep all their birth-days, they admire we do it not too ; to this purpose they exactly keep in mind their parents age and birth-day. This furnishes us an opportunity of instructing them how such days are to be kept, and why the church celebrates the day that saints dy'd on, and not that they were born upon. Certain it is many celebrate their birth-day, others the ages, or every hundred years, as the renowned society of Jesus did piously and religiously ; and the elector of Saxony and other Lutherans did sacrilegiously the hundredth year since the apostacy of the infamous Luther, stamping on their silver and gold coins, Sæculum Lutheranicum. See Spondanus in his supplem. an. 1617. Others celebrate the coronations of their kings. I saw that of the king of England kept at Madraſtapan, that of the pope at Rome ; I twice saw it kept for Clement X. who now steers S. Peter's boat.

4. Another Chinese writes: “ If a son “ be obedient to his parents, his children “ will be obedient to him ; if he is disobe“ dient, how can he expect his should be “ obedient? He that is obedient breeds “ obedient children, he that is rebellious “ begets rebellious children. NAVA-

RETTE.

5. Another of them says: “ He that “ breeds up children, knows how much “ he receiv'd from his parents: he that la“ bours and watches, knows with how “ much pain and trouble his neighbour “ earns his bread.

6. The second Chinese master. “ Dis“ obedience has three consequences ; the “ greatest, the want of children: he that “ has children provides against old age, he “ that lays up corn provides against a “ famine.” In another place he says, “ There are three sins belong to disobe“ dience, the greatest is the want of chil“ dren.

This doctrine, as I observ'd elsewhere, made way for concubines ; which-error has been sufficiently impugn'd, but it is very hard to be rooted up. They look upon us as disobedient because we do not marry: for this reason the Chinese are much concern'd at the want of children, and use all their endeavours to have them.

7. Another of them says: “ When your “ parents express their love to you, re“ joice, and forget it not ; if they hate “ you, fear, but do not love them the less:
 “ if you discover any failings in them, re“ prove them, but be not disobedient.

Brotherly reproof is of very ancient standing, and much celebrated in China ; it is to be us'd even towards parents, as the heathen says in this place, and shall be repeated hereafter.

8. Confucius. “ Among all sins none “ equals that of disobedience.

9. One of his disciples: “ Of all works “ whatsoever, obedience to parents is the “ chiefest, it reaches to heaven ; for its “ sake heaven sends the obedient wind “ and rain in season. Come down to the “ earth, therefore it furnishes them with “ plentiful crops: come to men, therefore “ all blessings and felicities reach those that “ are obedient.

Had these authors known God, they had not certainly talk'd after this manner. Tho' S. Paul, Ephes. vi. says, Honour thy father, and thy mother, which is the first commandment in the promise. What goes before he allows as tending to God, which is in Exod. xx. and Deut. v. There is nothing to this point in the Chinese books.

CHAP. V.

How Man is to order and regulate himself.

1. THE Chinese philosophy. “ When “ you see any thing that is good in “ your neighbour, consider whether the “ fame is to be found in your heart ; and “ if you perceive any defect in your “ neighbour, search your inside ; if you “ do so, you will certainly improve: for “ if you find not the good you observ“ ed

NAVA-RETTE. “ ed in another, you will strive to get it ;
“ and if you find the evil you saw in your “ neighbour, you will endeavour to cast “ it out.

2. A grave author says, “ He that does “ not fear, draws on himself troubles. He “ that is not full of pride, will receive be“ nefit. He that is not fond of his own “ opinion, will be wise.

3. Another Cbinese has these words: “ It “ is opposite to reason, that he who lives “ loosely, should pretend to curb others.
“ He that is in himself good and upright,
“ and instructs his neighbour by his exam“ ple, will doubtless have disciples.

4. Another Cbinese. “ It is not lawful “ for him that has many good parts, to “ blame or carp at the want of them in his “ neighbour.

5. Another says, “ You must not be“ cause you are noble, despise those that “ are not so ; nor must you reproach others, “ because you are great in fame and “ riches ; nor is it lawful to undervalue an “ enemy, because you are courageous and “ valiant.

He is in the right in every point. Before we proceed any further, we might here set down the origin, rise, and antiquity of nobility. According to S. Augustin, it began in Shem and Japhet. The Fasciculus Florum in the first age, fol. 5. says the same.
When Noah cursed Ham, This is the first mention of servitude, and consequently of nobility. But this blessing and curse is in regard to virtue and vice, for the one or the other of which a man is truly call'd noble, or ignoble.
Fol. 5. p. 2. it says, nobility first came up in the time of Phaleg the son of Heber, many reasons concurring to make it so.
Mankind increasing, and men being prone to evil, it was requisite to prevent the insolencies of the wicked towards the good ; and therefore some good man, who was more upright and wise than the rest, was chosen to be over the community, to prefer the virtuous, to support the middle sort, and restrain the wicked ; hence he was call'd noble, as being notable for virtue above the rest. Whereupon S. Jerom ; I see nothing to be coveted in nobility, but that noblemen are in a manner constrained not to deviate from the probity of the ancients. The second reason was to preserve the publick peace. In some nobility had its beginning from courage and valour, in others from their many riches, and in others from tyranny and oppression.

However we see the families of the two masters have continued for many ages in China, and are very noble, being so ancient, that I believe there are few in the world can match them. The line of some emperors lasted six hundred, and even eight hundred years.

6. Another Cbinese. “ If virtue reigns “ in a man, he may be said to be brave “ and valiant ; virtue is in the mind, not “ in the fortune. He that endeavours by “ violence to subdue another, shall perish.

7. The second master. “ He that for“ cibly subdues another, tho' he have him “ under, yet neither his heart nor his will is “ subject to him. When virtue and rea“ son are the weapons we fight with, the “ will submits, and the heart cheerfully “ complies.

8. Another author. “ Whosoever sees “ any thing in his neighbour that is good, “ let him always endeavour to have it in “ sight, that he may imitate it : if he sees “ any ill, let him strive to conceal and “ hide it.

Those who do the contrary, either endeavour to make their own crimes seem less, or to prevent being reprov'd ; as if this would avail them before the dreadful tribunal of Almighty God. Oleaster on the book of Numbers often observes, that God reprov'd Moses and Aaron in private.

9. Confucius. “ To hide the good that “ is in a man, is to destroy virtue. To “ expose the faults of others, shews a vile “ temper in him that does it. To speak “ well of my neighbour's virtue, is as if I “ were the virtuous person ; to lay open “ his failings, is as much as to own myself “ faulty.

10. One of their doctors. “ A man “ should hear talk of the faults of others, “ as a son would hear his parents rail'd at.
“ The ears may hear, but the mouth ought “ not to divulge it.

I heard a learned Cbinese, who was a good Christian, commend this sentence, and he expounded it thus : When a man hears his parents rail'd at, he presently puts a stop to that discourse, or takes their part, or shuns him that rails : all which we ought to do upon any other case of detraction.
To the second-point he said, That as a son when he hears his father's faults mention'd, conceals it without revealing it to another ; so ought we to suppress and hide the faults we hear our neighbour charg'd with. We know it is as bad to give ear to detraction, as to detract.

11. The second master. “ What pu“ nishment does he deserve, who speaks “ ill of his neighbour, and discovers his “ failings ? There is none equivalent to his “ fault.

Excellently express'd of a heathen. The Cbinese severely condemns slanderers, and tells us how tender we ought to be of the reputation, honour, and good-name of all men. The scriptures and writings of holy men are full of this doctrine.

12. Another

12. Another Chinese: " Let him that knows he is slander'd, not be angry; let him that hears his praises, not be puff'd up: he that hears others ill spoken of, let him not contract friendship with those that rail, but let him contract it with those who have good tongues, and let him delight in their company. The book of verses speaks thus; It is pleasant to see a virtuous man, it is a great satisfaction to hear good words, it is very delightful to talk of holy things, it is an excellent thing to act with a good intention. To hear railing, is like loading one's shoulders with briars: to hear good words, is like taking a burden of roses and lilies. If the heart has no ill thoughts, the feet walk not in ill ways. If there be no ill friendship, nothing is heard disagreeable to reason or justice.

This last paragraph has been writ above three thousand years, and in substance it wants nothing I know of to make it doctrine worthy any great doctor of the church.

13. Another of them. " To remove to virtue admits of no delay, it must be done as nimbly as the wind flies; mending of faults must be perform'd with the celerity a flash of lightning breaks out of a cloud.

This sentence is written in the Chinese language very succinctly and elegantly. I read it so often, and was so taken with it, that I remember it and some others to this day.

14. Confucius. " Sin in a virtuous man is like an eclipse of the sun and moon, all men gaze at, and it passes away: the virtuous man mends, and the world stands in admiration of his fall.

All Cbina has the same superstition in reference to eclipses that was among the ancient Europeans, which Spondanus gives an account of an. 377. n. 5. where he quotes those words of S. Augustin and S. Ambrose, which I writ in another place.

15. The same Chinese author. " He that knows his failings, will doubtless mend them; once mended, let him take care not to relapse.

16. Another Chinese. " To sin and not to mend, is to be wicked and a sinner. He that tells me my faults is my master: he that praises my virtues and makes them known to me, is a thief, who takes from me all I have that is good.

17. The same Chinese. " Having three friends, I must of necessity find one among them that may be my master; if I adhere to him that is good and virtuous, and shun those that are not so, I shall compass my design.

18. Another Chinese. " By talking little,
VOL. I.

" and adhering to good men, I shall save many troubles. NAVARRETTE.

19. Another. " Care and sollicitude is a jewel of inestimable value. Care preserves life, as the king's hand does.

The second proposition alludes to the custom of Cbina; it is usual for those who travel to have letters of recommendation from some mandarin for those they shall meet. This was in use formerly in the church for bishops, priests, deacons, &c. In the thirty fourth canon of the apostles, and in the councils Antisiodorensis, can. 7. and Remensis, can. 4. this subject is handled. Cassianus, Conc. Carth. 5. writes the difference there was as to this particular, and in Syn. Chalced. p. 244. he puts down to whom the letters of recommendation were to be given, and to whom those of peace. And taking the proposition in its literal sense, it is a plain case that he who carries his king's pass, may go any where safe. Diligence, says he, produces the same effect. See Spond. an. 142. n. 2. where he writes the several names given to those letters. Some were call'd Diplomata, which they had who were call'd or sent by the emperors, who had all necessaries allowed them. This is much us'd in Cbina, but is very prejudicial to the subjects. (It is nothing but free quarters on the road, or as it is call'd in France a route.) Eight years ago a petty king of the province of Canton went over to that of Fo Kien, to which purpose nine thousand boats were taken up. He carried along with him a hundred and ninety thousand people, all belonging to his family. In the next province they furnish'd him the like number of boats, and eighty thousand men to draw them. When we came from court, they gave us an order for boats and maintenance, though we had not the benefit of it, and shew'd it in every city and town, ninety men were allow'd for our boats.

20. Lao Zu, author of one of the principal sects in Cbina, says, " Many sins are hurtful to the soul, much riches to the body.

21. Another author: " It is necessary that a man leave the pleasures of this life. It is best to be sparing in diet. Seek not nobility, covet not riches, and be not led away by interest. If you do so, you will have but few troubles. He that is patient will have rest.

22. Confucius. " All good things are to be examin'd, and so are the bad in the same manner.

23. A Chinese says: " He who rejoices when he is told of his faults, has doubtless somewhat of a holy man.

24. Another: " Every man desires and covets to be virtuous, and he would be excusable

NAVA-RETTE. " excusable for not applying himself to the " practice of virtue, if for compassing of " it he were to use great force, tire him" self, waste his fortune, and hazard his " life; but since nothing of this is requir'd,
" why are not all men virtuous? If a man
" because he employs himself in virtue,
" were despised by his neighbours, hated
" by his parents, and slighted by his kin" dred and friends, he might be excusable
" for not following it; but on the con" trary, if he addict himself to it, his pa" rents will love him the better, his kin" dred, neighbours, and friends will ho" nour and respect him every day more " than other. Why then are we not all " virtuous and good?

25. The master Confucius: " When a " man speaks in due season, and to the " purpose, no body thinks much of his " words. When he laughs in laughing-time, " no man thinks much of his laughter.
" He that takes a thing he has a good ti" tle to, is not accounted covetous. He
" that is silent amidst the healths at a feast, " is virtuous. And he who in dividing " wealth acts fairly, is an honest and con" scientious man.

Silence at feasts is rare to be found. Noisily drunkenness, says Ecclus. c. xx. In Cbina it is excessive, they begin their feasts with the greatest gravity imaginable, attended by a thousand ceremonies, and the middle and end of them is all noise and confusion.

26. The same author: " Riches strength" en houses; virtue makes the heart fruit" ful. A little well got, is better than a " great deal wrongfully acquir'd.

27. Another author: " He that values " himself upon being a man, must shew it " by his actions. He that values virtue " above riches is a man of honour, and " he is base who prefers gold and silver " before virtue.

28. Confucius: " A good purge is bitter
" to the taste, but beneficial to the health.
" A true and faithful word is harsh to the " ear, but good to the heart. The surest " way to be happy and fortunate, is to " withdraw from sin. There is no better " way to avoid troubles, than to shun " committing faults. The perfect man is " never satisfied with himself. He that is " satisfied with himself, is not perfect.

29. Another Cbinese: " There may be " three faults in an honest man: 1. That " he having a superior above him, and not " serving him, expects to be serv'd by his " inferiors. 2. That having parents, whom " he does not obey, and to whom he is " not grateful for the benefits receiv'd of " them, he expects his children should be " obedient and grateful. 3. That hav" ing a brother, whom he does not respect

" as he ought, he would have his younger " brother be respectful to him. He that " does so, is not guided by reason and e" quity.

30. Lao Zu: " He that follows his own " opinion, is in danger of going astray.
" He that relies upon himself, has not a " perfect knowledge of affairs. He that is " conceited, has no merit.

31. A Cbinese: " He that lays up corn " and garments, fears not hunger or cold.
" He that hoards virtue, fears neither trou" bles nor misfortunes.

32. Another Cbinese: " He that looks " into other mens lives, ought first to look " into his own. He that affronts his neigh" bour with ill words, may be assur'd he " affronts himself first. Such a one is com-
" par'd to a man who carries his mouth " full of ink, to spurt it upon another, for
" he first dirt himself.

33. A Cbinese: " He who talks much,
" kills his body.

34. Another writes thus: " The huf-
" band-man forbears not tilling his ground
" either because he has too much or too " little rain; the merchant does not give " over trading because he has had one or " two losses: then why should a scholar " leave his books, because he is poor, or
" a good man his spiritual exercises, tho'
" he have troubles or business.

35. " If a man employs himself only in " eating and drinking, he will incur the " contempt of all people, and it will come " to pass, that for what is inconsiderable,
" as meat and drink, he will lose that which " is of value, viz. his good name, and re" putation. Plays, games and jesting, are " frivolous and useless things, only dili" gence in doing well is of value.

All this I like very well, but especially the last proposition, which is good and holy. I have already said, that plays are very ancient, and much us'd in Cbina. The players are not look'd upon at all; no woman is ever seen in their representations.
They were not admitted in Rome, says Scipio Nasica, according to the Fascic. temp.
fol. 31. Because it was very destructive to a warlike people, breeding idleness, and introducing lasciviousness.

36. A Cbinese writes very elegantly: " Do " not stoop to tie your shoes in a melon-" garden; do not handle your hat in an " orchard where there is fruit.

The author recommends us to circumspection in our actions, and cautiousness in our proceedings, that we may not give scandal, or an occasion to others to judge rashly.
He tells us it is not convenient to do all that is lawful, according to that of S. Paul,
All things are lawful to me, but all things are not convenient. S. Augustin serm. 43. ad frat.

But take heed ye be not deceiv'd, for many ill things are done under the colour of good. See Oleasf. in Deut. xii, xiii. It is lawful and just for a man to tie his shoes, tho' it be in a melon-garden, but another that sees it will suspect or judge he steals melons. It is also lawful to settle one's hat, but if it is done among cherry, or other fruit-trees, another that sees him lift up his hands will imagine he gathers the fruit. It is lawful to speak to a woman, especially if she be a sister, or near relation, but it is not convenient very often, because malice is so sharp, that what is only a point of civility may be improv'd to scandal. The same may be said in many other cases. Great regard must be had to circumstances of time, place, quality of persons, &c.

37. The second master: "For a man to love strangers, and not his own domesticks, is contrary to piety; to govern others, and not to govern ones self, is contrary to prudence; not to return a salutation, is contrary to civility and good manners.

As to what concerns not returning a salutation, there can be but two reasons for it among us, viz. open enmity, or rudeness. Among the Chinese there is none at all, for enmity is no cause not to make a return, and such rudeness no man is guilty of.

38. A Chinese: "When there are sins in thy house, it is soon known abroad among the neighbours. If a man is virtuous, there is none but will praise and extol his virtue. If a man is not honest and virtuous, make him not your friend. Receive not any thing without you have a good title to it. If your thought be not good, suppress it immediately; if your business be not just and honest, let it not come out of your mouth. He that is circumspect in all things, will have no cause to grieve. He that is patient, is affronted at nothing. He that is of a quiet temper, will live easy; and he that is sparing, will always have enough.

39. Another Chinese: "The mouth must not utter the neighbour's faults; the heart must not entertain evil thoughts, the ears must not hear detraction, the eyes must not see the faults of others. He who observes all this is near being virtuous.

40. A Chinese: "If a man fails in one thing, all he did before is lost and cast away.

41. "A good and virtuous man, says a Chinese doctor, does not grow proud; the wicked man is not sham'd to be puffed up.

42. A Chinese says: "He that has a sharp wit and great judgment, must not undervalue those who have not such good parts. He that is strong and powerful must not offend the weak and needy. He that knows not, let him ask. He that cannot compass what he aims at must have patience, and tho' he can and knows always how to go thro' with business, let him always take care to preserve humility. After all this he may attain to be virtuous.

43. Lao Zu: "Holy men heap up virtues, not riches. To adhere to virtue, preserves the heart; to adhere to profit, destroys it.

44. Another author: "Many benefits and much love are what makes a man esteem'd. To study carefully is the way to be powerful and wise.

45. "If rich and powerful men humble themselves to others, who is there that will not humble himself to them? If superiors love and respect their inferiors, which of the inferiors will not again love, honour and respect them? If he that is in high place and authority, carries himself stately and with rigour, who that is subordinate will not fear him? If he that speaks is in the right in what he says, and he that acts does it uprightly, who will dare to contradict his words, or carp at his actions? he speaks well.

46. "He that borrows a book is oblig'd to use it well; and if it comes to any damage in his hands before restoring, he is bound to mend it.

This belongs to studious persons, and the care the Chinese take in this particular, is worth observing. There are many Europeans who ought never to have a book lent them, till they have learn'd of the Chinese how to behave themselves. The same in other things, they look upon them as belonging to others, whereas they are oblig'd to use them better than their own.

47. One of them says, Virtue takes its original from humility; when a man declines in virtue, it is because his humility decays: misfortunes proceed from sensuality; disasters from covetousness; failings from much sloth and idleness. Acts of piety; to keep our eyes from looking on the faults of others; to keep the tongue from detraction; to keep the heart from covetousness; to keep the body out of ill company: not to speak without it be to advantage; not to meddle in other mens business; to serve the king, to obey parents, to respect superiors; not to grow proud in prosperity, not to be cast down in adversity; not to spend time in thinking on what is past, not to be in expectation of what is to come; not to rely on favour or preferment: these are the things man is to study and practise.

Much

NAVA-
RETTE.

NAVA- Much might be said upon this paragraph, RETTE. it is all good and holy, and there is nothing wanting but practising of it.

48. "To spend without measure, says the same author, is to forget one's family. A high place is often lost for want of frugality and moderation. He that is careful and diligent, provides for his whole life.

49. The second master; "Among the rest of the sins of disobedience or undu-tifulness, one is for a man not to maintain his parents; the second to be given to feasting and pastimes, and take no

"care of them; the third to marry without their leave; the fourth, to follow one's own will and pleasure; the fifth, to love broils and quarrels: These things either are hurtful to parents, or give them trouble, or fail of the respect due to them.

No son in Cbina does, or ever did marry against his parents will. By what has been written, it appears how little need we missioners have to instruct them concerning the malice of these particulars, this part is done to our hands.

CHAP. VI.

That every Man is to be contented with his Condition.

1. A Cbinese says thus: "He that can be contented, has cause to rejoice; much covetousness brings sorrow. He that can be contented, tho' he desire something, may live easy; he that cannot be contented, tho' he have much, lives in sorrow. He that compares himself to mighty men, thinks himself poor; and he that looks upon the poor, judges himself rich.

2. Another: "Long life is decreed by heaven; troubles and poverty have their certain times; to be satisfy'd with his lot is the greatest conveniency of man.

In reference to the years of a man's age, the Cbineses have the same proposition we read Eccl. xviii. The number of the days of man, at most an hundred years. See S. Thomas, 2 de generat. text. 57. lect. 10. and in Job xxxviii. lect. 2. and Oleas. in Deut. xxxii. Marcus Varro said, Man was like a bubble in the water. The Cbinese says the same. Among us we write much of the misery of our life, they do so too; yet both we and they are too fond of it.

The Cbinese sometimes asks us, Why God conceals the day of our death from us; We answer with the words of S. Bernard, serm. 69. Tract. de modo benevivend. Therefore Almighty God would keep the day of our death conceal'd from us, that we may always be ignorant of, and always believe it to be near. Notwithstanding such great light as we have receiv'd touching this and other points, we live as negligently and unconcern'd as those infidels do.

3. One of them says, Nobility and riches are coveted by all men, but are not obtain'd by the desire. Poverty and meanness are hated by all men, but hatred will not deliver us from them. A man grown rich with what belongs to others, and noble without deserving it, is to me like a little mist which easily vanishes.

4. Lao Zu: "He that sees himself rais'd very high, will do well to look to himself, and not forget he may be cast down.

5. Another writes: "He that knows himself, does not hate his neighbour.

6. The same author: "He that knows fate, and the decrees of the stars, does not hate heaven: he that hates it, is unwise. Have regard to justice in the first place, and to profit in the next. If you have a piece of brown bread, be satisfy'd with it, and don't look for white. Make your expence proportion-able to your income.

7. Confucius: "A good and virtuous man is voluntarily poor; a wicked man is so by force, because he wastes his estate. He that saves charges, saves borrowing. So says, very ingeniously and wittily, the Cbinese Seng Kie Seng Jung, Sen Kieu Jin.

8. The same author: "It is but reasonable that the rich and noble should live according to their quality; and it is so that the poor and mean do according to theirs.

9. An author writes: "He that has not charge of the government, must not concern himself with it.

CHAP. VII.

How the Heart or inward Man is to be preserv'd.

1. A Cbinese author says; "To preserve the heart well, we must endeavour to place it in the most retired part of man.

He speaks of the recollection of the senses and faculties. It is a very necessary, and a difficult affair, especially as to the imagination,

imagination, which sometimes may very often rove like a mad-man, running through all things whatsoever. The R. F. Lewis de Granada, in his Sinner's Guide, speaks to this point with his usual judgment.

2. The same author; "Tho' a man be very ignorant and dull, if he is reprov'd and corrected, he may come to be wise; and tho' he be very ingenious, if he does not study, he will be ignorant. Let care then be taken to reprove all men. To reprove and punish one for any failing, is to punish one's self, if guilty; to forgive the faults of another, is to pardon one's self their own. He that does not go through troubles, will neither come to be virtuous, nor rise to great places. Measure others with the same measure you use to your self, and desire not that to another which you will not have your self.

3. Another author; "He that would be very wise, must ask much. To speak lofty things, and act heroically, is the way to be in esteem.

Many admiring Xenocrates his eloquence, Plato said, What is it you admire at? Don't you often see lilies and roses grow up among nettles and briars? The same may be said of the Cbineses.

4. Another; "He that is very wise, and has great parts, if he would preserve them; must appear ignorant and simple. He that is ingenious, and a great master at any art, being humble, may go safely through the world. He that is very brave, must not depart from military discipline. The rich and powerful man, by not growing proud, secures his treasures.

5. Another author; "It is hard to find a poor man that is not a flatterer, or a rich man that is not proud.

6. Another; "It is easier to find an humble rich man, than a patient poor man.

There be none of S. Austin's fifth sort of poor in Cbina, there are very few patient. It were well if rich men would sometimes read the fifth chapter of S. James, with what holy fathers write upon it.

7. Another says; "Do not things hastily, when you meet with a good opportunity make use of it; tho' you get what you aim at, yet be not therefore negligent. Ancient men outwardly appear'd rough, but their life and inward man were virtuous. Those of this age outwardly appear men, but in their hearts are wild beasts. Let him that has money remember when he had none. Let him that is at ease, not forget past troubles: Let him that is well and in health, remember when he was sick.

VOL. I.

8. "He that asks, says another, must take care it be of one that can give. He that relieves the poor, must do it when necessity presses him. He that does not give, must expect no thanks. If the heart be free from passions, all the laws are plain.

It is all good. The second proposition is like that of Eccles. iv. 3. Deser not to give to him that is in need. If relief come not in time, the want is not supply'd. It is certain the Cbineses are charitable. All men ought to be so. Oleas. in Deut. xiv. ad mores. Whilst I was writing these papers, the supreme governor came to Canton, only for the time till the proprietor could come from court; and the first day he came he distributed among the poor five hundred bushels of clean rice, which was a considerable alms, and had been so from any prince in Europe. Every bushel was there worth ten ryals plate (five shillings) upon the inland it is much cheaper. The last proposition is but too true; if passion be predominant, the laws are expounded, and made to speak after every man's fancy and humour, and as stands with his conveniency.

9. "It is requisite, says another, always to think and imagine that the day draws near when we are to meet with our enemy: therefore we must live in continual fear and apprehension.

This is excellent doctrine with respect to death, which is our enemy. Every day, hour, moment, whilst we eat, sleep and laugh, it draws nearer insensibly. Blessed is the man who is always fearful, answers to the second part. See Oleaster in Deut. xxxii. ad mores.

10. "The perfect man, says another, has nothing to repent of, the peaceable has no enemies; the patient receive no affront: Fearing the laws, man lives pleas'd and satisfy'd. He that wrongs the publick, is always sad. The humble man may go safe all the world over; the proud and arrogant can scarce move a step without danger.

11. Confucius. "To think good and not evil, is to think.

12. Another says thus; "The mouth must be guarded and kept with as much care as we do a vial of precious liquor. Thought must be watch'd as narrowly, as we do the defence of a fort. Law-suits and quarrels proceed from much talk. Heats and animosities flow from positiveness, and every one standing in his own opinion.

Great designs have miscarry'd in the world for want of the mouth's being well guarded, and secrets flying out. The Cbinese Tartars are notable at keeping counsel, which we know by experience.

We

NAVA- We were amaz'd to see the secrecy and vi-RETTE. gillance us'd in their government, which is such, that there never appears the least token whereby to guess at their designs.

13. Another; "Covetousness and ap-perites spring from outward things: Desires proceed from the passions. If a virtuous man aims at temporal goods, it is because he has a just title to them.
A virtuous man is sad for the sake of virtue, not for poverty; he thinks on virtue not on what he shall eat. Let no man aspire to be first. Let every man take care to sweep the snow off his own tiles, and not the hoar-frost off his neighbours. An innocent heart is not a-sham'd to appear before others.

14. Another Chinese; "The more wealth a man seeks after, the more harm it does him.

15. "Remember virtuous men, says another; raise those that fall, hide the faults of others, and reveal the good you see in your neighbour.

16. "Very few men, says the Chinese, live to an hundred years of age. The wicked man leaves behind him the remembrance of his wickedness, the good man of his virtue. It is cruel to divulge the faults of others. It is injustice to favour wickedness. To take the quarrels of others upon one's self is folly.
One of the greatest troubles in the world is to bear with a fool. If you have no money, don't invite your friends.

There are foolish men every where, who take upon them other peoples quarrels.
These heathens give us good instructions to all particulars. There are none of these propositions but has something mysterious in it.

17. Another; "Six sorts of men may have cause to repent. The judge, who discharges his duty unjustly, is fearful, and sorry when he is call'd to an account for it. The rich man, who knew not how to keep his wealth, has cause to repent when he comes to be poor. The merchant repents when he has let slip a good market. He that would not learn when he might, is sorry for his neglect and idleness, when an occasion offers that he might benefit by having study'd. He who gives ill language, when his passion

"is over, and he comes to himself, is troubled for having done so. He that is healthy, and takes no care of himself, repents when he is sick.

He is much in the right; but it is to be observ'd, that in none of these cases man reaps any benefit by his repentance or sorrow, tho' it be never so great, it is only of force against sin. Let us change the discourse (says S. Chrysof. Hom. 5. ad Pop. Antioch.) to sorrow, and we shall find it avails us nothing; but it only corrects sin, and it was given us only to blot that out. If a man is fin'd, he is sorry, but it takes not off the fine.
If he loses a son, he is sorry, but it brings him not to life. But if a man has sinn'd, is sorry for it, and repents for his offence, he retrieves all the damage he incur'd by it.
This sorrow, grief, and confusion it is that produces bliss according to Ecclus. iv. There is a confusion that brings glory. The comment expounds it much to our purpose; so does S. Gregory, Lib. IV. Moral. cap. 21.

18. "It is better, says a Chinese author, to be poor without uneasiness, than rich with it. It is better to live in a thatch'd house without broils, than in a stately palace with 'em. It is better to eat hard bread in health, than pullets in sickness.

19. The master Confucius; "False words destroy virtue, impatience business. Humility puts away troubles, courtesy gains love. Humility unites a man to all people, Truth gains good-will.

20. Confucius again; "Four things man is to avoid; being fond of his own opinion, acting upon mere constraint, shewing a reason for all things and endeavouring always to carry what he maintains.

21. Still Confucius; "A virtuous man fears three things. He fears heaven, he fears the judges, and fears the words of holy men. A wicked man, as such, has lost all shame, and consequently fears nothing.

22. Another; "Much eating and good clothing, cause sensuality.

23. "One quarrel, says a Chinese, breeds many. He that saves one quarrel, saves an hundred. Good temper and meekness preserves life, and gains affections.
Hardness of heart, and pride is the source of troubles.

CHAP. VIII.

How to curb and bring Nature under.

1. A Chinese says; "The nature of man is like water, which once poured out of the vessel, never returns to it; so if nature once breaks loose, and slips away, it scarce ever is reduc'd to its own bounds. They that would stop the waters, make use of dikes and dams.

Those that would check nature, must make use of laws and punishments.
One quarter of an hour's suffering, saves an

“ an hundred years trouble. Let him that “ can attain the virtue of patience suffer.
 “ If a man does not bear, and curb him“ self, a thing that is no more than a straw, “ grows to a great heap. So that all trou“ bles whatsoever proceed from impatience “ and want of bearing. Patience is the “ precious jewel of the heart; impatience “ is its ruin and destruction. He that al“ ways meditates on the characters of pa“ tience (I have set down two in another “ place) will live pleasant and easy. He “ that will not indure for half an hour, “ will have vexation every day.

2. The master Confucius; “ Patience is the most necessary thing to live in this world.

3. A great Chinese doctor being ask'd, “ What persons stood in need of this vir“ tue? He answer'd, If the emperor is pa“ tient, the empire will be free from troubles.
 “ If kings are patient, they will thrive. If “ a judge is patient, he will rise to a higher “ post. If brothers are patient, they will “ increase their wealth. If husband and “ wife bear with one another, and are pa“ tient, they will live long together. If “ friends are patient, their friendship will “ be lasting. If any man is patient, he “ will be free from misfortunes.

4. He was ask'd about impatience, and answer'd, “ If an emperor be impatient, “ he will lose his empire. If kings do “ not bear, they will bury their bodies.
 “ An impatient judge will meet with trou“ bles. If brothers do not bear with one “ another, each of them will strive to live “ apart. If husband and wife are not pa“ tient, their children will be left father“ less. If friends do not bear with one “ another, friendship will cease. If any “ man is not patient, he will not escape “ trouble. He is no man that does not “ bear with another. He is not a man “ who is not patient. Fi Jin, Po Goei “ Jin: The first of these signifies patience, “ the second a man; the difference between “ the two words is very small.

The Chinese history tells us, that an emperor taking a progress through the empire, he came to a town, in which was a house where man and wife, children, grandchildren, daughters-in-law, servants, and all the family, liv'd in the greatest unity, love and concord. The emperor admiring it, went to talk with the master of the house, of whom he ask'd, How such extraordinary NAVApeace and quietness was preserv'd among so RETTE many persons? The old man without answering a word, took up a pencil, and dipping it in ink, writ Jin, Jin, Jin, that is, patience, patience, patience. The emperor understood him, commended his virtue, and rewarded it.

5. Another Chinese says; “ He who hum“ bles and submits himself, will live any “ where safely. He that is high, and will “ have every thing his own way, will cer“ tainly meet with an enemy.

If a man is proud, he will meet with one prouder than himself; and if he is positive, he'll find another as stiff as he. The learned Chineses who are so proud and haughty, like humility. Such is the nature of virtue, there is no man but is sensible of its beauty. S. Chrysostom takes notice of He- rod's sadness, after beheading of S. John Baptist; Why then does he grieve? He answers, Because virtue is such a thing, that even wicked men admire and praise it.

6. Another says: “ It is a base and vile “ courage that shews it self with passion “ and anger, attended by ill language.
 “ That is great valour, which exerts it “ self with anger grounded upon reason “ and justice; it is not fit man should have “ the first, nor ought he to be without the “ latter. He that understands this diffe“ rence, will easily perceive that there is “ an anger that is vicious, and another “ that is virtuous. A wicked man curses “ and persecutes a good one, but the good “ man must not answer him by any means;
 “ if he answers, it is a sign he wants pru“ dence. If he does not answer, his heart “ remains clean and cool, and the tongue “ of the slanderer hot and burning; and “ he is like one that should spit at heaven, “ the spittle falls in his own face. If I “ know any man curses me, I feign my “ self deaf and dumb; and even as smoke “ vanishes in the air, so do the words of an “ ill tongue. But if I answer him, it will “ be adding of fuel to the fire; it is best “ to let him move his own lips.

7. Lao Zu: “ A wise and learned man “ does not contend; a beginner does.
 “ Where contention is, the best course is “ to leave every man to his opinion, and “ not endeavour to carry a man's own, “ and by this means there will be no of“ fence.

CHAP. IX.

An Exhortation to the Study of Learning.

1. Confucius. “ He that will be learn“ ed, must ask many questions, must “ consider and meditate upon what he reads,

“ but he must not on that account omit “ actions of piety and mercy.

2. Another says: “ He that studies and “ learns

NAVA- " learn much, must improve in knowledge RETTE. " and humility; these two things make " man virtuous.

3. Confucius: " He that is sedulous and " desires to improve in his studies, is not " ashamed to stoop to ask of others.

In their philosophy they say, The way to learn is, to think on what is study'd, to be diligent in asking, to meditate, and be zealous in acting. They rise from one point to another.

4. Another: " To aim at preferment " without studying, is like attempting to " climb heaven without a ladder. He that " studies and is wise, is like the clouds " drawn by the sun-beams, which mount
" to the skies. He that does not tread " deep, knows not the gross part of the " earth; so he that wades not through the " documents of holy men, does not come " to be learned, nor to discover the pro" found mysteries of wisdom.

5. Another Chinese says: " Unless a " precious stone be cut, it is not fit to " make a beautiful jewel; if a man does " not study, tho' he have a good wit, he " will never be learned.

6. " If a man does not study, he will " remain as dark as night.

7. A Chinese: " If a man does not study, " and spend his time in learning, he is like
" a horse in breeches and doublet.

8. " Do not say, writes another, I will " not study to day, but will to morrow.
" The sun, moon and stars pass away,
" years do not stay; so that you can never " retrieve the time you lose this day. If " you are poor, yet do not for that rea" son forbear studying. If you are rich,
" do not rely upon your riches, and on that " account neglect to study. A poor man " that studies carefully, comes to be rich.
" A rich man that is diligent at his study,
" gets great fame and reputation. He that " shews learning gets a good name. He " that does not study will not come to be " a man. He that studies is a rich jewel " of the world. It is therefore requisite " that all men study.

9. An emperor said; " It is good to " study, and so it is not to study. To " study is like the ear of corn, not to study " is like the straw. Corn is the food of " man, and riches of the world; the hus" bandman hates straw and grass; and the " spade is tired with taking it up, yet af" terwards he makes use of it to burn,
" and make mud-walls, &c.

This is to signify there must be of all sorts in the commonwealth. If all men apply'd themselves to study, who would till the ground, and work at so many trades as are necessary to the publick, and to every man in particular?

10. " He that lights a candle at night,
" says a Chinese, would have the house
" clear and bright. He that studies, seeks " light for the understanding.

11. Another: " The employment of a " virtuous man is quietly and with ease to " compose his life, to be sparing in all " things that he may increase virtue. He " that does not love virtue, does not love " his study; he runs over his time, as a " horse does his race. If man does not " make use of his time, what is it good " for?

12. The master Confucius. " He who " studies must always imagine, he does " not study enough to be learned." (Sol-lon said, We are to learn as long as we live. Read S. Thomas, Cajetan, and A Lapide in xlii. ad Tim. y. 13.) " It is a
" folly to love wisdom and not piety;
" to love justice and not wisdom, is the " way to be unjust. To think to be " strong and not studious, is only aiming " to be mad.

13. The same author: " A son within " doors must be obedient to his parents, " and abroad respectful to others. Let " him be true and diligent in his actions;
" love all men, and if he has any time to " spare, spend it in study.

14. " Let him that teaches teach all " men alike.

This is good doctrine for confessors and preachers. We seem always more in-clin'd to the rich and mighty man, than to the poor beggar, as if it had cost God any more to redeem the one than the other.
I have heard of some passages both in Asia and Europe, which if they were written would not be at all edifying. On the words of S. John iv. The ruler said to him, &c.
S. Thomas asks this question: But the question is, Why God when intreated by him to go personally to his house, refuses it: But promises to go in person to the centurion's servant? One reason according to Gregory is, that by this he may reprove our pride, who offer ourselves to serve great men, but refuse to serve little ones, Ecclus. iv. Make thy self affable to the congregation of the poor, &c.

CHAP. - X.

1. A Chinese says, "To breed up children and not instruct them, is the parents fault. To teach them, and not do it severely, is the master's fault."

2. Another Chinese. "Those parents who bring up their children without learning, do not love them; and if they teach them without severity, they do not covet their good. The son who is taught by his parents, and does not learn, loves not those that gave him his being. If he learns, but does it not carefully, he does not love himself. How many sons of indifferent people by learning, have rose to be counsellors of state? And how many sons of counsellors of state, for want of learning, have degenerated into common people?"

This is often seen in China: nobility there is personal; so that if the son does not learn, when his father dies he becomes equal to the rest of the common people.

3. If the husbandman, writes a Chinese, does not plow and till his ground, his barns will be empty. If he that has children does not instruct them, they will be void of knowledge and learning. He whose barns are empty will suffer hunger and want; and he that has ignorant children will be void of equity and justice.

4. A Chinese. "Where children are not taught, it is because the master of the family is ignorant."

5. Though a business be but small, if it be not taken in hand, it is not done; so a son, tho' he have a capacity, if he is not taught, will not come to be a learned man.

6. Another. "It is better to have a son taught, than to leave him much gold. Of all the pleasures of this life, the greatest is to read good books. Of all necessary things, the most absolutely so, is to instruct children."

All he says is good. The Chinese always observe this for a rule, that a son must either be a scholar, or learn some trade; otherwise they say, they give themselves up to idleness and gaming, whence follow other vices, and the ruin of their fortune, which their parents acquir'd with much toil. The story of Robert king of Sicily is agreeable to the second proposition; he us'd to say, he would rather quit his crown than his studies.

7. An honest man who does not give his children learning, Ho Je!

These two Chinese words are very emphatical; they signify, what excuse can he give, what honest motive, design or end can there be, or can a parent pretend, for not giving his children learning?

8. Another. "If a son does not learn when he is little, when big he will be a fool. If a woman does not learn in her infancy, when grown up she will be good for nothing. The rule and method of teaching sons is to make them give ear to and follow the advice of their parents: to teach daughters they must be made never to stir from their mothers side. A son must not use himself to drink wine, nor to other worldly diversions. The daughter must be taught not to go. A severe father breeds beautiful children. A hard mother breeds pains-taking daughters. Children must be below'd with a rod in hand. If the bough of a tree when tender is not streighten'd, when grown up it is hard to set it right. If a son is not put into the right way when little, who will be able to direct him when he is big? Men usually love pearls and precious stones, but I love learning and virtue in my children."

10. Another Chinese. "As soon as a child can feed himself, teach him to do it with his right-hand: when he is six years of age, let him learn to cast accounts: at seven separate him from the woman, that he may not be effeminate: at eight let him eat at table, and be taught manners and humility: at ten let him live like a man."

The Chinese are extraordinary careful to observe all these rules, and particularly in breeding their children mannerly; so that a child at eight years of age behaves himself like a man of forty.

CHAP. XI.

Of the Satisfaction of the Heart.

1. A Precious stone that has no speck nor blemish, is fit to be presented to a king; and a dutiful son is a rich jewel in a family. The use of precious stones has a certain period and end, but the benefit of a dutiful and obedient son lasts forever. That house in which there is peace and unity, tho' it be poor, is rich; and R r " that
VOL. I.

NAVA- " that poor, which is full of ill-gotten wealth.
 RETTE. " What should he covet any more who has " one dutiful son? The father lives at ease " when his son is dutiful; and so does the " husband, if his wife is discreet and prudent.
 " The wresting of justice and parting of " kindred proceeds from interest. He that " has receiv'd an extraordinary pleasure,
 " must prepare himself for an unexpected
 " sorrow. Let him that lives at ease, " think on the trouble that may come " upon him. Great gains are follow'd by " great losses. He that has a great name " and reputation, must have much merit.
 " He that obtains a great reward must have " done considerable services. Great satis" faction follows mighty love; great flattery
 " is attended with great destruction,
 " great worth with great sorrow, and generally " great shame with death. To " love and do good, sometimes causes un" easiness and trouble.

2. The master Confucius. " He that " does not fix his eyes on the top of a " mountain, cannot comprehend what it " is to fall from thence. He that does " not go down to the bottom, will not " know the pain of sinking that threatens " him. He that does not go to sea, cannot " be sensible of the trouble of failing.

The very day I was writing this same in China, two hang'd and five voluntarily drowned themselves: they found themselves on a sudden seiz'd by such a mourning as will last them to all eternity.

3. Thus says a Chinese. " If you would " have your understanding clear, reflect " on what is past, and think on what is " present: if you would know what is to " come, examine what is past.

4. The master Confucius. " A fair and " clear looking-glass serves to shew the " body. Things past are a mirror to what " is present and to come.

The meaning is the same as before.

5. Another. " Business, though very " plain, cannot be secur'd a year. Those " that seem safe for a year, cannot be de" termin'd in a day, because there are so " many alterations in time, that nothing " is certain, and misfortunes befall men on " a sudden that can never be foreseen.
 " Husband and wife are sure of six foot " of land. It is not easy to preserve life
 " many years. The world is a monster " without a head: It calls an ingenious man " troublesome and offensive; him that is " dull, given to ease; him that is virtuous,
 " a sluggard and idle; him that is wicked,
 " pleasant. A rich man is envy'd, a poor " man oppress'd; an industrious man is ac" counted covetous, he that is sparing is term" ed niggardly. Now do you consider " what you can teach a man that he may live.
 " In truth it is hard to live in this world.

6. A grave author says: " If a tree is " water'd and prun'd, it roots itself and " grows strong in the ground, whence fol" lows an increase of boughs and blossoms,
 " and abundance of fruit; and in time it " comes to be a beam fit for any sumptu" ous building. So man, if he has a good " education, will grow much, and be a " person of singular note.

7. Another Chinese. " A man without " learning and education is like a cart with" out a wheel; as this cannot go on, so " neither can the other move or live in " the world.

8. Another. " A false man trusts no " body, and he that is real and sincere " trusts all men. Do not make use of a " man whose fidelity you suspect, and if you " make use of him do not suspect him.

9. The master Confucius. " When a " thing is rais'd to the greatest height it can " attain to, it returns to its first being.
 " The greatest joy ends in sorrow: great " friendship and unity in division. Dig" nity and high place often has a fall.

10. The same Chinese. " He that go" verns a province must take care that " there be no tumults in it: He that go" verns a kingdom, if he designs to esta" blish himself, must prevent misfortunes " that may happen.

11. Another Chinese says; " Those who " rule must foresee things, that they may " provide a remedy, and apply the neces" sary medicine.

12. Another. " The fish dwell in the " bottom of the water, the cranes fly very " high; these though so high may be shot,
 " and the others though so deep may be " caught. Only two inches of man's heart " are impenetrable. The height of hea" ven may be measur'd, the depth of the " earth may be taken, but none can guard " himself against the heart of man: it is " easy to know man's shape and mein,
 " but it is impossible to know his heart.
 " We see his face, and hear his words, but " his heart is a thousand leagues off.

13. A Chinese. " It is not proper to " measure water by the peck, nor to be " govern'd by the outward appearance of " man.

" 14. If hatred once take root, says a " Chinese, it is hard to pull it up. If you " bear your neighbour ill-will but one day,
 " it requires a thousand to dispel it. If you
 " requite your enemy with good deeds and " benefits, it will be like casting hot water
 " upon snow; but if you repay ill turns,
 " you will ruin yourself and him. When " I understand any persons are at enmity,
 " I use all my endeavours to make them
 " friends, and lay aside the ill-will they " bear one another.

15. Another

15. Another Cbinese. " He that hates a man is said to bring a great trouble upon himself. He that forbears to act well is a thief to himself. I beseech you be merciful, and live carefully, that you may not rob your heart of the riches of virtue.

16. " Thefts and robberies proceed from hunger and cold. He who is rich and warm clad, thinks on leudness: the poor and hungry on stealing. He that considers the troubles of poverty, will not grow proud. He that earnestly fixes his thoughts on the bitter potions and medicines us'd in sickness, will not be sad.

17. Another. " The garland and laurel are for the virtuous, and fetters and shackles for the wicked.

18. Confucius. " Noble and virtuous men are compar'd to justice: the vile and base to interest: the former act for the sake of virtue, the latter only for profit.

19. Another. " He that is not virtuous values riches, the wicked man prizes the goods of the world.

20. Lao Zu. " Much wealth is not preserv'd with justice and integrity. Much reading causes what is studied to be forgot. How can he who is not very holy do all things to perfection?

21. Another. " A poor man is look'd upon as of no judgment. He that is prudent to perfection governs well. He that does not hear, does not go to prate. He who speaks any thing good or bad, is certainly vicious, and has himself those faults he tells of others.

22. " No body will look ill upon him who does no ill action in his life. If you hurt another, be assur'd you will be hurt. Tender plants dread the frost. The frost dreads the sun. His own offence is an ill man's enemy. He that wears ambergreece about him diffuses a good scent, tho' he stand not in the wind. A good man, tho' his virtue be not made publick, exhales a sweet odour of virtue; but a wicked man sends forth the stench of his vices.

23. Meng Zu. " A virtuous man has many supports. He that loses his virtue, loses and destroys them all.

24. Another. " It is not reasonable a poor man should be despis'd, nor is it convenient a rich man should confide in his wealth and power. It may so fall out, that he who to day is rich, may be poor to morrow, and the contrary.

25. " He that avoids sinning gains many good things. He that saves charges has income enough. He that looks to what he has, does not want to give alms. He that saves and lays up, has something to leave his children. NAVA-RETTE.

Any man will say he knows these plain common truths well enough, and therefore there is no need of bringing them out of Cbina. I say he is in the right, but let him practise them as the Cbineses do.

26. " Those who keep close to them that are in high places, as soon as their business is done, forget them. Rich men have many friends, but very few when they fall into poverty.

27. " To serve a peevish master, is the way to be affronted by him. To be a friend to an impertinent man, is the way to be parted from him.

28. " A good word and good advice is worth more than many pounds of gold. It is easy to get gold, but hard to meet with good advice. A little ship cannot carry a great burden. It is not convenient to travel a deep and solitary road alone. He that treads dry land saves tiring himself. Man dies for money, and birds fall into the snare for food.

29. " A secret must be confin'd, not imparted to many. That business which is made known to many takes air, and the design fails.

30. " A poor man relies on his neighbour. Another book has it, a poor man is a leprosy to his neighbour. A poor man, tho' he lives in the middle of the market-place, is known to nobody. A rich man, tho' he live in a desert, is known by all men, has many relations, and they come to him from far countries. In all places a man's face is taken notice of according to his garb. If a horse goes not far, it is for want of strength: if a man rises not, it is because he is poor.

31. " If a judge has envious friends, wife and discreet men shun him. If the king has an envious favourite, the great men fly from him.

32. " Let him that rules a kingdom not make use of flattering counsellors. He that governs a house, must not be advis'd by a flattering woman. A good counsellor is the jewel of a kingdom. A good woman is the jewel of a house. A flattering and envious counsellor ruins a kingdom: and such a woman destroys a family. If the plough goes awry it spoils the field; and flattering words destroy virtue.

33. " Heaven, says a Cbinese, has all things for man: man has nothing for heaven. Heaven creates no man without sustenance for him; nor does the earth produce any herb without a root. Heaven gives a very rich man all he has;

NAVA- "to him that has but a mediocrity, his RETTE. "care and industry." The verses speak thus, "The man that is very rich grows proud; he that is very poor is sad, he that is sad turns thief, and he that is proud becomes cruel. The sons of misers gather dung as if it were gold. Lavish men use gold as if it were dung.

34. "Life and death are always before our eyes. There is nothing bad in this world but man's sin.

35. "Envy and hatred, says a Cbinese, bring mischiefs upon sons and grandsons.

36. The same author. "The first thing man is to do, is to mortify himself, and curb his appetites, to love all men, and be united to them through humility.
Man ought always to think on his past offences, and endeavour not to sin in thought. If he act according to this rule, the crown of the empire will be establish'd.

This an emperor said to his subjects, what could S. Augustin have said better to his children?

37. Meng Zu said to an emperor; "To keep fat cattle, and fowls in the kitchen, and full-fed lusty horses in the stables, when the people are starving, shews more care is taken of brutes than of the subjects, and is destroying of men to save beasts.

He reprov'd the emperor for pampering himself too much, and maintaining horses, without relieving the people's wants. This philosopher was bold, and not given to flattery; there are but few like him.

38. Another author. "One spark of fire may burn a whole forest; and one bad word may destroy the virtue of one's whole life. He that wears cut-work is sensible of the pains the seamstress takes;
and he who eats three times a day, ought to remember the husbandman's labour.
He that gathers virtue secures piety, and a pious man gains a good name.
Many by acting well come to be holy men.

39. Another Cbinese says. "He that would know what his king is, must look upon those about him. He that would know a man must see what company he keeps. He that would know a father, must observe his children. The king ought to be holy, the favourite and counsellor loyal and faithful, a father virtuous, and a son dutiful. When a kingdom is in an uproar, then the loyalty of ministers exerts itself.

40. The master. "Water which is very clear has no fish; if a man is given to prying, and loves to know all things, he wants friends and disciples.

41. The same author. "A virtuous "and honest man is to think on three things: one, that if he does not study whilst he is young, when he grows old it will not be in his power. Two, That if when he is old, he does not make use of the short time he has, when death comes it will be too late to act. Three,

That if he has wherewithal to give alms, and does not give it, when he is poor, tho' he would, he'll not be in a condition to give it: therefore he who being young hopes to live to be old, must apply himself to study. He that is old, and thinks on death, must take heart and do good. And if a man being rich is afraid he shall be poor, let him endeavour to give alms.

42. Another: "He who is a great lover of himself, will not attain to perfection.

43. "He that does not prevent things at a distance, will have troubles near at hand.

44. "The rain in spring, says a Cbinese, is fruitful; it makes the plants grow, and the fruit increase; the husbandmen rejoice at the sight of it, but travellers hate it. The moon in autumn is as bright as a looking-glass, people divert themselves by her light, but thieves hate her.

There was a counsellor, who had great influence in the government, and the emperor had a great esteem for him. Envious men, who were no small number, spoke ill of him, and laid heinous crimes to his charge. The emperor sent for him, laid the accusations before him, and in a great passion blam'd his behaviour. He without any concern answer'd what has been writ in the last paragraph, which imply'd that wicked and envious persons hated his integrity and unbiass'd way of proceeding, because they could not defile him with bribes, and other ill practices, therefore they hated him, as a thief does the light, which hinders his ill designs. He that does ill hates the light. The emperor was satisfy'd with the answer.

45. A Cbinese says: "To relieve him that is in distress, is to deliver him from danger. The heart of man is like iron.
The mandarines are the forge to soften
it.

The second proposition is much applauded by the Cbineses. The mandarines take great care to mollify the hardness of some men by severe punishments. For the most part the people of that nation are the sons of fear.

46. "The heart of man, says another, is hard to be fill'd. If there be any alteration in the sky, there follows either wind or rain; if man feels any change in his body, he either dies, or falls sick.

47. Another.

47. Another: "If the government of a kingdom goes in the right course, heaven protects and assists it. If the ministers are uncorrupted, the subjects live at ease. If the wife is discreet and virtuous, a husband has but few troubles. If the son is dutiful, his father's heart is easy."

48. "If a king takes the advice of his good counsellors, he will be holy."

49. Another: "The first sow, they that come after reap. If you reap do not rejoice, for a time will come, when others shall reap what you sow'd. How many have sow'd, that never reap'd?"

50. Another: "He who acquires great riches without a good title, may be assured of much trouble, if he is not extraordinary fortunate."

51. "When thirst rages, says a Chinese, a drop of water, tho' it be troubled, is sweeter than honey. When a man is drunk, the best wine drinks to him like vinegar. Wine makes not man drunk, man makes himself drunk. It is not sensuality that blinds a man, it is man that blinds himself."

The first proposition implies nothing comes amiss to one that is hungry or thirsty. I have too much experience of both sorts; I have sometimes drank foul water, and said I never drank any better in my life; as one said upon the like occasion, and he gave the reason, Because I never drank when I was dry. This agrees with that of Job vi. But to a soul that is hungry, bitter things seem sweet. The Holy Ghost speaks to the second point too.

52. "If any man should ask me to tell him his fortune, says a Chinese, I will answer him, that to wrong my neighbour is my ill fortune. For me to be wrong'd by others, is my prosperity and good fortune."

53. Meng Zu: "A merciful man is not rich, a rich man is not merciful."

54. "He that is obstinate in his own opinion, says a Chinese, cannot distinguish betwixt truth and falsehood, nor betwixt what is probable and what is not."

55. The same author: "The more a virtuous man perceives he is advanced in perfection, the more he humbles himself. The more a wicked man sees himself prosper, the prouder he grows. A vile man is full with a small matter, a virtuous man is not satisfy'd with a great deal."

56. "He who has virtue has certainly words: It is not certain he that has words has virtue."

57. Another: It is rare to see little virtue and merit in high dignity, and little discretion in much business without great troubles."

58. The same author: "He that is in high place must make ready to fall. He that has great places must watch to prevent his ruin. He that governs his superior at will, must remember he may fall into disgrace."

59. The same author: "Kings and parents must be merciful. The king must look upon his subjects as brethren and friends. Only loyalty to the king, and being dutiful to parents, confer nobility and glory."

60. Another: "A merciful father loves not an undutiful son. A wise king makes not use of ill counsellors. The rich man must not scoff at the poor. The young man must not laugh at the old, for poverty and old age will soon come upon them."

61. "A vessel too full, says a Chinese, runs over; a proud man bursts. Lamb, though it be good, is hard to dress to several palates."

62. Another: "Though a diamond fall into the mire, it loses not its value, or luster. A virtuous man, though he be employ'd in mean or dangerous things, must not lose the purity of his soul."

63. The master: "He who is not merciful, deserves not to live long in this world."

64. Meng Zu: "That is the best time which man makes good use of. Peace and unity with our neighbours is the greatest profit."

65. A Chinese: "The water which is at a distance does not quench the fire that is near at hand. A good neighbour at the next door, is better than a rich relation afar off."

66. Another: "Though the sun, moon and stars are clear lights, yet they do not communicate their rays to that which is under a close vessel. The knife, tho' it have a good edge, does not cut an innocent person. Misfortunes do not follow the virtuous."

The first furnishes us with an answer to the Gentiles, who often ask, how it comes to pass, that God does not impart to them the light of the gospel? Certain it is, punishment was not design'd for innocent persons. God sends troubles to the good as well as the bad, but upon different motives."

67. "If a poor man, says a Chinese, lives uprightly, he is always merry. A rich man, if he behaves himself not uprightly, is sad. It is no matter whether the house stands high or not, all that is to be minded is whether it let in rain, if it does not, that's enough. All that is to be minded in the garment, is whether it keeps a man warm, there is no minding the curiosity of the stuff and making NAVA- “ ing. Mind not whether meat has spice RETTE. “ in it, so it maintains and satisfies nature “ ’tis enough. He that marries must not “ look upon the woman’s complexion, “ air and beauty; let him observe whether “ she is discreet and virtuous, and that’s “ enough. It is not being a nobleman, “ or a commoner, that makes a man a “ good neighbour, he that is quiet and “ peaceable is best. He is not my friend “ that eats and drinks at my table, but he “ who relieves my wants. It is not being “ great or little that makes a mandarin,

“ but being upright and uncorrupted.
 68. Another Cbinese: “ When death “ comes, the owner can make no advan“ tage of his lands and tenements; though “ he have many good ones. When the “ last day comes, tho’ a man have much “ money and wealth, he cannot carry it “ with him.
 69. “ It is easy to begin a law-suit, says “ a Cbinese, but a hard matter to end it.
 70. Another: “ That husbandman who “ does not take care to till his ground, “ will starve.

CHAP. XII.

Of establishing Laws and good Instructions.

1. THE master: “ There are rules and “ instructions to make one a man, “ but the principal and necessary point is “ that he be dutiful to his parents. There “ are certain funeral rites and ceremonies “ appointed, but compassion for the dead “ is the main circumstance. Warfare has “ its rules and discipline, but the courage “ and valour of the soldiers is the most “ material part. There are laws to go“ vern a kingdom by, but the chiefest “ thing is to protect and take care of the “ husbandmen. There are laws and forms “ for living in a kingdom, or common“ wealth, but the best is to be meek and “ merciful. There is a certain time pre“ scribed for life, but the main concern is “ to banish idleness and sloth.

2. Another: “ The most necessary pro“ perty of a judge, is that he be upright “ and uncorrupted. The most necessary “ thing in a family, is to save charges, “ and be assiduous at study. The proper “ practice of an honest family is to con“ form to the laws. Care and industry “ produce riches, and saving prevents “ want.

3. The master: “ The whole life de“ pends on care and industry, the year on “ the spring, the day on rising early. He “ who in his youth is not diligent and as“ siduous at his studies, when old age “ comes will be a fool, and find himself “ empty handed. He who in spring does “ not till, in autumn will not reap. He “ who does not rise early cannot order his “ household-affairs well.

4. An emperor us’d to say to his subjects, “ If you would live well, the father must “ be severe to his children, and the mother “ mild; brothers and friends must honour “ one another, children must be dutiful, “ marry’d people love one another; men “ and women not to go or be together; “ kindred relieve one another’s wants; no “ body hinder the husbandman’s labour; “ no body take from another what does “ not belong to him; none play, or breed “ law-suits; the rich not devour the poor.

 “ When you travel, give the way to those “ that pass by; when you till your ground, “ strike not your plough into another man’s “ field. If you observe this, you will live “ at peace and ease.

5. The Cbinese philosophy: “ The first “ thing a master that teaches is to endea“ vour, is, that his disciples be virtuous.
 “ He that rules, must chiefly labour to stir “ them up to humility, and to honour one “ another. This will cut off law-suits and “ variances, and will prevent lawyers grow“ ing rich.

Nothing can be better spoken; I must confess I am astonish’d at the great knowledge that nation has acquir’d of it self, without conversing with others.

6. A Cbinese: “ Your first care must be “ not to meddle with the emperor’s govern“ ment. The second, not to carp at the “ judges. The third, not to censure that “ which all men do. The fourth, not to “ have to do with those that seek for pre“ ferment. The fifth, not to publish your “ riches, nor cast an evil-eye upon the “ poor. The sixth, not to converse with,
 “ or hear those who talk immodestly. The “ seventh, not to pry into other men’s bu“ siness. The eighth, when you come into “ a house, not to look into the papers you “ find. The ninth, when you eat, not to “ chuse the best bit. The tenth, when you “ are in company with another, not to take “ to yourself what is offer’d to both.

CHAP. XIII.

Concerning Government.

1. "Three things, says a Chinese, make " a good judge: first, being un-
 " corrupted. Second, being watchful.
 " Third, being careful and diligent. A " man must serve the king as he would his " father, his ministers as elder brothers,
 " and must love all men as he does his wife.
 " Ministers and judges must do the duty " of the office, as they do the affairs of " their house.
2. The master: " It is cruelty not to " instruct and punish. He who in himself " is upright and just, is obey'd, tho' he do " not command. If he is not righteous " in himself, tho' he command good things,
 " he is not obey'd.
3. Another: " What makes a good " judge, is observing the laws of his supe" rior, looking upon his inferiors as chil" dren, and making use of them only " upon necessity, or when there is reason " for it.
4. " No man will be disrespectful to him " that is courteous and civil. He who is " bountiful and free, will have many friends.
 " He who is true and faithful will be ho" nour'd by all men. He who is careful " and diligent will always deserve well.
 " He who gives much may make use of " all men.
5. " A noble and virtuous man is free-
 " hearted, but not prodigal, or a spend-
 " thrift; is noble and not hated, loves things " but is not covetous; is grave, but not

- " inaccessible; values himself, but is not " proud; being virtuous, he endeavours to " keep to a medium, and fly all extremes. NAVA-
RETTE.
6. " That king, lord, or judge, who " hears reproof and will be corrected, is " good, upright and just.
7. Another: " That counsellor who va" lues not his life, and fears not the stroke " of the scymitar, when he advises, deserves " the name and title of a counsellor. A " good counsellor is not afraid of death;
 " he who fears death is not a good coun" sellor.

This doctrine is much applauded in Cbi-na, some have practis'd it, as appears by the second book, and many did when the Tartar came in. There are also many in that country who kill themselves when they are in any great trouble. Pliny said, that the earth like a pitiful mother produced mortal poisons, that her children, men, may not die ignominious deaths, but might end their lives with one morsel or draught. Many have made use of this folly or barbarity, not only among the Chinese, but among others, as Demosthenes, Democritus, Hannibal, and Aristotle, as Suidas writes; Cato Uticensis, Caius Plaucius Numilla, and the Melesian Virgins. The Japoneses reckon it a point of honour to cut themselves with their sabres.
 It is a great misfortune that counsellors should be faint-hearted. Read *Sylv. tom.
 lib. II. c. 9 q. 3. n. 13. & S. Thom. 1. 2.
 tom. I. q. 18. disp. 12. art. 5. p. 761.*

CHAP. XIV.

Of Oeconomy, or Family-Government.

1. " IT is convenient, says a Chinese, to " give the master of the house an " account of any household-affair. Care and " frugality make the family be always in " plenty. In time of health, let them pre" pare for sickness. When the wife comes " home, let her be taught to work imme" diately.

The Chinese observe this last instruction very punctually, all the women work, and curiously; we may say of the Chinese women, as Prov. And she eats not her bread in idleness.

2. Another: " A foolish man fears his " wife, a prudent woman honours and res" pects her husband. He who keeps slaves " must be very careful to see they have
 " meat and clothes; let him always take " care of his fire, and at night look to the " thieves. If the children are dutiful, man

- " and wife live pleasantly. If the family " lives in peace, all its affairs succeed well.
 " It is a point of conscience to take care " of slaves. I am persuaded the Chinese out" do many Europeans in looking after these " poor creatures both in sickness and health.
3. " He who is about making a match,
 " must first consider whether the daughter-
 " in-law's temper be suitable to those of " his family. Let no man rashly take a " noble or rich woman to wife, she that " is virtuous and discreet is best, tho' she
 " be poor. Tho' she be poor now, what " do you know but by her labour and in" dustry she may come to be rich?
4. " He that would marry his daughter " must take care it be with her equal; if " so, doubtless the daughter will be easily " brought to serve her husband, and the " husband will certainly respect her. A " youth

NAVA-RETTE. " youth who is grown up that does not marry, is like a horse without a bridle.

" A woman grown up that does not marry, is like prohibited salt.

Prohibited salt is never safe any where, though it be never so much hid. This the Chinese are acquainted with, which is the reason of making the comparison. I before quoted the words of the Holy Ghost, You have a daughter, keep her body.

5. " He who is about marrying and considers the portion, is a barbarian.

Read Sylw. tom. I. lib. I. c. 5. n. 27. According to this rule there are abundance of barbarians in the world. Pius V. in his catechism, as Parrocb. 2. p. c. 8. speaks admirably to the marriages of catholicks, there the reader may see it.

6. " Let every man that has a family distribute the household-affairs according to every person's strength and capacity. Let him honour every one according to their merits. Let him use his fortune with moderation. Let him reckon his income, that he may know how to regulate his expence. Let him see that every one has their necessary food and raiment, according to their quality, endeavouring to carry an even hand in all things to prevent envy and contention.

CHAP. XV.

Of the Order to be observ'd in Families.

1. " Husband and wife are the first; parents and children the second; brothers the third: these are the nearest relations, and the source of all other kindred.

2. Another. " Husband and wife are knit together by the fidelity and trust of matrimony: they must not curse, quarrel, or strike one another; if any such thing be among them, it is a sign they are not in perfect unity.

3. " The children, says a Chinese, are as it were their parents hands and feet: parents are as it were their childrens garment.

This implies, that children are to serve and maintain their parents, and they to protect their children.

4. Another. " It is the property of man to acknowledge and be thankful for benefits: to receive favours and make no returns, is the part of a brute beast.

CHAP. XVI.

Of Ceremonies and Civilities.

1. THE master. " He who lives in a family, must be acquainted with the ceremonies and civilities that belong to it. Those within doors are, that there be a distinction between superiors and inferiors. For the securing of peace in the women's apartment, it is necessary there be several degrees and ranks. The same is practis'd in the palace, and so in the courts of justice, otherwise there would be much disorders.

The Chinese are most exact, and rather troublesome in their ceremonies; they observe them with the utmost rigour, they study them very carefully, and look upon any omission of this nature as a fault.

2. " If a superior, says one of them, does not observe order, he'll not have due attendance from inferiors; if the inferiors do not so too, they will not be able to perform their duty to superiors.

3. " A commander, tho' he be brave, will spoil an army if he does not keep good order. If a mean man is stout and not orderly, he will turn thief.

4. " A noble person is distinguish'd from the vulgar by his breeding and civility. He that is well bred respects all men, and all respect him.

5. Another. " Courtesy and affability make way for a man all the world over.

6. " At court the emperor is the first, and next to him the counsellors. Among the people ancient men take place, among the rest virtuous persons have precedence.

7. The master. " If I desire to be valued by men, the sure way to compass it is to value them.

8. " When a man goes out of doors, says a Chinese, he must do it with the same gravity and modesty as he waits upon strangers; when he comes in, it ought to be as if there were persons of note waiting for him within.

This is advising men to modesty and decent behaviour, though they be alone in their houses. The Chinese are singular in this particular, and in the circumspection they use in all their actions and motions.

9. Another says. "The father is not to make publick his children's virtues; children must not discover the failings of their parents.

10. "Man proceeds from three, says another, and ought to serve all three. From his parents that got him, from his masters who taught him, and from the emperors that maintain'd him. If there were no fathers, there would be no sons; if there were no masters, men would be mere beasts; if sustenance fail'd, he could not live.

11. The master. "Sacrifice to the dead as if they were present, sacrifice to spirits as if they were present.

This is not unlike what we find in Wisd. xiv. They made him they would honour, that they might worship him that was gone, as if he had been present. As if present imports the same as the Chinese ju zai: this proposition, because taken in one sense by some missionaries, and by others in another, NAVA- has caus'd much discord in that mission. RETTE. write upon this subject at large in the controversies, and therefore say no more to it in this place. I shall only observe here, that the church has improv'd in the knowledge of many truths, as I took notice when I treated of this subject, and Cassabutus did, 7. synod. œcum. pag. mibi 358, 359. in these words, And the church of God in progress of time is illustrated with new knowledge, whence it is writ in the Canticles, that she advances like the rising morning. Then he quotes the words of Castro, lib. 1. de hæres. c. 27. We now know many things, which were either doubted of, or quite unknown to the first fathers. Even so the church of Cbina, though so small and tender, has increas'd in several particulars, as plainly appears by what is writ in the controversies, and I hope in God it will still increase more.

CHAP. XVII.

How to preserve Fidelity.

1. THE master. "He who is not true and faithful, knows not what he ought to know to live in this world. It is certain a cart without wheels cannot move, neither can he who is not true and faithful live among men.

2. Another says. "One single word coming from a man ought to be of such force that it should never fail. When the mouth has once utter'd a word, whatever comes on't it must be perform'd; therefore it is requisite to consider what a man promises. If great and noble men do not keep their word, they sully their honour and reputation.

3. Another. "If there is not sincerity between the emperor and his counsellors, there can be no peace in the empire; if it be wanting between parents and children, there will be no peace and quietness in the house; if it be wanting between brothers, their minds cannot be united: if it be wanting among friends, their friendship will certainly fail.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of Words, and the manner of speaking.

1. THE master. "Among persons of learning and gravity, it is fit to discourse of serious matters, and speak weighty sentences; among inferior sort of people business of less weight may be discours'd of. He who speaks must suit himself to those that hear. When it is requisite to speak to any man, and he is not spoken to, it is losing of him; when it is not convenient to speak, and we do speak, it is losing of words; but a discreet man neither loses the person nor his words.

In my controversies I have writ, that it is not convenient to talk with infidels of all the mysteries of our holy faith, and I prov'd it out of S. Athanasius: since then I found this subject is handled at large by S. Thom. sup. Boetium in Trinit. q. 2. art. 4. and lect. 6. in 1 Cor. xi. Angel Maria. q. 7. de fid. sect. 1. does the same.

It is absolutely necessary to suit the discourse to the auditors, otherwise the words and labour are lost. S. Thomas makes it out sup. Apoc. viii. where he quotes the words of S. Gregory upon this subject. To avoid mistaking, it is requisite first to consider what S. Thomas teaches. The preacher is discreetly to foresee what is to be said, and to whom, and how, and how much, and after what manner, &c. Some get into a pulpit to let fall extempore sentences, and some of them plead for it the words of Mat. xx. Do not think, &c. But S. Thomas answers with the comment, That the apostles were privileg'd persons as to this particular, because the Holy Ghost was present in them after such manner, that they ought not to premeditate. Sylv. tom. VI. p. 112. writes notably to this effect. The words of S. Aug. Serm. 26. ad frat. answer to the rest of the pa-

T t ragraph:

NAVA-RETTE. For we must not lay open that which is good every where, but in all things must observe the time of making it known.

S. Thomas teaches the last in Mat. xxiv. For if he will speak words when it is not convenient, he loses them.

2. A Chinese says, "When we talk with kings, the discourse must be that they may make use of good ministers and counsellors; if we talk with great men, it must be of the loyalty and duty they owe to their king: When we converse with ancient men, we must advise them to make use of their children: When we speak with young men, we must lay before them the respect and duty they owe to their parents and elders: When we speak of the commonalty, it must be concerning their loyalty to their prince: and if we discourse with judges, it must be of uprightness, justice and good administration.

3. The master. "He who says little, is certainly in the right in what he says. The same man. "If words are not agreeable to reason, one is too much; if one word goes astray, it makes way for many more.

4. A Chinese. "The mouth and the tongue are the passage for all mischiefs, and the sword to destroy life.

5. Another. "To talk to one's neighbour concerning things that are good, is warning of him to go in the way of virtue: Good words are sweet as honey, the bad are killing swords; a man is not good because he talks much. The wound of a spear or sword is easily cur'd, but a bad word is hard to digest. Good words warm the heart, as a coat of fables does the body; the bad prick the soul, as thorns do the body: one good word is worth more than thousands of ducats, and a bad word is as mischievous as a poison'd arrow.

6. The master. "One word shews a man's prudence, and one discovers his indiscretion. One word is enough to save a kingdom, and one is enough to destroy it.

7. Another. "It is more delightful to hear good words, than to hear all the musical instruments in the world.

8. The master. "It is hard to enter in to discourse with an ill man, the best way is to withdraw and keep from him.

CHAP. XIX.

Of Friends.

1. THE master. "To live among virtuous people, is like living among roses and flowers, where tho' a man do not discern the smell, yet by degrees it works it self into the very bones. To live among wicked people, is like living in a storehouse of pilchards and fish, where if a man stays a while, tho' he be not himself sensible of the ill scent, yet he carries it about him and others perceive it. To entertain friendship with good men is like having to do with lilies, which if they are kept in one house, the smell of them pierces to the next: To entertain friendship with ill men, is exposing ones self to danger of ruin.

2. A Chinese says; "He who leans against vermilion makes himself red; he that handles ink is black; he that keeps company with wise and learned men, partakes of their learning and doctrine; if he adheres to discreet persons he gains discretion; if he follows fools, he gets folly, &c.

3. Another. "The friends of our times do nothing but shake hands, and if a word slips from one, the other is angry and in a passion; the first answers, and there's an end of their friendship. Friendship must be grounded on virtue, there must be no omission of respect or honour from one to the other: to meet and encourage one another to do good, and imitate one another's virtue, is true friendship.

4. A Chinese. "Keeping good company is like walking in the fresh evening air, where a man is cool without wetting his clothes. Conversing with ill company is like setting near a nasty stinking place, where, tho' the clothes are not dirted, they stink. Conversing with ill men, is like playing with naked swords; for tho' a man be not wounded, yet he is in danger of it.

5. Another. "Yen Ping (it is the name of a man of great antiquity) tho' he had many friends for a long time, yet he never was disrespectful to them, or us'd them without honour and courtesy.

6. Another. "Give respect to and keep far from wicked, pernicious and ill-minded people; honour and keep as close as you can to those that are good and virtuous. If any man come near to hurt, or give me ill language, I must give him good words, and remove him in a courteous manner. If a man comes to me with deceit and falshood, I must reprove and put him away with the naked truth: If I do so, it is impossible he should bear me ill-will.

The

The first proposition the Cbineses urge in respect to evil spirits as well as men. Lactantius de fals. relig. c. 20. writes the same of other nations, That they worshipped some gods that they might do them good, others that they might not hurt them. The people of the island Madagascar worship evil spirits very much that they may not hurt them, the good they take little notice of: They say, that being good, they require no ceremonies to do them good, and are not capable as such of doing hurt. The latter part of the paragraph I could wish were well observ'd by zealous Christians, who often frequent the sacraments. The author has more followers of his good doctrine among those heathens, than he would find in Europe. This is not a little confusion to us.

7. "Do not entertain friendship with a man who is fierce and cruel," is the advice of a Cbinese doctor, and it is good.

8. Another. "A lady that has not a clear looking-glass cannot see the freckles in her face: A man who has not a good friend, will not be able to discover the false steps he makes."

9. "It is the duty and rule of friends to gather virtue, and act jointly therein."

Christians may observe what sort of friendship there is among heathens, and what among themselves.

NAVARRETTE.

10. "If you would join friendship, says another, it must be with one that is better than your self, otherwise it is better to have no friends. All men are good enough for acquaintance, but there must be but a very few friends to whom you will disclose your secrets,"

11. Another Cbinese. "If you would plant trees, do not plant willows; if you join friendship, do it not with men of little worth. The ancients were true friends, because their hearts were united; friends of these times are not so, because their union is exterior, and only consists in words."

12. "When a man is rich and great, he has friends and kindred without number; if the same man falls into troubles, you will not see one of them come within his doors. The friendship of lords and great men is as cold as water, that of the indifferent sort is sweet as honey."

13. "An upright and good man does not seek friendship for interest-sake; to be a friend on this account destroys piety. A long journey shews a horse's strength, friendship of long standing makes known the heart of man."

CHAP. XX.

Of the Women.

1. THE master. "A marry'd woman must be subject to her husband, and therefore it is not convenient she should have absolute command. Woman is under three subjections, one to her parents before she is married, another to her husband when married; when he is dead, as to the government of the house and estate, she must be subject to her sons. She must not go out of her apartment to order what belongs to her. When she is at age to be married, let her always keep close in her chamber, and if she goes out of it, let her not walk in the court to be seen, which is very unseemly: If she goes out of her room in the night, let it be with a lanthorn, and not in the dark, otherwise he that meets her may suspect she is not going about any thing that is good."

Concerning the retiredness of women, read Sylv. 2. tom. in Apoc. c. xii. q. 26.

The words of St. Paul, Women be subject to your husbands, are to this effect. The Cbinese women are incapable of inheriting, of managing business, and of any other power of government: Some there have been renowned in the world, and very unhappy in government. But because this is extraordinary, the philosopher said their government was the destruction of the family, as that of a tyrant is of the kingdom, S. Thomas quotes it in 1 ad Tim. ii. lett. 3. and in 1 Cor. xv. I have already made mention of the extraordinary retiredness of the Cbinese women, and it is very strange, as appears by what has been writ, that they should maintain that rigor for above two thousand and fifty years.

2. A Cbinese. "Four things are commendable in a woman: 1. Virtue. 2. Her face. 3. Her words. 4. Her work and employment. For the first it is requisite that she be very wise, discreet, and judicious; for the second, she need not be very beautiful; it is not expected her words should be very witty, or that she should speak in verse: It is not to be expected her work should be so curious as to outdo prime work men: Her virtues must be retiredness and modesty, that her garb be suitable to her condition, that in her mien and carriage she be grave and bashful, and that she be moderate in all her actions. Every married woman ought to be adorn'd with these virtues. She must first weigh her words, not tell lies, and speak in due time"

NAVA-RETTE. " time and season: It is enough that she
" keep her face clean, and sober clothes:
" Her work and employment must be to " spin, weave, sew, and the like: She " must be watchful that the household af" fairs may be orderly.

3. Another Cbinese. " What a woman " is to observe is this, that if she speaks
" it be soft and mildly, without raising " her voice; if she goes let it be gently, " if she stops it must be with modesty, her
" ears must not hear ill words, her eyes
" must not look much, she must always " be in fear and dread lest her husband " should receive any affront, and have any " trouble upon her account. That hus" band who lights of a good wife has no " troubles, a virtuous wife keeps all the " family in peace.

4. " A Cbinese was ask'd, whether it " was lawful for a widow to marry again?
He answer'd, " To marry, because she is " poor and has no support, is lawful;
" but these are things of small moment, " when compar'd to the good there is in " continency.

By what has been said it appears, the Cbineses make no great account of women's beauty.

For the retirement of women, we may well instance the example of C. Sulpicius, who put away his wife, because she went out of doors with her head unveil'd. A Lapide in Gen. xxiv. y. 28, & 67. says, the women formerly had inner rooms, as is now us'd in Cbina.

I could easily have enlarg'd upon several points. I have left out above half the notes I took, whilst I was confin'd in Can- ton; the matter we have in hand requires no more, since our only design is to shew how much that nation has receiv'd from GOD, tho' it is so ungrateful. What has been writ is enough for this purpose.

We daily reading Cbinese books, always found something new to make our reflections upon; and that our labour may not be quite lost, I will here add a few. It has been said already, that women do not inherit, nor did they among the Jews till Numb. xvii.

5. A counsellor said to the emperor Vu Vuang, " It is a great happiness to over" come one's will and appetite with rea" son and justice. It is a great trouble " and misfortune when the will sways more " than reason.

6. " In the reign of the emperor Keng, " says the history, the empire enjoy'd such
" peace, unity, and mutual love, that for " above forty years there was no need of " inflicting any punishment.

7. A Cbinese doctor says, " The doc" trine which is taught must be firm and " solid.

8. King Kung ask'd, " How he might " govern his subjects well? A counsellor answer'd, " By looking to his benefit and " profit. He ask'd again, How that was " to be done? The other reply'd, Teach" ing them to employ themselves in works " of piety, and to observe justice; and so " doing, every thing will be profitable
" and advantageous.

9. " Another ask'd, How it might be
" discern'd, whether the kingdom im" prov'd or decay'd? His secretary an-" swer'd, " When the counsellors do not " often acquaint the king with what hap" pens in the provinces, it is a sign the " royal patrimony wastes; because the " disease not being known, the remedy is " not apply'd. When the king being told " of his ministers faults, does not punish " them, it is also a sign all goes to ruin.
" When ministers grow great and rich,
" with their employment, that is the last
" sign of destruction; for it is certain the " body of the kingdom, that is, the sub" jects, are exhausted and drain'd.

10. Min Juen Cbi says, " The less is " drawn from the people, the more a king
" will have in time of need.

This is singular policy, yet not so strange, but it has been practis'd in Eu- rope. We have an example in Constantius Cblorus, Father to Constantine the great, when he govern'd France and England.
This has been observ'd at the end of this book.

The End of the Fourth Book.

BOOK V.

Which treats particularly of the learned Sect.

THOUGH something has been said in the second and third books concerning the sect of the learned in Cbina, and some of their principles set down, which might serve to make known its design, and the end it aims at; yet because it is a matter of mighty moment, that missionaries be fully acquainted with all that belongs to this sect, I have thought fit to insert in this place, what has been writ concerning it by the R. F. Nicolas Langobardo, of the society of Jesus, an ancient missionary, and renown'd in that mission: the understanding of which I am satisfy'd will be a great advantage to the ministers of the gospel; and with small labour will lay before them how they are to deal with the infidels of that region. The original manuscript was carried to Rome, and I presented an authentick copy to the holy congregation de propaganda fide, which is kept among the records. This good father writes thus.

NAVA-
RETTE.

A short ANSWER concerning the Controversy about Xang Ti, Tien Xin, and Ling Hoen (that is, the King of the upper Region, Spirits, and rational Soul assign'd by the Chinese) and other Chinese Names and Terms; to clear which of them may be us'd by the Christians of these Parts. Directed to the Fathers of the Residences in China, that they may peruse it, and then send their Opinion concerning it to the F. Visiter at Macao.

The P R E F A C E.

Giving an Account of the Original of these Controversies, and what has been done about them by Order of Superiors.

I*mprimis.* It is above twenty five years the Cbinese Xang Ti (that is, the king of the upper region) began to be an eye-sore to me, and to go to my heart. For after having heard Confucius his four books, as we all us'd to do at our first coming hither, I observ'd by degrees, that the definition and account of several expositors of Xang Ti, was very opposite and repugnant to the divine nature. But having taken the notion from the ancient fathers of the mission, that Xang Ti was our God, I laid aside those scruples, and conceited, that perhaps some of those expositors might be mistaken, as being but particular authors who did not consent to the ancient doctrine. In this persuasion, and with this idea, I liv'd the first thirteen years, which time I staid at Xao Cbeu, without having an opportunity to confer about this point, as I ought to do, with the fathers of the other residences.

2. After F. Matthew Riccius died, I being left in his place with the charge of all this mission, receiv'd a letter from the F. visitor Francis Pascus in Japan, in which he gave me to understand, that our fathers were there reflected upon, for bordering upon the errors of the Gentiles in some books they had compos'd in the Cbinese language. So that the fathers and brothers in those parts met with great difficulty in confuting those errors, by reason their adversaries urg'd what they found in those books of the Cbinese fathers. Whereupon he earnestly requested me that we should take great care what was done as to this particular: for tho' it was not easily to be imagin'd, that the fathers who write books in

Xang Ti.

NAVA-Cbina, and are such able divines, could be RETTE. deceiv'd as to the subject of the sects; yet it weigh'd much with him to see, that many of ours in that country affirm'd it was so; and these such men as had made those sects their particular study, and were very well read in the Cbinese books. This advice from F. Pascus confirm'd me in my former doubt, and therefore I apply'd myself the more carefully to sift out the truth. Besides all this, going according to the duty of my office to Pe King, I found F. Sabatimus de Ursis labour'd under the same apprehensions concerning Xang Ti. Upon this we seriously discours'd with Dr. Paul and others we found well qualify'd, concerning the reconciling the difference there was between the texts and the comments; and they all unanimously agreed that there was no need of taking so much pains to reconcile them, but that we should always stick to the doctrine of the text when it made for us, and not concern ourselves with the contrary interpretations of expositors. The same answer was afterwards given us at several times, and in several places, by the doctors John and Michael. This made some of our fathers of opinion, that this was a sufficient means to decide the controversy, and therefore there was no need of any further canvassing the point. But F. Sabatimus and I, with several others, were of opinion we could not thus be safe and easy, in regard the learned Cbinese Christians generally suit their sentiments to ours, and explicate their doctrines according as they think corresponds with our holy faith, without regarding of how great consequence it is to have the truth of these controversies brought to light, and that nothing be said which may have the least shadow of falshood or fiction.

3. Whilst we were busy upon these debates, F. John Ruiz came up to us, being lately arriv'd at Macao from Japan, and desirous to decide the same matters in controversy. His coming was very seasonable, and as far as I can guess, particularly ordain'd by God for the benefit of the Christians of Japan and Cbina. And tho' those fathers, who thought the case plain enough and settled, would not argue it with the said father; yet the greater number of us, who judg'd the truth was not yet clear'd, were glad to confer with him about the difficulties that occur'd on either side. So we laid open the principal fundamentals of the three sects, Ju, Xe, and Tao (that is, the sect of the Literati, or the learned; that of the idols; and that of the wizards, so we usually call the third) which will open a way to decide these controversies.

4. F. Ruiz returning to Macao, gave a letter in which was an account of all these affairs, to F. Valentin Carvalho, then provincial of both provinces; who writ to us, recommending the study of the sects as a most important and necessary thing to prevent mistakes in the opinions and terms we have introduced among the Christians of these parts; and with it he sent us a catalogue of the names he judg'd dubious or dangerous, that we might examine and appoint which of them are to be us'd.

5. After this F. Francis Vicira came visitor; and understanding what orders F. Carvalho had given us concerning the doubtful name, he confirm'd those orders, and directed us anew to send him our resolution upon that matter, and the opinion of the Christian mandarines. This I sent him by F. Sabatimus, when he went away banish'd with the other fathers to Macao: and besides I charg'd the said father by word of mouth to acquaint him with several other particulars concerning these affairs, he being a person well acquainted with them. The father perform'd his part very well, both in writing and by word of mouth. But the father visitor seeing there were then with him two fathers of the contrary opinion, who were F. Pantoja, and Bagnoni, he was of opinion these controversies could not be decided unless disputed in form. Therefore he order'd those three fathers, every one to write a treatise upon them. And for the better and clearer proceeding in the case, he commanded them to argue upon three points; the first, de Deo; the second, de Angelis; and the third, de anima rationali: making out whether in the Cbinese doctrine there were any footsteps of these things, or not; for on that depended the concluding upon the Cbinese terms that were to be us'd among these Christians. The fathers compos'd their treatises, dividing themselves into two opposite parties. For the fathers Pantoja and Bagnoni undertook to prove the affirmative, alledging, that the Cbineses had some knowledge of God, of angels, and of our soul, calling them by the names, Xang Ti, Tien Xin, and Ling Hoen. F. Sabatimus undertook the negative, urging, that the Cbineses, according to the principles of their natural philosophy, and physicks, had not the knowledge of a spiritual substance distinct from the material, as we assign; and consequently knew not what God, or angels, or the rational soul were. This opinion was much applauded and approv'd by the fathers and brethren of Japan who were then at Macao, as better grounded on the Cbinese doctrine, and the father visitor was near giving judgment for it. But the business in hand being of such moment, and he not a competent judge of the Cbinese proofs alledg'd for either side, he resolv'd to send the said treatises up hither that we might examine them, not only with the assistance of the learned Christian Cbineses, but of the heathens too, who are not suspected that they will comply with the fathers in giving the true sense of their doctrine.

6. At the same time the three fathers compos'd their treatises at Macao, F. Ruiz compos'd another large one, following the opinion of F. Sabatimus, so that there were two treatises on each side. This last writ by F. Ruiz, being read by the father visitor, and the gravest of that college, gave great satisfaction to them all; for which reason the father would have sent it hither to me with the other three: but because it could not be transcrib'd so soon, he made an abridgment of it in a letter he sent me of a sheet and a half, and very sufficient to decide what we are now about concerning these controversies.

7. Having receiv'd these four treatises in this city, tho' I did not question but the fathers, Ruiz and Sabatimus, had the true notion of the Cbinese doctrine, conformable to what I had before discours'd with them; yet I resolv'd to make further enquiry into it, receiving new information from the Christian mandarines, and arguing further with the fathers of this mission, and I always found the opinion of those fathers the best and safest. As for the heathen learned men, I could not receive any information from them (as the father visitor earnestly press'd me to do) by reason of the persecution, which gave us no opportunity of conversing with them freely, and therefore I was forc'd to delay this answer longer than I was willing to have done, that none might complain judgment was given without hearing what they had to say for themselves. In short, having laid hold of the opportunities I met with, of conversing with several learned men during the last years I was in the south, and more particularly the two I resided in this imperial city; the business of the Cbinese doctrine, as far as relates to what we have in hand, was made plain and perspicuous, and therefore I will in this my answer give my sense of it plainly and succinctly.

8. It is requisite that those fathers who are to see this answer, should first see the four abovemention'd treatises, for I here insert many things contain'd in them. It is also to be observ'd, that I make this answer short, because I deal with your reverences who are acquainted with these affairs, and therefore it is enough to touch upon the principal points. The same reason will serve F. visitor, and other fathers who are out of Cbina, who only desire a short decision of these controversies, approv'd of by the ancientest fathers, and who are most vers'd in this mission.

Notes upon what has been writ above.

NAVARETTE.

Note 1. The king of the upper region, assign'd by the learned sect, went to the heart of, and was an eye-sore to the good father Longobardo. And yet there are some who have such cataracts over their eyes, that to this day they preach him up to be our God.

2. If a Franciscan or Dominican had writ what F. Pascus did, what complaints would the world ring with against us? I take them for granted. It follows thence, that the preaching of the word of God was defective in Japan, as well as in Cbina; what wonder then it should so soon be check'd in both places?

It is certain, the religion of Japan took its origin from that of Cbina; the Japoneses ever acknowledg'd the Cbineses their masters, as to matters of religion. The Cbinese merchants who sail'd to Japan, carry'd the books of our holy faith, printed in the Cbinese language, to sell to the Christians there. They read them, and being well vers'd in their own sects, took notice of the errors they found in them. Now the Japoneses making this reflection, is a powerful argument that the doctrine of those books was not sound. But the authors of them can at most be somewhat guilty only of a material mistake. I was told in Cbina, that a missionary had printed a book full of extravagancies and errors; care was taken to get it up, if any copies remain'd in the hands of infidels, it is a plain case they will do harm. The worst was, that they did not examine it before it was printed. F. James Collado, in a memorial he presented to Philip the fourth, says, That in a book he read in Japan, he observ'd four several heretical expressions, which tho' they were not imputed to the author, yet the hurt they may do was great, and the consequences fatal.

By what has been and shall be writ, it plainly appears that the argument they daily use is bad, viz. That the ancient missionaries of Cbina being grave, learned, and experienc'd men, the rest are oblig'd to follow and practise what they taught. If this argument does not take place with them, less ought it to do so with us. The more weighty matters are, the more examination they require; these are affairs that concern eternity, no care or industry is too great; we must not be satisfy'd with probabilities, nor are they sufficient upon such occasions. So says the bishop of Nan King, disp. 4. c. 3. dub. 3. For sacred things which belong to religion itself, and are absolutely necessary to bliss, probability is not sufficient, but an undoubted certainty is requisite. He proves it very NAVARRETTE. very well in the next doubt, and quotes F. Vagotius a jesuit to make good his assertion. F. Strix was deficient in this point, for which reason the pope forbid his book.

As to the advice of the learned Christian Cbineses, we all know their sentiments, and yet there are some who shut their eyes to follow and approve them.

3. I never lik'd the sentiments of those fathers; disputes never do hurt, tho' the matter discuss'd be plain and easy, but it is rather laid more open by this means, according to the doctrine of S. Thomas quoted in another place.

Besides, it is very consonant to reason, that where there are persons learned and expert in an art, it should be taken for granted they have some reasonable grounds which incline them to maintain the contrary to what others think is certain and plain. Why then should they avoid hearing them, since as men they may be deceiv'd, as actually they were? And if the fathers Longobardo, Sabatimus, Ruiz, and others, would not lay aside their scruple on account of what the fathers Riccus, Pantoja, and others taught; What reason is there that I and others who are not of the society, should rest satisfy'd and give over, because those fathers practis'd it?

The words of S. Augustin quoted by A Lapide, Can. 2. in Penth. answer to the advice of the Cbinese Christians, that we should follow the texts, &c. Philosophy and physicks are to be adapted to holy writ, and to the word of GOD, from whom all method, order, and measure of nature has its being.

Holy writ is not therefore to be wrested on the contrary to the sense of the philosophers, or to the light or dictates of nature. This last part is what the learned Christian Cbineses aim at. S. Thomas speaks to the same effect in 1, 2 Pet. ad illud, non sit propria, &c.

4. Some, and those not a few, would persuade us, that nothing has been alter'd of what the first missionaries decreed; the contrary appears by what has been already written, and shall be made out more plain in the second tome.

5. They divided themselves into two opinions; the same has been done in other points, which I do not admire at, but I am surpriz'd that the contrary should be spread abroad in the world. There were two opinions opposite to one another; it is impossible for us to close with and follow both, we follow the best and safest, or rather that which is certain, which no man can complain of.

6. I wish some men had taken half the pains to prove their opinion that F. Longobardo did for his; but I am more than sufficiently satisfy'd it is not so. It is to be observ'd too, that tho' those of the contrary opinion follow'd the advice of the Cbinese Christians, and of doctor Michael, that they might curry favour with the learned men, and gain them to their side, yet it avail'd them nothing to prevent their being sent banish'd to Macao, and put up into cages. F. Longobardo absconded and staid behind; the LORD preserv'd him to write this treatise.

P R E L U D E I.

Of the classick and authentick Books of China, by which these Controversies must be decided.

1. THO' in Cbina there be variety of books of several subjects and professions, in which many points of these controversies are touch'd upon: nevertheless in regard they are not all of such reputation as is requisite to decide matters of such weight, we have resolv'd upon mature advice to make use only of the classick authors, whom the learned sect follows; which as it is the ancientest in this country, having been profess'd four thousand years by all the Cbinese kings and mandarines, so it is the most renown'd of all that have been to this day.

2. The authentick books of this sect are reduced to four ranks. The first of the ancient doctrines, Je King, Xi King, &c. they were left in writing by the first kings and wise men of Cbina, and therefore the learned are examin'd by them. The second is, the comment upon those doctrines; which is of two sorts, one a short comment made by one author only, which always goes along with the text of each doctrine, and the ordinary gloss which scholars study, and masters teach. The other is the great comment call'd Ta Zicuen, which was order'd to be made above two thousand five hundred years ago by the emperor Jung Lo, he chusing out to this purpose forty two mandarines of great note among the learned sect, of whom a considerable part of the council of the court call'd ban lin was compos'd. These mandarines in the first place examin'd and approv'd of the Zu Xu's short comment, and the aforesaid doctrines. Afterwards they compos'd the great comment, bringing together the interpretations of the principal expositors, who had writ upon those doctrines for one thousand six hundred years, that is, since the general burning of Cbinese books in the reign of the family Zin, Zin, by order of the emperor Cbi Hoang. These ancient expositors are very numerous, for in Zu Xu alone are contain'd about 107, in the comment of Je King 136, in that of Xu King 166; and so upon the other doctrines, as appears by the catalogues of them printed at the beginning of the works: and it is wonderful to see how they all agree in the understanding of the fundamentals and most essential parts of the doctrines, so that they seem not unlike our holy doctors in the exposition of scripture. Wherefore, not without reason, the comments are held in such esteem in Cbina, that the compositions the scholars make upon the text are not allow'd of, if they answer not the sense of the comment. The third rank of books is, of those that contain the body of their philosophy, moral and natural, which they call Sing Li. The same forty two mandarines collected this body of philosophy, gathering together in it the several matters that lay dispers'd among the ancient doctrines, and those which were afterwards handled by several authors, a hundred and eighteen of whom are mention'd in this work. The fourth rank are, the original books of those authors who flourish'd after the general burning; that employ'd themselves partly in expounding the doctrines of the first philosophers, and partly in composing several things of their own. These are the classick books of the learned sect, from which we may gather whether the Chineses had any knowledge of the true GOD, Angels, or rational soul.

3. Here by the antiquity of the Chinese doctrines is to be observ'd, which took their origin from the first king of this empire, call'd Fo Hi, who according to the Chinese chronicles falls many years before the flood. But because this cannot be allow'd of, as being contrary to holy writ, it is certain at least that he was soon after the division of tongues. Therefore F. John Ruiz, in the treatise he compos'd concerning these controversies, very probably makes out that Fo Hi was the great Zoroaster.

Zoroaster.

King of Bactria, and prince of the Chaldean Magi, who gave a beginning to all the sects of the West, and afterwards came into the East, and founded the kingdom of Cbina, and the sect they call of the learned.

4. Whence it is, that this sect of Cbina, and those of the other heathens of those parts, proceed from the same source, and by the contrivance of the devil, they have a great resemblance with one another, and lead men away to hell by the same art and contrivance. I do not enlarge upon this point, because the aforesaid father has done it amply, and learnedly in his treatise. I earnestly desire, and advise all to read it with attention, because it will give them much light and assistance for deciding these controversies.

NOTES.

1. I and the rest of us agree with much satisfaction to all that is written in Num. ii. In the third I must observe, that as to the chronology, there has been some disagreement among the fathers of the society. Some follow the computation of the Septuagint; others that of the Roman martyrology. It is a matter of moment, and must be reconcil'd, to oblige us to follow it.

2. What is said Num. iv. agrees with what I quote in another place out of F. Arias, and F. Kircher writes the same. And tho' the learned sect be so ancient, yet I like what Tertullian says in his apology; But the doctrine of the prophets being much ancienter than any of the philosophers, it is therefore easy to believe that was the treasure whence all later wisdom flow'd. This is the opinion of S. Augustin, and others, whom S. Antoninus follows, 4. p. tit. 11. c. 4. Sect. 5. whom I quoted in the third book.

What has been said, disproves what Morales and others write, that the Jews of the ten tribes peopled Cbina, and that the Chineses took their doctrine from the Israelites. If they agree not in this point, the discord will be among their own family, but not with us.

PRELUDE II.

Of the Disagreement sometimes found among the authentick Books; and that in such cases we must rather be govern'd by the Comments than by the Texts.

1. THO' in reality there be no disagreement between the authentick books of the learned, if their principles are rightly understood and conceiv'd; nevertheless, in regard sometimes there seems to be some between the several texts of the doctrines, and interpretations of the expositors, therefore this prelude is inserted, to shew how we are to govern our selves in such cases; and in the first place I will give some instances of this disagreement. V. g. The doctrines tell us, or at least seem so to do, that there is a supreme king whom they call Xang Ti, who is in the palace of heaven, from whence he governs heaven, rewards the good, and punishes the wicked.

VOL.

GOD.

Xang Ti.

X x

But

NAVA-RETTE. But the expositors attribute all this to heaven it self, or the universal substance or nature, which they call Li, as shall be said in its place.

Spirits.

2. The doctrines further say, that there are several spirits which they call Xin or Kuei Xin, which preside over mountains, rivers, and other things in the world. But the expositors explicate this of the natural causes, or of the operative virtues which work in those causes.

Soul.

3. Lastly the same doctrines, speaking of our soul by the name of Ling Hoen, give us to understand, that it remains alive after man is dead. And they tell us of an ancient king whose name was Vuen Vuang, that he is in the upper part of heaven, and sits by Xang Ti's side. But the expositors unanimously maintain, that Ling Hoen is nothing but an airy or fiery entity or being, which when separated from the body, ascends and reunites it self to the substance of heaven, with which it is one and the same thing. And this is the genuine exposition of those texts which affirm, that king Vuen Vuang is by the side of Xang Ti; for Xang Ti according to them being the same thing as heaven it self, when the soul returns to heaven, it is said of course, goes to unite it self to Xang Ti.

4. Much of this seeming disagreement is found in their texts and comments; and the texts seeming more suitable and agreeable to our doctrine, therefore some fathers are of opinion we should follow the texts, without taking notice of the comments. But the other fathers think it not enough to follow the texts only, but that the expositions of the commentators must be taken with it; and when any doubt arises, we must govern our selves rather by the comment than by the text. Now this variety of opinions being known, it being of so great consequence for the clearing of what we are about, there is a necessity of explicating it here in the first place; and therefore I will assign the reasons of both opinions.

5. These that follow may be urg'd in behalf of that of the fathers Pantoja and Bagnoni. 1. In the text of the doctrines is the truth of all the philosophy and knowledge of the learned sect; for which reason there is no doubt but their force and authority is greater than that of the comments. 2. The commentators for the most part liv'd in the time the family Sung sway'd the scepter, when the sect of the idols were already come out of India, and so they had imbib'd many new and erroneous opinions from that sect, which occasion'd them sometimes to swerve from the true sense of the ancient doctrines. 3. The principal Christians we have in Cbina, who are great scholars and mandarines, advise and persuade us to follow the doctrine of the text (if, as they are grave and great, they were virtuous and fear'd God, they would give no such advice) giving them such expositions as suit nearest with our holy faith, as has been done ever since the society came into this kingdom. Therefore it is likely we ought to follow their sentiments, both because they are so well vers'd in the affairs of Cbina, and that they know what agrees, and what disagrees with our holy faith. 4. We following the text, where it is favourable to us, as it is in many considerable points, we shall unite our selves with the learned sect, which will gain us the affections of the Chineses, and facilitate the propagation of our holy faith throughout this kingdom; especially knowing the saints have given us an example so to do, making their advantage of any small matter they found that was good among the heathens with whom they convers'd, as S. Paul, when being in the Areopagus, he made use of the words of the poet, isus enim & genus sumus.

7. If we take the texts in another sense than the comment gives them, the Chineses will imagine we do so, because we have not read all their books, or do not understand them as they ought to be understood; and accordingly some learned men actually censur'd several places in Xe Je (the name of a book) compos'd by F. Matthew Riccius, among whom was that famous Bonzo of Che Kiang, who writ four articles against the said book, and at the beginning of them says, The stranger father might be excus'd for having misinterpreted the Chinese books, as understanding no better. Kin Tai So, a friend to the society, and particular devotee of the aforesaid F. Riccius, with his own hand writ a pamphlet, in which he collected those things that ought to be said of the three sects, because the father was out as to them in his book. I forbear bringing any more instances, as being satisfy'd this I have brought is well known to almost all ours that belong to this mission.

As for the articles of the Bonzo, and the pamphlet of Kih Tai So, they are kept in the archive of Kang Cbeu, he that pleases may see them.

8. It is certain, as I said at the beginning of this prelude, that the comments are not opposite to the texts; to say such a thing would be a mere heresy in Cbina, forasmuch as these comments are receiv'd and valued in all their classes almost in an equal degree to the texts. But let us allow some contradiction between them, and that the texts were more consonant to reason than the comments: Yet the Cbinese will never submit to us in that point, when we explicate the text contrary to the comments; for they take it for granted that the comments do not err, nor contain any thing contradictory to the texts. This therefore will be undertaking an endless quarrel with the Cbineses, and at last we shall come by the worst of it, of which I am a sufficient witness, because of the great experience I have of my self and others entering upon these disputes with the Cbineses. For at first when they hear us say, for instance, that Xan Ti, explicated as usually we do, is the Creator of the universe, &c. they laugh at us, as knowing that according to the doctrine of their sect, Xang Ti is heaven, it self, or its virtue and power; and therefore it could not be before heaven, but must have an equal beginning with heaven, or be posterior to it. And when we offer to carry on the argument, proving after our manner that the workman is before the house, &c. they will not suffer us to proceed, but presently put an end to the discourse, saying, that since our God is their Xang Ti, there is no need of explaining it any more to them, for they understand it better than we do. In short, tho' we contend never so much that the expositors ought not to define Xang Ti after that manner, they always stop our mouths with the same thing, which is, that we do not understand their books. And many of them take pet, and look upon us as foolish and troublesome, for attempting to teach Cbineses how their authors are to be understood and explicated.

9. When the father visitor Vieira order'd the fathers of Cbina to argue the three questions above-mention'd, father Sabatinus asking him, whether he would have them go upon the seeming sense of the texts, as the fathers Pantoja and Bagnoni had done, or upon the explication of the expositors? He answer'd positively, he would know the sense of the expositors, for that was NAVARRETTÉ. the practice of all classes and professions whatsoever; for there is no concluding any thing, for instance of the Platonick, or the Peripatetick doctrine, but according to what their classick and approv'd commentators maintain. This method being assign'd, F. Sabatinus compos'd his treatise, and prov'd, that according to the authentick texts, Xang Ti could not be our true GOD, nor Tien Xin our angels, nor Ling Hoen our soul. These reasons seem sufficient to make us approve and follow the second opinion, which is, to be guided rather by the comments than by the texts. It only remains to answer the arguments brought for the first opinion.

10. As to the first; I grant all that is urg'd concerning the force and authority of the doctrine it self, beyond that of the comment; but I also affirm, that the light and assistance of comments is necessary for the understanding of obscure texts. Nor can I forbear taking notice in this place, that I am much surpriz'd to see how much stress those fathers lay on the text of the Cbinese doctrine, so that they seem to look upon it almost as reveal'd doctrine, which cannot err. And yet we know Confucius corrected several errors in the ancient doctrine, as our Aristotle did in the books of the philosophers before him. Therefore as in Aristotle, in process of time, there appear'd many things that wanted to be corrected, so they may be found in Confucius.

11. To the second answer, first, That the classick comments we now speak of, are not made only by the authors who writ after the sect of the idol was introduced, which was in the year of our Lord 65, but by many others who flourish'd before the coming in of the said sect, for two thousand years before the incarnation. All these profess'd they follow'd the pure and peculiar doctrine of the learned sect, without mixing any opinions of other sects, as appears by the comments themselves. I do not deny but there were many, and those very famous writers, who writ after the coming in of this sect of the idols, and seeing their errors; but these do not belong to the sect of the Literati, or the learned, which we now make use, but to the sect of the idols, owning themselves to profess it. In the second place I answer, that there is never a learned man in Cbina, who will indure to hear it said, that their authentick comments deviate the least from the true sense of their doctrines. They are rather of opinion that the doctrines themselves will not bear any other exposition than that of the comments, if they be compar'd together, and the whole try'd by the principles of their philosophy.

NAVARETTE. 12. To the third I answer. 1. That our Christian Chinese learned men give us that advice, partly, because they are not sensible how prejudicial it is that any small error should be found in the matters we treat of; and partly, because they are willing to shroud themselves under the cloak, that our religion borders upon their sect, so to avoid being reflected on for following a strange doctrine: but our fathers must have higher notions, not suffering themselves to be rul'd by, but ruling them, as they find most convenient for both parties. 2. These same learned men, when they make compositions on the texts of their doctrines, give them no other meaning but what agrees with the comments, for otherwise their compositions would be rejected as erroneous and faulty in the schools of Confucius. Therefore I see not why they should persuade us to follow the very contrary to what they practise.

13. To the fourth I answer, That the supposition is false, which is, that the texts make for us; for in truth they do not, when understood as they ought to be by the sect of the learned. Therefore to attempt by force to lay any stress upon it, that is, to oppose the comments, will be like building upon sand, and flying with Icarus his wings. As for the example left us by saints, it ought to be imitated, where it can be done upon good grounds.

NOTES.

1. It is not at all strange to find some things in books which seem contradictory, though in truth they are not so. This may be seen even in the holy scripture; and the holy doctors, and other ecclesiastical authors, have taken much pains to reconcile this seeming disagreement. S. Augustin writ de concordia quatuor evangelistarum. Others have reconciled many places of the old testament. Peter Burgomensis reconcil'd many of S. Thomās, and therefore it is no wonder the same should be found in the Chinese doctrines.

Souls. 2. The learned Chineses speak and conceive concerning our soul, as is said in Wisd. ii. that it is a little air; And the word of a spark of fire. This according to Alb. Mag. de bom. tract. 1. q. 1. art. 2. is, A natural heat, which when quenck'd, the body withers and falls away into ashes, and breathes out the corporeal spirit, which is dispers'd into the air. Diogenes said, the soul was a thin air, which seems to expire in death. The Chinese says the same. Heraclius said it was a vapour. Thales held the same, and so does the learned sect of China, as shall be shewn hereafter.

3. The grounds mention'd in this same number, are the only reasons the modern missionaries, who at this time follow the ancients, go upon, without adding any thing new, or answering to those the other side brings, tho' they are so weighty and strong, that in my opinion they will convince all that shall read them without prejudice.

4. I read the bonzo's book, but neither that, nor what our author mentions of the other learned Chinese, will convince some men; a strange undertaking! F. Balas often said, if a Chinese should go into Europe, and after having studied our sciences five or six years, should expound scripture, canons, and fathers, in a contrary sense to that of the saints, doctors, divines, and canonists, and should endeavour to persuade us that his exposition was the truest, should we not think him a mad man or fool? Who doubts of it? Then must not the Chineses of necessity say the same of us, when they perceive we expound their texts contrary to the meaning generally receiv'd by all men, for three or four thousand years?

5. I shall say more to this point in another place, tho' I think what the author writes may suffice.

6. Our author with good reason admires to see his brethren lay such stress upon the Chinese texts. There are other persons who make no account of what the holy doctors of the church say and teach. Some fancies run after novelties, others cling to all that is ancient. The Chinese doctrines were erroneous, says he; nor can it be otherwise, being the works of heathens, as I have prov'd out of Lactantius in the second book. Confucius has innumerable errors, as the author of another treatise, which I shall insert in the second tome, affirms. Some late authors have taken upon them to cry up Confucius his doctrine at such a rate, that they justify it free from any slip or mistake whatsoever, without considering they oppose the opinion of their elder brethren. But such men, by express command from their superiors, ought either not to persuade strangers to follow their ancients, or reflect on the division they breed in their own family, to the great prejudice of those infidels, who say, that according to the exposition they who hold this opinion give their texts, they have had the faith we preach to them some thousands of years in China, and therefore there is no need we should trouble ourselves, sail five thousand leagues, &c. for this purpose.

Besides, to be free from all error, is the peculiar privilege of the law of God. The bishop of Nan King expresses it very well, de verit. relig. Christi. c. 4. sect. 2. The same does Prosper. Aquit. lib. cont. Colat. cap. 26. Nor is it unknown, says he, how much the schools of Greece, how much the Roman eloquence,

quence, and the curiosity of the whole world have labour'd in vain about the finding out of the supreme good, employing much hard study and excellent wit, and at last have only lost themselves in their own imaginations, to the darkning of their foolish heart, who make use of none but themselves to discover truth. S. Antoninus handles this point, 4 part. tit. 11. cap. 4. where he writes at large of the errors of the Gentiles. Why may not we apply the words of St. Paul, Ephes. iv. to those fathers who find our faith in the works of Confucius and his disciples? Even as the Gentiles walk in the vanity of their mind, having the understanding darkned, being alienated from the life of God, through the ignorance that is in them, because of the blindness of their heart; who being past feeling have given themselves over to lasciviousness, to work all uncleanness, &c. And that of Prov. ii. Their malice hath blinded them, they knew not the mysteries of God.

7. It behoves us to follow the doctor of the Gentiles, Tit. c. 1. Not giving heed to fables. And that of Heb. xiii. Be not led away by various and strange doctrines. S. Thomas, lect. 2. expounds it thus, That is divided. For truth consists in a mean, to which unity belongs, &c. The doctrine therefore of faith is one, because from a point to a point but one right line can be drawn; all other doctrines are various, because it is usual to stray many ways from the right. To this purpose read S. Antoninus quoted above.

Virtues.

8. Some will say that the Chinese books are very agreeable to the law of nature, and that the Chinese wonderfully follow the track of nature and reason, and are courteous and apt to learn, as well as ingenious, great politicians, and therefore very capable of Christian wisdom, &c. So says Corn. à Lap. from F. Trigaucius; wherefore it will be convenient to follow their books and doctrine. I answer, That I do not wonder this should be written, but I would have it compared with what I quoted above out of F. Arias, and what shall be said in other places. If their being so addicted to superstitions, sodomy, frauds, lying, pride, covetousness, sensuality, and many other vices, is following the course of nature and reason, then that father was in the right. Let the mighty advance in conversions; the constancy in the faith they have shewn, and the fervor of the learned in the service of God speak for them.

Vices.

9. I cannot but admire the diversity of men's wits. Some will be grabbing in the doctrine of saints, assigning errors to them, on account of some little words that may be explicated in a good sense. Others approve the doctrine of heathens in the bulk, tho' they have not read it. St. Paul made use of the philosophers, 1 Cor. ix. I am

VOL. I.

become to the Jews as a Jew, to those who were without a law, &c. But S. Thomas, lect. 4. says, That he suited himself to the Gentiles, that is, by consenting to their reasons, and the sound propositions of philosophers. It had been a fine contrivance indeed to follow them in all things, when they were so much out of the way. The saint in 1 Tim. iii. lect. 3. speaks thus: But in this they waver'd, because they had not the righteousness of truth, by reason their manners were deprav'd; also for that it can hardly be found among them, that they agreed in truth. Let any man look into the manners of the Chinese, and from them as from an antecedent, let him deduce the truth is to be found in their learning; and if even in this the text and comments contradict one another, it manifestly proves they contain no truth at all. Nor is it reasonable that the preachers of the gospel should submit to be disciples of heathens (it speaks as to matters that concern our religion) we are to be their masters, their light, and their guides, and not to suffer ourselves to be guided by them. As our author says, Our notions must be of a more lofty nature. When they find ever a word in the texts, which in the gross sound, and superficial sense seems to be somewhat for us, they presently think our holy faith is signified by it, and imagin they have a strong weapon to convince the infidels; and they understanding those things better than we do, the consequence is, that they are farther than ever from compassing what they aim'd at. Our Albertus Magnus 2. sent. dis. 1. art. 5. instances in David de Dinanto, who said the Materia Prima was God. This was signified in the temple of Pallas, where it was written: Pallas is whatsoever was, whatsoever is, and whatsoever will be, whose veil no man could ever lay open to another. It were pleasant that we reading these words, should presently engage to maintain and defend that it is our God who is meant by them. It were absolutely necessary first to examine thoroughly whom they meant, and to whom they assign'd those attributes; it were not proper to be rul'd by the literal sound of those words, for they made the materia prima eternal, a parte ante, and a parte post, and gave it a divine being. This same the Chinese do with their Li, or Tai Kie. They also give the supreme attributes to their Xang Ti; must we therefore rely upon their books, and preach that to them for our God, which in reality is their creature? Ought not we to examine the point, inquire what it is they mean by these things, undeceive, and make them sensible that they take from God the glory due to him, and give it to creatures, as Wisd. xiii. says of others?

NAVARETTE.

Y y

Not

NAVARETTE. Nor is what Morales urges of S. Paul's unknown GOD to the purpose, because it makes not for the case of Cbina. In this particular I would have them read and follow Corn. à Lapide. To that of Dinantus may be added that of Virgil and Trismegistus, instanc'd by S. Antoninus, cap. 4. §. 5. ut suprà.

10. It is certain the learned Christian Cbineses propose to themselves the end the author mentions, in giving the advice they do, and no man can find any ground to maintain the contrary. These points are to be consulted about with good Christians, well instructed in our faith, and sincere. I one day discours'd with Linus, who doubtless is qualify'd as above, and he said: father, there is no looking into or reading our books, in order to write or dispute concerning the law of GOD, for in our books there is nothing to be found but ravings, and nothing that relates to the law of GOD; do not you be govern'd by us, nor ask us any questions concerning this affair. This advice I took, and will always follow it.

PRELUDE III

Of the Symbols, or Hieroglyphicks us'd among the Sect of the learned; whence it proceeds that they have two several sorts of Doctrine, the one superficial according to Appearance, and the other the true.

1. AS to the first part of this prelude, it is to be observ'd that almost all the ancient heathen philosophers invented several symbols, hieroglyphicks, or figures, to the end to conceal the mysteries of their philosophy, whereof the course of Coimbra speaking tom. I. Physic. has these words: The ancient custom of philosophers taken by Pherecydes, Pythagoras his master, from the Egyptians and Chaldeans, was, either not to write down the precepts of philosophy at all, or to write them obscurely, that is, under the obscurity of a deep bidden sense, and shrouded under mathematical figures, and enigmatical expressions. For the poets darkned and conceal'd the secrets of philosophy under fables, the Pythagoreans under symbols, the Platonists under mathematicks, and Aristotle under the conciseness of his stile. For they thought it a crime to admit the base multitude into the secrets of learning, and to make known to the large and idle multitude those things which nature had hid from us. However Aristotle, though he thought not that philosophy was to be made common, yet he did not approve of that method, which left all things dubious, and sometimes conceal'd truth under a vain shew of falsehood.

Symbols.

Even so the Cbinese philosophers, who were the founders of the sect of the learned, have their symbols, consisting as well of several figures and numbers, as of metaphorical expressions, all of them tending to express the being of universal things, and their efficient causes. The principal symbols are even and odd strokes cross'd in the middle, black and white points, figures round and square, the six positions of places in their way of writing, and other metaphorical terms and expressions. The books of Ye King, which contain the speculative part of the Cbinese doctrine, are full of these symbols. As to the mysteries and efficient causes of numbers, there are two whole books, which are the eleventh and twelfth of Sing Li, by which it were easy to restore the science of Pythagorical numbers, which were lost in the Great West.

2. This use of symbols is also to be found in the sects of the bonzes, and tao zu. The bonzes began to use them ever since the sect of the idols was brought into this country, and brought at the same time the hieroglyphicks of the Gymnosophists, which consist of figures of men, beasts, clouds, serpents, devils, swords, bows, spears, arrows and other implements adapted to their designs. Those of the sect of tao zu, in imitation of the bonzes, make use of almost the same symbols of human figures, to express the first principle, the faculties of the soul, the elements man is compos'd of, &c. So that it is plain and visible, symbols are us'd in the three sects, tho' all men do not know them to be such, but only those that were better vers'd in the mysteries and principles of those sects.

3. As to the second part, it must be also observ'd, that by reason of these symbols there have been in all nations two several sorts of doctrine, the one true and abstruse, the other false and visible. The first was philosophy, and the knowledge of natural causes, known only to wise men, and privately handled by them in their schools. The other a false appearance of popular doctrine, which was the enigma of the first, and the multitude thought to be true, as the words themselves sound, tho' in reality it was absolutely false; and this they apply'd to their morals, the government of the commonwealth, and divine worship, as Plutarch de placit. philos. affirms, and so does Pierius in his hieroglyphicks, and others. Thus they made many gods, some good, some bad. The good were those they made to signify the materia prima, and the chaos; the four elements, as Empe- doctes writes, and is quoted by Plutarch. de placit. philos. lib. I. cap. 3. where he says, In the first place I will shew you four roots of things, heavenly Jove, Juno that gives life; besides these Pluto and Neltis, who waters human channels with tears. Jove, that is fire and the sky; Juno that gives life, is the air; Pluto is the earth; Neltis under the name of human channels, is water and seed. The bad and hurtful gods were those they feign'd under the names of furies, fates, &c. signifying the principal passions of the soul, which inwardly torment and disturb man. This holds in terminis, as the course of Coimbra observes, quoting St. Augustin in the subject de anima. The sect of the Gymnosophists, to denote that those men who suffer themselves to be led away by their passions, are like brute beasts, feign'd that the souls after death went into the bodies of several beasts, whence the ignorant vulgar suppos'd there were good and bad deities, angels and devils, and that our souls transmigrated through several bodies. Plutarch in the same book adds, that those who denied the Divine Providence over the world, and the immortality of the soul, because they could not by the fear of laws alone curb the private evil inclinations of the people, did therefore invent a deity and religion under symbols and hieroglyphicks, to check the people, and govern the commonwealth, thinking they could not live peaceably and quietly, without some sort of worship and religion, though it were false.

4. S. Augustin plainly shews this in several places of his books of the city of God, where he sets down the three sorts of philosophy among the ancients; one fabulous, us'd by the poets; the second natural, peculiar to the philosophers; and the third political, which was common among the people.

5. The three sects of China absolutely Religion. having two several doctrines; one private, which they look upon as true, and is only understood by the learned, and profess'd by them under the veil of symbols and hieroglyphicks. The other vulgar, which is the metaphorical part of the first, and is by their learned men look'd upon as false, in the superficial sound of the words; this they make use of for government, for their divine, civil, and fabulous worship, thereby inclining the people to good, and deterring them from evil. Now leaving those two sects, which at present we do not treat about; it is most certain that those of the learned sect, as has been hinted before, represent the general causes with their effects and influences, under numbers and symbols; and under the name of good and bad spirits, one of heaven, another of the earth, of stars, mountains, &c. they signify the universal things of the world, as the faculties and NAVAPASSIONS OF THE SOUL, THE HABITS OF VIRTUES AND VICES, AS THEY IMAGINE THEM TO BE. RETTE.

6. That the sect of the learned has these two different doctrines, is prov'd as follows: 1. In the book call'd Lun Ju, lib. III. p. 5. Zu Ku a disciple to Confucius says, as it were complaining of his master, That he never understood by him, that he spoke to him of the nature of man, and the natural disposition of heaven, till last of all. 2. In the same book, p. 17. Confucius says, that the way to govern the people well, is to make them honour the spirits, and to keep far from them; that is, that they do not go about to search into what they are, or what they do, &c. 3. In the sixth book of the said Lun Ju, Confucius being ask'd by his disciple Ki Lu, What death was? He answers very drily, How shall he who does not know what life is, know what death is? Lib. IV. p. 6. four things are set down, which Confucius did not use to treat of. Of these, one was the spirits. The comment gives the reason, that he did not discourse of spirits, because there are several things hard to be understood concerning them, and therefore it is not fit to talk of them lightly with all persons. 5. In the book call'd Kia Ju, Confucius designs at once to rid himself of answering the questions many ask'd him concerning spirits, the rational soul, and things after death; he resolv'd to assign one general rule, saying That things that are within the six positions (that is, within this visible world, and are visible) may be argu'd and not doubted of; but those things that are without the six positions (that is, which are out of this visible world, and are invisible) must be let alone as they are, and not disputed about.

7. From these and such-like places of Confucius his doctrine, three or four other deductions or inferences over and above may be made. 1. That in the learned sect, besides the vulgar and visible doctrine known to all of them, there is another hid and philosophical, known only to the masters of the sect. 2. That Confucius shun'd talking distinctly and plainly of the spirits, rational soul, and things of the other life, for fear lest the multitude knowing the truth of their philosophy in relation to those things, would be quite deprav'd, and by that means the publick peace would be subverted. 3. That by the words of Confucius mention'd in the last quotation, the learned of China have their hearts darkned, and their eyes closed, that they may not see nor think any further than the visible things of the world. 4. That by this means the wisest men of China are miserably led away into the worst of evils, which NAVARETTE. is atheism, as will more plainly appear in the following preludes, where we will pry into and examine the principles and grounds of the doctrine, as well in physics, as morals.

NOTES.

2. Some allow of this doctrine in the learned sect (there is no dispute as to the others; as far as it concerns that of the bonzes, I writ enough of it in my relations to confirm what the author says) others will not allow of it, they think it does not answer their ends; and were it not so, there would not be the least appearance of disagreement between the texts and comments. There are some too who think, it lessens the value of Confucius his doctrine; yet allow he makes use of parables, wherein they are much deceiv'd, for we see that the Greeks and Romans, who far exceeded the wisdom of the Cbineses, observ'd that method, and the holy prophets did the same for other ends; and it is said even of the author of life, that he spoke in parables, according to the custom of Palestine; to which you may see Corn. à Lapide in the canons upon the prophets, can. 56. in Exod. ii. v. 6. S. Thomas says the same of the old law, in Heb. xi. lect. 2. Oleaster gives the reason, in Exod. xxiii. ad mores. Read S. Thomas in 2 Pet. iii. ad finem. To deny this in Cbina, is nothing but foreclosing the argument, to contend that the literal sound makes for our holy faith. Read the seventh chapter of F. Semedo's Cbinese empire, and see Oleaster in Num. xi.

4. In this paragraph the author quotes S. Augustin at length; I think it not necessary to write his words. See the faint lib. I. lib. II. c. 32. lib. IV. c. 27. lib. VI. c. 10. de civit. Dei. He takes those three sorts of philosophy from S. Paul, Rom. i. S. Thomas expounds them, lect. 7. Et 2. 2. q. 94. art. 1. Raphael de la Torre on this place, disp. 2. And Suarez, l. 2. de superfc. c. 4. n. 8. Some of these points shall be hinted at again in another place.

PRELUDE IV.

Of the Learned Sect's Method of Philosophizing in general.

1. IT consists in seeking after the first principle of this our universe, and how general and particular things proceeded from it, with their efficient causes and effects; and particularly in enquiring concerning man, what he is as to the body, and as to the soul; of his way of understanding and acting, of the habits of virtue and vice, of every man's fate, influx and destiny, by the horoscope of his nativity, that he may order his actions according to his lot. These are the things they treat of in a great measure, as was observ'd above, under several figures, symbols, numbers, and enigmatical terms.

Philosophy 2. This their method of philosophizing is compos'd of two parts. The first is to reason concerning the first principle, and the universal causes proceeding from it, as to their own proper being and substance, with their places, qualities, and efficient virtues; not as they actually work, but in as much as they have the power of working. This science they properly call sien tien bio, that is, a priori. This Fo Hi treated of when he form'd the kuas, and the figures of their je king.

3. The second is, that supposing this first production, order, and constitution of the universe, and its general causes, they enquired in what part of the zodiack, according to their hemisphere and climate, the general efficient causes begin to exercise a predominant virtue, and to produce things; and how far that predominancy reaches to the generation of things, and that they may return and corrupt, as appears in the course of the four seasons of the year, with the access and recess of the sun, the heat prevailing six months in summer and spring, and the cold six more in winter and autumn. This science they call bien tien ho, that is, a posteriori. Vuen Vuang, Cbeu Kung, Confucius, and other learned authors of note treat of this subject ex professo, because in it consists all their end, which is to imitate heaven and earth in their operations and government of the world, during the four seasons of the year.

4. Hence it is, that whilst the heat which nourishes and produces is predominant, they follow their business, sport, &c. and when the cold prevails, which corrupts and destroys, they execute such as are sentenced to death. According to these changes of the four seasons, they enquire into every man's horoscope, to the minute in which he was born. In this their science a posteriori, there are among them several opinions and ways of explicating. For some say the universal causes begin to have force in such a point of the zodiack, and according to it from thence forwards such qualities are receiv'd in the production of the thing, and such a fate is assign'd. Others say in such another point, &c. and therefore there are several sects, some following

Vuen

Vuen Vuang's kvas, others those of Yang Xi, others those of Chu Zu, &c.

5. This virtue or predominancy of the general causes, they call si chu, chu zai, kiun, vuang boang; all which signifies to predominate, and they are the same letters us'd for king. The difference betwixt these two sciences is to be particularly observ'd as a matter of much moment to what we have in hand. Therefore I will explicate them more largely in two special precludes.

NOTE.

All that has been said in this prelude, is so far from deviating a jot from what the learned sect professes, that it is certain no man who has read but a little in their books can contradict it. What is mention'd in the first paragraph was one of the errors of the Manichees. S. Thomas, Heb. xii. says, NAVARETTE. They ascribe the variety of accidents that befall man to his birth; so that every man's life and manners are order'd according to the constellation under which he is born. This it is the Chinese affirm, and other antients believ'd. S. Isidorus, lib. IX. Orig. cap. 2. says, The Aruspices, or soothsayers, were so call'd, as it were, for being horarum inspectores, or lookers into hours; for they observe days and hours in doing of business, and they mind how man is to govern himself at all times. The horoscopes took their name from the prying into the hours of men's birth, with various and different destiny. We see all this is observ'd to a tittle in China, and almost all of it is publish'd in the kalendar of the mathematicians of the court-print.

PRELUDE V.

Of the Science a Priori, that is, how the Universe was produced, according to the Chinese.

Cosmology.

1. IN the first place, they not being able to imagine that any thing could be produced out of mere nothing; and knowing no infinite power, that could create it out of nothing; and on the other hand, seeing there are things in the world which now have a being, and anon have none, and that they were not eternal, they concluded there must of necessity be a cause eternally antecedent to all things, and which was the cause and origin of them all, which they call li, that is, the reason or ground of all nature. They also supposed that this cause was an infinite being, incorruptible, without beginning or end. For they hold, that as out of nothing comes nothing, so that which had a beginning must have an end, and the end returns to the beginning. Whence sprung the opinion receiv'd throughout all China, that this world must have an end, and be again produced anew. The interval from its beginning till the end they call tai su, that is, great year.

World temporary.

2. This same cause, according to them, has no life, knowledge or power, and is only pure, quiet, transparent, subtle, without shape or body, only perceptible to the understanding, as we speak of spiritual things; and tho' it be not spiritual, yet it has not these active and passive qualities of the elements.

First cause.

3. The manner of enquiring how this visible world proceeded from the first principle or chaos, call'd li, was thus: they seeing that of necessity there must be an eternal cause of visible things; and considering on the other hand, that this of itself had no manner of act or efficiency, without which things could not be produced from it; and perceiving again by daily experience that heat and cold generate and corrupt things, and that these two qualities are the efficient causes of all generation and corruption; they sought out, how from this chaos, or materia prima, call'd li, was produced the materia proxima, which things are compos'd of; and how heat and cold could be generated in the world, that other things might be generated of them. Therefore they imagin'd that from this materia prima, li, which is infinite and immense, this air naturally and accidentally proceeded through five several changes or conversions, which they assign, till it became material; as it now is; but still remaining confin'd within that infinite chaos, call'd li, Chaos. was reduced to a finite globe, which they call tai kie, that is, highly terminated, or confin'd. They also call it boen tun, boen lun, before things proceeded from it. And this air which flow'd from the first chaos, thro' the aforesaid five changes, is also incorruptible as to its substance, and the same entity with the first li, but is more material and changeable, by condensation and rarefaction, by motion and rest, by heat and cold, &c. This second chaos, tai kie, before things proceeded from it, they imagine and describe after their manner. It is needless to give the description in this place.

Tai Kie.

4. They perceiving that heat and cold are the causes of the generation and corruption of things, and that they are produced by motion and rest, imagin'd that

NAVA-
RETTE. the conglobated air in this second chaos mov'd either accidentally or naturally, by which motion heat was produced in the same body of the air; and that motion ceasing, the stillness naturally produced cold, part of the air remaining hot, and part cold, but extrinsically not intrinsically and of its own nature; so that the air was divided into hot and cold, which is what they call leang i, and in tang. The hot part is pure, clear, transparent, and light. The cold is impure, unclean, dark and heavy.

5. So that the most general efficient causes of the universe are rest and motion, heat and cold, which are call'd tung, cing, in, jang. The heat and cold united themselves together in a most strict union, amity and concord, as husband and wife, or father and mother, and produced the element of water, which belongs to in. At the second copulation they produced the element of fire, which belong to jang, and so they went on producing the five elements, (the Chineses assign so many) which are tai kie, or in jang, or the air qualify'd, as among us the qualities with their elements; which are water in the north, fire in the south, wood in the east, metal in the west, and earth in the middle.

Elements.

6. In jang, and the five elements, produced heaven, earth, sun, moon and planets; for the pure, hot, transparent, and light air ascending, formed heaven; and the impure, cold, dark and heavy sinking down, form'd the earth. After this heaven and earth joining by their intermediate virtue, produced man and woman; man answering jang, or heaven; and woman in, or the earth. For this reason the king is call'd tien zu, that is, the son of heaven, and sacrifices to heaven and earth, as to universal parents. In these three things, heaven, earth, and man, all other things are contain'd, as in their source and origin.

Heaven.

Air.

Earth.

7. Such was the creation of the universe, according to the ancient and modern Chineses, the whole frame of the world being form'd in three principal things, which are the cause of the rest. The first heaven, which comprehends the sun, moon, stars, planets, and region of the air, which is between heaven and earth, where their five elements are, being the immediate matter of which all things below are engender'd. This region of the air is divided into eight kuas, which are so many parts of the air it self, or qualify'd elements, having several qualities, answering to universal efficient causes, which they imagine. The second earth, which includes hills, mountains, rivers, lakes, sea, &c. and these are also universal efficient causes, which are possess'd of virtues and effects. The earth is also divided into parts, which contain the kang jeu, that is, strong and weak, or hard and soft, harsh and smooth. The third is man, of whom the rest are generated.

8. It is here to be observ'd, that this production of the universe was absolutely accidental, after the manner as has been shewn; for the first efficient causes of this machina were rest and motion, heat and cold; the materia proxima was the corporeal homogeneous air. The production of heaven and earth was also accidental, unforeseen, or natural, and not deliberate or advis'd; for it is said that the pure light air ascended and became heaven, and the impure and heavy became earth.

9. The form of the universe is this, heaven is spherical, and therefore moves and influences in circulum. The earth is square, therefore it lies still in the center, and influences per quadrum; and four elements answer to it, one to each of the four sides, and a fifth to the middle superficies. Besides, heaven they imagine that infinite materia prima, call'd li, from which tai kie flow'd; and they also call it kung, hui, tao, vu, vu kie; still, transparent, rare in the superlative degree, without knowledge, without action, nothing mera potentia. This air that is between heaven and earth, they divide into eight parts, as has been said; four of them they assign to the south, where jang reigns; and four to the north, where in, or the cold, rules. To each of these parts answer a portion of the air, which they call kua, because of the different quality it enjoys.

10. This production of the universe is assign'd by Fo Hi, and is represented in the figure of je king, call'd bo tu, which has black and white chequers, and was ever by tradition understood after this manner. It is also express in the figure of jo xu, which has black and white points in even and odd numbers, viz. odd, 1, 3, 5, 7, 9. and five even; 2, 4, 6, 8, 10. which answer to the kuas; or general causes of the universe. Confucius specify'd this in writing in his exposition of je king, beginning with tai kie, as follows: the chaos produced heat and cold (which comprehend the five elements) these two became four, that is, heat and cold in an intense and a remiss degree. These four produced eight qualities, viz. hot and cold, hard and soft; four in an intense, and four in a remiss degree. They substitute these eight for the three principal causes, which are heaven, earth and man; and so these eight, or these three, produced all things in the world, which is all to frame the aforesaid three, which they say are the cause of the things that are generated, or corrupted in this world.

11. The learned men, who succeeded Confucius in their comments and glosses, specify this production of the world more minutely, beginning at the first origin, or infinite matter call'd li, as it is in the first entrance into their philosophy, call'd ying li, which commences from vu kie, whom they also call tao. Lao Zu the head of Tao Zu's sect, sets down the production of the world exactly after the same manner, in his book call'd lao zu king, in numbers, or metaphorical terms thus: tao, or the first chaos, produced unity, which is tai kie, or the materia secunda. Unity produces duality, which is lang i. Duality produced trinity, which is tien ti, jin, san zai, heaven, earth and man; and trinity produced all things. So it comes to be the very same doctrine, as that of the Literati, or learned Chinese.

NOTES.

1. I have several times with care and attention read in the Chinese books, all that is written in this prelude; if any man makes a doubt of it, let him read a little, and he will be satisfy'd. Observe how true it is, that the Chinese hold the same errors that were formerly in Europe, as the author proves in the sequel, and I instanced in another place out of F. Arias and F. Kircher. Our B. Alb. Mag. tract. 2. de hom. quest. 89. art. 2. in fine, mentions the same that is writ in the first paragraph: Some said there were infinite worlds successively; the head of them was Empedocles, who said, that one motion of the heaven being perform'd according to the motion of the world, all things return to the first matter, and another motion beginning, are regenerated in like number as they were before, and another world begins. But that motion of the heaven is perform'd according to the progress or motion of the first stars, &c. in thirty six thousand years, and this space of time they call one great year. Who can chuse but observe, that this is what the Chinese teach to a tittle, though they add six thousand years to their great year, and some more, which is a small difference in so great a number?

2. There was another sect, says Albertus, which taught, That there were infinite worlds, one without another. The Chinese have not fallen into this error; for they own, they cannot tell whether there are any other worlds besides this or not.

3. The Chinese in their books assign five elements. This is a thing so universally agreed upon among them and their books, that the very school-boys know it. F. Matthew Riccius owns it, and argues against this error. So does F. Trigaucius in his history, p. 177. and yet F. Intorceta being a missioner of but a few years standing NAVA- will maintain, that the Chinese do not hold RETTE: that opinion; and he proves it with the same words that F. Riccius uses to confute that error. Whom must we follow, the old ones, or the young ones? those that are well vers'd and read in the Chinese books, and the most learned of the society in Cbina, or F. Intorceta?

4. There are some men so open hearted, that wherever they find the least word which seems to have any resemblance to the mysteries of our holy faith, without further examining into the matter, they presently make the application very contentedly, thinking they have found a mighty treasure; as for example, what the author mentions in this number, they would appropriate to the blessed Trinity. So that though this mystery cannot be positively found throughout all the old testament, yet they will have it to have been reveal'd to the Chinese. A strange conceit! if they had not a revelation, as one of necessity must suppose, they could not attain the knowledge of it thro' creatures as divines teach, and with them S. Thomas 1. p. q. 32. art. 1. in 1. dist. 3. art. 2. & 1. contrag. c. 14. Reason shews it: for, God has not the appearance of a cause to creatures on account of what is their own, but of what is appropriated to them; they might nevertheless have some revelation concerning God, either made by the devil, or from the doctrine of others, as Plato is said to have read the books of the law and prophets, by which he might attain to some sort of knowledge of the Trinity. So tho' Aristotle at the beginning of his book de celo & mundo, says, And thro' this number, viz. of three, we apply'd our selves to magnify one God above all the properties of things created: yet it is not to be inferred that he had any knowledge of this mystery. Because, says S. Thomas, The philosopher did not intend to assign a trinity of persons in God, but in regard that in all creatures perfection appears in the number three, viz. in the beginning, middle and end; therefore according to the ancients they honour'd him with treble prayers and sacrifices. And tho' Trismegistus said, One begot one for his own sake, one begot one, and reflected his own heat upon himself: yet we must not say he had this knowledge by any other means but by revelation, or being taught by others. We must always have regard to the principles of philosophy, and to the common sense of ancients and moderns, who having had no knowledge of one God, were less likely to have it of the Trinity. Did the Chinese speak like Trismegistus, it were a sufficient ground to go upon. Besides, the Trinity mention'd by our author, is produced and caus'd after other creatures, whose first principle is li, or tai kie.

PRE-

PRELUDE VI.

Of the second part of Science, which is a Posteriori, how things are engendred and corrupted in this World.

NAVA-
RETTE.

1. Another method the Cbineses have of philosophizing, is, allowing the first production of the universe, and order of general causes, to inquire into the cause of the generations and corruption which happen every year in the four seasons, spring, summer, &c. and to search into the heavenly influences that are prevalent upon our bodies on the same months, days, hours and signs of the zodiack; thence to gather every man's fate, destiny and natural inclination, thereby to know how he is to govern himself in his actions, that he may co-operate with his fate, and not oppose it.

2. The principal authors of this science, are Vuen Vuang, and his son Cheu Kung; who seeing that things are engendred, and the life of animals, plants, &c. supported by heat, and that the same moves them to act for the attaining of their ends, and that on the other side cold corrupts and destroys them; they assign'd heat and cold as the causes of generation and corruption, and that heat was produc'd by motion, and the access of the sun, and by brightness and light; and cold by the recess of the sun, stillness and darkness. Moreover, perceiving that things began to be engendred and grow vigorous from the spring forwards, and that they were in a flourishing condition till the end of summer, and that from autumn forwards they began to change, decaying, withdrawing, and ceasing their operations, till the end of winter, therefore they assign'd the two first seasons to the heat, and the two last to the cold. And accordingly they divided the zodiack round the horizon into eight parts, like eight points, which are the eight kuas of this science, whereof four belong to the heat, and four to cold: According to this doctrine, they say, that the influence of general agents, or predominancy, and activity in their hemisphere, begins at the kua call'd Cbin, which answers to the East, and begins exactly with their spring, according to the course of the sun, and is usually on the fifth or sixth of February. This actuality, predominancy or influence, they call ti chu, chu zai, which is the predominancy of heat during the first six months, which again withdraws at the contrary season about October. To express the beginning and end of this predominancy, they make use of the words cho, je, that is, to come out, and go in; kio, xin, that is, to draw up, and stretch out; vuang lai, that is, to go and come. All which bears the same sense. And this being caus'd by the access and recess of the sun, which always in respect to them performs his course to the south, therefore they look upon that part as hot, and call it tai yang, and the north as cold, calling it tai in.

NOTE.

This good father deserves a thousand commendations, for having so exactly explicated these matters so difficult and obscure, and made them intelligible even to Europeans; and though he had undertaken no other task in Cbina but the composing of this treatise, he might think the years he spent in that mission well employed. He has by this his labour obliged us all to pray for him, though I believe such was his piety and virtue, that he has little need of our prayers. He died at ninety years of age, and those truly worthily spent.

PRELUDE VII.

Of the famous Axiom in China, Vuan Vue Je Ti, that is, all things are the same.

1. Among the rest of the Cbinese principles, which are to be observ'd to our purpose, one most material is, that they hold all things to be one and the same substance. And because this opinion has much resemblance with that of some ancient European philosophers, who said, That all things were the same, it will be convenient in this place to shew how they understood and explicated it. Aristotle speaking in several places of the famous philosophers, mentions those who said, That all things were continued, and are one and the same by nature, and the manner of their being, but various according to sense, and no way differing.

22. The course of Coimbra, Fonseca and others, relying on Aristotle's text, say, those ancient philosophers knew nothing beyond the material cause, and even that but grossly; for they imagine that the matter it self was the whole essence of natural things, and that they were all one continu'd thing, and very agreeable to outward sense, without having any essential difference among themselves. As if a man should say, that air and water are the source of all things; he must must of necessity own, that all things as to their essence, are air and water; but they are distinguishable as to the accidents, as condenseness, rarity, heat and cold, &c. Just as we say of artificial things made of wood, that as to the essence they are wood, but are distinguishable by the artificial form. And in this sense Parmenides and Milto affirm'd that all things were one and the same, and accordingly Aristotle quotes and refutes them. See Fonseca in 1. Physic. from whom this is taken.

3. The philosophers of our times, and ever since Aristotle, by reason of the opinion they had conceiv'd of the others, will not be persuaded that men of such great judgment should speak in the sense Aristotle opposes, and therefore give them several interpretations. Some say Aristotle blames them, because the words sound to that effect, and not that he believes they really held that opinion. Nay, they accuse Aristotle, as if he charg'd them with what they did not mean; but they are all deceiv'd.

4. That those philosophers held the said opinion, the author sufficiently proves in this place.

5. The fourth is prov'd, because others ancients than they held the same opinion, as the Indian Gymnosophists, and the Bonzes of China who sprang from them. Lao Zu with his Taos Zus holds the same; and above all the learned Chinese, from the highest to the lowest, as well the ancient as modern. These three sects are ancients than the aforesaid philosophers; and all had their origin from Zoroastres the magician, and prince of the Chaldeans, who so taught and spread it abroad throughout the world, making the chaos eternal, &c. By which it plainly appears that the said ancients, and three sects of China conceive,

That all things are the same by nature and reason; and that the opinion of these and them is exactly the same. NAVARRETTE.

NOTES.

1. I grant what the author writes concerning the opinion of the Chinese, is very plain in their books, and is not in the least to be doubted; they so often repeat all things are the same, that it seems superfluous to argue about it. Trigaucius, lib. I. c. 10. fol. 52. says, The sect of the bonzes hold the same opinion; but he was wilfully mistaken in saying, that this doctrine came from the bonzes within these five hundred years; forasmuch as the said proposition is found in terminis, in the ancientest books of the learned sect. To these points, read S. Thomas, 2 tom. in 1 p. q. 44. disp. 18. q. 1.

2. As for the ancient Europeans believing the same, he proves it very well, and it may be confirm'd by the opinion of S. Thomas, 1. p. contr. Gent. and especially opusc. 15. c. 6. where he mentions Pythagoras and others, and on Heb. xi. lect. 2. That the errors of the Chinese sprung from the Chaldeans, shall be further made out in another place. As to what some men, guided only by their own fancies, say, that it is all false, denying what they please by the bulk, there is no notice to be taken of it, for it follows that what they so rashly utter must be false. So Aristotle confutes them, 4 Metap. lect. 17. S. Thomas expounds it; It is equally manifest, that he who says all things are false, owns at the same time that what he says is false. The faint out of the philosopher replies to the answerer that may be made to this conclusion; there the reader may see it.

PRELUDE VIII.

What Generation and Corruption is, according to the Sect of the Learned.

1. THERE were two sorts of matter of which the world was compos'd, and both of them incorruptible. The first is the infinite chaos, their li. The second the original air, or their tai kie, within which intrinsically is the being and substance of the first matter, and consequently is in all things and never quits them. After the production of heaven and earth, this air that is between heaven and earth, is the materia proxima of all corruptible things, as the elements are among us; of it they are made by generation, and to it they return by corruption; so that the air is the being, essence, and nature of all things, they being engendred of it by condensation in some corporeal figure, and proceeding through several qualities, by virtue of heaven, the sun, moon, stars, planets, elements, earth, and other universal causes, according to the year, month, day, hour, and sign such thing was produced in; which causes are, as it were, forms and beginning of the interior and exterior operation of the suppositum.

2. Generation therefore, according to this sect, is the receiving of the being and substance from the air, or chaos actuated into figures and qualities, which are more or less pure, penetrating and obtuse, and are to it in the nature of form, the heaven, sun, &c. and the particular causes which apply and dispose the matter concurring. Corruption, or death, the destruction of

NAVA- the outward figure, and the qualities, hu-RETTE. mours, vital spirits, &c. which maintain'd the living creature; and being again dissolv'd into the substance of the air, the pure, light, and hot part ascending, and the impure, heavy and cold sinking down.
 Ascending answers to xin and boen, descending to kuei and pe. Here it is to be observed, that by the word xin are meant the spirits the Chineses think pure; by the name boen, the souls of men separated from the body; by the name kuei the spirits which are reckoned impure, and by pe human carcases.

NOTE.

Other ancients maintain'd the same doctrine here mention'd; it shall be shewn in another place. That it is a positive opinion of the learned Chineses, appears by their books. The Greeks call the materia prima, bile, which is the same as chaos and confusion. See S. Thomas opusc. 31. The Chi-nesefes call it li. I have already quoted S.
Thom. in 1 p. see him where he treats de generatione.

PRELUDE IX.

Allowing what has been said before, how things are distinguish'd from one another according to the Chineses.

1. THEY making the air the whole essence of the thing, say, that all things are one and the same substance, and are distinguished from one another by the outward shape, and the qualities of the very air: this that distinguishes them they call ki cho. As to figure, they mean the several shapes of corporeal things. As to the qualities, they imagine that this air may be qualify'd four several ways, which are chin, pien, tung, se. The first, streight, constant, pure; the second, crooked, inconstant, foul; the third, sharp and piercing; the fourth, obtuse and thick. Ching and tung are good, they who receive them become men. Pien and se are bad, those that receive them become beasts, plants, &c.

Men.

3. The two good ones are subdivided into perfect and imperfect, pure and sullied.
 Those who receive the perfect part of ching, and the pure of tung, are wise and heroes, who are naturally born such, and act according to reason, never doing any thing contrary to it, in which they excel all other men, and are therefore held in great honour and veneration. They who at their birth receive the imperfect part of ching, and the thick part of tung, are ignorant men, ill livers, and of bad customs. They call them ju jin, who have nothing but the shape of men, and in other respects are like beasts. There is a mean betwixt these two sorts of men whom they call bien jin, that is, prudent and virtuous men.

4. After the same manner the two ill parts of air are subdivided. Those that receive the perfect and pure part of these become beasts, and even among them there is another subdivision; those that receive the imperfect thick part, become plants, herbs, &c.

5. By which it appears, that they were so far from having any knowledge of the creation out of nothing, by virtue of an infinite power, that they did not so much as understand the true generation of matter and substantial form, but only conceiv'd an accidental alteration and change of figure and qualities, pre-supposing the common homogeneous matter of all things, which is the very air, eternal, ingenerable and incorruptible in its substance; yet alterable by motion and stillness, heat and cold, rarity and condensation, &c. This air alone being the essence of all things, as was said above out of those philosophers.

NOTES.

1. This doctrine I have read in the Chinese books, where it is so plain that it may be seen with half an eye. There are material and sensible similies enough to make it somewhat plainer. Of the pure flower of the meal is made the whitest bread, then follows household bread, then brown bread, next to that dogs bread, and last of all bran. After this manner the Chineses talk of their air, whereof there is a part pure and refin'd, he that receives it at his generation, becomes a hero and holy man; he who receives a more imperfect part is wise and virtuous; he that has less is ignorant, the rest are beasts more or less perfect.
 Swine, they say, receive the foulest part of this sort, for they account them the meanest of beasts; then follow the plants in like order, and so other things.

2. That which Monardes brings in his dialogue upon iron, fol. 129. may serve our turn. He says, after Plato, that the heavenly and earthly virtue are the origin of metals. Trismegistus says, The earth is their mother, and heaven their father.
 The Chineses say the same in regard to the production of things. Monardes after Avicene, and other modern authors, is of opinion that sulphur and mercury are the origin of all metals, the first as father, the second as mother. Metals vary as these principles are more pure, or more coarse. So that gold, which is the perfectest of metals, receives the purest part of those principles. Silver, which is more imperfect, takes the virtue or influence of the same origin after a more imperfect manner; then follow the rest. Thus it is the Chineses NAVAsign, and has been explain'd. I oppos'd RETTE. this error several ways in my books, GOD grant it may do some good. Other ancient Europeans affirm'd the same the author mentions in the fourth paragraph. See S. Thomas, opusc. 15. c. 1.

PRELUDE X.

That the Chineses know no spiritual Substance distinct from the material, but only one more or less material.

Spirit. 1. Allowing what has been said, it plainly appears that the Chineses knew nothing of any spiritual substance, distinct from the material, such as God, angels, and the rational soul; which is further confirm'd by their being ignorant of the creation out of nothing by an infinite power. They only knew of an universal, immense, and infinite substance, from which proceeded their tai kie, or primogeneous air, which contains the same universal substance, and investing itself by motion and stillness, with several qualities and accidents, becomes the immediate matter of all things.

Bdy. 2. This substance they divide into two parts, ju and vu. The first is all the corporeal substance with a material figure and body, and is condense and solid; so that being struck upon or touch'd, it resists and sounds. The second is a substance not so material, such as this air they imagine, nor has it any body, shape, or sound, and therefore cannot be seen or felt, for which reason they call it nothing and emptiness, in China vu kung, hui, vu hing, vu se, &c. And advancing still further in the consideration of this substance, as far as only concerns its entity, abstracting from any quality or accident, they call it tai vu, tai kung, and other names which shew it to be most pure, most absolute, simple, and rarify'd in the highest degree, as we represent the spiritual substance.

3. But let no man imagine that this substance which the Chineses assign, can be spiritual in the sense that we take spiritual things. For in the first place, it cannot exist of itself but in that primogeneous air, from which it can never be separated.

accidents and qualities, and therefore makes the being of all things, or to speak more properly, is the being and substance of them all. 3. Because they call those things which seem spiritual both to ancients and moderns, ki, that is air, or airy qualities. And particularly Confucius being ask'd by one of his disciples what angels or spirits were; he answer'd, they were air. See the sixteenth chapter of chung jung, which treats of this subject, and sing li, tract. 28.

NOTES.

1. Other ancients held that opinion. S. Thomas mentions it, opusc. 15. cap. 7.

2. From this doctrine of the learned sect I infer, that we cannot make use of the word vu, to express the mere nothing and creation of the world, because the said word does not exclude the materia prima; and if I say God created heaven and earth out of vu, I shall say he created them, not out of mere nothing, but out of that matter. Nor can we use the word jeu, to express the nature of God, angels, and our soul, because it signifies a corporeal substance. This point requires much attention.

3. The Chinese books themselves own, that li, the universal substance, cannot exist of itself. F. Matthew Riccius, Julius Aleni, and others, assert the same. Hence they infer it is a very imperfect accident or substance; but the Chineses own it is no actuality or intelligence. Nevertheless Clement Chu Fi Cbi a Christian, contended with me that li was our God; if he is to be sav'd by him, bad will be his lot. This is the benefit of following the Chinese texts.

PRELUDE XI.

Of the Spirits or Gods the Chineses adore, according to the Sect of the Learned.

1. THOU' by what has been already said, it is easy to conceive what sort of spirits those are, which they reckon after their manner as gods; nevertheless because this is the principal point as to these con-troverfies, 'tis fit to handle it a little more at large, laying down what it is the learned sect says of these spirits which relate to our purpose.

2. It

NAVARETTE. 2. It is to be observ'd, that according to this sect, all there is or can be in this world proceeds from li, which comprehends tai kie, i. e. the materia prima, or universal substance of all things; and the primogeneous air, which is the materia proxima of all; and that from li, quatenus li, flow the five virtues, which are piety, justice, religion or worship, prudence, and credit or faith, with all their habits, and other spiritual matters. From the same li, qualified by the primogeneous air, flow the five elements we mention'd, with all other corporeal qualities and figures. So that with the Cbineses, as well the moral as physical part proceeds from the same source, that is their li, which is the being of all things, as has been said. Whence came that sentence of Confucius, that all his doctrine was reducible to one point, viz. li, the most universal reason and substance.

3. Thirdly observe, that as li does not produce the things of this world but by means of kie, which is its conjunct instrument, so neither does it govern them but by the same means; whence it is that the operations as well relating to the production as to the government of things, are commonly attributed to kie, as the instrumental and formal cause to li. As for instance, we say, the understanding conceives, and the will loves; whereas it is the soul that conceives and loves by means of those her faculties.

4. Observe further, that according to this sect, when the years of the world's continuance are at an end, this universe will expire, with all that is in it, and all return to its first principle from whence it flowed; so that nothing will remain but only the pure li, accompanied by its helpmate kie. Then the same li shall produce another universe after the same manner, which ending, another will succeed, and so another without end.

Spirits. 5. Observe yet further, that the first ground of assigning spirits in Cbina, as well as in other heathen countries, was for two reasons. First, Because they saw that heaven and earth, with the other universal causes, performed their operations very sure and orderly, and thence they conjectur'd there was some invisible author or principle that govern'd within them, which they call cheu, that is, lord; cheu zai, that is, president; xin cui, that is, the spirit going out and returning; ti kiun, that is, king or emperor. The second cause was, the great benefits they perceiv'd men receiv'd by means of those spirits, and therefore they thought themselves oblig'd to honour and worship them with several sacrifices, as is said in the book li ki, lib. VIII. pag. 47. which is the name of their book of rites and ceremonies.

6. It is yet further to be observ'd, that the Cbineses, even from the origin of their empire, which properly had its beginning in the emperors Jao and Xun, ador'd those spirits, as appears by their doctrine call'd xu king, lib. I. pag. 11. where four sorts of sacrifices are set down, which us'd to be offer'd to four kinds of spirits. The first call'd lui, was offer'd to heaven, and to its spirit, which is Xang Ti. The second term'd in, was to the spirit of the six principal things, that is, of the four seasons of the year, of heat, cold, sun, moon, stars, rain, and drought. The third they stile uang, to the spirits of mountains and rivers of note. The fourth pien, was offer'd to all the multitude of other spirits, belonging to all the small parts of the universe, and to the men of note in the commonwealth.

7. All the spirits the Cbineses adore, are the same identical substance with the things in which they are. This is made out; 1. By the common axiom, all things are the same. 2. Because Cbung Zu a classick author, speaking of xang ti, the spirit of heaven, positively says, it is the very same thing as heaven; then a fortiori, or at least a simile, the same must be said of the spirits of other things. 3. Confucius in cbung jung, pag. 11. says of all spirits, that they constitute the being and substance of all things, and cannot be separated from them, but they must be destroy'd.

8. If any man object, that these spirits are often taken for the operative virtue and actuality of things: I answer, 1. That it is true, yet that does not imply but they are also taken for that substance, adorn'd with that operative virtue; but this rather is the most usual sense, insomuch, that as I said, according to Confucius, they make the very being of things. 2. That taking the spirits for the pure virtue and actuality of things, the notion of them becomes the meaner, as of a quality or accident which cannot subsist of itself.

9. A second conclusion. All spirits had a beginning, because they all proceeded from tai kie, and the most universal substance of all things, and so they are posterior and inferior to it. Hence it is that the doctor V. Puen Ju said, that xang ti was the son and creature of tai kie, and that the same must be said of our Tien Cheu, that is, of our God, if he was the same as xang ti. It evidently appears then, that what the Cbineses conceive under this name xang ti, cannot be our God.

10. Third conclusion. All spirits will end when this world ends, and return to their first principle. This is prov'd by the doctrine of the third observation, and confirm'd by what doctor Chey Keng Ju one of the court of exchequer says, that as well lien

Shien chu, as xang li, and all other spirits, must have an end, nothing remaining but li, the most universal substance; whence he infer'd, that according to the Chinese doctrine, there was nothing greater nor better than the said li.

11. Fourth conclusion. All the spirits or gods of this sect are equally perfect as to their being, and are one greater or less; with regard to the places and things they preside over. This is prov'd by the simile of water, which is in several vessels of gold, silver, copper, &c. The water is the same, the difference is only in the vessels. The same they say of spirits, which are the very same li, or tai kie, but placed in several vessels, as heaven, earth, mountains, &c.

12. Fifth conclusion. All these spirits are void of life, knowledge, understanding, or liberty. First; Because they all proceed from that most universal substance li, which according to the principles of this sect wants all these things, as was said prelude 5. Numb. 2. Secondly, Because in their xuking, lib. I. p. 35. they positively say, the heaven, which is the chief thing in the world, neither sees, hears, understands, loves, nor hates, &c. Whence it follows, that either there is no spirit in heaven, or if there be it is the self-same substance with it, and consequently neither sees, hears, nor understands.

13. Thirdly, This is prov'd, because heaven and earth, as is said in the philosophy, lib. XXVI. p. 16, 17. are void of reason, that is, of will and deliberation, but do all things by a certain natural propension, just as fire burns, and a stone tends downwards. Fourthly, In disputing upon this subject, the earth is parallel'd with heaven. Now the earth, 'tis most certain, neither understands, nor has life; and consequently the same must be said of heaven. And in regard this is said with respect to the operations which properly belong to spirits, it plainly appears, that when they say such operations are not done by choice, or a rational will, it must also be concluded, that the spirits of heaven, earth, and other things, are void of life, understanding, or liberty. Which is further confirm'd by the general persuasion of the Chinese, that he who does well shall be rewarded naturally and of necessity; and so he that does ill shall be punished: as he is warm'd that draws near the fire, and grows cold who is among the snow. This implies, that the affairs of this world are not govern'd by a supreme providence, but by chance, or according to the course of natural causes.

For the better clearing of this point, some questions are here put and answer'd.

14. The first question is this; if the spirits are one and the same substance with the things they are in, why do they assign the name of spirits apart from the things? The answer is; That this name is given to denote the formality of acting, forasmuch as the said action proceeds from an occult principle, which after some manner rules within the things in the nature of a spirit. And sometimes it denotes the very substance of the things, in as much as it is singular; pure, rare, and very near incorporeal, which is the reason the operations are wonderful and inscrutable.

15. Quest. 2. If these spirits, as to their essence, are the very universal li, how can it be said they proceeded from it? Answer; They were produced like all other things which proceed from the said li, which is superadding some accidental form or formality, whereby they become formally another distinct thing from the very universal li; and this is sufficient to justify the saying they are produced from it. The same argument holds as to what is said, that the spirits shall have an end, or be destroy'd, and the active virtue of li shall cease at the end of the world; and then only the substance of li shall remain, being stripped of all the qualities and formalities it was possess'd of before.

16. Quest. 3. If li of itself has not actuality, as has been mention'd before; how comes it to be said, that it is the same thing with the spirit whose nature is to be active? Answer; The substance of li, which consider'd in itself had no actuality, begins to have it after producing its ki, that is, its primogeneous air, which is its conjunct instrument. Thus the operations of the spirits radically belong to li, instrumentally to ki, and formally to the spirits themselves.

17. Quest. 4. If there be no spirit in things distinct from their substance, when sacrifices are offer'd to heaven, earth, &c. Who are these sacrifices directed to? Answer; The Chinese generally follow the customs they receiv'd from their ancestors, without examining who it is they offer sacrifice to, whether to the things they see, or to their operative virtue, or to some spirit that may perhaps be in them, insomuch that Confucius set it down as a general rule to them, that they should not enquire into what cannot be seen. Answ. 2. The most learned and best read men in their sect, acknowledge no more in those things they offer sacrifice to, but the substance of li and its ki, as plainly appears by the doctrine of Confucius, in the sixteenth chapter of chung jung, where after shewing that spirits are composing parts of the being of things, and that therefore they cannot be separated from them without their destruction; he presently adds concerning the said spirits, that

NAVA. that they cause themselves to be honour'd BETTE. and respected by men, inducing them to compose themselves interiorly and exteriorly, and to offer them sacrifices. This point deserves particular observation, as the principal foundation of the learned sect.

18. Quest. 5. Granting that many think there are such spirits, and that they are a living and understanding being, and that this was believ'd before the coming of the sect of the idols, even from the time of the kings Jao and Xun, and so mention is made of them in the ancient doctrines, as if they liv'd and took care of human affairs. Granting this, what say the learned Chineses to it? Answer. All the learned Chineses of note, both ancient and modern, do unanimously deny there are any living spirits, and of a different substance from the places and things in which they are, because it would imply a contradiction in the very principles of their philosophy, according to which all things are the same, as has been said. As to the multitude, and the ways of speaking and expressing themselves we find in authors, it is to be observ'd, that there are two sorts of spirits assign'd, one that is call'd of generations and corruptions, the other of sacrifices. The first are physical spirits, by which they say are signify'd the natural things of the generations and corruptions there are in the world; and these are sometimes taken for the substance of the things operating, other times for the qualities and formality of acting. The others are the civil spirits which were brought into the commonwealth, to restrain the multitude and keep them in awe, by believing there are several spirits in heaven, the earth, mountains, &c. which can do harm to men, as the ancients said of Jupiter, Mars, &c.

19. In short, it is requisite all our missionaries be acquainted with so essential a point of these controversies, which is, that in these sects there is a secret doctrine for the wise which they account true, and a plain doctrine for the ignorant which they look upon as false. For which reason there is no laying any stress on the texts of their doctrines, in which they designedly express themselves, so as the multitude may imagine there are living spirits and gods, and accordingly may reverence and fear them.

20. But it is requisite to hold fast to the principles of their philosophy, understanding every thing as the masters of the sects do, that is, according to the sense and direction of the classick expositors. And to shew this is the true Chinese doctrine, I will mention some famous authors, who handle this article ex professo, and conclude, there are no other spirits besides natural things themselves.

NOTES.

1. From what has been and shall be said it follows, that the sect of the learned has a religious worship; which is agreed to by the fathers Gouvea in his history, Semedo in his Chinese-empire, pag. 73, and 115: and other authors. It is also a plain inference that the learned are idolaters. What matter tho' this man or the other of their own head deny it? S. Augustin, lib. XIX: cont. Faust. Manich. cap. 1. says thus; Men cannot be united under any name of religion, whether true or false, unless they are knit together in fellowship by some certain seals or sacraments. Since all nations in the world, tho' barbarous, have had their sorts of religion; why or wherefore will they deny this to the Chinese nation, which they extol above others, and even above the clouds? or what matter is it tho' they ador'd not images, as if the idolatry without images were not the first and antientest? S. Paul, Rom. i. They worshipped and serv'd the creature rather than the creator. S. Thomas, lect. 7. For they worship'd the heavenly bodies, and air, and water, and the like, according to that of Wisd. xiii. Either fire or air, &c. And herein he blames the folly of the Gentiles, who tho' they never believ'd there was any deity in images, as Hermes his followers believ'd; nor did imagine the fabulous stories the poets told of the gods to be true; yet they gave divine worship to some Creatures. See 2. 2. q. 122. art. 2. ad. 2. and Cajetan, in Rom. i. on the words, And they worship'd and serv'd. More shall be said to this point in another place. Tho' the Chineses were guilty only of observing days, hours, &c. which S. Paul, Galat. iv. forbids, it were enough to our purpose. S. Thomas, lect. 3. You observe fortunate and unfortunate days, months, times, and years; that is, the constellations and course of the heavenly bodies, all which things take their original from idolatry, &c. Therefore they that observe such differences of times, worship the heavenly bodies, and order their actions according to the judgment of the stars, which have no direct impression on the will of man, &c. and in these to observe the course of the stars, belongs to idolatry. Can any man in the world excuse the Chineses from this idolatry?

2. That doctrine is evidently plain in the twenty eighth treatise of the great Chinese philosophy. The same error is imputed to Origen. Something was said to it above, and more shall be added in the second tome.

3. Thence we gather it is groundless to say, that those are no sacrifices, which are offer'd to Confucius and the dead, because they do it in acknowledgment for benefits receiv'd; for they sacrifice to heaven, the earth, &c. on the same account. And this is assign'd as the reason in the books concerning those sacrifices. See F. Semedo, p. 125.

7. According to that doctrine, the Chineses were idolaters from the beginning. Read the same F. Semedo, p. 119, 125. and in other places of his empire of China. The fathers Brancato and Fabre may read this, and they will understand, that lui is to sacrifice to heaven, not chai; and that the Chineses have sacrificed to famous men many ages ago.

8. That doctrine is so plain in the Chinese books, that I think it needless to add any more concerning it. In my relations I mention'd what F. Gouvea writ to the purpose; it is in the foregoing book.

9. For the love of CHRIST see what a god has been preach'd in China, and there are some will still preach him: how is it possible the learned sect should be converted? how can they that are converted be saved through faith in such a god? how can our holy faith chuse but be check'd in China and Japan? and Tien Cheu, whom we have all preach'd up as our God, is in effect the same as that King above, or of the upper region; what can we say? in short, it was not for nothing the learned Chineses daily said to us, In fine, heaven is the Lord; for those words, according to their sect, bear that sound or sense. Then in vain have we labour'd and run; light was forsaken, and we were left in the dark. This I say, because so essential a point ought to have been sent to Rome. That god was preached to comply with the opinion of some learned Chinese Christians, in order to gain the good will of the professors of the learned sect. The bonzo quoted above, very well observ'd and set it out, they would gain their good wills, but it ought to have been by enlightning their understandings. Origen, hom. 3. in cap. xiii. Esdr. says thus, God deliver us from such masters, who wheresoever they are, rend and divide the church, speaking according to the inclination of the bearers. He gives the reason, Because there are more lovers of pleasure, than of God. What is it to preach him up for god who is not so? do they call this prudence and wisdom? Wo unto you who are wise in your own eyes! says Isa. v. 21. And Corn. à Lapide, Who govern your selves by your own human and politick advice, not by the law and will of GOD, not by the divine prudence and counsel; who rely more on your own judgment, than the prophets, &c. Some say, that we Friers spoil and disturb all through our ignorance and indiscretion. But S. Thomas upon S. Paul, Gal. vi. As many as desire to make a fair shew in the flesh, lect. 3. *For the Jews persecuted the NAVA-disciples of CHRIST for preaching the cross, RETTE. 1 Cor. i. And this because by preaching of CHRIST the rites of the law were abolish'd. For if the apostles had, together with the cross of CHRIST, preach'd that the ceremonies of the law were to be observ'd, they had never persecuted them, &c. Therefore, that they might not be disturb'd about the faith of CHRIST, and might live in peace, they forced them to be circumcised. But because they may falsely say (S. Thomas goes on) that it was not for this reason they introduced circumcision, but only through zeal of the law; therefore, excluding this, he proves what he said, and adds, but neither they themselves who are circumcised keep the law, &c. For it is manifest, that if thro' zeal of the law they should induce some to observe the law, they would also have commanded the law to be fulfill'd in other respects, viz. in morals, which are more excellent in the law, and in other observances. But therefore it is they will have you circumcis'd, that they may glory among the Jews in your carnal circumcision for making so many proselytes. See Mat. xxiii. 15. There might be zeal, but it ought to have appear'd in obliging them to confess and receive once a year, to hear mass in that time, to abstain from flesh, at least upon Good Friday, and some other things; and not persuade us what they do is thro' zeal of gaining souls. GOD grant it be not (in some I say) That they may glory in their making so many proselytes. The saint, lect. 3. c. 5. observes that CHRIST suffer'd, and S. Paul was persecuted for not allowing the ceremonies of the law. It had not been so, if they had suffer'd them to be observ'd together with the evangelical law, but the Jews would rather have been pleas'd at it. So the learned sect of China is pleas'd that the observation of our holy law be brought to descend to sacrificing to the dead, Confucius, and other things, which they observe according to their traditions. I adhere to the good F. Longobardo, and those of his mind, who had no respect to flesh and blood, nor to other motives, but only to truth.*

11. This number agrees with what Suarez says, lib. II. de superstit. c. 4. n. 17. Whence it is likely they believ'd that every God had a supreme power and virtue in some employment, presidency, or efficacy concerning some things, tho' some were called greater; others lesser, according to the dignity of the things over which they presided.

12. It is the doctrine of S. Thomas, that every occult principle is call'd a spirit. So say the Chineses, and add, that if the plants had not a spirit they could not grow, and be productive. Then the spirit they have is the operative virtue, which is the same I mention'd out of F. Gouvea. PRE-

Of several Authorities of classick Authors, who treat of the Chinese Spirits and Gods.

NAVA- 1. *C*hing Zu upon Cbung Jung, p. 11. explaining the nature and being of spirits, says, they are the operations of heaven and earth, and certain footsteps of the natural generations and corruptions. Where it is to be observ'd, that under the name of operations, he comprehends the operative power or vertue, and under the name of tokens or footsteps, he also means the being and essence of natural things.

2. The same author, lib. XXVIII. of the great philosophy, p. 37. says, that the spirits, Je King speaks of, are the generations and corruptions; that is, are the causes of generations and corruptions, which is the proper subject of that book.

3. Here this author asks, what the clouds and rain are, which proceed from the waters? He answers, they are effects of the smokes and vapours of the air; and giving this for granted, he further infers, that when men sacrifice to the spirit of rain, they only sacrifice to the air, which is the true cause of it; and he further proves, that it is ignorance to go to ask rain at the temples of the statues of wood or clay, which have no rain, and to leave the mountains and water, which are the proper place for it. By which it plainly appears, that this author acknowledges no other spirits, but the air, of which the substance of the mountains and waters is compos'd.

4. The same author, lib. XXIX. p. 11. speaking of the difference betwixt heaven, and the king above, or of the upper region, says: Taken as to its shape, and celestial body, it is call'd heaven; in respect to its government it is call'd a governor: in regard to its great subtilty, it is call'd imperceptible: in regard to its operations it's call'd a spirit: in respect to its nature and property, it is call'd strong; and all these things in reality are the same, and are only distinguish'd by name and formality. This place ought to be taken particular notice of, because since it says that the king above, or of the upper region, which is the spirit of heaven, is the very same thing with heaven, the same must of consequence be said of the spirits of the mountains, waters, &c.

5. Chang Zu in the twenty eighth book of philosophy, pag. 38. says, the spirits are nothing but solidity and fulness; that is, the universal substance of the aforementioned li, and its primogeneous air, which is immense and infinite, and consequently fills all things. Therefore the expositor Liu Kien Cbung applies to it that of Cbung Jung, pag. 11. that he is above on the right and left hand, that is, every where, as air is in all places, since there is no vacuum in nature.

6. The same author upon Cbung Jung, pag. 11. says, that spirits are the power or actuality of the hot or cold air, which they call in jang, and are the cause of the generations and corruptions that happen in the world.

7. Cbu Zu, lib. XXVIII. of the philosophy, pag. 2. asks the question, Are the spirits air? He answers, They seem to be the life, vigour, and actuality that is in the air.

8. Page 3. the same author says, that rain, wind, dew, hail, sun, moon, day and night, are all tokens and effects of spirits; and that there are clear, universal and good spirits. As for those that are said to sound upon bridges, and beat in the breast (such as are in people possess) these are they that are call'd crooked, false and dark spirits, which sometimes are, sometimes are not, go and come, disperse and gather. There are also some spirits of whom it is said, that if you ask them, they answer; and if you intreat them, they grant. These are also call'd spirits, and are the very li, that is, the universal substance and being of all things, as they are all this same substance; and all the difference betwixt them is, that one is gross, the other rare, one great, the other small.

9. The same author, pag. 38. proves there are spirits, thus: if there were no spirits, the ancients would not ask any thing of them; now we see they abstain'd seven days from the use of matrimony, and fasted three days, in order to make their prayers to the things that are seen, or are not seen; then of necessity we must suppose there are such things. Now the emperor sacrifices ^{Sacrifices} to heaven and earth, therefore it is certain there is heaven and earth. Princes and dukes offer sacrifice to the famous mountains and rivers. Gentlemen offer the five sacrifices, therefore it is certain, that there is the great gate of two leaves, there is the way, there is the little gate of one leaf; there is a hearth and inward court. When any thing is seen now that is wonderful in the temples of our forefathers, it is nothing but the air of the mountains and waters that is gather'd there. After much time past, if those temples were destroy'd and cast down by men, then those wonders would cease. The cause of it may be, that the air of those places is spent. Hence it is plainly plainly to be infer'd, that spirits are nothing but the actuality of the air, and to it are directed the sacrifices which are made to heaven, earth, mountains, rivers, bridges, the hearth, and the temples of the dead.

10. The same author puts the question further: when sacrifice is offer'd to heaven, earth, mountains, and waters, and victims are slain, pieces of silk burnt, and wine poured forth; is this done to shew the affection of the heart, or because there is really any such air, which comes to receive those offerings? He answers, If we should say, there is nothing comes to receive what is offer'd, to whom then do we sacrifice? and what thing is it that is above, which moves to respect, and makes men offer sacrifice to, and fear it? nevertheless if we should say there is some chariot of clouds in which that thing comes down, it will be a great falsehood and lie.

11. Pag. 39. speaking of the name of the spirit of heaven, which is the same with the king of the upper region, he says it is call'd xin, because the air of heaven always spreads. By which it plainly appears there is no living or intelligent spirit in heaven, but only the substance of the air with its actuality and influence.

12. He further asks in the same place: When sons sacrifice to their parents and grandfathers, is it certain they look for them, as the very air of themselves? (that is, do they consider them as one and the same thing with the air within themselves?) When they sacrifice to the spirits of other persons or things, how is this done? do they come to receive the sacrifices, or no? He answers, that children are undoubtedly the same immutable substance with their fathers and grandfathers. When they sacrifice to other persons or things, they are oblig'd on some just account to do it. Wherefore Confucius says, sacrifice to your parents as if they were present. When the emperor sacrifices to heaven, heaven is a thing he ought to sacrifice to, and its very air resembles the emperor. Then how can it forbear coming and accepting of the sacrifice? When the dukes and princes sacrifice to the household-gods, and to the gods of the five nourishments, they offer equal sacrifice to them, because of the resemblance of the same air that is common to them; then how can they but come to accept the sacrifices? At present they sacrifice to Confucius, but this is only done in the schools of the universities, that they may conceit the likeness of his air. If any shall say, that heaven, earth, mountains, &c. are things permanent, and therefore when sacrifices are offer'd to them, it may be that their spirits may come to the sacrifices; but as for dead-men, their air is now NAVADISPERS'D, can it then be made to come to RETTE. receive the sacrifice? He answers, that there is only one and the same air, which from the beginning was imparted to grandfathers, fathers, and thro' them to sons and grandsons. All this is taken from the aforesaid author, by which it manifestly appears, that according to the sect of the learned, all spirits, as well of men, as of heaven, earth, &c. are nothing but air, an homogeneous body, and common beings of all things, and consequently that they know of no spiritual substance distinct from the corporeal, existing of itself, living and understanding.

13. Cbin Pe Ki, lib. XXVIII. of the philosophy, p. 40. says, that when the ancients sacrificed to heaven, earth, &c. they always placed a statue; the reason was, because heaven, earth, &c. are only the being of the hot and cold air, which they call in jang; and by using this statue, they intended that the hot or cold air should gather in that statue, that so their sacrifice might not be offer'd in vain. When they shed the wine, burnt perfumes, slew victims, and offer'd pieces of silk, all was to express the true respect of their heart. This being done, immediately the air of heaven and earth met to fulfil the desires of those that sacrificed.

14. Cbu Kung Zien upon chung jung, pag. 48. says, the spirits the learned sect speaks of, are of two sorts; the first is that of natural generations and corruptions. We have already spoke of it.

NOTES.

1. All the author mentions in this place, I have often heard and seen, I wish others had done so too. It is a thing well known that the Chinese sacrifices are offer'd to the air; let him that denies it make out what he says, and answer the author.

2. Had he call'd those only that are offer'd to the dead, and to Confucius, sacrifices, we might have done the same, without deserving to be reflected on; and many others of the same society having done the same, who can justly blame or complain of the two religious orders? The same holds as to their temples.

3. Whosoever justifies the sacrifices we have spoken of, and what is contain'd in the third paragraph answering to this, will also justify those which are offer'd to the dead; either they are all good, or all bad. Let it be well consider'd whether this may pass as a political ceremony; we say it cannot, and very grave missionaries of the society are of the same opinion. Others say it may, and practise it; let them look to it.

P R E L U D E XIII.

That all the Spirits, or Gods of China, are reduced to one, that is, their Li, or Tai Kie.

NAVA-
RETTE.

1. WE must observe in this place, that the Chinese idolatry in a great measure resembles that of Europe; and laying aside at present other things wherein they agree together, I will only mention that which relates to assigning one only GOD, which they imagin'd to be the substance and being of the universe. S. Aug. 4. de civit. Dei, cap. 10, 11, 12. proves out of the ancient Roman, Greek and Egyptian writers, that several gods the old philosophers introduced were in effect one and the same thing; that is, that there is but one thing, which is all things, all the gods, the soul of the world, and the world itself. Whence we may gather that the ancients thought all to proceed from the infinite chaos, as they imagin'd it to be the first material principle, and materia prima, persuading themselves it was the same thing with the particular parts of the world: and thus they grounded all their multitude of gods and idolatries on these physical notions. And it is evident, as the same saint says, that this opinion was receiv'd and current in Asia, thence communicated to the Greeks and Egyptians, and from them to the Romans. Read the saint's own words.

2. Lewis Vives upon the words of the saint, cap. 12. If the spirit of the world is God, &c. says, it was Pythagoras his opinion, that all things were part of GOD, which implies, that there is but one thing in the world, that is, the chaos, or materia prima, which they call'd GOD, or the mind. This, says he, was the opinion of Pythagoras, which Virgil expresses, Æneid. 6. Principio calum ac terras, &c.

3. This plainly shews what opinion they held concerning all things being one and the same, from which they proceed, and to which they return; which made them call it GOD, as knowing nothing superior to it. The Chinese have the same notion of their li, which is the same as, the nature of a mind, and the directing rule of all nature, &c. or their tai kie, which is the same as, the bosom of all nature, containing in itself virtually or confusely all possible things; imagining that the said li is the universal substance, which fills and governs the universe. They have a thousand passages in their books upon this subject, I will here insert two or three of the chiefest.

4. (1.) To prevent any mistake in the names, it is to be observ'd, that their li, together with their tai kie, are the same substance of the first principle, only distinguishable in some certain formality proper to every thing: for li denotes the entity in particular, without any other circumstance; and tai kie denotes the same entity, in as much as it is the ground and root of all things, being in the midst of them, as the north pole is in the midst of heaven, and the king in the midst of his kingdom.

5. (2.) In the twenty sixth book of the philosophy, pag. 28. tai kie is said to be the cause why the heaven moves, and the earth always stands still, and men and causes perform their operations without ceasing; and shewing the reason of it, says, that the li, or tai kie is within the said things, as governor and director of them, which is the very office assign'd to spirits. Ching Zu expresses it in the definition of the king above, or of the upper region, saying, he is so call'd because he governs.

6. (3.) In the first book of the said philosophy, pag. 31. it is shewn how the li predominates over the things of the world, and therefore there is no defect in them, so that when the heat goes away the cold comes; when the sun draws off, the moon comes up: in spring things sprout, in summer they grow, in autumn they come to perfection, and in winter are preserv'd; which was ever so, because there was a predominancy and government of the solid and true li.

7. It is also said in lib. XXVI. pag. 9. that the tai kie is the ground and cause of the production, and end of the world. Before the world was produced, tai kie was the cause of heaven, earth, men and other things. Tai kie shall again be the cause at the end of the world, that men and things should have an end, and heaven and earth should again be united in the chaos. But tai kie is always the same at the beginning or end, it can neither increase nor diminish. From these and such like discourses there are in the Chinese books concerning li and tai kie, it may be gather'd, that there neither is, nor can be any thing greater in the opinion of the Chinese. Some queries of consequence may occur in this place.

8. (1.) If tai kie, or li, is so great, as has been said, why do not the Chinese sacrifice to it, and commend their affairs to it, as they do to lesser things? They answer, first, That sacrifices being instituted for the well governing of the people, it was thought convenient they should be offer'd to things that could be seen, and understood

Li.

derstood by the multitude, such as heaven, earth, mountains, &c. with the spirits, and operative virtues they acknowledge to be in those things. As for tai kie, they leave it aside without any sort of worship, as being most occult, and which is not to be enquir'd into by the people, according to Confucius his rule. They answer in the second place, That the wisest of the learned sect think not themselves oblig'd to these sacrifices, judging them to be a mere political ceremony, or are satisfy'd with offering them to particular spirits, supposing them to be parts of the universal spirit. Therefore doctor V. Puen Su said, he might well adore the dish of cha he then held in his hand, as knowing that tai kie was in it, after the same manner as it is heaven, and in all other parts of the world.

9 (2.) The question is, how is it to be understood that tai kie is the universal spirit, and the spirits of heaven, earth, &c. are as it were parts of it? Answ. According to the doctrine of the learned sect several comparisons may be brought to make it out. 1. Of water in general, compar'd with particular waters, as the sea with rivers and fountains. 2. Of our soul which governs the whole body in general, and each limb in particular. 3. Of nature, and the universal essence, which may be look'd upon in its being abstracted from individuals, and conjunct, or concrete in regard to them. 4. Of the materia prima, which being a general ens, is divided into several second matters, according to the variety of qualities it puts on. 5. Of a lump of wax, which being melted, may be chang'd into several shapes of trees, flowers, beasts, &c. and after that being again dissolv'd, remains still the same original wax it was at first.

10. By these comparisons it may be easily understood, that tai kie is the universal substance and spirit of the whole world, and the particular spirit and substance of each part of it, which their philosophy in one place expressly declares thus: All things are one and the same tai kie; upon which the comment adds a more universal clause to this effect, which is that every thing has its tai kie. The very same thing in terminis, is said of the li, lib. XXVI. p. 1. Li is one, but its parts are many: speaking in general of heaven, earth and all things, there is but one li; but speaking of men, and other things in particular, each of them has its li.

11. The third query. By what has been said, it is only prov'd that there is one universal substance in the world, and all its parts; but it does not so plainly appear, that the universal spirit is one and the same NAVARETTE. with the particular spirits; therefore the question is now ask'd, wherein consists the formal reason of a spirit according to the Chinese answer? It being prov'd that there is but one substance in the world, the same argument proves there is one universal spirit. The reason is, because the substance and spirit are not two things, but one and the same, taken under two formalities, one of the proper entity, the other of its operation, or of the entity it self, in as much as it is the principle of operation; therefore as the substance is the same throughout the universe, and in each of its parts, so the spirit is equally one and the same, tho' it be universal, in as much as it governs the universe, and particularly in as much as it governs its parts. This point I heard very well handled by doctor Hoang Jun Tai, and doctor Cheu Mo Kien, both great mandarines, and by others well vers'd in the affairs of their sects.

12. The fourth query: Allowing what has been said concerning the universal spirit, the question is now concerning the spirit of heaven, call'd the king of the upper region, what proportion it bears to the other spirits? Answ. In some points they agree, and in some they differ. They agree first in the substantial entity, which is the same in them all with that of the first principle, for which among them there is no greater or less nobility or perfection, but they are all equal. 2. In their origin, because they were all produced from the tai kie, when heaven, earth, and other things were produced, and are the same thing with them, so that they cannot be parted. 3. In their final determination, because they must all have an end, when those things end whose spirits they were, which will be at the end of the world, when the great year shall expire, as has been said.

13. They differ, 1. As to the places in which they reside, for some are greater, some less. 2. In their qualities and other accidental dispositions, which are agreeable to the places they belong to. 3. In their operations, which are more or less perfect according to the places and qualities on which they depend. Let this suffice to shew that all the spirits or gods of the Chinese are reduced to one only, which is the first principle, call'd li, or tai kie; which being the materia prima, or the air, according to the learned sect, is a lively image of the European Jupiter, and therefore those verses of Valerius Sorianus, Jupiter omnipotens, &c. may be apply'd to them both.

NAVA-
RETTE.

NOTE.

The same question, and with much more reason, may be put to F. Trigaucius, and others who say the Chineses had the knowledge of the true GOD. Notwithstanding all this, lib. I. cap. 10. fol. 52. he says, Tho' the learned Chineses, as I have said, know one supreme GOD, yet they erect no temple to him, nor appoint any place to worship him, nor have they any priests or ministers of their religion, or any solemn or set ceremonies, &c. But he gives not the reason of it. It seems impossible and incredible, that if they knew GOD, they should have no form or ceremonies to worship him. They have them for a thousand other purposes, and erect temples to heaven, earth, other spirits, and the dead; and is it likely they would erect none to GOD? The god that father speaks of in this place, is the li, or tai kie; but I believe in no such god. In reference to the answer that mandarin gave, read cardinal Hugo de incarn. disp. 37. sect. 1. num. 2.

In the first treatise of philosophy, there is the simile of a piece of quicksilver, which divides it self into a great many parts, and again unites, the piece remaining as whole as at first. It seems to me pat to the purpose. All these points shall be handled in the second tome.

PRELUDE XIV.

Of several Attributes the Chineses assign to this first Principle, we have already explained.

FOR the better understanding the nature of the first principle and universal substance of all things, I will here set down the names the learned sect gives it.

1. In the first place they call it li, by which they signify it is the being and substance of things, imagining there is an infinite, eternal, ingenerable substance, without beginning or end. This substance with the Chineses, is not only the physical principle of heaven, earth, and other corporeal things, but also the moral principle of virtues, habits, and other spiritual things, whence came the axiom so generally receiv'd, All things are one and the same; and the other, viz. To go to the bottom of things, is to exhaust their nature and being.

2. They call it invisible principle, because that universal substance, consider'd of it self, before it became visible by some change or quality, was altogether invisible, and is so still, if we look upon it with a metaphysical abstraction, in as much as it only regards its entity, strip'd of all qualities and individuating conditions.

3. It is call'd the first and supreme principle, because from it all things flow'd, and must be reduced to it at the end of the world. In its own being it is perfect in the highest degree, and perfection it self.

4. It is call'd the great vacuum, and vast capaciousness, because in that universal being are the beings of all particular things, as the waters of several rivers are in the spring, and in a root is the body, branches, blossoms, and fruit of the tree.

5. It is call'd singular unity, because as in numbers unity is the beginning of them all, tho' it has no principle it self and is indivisible; so among the substances and beings of this world, there is one singular in the highest degree, which is not capable of being divided as to its being, and is the principle of all other beings that are or can be in nature.

6. They call it mix'd and aggregated, because in the being of this principle the beings of all things are virtually together, as it were in the feed; and therefore when this aggregation was distributed in producing this world, the light and pure substance ascended, and became heaven, and the gross substance sunk down and became earth.

7. They call it conglobated and round, because before the production of the world, the first principle was like a round ball which has neither beginning nor end.

8. They call it great vacuum and emptiness, because it can receive and entertain all things within it self, and there is nothing without it.

9. They call it primogeneous or original air, which is at first that universal substance, but dispos'd and prepar'd by the five changes the Chineses imagine (as was said prelude 5. num. 3.) that it may act. So that this air on one side denotes the first quality which flow'd from the li, and serves it as an instrument conjunct; and on the other hand it signifies the very substance of the li already dispos'd to act, so far as according to the rules of good philosophy, actiones sunt suppositorum.

10. They call it, a thing that is in heaven, or contain'd in heaven; because tho' the universal substance of the first principle be in all things in the world as in its indivi-individuals, yet it is said to be chiefly in heaven, which is the most excellent thing in the universe, and more than any other shews its mighty efficiency and causality.

11. They call it the gift of heaven, because heaven (with regard to second causes) being the most general cause which always concurs, and has the greatest share in the causality of the production of things, it is said to communicate to them the universal nature and substance of the li, and therefore it is call'd the gift of heaven.

12. They call it the natural condition and rule of heaven, for as much as it causes all things to be guided and governed in due method or order; yet not by any intellectual sense or rational choice, but only by a natural order and propension.

13. They call it the nature of things, that is, in as much as that universal nature of the first principle is communicated to particular things; as for instance, if we should regard the matter of any metal as it is in several vessels.

14. They call it the supreme solidity and fulness, because nature and the universal entity fills all things, nay, is the entity and being of them all. This is discours'd upon from the twentieth to the twenty fifth chapter of their chung jung; where it is to be observ'd, that the said universal nature of the first principle is stretch'd out within and without the universe, giving their being to all things, both in a physical and moral sense.

15. To this solidity, or universal entity, the Chinese attribute what we do to the ens commune, that is, unity, truth and goodness. All which the author makes out by positive quotations of the classick books of the learned sect, to number 18.

16. They attribute to it all manner of perfection, as that nothing can be greater; that it is the supreme medium, supreme rectitude, supreme cleanness, supreme purity, supremely spiritual, and supremely imperceptible; in short, it is supreme and perfect in all respects, so that it is capable of no addition.

17. On account of these perfections they said, it is of an incomparable excellency, not to be equal'd, as appears in their lun ju, lib. II. c. v. And tho' in this place the said commendation be given to heaven, yet regard must be had to the stile the learned sect use in their li, that when they would magnify the king of the upper region, they say he is the same thing with heaven; and when they magnify heaven, they say it is the same thing as the li; but when they speak of li, they say it is great of it self, because they imagine it ever was of it self from all eternity, and will be without end; and it is besides, the beginning and end of all things, even of the king above and heaven, as has been proved.

18. Methinks some man may entertain a thought, whether this li, or tai kie, might not be interpreted to be our GOD, since they assign it so many and such excellent properties, which can only suit with God.

Answ. 1. Take heed, take heed, there's a snake in the grass; and a cruel Leviathan lies under the smooth water. No man must suffer himself to be led away by these seeming specious and honourable titles, but thoroughly examine what it is they are apply'd to, which in short is nothing but our materia prima; which is manifestly made out; for notwithstanding they assign it so many perfections, they also attribute to it many imperfections, as our philosophers do.

19. In the first place they say, It cannot exist of it self, but stands in need of the primogeneous air, which is equivalent to our coeval quantity. 2. They say, consider'd as to it self, it is a stupid thing, without life, design, or understanding. 3. That it can do nothing, but by the means of the air, and our qualities, which accidentally flow from it. 4. That it is the subject of all generations and corruptions, taking on it, and casting off several qualities, which, like accidental forms, constitute and distinguish the being of things. 5. That all things in the world are material of necessity, and there can be none properly spiritual. All this may be seen in the twenty sixth and thirty fourth books of their philosophy.

20. Answ. 2. That from all antiquity, there was never any man in Cbina that ador'd the li, or tai kie, or offer'd sacrifice to it, they being all of opinion that religious worship is not to be given to any but visible things, according to the doctrine of li kie, lib. VIII. pag. 42. Whence a most important inference may be made, that the learned Chinese were either very stupid, or else invented an outward religion, without regard to the interior: For if the li, or tai kie, according to them, has no divinity, much less can heaven have it, which is but an effect of tai kie; and still less can the king above have any, being nothing but the operating virtue of heaven; and still less can other inferior spirits or gods have, any which belong to the mountains, waters, and other parts of the world.

NOTES.

I must inform the reader that whatsoever the author mentions in this place, he proves it by positive quotations of the learned sect, which are writ out in the authentick copies, and in the original, which I have seen and read.

The next thing to be observ'd is, that as well F. Matthew Riccius, as F. Julius Aleri,

D d d

NAVA-
RETTE.

NAVA- Aleni, and the rest of the society who have RETTE writ concerning the tai kie, do unanimously own with the author, that it is our materia prima. Nevertheless F. Intorceta in his Chinese wisdom writ, that the said tai kie had been our God to the antient Chinese. If the brethren of the same family differ about such material points, why do they complain of us? F. Trigancius and Morales, some of those that are now in China holding the same opinion, say, that no small number of the ancient Chinese found their salvation in the law of nature, being assisted by that particular grace which God does not use to deny him that does the best that is in his power. It may be so, but I know not how it can be prov'd, if they had no god, the li, tai kie, or king of the upper region. I will make a particular argument upon this subject in the second tome.

The author says, the learned Chinese were very foolish, or feign'd religion. When was not idolatry foolish? says Corn. à Lap. I say they were guilty of both, tho' S. Aug. lib. II de doct. Christ. says, If the philosophers by chance spoke any truths agreeable to our faith, they are not to be fear'd, but to be taken from them as from unjust possessors, and to be apply'd to our use; as the children of Israel took gold from the Egyptians to put it to a better use. But nothing is to be found in the books of the learned Chinese that makes for our holy faith; so that we may say of them the same that Fascic. Temp. 4. etat. fol. 20. writes of Numa Pompilius, and other Romans; It is very much to be admir'd, that these men of excellent-wits, argu'd so sharply upon almost all things that are done under the sun (let us freely apply it to the Chinese) and yet rous'd so wildly as to the knowledge of the true God. We may here add the words of S. Isidorus, lib. V. orig. c. 30. The folly of the Gentiles, which had fram'd to it self such ridiculous forgeries. The fictions and ravings of the Chinese have been seen in this and the second book, and shall appear plainer in another place.

The Fascic. Temp. in the place above-quoted, speaking further to the same purpose, adds: Observe, that holy doctors do not make use of the sayings of the Sibyls and other heathens to confirm the holy christian faith, but declare they had no prophetick spirit, but were possess'd or rous'd. Whence Augustin arguing against Manicheus, says, If it be made out that either the Sibyls, or Orpheus, or any other of the heathen diviners and philosophers deliver'd any truth, it may avail for repressing the vanity of Pagans, but is not to make their authority the more. For as much difference as there is betwixt the preaching of angels, and the confession of devils concerning the coming of CHRIST; so much odds is there between the authority of prophets, and the curiosity of sacrilegious men. S. Antonine quoted above handles the same point. There are those in China, who take chimera's and follies out of the books of that nation, as a principle on which to ground their proof of the incarnation of the Son of God. It is a plain case such proceeding is not justifiable.

What Life and Death is, according to the Sect of the Learned, to make out whether our Soul be immortal, and after what manner.

1. WE must presuppose, first, That all things are the same, and only differ in the outward shape or figure, as has been said. 2. That the substance or entity produces the said qualities, per emanationem, as the material cause, and therefore they cannot be separated from it without being destroy'd. 3. That the universal substance being qualify'd and dispos'd with its primogeneous air, is distributed among the second causes, which are heaven, earth, the elements, &c. And therefore when the second causes operate, the universal substance is operating in the midst of them as first mover, tho' the denomination of the operation is not taken from the universal substance, but from the second causes, as is usual among us; for when they combine to frame mixt bodies, we make no mention of the materia prima, tho' it be in the elements.

2. We must further take along with us four denominations or formalities that belong to the universal substance relating to the matter in hand. 1. That with regard to its own being, or as it is in heaven, it is call'd li. 2. That as it is given by heaven the most general cause, it is call'd ming. 3. As it is receiv'd by things, it has the name of jing. 4. As to its operations, it is term'd chu, chu zai; and this last formality being apply'd to man, they say this chu zai is the heart, which governs all that is in man, whether physical or moral.

3. In the first place, I say, the life of man consists in the unity and agreement of the parts of the entity of heaven and earth in the same man. The entity of heaven is a most pure light air, of a fiery nature; of this the soul is form'd or the vital or animal spirits which they call ou, that is, soul.

soul. The entity of the earth is a gross heavy air, and of an earthly nature, of which the body is form'd with all its humours, which they call pe, that is, a human body or carcase.

4. In the next place I say, death is the separation of those parts from one another, and they return to those places they belong to: so boen, or the soul, ascends towards heaven; pe, or the body, goes to the earth. Xu king, lib. I. p. 16. treats of this point, where the death of king Yao is describ'd in this manner. He ascended, and went down; the comment, that is, he dy'd; because when man dies, the fiery or airy entity ascends towards heaven, and the corporeal mass returns to the earth. It is to be observ'd, that the Chinese here gives our soul the name of air, and so in many other places; therefore it is a corporeal thing, tho' it be very much rarify'd.

5. Thirdly, I say, as to immortality, that when the soul is separated from the body, both parts lose the being they enjoy'd as such, and nothing remains but those entities of heaven and earth, as they were before they join'd to compose man; for which reason the immortality, or permanency belongs no longer to the parts of man that was, but to the two entities of heaven and earth, which as general causes ever continue in their substantial being, and are only chang'd as to accidental form. The same and much more is to be understood of the li and universal substance, which ever continues immoveable in the general causes, without suffering any change, either as to its being or place. All this is expressly set down, lib. XXVIII. p. 41. of the philosophy, out of which I will set down but one saying of Ching Fu, which is this: When man is compos'd and made, which is by the union of the entity of heaven with that of the earth, the universal nature does not come; and when he dies, that is, upon the separation of those two entities, the same universal nature does not depart: but for as much as the pure air, which is the entity of heaven, returns to heaven, and the corporeal mass, which is the entity of the earth, returns to the earth, therefore it may be said, the universal nature departs.

6. By what has been said, we may gather the literal sense of their xi king, lib. VI. pag. 1. where it is written that Vuen Vuang going up and down is by the sides of the king of the upper region; for in the first place, Vuen Vuang is not there, nor his soul, but that part of the heavenly air, which once was the soul of that king. 2. It is said of this air that it ascends and descends, and that it is by that king's sides, to denote that it is of the same nature with all the air of heaven; and for this reason they call the soul of man, after it is separated from the body, jeu boen, that is, a wandering and vagabond soul, like the heavenly air which runs through all quarters. 3. The air of heaven is in this place call'd by the name of king of the upper region, to express its similitude with the air of the soul; for as that predominates and rules in the heavenly body, so does this guide and predominate in man's body; so that this is the formality thro' which the substance of the thing comes to be call'd a spirit, as was said prelude 11. n. 15.

7. Fourthly, I say, that true immortality is not by the Chinese ascrib'd to any thing but the li, or the universal substance, which was before all things, and will remain after they are extinct, after the manner our philosophers us'd to say the same of the materia prima. What the author adds in this place has been set down already. Let Trigaucius and Morales read this answer to it.

NOTES.

1. F. Catanius in his Chinese dictionary, which is famous among the fathers of the society, says the same word for word, and with much reason.

2. Add to what has been said, that there is a place in their philosophy, which positively asserts, that the airy part which ascends to heaven, becomes the same thing with it, which makes our author's design more plain.

3. The Chinese books explicate that place concerning Vuen Vuang, and others like it, very plain; how can we turn them to a sense contrary to all their sect?

PRELUDE XVI.

That the wisest Men of all the learned Sect do all of them at last conclude in Atheism.

Atheists.

1. I Will here treat, as well of the ancients as moderns. As for the latter, F. Matthew Riccius in his history, lib. I. c. 10. affirms, that they are almost all of them atheists. Ages afterwards passing on, that first light was so darkned, that if any happen to abstain from the vain worship of their gods, there are few of them but make a greater fall into atheism. At the end of the same chapter he expresses it more plainly; see F. Trigaucius in this place. This is in relation to the modern Chinese, in which

NAVA- we all agree without the least difference.

RETTE. Of the ancients, the father says in the same place, that they own'd and worship'd one Xang Ti. supreme deity, call'd Xang Ti, that is, king of the upper region, and other inferior spirits, and that consequently they had knowledge of the true God. But I, with the good father's leave, and the leave of others of our society who follow his opinion, am persuaded, that the ancients were as much atheists as they.

2. (1.) By reason of their most universal principle, omnia unum sunt, all things are the same; which may convince the masters of this sect, that either they did not believe there was a God, or else they assign'd a chimerical and monstrous thing for a God, which is as bad as assigning none.

3. (2.) An account of another principle receiv'd in all their schools, that all things in the world proceeded from the tai kie, and are to return to it; whence it follows that the king of the upper region, and other spirits, had a beginning, and will have an end, which is all repugnant to the Deity.

4. (3.) Because of the common opinion of the learned, that this world was produced by chance, and is all govern'd by fate. As also, that men after death return to the vacuum of the first principle, without any reward for the good, or punishment for the bad; whence it is gather'd, that the gods they assign'd for the good government of the state, are to them gods of wood, or stone, without any thing but the outward shew of a deity.

5. To prove that the ancients were atheists, it is enough to say, the modern Cbineses are so, because these are but the mere eccho of the ancients, on whom they build, and whom they quote in their discourses, as well relating to sciences as virtues, but chiefly in matters of religion. And to shew how good grounds I have for what I say, I will set down what I found practis'd, by conversing with several learned men and mandarines.

P R E L U D E XVII.

Of what several learned Men of note said, with whom I discours'd upon the Subject of these Controversies.

S E C T. I.

Of the Heathen learned Chineses.

I. AMONG these, our author says, that doctor V Puen Ju, a great Tien Chu. mandarin, made out, that our Tien Cbu, that is, our God, as we call him in Cbina, allowing that he has some resemblance with the king of the upper region, could not chuse but be a creature of tai kie: that all things are one and the same substance; and tho' it is said there are several spirits, yet in truth there is but one universal substance; Spirit. nor is the spirit a thing really distinct from the substance, but the very substance itself look'd upon under the formality, as it is acting and ruling within the things. Upon this I ask'd him, says he, concerning the difference assign'd betwixt these spirits, whereof some are superior, others inferior.
He answer'd, that as to their substance and entity, it was the same as well in heaven as upon earth; but with regard to the operation and efficacy there was some difference, according to the several qualities and dispositions of things, as has been said.

2. Doctor Cheu Mo Kien, a mandarin of the court of rites, having read F. Riccus his books, ask'd us upon occasion, What God. we meant by Tien Cbu (so we call God) and we explaining it as we use to do, that he is a living intelligent substance, without beginning or end, &c. and that he had created all things, and govern'd all things from heaven, as a king does from his palace: he laugh'd at us, and said, we made use of very coarse comparisons, in as much as Tien Cbu, or the king of the upper region, is not in reality one like a living man that sits in heaven, but the virtue that has dominion and governs heaven, and is in us and in all things, and therefore we must imagine our heart is the very self-same thing as tien cbu, or xang ti. Tho' we labour'd never so much to proceed in explicating our Tien Cbu, he would not permit us, saying, He very well knew what tien cbu was, since we said he was the same thing as the king of the upper region. Our F. vice-provincial was present at this discourse.

3. Doctor Cien Lin Vu, tho' he was our friend, and had often heard our fathers discourse concerning the true God, who came into the world to save us, yet he could never frame any other notion of it than that he might be then like their Confucius; which they ground on their erroneous opinion, that there is but one universal nature, which is so absolutely the principle of all things, that it is all of them. And as for what relates to men, they who are more perfect, either by their good natural disposition, or by their own industry, do best represent that universal nature of the first principle; and therefore it is said, they are one and the same thing with it: so that speaking according to this doctrine, our JESUS in Europe is no more than their Confucius in Cbina, and Foe in India.

4. I will not omit relating what happen'd to me one day with the said doctor, and doctor Michael. We coming to the point of discoursing how in Europe we follow the law given by God; the doctor presently put in his opinion, saying, It was probable it might be like that the Chinese have given by Confucius, since both legislators were the same thing as heaven and the first principle. I would have answer'd to this, but doctor Michael in a low voice press'd me to forbear at that time, that I might not trouble his friend, especially for that it was not easy to confute such an opinion in Cbina. Observe this till another time.

5. Doctor Sui Jo, Ko told me very positively, That there was but one only substance in the world, call'd li, or tai kie, which of it self is immense, without any limit or bound. Granting this, it follows of necessity, that the king of the upper region, and all other spirits, are only the operative virtue of things, or the substance of the things themselves, taken as it operates. He said further, that the government and order of things in this world, came altogether from the lie; but naturally and of necessity, according to the connexion of universal causes, and to the disposition of the particular objects, which is what we properly call fate.

6. Doctor Cheu Keng, Su spoke these very words to me, That our God, call'd Tien Cbu, shall end with the world. Then how can you say, that man shall enjoy him for ever in heaven? he said it for two reasons. First, because he conceived that Tien Cbu was like the king of the upper region, considering the resemblance there is between the two names. 2. Because he knew the king of the upper region, or spirit of heaven, must end with the world, as has been said. I answer'd him, That if our Tien Cbu had proceeded from the tai kie; as does the king of the upper region and other spirits, then his argument were good; but that it was not so, and then I laid before him the order of the four causes.

7. Doctor Li Sung Jo, president of the exchequer-court, told us several times, That after death there was neither reward nor punishment, but that men return'd to the vacuum from whence they came. And when we told him, that there is an immortal, living, and omnipotent God, who rewards every man according to his actions; he positively deny'd there was any such God, heaven, or hell, as things never heard of in his sect.

8. We ask'd doctor Cbing Lun Ju, a mandarin of the court of rites, Whether according to the sect of the learned there was any reward or punishment in the other life? he laugh'd at the question, then answer'd, That it could not be deny'd but RETTE. there were virtues and vices in this world, but that all ended with death, when the man in whom those things were expir'd, and therefore there was no need of providing for the next life, but for this.

9. I accidentally met with Cheu Jang Tien, who was well vers'd in all three sects, and so was a master, gathering many scholars in all parts. Finding him so well read, I ask'd him first, What the king of the upper region was according to the learned sect? He answer'd, It was the spirit or god they adore, and distinct from jo boang, ador'd by the sect Lao Zu, and from Foe, the god of the bonzes. (2.) I ask'd, whether that king was the same thing as heaven, or distinct? He answer'd, It was the very same thing with heaven, as was said prelude 12. num. 4. as also, that he is the very same as the li, tai kie, juen ki, tien xin, tien ming, and nan jin, that is, the earth's husband. So that these and other epithets are only the several formalities of the substance, or entity it self.

10. (3.) I ask'd, Whether this king was of equal standing with heaven, or before or after it? He answer'd, It was co-eval, and both of them proceeded from tai kie. (4.) I ask'd, whether this king was a living and intelligent being, so as to know the good or ill men do, to reward or punish them? He answer'd in the negative, but that he operates as if he were so, according to the words of Xu King, lib. I. p. 35. that heaven neither sees nor hears, loves nor hates, but does all these things by means of the multitude, with whom it has an inward conjunction in the li itself.

11. (5.) I ask'd, Whether the king of the upper region were only one? He answer'd in the affirmative, and that he is the spirit of heaven.

12. (6.) I ask'd, Whether there be one like a king, who proceeds from the parts of heaven, as is imply'd by the doctrine call'd je king? He answer'd, That king is the air, which causes the generation of things, 'till they are perfected, as is evidently gather'd from the changes the said air causes in the eight parts of the horizon; and this is the literal sense of that place under the metaphor of a king.

13. (7.) I ask'd, If the king of the upper region is not a living creature, but only the air, or virtue of heaven, how comes it to be said in some authors, that he convers'd with kings, who said, they had his orders for doing some things? He answer'd, There never was any such conversation in that nature the words sound, but that it is all a metaphor and figure, for as much as the said kings have an inward NAVARETTE. correspondence with the li of heaven, and therefore they acted as if they had receiv'd orders from heaven.

14. (8.) I ask'd, Whether the sacrifice the emperor yearly offers to heaven, be also offer'd to the king of the upper region? He answer'd, That heaven and the king of the upper region were one and the same substance under two formalities, and therefore when sacrifice is offer'd to heaven, it is offer'd at the same time to the king of the upper region; and the same may be said of the sacrifices offer'd to mountains, rivers, valleys, &c.

Confucius 15. (9.) I ask'd, Why would not Confucius, when he was sick, suffer his disciple Zu Lu to pray for him? He answer'd, Because he was persuaded, heaven and its spirit and he were the same thing; and besides, he never did any thing opposite to reason, and therefore there was no occasion to pray for him.

16. (10.) I ask'd, If the wise men of the learned sect do not believe there are real spirits, why did they bring them up among the people? He answer'd, To curb the multitude, that they may not be unruly. Thus far the said doctor, which of it self were sufficient to clear all these difficulties.

17. In this paragraph he names eight mandarines more, all of the court and several provinces; and concludes, And others no less famous and learned at this court, whom I pass by for brevity sake. Nor do I mention another great multitude of learned men and mandarines, with whom I convers'd in other parts of Cbina, during the many years I liv'd there, for I perceive they all agree unanimously.

NOTE.

1. I shall say something to these points in another place. Here I cannot but take notice, that if the doctor who was so learned had so mean a notion of the god the fathers preach'd to him, what idea could ignorant persons frame? Our God is as much in Europe as Confucius is in Cbina. It seems our holy faith is well advanced in that kingdom.

SECT. II.

The opinion of the learned Chinese Christians.

1. Not only the heathens, but even the Christians, when the question is categorically put to them, confirm what has been said, as appears by what follows.

2. In the first place doctor Michael, whom I work'd upon to lay open to me all the secrets of his heart, without his being sensible what I was doing. I made use of this stratagem: I acquainted him that our fathers in Japan and Cochinchina study'd the Cbinese books as they did in Cbina, and some doubts occurring to them, which they could not solve, they desir'd us, and it was really true, to send them the exposition of them, receiving our information from learned men of note and esteem. But that he must observe, those fathers desir'd to know the pure doctrine of the learned sect, without any mixture of interpretations given by us Christians. He was very well pleas'd to hear this, and bid me propose their doubts, and he would answer them, as understood by the learned.

3. (1.) I ask'd, Which were the authentic and classick books of the sect? He answer'd, The five doctrines, zu ku, with its comments, Sing Li's philosophy, and the chronicle tien cbien; and took notice, that in these books very often the words run one way, and the sense is taken in another. By which he would express that they made use of tropes and figures, to be understood only by those who are vers'd in the mysteries of their sect.

4. (2.) I ask'd, Whether the expositors of those doctrines, and particularly the learned that liv'd while the family Sung reign'd, were reputed of good authority at present in Cbina? He answer'd, Their authority was very great, because they had corrected the text of the ancient doctrines, and had moreover commented upon them, without which they would be all in the dark. And therefore with good cause it is establish'd, that at examinations no composition be allow'd, that is opposite to the common explication of expositors. And though these sometimes vary among themselves, and err in matters of small consequence, yet they all agree in essential points, and hit the design of the ancients. He observ'd further, that the learned men of Cbina discourse excellently upon those things they see; as for instance, the five ranks of men, the five universal virtues, the government of the state, &c. But of all things that are not seen, as of angels, the rational soul, &c. they spoke very wild and falsely, so that there is no relying on them. All which ought to be mark'd with capital letters, for the better deciding of these controversies.

5. (3.) I ask'd, If the Cbineses can give no account of invisible things, to whom do they offer their sacrifices? At this he shak'd his head, and smiling said, The Cbineses properly offer sacrifice to the universal heaven, and to the earth, mountains, &c. which they all see, thanking them for the benefits and advantages they receive from them. As for the spirits, they don't certainly know there are any, but guessing there there may be, they honour and respect them, together with the aforesaid parts of the universe, believing they are the same substance and entity with them.

Future
State.

6. (4.) I ask'd, Whether after death there be any reward or punishment for good or wicked men, according to the doctrine of the learned sect? He answer'd, That they make no mention of any such things. Here, he sigh'd and complain'd of the professors of this sect, for falling so short, in not teaching the things of the other life; which is the cause the multitude is not encourag'd to practise virtue in earnest. He commended Foe's sect, which preaches up heaven and hell.

Immortality.

7. (5.) I ask'd concerning the immortality of the soul, and the place of Vuen Vuang, who is by the side of the king of the upper region? He answer'd, There was no further mystery in it, than that the earthly part return'd to the earth, and the airy ascended to heaven, uniting it self to that king, who is the heaven it self. The poet endeavours to magnify Vuen Vuang, feigning that the heavenly body is like a king, and he sits by his side like a loyal and well-belov'd subject.

8. By what has been said it appears that according to the doctrine of the learned, there is no GOD, angels, immortal soul, &c.

9. Being afterwards in the imperial city, he shew'd us several treatises he had compos'd of things relating to our religion, with an exposition of the ten commandments; in which tho' he treats of many things he has heard from our fathers, yet every foot he flies out into other things taken from the Chinese doctrine, which more fully makes out the true opinion of the learned. I will here insert some of them. 1. In the introduction to the commandments, he says, that all things are one and the same substance, which is their li, not differing from one another, any otherwise than by the outward shape, and accidental qualities; whence follow all the absurdities our Europeans deduce from the principle, omnia sunt unum, or all things are the same, till at last they come to downright atheism.

Li.

10. In the same introduction, he says, that all the ancient wise men of China were spirits, or angels incarnate, continued one after another. Which according to the notion of the Chinese, is thus, that the li, or universal substance, as on the one side it performs its wonderful operations, and on the other those that are beneficial to man, is call'd a spirit; and for as much as its operations are observ'd in heaven, the earth, mountains, and other parts of the universe, as also in man; therefore several spirits are assign'd to those things, all which to NAVARETTE the wise men are but one, as the substance is but one.

11. Je Ko Lao in the preface he writ to this very book, alludes to the same, when he says, the king of the upper region, or tien chu, was incarnate upon our earth. Which he proves thus: the king of the upper region did incarnate several things here in the east in the persons of Jao, Xun, Confucius, and many others, as well kings as subjects; ergo, he might as well incarnate in Europe, as the fathers of the society say he did in the person of JESUS. By which it plainly appears, that to the Chinese CHRIST in Europe is no more than Confucius, or any other wise man in China. This was the reason why doctor Michael would not permit me to reply to doctor Cien, as I observ'd, §. 1. num. 4. because he himself still entertains this Chinese, or rather this confused notion.

12. (3.) In the same place he says, That Confucius his doctrine is perfect in all respects, and the very same with gods, which is an inference naturally deduced from the two points we spoke of last, viz. That all wise men are spirits incarnate, and all spirits are the very self-same substance, and therefore have the same wisdom, power, &c.

13. In the exposition of the first commandment, he says, we are to worship heaven and earth; and in the exposition of the third, that sacrifices may be offer'd to our saints, as is done in China to heaven, earth, masters, and other dead persons. All which is grounded on the receiv'd opinion of the learned that all things are the same substance, or parts of it, as has been several times said.

14. In regard this opinion, that all things are the same substance, is common to the three sects; he endeavours in this treatise to speak well of them all, shewing that all of them have the same end and design, which is to assign a principle to the universe; and that therefore they border upon our holy faith, and come to be the same thing with it in essentials. And if any man should object the many errors there are in the sects, all of them very opposite to our holy law: He answers, There were not at the beginning, when the sects flourish'd in their true and pure doctrine, but that they crept in afterwards by means of the comments made by disciples, who did not reach the design of ancient authors; therefore he often advis'd us in explicating things, to use a two-fold, or amphibological method, which may be easily apply'd to either part of the controversy; and thus, he says, we may please, and so gain all. This is the method and advice Dr. Michael

NAVA- cbael gives us to preach the gospel in Cbi- RTTEE. na. Let every wise man consider what consequences we may and must deduce from hence.

15. I also ask'd our M. Atbanasius, who had so much study'd the learned sect, and perus'd several of the best libraries in Cbi- na. He answer'd in some short and comprehensive sentences: His words are these;

1. The learned treat of mén, not of heaven; of human, not of divine things.
 2. They treat of life, not of death. 3.
 They treat of this, not of a future life. 4.
 They treat of corporeal, not of spiritual things. 5. They treat of one principle, not of diversity of species. 6. They say, things must be done without any design, and that there is no reward nor punishment.
 7. They say, men and heaven are the same li; and that for man to exhaust himself, is to serve heaven. 8. They say, that the height of goodness and perfection is the height of nature, and that there is nothing beyond her. 9. That the directive rule of heaven is the entity of the supreme goodness, which has neither scent, nor sound, that is, it is imperceptible. 10. That nature supremely good has neither beginning nor end, and is only in the body and heart of man. 11. That if a man does his duty, his life will be happy, and his end easy.
 All these are the words of Atbanasius, who says, it is requisite to oppose these tenets vigorously.

Xang Ti. 16. I put the same question to doctor Paul, who answer'd very ingeniously, that he was of opinion, the king of the upper region could not be our GOD, and he believ'd neither the antient nor modern Cbineses had any knowledge of GOD. But since the fathers upon good motives call that king GOD, that the learned Cbineses might make no objections, and because this epithet was decent, he judg'd it good and requisite to give him the attributes we give to GOD.
 As for the soul, he said, he fancy'd the Cbineses had some knowledge of it, but imperfect.

Atbeijts. 17. Doctor Leo, the licentiate Ignatius, and generally the rest of the learned Cbi- nese Christians, ingeniously confess, that all the modern learned sect are atheists, and build on the common opinion of the expo-sitors. But they further say, they are of opinion, that to comply with the Cbineses, we ought to stick to the text of the old Cbinese doctrines which make for us, without minding the modern expositors. On this very point depends the whole difficulty of these controversies, for deciding of which rightly we must beg the light of the holy ghost. It being a matter of such consequence, I will here add some considerations of my own which occur at present, as shall appear in the following prelude.

This prelude, which would be of great consequence, is wanting; so that the treatise remains, lopt, and imperfect, tho' it contains enough for those that have an insight into the matter.

NOTES.

1. What the bishop of Nan King, disp.
 5. c. 4. sect. 3. quotes out of S. Augustin, suits well in this place; The philosophers themselves who profess learning, scarce deliver'd any thing relating to the worship and love of GOD; and tho' many of them diligently employ'd themselves in suiting the manners of men to civil and political virtue, and writ long treatises concerning the same civil virtue, yet they either very lightly touch'd those that concern'd the worship of GOD, or refer'd their disciples to the country worship practis'd by the idolaters.

2. The fathers Morales and Martin Mar- tinez, call doctor Michael the pillar of the Cbinese church. If the pillar and his doctrine were no better, how could the structure chuse but fall?

3. Doctor Michael compares and unites our holy law with that of Confucius, and consequently with the other two, for they all three grow into one, as F. Matthew Ric- cius confesses. We will here set down what Corn. à Lapide writes in Encom. Sac. Script.
 sect. 2. num. 15. Our age, which has seen all sorts of monsters, saw a fanatick, who publish'd a blasphemous triumvirate of the three impostors of the world, MOSES, CHRIST, and Mahomet. In Cbina they assign us a Qua- drumvirate; Confucius, Foe, Lao Zú, and CHRIST. Note that according to the opinion of the society, as was said in my prefence, Dr. Michael was one of the best Chri- stian learned Cbineses.

4. He gives all the sects a good word, he will be at peace with them all, and is against disputes or persecutions. This is not the peace of CHRIST; I came not to bring peace, but the sword. The bishop of Nan King, disp. 5. sect. 1. num. 2. Most, if not all the professors of superstition and false religions, were generally of opinion, that several religions might be allow'd of, nor did they altogether condemn others which they did not follow. But the true and lawful religion even condemn'd all others, in so much that the followers of it would never entertain any commerce with those who deny'd, tho' it were but one tenet of faith and religion. Which he there proves sufficiently. In Cbina order is taken not to oppose the sect of the learned, not to speak ill of Foe, to use double-dealing to gain all men (to undo all men were better express'd) not to provoke the infidels, to prevent persecution, &c. This was

NAVA-RETTE. was great prudence in doctor Michael. But the greatest mischief is, that his advice prevails with some men. A missioner in a book of his speaks thus; Tho' there are in this kingdom three laws, yet that of CHRIST is most holy and perfect. You should say, father missioner, That only the law of GOD and his Son JESUS CHRIST, is good and holy, that only that can save; that the rest are wicked and pestilential; otherwise I must say, you desire to be at peace with them all, and grant them to be good and holy.

5. So that it seems good motives and policy are allow'd some weight in these cases. Human policy and prudence has stretch'd so far, as to make him a true god who is not so, nay, even that which is destitute of vegetative life. The heathen policy extendeth not so far, for tho' it made and unmade gods, yet it knew no true deity; yet they that know one, take away its divinity to bestow it on a mere creature. This is the great power Trismegistus spoke of; And that men had taken that great and wonderful power of making gods. We have seen it of late years in Cbina, as shall appear in another place.

6. I highly approve of Athanasius his opinion, that the learned sect ought to be vigorously oppos'd, yet it is not receiv'd nor made use of.

7. The learned sect is here excellently laid open and made known; it is expressly forbid to say it agrees either in the whole or in part with our holy law. If we observe the prohibition, and others do not, and any trouble or persecution should arise thereupon, we will give GOD thanks, and bear with it for his sake, rather lying under the scandal, than conceal or forsake the truth. Of how great authority all that has been writ by F. Longobardo is, may be gather'd by his many quotations out of the classick books of the learned sect, and the sayings of so many doctors, as well Christians as heathens, so that I do not see what could be added to it; our adversaries alledging for themselves none but the fathers, Riccus and Pantoja, and doctor Michael, it plainly appears they are far from ballancing of him. One thing I observ'd in Cbina, which was, that tho' F. Longobardo was so great a missioner, so holy a man as all people own; and in method, stile, distribution, and variety of this treatise, shews himself to be a metaphysician, divine, humanist, and well vers'd in the Chinese sciences; yet those of his family who will not follow him, lessen his reputation, by saying, he was no great divine. Here the words of Boetius are to the purpose; Many men have often gain'd a great name by the false conceit of the multitude. But

Let us call it a little name.

allowing that others might excel him in divinity, does it therefore follow that they have more knowledge of the learned Chinese sect? Not at all; for then it would follow that any missioner must understand the said sect better than all the doctors and authors of it, in regard he must out do them all in divinity. I must add further, that this point may not be argued any more, that all the author quotes is in their books, and so understood by the Cbineses.

8. I must add, that I was the first cause that brought all at length to agree, that the Chinese king of the upper region, neither is, nor can be our god. The compassing of this only thing makes me think all my sufferings well bestow'd.

9. In this place, among others one considerable point might be argu'd, which is, Whether the Cbineses, who have hitherto believ'd this king of the upper region to be our god, have had a supernatural faith concerning him? according to what has been premis'd, I am something confident they had not. It will be requisite to discourse upon this subject in the second tome; for the present it will suffice to see what divines teach as to this point: They, as S. Thomas 2. 2. q. 1. disp. 2. art. 4. §. resolutio hujusdubii, are of the same opinion I have declar'd my self. Serra, art. 3. q. 1. decides the same with S. Thomas; so Gonet, Ferre, and others. What the consequences are may easily be infer'd, I will write them in another place. The chiefest, to which all the others tend and are reduc'd, is, Whether those who liv'd and dy'd in no other faith, but that that supreme king was our god, could be sav'd. I propos'd some doubts concerning it at Rome, drawn from the doctrine of this treatise, which I and others look upon as most true; but they at that court not understanding the Chinese letter, nothing was decided: I will set them down in my second tome.

It might also be here discuss'd, whether the Cbineses, being as they are really atheists, and having no knowledge of GOD, angels, rational soul, reward or punishment in the life to come, are capable of oaths, or the like? The occasion of the doubt is taken from S. Paul, Heb. vi. that those who swear, do swear by one greater than themselves. The atheists own no superior being, or greater than themselves, and consequently are not capable of an oath. This is the opinion of Leander, tract. 1. de juram. disp. 6. q. 44. where he quotes, to confirm his opinion, Suarez, Fagundez, and Palao.

I must say I have seen the contrary, and taken notice of it in the Chinese atheists spoken of in this treatise. Which may be prov'd, first, because they sacrifice, pray

to,

NAVA- to, and beg of heaven, the sun, moon, RETTE. and other things already mention'd; whence it follows they own a superiority in them. The consequence to me seems good: Then why may not this superiority suffice for an oath? We see that notwithstanding their atheism, they worship the heaven, earth, &c. as superior beings, as such they honour, reverence, and fear them; and in reality they swear and have certain ceremonies to render the oath more solemn. Nor do the Chinese atheists imagine there is nothing greater than themselves, none of them are so extravagant; then consequently they own a superior, which suffices for them to bring him as a witness: this will hold in general, or absolutely, not if we come to determine of the nature of an oath. And if this be deny'd, why may not the sacrifices, prayers, and supplications be as well deny'd? have not these too respect to a superior? I find all the several species of oaths among those heathens, that for asserting what they say, that for threatening, and that for execrating.

CHAP. I.

His Voyage to New Spain.

1. MY holy father S. Thomas, lett. 2. in Rom. i. teaches that only great things are to be written, that they may be continu'd in the memory of men. It has not been the custom to write any but great things which are worthy to be remembered, and ought to be transmitted to posterity. These words have much discourag'd me from writing this book, nevertheless the rarity of some things, and the novelty of others, made me resolve to take pen in hand, and give an account of what I my self have seen. Our Oleaster in princip. num. 33. says thus, Posterity is pleas'd to hear, not only the famous actions of their ancestors, but also their dangers, sufferings, and other things of that nature, tho' they be toilsome. I cannot truly say, that I have compassed the earth, and walk'd over the sea and dry land. But it was not thro' curiosity or covetousness, which usually encourage many to such undertakings. This work was much forwarded by the superfluous spare time I had in the island Madagascar, where, to divert it, and be less sensible of my long stay there, I made my benefit of the words of Ecclus. xxxviii. 25. Write in time of leisure.

2. I have read some printed travels, and observ'd several things in them, which as being common and trivial, deserve no reflection, nor making a mystery of, or magnifying them. I read an account of a journey certain persons made from Vera Cruz to Mexico, which does so magnify the difficulties, hardships, sufferings, hunger, cold, and other calamities, that the author makes it sufficiently appear, he has far outdone the truth of what it really is: and if he takes such liberty to launch out in speaking of a road so well known, so much beaten, and so common, and than which there are certainly some worse in Spain, what will he do when he writes of travels through places less known to, and more remote from us? I will not follow this method, nor make a mystery where there is none; I will endeavour not to tire the reader with needless extolling of things, and crying up that which is ordinary and common. NAVA-

RETTE.

3. That certain and generally receiv'd opinion all men had conceiv'd (and no man either here or there does at all question) of the rigid and most exact regular observance of our province of the holy Rosary in the Philippine islands, was the motive that made me resolve to leave my kindred, country, and friends, and undertake so tedious a journey, and two such long voyages, as there are from Spain to the utmost bounds of Asia. This great part of the world commences at those islands. It is no small contradiction to human nature, to leave ones country. Nazianz. epist. 108. calls it, The common mother. Lyra in 2 Reg. cap. xx. says the same. 'Tis true, that to religious men, all the world is their country. The same saint says so, epist. 28. To me every land, and never an one is my country. And Hugo de Sanc. Viç. lib. 3. de disdasc. cap. ult. writes thus: He is still very tender to whom his country is sweet; he is brave who accounts all nations his country; he is perfect to whom the world is a banishment. Here the words of St. Paul suit well; We have here no settled city, but we seek after one to come. So that of Tertulian de martyr. cap. 2. where he teaches and proves, by what St. Cyprian says, epist. 18. that this world rather deserves the name of a prison and dungeon, than of a habitation and native country. Diogenes was almost of the same opinion; A worldly man, so he call'd himself, because I am a citizen and inhabitant of all the world. To leave friends and kindred is more, a truth that requires not any proof, no more than to say, all this is nothing in regard of our duty to GOD. I do not mean in case they obstruct serving of him, for what St. Jerome teaches in this case is well known. Go on trampling on your father, proceed treading on your mother, and fly with dry eyes to the banner of the cross. S. Bern. epist. 351. In this respect it is the biggest piece of compassion, to be cruel for the sake of CHRIST. Be not mov'd by the tears of mad people, &c.

Read

NAVA-RETTE. Read Sylv. tom. 2. lib. IV. c. 8. q. 18. n. 137. Being then actually professor of philosophy in the famous and renown'd college of St. Gregory in Valladolid, I set forwards upon my journey on the 26th of January, 1646. Little remarkable happened then, though there wanted not some matter of merit. The author of the book that treats de conversione gentium, says, the first thing a missionary is to arm and provide himself with is patience, and truly he is much in the right. So many provocations occur every moment, that if this virtue be wanting, the bravest and most resolv'd spirit will soon dismay. It is patience, says he, which causes the mind in adversity not to depart from the love of God, and the righteousness of justice. And when the manners of others are insupportable, says the apostle, bearing up one another, granting, that is sparing. Read Tertullian, cap. 8. de patien. where he has much to this purpose; and let every man endeavour to provide so good a companion.

4. The second night we lay at Salamanca; the scholars were at variance, and that night one of them was kill'd. I look upon it as most certain, that no scholar has dy'd a violent death in Cbina these two thousand years, tho' there are above three millions of them in that kingdom. I spoke of their modesty and good carriage in the second book, in this place I might write of the leudness and debauchery of the Europeans. If that were observ'd in Europe which is in Cbina, as I have mention'd before, many mischiefs would be prevented. That murder caus'd trouble, some fled, others absconded; the dead man was bury'd, I saw him in the church of our lady de la Vega.

5. Two or three days we travell'd in rain and cold, and the comfort we had the last night, was to lie upon the stones. On the first of February we set out from Placentia, to lie that night at a lone inn, call'd Venta de la Serrana. We soon met with a trooper, who began to molest us; he committed barbarities in the inn, abus'd the innkeeper and his wife, and two poor youths that were there much worse; because at eleven at night they would not wash their hands and faces; he turn'd them out of doors, the ground being then cover'd with snow. The fellow did such things, as a wild Arab would not have been guilty of, and there was no possibility of bringing him to hear reason. God mortify'd him a little, or else neither I nor my companions had far'd well. After this two other religious men came the same way, they had a little as betwixt them, and barely as much money as would serve them to Sevil; they met with two soldiers, who took all from them. These workmen of our LORD begin to suffer before they preach in Cbina or Japan. When I travell'd in so much safety among infidels, as I shall shew hereafter, I call'd to mind these passages, and reflected on them by my self; in short, it is, A man's own family are his enemies.

6. Being to cross the river Guadiana, we met two watermen with each of them his sword and pistol; they freely offer'd us our passage, but when half way over, they gave us to understand, that as for our selves the passage was gratis, but each beast was to pay a piece of eight. There was no appeal from them, nor any writ of error to be brought. We had recourse to intreaties and tears, through which God softned their hearts, and it was brought about that they should be satisfy'd with half a piece of eight a head. At Villanueva no body would give us a lodging, they were so kept under by the soldiers. Coming one evening in Cbina with a great number of passengers to a village where lodgings were scarce, the master of one of them turning away his own countrymen, entertain'd me and three servants I had with me. I then remember'd what happen'd at Villanueva, how well those two passages agree. Having spent that night uneasily enough, next day we went to dinner to a reasonable good town. As we came to the inn, the innkeeper came out to meet us very gravely, and with tokens of great admiration, ask'd, Fathers, whence came ye? We satisfy'd his curiosity, and he clapping his hands together, said, Blessed be God, I have gone out of my house three times, and return'd home every time beaten, rob'd, and stript, and your reverences and those gentlemen come safe and found in all respects. Blessed be God: We gave God thanks, and had compassion on him.

7. As we came into Berlanga, we saw a troop of horse marching along another street: the captain was a man of a graceful presence. The chaplain rode with his church-staff before him; and the captain's mistress veil'd, follow'd the chaplain upon another horse. I like it very well that there should be publick prayers in time of war to implore the divine assistance, without which no victory can be obtain'd. Read Corn. à Lapide in Exod. xvii. 15. but One praying, and another cursing; whose voice will God bear? one building and another pulling down, what does it avail, but mere labour? Why should God hear the voice of priests, and not the cry of open and scandalous sins? If the soldiers with their wickedness pull down all that the servants of God build with their prayers, what can we expect, or what can follow, but labour, toil, and weariness? Some say, it cannot be remedy'd, or that the redressing of it will cause greater inconveniences.

It is a great misfortune that the Cbineses, Mogols, and others can remedy it, and in our parts they cannot. Something to this effect has been said in the fourth book. Ferdinand the first, and S. Pius Quintus were us'd to say, Let justice be done, and let the world perish; what a happy end it would have. There is no doubt, but the Spanish nation is more fierce and unruly than some others; there are instances of this truth. It is but a few years since two soldiers short of Badajoz met a father and his son, who carry'd a little saffron to sell; they took it away, and resolv'd to murder them. The son pray'd them to kill him and spare his father to be a comfort to his mother and brethren. The father desir'd them to be satisfy'd with his life, and to let go his son, that he might maintain his mother and brethren. They would not compound, but inhumanly butcher'd both the father and the son. One of them paid for it with his life, and confess'd what has been said, the other fled. If such an account were sent from the Mogols country, Siam, Japan, or Cbina, should we find ever a man amongst us that would not abhor such nations, and rail at them, saying, they were barbarians, pagans, and had no fear of God? then let them be very well assur'd that these and the like barbarities are to be found among us, but not there. Here we might apply what in another place I quoted out of Euguvinus and Oleaster.

8. We come to Santillana, our supper there was light, our breakfast next morning none at all, for our viaticum was quite spent. At the passage of the river we took no notice of our condition, till we were over, and this contrivance stood us in good stead. I told the waterman how things were with us, a companion of his was offend'd at it; but the first of them who seem'd to be more courteous and pliable, said to him, These fathers have it not, what can we do to them? There are many passage-boats in Cbina, and some over deep and wide rivers, but there is no obligation of paying at any of them; they ask something as free gift, and none give but such as please. We made haste to get to dinner to Sevil; by the help of God we got thither, hungry enough. We continued but a few days in Sevil, and kept for the most part within. It is better to be at home, but it is hurtful to stray abroad, says Hesiod. And S. Anthony, A Monk out of his cell is like a fish out of the water. There our vicar gather'd some alms. At S. Lucar we got some more, and his excellency the duke of Medina Cali reliev'd us according to his generosity, and the particular affection he bears our order. We had need enough of all this, for tho' his majesty supplies us bountifully, and orders we should have de-NAVAVcent accommodation in his ships, never-RETTE. theless we are at incredible expence to get some little hole, where we may be by our selves, and free from the noise of the sailors.

The gun-room cabin cost us two thousand pieces of eight. Who would imagin it?
Where shall we have it, if we do not beg and pinch our selves for it? They kept us seventeen days aboard in the river S. Lucar, spending our provision, melting with heat, and eaten up with flies and mices. Every day they founded the bar, orders came from the council to put to sea, but they did it not for want of water. A good clergyman of Saldanna, who had experience in sea-affairs, came to me one day, and said: Father, your reverence may assure your self, that till the admiral has his wine, there will not be water enough to carry out the ships. He proved a prophet. As soon as ever he had got six-thousand jars of wine he wanted, the water rose wonderfully, so that we got to sea to the great satisfaction of us all. The council, added that good clergy-man, is very sensible of these contrivances, and that is the reason they send such positive orders. True it is they avail but little, and these men are the cause that the king's revenue is wasted, and passengers consume their provision; and what is worst of all, these delays upon their private account sometimes endanger a fleet. Allowance was then given for officers and seamen to ship a certain quantity of wine. D. John de Mansilla one of the directors of the trade went aboard, I waited upon him, as being my country-man and friend. He examin'd them upon oath, whether they had stowage of their own to carry the allowance that was made them. They swore they had. D. John said to me, I am satisfy'd they are forsworn, but I do my duty. The admiral took up all the ship; even the gunners made their complaint to us, that the cabin of the gun-room was taken from them, to sell it to us; they had as little mind to part with it, as we to give two thousand pieces of eight for it. We put to sea in June, and had we sail'd as they did before the flood, it had certainly been a great diversion. S. Thomas from the gloss on 2 S. Pet. chap. iii. says, Then the air was more serene and still than now, for then there were no storms: Tho' there are some of another opinion. Our method was, at break of day we sang the Te Deum. After sun-rising, having first consulted the master, four or five masses were said, and all the crew resorted to them; in the afternoon the Salve Regina and litany of our Lady was sang, then the rosary was said by gangs, some miraculous stories were read, and there was some discourse of religious matters. On fundays

NAVA-fundays and holidays there was a sermon. RETTE. An hour after the Angelus Domini, (which is before night-fall) a man went out at the hatch (for he was continually almost under deck) and having rang a little bell in the saddest and most doleful voice that ever I heard, said, Death is certain, the hour uncertain, the judge severe. Wo unto thee who art slothful! do that thou couldst wish thou hadst done when thou diest. He rang the bell again, and praying for the souls departed, withdrew, and all the crew repenting for their sins went to rest without the least noise. During the voyage there was frequent confessing and receiving, little gaming, scarce any swearing, save only the master who transgress'd in this particular; he certainly fasted every saturday upon bread and water. The purser us'd to say to him, What are you the better for fasting, when you swear every moment? Honest Lazaro Beato, that was is name, answer'd, And what would become of me, if I did not fast? That employment is provoking; but I have observ'd aboard Portuguese, French and Dutch ships, that their masters command with more ease and calmness than ours, nor are they so severe towards the steersmen as with us.

9. We were once talking of the disorders there had been in the West-Indies, about distribution and propriety of the Indians, things little talk'd of in old Castile, especially but little known among young people; the Spaniards call every division subject to a lord or proprietor, under whose command the Indians are, a vicarage. Several opinions are deliver'd, at last the clerk of the check deliver'd his thus: If I were the king, all the vicarages should be in the hands of religious men, for it is certain it would be more for his majesty's, and the Indians advantage. If I were general of the religious orders, religious men should possess never a vicarage, for it is better for religious men to be in their monasteries, free from troubles and disputes. I have since read what the lord Solorzano writes upon this subject. I have heard others say, and found it to be true by experience, that the clerk of the check was in the right, and in few words decided the case, which I think all men must of necessity own, if they consider the point with the least piety.

10. The first day we discover'd four sail, we gave them chase, they soon put out their boat and came aboard. They prov'd to be Dunkirkers, who had taken two French Ships, and were carrying them to S. Lucar. The eighth day we had sight of the island Lanzarote, and left it a stern. On S. John's or Midsummer day, we made great rejoicing, all our colours and streamers were hung out, the cannon were fir'd, there was high mass, and an excellent sermon preach'd by the father commissary of the order of our father S. Francis, in the afternoon. There was a bull-feast aboard our ship, and so diverting, that I never saw the like in all my life. A Mulatto handsomely dress'd went out to strike the bull with his spear; he rode upon two foremast men ty'd back to back, betwixt them he had placed a saddle, which one of Peru carry'd over; the Mulatto did wonders. The bull, tho' he had but two feet, was well furnish'd with horns, and laid about him at such a rate, that no man could stand upon the deck: all this while we were under sail, which was the best of it, the day pass'd away very merrily. This may serve to divert the reader. We read in 2 Macc. xv. 40. For as it is burisful always to drink wine, or always water, but it is pleasant to drink sometimes the one, and sometimes the other; even so, if speech be always finely fram'd, it will not please the reader. There must of necessity be variety in a voyage, and that of it self is agreeable, and sharpens the appetite of reading. On the feast of the seraphick doctor S. Bonaventure, in regard the father commissary, to whom we were much oblig'd, bore that name; and to honour the saint, the day was solemniz'd, we all said mass (being twenty nine priests) there was high mass, an excellent sermon preach'd by one of our order, a professor of divinity of S. Thomas in Sevil, a man great in all respects. He dy'd the first year he came into the Philippine islands; but, Being perfect he soon run out a long time.

11. Captain Balladares, a Galician by birth, being somewhat a head of the fleet, took two small French vessels. That captain was much applauded by all men; his joy was not lasting, for another day giving chase to a great French ship, he spent his main-mast, and all men rail'd at him without mercy or modesty. He went into Vera Cruz with drums beating, colours flying, and his prizes a-stern, and within three or four days dy'd lamented by many.

12. The feast of our father S. Dominick was kept solemn. On the eve vespers and compline were sung, with as much grandeur, as if we had been in Sevil. The chapel was so beautify'd both within and without, that we all admir'd it. The officers and passengers vy'd in bringing all they had to adorn it. That night they spent in honour of the saint, with musick and hymns. Next day there was high mass, the father commissary was to have preach'd, but excus'd himself upon account of indisposition, and it fell to my lot to dishonour the feast.

13. We arriv'd at Vera Cruz after sixty days sail, having endur'd but little fatigue, no storm, aboard our ship only one dy'd, aboard all the rest I think none but one dropt over board. There was scarce any distemper, save a little sea-sickness at first, all the voyages I have made since I have never been subject to it. We endur'd some thirst because we took in no water upon the voyage; the reason they alledg'd was, that his majesty had given strict orders that no time should be lost: thus they disguise their contrivances. It is likely the delay we made seventeen days at San Lucar, was the king's pleasure too. The vermin man uses to breed, as soon as we came to the Leeward island, dy'd all away, so that there was not one left; it is very strange but common to all Europeans. I am sufficiently inform'd concerning it by French and Portugueses, so that when they had pass'd that sea no European breeds lice. This I can safely vouch of my self, that during twenty six years I liv'd in the several parts I shall mention in this paper, I never bred one; whether I wore cotton, or woollen, whether I shifted me once a fortnight, or oftner, or seldomer, I was always in the same condition without so much as a nit. After I return'd through Portugal to Castile, the old habit of body return'd. I cannot dive into the secret of it. If the natives of the Philippine islands, China and India bred none, it were reasonable; but that they should breed them, and yet the Europeans go free, I can give no reason for it, it is some particular influence. A religious man of the barefooted friers of our father St. Augustin happened to embark at Manila, designing for Spain, and Rome; he was troubled with several tetter, which many Europeans are subject to in that country; but having sail'd forty leagues northward, he on a sudden found himself free from that distemper. Five years after he return'd to the islands, and before he could get ashore, that ill habit of body return'd upon him, and he had the distemper, tho' during that time he had been wholly clear of it. This is certainly very singular.

14. Another thing no less strange happened to another religious man of the same order, which I will insert here that I may not forget it. He sail'd to Persia, and travel'd thence by land. One day he alighted from his camel hastily to ease nature, and did it as hastily because the Caravans never stop; he happened to find a leaf of some plant at hand, which he made use of instead of paper; and he prov'd so fortunate, that it absolutely cur'd him of terrible Hemorrhoids that tormented him, so that he continu'd some years in Europe, and return'd to the islands, yet never had more of that disease. When he observed how he was mended, and reflected on the cause, he could never find what leaf or plant that should be, which he was much concern'd at, and blam'd his oversight, tho' the eagerness of overtaking his company was his excuse; it was pity he knew it not, it being a loss to those who labour under this distemper. These two passages, and what I said before, prove there are unaccountable influences. On S. Laurence his day we landed, dirty, full of tar, and in a scurvy posture, but well pleas'd we left so much sea behind us. We thank'd all that belong'd to the ship for the kindness they had shew'd us. To say the truth, we did them all the service we could, and they deserv'd it for their kind entertainment and civility towards us, the Lord reward them for it.

CHAP. II.

The Journey to Mexico, stay there, and further progress to Acapulco.

1. IT cannot be deny'd, but that the Spanish nation has been renown'd for extending the faith of JESUS CHRIST, and making it known to mortals. This truth is plainly made out by the many conversions they have made, the blood it has shed in defence of the doctrine it preaches, and the great number that daily leave their country and parents on this account. This seems to be peculiar to Spain, says Gilbertus Genebrardus a French man, lib. VIII. Chronolog. An. 1492. Which year, says this grave author, the war of the Spaniards against the Moors was begun, and their expedition to the West-Indies began, as if it were the work of the Spaniards to subdue pagans and infidels. The same spirit continues to this day; and so we see that almost every year religious men go to several countries and provinces, without being discouraged by long voyages, difference of climates, and other great inconveniencies they meet with every moment. My order has had no small share in this undertaking, as is well known to the world, for much is written of it, which I allow as receiv'd. To this purpose twenty eight religious men of us came into New-Spain in the year 1646. Four and twenty upon his majesty's charge, the rest upon charity, and retrenching our allowance. Being come to Vera Cruz, we soon found lodging upon charity till we went from thence, which was a great goodness of GOD. We presently borrow'd

NAVA- borrow'd a thousand pieces of eight to pay RETTE. for the gun-room cabin, for it was our bargain to pay a thousand at S. Lucar, and a thousand at Vera Cruz. They were lent us without any interest, and the owner waited till we found means at Mexico to get the sum, which we honestly repaid.
 For the better conveniency of travelling, we divided our selves into three companies.
 All was new to us, the country, the trees, the fruits, and all other things. We pass'd through places infested with mosquito's, or gnats, which are very troublesome over mighty waters, heard terrible thunder, but met not with those uncouth roads, or mighty cold, which others who travel'd the same way the next year so mightily magnify'd; much whereof I mention'd at the beginning of the first chapter of this book.

Puebla de los Ange-
 los.

2. At Puebla de los Angeles we repos'd our selves a little, and were very charitably entertain'd in the monastery and college of our order. We saw the city, the church of our holy father S. Augustin, which is one of the best in the world; we had the blessing of the most illustrious lord D. John de Pallofax y Mendoza, a prelate great in all respects, insomuch that it will not be in the power of any man to eclipse his grandeur: He was mighty obliging to us, and behav'd himself like a loving father. We went on to our hospitium of S. Hiacintb de Tacuba, without the walls of Mexico, where we found the very learned and venerable F. F. Sebastian de Oquendo, of the monastery of Oviedo in Asturias; he had been some years before at Manila, where he was long professor of divinity, preach'd much, and that with singular spirit and fervour. He was prior of the monastery of S. Dominick, and labour'd indefatigably in that province, honouring it with his learning and virtue.
 He had writ a comment on S. Thomas, several tracts of morality, and likewise matter for sermons; was a man singular in all things, never drank chocolate, never eat flesh, spent most part of the night in prayer, was held in great esteem in that country:
 after death his reputation still increas'd, for when he had been bury'd six years, his body was found uncorrupted. At this time he was vicar of that house; it is easy to guess how he receiv'd us, and what tender affection he shew'd us. Being altogether there, we began to live according to the custom of our holy province, without any other bed but only two blankets upon boards, two hours mental prayer, our choir duty, time of study, and the rest that belongs to our profession. On fundays and holidays we preach'd and heard confessions, and every week had publick disputes. It was our misfortune that the following year 1647, the ships from Manila miss'd com-1647.

ing, so that we were forc'd to stay till the year 1648. That country was govern'd by the count de Salvatierra, a religious and affable person, who did us great honour.
 We made use of a precedent that had been to furnish the second year's maintenance and clothing; and the viceroy in pursuance of it resolv'd to relieve us. The assessor who was to pass the order, expected we should present him. Among the rest of the king's officers, there was one D. Peter Zarate, a man uncorrupted and consequently poor; he had a great kindness for us, and was wont to say, These gentlemen here understand their own methods; but I don't conceive nor comprehend them, let them look to it, for I hope in God I shall not go to hell for leaving my heirs plate. Three of us went to see the desert of the barefooted Carmelites, who entertain'd us as might be expected from their great charity, and the affection they have for our order. We saw it all, and judg'd it to be what it really was: Every part exhal'd virtue and sanctity.
 In our return we call'd at Santa Fe, and saw the house of that prodigy and wonder of virtue, the venerable Gregory Lopez.

3. At this time happen'd that terrible storm against the lord bishop Pallofax; God bless me, what was it they did not lay to his charge! These are things well known, and therefore I will not insist upon them. Two things I could never dive into, tho' I took pains about it; one is, the mask made by the scholars belonging to the society (it is a plain case, that the fathers who are so circumspect in all their actions had no hand in it) in which one of them carried a crossier ty'd to a horse's tail; another a mitre at the stirrup, and the figure of the bishop with the men he had on his head. All men dislik'd, and none could approve of it; the scholars de-serv'd to be severely punish'd. The other thing is, that I make no doubt of the many privileges granted to the Mendicant orders to preach, and hear confessions; which grants have been made by popes, who have done it upon mature deliberation, in regard to the extraordinary services they have done and daily do the church. Now what I observe is, that in Japan and China, the fathers of the society have, and do still pretend that the orders of S. Augustin, S. Francis, and S. Dominick can neither preach to, nor hear the confessions of even the Gentiles, without leave had of their order, who are Vicarii Foranei; upon which church-censures have been let fly: And that they at-fully. There was a great disturbance, and no little scandal given in that country at this time; who was the cause of it does not belong to me to determine. I look upon what S. Bernard says, Epist. 78. to be true, He is to himself a cause of scandal, who did that which ought to be reprov'd, not he who reproves it. No doubt but the good bishop suffer'd very much. Some boasted afterwards at Manila (there are always impertinent people) that they had got the better, and thrust up the said bishop into a hole at Osma. All I know of it is, that he liv'd and dy'd in that hole as they call it, with great reputation of piety, and that his body is at this time held in great veneration. The rest is left to God.

4. Leaving aside many things which are not material to the reader, I will go on with my travels. In Novemb. 1647. three of us set out for Acapulco, to expect the ships from Manila, and provide necessaries for our voyage. We went no doubt too soon, but our eagerness to be at the end of our journey made things appear rather as we wish'd, than as they were. We soon came to Cuernabaca, from the top of which place we discover'd that famous vale from which the marquesses del Valle take name. It look'd like a terrestrial paradise, and Cuernabaca seem'd no less. In every street there were two crystalline brooks, shaded on both sides with most beautiful plantane trees; these are not planes, as was observ'd before. A little beyond this place, upon crossing a small brook, the temperate air changes into excessive heat. This road is indeed bad and troublesome, there are mountains that reach up to the clouds, and as uncouth as may be; mighty rivers, and the summer then beginning, high swoln. Bridges there are none, but abundance of musqueto's, or gnats, that sting cruelly; some nights travellers lie in the open air. To secure our selves against the snakes, we beat the grass very well all about, and then set fire to it a good distance round; then got into the middle of it, where we rested as long as time would permit. We came to the place of the two brooks, where we pass'd the heat of the day expos'd to the sun. There are infinite gnats in that place; I placed my self in a small island between the two brooks to say my office, arm'd my self with gloves, and a cloth before my face, yet was it impossible to continue there two minutes. I us'd other methods, which avail'd neither my companions nor me, so that we were forc'd to make haste away; some places were tolerable. Being come to the river de las Balsas, we arm'd our selves again with patience; it is well known that river is very large, people pass over it on canes, which are supported by only four calabashes they are fastned to; at first NAVA- it is frightful to see so ridiculous and weak RETTE. an invention; an Indian lays hold of one end of it, and the passenger being upon it with his mules furniture, he swims, and draws it over after him. There I saw a thing that appear'd odd to me, every Indian wears a long towel over his shoulders, and with the end of it are continually driving away the gnats, and yet I saw their legs were raw with their stings.

5. I was told another thing no less strange: One of my companions went down the river to see for some fowl, he found the curate of a town, who, to escape the gnats, was in a little room close shut, and covered all round with clothes; they go not into any dark place. The heat was intolerable; discoursing of it, the curate said, That a few years before it had been so violent, that the thatch of the houses took fire, and the whole town was burnt. They were thatch'd with straw, and palm-tree leaves. Nothing could be beyond this.

6. We pass'd by night through the cane grove of Apango; in summer no body passes it, because the heat is so great people are stifled with it; it is six leagues long, and as many over, two cannot go abreast. At break of day my mule spy'd a lion, which made her start, so that she had like to have thrown me; at our shouts the lion went away slowly into the thickest part. At sun-rising we came to the town, where we were well receiv'd by the curate who was born in old Castile, his name Santoyo. He wore a cloth upon his shoulder to defend himself against the gnats, and ceas'd not beating with it a moment. Discoursing about the cane grove we came through, he told us how troublesome and dangerous it was to pass when the waters were out, as well because they met there, as by reason of the snakes that bred in the trees; so that when he went to the town on the other side of it to say mass, or to any sick person, he carry'd two Indians before him with hatchets to cut down the boughs, or could not go through, because certain small green snakes bred upon the boughs among the leaves, which by reason of their colour were hard to be discern'd, and as any one pass'd, would let themselves down upon his hat or cap, and then make to the face, sting, and immediately a man falls down dead. Their poison must needs be very strong.

7. Short of the river del Papagaio, or of the parrot, there are some sugar-works; R. del Pa- we arriv'd at them just as a poor Indian putting the cane into the mill, had his arm drawn in and ground to mash: He made his confession, with the assistance of an interpreter, because he would have it so, and dy'd soon after.

NAVA-RETTE. 8. At Tiztla, because the place was commodious, we rested two days and a half, without spending our time idly. We visited the curate, who then kept his bed, having been fore wounded with a spear by a villanous Mulatto, and the curate being old was very weak. The governor D. Joseph de Castejon was not able to turn himself in his bed, because his leg was broke. Other Spaniards labour'd under spiritual distempers, because all of them having had a great falling out with the curate, they would not be reconcil'd to him, tho' he from his bed heartily begg'd their pardon for any displeasure he had done them. The governor was willing to comply, as believing the misfortune he labour'd under had befallen him for having quarrell'd with the curate. Fathers, said he to us, I was going to a small town, and rode my mule, which is a good temper'd beast, the road as plain as my hand; I was discoursing with my friend concerning our quarrel with the curate, and said, before George I will furnish the curate with matter of merit. No sooner had I spoke the words but my mule stumbled, down I came in a moment, and my leg was broke. It was certainly a judgment, I'll have no more falling out with priests. The ensign Valenzuela, who was as deep in the mire as any, prov'd obstinate, ill-natur'd, and inflexible to all our exhortations to him to speak but a word or two to the curate, by way of condoling with him for his distemper, which was as much as we desir'd of him. He agreed to it with an ill will, and we went together to the poor curate's house. The ensign went in stamping, and in a haughty tone said; No more quarrelling, master curate, let every man stay in his own house and look to it, let us not scandalize the town. We were out of countenance, and the curate was struck dumb, that he had not a word to say for himself. In this posture we left that business. The Mulatto was fled, and we continu'd our journey on the day of the conception of the blessed Virgin, when there was a bull-feast. I shall never forget Valenzuela's perverse temper. D. Joseph the governor was of a generous disposition, and was a genteel person; I heard some years after that he was not cur'd, but walk'd about Mexico upon crutches; it is likely he did not forget what he said to us when he was in bed. Remembring the very words Valenzuela spoke to the curate when he visited him with us, I thought good to set them down, for it is no small rarity that I should keep them in mind twenty five years. Master curate, said he, since what's past is past, let us have no more trouble about it. An excellent way of begging pardon, especially considering his way of delivering himself, which cannot be describ'd.

7. We saw abundance of pheasants by the way, and some trees peculiar to that country; particularly one the Spaniards call the organ-tree: It is a very proper name, for the shape of it is exactly like an organ. I never saw such a tree in all my travels but only on that road. At a little town the Indian governor spoke to us; among other things he told us in broken Spanish, That he had a son whose name was D. Francisco de Aragon, Portugal, Mendoza, Gulman, Manriquez, y Campuzano. We were pleas'd at his noble surnames, and the Indian's vanity. It pleas'd God we came safe to Acapulco, which in the country language signifies Acapulco mouth of bell. I must here insert one thing which I happen'd to omit in the foregoing chapter: The monastery of the religious men of the order of S. John of God was at this time building at Mexico. The church was finish'd and finely contriv'd; the work went on, and yet it was not known who was at the charge. Some endeavours were us'd to discover it, but without success. Only the prior knew the founder, under this tie of secrecy, that whensoever he discover'd him the work should cease. I ever lik'd this action, he sought for no reward in this world who so carefully conceal'd his charity, he reserv'd all for the next life, where doubtless he receiv'd great interest: Read Oleas't in Exod. xxv. ad mores to this point. I have often ask'd, whether this benefactor was yet known, and was at last told that after his death he was, and that he was an honest man of no great account in that new world. About that same time Lorenzana built the renowned monastery of the incarnation. I am inform'd others have been built since. Mexico is one of the noblest cities in the world. I saw and handled another rarity, which is the crown of our Lady of the rosary at our monastery, it cost twenty four thousand pieces of eight. They tell me another of the very same sort, tho' less, is made for the child Jesus, which she holds in her arms. A religious man of note gather'd alms to pay for this work.

CHAP. III.

The Author's stay at Acapulco, and Voyage to the Philippine Islands.

1. WE had a house hir'd for us at Acapulco ever since the last year, against the season came to go to sea: It is usually hired for eight or ten days, the religious religious men use to stay there for two months to provide necessaries. The houses are all low, without any upper floor at all; the best of them are mud-walls, and all thatch'd; nevertheless they made us pay four hundred pieces of eight for ours; this seems incredible, but to me who paid it, is most certain. Our landlady was a good ancient widow, whose name was Mary de Esquibel; she had a son a priest of a most exemplary life. He was excellent company for us: the curate's name was N. Anjo, born near Osonno, above seventy years of age, he was something poor, yet the report went, that he had hoarded above twenty thousand pieces of eight. He once own'd to me, that one year his benefice had been worth to him four thousand pieces of eight. The governor of the fort was D. John de Bracamonte Santistevan, born at Avila de los Cavalleros, an affable, meek, courteous and accomplish'd gentleman. He held not that post as proprietor. The port is the best and safest in the world, as they who had seen many others affirm'd. Of all I ever saw, and they are not a few, none can compare to it. The fort is good, has a battery of excellent cannon; no ship can come into the harbour, but they can sink her. The temperature of the air is hellish, according to the name it bears; and therefore in the rainy season, which is the summer in Spain, all persons retire up the country for better air, excepting the blacks, some poor people, and the soldiers. Whilst I was there my two companions fell sick, and I continu'd in health to attend them, and do our other business. That is such a country, that if a man will keep a servant, it will cost him at least a crown a day, besides his diet; and if there are ships in the harbour, three pieces of eight will not do. I never saw a dearer country in all my travels. I was forc'd to do all our business my self, because our money would not reach to servants, and therefore I took care of the poultry, and fed them. The drinking water was brought from a little spring, about a musket-shot from our house; they call it Chorrillo, the little stream. Every earthen vessel cost me two ryals (a shilling.)

2. Two misfortunes besel us in that place. One was the death of the governor of the castle, who was a real friend. I heard his confession, and attended him as much as I could. He dy'd in my arms, and was a great loss to us. They went about burying of him, and five hundred pieces of eight were demanded. I was astonish'd at it, especially because there was but one priest belonging to the church: at last they agreed for a hundred and fifty. At his funeral the cannon were fir'd, and it was strange that it was heard fourteen leagues up the country. I would not have believ'd NAVA- it, had not the man who heard it, and was RETTE. a person of worth, vouch'd it in my hearing. He was a particular friend to the deceas'd, and was going to visit him that very day the cannon were fir'd. He had lain fourteen leagues from the port, and hearing the cannon, said, Either D. John is dead, or some ship is come from Manila. This he told us after his arrival there. Several made interest for that employment: the viceroy gave it to a Biscainer, whose name was D. Martin—he prov'd a good man; he had been before at Manila; and liv'd not long, as shall soon appear.

3. The second and greatest misfortune was, that the church of St. Nicholas, which was at the end of the town, a great way from our house, took fire. It broke out about one of the clock, and about four all the town was almost reduced to ashes. The wind carry'd the fire, the houses were thatch'd, and dry as tinder, there is no doubt but it burnt fiercely. The rarity was, that the wind would carry a spark two hundred paces, which no sooner fell upon a house, but the flame blaz'd up to the clouds. The bells of the monastery of St. Francis fell down; their fall and the hole they made in the ground, were the cause of discovering eight pieces of cannon hid there by D. Sebastian de Corcuera, who had been governor of the Philippine islands, and was then kept prisoner at Manila by D. James Faxardo, who succeeded him in that government. The loss of the royal apothecary's shop was deplorable, all the pots and vessels were of fine China ware; and tho' the house was slated, yet that would not save it from utter ruin. In the yard of our house there was a shed in which there were thirty six long heavy chests belonging to D. Sebastien de Corcuera, the six least were sav'd with much trouble, the other thirty were burnt, and the fire held there three days. All that was brass remain'd, but much disfigur'd; a thousand curiosities were burnt, abundance of rich China ware, which to save it from breaking, was pack'd up with cloves, pepper, and China ink. Corcuera lost several thousand ducats. Some have writ great commendations of this gentleman, as well in regard to his being uncorrupted, as upon other accounts, which might be very well sav'd; many truths may be conceal'd, but it is not lawful to maintain and publish the contrary, especially when the fact is notorious. To undertake for private ends, to give the lie to all the world, who were eye-witnesses of what was done, is to convict one's self of flattery and deceitfulness. According to the vogue of all men in the Philippine islands, he was no good man; some

NAVA- some in these parts will have him to be so, RETTE. God rest his soul, and give us grace. The fire went so far, that it got into our hen-roost, and burnt near three hundred. so that we lost the refreshment of our voyage. One thing mov'd me to compassion, and made me shed some tears. Every man upon such occasions looks to his own house, without regarding his neighbours.
 The guardian was left alone in his mona-stry, and being sensible of the danger of the fire, put a stole about his neck, and carry'd out the blessed sacrament. The old man walk'd about weeping, without knowing where to secure his heavenly treasure. He went away to our house; we placed our LORD in our oratory. The fire came on, F. guardian took him up again. We set a chair under a tree, where it stood some time, till at night it was carry'd to the governour of the castle's house. We three, with what little we had, stay'd in the open field, expecting some body would give us house-room. The governour was every where, he walk'd afoot, and being fat overheated himself, which turn'd to a fever, of which he dy'd after we were gone to sea, as we were afterwards inform'd. That town was so ruin'd and all men so sad, that no body spoke a word. Near to our house there were two large stately trees, the fruit they bear is like dry beans, they are an excellent purge: we saw the experiment try'd upon a little black; it was very remarkable, it never ceas'd working till he wash'd his hands in cold water, which stops it. Opposite to the house in the old fort were, as I suppose there still are, the tamarind trees, which are beautiful, and the fruit wholesome and very medicinal; there I took provision of it for the ship. In that place I several times saw the king of the Zopilotes, which are the same we call Vultures, it is one of the finest birds that may be seen. I had often heard it prais'd, and, as I thought, they over-did it; but when I saw the creature, I thought the description far short of it. I mention'd it in my first book. There are in that country abundance of terrible scorpions. We were told a good and easy remedy against them, which was when we went to bed to make a commemoration of St. George. I continu'd this devotion many years. God be prais'd: the saint always deliver'd me both there and in other countries from those and such like insects.
 We used another remedy besides, which was to rub all about the beds with garlick.
 We were assur'd there, that it was a try'd and certain remedy against this sting, and the pain of it, to stroke the part that was hurt with a child's private member, which immediately takes away the anguish, and then the venom exhales. The moisture that comes from a hen's mouth is good for the same.

 I once catch'd another little insect that disturb'd the poultry, it was very deform'd, and of a strange shape. As soon as it was known, several women came to beg its tail; I gave it them, and they told me, that it was of excellent use dry'd, and made into powder; being a prodigious help to women in labour, to forward their delivery, if they drank it in a little wine.

4. There is another little creature in Mexico, which they call zorillo, of a hellish nature, for when it breaks wind, it infests all the ground about with the stench.
 The greatest trouble we all of us had during this time, was, that no ship came from Manila, tho' the season was well advanced.
 At night whales would come into the bay, and make such a noise in the water, that it sounded like cannon; at first we fancy'd some ship was coming in, the neighbours undeceiv'd us, so that we took no more notice of that noise. About the middle of March a ship pass'd before the harbour to the northward, every body was alarm'd; we expected it should tack about, as being of opinion they had not made the mouth of the harbour. It accordingly tack'd, a boat went out and brought it in, but it came from Panama to fetch the viceroy, who was prefer'd to the government of Peru. There was some dispute, whether the viceroy should go away to Peru in that vessel, or should send relief in it to the Phi- lippine islands, whence no ships had come in two years. There were some troubles in Peru at the same time. A consultation being held, they agreed it was best to relieve the islands. The plain truth is, they had no mind the bishop of Campeche, who had been at Mexico some time to that purpose, should take the government upon him. What the consult had decreed, was put in execution; the pink was taken up for the king's use, for thirty six thousand pieces of eight. There is no doubt but in the East-Indies they would build four vessels as big again as that for the money.

5. This secur'd our voyage. I began with fresh courage to make my provision, and secure water, which is a main point; there was enough of it, but the putting it aboard only cost me thirty six pieces of eight. The blacks monopolize this trade, and it must be as they please. The vessel was small; the men, merchandise, commodities sent by the king, provision, water, wine, &c. in so great a quantity, it seem'd impossible so little a ship should contain; and in short many bails were again brought ashore for want of stowage. The commander was our friend; he made the best provision for us he could, and we were much

much better accommodated than we had been the first voyage. Thirty priests of us went aboard upon Palm-sunday, the 8th of April, 1648. One of the king's officers never return'd me twelve fowl I had lent him, tho' he had no manner of right, for he did us no kindness, nor had we the least favour from him or his companions. F. guardian kept back six upon charity, that was the reward I had for the sermon I preached upon St. Joseph's day. As we were going aboard, a letter from the lord bishop Palafox came to our vicar, telling him, he received news from Spain, that the islands were in the hands of the Dutch, that he would do well to look to it. This news was spread abroad: I don't doubt but there was sufficient ground for it, as shall be said hereafter. And tho' it was enough to discourage any man, yet none were dismay'd the least, but we all resolutely declar'd we would see how it was. If we consider it rightly, it was a rashness, at least to human appearance; but God seem'd to have a hand in't, we were eager to go, and therefore valued nothing. S. Thom. in i. ad Rom. l. 5. says, That whatsoever a man eagerly desires, he seeks to gain it at any rate, whether easy or difficult. He never considers obstacles.

6. On Palm-sunday we din'd aboard the vessel upon what our landlady sent us; for having receiv'd four hundred pieces of eight for the hire of two little pitiful houses she furnished us, after the fire we spoke of before, she now shew'd her self grateful, and treated us well. There is a lake near that place, which breeds an excellent sort of fish call'd almojarra, this it was we din'd upon that day. I put to sea with much satisfaction, and tho' the land we left astern was high enough, yet we lost sight of it that afternoon. Eight days we lay by for a wind; the heat during that dead calm was extraordinary. Upon Easter-day one mass was said, the pink was not convenient nor big enough to celebrate that high mystery, so that was the first and last. We never miss'd the Rosary, Litanies, and Te Deum at break of day; besides these, other devotions, and spiritual discourses. That day the wind freshen'd, and held without abating the least twenty four days. The sea beat hard upon the side of the little pink, which made it and us very uneasy. The commander, who was us'd to that voyage, said it was a strong current coming down from Caliphornia. And though afterwards discoursing on this subject with one who thought himself skilful in navigation, he deny'd that any such thing could be, yet I believe what I heard from him that understood it, and am the better satisfied in it, in regard how ill the said person came off, when his opinion was thwart-NAVATED. All the jars and pots that were emptied aboard the vessel, were cast into the sea; a chest of bisket and hen-coops were immediately burnt to make us some more room. We had hardly room to stand. No body could live under deck, it was so full of provisions and commodities. All men lay expos'd to the sun and air. We had the steer-ridge, which was no small comfort; the cabbins was very little, yet a great ease. Having sail'd eight hundred leagues, we left St. Bartholomew's island to the northward, but saw it not; they say it is small, and destitute of all things. We had a dead calm for eight days again. The seamen and soldiers would leap into the sea to cool themselves, but would sometimes return hastily to escape the sharks they discover'd. A very strange, and to appearance miraculous accident befel us. Some men went down for water, to give all people their allowance; when they came up, I and many others observ'd they were as pale as a clout, we ascrib'd it to the great heat under deck. They kept their counsel, without taking notice there was any thing more than ordinary; among the rest one Belastain a captain of foot had been down: when we were ashore, we understood that they going to look with a candle what water there was in the cask, lit upon a barrel of powder, in which the candle went out, without giving fire to it. This seems incredible, but certain it is, that had it taken fire, we had all flown up into the air, before we could say, LORD have mercy upon us. When we do not watch, our guardian angels watch for us, and succour us in distress. When they told it us, though we were ashore, it made our hair stand an end.

7. There was another extraordinary accident, but of no danger. The master was a Portuguese, his name Antunez, who no doubt understood his business; he daily computed how many leagues we ran, according to his judgment, for in sailing from east to west there is no certain rule. This is a subject has employ'd many, and does at present, to find the fixt longitude, but I believe to no purpose. Some who slept more than the master, would have it we had run more leagues, and said, we were past the islands de los Ladrones, or of thieves, now call'd Marcanas: there was much debate, and wagers laid. The master was nettled, and swore they should not be seen till next sunday. Every body look'd upon it as a piece of Portuguese positiveness. Trinity sunday came, at sun rising he sent up to the round-top, and said, This day before eight of the clock we shall discover the islands de los Ladrones. It was very strange; about half an hour after, he that was

NAVA- was at the top-mast cry'd out, Land a RETTE. head, land. They all stood amaz'd, and not without cause. That afternoon they discover'd four sail from the topmast-head, which caus'd a great consternation, but it was a mistake of the sailor. A small vessel made up to us; we lay by for it, to take in some refreshment it likely brought, which the natives of those islands exchange for nails and old iron. About night-fall it quite vanish'd astern of us. How that came to pass, and who was aboard, shall be said in another place. Three days after was a great calm, and after it follow'd a terrible storm. They lower'd the top-masts, and the commander was for cutting down the masts by the board. The master's mate, who was an excellent seaman, oppos'd it. The violence of the wind put us by our course. We stood for the channel of St. Bernardine, and were forced to steer away for New Segovia. Having discover'd the land of the islands, we kept our coasting along, and towards the shore perceiv'd high sand-banks, shoals, and rocks. The master gave the steersman directions what course to hold, and lay down to sleep a little. Fresh islands and shoals were discover'd ahead, and our commander order'd the man at helm to stand in to shoar. The purser presently stept up and cry'd, A shoal ahead. They shifted the helm, and we weather'd it wonderfully, the vessel almost glancing upon it. The master wak'd with the noise, was in a mighty passion, and he had good reason, because they had not follow'd his orders. He stood directly from the land till we came into fourteen degrees and a half latitude. Thus we arriv'd safe on mid-summer-day at Casigura de Baler. Next day some people went ashoar, but late, for which the commander was blam'd. They advanced to hear how things stood, the Dutch having been there with four sail, which had not the storm prevented it, had certainly taken us; the natives thought our men were enemies; being satisfy'd they were not, they receiv'd them. There they had a short account of the posture the islands were in, of the victories his majesty's forces had obtain'd over the Dutch, and that the enemy still infested those seas. They brought aboard with them two Indians who spoke several languages, and knew how to carry a ship to Lampoon. Having heard this news, and receiv'd these pilots, we sail'd that night, and the next day within musket-shot of the shoar, which was very delightful. That afternoon we came to an anchor in the port. About midnight the wind blew furiously at south west, and tho' it came over the land, it made our anchors give way, and was driving us out to sea. That wind seems to have been the effect of a special providence, to keep off the enemy. Next day the plate, and other goods belonging to his majesty and private persons, were secur'd, and it was propos'd to lay up the pink upon the back of a small island, that the enemy might not discover it, tho' he should come into the port. We set out for Manila, and by the way were inform'd how much all men were overjoy'd at our unexpected arrival. That great satisfaction was in some measure allay'd, for the enemy by mere accident discover'd the pink, and made to it. Our men being ill provided, at variance, and the commander but an indifferent soldier, they set fire to it sooner than there was occasion; so that in half an hour's time his majesty lost thirty six thousand pieces of eight, and they that were aboard some reputation.

8. We travel'd four days afoot, not along a road, for there is none, but over hills, rocks, and inaccessible places. Some rivers we swam over, others we waded breast-high. On the mountains, which are very high and thick of trees, we found such multitudes of leeches, that there was no possibility of avoiding them; the blood ran from us all as we went. I declare it for a certain truth, that I saw one making its way thro' a shoe; I call'd upon others to observe that strange sight, as accordingly they did, and stood amaz'd at it. It rain'd very hard; we halted wherever night overtook us. The Indians made huts cover'd with the leaves of palm-trees, in which we lay upon the grass with the water flowing over it. The last day we went down a hill, whose ascent was two leagues, some said more; that day we descended as much as we had ascended in three. Some part of it was very rough, the rain continual, so that we tumbled every step, and could not avoid it; and I avouch it for a truth, that I saw some of my companions sitting down carry'd some little way by the water, and yet so well pleas'd it is hard to be imagin'd.

9. We came to Apanguiel, where there is a fine monastery of our father St. Francis, but were so wet, dirty, weary, and hungry, that nothing less than all the kind entertainment we met with there could have made us appear like men. Our cheer was such as agreed with those holy men's charity. The next day two fathers arriv'd there from Manila, which was still fresh comfort to us. Another F. guardian, who was F. Luke, carried four of us to his monastery; the church was beautiful, the house indifferent, the seat the finest and most delicious that can be imagin'd. It stands high, and from a balcony there was a full prospect of all the lake Bai, which is thirty ty leagues in circumference, has some islands in the middle, and is encompass'd on all sides with mountains, groves, palm and plantane trees, rivers and marshes, extremely pleasing to the eye. We afterwards visited other monastries, and still found every thing new and rare. We set out in two vessels for Manila, cross'd the lake, lay that night at Binangoa, where the guardian F. Francis made very much of us. The next night we continued our voyage to the mouth of the lake, where ten vessels from Manila expected us; in them there were Cbineses, Indians, and the Mungrels. We laid mask, and getting aboard, sail'd down the river, being notably entertain'd with fireworks, beating of basons, and firing of muskets. The Cbinese basons made us gaze, for tho' they are no bigger than an ordinary bason, they sound like a great bell. It is a strange instrument. The river is one of the finest in the world. That of Goa is wider and deeper, but this is better set out with great houses, orchards, towns NAVARRETTE. and churches. We went into some palaces, which would surprize any European. Being come to the bridge of Manila, a notable structure, we saw it cover'd with people of several nations. We were receiv'd into our monastery with ringing of bells, where we immediately visited the miraculous image of our Lady of the Rosary, the comfort of that and all the other islands in their afflictions and distresses. The sight of it rejoiced our souls, and made us forget all past toils. The father provincial, as a singular favour and indulgence, granted us eight days exemption from mattins. Those that came at other times said, he had dispens'd with them but for three days, and that the privilege granted was very great. To say the truth, there wanted not some that went to the choir that very night, but I had not so much fervor of spirit as to perform so much.

CHAP. IV.

The Author's Stay at Manila.

1. D. James Faxardo Cbacon govern'd the islands at this time; this gentleman was excellently qualify'd for government, because he hated money and women. F. Andrew Gomez, a religious man of my order, carry'd him a little bit of the holy cross set in gold. He valued it at a great rate, but would not accept of the relic till the gold was taken off. He retir'd too much, and gave ear to none but Emanuel Estacio de Venegas, who grew so proud of his power and preferment, that he govern'd absolutely. He was no less dreaded by all men, than Nero was in his time, but he suffer'd for it afterwards. D. James Faxardo had now kept D. Sebastian de Corcuera in prison five years. A strange turn of fortune! D. Sebastian had been the most absolute, the most dreaded lord in the world. In his time happen'd the banishment of that archbishop so much talk'd of throughout all those nations. He undertook the war of Ialo, where the gentry of Manila perish'd. The island Hermosa was lost, by his neglecting to relieve it, as all men there say. He gather'd vast wealth. He was sent a prisoner to New Spain, and afterwards to Madrid, where it is said he came off well. They expected other sort of news than they heard of him at Manila. Some body has writ that he was a man that regarded not interest, but the author gives no proof of it but his bare word. I read it in a pamphlet that D. Sebastian de Corcuera clear'd himself, alledging, he had gather'd his riches out of his majesty's allowance. But another pamphlet argues against him thus. First, That governors cannot deal or trade with his majesty's allowance. 2. That it is impossible he could with his allowance gain as much as the Custodium cost, which was lately brought to his majesty; what he lost in the ship that was cast away upon the islands de los Ladrones; what was burnt at Acapulco; the plate he had at Mexico; and what was taken of his at Burgos. Nor does it follow that he was a good governor, because he has since behav'd himself like a good Christian: nor is there any ill consequence can follow of speaking the truth out of a true zeal, only that they are displeas'd to hear it, who do not desire to know it. Estacio de Venegas, whilst a private man in Manila, was belov'd by all men, when a favourite he was hated: there is a great deal of difference between being in a post, or being in none, to make a man's actions be the rule of honesty. D. Sebastian was the inventor of the vandalas, (it is a name given by the natives, and signifies a division, or rather assessment) which has been the ruin of all men. For the better understanding of it, I will explain it in a few words. In the first place I must declare it is a great piece of ignorance to make D. Sabiniano Mamrique de Lara the author of this division. How could this gentleman be the author of the vandalas, when there was fourteen years pay of the vandalas due to the Indians when he enter'd upon the government? The revolt of Pampanga for want of paying these divisions, happen-

NAVARETTE. ing during this gentleman's government, perhaps was the cause some men talk'd as they did. True it is, that insurrection oblig'd D. Sabiniano to give them a great number of pieces of eight, in part of what was due, as they told me afterwards; but this was paying; and what was that to prove him the inventor? in short, after the Indians have paid their taxes, attended the cortes, and other personal duties, which are many, they rate every province yearly; as for instance, that of Pampanga at twenty four thousand bushels of rice, at two ryals, or two and a half, a bushel, because it is for his majesty, and this they are to trust God knows how long. The Indians of the province are rated how much every one is to furnish to make up this quantity, which is exacted with great rigour, besides the frauds of the masters of vessels who carry it; so that he who is assess'd three bushels, must give half a bushel over; and he who is assess'd six, pays seven, &c. This is it they call vandalas, and this is what was not paid for so many years, which makes the Indians quit the islands, and go to other places, and forbear sowing, as I my self have heard them confess; and it is most certain, that if this assessment were sometimes taken in lieu of the other taxes, or they were exempted some personal duty, they would be very well pleas'd. But it is hard that this should be continued every year, and that there should be plate to pay ministers, officers civil and military, and other expences, and never any to pay what is bought of the Indians. If these and the like proceedings cause the Indians to quit the country, where will be the advantage of those lands, or what will the Spaniards do there?

3. The greatest trouble we religious men meet with in the towns of the Indies, is to see their sufferings, and find out how to comfort them. It sometimes happens, as it did in my time, that the rice is destroy'd in some parts (this is frequent, sometimes the mice eat it, sometimes for want of rain, and sometimes the sea breaks in and drowns it) so that there was no possibility of paying the usual tax. This was made known to the lieutenant of the province, the governor of the island was petition'd, but to no purpose; so that the Indians bought rice at four ryals the bushel, and sold it to his majesty for two and a half upon trust never to be paid. It is plain our catholick kings bowels of compassion would not allow of such practices, were they sensible of them. It were better for the Indians, that the governors should maintain them, and they work all the year for the taxes and vandalas, than to be handled as they are now. It is a great misfortune that the Tartar should take such care of his Chinese subjects, and that we should make it our business to take no care of our sovereign lord the king's subjects, having receiv'd such frequent intimations of his will. It is no wonder those islands are so exhausted, though the soil is as good, as fruitful, and as kind as can be wish'd.

4. It were endless to descend to particulars. I know that in my time a governor of Ilocos in two years made fourteen thousand pieces of eight of his government; what a condition did he leave the Indians and their country in? It were well that those who write from thence would speak plain, and point at persons and things, and not do in general terms, leaving room to blame those that are innocent, and clear the guilty. This must be either a design, or malice. All the world knows how clear our province has always been, and still is, from seeking after any worldly interest in that country; they have never consented to possess the least revenue, they have never receiv'd duties from the Indians they serve, they have always been satisfied with the alms freely given by Spaniards, or natives: thus have they been maintain'd, and have cloth'd themselves out of the alms his majesty gives them, and have wanted for nothing. It is requisite to discover who are guilty, that all may not suffer. Read Oleas. in xxv. Num. & nomen viri Israel, &c. One year a certain governor writ a complaint against our fathers at Pagasinan (one while he was for us, another against us, so changeable is man) that they had burnt some woods, whence timber was to be had to build shipping. It is easy to imagine the effects this letter from a governor produced in the council of the Indies. Now if this man would go about to burn the hundredth part of one wood, he would not be able to compass it in a year with the assistance of ten thousand Indians. This is well known to those who have seen the woods in the Philippine islands, and the proofs are convincing. The blacks who live in the midst of those woods are very numerous, and burn a great deal, yet it is never mis'd. In the island Mindoro, where I was twice, I was an eye-witness to what the Indians practise. They have no lands to sow, and to get some little rice they fire part of a wood; after they have labour'd at it some days, they clear and cut down the under-wood, they heap them together, and set fire to them again; when all that is burnt, they set fire to the great trees, till they waste them by degrees; and they are so hard, that the Indians are forc'd to ply it eight days or longer, stirring and raking up the fire. When an Indian has labour'd two months from morning

ing to night, he has clear'd about as much land as he alone can manure. How then could a vicar with four Indians burn whole woods? Were not this true I would not write it, but would rather have pass'd it over since it is now forgot, but it is fit to be known in case any thing of the same nature may happen again that no man may rashly give credit to that which is in it self incredible. D. Sebastian Cavallero de Medina, being his majesty's attorney general, either to shew great zeal, or gain reputation, sent a complaint of the excessive duties religious men exacted from the Indians in these parts; there is no doubt they were all thought guilty. He ought to have explain'd it, and not make the innocent liable to be blam'd for the fault of some.

5. Eight days after our arrival, we were distributed into several provinces to learn languages, that we might administer to the Indians. I remain'd in the province of Manila, where with some others I learn'd the language Tagala, without much difficulty. If in Europe grammar and other arts were follow'd with such application, as we there learnt languages, Men would soon be learned. At the end of five months we all heard confessions and preach'd, and at the year's end did both with great ease, and convers'd with the Indians about their affairs. During this time we employ our selves no other way save only in the business of the church and choir. Our whole time is taken up in descending to cafes and tenes of strange tongues, for the benefit of souls. If the climate were not so opposite to that of our country, we should take double the pains. The heat is excessive, to ease it we use baths, and the fruit which is most delicious, but in time we grow sickly. I always lik'd the Indians, they are not harsh and stern, like those we saw at Mexico, but civil and tractable; they have wit enough, and are very dextrous at any thing. There are among them excellent penmen, painters, carvers. They are apt to learn any mechanick trade, and above all very willing to learn, and submissive to priests; as for their understanding in what concerns our holy faith, they may vie with most of our countrymen, and out-do them all. They have excellent books in their language, which the religious have printed, and they love to read them; so this is owing to our labour, and their aptness to learn. The Indian women are very devout and modest, and frequent the sacraments with great zeal. There is no holy-day great or small but abundance go to confession, and receive the blessed sacrament. I us'd to say, that the fervour of the ancient people of Castile was gone over to the Indian men and women at Manila. The Indians celebrate festival days very well, there are few among them but Navadance very well; and so in processions they use dancing and play well on the harp and guitar. His majesty allows every church eight singing men, who enjoy privileges, are employ'd at the divine office, and sing well; there being always some aiming at those places, the number is greater, but only the eight that are appointed enjoy the privileges granted. The ornament of the churches is decent, curious and cleanly; and there being abundance of roses, flowers, and sweet herbs all the year, these things are great helps to set out the churches.

6. The Indians are great archers, especially those they call Zambales, and those that live in the mountains; they have no other arms offensive or defensive. I heard ancient men tell such feats of them, as I judg'd incredible, till I had an opportunity of convincing my self. Men ought not presently to believe all they hear, nor should they be as incredulous as I have been. I once met a company of mountain-Indians, and among them four, of about seven or eight years of age. I took an orange, which are very plentiful there, and threw it up into the air, as high as I could, saying, shoot that orange, my lads. They all four hit it in the air, and beat it to pieces. Another new comer and I were astonish'd, and he who had been longer there, and told us of it, laugh'd at us. This I was my self an eye-witness to in the little town they call Abucanantaas. This shews they are good archers.

7. Whilst I continued in the islands I perform'd all the duties obedience laid upon me; I ministr'd to the Indians, I taught in our college and university of S. Thomas, and preach'd, tho' I was never healthy; for after two years being there, the country disagreed with me very much. During this time some particular accidents happen'd, a few whereof I will put down, that I may not extend too far. Col. D. Lorenzo Lazo, a good soldier, very brave, and of a gigantick stature and presence, was governor of Terranate; he was at variance with Emanuel Estacio, and was impeach'd of holding correspondence with the Dutch, a mere foppery. He was brought away prisoner, and dy'd aboard the ship somewhat suddenly. His death was laid to Estacio's charge, I know not how he clear'd himself. His death was much lamented, and the manner of it suspected, for he was very well belov'd, and much fear'd and honour'd by the Chinese infidels; because at the rising under Corcuera, he alone with his sword and buckler on a bridge, stop'd a world of Chinese he met there, as Horatius Cocles did upon the like occasion. Admiral Sebastian Lopez a Portuguese, and brave soldier, liv'd

K k k

NAVA- at Manila, and did wonders in the victories RETTE. we obtain'd over the Dutch. He dy'd suddenly, and was thought to be poison'd. This also was laid to the charge of Emanuel Estacio, besides many other things sent into Spain.

8. The Hollanders some years before having done much harm in that country, entered the territory of Batan, where those of my order exercis'd the spiritual function, and possess'd themselves of the churches, rather through our fault, than any valour of theirs; the governor resolv'd they should be demolish'd. The greatest mistake was in suffering them to be built, but once finish'd, they could stand the enemy in no stead, as having no harbour, or so much as water enough for their ships within a league, nor any safe way to travel by land. Our cowardice gave them the opportunity to break in, and was the occasion of demolishing those buildings, in which the natives suffer'd much, because they did not only work, but all the timber, which was very good, a considerable quantity, and their own, was taken from them, without allowing them a cross for it, and Emanuel Estacio made his presents of the very stone. If the materials had been left to the Indians, since they were their own, they would have demolish'd the churches for the value of them, have had money to spare, and time to attend their tillage, and other labour. This brought those poor people into some distress, and among their other misfortunes the enemy took some of them, and two religious men of ours well vers'd in the Ta-gala language.

9. Upon the death of D. Lorenzo Lafo, D. Lorenzo de Ayala succeeded as colonel; he was a Castellan, or governor of fort Santiago, or S. James, a most amiable person; there was no body in Manila but lov'd him tenderly. The lady Anne Tellez his wife was a faint-like woman, they were call'd the loving couple, and each was above seventy years of age. Estacio took not this in good part; a proud man cannot endure that any body should rise above him, he thwarted the old gentleman, which soon put an end to his life, to the great regret of all that knew him. From him that command went to D. Peter de Almonte. This gentleman had been some time banish'd Manila, he was not of Estacio's faction, and therefore it was fear'd he should be chous'd of the post; but the governor having by this time a jealousy of Estacio, because D. John de Saraos had done him an ill turn, he sent for D. Peter and gave him his commission, and made him knight of the order of Santiago at the same time. The publick rejoic'd at this, and Estacio was very much troubled and in care for his fortune, which having rais'd him so high through so many wrongs, he had cause to fear would soon cast him down. St. Thomas in Pfal. xxxvi. says thus, The order of falling is, because they are lifted up that they may fall the heavier; but the manner is like smoke, which once scatter'd is no more to be retriev'd. So it prov'd with this man. On the fourteenth of September, being the feast of the exaltation of the holy cross, it was whiper'd about the city that he was apprehended. Every man was struck dumb without daring to speak out; for had it not prov'd true, any man that had mention'd the least word would have paid for it. The news grew hotter, and it appear'd they had carry'd him away prisoner to the fort of Santiago, or S. James. The city began to breathe, and was eas'd of the heavy cross it had bore some years, and that day he began to bear that which God sent him: When he was in honour he did not understand. He neither understood himself, nor knew how to sit fast in the saddle. Much of what he had was seiz'd, but he had much more conceal'd, as well in Manila, as at Mexico. He suffer'd and came to misery, and some years after dy'd in the dungeon. It were better for him to have been contented with his first fortune of a merchant, and inhabitant of Manila, in which quality he was belov'd by all men. This is he who said he would stop the mouth of any governor that should succeed D. James: with one or two hundred thousand pieces of eight. He was very much deceiv'd.

10. Upon Corpus Christi day, in the year 1653, a considerable misfortune befel me, which was that a flash of lightning fell upon the house of Batan, where I then was; our LORD deliver'd me, the religious men and others belonging to the monastery. That day sevensnight another flash of lightning fell two musquet-shot from the house, where it kill'd a black and an Indian, who were gone out a hunting. That disaster struck a great terror into me; till then I own I dreaded thunder but little, or not at all, but ever since nothing can be more fearful than I am. Soon after upon S. Barnabas's eve, as I was carrying our collegiates of S. Thomas out to recreation, in crossing the river, the wind blew hard, overset the boat, and we were all in the water. The waves were so strong that we holding fast by the sides of the little champan which was overset, they drove us away as if we had been but a straw. The danger was great, therefore I took care to absolve them all, tho' with great trouble and anxiety. There was no body to absolve me, and I had scarce presence of mind enough to lift up my heart to God. An infinite number of people look'd on without being able to succour us. It pleas'd God some canoes ventur'd out, which tho' they overset too, yet they sav'd our lives. I was in most danger because of the weight of my habits. Two blacks who stuck by me, under God sav'd my life. We all returned safe to the place where we took boat, clothes and other things were lost; but the bottle of wine to say mass, being two fingers breadth empty'd, was thrown ashore. God in his mercy was pleas'd to deliver me from all these dangers.

11. About the same time we receiv'd the news of a dismal accident which had happened at Cagayan, to one of my fellow travellers, whose name was F. Luiz Gutierrez, born at Almagro, and a very good religious man. On Candlemas-day that year he had said two masses in two several towns; there was another three leagues off, and therefore for the satisfaction of those Indians, that they might not be left without mass on so great a day, he resolv'd to go thither and say the third. He was sailing along a creek very dangerous, because of the alligators; they observ'd one stirring in some particular place, the Indians in the boat took heart, and endeavour'd to keep on their way, making a noise with their oars and shouting; but it avail'd nothing, for at the second terrible stroke the alligator gave with his tail, he overset the vessel, so that they were all in the water. The Indians being more active, and having less hindrance from clothes, easily got to shore. The poor religious man loaded with his habits, and not over skilful in swimming, became a prey to that cruel bloody monster, who fed on him, and he was bury'd in his bowels.

12. We know for certain that some deaths, which to the eyes of men are unhappy, are happy before God, and to them that pass through them. A good death, says St. Augustin, is that which follows a good life, be it of what sort it will. It is a bad death which comes after an ill life, tho' it be quiet and peaceable in bed. The good F. Lewis Gutierrez having liv'd so virtuously, said two masses that day, and being about to say the third, who is there that can doubt of his good disposition? Why God should permit that misfortune, is to be try'd in another court, it is our duty to be always ready; Be ye ready, because ye know neither the day nor the hour. Read what A Lapid writes concerning Lot's wife in Gen. xix. 24. and that of the prophets, 3 reg. xii.

13. I several times saw fierce and terrible alligators, especially one morning as I was coming down from saying mass in a town, and went down the river towards the sea; the Indians began to cry out Caiman, Caiman, that is, Alligator, Alligator; I NAVA- look'd all about and saw him not, they RTTEE. pointed at him, and yet I was not satisfy'd; and the truth was I saw him, but he being so vastly big, that I could not persuade my self it was an alligator, or that there were any so large in the world as what they shew'd me. We drew nearer, and then I plainly discover'd and distinguish'd him: He lay asleep upon a little island of sand at the mouth of the river, and I thought it as big as the main mast of a good ship; and before I thought that bulk had been some tree carry'd thither by the stream of that great river. I saw others afterwards but not so large. They are terrible to look to, and have four eyes, two above and two below; there are abundance of them in the lake Bai. In dry seasons they carry the great cattel to feed thereabouts, it being excellent pasture. The horses and cattel graze; and tho' they are watch'd, yet an alligator comes out and carries away one of them every now and then, as a cat does a mouse.

14. Some small time before I came to the islands, there happen'd a remarkable accident, which was that a couple of Indians being marry'd, and ready to go to dinner, the bride took a fancy to go down to the river to wash her feet, as they do every now and then. The house was built, as is common there, partly over the river. As she was washing, an alligator snapt at, and carry'd her away: Her cries brought out the people, who saw her betwixt the alligator's teeth, and he making away with his booty. The bridegroom seeing that dismal sight, blinded by love, and overrul'd by passion, rashly cast himself into the water, with his dagger in his hand, and follow'd the robber that carry'd away his love. He overtook and fought with him, recover'd the woman and return'd victorious with her in his arms, but she was dead. He return'd a widower, sad, and full of tears: It was a famous and heroick action. Many Indians have escap'd these monsters, they have found by experience that they are very tender in their eyes, therefore those who are not in a consternation, attack that part, and the alligator flies to save himself. In those countries all people report, that when the female spawns, she always does it where there is a current of water: When the young ones come to life, they drive down the water, where the old one expects them with her mouth open, and eats all she can catch, that which slips by on either side saves its life. This they say is the reason the rivers are not all full of these creatures, tho' there are many of them. I shall return to them in another place.

15. I will end this chapter with the account

NAVARETTE. count of a most strange accident, tho' of another nature, that fell out in my time in the port of Cabite. I was told it, but made a doubt of the truth, inquir'd further of Mr. Quinones the curate of that port, and was satisfy'd and assur'd of the certainty of it. An Indian woman sent her daughter to the sea-shore, which was about thirty paces distant from her house, to gather some sticks which the water throws up: The Indian girl saw something on the shore like the paunch of a sheep or goat. She went and told her mother; her mother bid her fetch it. When the Indian woman saw it, she perceiv'd it was the off-spring of a woman, she open'd it and found the child alive, carry'd it with all speed to the curate Quinones, who baptiz'd it, and it soon after died. It was always suppos'd, that some wicked woman, to conceal her crime when she was deliver'd, had thrown the child after-birth and all, into the sea; and by the place where it was found, and the time it was computed, it must have been at least five or six hours in the water; and yet neither the cold nor length of time kill'd it, which is very strange. All men admir'd at it, and I am amaz'd every time I think on it; and as with regard to GOD nothing happens accidentally, we are bound to praise and adore the inscrutable mysteries of his divine providence, which as it preserv'd Moses in a wicker-basket on the river Nile, so it preserv'd for his glory this child in its natural swathing-bands, in which its cruel and wicked mother brought it forth.

CHAP. V.

What Observations I made, and how I was employ'd during that time.

Sabiniano Manrique de Lara. 1. IN the year 1653, D. Sabiniano Manrique de Lara, brother to the earl of Friginiano, arriv'd at Manila as governor of those islands. With him went D. Miguel de Poblete, an American born at Puebla de los Angeles, as archbishop: The lord Cardenas, a native of Peru of my order, a very learned man, and greater preacher, as bishop of new Segovia: The lord N. S. Gregorio a Franciscan, as bishop of new Caceres; and doctor Ueles dean of the cathedral of Manila, as bishop of Zibu: they brought men and plate, which was new life to the islands. All men were consum'd, poor, sad, and tir'd out with D. James Faxardo's severity, and overmuch retirement. The new governor's familiarity was very pleasing, he spoke to every body, heard all men, walk'd about the city, visited the monasteries, never fail'd being present at festivals and sermons of note. He was pleasant, and held a discourse very wittily; he was not the least proud or vain, but religious and godly, and several times I heard him speak of spiritual affairs, and the contempt of the world; I was astonish'd, as well at the words he spoke, as at the spirit and energy with which he spoke them. He was never partial towards any particular religious order; he honour'd, respect'd, and lov'd them all, behaving himself towards them as a prince ought to do. He shew'd himself very devout upon sundry occasions, going himself in the processions that were made in the city. He was charitable, and endeavour'd to have the people multiply; to which effect many marriages were concluded through his means, he forwarding them by giving some employment. When the new archbishop absolv'd that country from all ecclesiastical censures it had incur'd on account of Corcuera's banishing the bishop, as was said above, D. Sabiniano himself conducted the lord Poblete to the postern of the storehouses, which way the archbishop had been thrust out, to give his blessing there. When he had done it, D. Sabiniano cast himself at the archbishop's feet, and said, your most illustrious lordship may be assur'd I will not cause any such troubles. This action of his gave an excellent example to others.

2. He was unfortunate in some things, particularly in ships being cast away in his time, but I don't see why he should be blam'd for this. What was D. Sabiniano to blame, because the ship which D. Peter de Villaroll commanded was cast away? What fault was it of D. Sabiniano's, when the commander Vgaide, and Thomas Ramos lost another of great value? All I can say is, that this gentleman took a great deal of pains, built good ships, and fortify'd the city well to oppose the Cbineses. I heard afterwards of some things which were laid to his charge, when he gave an account of his employment, which are fitter to make a jest than any thing else of. That little sharp humour he had, was the best thing he could shew in that country. I observ'd, and carefully took notice of one thing, which was, that if in his haste and passion he happen'd to speak a hard word to any body, he was so much concern'd and troubled at it, that he would omit no possible means to satisfy the party that was griev'd; so that for the future he was extreme kind, and express'd his affection to him in all manner of ways; a great proof of his good temper. Much more might be said, were it suitable with my design.

3. Yet I cannot bear that this gentleman's services and merits should be altogether buried in oblivion, and therefore I resolv'd in this place to give some small touch upon them. I will not play the panegyrist, nor the historian; my pen will reach neither, but will only in plain terms relate what I know of certain. It is not my business to blazon his family, or deduce the genealogy of Manrique Lara, or give an account of its several branches, which honour many houses in Spain; for besides that it is an undertaking above my reach, it would be holding a candle to the sun. Philo Alexandrinus said of the sacrifice of Abel and Cain, For neither the sun, nor moon, &c. These beautiful planets which govern the day and night, need no orators to commend their beauty; their own light makes them known, and recommends them to all the world.

4. I must also own, that if he I spoke of had nothing greater than his birth to recommend him, I should not be so much led away by that. It cannot be deny'd but nobility native is commendable, but that which is acquir'd exceeds it, and raises a man above the clouds. And tho' Ovid in his epistle to Piso lessen'd the former, Perit omnis in illo gentis bonos, cui laus in origine sola: yet others with good reason extol it; but there is no man who does not cry up that which is gain'd with dangers, labours, troubles and fatigue. Read S. Thomas his first book, de erudit. princip. c. 4, & 5. where he says much to the purpose. Therefore I say this gentleman by his piety, good example, and service done his majesty, had added new splendor to the family of Manrique de Lara, and increas'd its glory.

5. Being at the port of Cabite in the year 1656, I heard him say he was a colonel at nineteen years of age. Some men by their valour and resolution, gain more in a few years than others do in a great many. S. Jerom, and after him Lyra in Dan. i. says, There is this advantage in a noble birth, that it imposes a sort of necessity on noble persons, not to degenerate from the worth of their ancestors. Nobility influences men to act as becomes their descent. It is no matter tho' a man be young, if courage and resolution guide him.

6. Her highness the princess Margaret governing Portugal, and having fitted out a fleet of eighteen sail against the French, D. Sabiniano was made admiral of it for eighteen months. This was a post of great honour, and imply'd that he who was prefer'd to it was better qualify'd for it than others at that court. There was no action,

7. But the time when he shew'd the greatest constancy and courage, was, when he carry'd supplies to Portugal, at the time that crown began to cast off the dominion of our monarch. How often was his life in danger? How many straits was he reduc'd to? But how great resolution and valour did he shew upon all occasions? He set out of Cadiz with the command of two vessels, in which were three hundred foot, six reformed captains, provisions and ammunition for the castle of S. Julian, at the mouth of the river of Lisbon; there he resolutely landed, to be inform'd of the state of the place, tho' his officers oppos'd it. It is in vain to withstand a man who runs on with zeal in his prince's service. He understood the castle had surrendred. He was forced to strip from the waft downwards to get to his boat, which when in it overset; D. Sabiniano sav'd his life by swimming: they cannonaded his ships from the castle; and he because they lay by for him, made signs to them to make off, without regarding the danger he was in himself of falling into the enemies hands. This it is to regard the publick; not one's private good. The ships set sail, not knowing how to take up their commander; so that he, wet and almost naked, together with capt. Bartholomew Antonio, took into a little cave to dry himself and attend his fate. That little repose, such as it was, lasted not long; the danger so much increas'd, above three hundred men passing that way in a body, that the captain and he gave themselves for dead. GOD deliver'd them that they might begin to suffer afresh. Here begin the disasters of D. Sabiniano in that kingdom: He was taken and carried to the castle, and tho' the count de Prado his friend us'd him well, yet that did not deliver him from what GOD had ordain'd he should endure for his king and for his honour.

8. The news of his being taken coming to Lisbon, abundance of people flock'd to see him, because he was so well known at that court. Being at dinner, one rose, and drawing his sword half way, said, I hope in GOD I shall enter the Retiro (that is, the king of Spain's palace at Madrid) and kill the king of Castile, and the count duke. To talk thus in the presence of a prisoner is great folly. The Chinese say, A dog that barks much is ne'er the better for it. That Portuguese was talkative, and without doubt a coward: Had he said that when D. Sabiniano was drying himself in the cave, and had his little sword, I suppose he would have had cause to repent it. D. Sabiniano, who will put up nothing that con-

NAVA-RETTE. concerns his king, tho' never so inconsiderable, answer'd, I trust in GOD I shall see you hang'd in the great market-place, call'd Rocio, with other impudent traitors like your self. It is no great matter to give such an answer, when a man is at liberty with his sword by his side; but it is a sign of great courage and loyalty to break forth into such expressions, being a prisoner among enemies. That pass'd, and five days after one of the four corregidores of the city carry'd him away prisoner to Lisbon. When he entred the city, the mob lording it, threw every thing that came to hand at him. He was committed to the castle of S. George, where being feverish with what he had gone through, he laid down upon a mat. The constable of the castle took pity on him, gave him a bed, and order'd the officer commanding to use him well. A month after he was carry'd to the prison of the court (it answers to our Marshalsea) because there had been a report that certain captains design'd to take him out of the castle: There he continued five days, was then remov'd to the city goal, lay eight months in a dungeon, which threw him into a dangerous distemper. This did not move the goaler to give him the least ease, he had certainly banish'd all sense of charity. The heathens in Cbina treated me and others much better. Money prevail'd, for that is the god of such people; he put him into a little room, where he recovered of his indisposition. Nor was this comfort lasting, for on account that a prisoner had made his escape, a new goaler came into place, and the prisoners fear'd the worse. He order'd D. Sabiniano back to the dungeon; some words pass'd upon it, so that the goaler went to make his complaint to the Alcaldes de Corte. One of the alcaldes came down, words pass'd between them, he commanded him to go into the dungeon. D. Sabiniano excus'd himself, saying, There were orders he should be alone, and that in the dungeon there were a great many. The alcalde said, Go in fidalgo (that is, nobleman) for there are other honest men there as good as you. Had the alcalde not known D. Sabiniano he might have been excusable, but knowing him, he was certainly very brutal, and deserv'd the answer D. Sabiniano made him, who in a rage told him: He was an impudent villain, and that but for dirting his hands, he would beat him to death. It was boldly spoke of a prisoner to the judge; but ill usage provokes generous souls.

9. The alcalde being in power, and affronted, order'd him to be put into the hole, to which he was let down through a trap-door, and there lay six months in misery. These sufferings nothing discourag'd him, but rather added to his resolution; his body so tenderly bred, suffer'd, but his heart surmounted all difficulties. Next follow'd that famous conspiracy carry'd on by the archbishop of Braga, marquess of Villareall, duke of Camisaka, and others who were executed. D. Sabiniano's opinion was not follow'd in it, I doubt not but his was the just and right method, for he was a person of excellent judgment. He writ to the late king concerning that affair, and gave a note of directions how his letter should come to the king's hands, but this paper was found out. He was brought before a court compos'd of sixteen judges, and went with a resolution to break thro' all that stood in his way, if they did not shew him the respect due to his quality. His reason was, that he was not carry'd before that assembly as a criminal, but as a prisoner of war, and therefore ought to be treated with all respect. At his coming in he found them all bare-headed; it is likely he had declared his intention, and they were acquainted with his resolution; they all bow'd, and gave him a seat. Being examin'd upon oath, he own'd that note was his. Being ask'd who the letter was for mention'd in the note? He answer'd, For a woman. They ask'd, Whether she was marry'd, or a maid? He wittily reply'd, That question did not belong to the court, but to the confession-seat. After some other interrogatories, that ceremony ended. He was return'd to the same place, and order'd to be taken care of and secur'd.

10. A fortnight after the corregidor, with four alguaziles, conducted him to Santarem; a great many removes, and all bad ones. He was there delivered to a goaler, who was well qualify'd to execute that place in hell. Five days he kept him in a room convenient enough, but then carry'd him down to a dark and strait dungeon. There he was under two locks, with a guard of twenty five soldiers, and their commander, without being allow'd ink, or to converse with any body. His diet was search'd; a window there was with strong iron bars they shut up every night; and us'd so many precautions, that he had need of all his courage not to dismay. Five or six months after king John the fourth pass'd that way, the prisoners implor'd his mercy, which they obtain'd, who had no body to oppose it. The corregidor had advis'd D. Sabiniano to do the same; but he boldly refusing the advice, shut his window, which was as much as throwing of it in his face that pass'd by: a resolute action for one that was in a dungeon. The rabble rose, and cry'd, Let the traitor die. King John order'd the window to be fast barr'd barr'd without, so the poor gentleman was immur'd for nine months, without any light but what came in at a little hole he made with a small knife he had, and was so close kept, that a captain who was his acquaintance could not give him such relief he design'd him.

11. His shutting the window was much resented by the Portugueses. I was told it in China by some of that nation, and they added, they were about putting of him to death for it. After so many misfortunes, he was exchange'd for the count de Villanova de Portimano. D. Sabimano was taken on the 25th of December, 1640. and releas'd the 8th of May, 1645. Who can imagine his sufferings in five years? Being come to Madrid, he was soon after made constable of the castle of Acapulco, an honourable post, but I often heard it said, there was nothing at that time greater to reward his services. Next he had the government of the Philippine islands, the best and greatest post in the Indies. He govern'd as I have related, and shall further write hereafter. More he has not had, because he would not. I very well remember he said to me once at Manila; F. Dominick, if it shall please God to send us to Spain, your reverence shall see I will retire to Malaga, to endeavour so to live as I would die, without concerning my self with worldly affairs.

12. About the time the new governor came to the island, I discover'd upon the mountains of Batan, that fruit so much esteem'd, and so delicious there is in China, which the Spaniards call lechias, and the Chineses, li chi. It is one of the best in the world. I carried some to Manila, and they were the first that ever came fresh to that city. Those they carry thither from China, are dry'd, and do not shew what they are when new gather'd. I spoke of this in the first book.

13. About the same time, I being then gathering strength after a fit of sickness, offer'd to go companion to one of ours, who was design'd for the island Luban, and thence to Mindoro, to visit some Christians, and do the best service we could to those poor Indians. The isle of Luban is twelve leagues distant from that of Manila, it is small but beautiful, has abundance of cocotrees, much cotton, and very good use is made of it; the town contains about two hundred families that pay taxes: it has a very good fort, with an excellent ditch, for the inhabitants to defend themselves against the robbers they call Camucones, who, through our great negligence, every year infest that and other places, to the great detriment of his majesty's subjects. Whilst we were there, an alarm was given; we fled to the fort, but it prov'd a false one. NAVA-

The church is indifferent, and well adorn'd. RETTE.
The curate had order'd, that as soon as the Angelus Domini bell had rung, it should ring again to the Rosary, and all the town resorted to it. Some persons assur'd us, that since the introducing of that devotion, no enemy had ever come thither, whereas before there were many that infested them, and carry'd away all they had. Before they neither said the Rosary nor had a fort, afterwards they had both, but the first had sufficed to secure them. We heard confessions, and preach'd there till after Christmas, which was kept with great solemnity. About that time a most terrible storm rose, which made us go down to the porch, as believing it would bear the house down. Not far from thence one of the king's champions was under sail, and in it the governor of Caraga, with his wife, and three barefooted fathers of St. Augustin; they ran right before the wind, without knowing whither they went. The night was dark, the sea swell'd, they concluded they should be cast away, but knew not whether near or far from land. Two of the fathers of St. Augustin consulted together in private, and as it is suppos'd, said, it was better to be in a readiness, and not stay till all fell into the sea together, where it is hard to get loose from one another. Each of them ty'd up his little quilt full of varo, which Varo is a thing like cotton, that bears above water a long time, call'd his boy, and so they cast themselves into the sea, without being taken notice of by any body; but what we have written was guess'd to be done by their being missing with their quilts. Their companion and the rest were much troubled at it, but they were never heard of; it is likely the first plunge into the sea they lost their quilts, and perish'd. At break of day the little vessel was cast ashore upon a small island, half a league from that of Luban. All the people were sav'd, except one woman-slave, who throwing herself into the water to get to shore, was drown'd before any body could come to her assistance. They came to Luban so thin and poor, that any one might guess what they had suffer'd. The curate treated them well.

14. Upon the day of the Epiphany we cross'd over to Mindoro. That afternoon Mindoro we went up to the town of Calavit, it is above a league from the sea, and all the way steep and craggy. Three days after we came down to go to Guistin, where we were to reside, thence to repair wherever there was occasion. That day we travell'd above six leagues afoot, along the hellishest road imaginable. In some places we climb'd up the rocks, in others we could scarce get up

NAVA- up with the help of the Indians. We saw RETTE. a place where the rocks were pointed, and so sharp and piercing, that in truth they pierced the soles of our shoes, and the poor Indians feet, which were bare, really ran blood, that it broke our hearts to see them.
 We came to the foot of the mountain of Guistin, without having broken our fast: there we found some Indians, who had roasted batatas, but cold; we eat a little of that dainty, and began to mount the hill: it is as high as the other, but much more craggy. For a good space we did nothing but crawl upon all four, holding by the roots of trees, then we walk'd, but every now and then laid our selves on the ground to get breath. By God's assistance we came to the top, found the church, but without being able to get into it, fell down at the very door flat upon our faces, where we lay a great while to rest. That done, we found our selves in such a sweat, that our very outward habits were all wet.
 The wind was cold, and blew very hard;
 that night's lodging was in a little thatch'd house, where the air came in at every corner; our supper was a morsel of bisket dipp'd in the wine we had to say mass, because of the cold; we slept sitting, and one leaning against another. The next day, which prov'd fair, we made use of the sun to dry us. Having said mass, we went about our business, which was to take care of the souls of those Indians. All our cheer was some eggs, rice, and batatas, whereof there is abundance, and good ones in those mountains. Upon Candlemas, after saying mass, and preaching, I return'd to Calavit, all the same day travelling the second time that blessed road I spoke of before. The weariness, sweat, wind, and ill provision, made me so sick that night, as I lay alone in my little hut made of cane and straw, that I thought I should die, and yet in truth I was pleas'd. Some days I continued there doing my best. I went to two other little towns, and the road bad enough; there I preached, catechized, and baptized some. One day I had nine marriageable young men, who were come down from the mountains to desire baptism. They had never seen priests; after being instructed, they were christened.
 An old man, in appearance above fourscore years of age, came duly to the catechising; he appear'd very devout; and when I went to say the divine office, he would go after me. Once I call'd him, and ask'd, What he would have, and why he always follow'd me? He answer'd, Father, I hear you say, we are oblig'd to know the Christian doctrine, and I being ignorant of it, seek an opportunity for your reverence to instruct me. How long have you been a Christian, said I? He answer'd, A year.

 And I thought he had been so from his infancy. I farther ask'd him, Who bap-tiz'd thee, and how? He gave me a full account of all, and told me, they had not taught him a word, giving for their reason, that he was old and could not learn. It troubled me much, and I began immediately to instruct him. I us'd to take him with me to the sea-shore, and both of us being seated, I explicated the belief to him the best I could, according to his capacity.
 I would say to him, Do you see the sea and the sky? God created it all. He then reply'd, Is that possible? is God so great, that he could do what you say? I repeated and explain'd it, and would again say to him, so that this sky, this earth, this sea, &c. is all the work of God. And he admiring still, went on; Is God so great, so very great? which he often repeated. I took care of him, and he was diligent, for he understood things better than the young ones. I afterwards heard his confession, and found some difficulty to absolve him.
 I ask'd, John, have you ever swore, or told any lie? He answer'd, To what purpose, father, should I swear or lie? Have you had any words, or been angry with any body? Father, said he, I live alone, mind my tillage, I see nor converse with no body; tho' I had a mind to quarrel, I have no body to fall out with. Thus he an-swer'd to all I ask'd. I gave him a few rags, and bid him call himself John of God.
 He went his way very well pleas'd, and I remain'd with great comfort. Having catechis'd that little town, and baptiz'd the children, with those I said were grown up, I return'd to Guistin. The curate of Nan- boan, thirty leagues southward, sent for one of us, and I resolv'd to go thither immediately.

15. As we were sailing along in sight of shore, the Indians discover'd a Carabao or Buffalo near the water. We put to shore;
 I was left in the vessel: the Indians fell upon the Buffalo with their spears, and he defended himself wonderfully; at last he ran raging into the sea, and came furiously up to the vessel in which I was; he struck the canes on the outside, or else I had been in danger of my life. At length they kill'd and cut him in pieces. I went ashore to wait for the men, and presently we discover'd a company of mountain-blacks; we perceiv'd they were friends, so that I rested satisfied; and that the sight of me might not disturb them, I slipt in among some trees. They came up to us, being about thirty men, women, and children, all of both sexes with bows and arrows, and stark naked, only their privities cover'd with leaves of a certain tree. The men were

were painted with white, the women with other colours, and wore great wild flowers in their ears. To say the truth of it, they all look'd like devils. When they were in discourse with the Indians, I came out on a sudden, talking to them in their own language, and offering them leaf tobacco, which they make great account of. As soon as they saw me they started, and almost all the women and some boys fled so nimbly, that they seem'd to fly. The rest were pacified: I gave them tobacco, and talk'd to them with all possible kindness, and endearing manner. Two women went to bring fresh water to drink, and the Indians having done with the carabuo, they staid there with the offal, paunch, and bones. The Indians told me, as soon as we are gone, all these people will gather about here, and will not stir till they have gnaw'd the bones, and eaten the paunch and all that is in it.

16. At ten of the clock at night we went up the river Bacco, which is at the main point of that island. The rain was so vehement, that the town was drowned: there I stay'd twenty four hours. In sight of the town is a vast high mountain, whence a river tumbles down, which being look'd upon from below, looks like a mountain of crystal; the water runs near, which being so soften'd with the fall and running over much carza parrilla, is extraordinary good. This island has some notable things. First, abundance of civet cats, of which they might have a considerable trade; abundance of wax upon all the mountains; they make no account of the honey; plenty of batatas, cometis, ubis, names, and variety of fruit; an infinite number of cedars, whose blossom, which I often saw, exhales a most fragrant scent, and reaches far; a multitude of coco-trees. There are besides abundance of other trees, from which they extract honey, wine, vinegar tuba and chancaca; a sort of trees like plantans, of which they make a sort of black hemp for rigging. There is another sort of white hemp, taken from another tree, they call abaaca, it is excellent for cables, the more it is wetted, the stronger it grows. There is another tree, of which they make stuffs as white as snow, and delicately soft, which the Indians use for their beds and clothing, tho' they do not want cotton, of which they make excellent cloth.

17. The sea and rivers abound in excellent fish: that sort is found there which is commonly call'd piscis mulier, of the bones whereof beads of great value are made, because they have a singular vertue against defluxions; that which has been try'd is worth much money. The licentiate Francis Roca, curate of that place, told me a very extraordinary passage that hap- NAVA- pen'd in his division. An Indian going a fishing every day, found near the water a piscis mulier, they say it is like a woman from the breasts downwards. He had actual copulation with her, and continu'd this beastly whoredom for above six months, without missing a day. At the end of this time GOD mov'd his heart to go to confession; he did it, and was commanded to go no more to that place, which he perform'd, and that abomination ceas'd. I own, that if I had not heard it myself from the person I have nam'd, I should have doubted of it.

18. The next day late, the curate, governor, and I set out in three boats for another parish, which was it I design'd for; they three were to be reconcil'd, having had some falling out, and that was the reason of undertaking this voyage. The curate made us very welcome; they embrac'd and became good friends, putting an end to the festival with a noble treat he gave us. Upon such occasions, and great rejoicing, it is no sin to add something extraordinary. St. Thomas observ'd it, speaking of Isaac. After him Lyra made the same reflection in Tob. ii. upon the words; When it was the festival-day of the LORD, and a good dinner was made in Tobit's house: he says, By this it appears, that upon festival-days it is lawful to drink more, and more delicately, in respect to the feast, not out of gluttony, &c. Even GOD himself seems to have intimated the same formerly. Read Oleaster in Num. xxviii. ad mores, y. 3. There is no doubt, but upon a day of entertaining guests, and making a reconciliation, there ought to be a dish extraordinary. It is true there was no wine, but abundance of good water. A few days after I set out upon my visitation, I had many places to go to, and they were far asunder; having been at the first, I struck up the country to avoid a cape that runs far into the sea. The way was so thick of trees, and they so tall, that for two leagues there was no seeing the sky; and there was such abundance of leeches, that we could not get rid of them. Coming down to the sea, I was carry'd over a brook upon an Indian's shoulders, who carried his spear in his hand; about the middle he spied a stately thornback, darted his spear, and nail'd it to the sand. Having set me down, he went back and brought away the fish struck thro' the middle. He told me how delicate meat the liver was, which being boil'd for me, I found to be very dainty. I told this at Rome in the year 1673, and it took so well; that there were persons who endeavour'd to get some. I did not then know the great vertue there is in the flat bone at the tip of that fishes tail;

19. I went to pass the holy week at a little town, which had a small church, the pleasantest and most delightfully seated of any in the world, I believe. It is three leagues from the sea, and the way to it, is up an admirable and mighty river. Upon floods it spreads its stream a league wide. Near to the river is a little hill, that looks like a fine garden. On the south-side of it are beautiful coco-trees; on the west and north it is cover'd with cacafochiles full of flowers, pleasing to the eye and smell; on the east is a prospect of vast high and delightful mountains. About it was the enclosure of stately magueyes, and in the midst of them was the church and house, the town on the south-side; the north-side, on which the river ran, was very craggy, and a fine spring at the bottom of it. The ascent was designedly cover'd and blinded, to secure the place against the enemies they call Camucones. Indians of other towns assembled there, and confessed and received; some were baptized. Two things somewhat remarkable happen'd to me there. One was the hearing a confession of thirty years. Truly the Indian made a very good confession, and was a man of good sense. The other was, that a woman who was marriageable, and of a very sound judgment, said to me, Father, I went up to the mountain with a youth, we liv'd there six years as if we had been marry'd. (In the mountains they may live without working.) One night, as we had done many others, we lay down to sleep upon the grass. At break of day I wak'd, bent my body up to look upon him, and saw him dead by my side. That struck such a terror into me, that I immediately came down to the town, and resolv'd to confess my self, and mend my life. I have found this opportunity of your being here, and will make my advantage of it. I advis'd her what to do, and always to bear in mind how merciful God had been towards her. Here what God says is literally verify'd, that when two sleep, he will take the one and leave the other. The poor miserable youth being suddenly assaulted by death, was in danger enough, considering the time and condition he was in when call'd. We perform'd all the ceremonies us'd by the church from Palm-sunday till Easter-day. There was a sepulchre; the chief man of the town found all the wax that was us'd. I remember that as I was preaching upon the Monday the good old man's heart was touch'd, and on a sudden he knelt down, crying out aloud. His devotion provok'd me and others to shed tears, and so the sermon ended.

20. All those Indians are like our plain ^{Natives} countrymen, sincere and void of malice. They came to church very devoutly; not a word was spoke to them but produced fruit: would to God the seed were sow'd among them every day; but there they have mass but once in two or three years. When they die, there's an end of them; but great care is taken to make them pay their taxes, and the curate's dues.

21. Their is one great conveniency for the Indians in having religious men in their divisions, which is, that these being now and then chang'd, if an Indian is bashful, or afraid to confess to one of them, or has had any difference with him, he lays himself open to another, and makes a good confession. But if once he is afraid of a curate, or it happens the curate is harsh to him, he can hardly be brought to make a clear confession to him. He that made a confession to me of thirty years, had before conceal'd some things out of fear. Some years before the fathers of the society had been in this island, they had four of their family there, who labour'd very diligently; the clergy to whom it belong'd before, went too low with them. The fathers resign'd, and all that was left to one curate, which had been before the care of four religious men. We may guess what a condition it remain'd in; this is seeking those things which are their own, not those which are CHRIST'S. Places were visited where the curate had not set foot in fourteen years.

22. Upon Easter-day, after having said mass, explicated that mystery, and distributed among the poor some rice, batatas, eggs, and fruit that had been offer'd me, I set out by land to another town. By the way I lay under the shade of certain trees; there I met a mountain infidel, he had an excellent natural disposition; I us'd him with all imaginable kindness, but there being no previous disposition, it avail'd little. The next day I lodg'd in the house of another infidel, who treated me well. These and thousands of them will not be baptiz'd, for fear of the taxes and personal duty, as I observ'd before.

23. We came to the town of Santiago; or St. James; it is in an ill air, expos'd to the enemies call'd Camucones. The foregoing year those people had carry'd away some of the Indians; one of them gave me this account; Father, my wife was in labour in this house when the enemy came, I threw my self out at that window, and others follow'd me; the rest, especially the women who attended my wife, were taken. They drove them this way, and my wife being being weak and spent, was not able to go, and they were beating her on, which I stood yonder looking on without being able to relieve her. One of them carry'd the new-born child upon his arm, and just in that place he clave it from top to bottom with his hanger, and left it there. Inhuman barbarity! This griev'd my heart, and fear would not let me sleep, and so my health daily impair'd. I spoke to the Indians to remove to another place which was more healthy and safe; they consented, and there soon set up a little chappel, and a small house for me. For themselves they made barracks after their manner, and they are sufficient to keep out the wind and rain; cold there is none, but excessive heat.

24. A boat of the Chinese of Manila that ply thereabouts came to this place. The Chinese whose name was Gose told me, how he had by art and cunning got clear of six vessels of the enemy; he had aboard a father of the society and a Spaniard. He seeing the enemy design'd to attack him, prevented him, let fly his colours, and playing on his basons, made towards them as it were in defiance. They drew together to consult, and the conclusion was that they fled. The Chinese in his broken language said, Those fellows don't see nor know what is in my boat, and they are afraid of death; if I fly I am certainly lost, then is it not better to attack them? He must either imagine I have arms, or at least will be jealous of it, and which of them will venture his life? Upon St. Philip and Jacob's day I was in great trouble: I was hearing confessions in the chappel, and observ'd that the cane-chair on which I sat mov'd. I imagin'd a dog was got under it, and bid the Indian turn him out. He answer'd, Father, it is no dog, but an earthquake. It increas'd to such a degree, that leaving the penitent, I kneel'd down, to beg mercy of God. I thought the end of the world had been at hand: I have seen several earthquakes, but none so great as that. When it was over I said, If it has been so great at Manila, there is not one stone left upon another. I was afterwards inform'd it had done some harm, but not considerable. It was an hundred leagues from thence to Manila, and much water betwixt.

25. During those days I catechis'd all, heard their confessions, and administred the blessed sacrament to them. There were no persons of age to baptize, but some children. The heat increasing, as did the danger of the enemy, and my health decaying, I resolv'd to return, with no small grief for leaving two other places unvisited, twenty leagues from thence. I came to Namboan, calling at the same towns I had come through before. In this journey I observ'd, that having gone up a river, and NAVY-order'd the Indians to provide me a place RETTE. to say mass in, and another to lie in that night, they did it in two hours time, covering all the place with only two leaves of wild palm-tree. A violent rain fell that night, but not one drop came through. I have then and several times since admir'd this; each leaf was so large, that an Indian carry'd it dragging after him; and being shap'd like a fan with gutters, and strong, it would bear out any rain whatsoever. Another thing happen'd in another town, which put the Indians into much fear, and not a little amaz'd me. They were upon the sea-shore making ready the vessel I was to go in, and on a sudden there came out of the water a fish very well known there, which we call Picuda, and the Portugueses Vicuda, and laid hold of an Indian's ankle with such force, that it was dragging him away to the sea; the company came in, and with sticks and stones made him quit his prey, and return to the sea. They brought the wounded young man to me, he made his confession, remain'd in a bad condition, was afterwards cur'd, but ever halted. Those men were scar'd, for they had never seen or heard say that fish would come ashore, and much less that it would fall upon a man.

26. Near to Namboan there is an admirable lake, so full of fish, especially that sort we call Lifas, that sometimes they take them with their hands; they take out the roes and leave the fish; these roes salted are very good with rice, and look'd upon as a dainty. Whilst I was there, an Indian woman went in to wash her self, but was devour'd by a crocodile. I set out for Manila, and a chief of the Indians with his son and four others went southward; the enemy attack'd them, and tho' they fought, they were taken and carry'd captives to Mindanao: God deliver'd me and those that were with me. I pass'd by the bay of Batangas, and then had a sight of the lake of Lombon, which is a very fine one. From Manila, where I stay'd a few days, I went to Batam; there I was much troubled and disturb'd by witches or fairies, what it was we knew not, but the effect show'd it to be a contrivance of the devil. No considerable hurt was done any man, but we heard much noise, and saw stones fly; the house all foul in a moment, and as suddenly clean; the chairs hurry'd about without perceiving who mov'd them, and the like. We pass'd whole nights without closing our eyes.

27. One night when I and another were gone to rest, and the noise was abated, there came into the place where we lay, the governor, judge, and other Indians, to see whe-

NAVA- whether they could discover any thing.
 RETTE. They went on courageously, threatening those that durst disturb the house. The moment they came in they were thrown down stairs, an infinite quantity of stones, sand and dirt tumbling after them. They were so frighted, that they never enquir'd further into the matter. I was call'd away to Manila, and by that means deliver'd from this vexation, which continu'd some months, and others had enough to do with it.

C H A P. VI.

Of my Second Mission to Mindoro.

1. I Return'd the third time to the college of St. Thomas, and it was to be first professor of divinity. Next year about the end of April, the lord archbishop appointed D. Christopher Sarmiento curate of our lady of Guia, visitor of Mindoro. He desir'd me to bear him company, a little invitation serv'd because the air of the college did not agree with me. Father provincial gave his consent, and taking one of my scholars for my companion, we went up the river altogether; then we cross'd the sea, and upon the feast of the invention of the cross, which is the third of May, I preach'd at Baco. The Indians have a more than usual devotion for the cross, they celebrate the festival the best they are able. There is no Indian town but is full of crosses which they adorn and set out very curiously. Going to the first place we were to visit as we were a sailing up the river, a terrible storm overtook us, and we had a wretched night in the vessel, which was very small. We cross'd the mountain of the leeches a second time with much trouble. I was about leaving the second place of visiting till our return. A chief ask'd me to hear his confession; I advis'd him to stay, because I would return that way, and stay there some time. He press'd and desir'd me to hear his confession; I did so, and when I came back he was dead. I look'd upon it as a special predestination: I remember he made a good confession, and was very penitent.

2. I came to the town, so beautifully seated, as I describ'd before; but the Camucones having taken their chief the last year, as he was going from Nanboan, I found the people remov'd, and all sad and disconsolate. I spoke to his wife, who was in mourning, and heard her confession: I had heard her before, and truly she never uncover'd her face, so great is the modesty and reservedness of many Indian women, tho' they be but country people. I comforted her the best I could: At another town before we came to that of Santiago, many Indians met, and we staid some time there. Here I observ'd that the dogs bark'd very much at night, and the place being expos'd to the Camucones, we were somewhat concern'd. I ask'd the Indians why the dogs bark so much? and they answer'd, Father, there are abundance of Crocodiles ^{Dogs.} in this river; the dogs that have a mind to swim over, meet in one place, and bark for a good while till they think the Crocodiles are assembled there (it is most certain and known by experience that the Crocodiles watch dogs, as the cats do mice) then some of them running up, and others down, they cross over out of danger from the Crocodiles. This happens every night, and therefore you need not be concern'd at their barking. I wondred at it, and remembered I had read that the dogs of Egypt did the same at the river of Nile.

3. During that time, a spy of the enemies came to us; he put upon us, telling a thousand stories, when we began to suspect it, there was no finding of him. Afterwards an Indian came to us from the other towns, who said there were ten vessels call'd Carvoas of the enemy sailing that way. The Indians immediately retir'd into the mountains, and we stay'd behind only with our boys. This bad news made us resolv'd to return, very much concern'd to see what obstacles there were to hinder the prosecution of our mission to those places that were in most need. At my return I heard of several skirmishes the Indians had with the Camucones, but were ever worsted. Before we came to Manila we heard the news, that the ship S. James coming from Mexico under the command of D. Peter de Villaroel, was cast away near Balaian. I heard the commander D. Peter Mendiola say, that ship stood his majesty in above two hundred thousand pieces of eight. This was the famous ship S. James that serv'd instead of a castle when the Dutch assaulted Manila. She receiv'd the shot of all the Dutch artillery upon one side being then a ground. Above a thousand bullets were found in her, and of above two thousand that were fir'd at her, not one went through. The timber of that country is extraordinary, and they build ships very strong. The ship that sail'd that year for Acapulco, weather'd great storms, and one wave carry'd fourteen seamen over board, as the letter I saw mention'd, the ship's crew afterwards justify'd it, and that the same wave threw them back upon the deck, deck, which was the strangest happiness. Those that are acquainted with the sea will not think this impossible. Some years before, the seamen said at Cavite, that a wave took thirty six men out of another ship that was bound the same way, some were sav'd, the rest perish'd. When D. Peter de Villaroel return'd, he that is now archbishop of Manila writ me word that a wave had carry'd away all the gallery astern, it was so strong; it seems incredible a wave should have such force. It seem'd as if some spirit had been during that time at Marivelez to hinder any ship coming into the bay, as I observ'd in a sermon at Cavite. The ship D. James Faxardo built at Camboxa, came near and was cast away on the flats of Japan, and people of note perish'd in it. The ship that sail'd afterwards from Mexico under the command of Lawrence de Ugalde, being in a river, there arose so monstrous a storm, that all of her which was above water, was torn off and cast ashore, and some men were dash'd against the trees, to which they stuck, and were found there afterwards mere mummies. Abundance of plate was lost, and much stolen. It was reported as a certain truth at Manila, that betwixt Acapulco and that place the commander had got above twelve thousand peices of eight, box-money at play. Who can believe it in these parts? At Pamagasinam, there was terrible thunder, lightning earthquakes; and there fell hail and stones of such a prodigious greatness, that some weigh'd an hundred and a quarter. The lord bishop Cardenas writ so to the bishop and court, adding, that he himself had seen some of those stones. It was thought some burning mountain had broke out, but it could never be found whence those stones came.

4. The loss of so many ships was very afflictive, the greatest damage fell upon the Indians: for there being no living without ships, when one is lost another must be built, and timber must be fallen; to this purpose they gather six or eight thousand Indians, and send them into the mountains; they have the vast labour of felling and dragging them down, besides the beating of them, bad pay and worse provision. Sometimes they send religious men to protect them against the hellish fury of some Spaniards. Besides all this under the pretence of one they cut timber enough for two ships, so many make their advantage of the labour of the Indians, as I saw it done at Cavite.

5. Before I leave Manila it will be proper to say something concerning that island. I will not particularize any thing concerning those of Oton, Ilo, Zibu, Marinduque, Romblon, Caraga, Calamianes, and others subject to our king, inhabited by Indians, NAVA- and attended by religious men, or curates, RETTE. because I was not in them. I know they abound in rice, black cattel, wax, cotton, and the usual fruits of the earth; but as I said before, I can tell no particulars of my own knowledge. Only this I know for certain, that the swallows nests, which are near the shores, are held in great esteem and look'd upon as a dainty. Boil'd with flesh they are exceeding good and nourishing. At Manila they are given as presents. Those they carry to China, are worth much money, as I have observ'd elsewhere. At Calamianes there is abundance of them, and so I suppose there is in other islands, because the Portugueses make a trade of them from Camboxa and Siam to China. To look to, dry, they are like ash-colour'd clay, when wash'd and boil'd they alter. It is beyond dispute, there is gold in all the islands we have spoken of, in some more than others. The island of Manila is the largest and most known, it extends from nine or ten degrees of north latitude, to above nineteen, (others say only from fifteen or sixteen to nineteen, and this I look upon to be truest.) Its breadth from east to west is very unequal and uncertain. The city Manila, which is the metropolis of all the islands, is seated upon a great river, and near the sea. In it reside the governor, four judges, the attorney-general, archbishop, three officers of the king's, a great Aguaril of the court, the council of the city, a head-Aguaril, and two in ordinary, and aldermen. The old cathedral was overthrown by the great earth-quake in 1643; another was afterwards built but not finish'd in my time. There is a very large and beautiful royal chapel, the monasteries of S. Francis, S. Dominick, the society, S. Augustin, S. Nicholas, S. Clare, S. John of God; and two colleges, that of S. Thomas, which is ours, and a university incorporated and annexed to that of Mexico; and that of S. Joseph of the society. There is a noble royal hospital, church of S. Potenciana, with a house for honest women to retire, and a stately church of Misericordia, or Mercy, with a school, in which they breed up many Spanish fatherless maids, and give them portions to marry. The best sort of inhabitants at Manila look after this seminary; to be the first brother of the Misericordia, is one of the chief posts in that government. Being to preach one year in that church, I read the statutes of that brotherhood, which gave me some information into their affairs. One was, that in one year, which was not long before, thirty six thousand peices of eight had been given in charity to private poor. There are excellent buildings both within and

NAVA- without the city, orchards, gardens, and RETTE. baths which are very convenient, because of the vehement heat. The walls, bulworks, bastions, cover'd ways, and other works about the city are as fine as may be.
 The place is naturally impregnable, and the fortifications would secure it, tho' it were not so. There are good heavy canon.
 It is one of the best towns the king has. Without the walls is an infinite number of people and towns all about. The river runs all along the walls on the north-side, and over it is a stately bridge. I do not insist longer on these things, because they are well known.

6. The Chineses in their books make mention of the island of Manila, which they call Liu Sung; they say, it is a country that abounds in gold, and they are in the right. The provinces of Pagasinam and Ilocos are more remarkable than the rest on this account. There is abundance of good rice, some comes up in forty days, so that in the space of forty days, it is sow'd, grows, ripens, is reap'd, and eaten, which is very remarkable. Some is two, some three, some five months coming up. There is excellent land for wheat, were there any way of sowing it; no Indians incline to sow, the land being taken up in the king's name, and therefore they will not addict themselves to that labour. In my time a bushel of wheat came to be worth ninety pieces of eight. There are goats, abundance of deer, and more of Bufaloes; they have coupled with cows, and produc'd a third. Species very fine to look to. There are geese, bens, sugar, wax, and so much of that we call Brazill-wood, that it cost nothing but the cutting; Cotton enough to cloth the inhabitants, wine and strong water made of Ni-pa, and other ingredients enough, and enough to drink. The fruit is good and plentiful. The Guayava, which has spread so much that it destroys the grazing land, is excellent good, raw, boil'd, dress'd with meat, preserv'd in jelly, and all sorts of ways. The reason it has increas'd so much, is because the crows and other birds eat of it, drop the seeds, and wherever they fall they grow. Thus the Portugueses told me the sandal increas'd in the island Timor, without any other labour, as I said before.
 This tree also bears a little fruit, which the birds eat, they let fall the seeds, and they take root without any further help. The macupa, bilimbin, pabo, santol and papaya, are equal to the best of ours. The nanca, which is the largest fruit that is known in the world, some being above forty pounds weight, is very pleasant, and the nuts or kernels every slice of them has in it, are delicious, raw or roasted. This fruit grows out of the body of the tree,

Guayava.

Sandal.

Nanca.

and large branches, for the small ones could not bear it. The tree bears no blossom.
 F. Kircher very much admires this sort of fruit, and the pine-apples, or ananasses, as the Portugueses call them; he says, they grow in China, but was mistaken in this point; they are in these parts, but not in China. The Portugueses much commend the ananasses of Molaca, they are certainly good, but I found very little difference betwixt them and those of Manila, which tho' I eat them in new Spain seem'd to me never the worse. There are chiconzapotes, black zapotes very good and plentiful; but above all ates, which I am convinced exceed all fruits in the world for taste and smell. Seven or eight several sorts of plantans, some better than others, so of oranges; the limons of Manica are small; a thousand varieties of fragrant flowers, and no less of sweet herbs. Majericons and sage grow wild in the fields to a wonderful height; several sorts of coco-trees. The coco is of excellent use, before the nut comes out, they draw an excellent liquor from the nib of the branch; these Indians call it tuba, and the Indian properly so call'd, has the name of Sura; what runs from it at night is a pleasant and wholesome drink, being boil'd in the morning it holds good all day, they make of it excellent srrup, and good honey, as I have done my self. What drops in the day is made into wine, and delicate vinegar. Of the outward rind of the coco they make a sort of okam to caulk ships, and make ropes, and good match, which the musquetiers there make use of.
 Of the inward shell are made fine bowls to drink water, or chocolate. The water within, when the coco is fresh, is wholesome and pleasant drink for sick people. They roast the coco and laying it out all night in the air, they drink the water, and find a good effect of it. Of the white nut, into which the water by little and little is converted, they extract milk and use it several ways, particularly to dress rice. Besides, they make an excellent preserve of it, which the Indians call Buchayo. It also yields good oil. Of the mash that remains, the Indians and Mulattoes make a good dish with rice. There remains the trunk of the tree and branches, which serve for many other uses. Canes are also very serviceable, some are as thick as a man's thigh, of which they make chairs, tables, houses, churches, enclosures for cattel, scaffolding for buildings, and many other things. The islands abound in fish, stately oysters, iguanas, which tho' they look hellishly, are a great dainty; olaves, and pampanos. All the island of Manila, and others subject to it, have but a little coolness, tho' some parts are temperate, for any thing else they need not

not be taken care of. The king gets nothing by it, but private persons do for him and themselves too. There are places in it will produce any thing, corn, cloves, cinnamon, pepper, mulberry trees for silk worms. Tobacco there is a great deal and good; as much ebony as can be desir'd; sandal in the mountains, but not of the best sort. There are precious bezoar-stones in deer. I saw a singular one they said was worth many ducats. They hit a deer with a forked arrow, which stuck in him and he alive; some time after they kill'd him, and found the forked point of the arrow in its full shape, but all overgrown with bezoar; they broke a point, and through it the iron appear'd, to the admiration of all that beheld it; and the iron of the arrow being poison'd, they said, that stone, because it had hindred the poison of the iron from taking effect must needs be an excellent antidote against any poison. I forgot to take notice of the fruitfulness of the soil at Manila, and it will suffice to make it known, that six short leagues from that city, there are certain lands which they call of Tunazan; these yield a hundred and thirty bushel of wheat for one that is sow'd in them, which is as much I think as can be said.

Bezoar.

7. Some other matters of less moment concerning Manila had lik'd to have slip'd me, but it is not fit they should be forgot. One is a college call'd the children of S. John Lateran; it was founded by a lay-brother of my order, his name B. James of S. Mary: In my time it had once above two hundred boys, to the great benefit of the islands. His way of governing them was inimitable, he taught them to read, write, grammar and musick; for philosophy and divinity they came to our college. He cloth'd them twice a year, taught them their Christian doctrine in the morning before breakfast; they said the third part of the rosary divided into two choirs, another third at noon, and the other third in the evening with the salve and litanies of our lady. On great holy-days they said matins at midnight; whilst they din'd and sup'd, one read. Every month they confess'd and receiv'd. He punish'd and cherish'd them. From thence some went to be soldiers, some clergymen; others into the religious orders of S. Dominick, S. Francis, and S. Augustin. So that it was a nursery of spiritual and temporal soldiers. He procur'd an order from his majesty to defray the charge. He got alms of the funerals, and of the Indians. An heroick undertaking! I am told they are now brought into the city, and attended by the gravest religious men in the province, and even of late those that have been provincials of it.

8. We see another remarkable thing in NAVA-that country, which is, that tho' the city RETTE is little and the Spaniards but a few, yet thousand of Cbineses, mungrels, and natives, live by them; so that in the Parian of the Cbineses it is likely there are two hundred carpenters, and a proportionable number of other trades, and they are always employ'd at Manila by the Spaniards. There are at least two hundred Cbineses and mungrel barbers, who all live upon the Spaniards, and so of others. Without the walls there is a famous hospital for the natives, the Franciscan fathers attend them very well, they having charge of the hospital. Opposite to the castle of S. Gabriel, is the hospital of the Cbineses under our direction: There is in it a Cbinese physician, Cbinese medicines; a religious man that speaks the Cbinese language, servants and attendants to look to every thing. Few have dy'd without being baptiz'd, many with hopeful tokens of their salvation. All the country about Manila, except that part next the sea, is full of towns and churches. That of Parian is ours, where there is always a religious man, who is a Cbinese interpreter. Dilao is for the Japoneses, and has a Franciscan. The parish of S. James the apostle is for the Spaniards who live without the walls. That of our lady of Guaia, a miraculous image. Ours of the rosary is very miraculous, and the comfort of all those islands; I am told they have made imperial crowns for both images of mother and son, richer than that I spoke of at Mexico. The barefooted fathers of S. Augustin have an Ecce homo, which moves all that behold it to pious compassion; it was placed there with great solemnity at the first coming into the government of D. Sabiniano Manrique de Lara, who went thither to-mass every friday.

During these years some persons of note dy'd in that city, such as D. Francis diaz de Mendoza, D. Peter Mendiola once governor of Terranate, major Navarro, otherwise call'd the just judge; his son-in-law James Enriquez de Losada. Of churchmen D. John de Leda, and D. Alonso Zopata, Doctors of our university. I think at present none of my time are left.

10. At that time the supreme court consisted of D. Sebastian Cavallero de Medina of Mexico, D. Alvaro Fernandez de Ocampo of Madrid, D. Francis Samaniego y Jussta of the mountains, D. Salvador de Espinosa of Vera Cruz, D. N. de Bolivar attorney general. They all favour'd me, I dedicated conclusions to the second and third, and after to D. Sabiniano, which he was present at with all the council. D. Peter de Almontre colonel. The major D. Martin de Ocaiz went that year to command the NAVARRETTE. the supplies sent to Terranate. F. Francis de Paula was commissary of the inquisition, he had been provincial, and was so afterwards again. At this time I resolv'd to leave those islands.

11. A very holy and religious action done a few years before at Manila had like to have been forgot; it is fit it should be known to all men, and applauded by the sons of the church. When the Christians were banish'd Japan, it is well known they came to Manila: It is impossible to express how those confessors of CHRIST were receiv'd, treated, and carest'd, every one strove to outdo another in piety. Many came sick, and with the reprosy, yet charity was such, that they carry'd them home to their houses to be cur'd; and they that had one of them fall to his share, thought themselves happy. They look'd upon them as saints, and valu'd them as relicks of inestimable value. The governor, counsellors, townsmen, religious persons and soldiers, went, as it were to snatch a Japanese, either found or sick. I don't question but it much edify'd the Cbinese infidels that look'd on; for tho' they observe and take notice of our faults, yet at that time they were sensible of the wonderful efficacy of our holy law. The presence of so many witnesses, and such as they are, ought to make our carriage and deportment such, as may make them by it know and glorify our GOD; a point S. Thomas proposes and treats of in his opusc. to the dutchefs of Brabant. I heard afterwards some Europeans behav'd themselves not so well towards the banish'd people of Ireland, a sign they have not known what trouble is, and that the practical part of their faith is not so vigorous as it ought to be. They are cruel, hard-hearted, and even impious, who upon such occasions do not relent a little. Let us ask those men with S. James the apostle in his epist. Canon. c. 2. Shew me your faith, &c. S. Thomas upon it, Who says, prove to me that you have faith by certain tokens; who says, you cannot prove it, because actions are wanting, and words are not sufficient, &c. And I will shew you my faith by my works; that is, I can prove my self one of the faithful by my works. Those who are persecuted and banish'd for the law of GOD can make good proof, not only by the words they answer'd to the tyrant and ministers, but by the consequences of their actions, (The proof of love is the performance of the work, says S. Gregory) that they are faithful to GOD and his law, and catholicks: But they who are hard-hearted to them, only testify by words, not by actions. What the holy apostle says immediately before the words last quoted, is very pat to this purpose.

CHAP. VII.

Of my departure from Manila, and voyage to Macasar.

D. Sabiniano Manrique was governor, and gave general satisfaction (never any governor did or will please all men) tho' he wanted not some enemies, which human prudence can never prevent; but an argument that he govern'd well is, that the commander Francis Enriquez de Lofada, in the year 1666, writ to me, and I have his letter still by me, that all men cry'd out for D. Sabiniano, but particularly the religious orders. I never heard that they cry'd out for others. This is a sufficient commendation of that worthy gentleman: tho' his lordship had promis'd to secure my passage in the ship, which was to sail that year for Acapulco; the dread I have of crossing those seas, and other motives, inclin'd me to go aboard the commander Christopher Romero my old friend. All my store and provision amounted to sixty pieces of eight, four tunicks, and two habits; that I might go the lighter, I left my cloak with a friend, and afterwards mis'd it and other things. No voyage upon sea can be ascertain'd, and it is a folly to set days to it.

2. We set sail the fourteenth of February;

I own I was presently discourag'd, and fear'd our voyage would be tedious, because the sailors who in reason ought to live regularly, began to grow loose. About that time the east winds usually roar'd, and to us they seem'd to be lock'd up in their caverns. On the sixth of March we came to Zamboanga, met the succours that were going to Terranate, they had taken in rice and flesh at Oton; the commander in chief was already dead. The seventh at night we continu'd our voyage; the sail with a sudden gust of wind threw the best sailer we had into the sea, where he perish'd; which misfortune increas'd my fears. During our passage, which is of but sixty leagues to Macasar (this is otherwise call'd Celebes) we had very bad weather, most furious driving winds, terrible violent gusts, but not lasting, and what was worst of all bad pilots. One morning we found our selves driven in among most frightful banks and rocks; I cannot imagine how the vessel got in among them without being beaten to shivers. We got out of that danger to run into greater; for four or five days the weather prov'd very fair till about half an hour hour after eleven; and when we were to make an observation, the sky would be clouded and we disconsolate. The land lay upon our larboard-side, sometimes about two leagues from us, as we afterwards observ'd, but so clouded that we did not discern it. One day we held our course with a fair wind and weather; they conceited it was a great bay, and discovering land to the northward, made to it. The current was so strong against us, that tho' the wind had freshen'd very much, we could not make the least way. We were then in a place, from whence in eight days we might have been at Macasar. My sins were the cause we did not reach thither till October following: we run up to that land at a venture. Upon holy saturday being the last day of March, when we were about founding, our vessel stuck fast. It is impossible to express the confusion we were all in; all cry'd out, Strike the sails, and none stir'd to do it. I crept into a corner to give my self up into the hands of God, concluding all was lost. The ebb shew'd we were surrounded with flats, save only the channel through which we had sailed, by the special guidance of God: there was fourteen fathom water at the stern, and the head was aground. They labour'd till after midnight, the weather being clear and serene, which was our good fortune. The flood return'd, and after much pains taken, the vessel floated without having taken in any water; as soon as it was day we sail'd. Good God, what a melancholy Easter we had! Our provision grew daily shorter, and our confusion encreas'd. In short, after eight days we found our selves imbay'd, without knowing which way to get to sea. There were small vessels plying thereabouts, they took us for pirates, we them for robbers; so we fled from one another, and knew not how to find out where we were. We had already perceived by the sun, that we were by our course in two degrees of north latitude, which by our chart was wrong. We spent eight days more in getting out of that bay. We plainly discover'd land ahead, and the weather favouring to make to it, the commander, contrary to the opinion of all men, resolv'd to anchor there till next day. When we were at dinner he said to me, They are all against me; is not your reverence of my opinion that we make over to morrow, it being saturday? I answer'd, Sir, the best time to stand over is, when God gives us a fair wind. He held his tongue and follow'd his own head. The second day of our passage, about three in the afternoon, being the eve of the feast of S. Mark, the wind started up at southwest so strong, that we were forced to run away before it, close to the shore, not knowing what sands were in the way. That NAVARRA night was one of the worst I have seen upon sea; the main-sail flew in shivers, the yard was spent, the foremast came by the board, the whipstaff broke, we all took into the cabin, said the Rosary and Litanies of our Lady, expecting how it would please God to dispose of us. All the crew had already made their confession. After midnight, through weariness, I fell asleep in a corner; when I wak'd the wind was fall'n, but the sea ran very high. We found our selves near the shore, and discover'd the landmarks, which was no small comfort. We had been six weeks beating about that place; there we lighted upon that they call the Devil's Island, and might have made the kingdom of Totole, had our men dar'd. The commander resolv'd to come about, and stand back for the kingdom of Bobol, to take in provisions. When we were half way over, the wind came about a head of us, so that we were fain to give way to it; thus we lay cruizing in the same place. We made a second time for Bobol, being almost lost; it was by my advice we had tack'd about; and the commander said, Father, some angel spoke thro' your reverence's mouth, for it is most certain we must have perish'd, had the fierce wind that started up found us where we were the day before. Something we bought there, and took aboard an Indian of Manila, now become half Mabometan. He was a great help to us afterwards, being well acquainted with that coast. Upon Corpus Christi day we anchor'd near Totole, where we found capt. Navarro, who was bound in another champan for Macasar as well as we; at which we rejoic'd, but our satisfaction was not lasting. It is well known that in sailing to the east twelve hours are gained, and twelve lost in sailing westward. Betwixt Terranate and India the Portuguese computation is follow'd. We came to that place according to our reckoning upon Corpus Christi day, which is a thursday, and they that came from Terranate took it for friday; so that at noon we had eaten flesh, and at night in the port supp'd upon fish, and lost that day, so that the next was saturday; so that if we had anchor'd at midnight, we should have had no friday, and but six days to the week. As to the divine office, tho' I was not oblig'd to all that of friday, yet having time to spare, I perform'd for both days.

3. There we bought abundance of sagu, Sagu, the Indians at Manila call it yoro, it is the heart of certain palm-trees; being steep'd, it becomes a sort of yellow meal, very like yellow sand. Of this they make thin cakes, which those people use instead of bread, and we liv'd upon it six months. Excellent NAVARETTE. lent diet for Europeans, and sometimes not enough of it to satisfy hunger; sometimes it was insipid, sometimes had a taste, it is so tough it never breaks, tho' it be drawn out a yard in length. The Indians at Manila eat it in time of scarcity; we were mov'd to compassion when we saw them eat it, for it is no better than ground-sticks; but at this time we thought it a dainty. The place we were in, was in a little above one degree of north latitude: from ten till two every day the sun scorch'd, but about that time every day a great shower of rain fell, with terrible thunder and high winds, so that the air was cool'd, and so cold at night, that we were forc'd to put on more clothes.

4. Capt. Navarro and our commander agreed to winter there; we were much troubled at it. I and two other passengers design'd to have bought a vessel of the king, and gone away in it. When the bargain was made, and the money paid, the king repented him, and kept above half our money: he paid it afterwards, was very knavish, tho' he treated me honourably, always making me sit by him; some ridiculous passages happen'd between us. His palace was a little house made of canes and straw, and in that hovel he carried himself very majestically; all his people spoke to him prostrate on the ground. He once made us a treat, which consisted of sagu cakes, and some dry'd small fishes boil'd without any salt. The prince his son dy'd, and I own I was astonish'd at the funeral: the king and queen went to it, the king in wooden clogs, the queen barefoot. At their return, as she was going up, a maid wash'd her feet upon the stairs. For four and twenty hours, they every half hour fir'd some pedrero's that were before the palace gate. The king withdrew, and would not be seen for several days. He expos'd all he had to sale; to denote his concern, but no body durst buy any thing. There we saw one thing extraordinary enough, which was that most of those people would not take silver; and if we shew'd them a piece of eight, and a single ryal together, they would rather take the ryal than the piece of eight. Whilst we had single ryals we liv'd cheap; when we had spent them, they would not give us as much for a piece of eight, as before they gave for a ryal. We endur'd a great deal of hunger. One day I went ashore and met with a black, who was our commander's cook, boiling some small fishes. I desir'd him to give me one or two; he answer'd, Father, I have them by tale. Then, said I, will you give me a little of the liquor they are boil'd in, for God's sake? I will, reply'd he. I look'd about the shore, and found a half coco-shell dirty and full of sand; I wip'd it with my hand, and in it receiv'd the broth, into which I put a piece of dry sagu, (tho' it lie a whole day in water it will not soak) I ate a few mouthfuls with much difficulty, and sup'd up the broth, and so went contentedly away.

5. Upon the ebb, the seamen went to catch shell-fish upon the rocks and sands that were left dry; there they gather'd strange creatures, as snails, toads, snakes, and a thousand several sorts, all which they eat, and throve upon it. I was reduced to such a condition, that I stole sagu when I could conveniently. I often said, what need was there of any other dainty, but some rice boil'd in water? At Manila I strictly observ'd the physician's directions, not to eat butter and several other things; in this voyage I eat such things that I wonder I liv'd. He that gives snow, gives wool. On the first of August we set out from Tozole; those cruel men expos'd us all to the danger of losing our lives; four were already dead, and others sick. I observ'd a strange thing, which was, that a poor black that was going only to beg at Macasar, came aboard so lean he could scarce stand; and yet for all our sufferings, in which he had the greatest share, he recover'd and grew so fat it was hard to know him again. On S. Dominick's day, about sun-setting, we cut the line, and enter'd upon south-latitude. The line is directly over the two islands they call the Two Sisters. The wind came so cold from off the land, that every one clad himself as warm as he could, so that in Europe men at that time sweat in fifty degrees of north-latitude, and we shak'd with cold under the line. Who can conceive the natural reason of it? Cajetan ingenuously says, this is Scientia de singularibus, which is only found by experience. Two days after we came to the kingdom of Caille, in one degree and a half of south-latitude. It is a noble bay, above three leagues in length, and two in breadth. As soon as we dropt anchor, an Indian of Manila, whose name was John of the Cross, came aboard. He came in a devout posture, with his beads about his neck; I ransom'd him for twenty pieces of eight, and carried him to Macasar, where he prov'd to be a great knave. He inform'd us, there were two Portugueses there, whom we presently went to see. By the way we visited a petty king, who treated us with coco-nuts. Captain Navarro ask'd for water to drink, the queen said, there was none in the house; the king was angry, and order'd some to be brought presently. Upon this the queen came out of her little room immediately, and taking up a great cane, went went away nimbly to the river, which was near at hand; she soon return'd, and we drank. Here one of the Portugueses came to us, the other was very sick; we went to his house, whither men and women flock'd to see us, and among those, these hellish monsters of men in womens clothes, who are publickly married to other men. Nothing so much astonish'd me in those parts as this. Here the Portuguese told us, some men would rather marry those brutes than women: for which they gave two reasons; the one, that they took great care to make much of their husbands, the other, that they were very rich, because only they could be goldsmiths.

6. It is in this kingdom where men and women are clad in nothing but paper, and that not being lasting, the women are always working at it very curiously. It is made of the rind of a small tree we saw there, which they beat with a stone curiously wrought, and make it as they please, coarse, indifferent, and very fine. They dye it of all colours, and twenty paces off it looks like fine tabby. A great deal of it is carried to Manila and Macao, where I have seen curious tent-beds; they are very good in cold weather. When it rains, water being the destruction of paper, those people strip, and carry their clothes under their arm.

Clebes.

7. The men are always employ'd in making oil of coco-nuts, of which they sell very much, and pay a great deal as tribute to the king of Macasar. Whilst we were there, he sent to demand of them ninety thousand pecks of oil. It is wonderful to see the coco-trees there are about the fields. That country produces an infinite number of plantane trees, and they are the best in the world; the natives live upon them without sowing rice or any other grain. Eight days we continued among those people, eating nothing but plantanes, and drinking the water of coco-nuts. They breed buffaloes, goats, and horses, which they sell, and when they have general meetings they eat a buffalo or two, half raw, half roasted. The towns NAVA are regular, the town-houses extraordinary. RETTE. The climate is good, and the people would willingly submit themselves to the Spaniards, as we were told there, that they might be deliver'd from the tyrannical government of the king of Macasar.

8. I afterwards ransom'd another Indian of Manila, he was sick; I heard his confession, and as soon as he came to Macasar he died. I gave six pieces of eight for him, and would have given my very habit rather than go without him. We sail'd out of the bay on S. Bartholomew's eve, but the sea ran so high, we were forced back. On the nativity of our Lady we set out again, and by degrees got to the kingdom of Mamuyo. With much difficulty we got into the port, where all the seamen fell sick. I, with the sick Portuguese I brought away, and two young servants I had, bought a little boat; whilst it was fitting out, I rested, and attended the sick. I saw the king's palace, which was very fine, and made of extraordinary timber. We set forwards, leaving the two champan there at anchor. We had enough to do to escape some dangers, but we spent the nights at ease and quiet. True it is, we were guilty of some rashness. Before we came to the kingdom of Mandar, we lit of another king, an ancient man, who us'd us well, and sent the prince to visit me; he was a handsome youth. The nearer we drew to Macasar, which is the capital of the island, the more civiliz'd we found the people. It pleas'd God in his mercy that I arriv'd at Macasar nine months and three days after I set out of Manila, that voyage being never reckon'd above forty days. I thought I was come into a paradise, found two of my order there, who to me seem'd two angels; and they prov'd so to me, for they made as much of me as their poverty would permit. The truth is, nothing was so pleasing to me as being off the sea, among my own brethren, and where I might say mass.

CHAP. VIII.

Of my Stay in the Kingdom of Macasar.

1. THE island of Macasar (or rather Celebes) is very large. The sumbane, which in their language is the same as emperor, lives in the most southern part of all the island, which lies in about six or seven degrees of south latitude. He has several petty kings under him. The country abounds in rice. Fourscore years ago it was inconsiderable, but since then has thrived mightily by reason of the fairs kept there; ships meet there from Manila, Goa, Macao, English and Dutch, so that abundance of rich commodities were brought thither from all parts of that Archipelago. Trade enrich'd the country, and made the sovereign powerful. Before this trade, the knowledge of the law of God was brought thither by means of the Portugueses then at Malaca, and that of Mabomet from Siam. At that time they were all Gentiles, and thought good Religion.

NAVA- good to receive one of the two laws; that RETTE. they might not err in so necessary a point, they resolv'd to make use of an extravagant expedient, which was, at one and the same time to send away a vessel to Siam for Mabometans, and another for religious men to Malaca, resolving to admit of those that came first. The Mabome- tans came first, through the fault of those at Malaca, as I heard it often from grave Portugueses, as well clergy as laymen.
 They receiv'd them and their law, which they have observ'd most strictly, and has obstructed the conversion of those people.
 When the Dutch took Malaca, most of the Portugueses, mungrels and others who serv'd them, retir'd to this country. The king receiv'd and assign'd them a place to live in, so that in my time there was a great town there. By the help of these Portugueses the trade daily increas'd. Many Malayes repair'd thither, and I have seen an em-bassador there from the great Nababo, that is of Golocondar. No man paid anchorage, or any other duty; saving the presents captains of ships and merchants of note made the sumbane, all the trade was free. This made it an universal mart of those parts of the world. The very day I arriv'd, prince Carrin Carroro, a man of good parts, and well vers'd in ours and the Por- tuguese language, sent me a message. He was the son of that renowned tho' unfortunate prince, our great friend Carrin Patin Ga- loa. He sent me word he would see me in the house of a rich and considerable man, who liv'd by our house. He would not go to the monastery, because a little before the sumbane and he had order'd our church, and that of the fathers of the society, to be thrown down, at the request of the governor of the bishoprick of Malaca, who liv'd there, and of the curate, either because the people went all to the monastries, or else because there was not so much alms given to the parish, the religious sharing with it. This is the original of all fallings out of this sort, and will ever be so. They made the sumbane and prince some good presents to gain their consent. The churches were demolish'd by the Moors, but even all of them did not approve of the action.
 Insomuch that there being great want of rain that year I was there, Carrin Samana, a Moor of great repute, and a rational man, us'd to say, How should God send rain, when they destroy and burn his churches? I went that afternoon to see the prince; he receiv'd me kindly, and ask'd several questions concerning Spain and Manila.

2. I had no thoughts of repaying his visit, as believing those people did not take notice of such things. I understood the prince had complain'd of my neglect; I desir'd captain Francis Vilira, in whose house he had visited me, to bear me company.

 He did so, we went together three quarters of a league. His palace was very good; he kept us till one of the clock, shew'd us some of our maps and books; he kept his father's library, which was considerable, had an excellent striking clock: we talk'd of Mabomet, and the Portuguese, who was a very zealous catholic, staidly told him he was in hell. Do not say so captain, quoth Carroro. I commended this man's resolution, another would have call'd it folly. If he had dy'd on this account, he had been a martyr; as the priest was whom they put to death at Damascus for the same reason. We return'd home through a row of palm-trees, the finest in the world. The sun's rays could not pierce it, and it was above a league long, tho' we did not go the whole length. How it would be valu'd among us, and with good cause! the prince repeated his visits oftner than I would have had him. As soon as I took his hand, which was the way of paying him respect, he would say, Our LORD be with your reverence. He one day brought the sumbane to Vilira's house along with him; I was presently call'd, came, and in truth they both did me too much honour. Their garb was the most ridiculous that can be ex-press'd; they were both in their gay dress, had cloth coats after our fashion on their bare skins, their arms naked, the sleeves hanging down, and their bellies uncover'd after their fashion. The prince told us how his men had kill'd a crocodile seven fathom long, and three fathom thick; and that he had some of the teeth by him. It was then the monstrousest creature in the world. I mention'd it in the first book.

3. At this time an ambassador came from Jacatra; they received him in the house of the secretary Andrew Mendez, knight of the order of CHRIST, son to the last sumbane, and a black woman. The ambassador was call'd, the sumbane and prince sat upon chairs rais'd high under a canopy; the prince plac'd me by his side, and ask'd me some questions; he had a large sparkling diamond on his finger. The ambassador came upon a stately horse, six thousand Moors with lances attending him.
 Having made his obeisance, the embassador sat down and was cover'd. They commanded him to be uncover'd; the interpreter urg'd, that ambassadors us'd to be cover'd. They told him, it was true, ambassadors from kings did use to be so, but that was not for him who came but from the governor of Jacatra; he obey'd and held his tongue, offer'd the present he carry'd, which consisted of several pieces

pieces of silk. It was not receiv'd, the letters were read; and not being satisfy'd with the excuses that were made concerning two ships the Dutch had taken from them, they resolv'd to remit the business to force of arms. It had been better for them to continue in peace, and lose the two ships. The embassador went aboard his ship; they took away what they had in the factory by night; then he declar'd war, cannonading the place. Great wars ensued; it cost the Dutch dear, but they stood to it, and in the year 1670. when I pass'd by Malaca, they made themselves masters of that country; and that the people might not rebel again, as they had done before, they carried away the sumbane, the prince, and several great men; thus God humbled their pride. The first time the Dutch took it, their first article was, that all the Portugueses should depart the place: they did so, and had well deserv'd it.

4. About that time an old man came to me; he fix'd his eyes upon me, and I did the same to him. I thought I knew him, and he had a mind to speak to me. After a while I bethought my self, and found it was that chief of the island Mindoro, who was taken when I left that island to return to Manila. I was very glad: he told me how he had liv'd four years in slavery under several masters. He wore his beads about his neck, and assur'd me, he had never miss'd saying them over a day; that they had offer'd him wives, but he would never consent to marry. He made his confession, and in truth I was astonish'd to see how God had preserv'd him so clear, among such wicked people. It is a great thing to be good among ill men, says St. Bernard, epist. 25. I enquir'd after his son, and the tears running down his eyes, he told me, that flying from Jacatra, where they had sold them to a Cbinese infidel, they travel'd over the mountains by night, sleeping betwixt whiles in places remote from the roads, that they might not be found by any that sought after them; and that one night his son lying asleep between him and a youth he had with him, a tiger came and carry'd him away in his jaws. LORD have mercy on him! What a grief it must have been to his father! I took particular notice of one thing, which was, that when this chief liv'd in his own town, and at home, he was so fat and unweildy, that he could hardly go with a staff; and when I saw him almost naked at Macasar, he was spare, and as light as if he had been but twenty years of age. By which we may see how natural labour is to human life, and how hurtful tenderness is. I provided for him the best I could in a vessel that was bound for Manila: how pleas'd NAVA- were his family and town when he re- RETTE. turn'd?

VOL. I.

5. I preach'd at Macasar in Lent the year 1658. Carroro every day said he would hear me, but never perform'd it. 1658. His father was a great lover of sermons, and constantly heard them. He had read all the R. F. F. Luis de Granada's works; he was convinced ours was the true faith, and was wont to say, Many went to hell out of policy, and that he was one of them; (this is barbarity in earnest) it was suppos'd by his words that he intended to be baptiz'd at the last hour of his life, and therefore F. Francis a jesuit attended him in his last sickness, having water ready to use it, whensoever he should desire it. But he having neglected so many calls, God slighted him: Because I have call'd you, and you refused, at your death I will laugh, &c. He lost his senses, and so dy'd. A most unhappy man! Carroro his son, in my hearing, said of him, that he was an admirer of all our things: Whensoever he saw a sword, he would handle it, and enquire of the use of it. He once took a Portuguese's sword in his hand, and understanding from him it would pierce a double buff coat, he made him try it immediately, which the Portuguese perform'd, tho' he hurt his hand with the great force he put to pierce the buff, which was upon a chair. Patin Galoa seeing that done, ask'd for his bow, and adding Bow. one fold more to the buff coat, made such a furious shot, that he pierc'd the three folds. All that were present stood astonish'd. That sort of bow seems to be an insignificant weapon, and they do wonders with it; all their arrows are poison'd,

6. We once saw the sumbane's elephant Elephant. pass by along the shore, with his driver upon his back; very soon after he came back alone. We were surpriz'd at it, enquir'd how it came about, and were told, that the day before the driver had a coco-nut given him, which he struck twice against the elephant's fore-head to break it; this day as he was going towards the town, the elephant saw some coco-nuts they were selling in the street, he took one up with his trunk, and beat it to pieces upon his driver's head, left him dead upon the place, and return'd alone. This comes of jesting with elephants.

7. About this time the sumbane commanded two Portugueses should be apprehended for a murder they had committed, and condemn'd them to death. At the place of execution he offer'd them their lives if they would turn Mabometans. The first would not consent, so they ript him up with a sort of dagger they call Clis. The other was so daunted at the sight, that

he

NAVA- he immediately abjur'd Christianity. Af-RETTE. terwards he fled to the mountains, and got over to Macao, where he was reconcil'd.
 There were abundance of slaves to the Portu-gueses there, who had renounced their religion; upon any little quarrel the slaves would go away to the Moors. When they had abjur'd Christianity, they would come and scoff at their masters. I understood another thing there which is deplorable, viz.
 that Christian men kept Mabometan women, and Mabometan men Christian women.
 Whence sprung these and many other spiritual calamities?

8. At the court of the island Borneo, which is very near to Macasar, there are above four thousand Indians of Manila in slavery, which is a great pity. Indians of Manila may be found in every island of that Archipelago, being either slaves or run-aways, and in all places wherefoever I was, from Cbina as far as Suratte, I met with natives of Manila, and its lesser islands, and yet people will assign other chimerical reasons of the decrease of them. Use them well, and they will not fly; protect them, and they will not be carry'd away into slavery. There is not a ship sails from Manila, whether it belong to Siam, Camboxa, or the Portuguese, &c. but carries away Indians out of the islands.

9. At Macasar I saw Ostridges, and a child that had twenty four fingers, toes and thumbs; and besides they said it was an 1658. Hermaphrodite. About May, 1658. a pink arriv'd there from Goa, and fortunately escap'd the Dutch; it had aboard some Franciscans and Jesuits. Discourfing about the taking of Ceilon by the Dutch, one of the Franciscans said, It was to be lost of necessity, or else fire must have fallen from heaven and consum'd it, for the iniquities and wickedness of the Portugueses. He was a Portuguese, and a religious man, who spoke these words in my hearing.

10. I being then out of conceit with the sea, and unprovided of all necessaries to bring me into Europe, resolv'd to go over with the Portugueses to Macao, and thence to enter Cbina, where those of my order were, and to end my days among them. I met with good conveniency and company; four small vessels were ready to sail, but all of them very fearful, because a great Dutch ship lay in sight. Some made great boasts in their talk, but an Englishman advis'd them to take heed what they did, for the Dutch would not come to board, but batter the pinks at a distance, and out of danger. He said further, You gentlemen have order'd your business very ill, you have only taken care to build one nest in one place, and another in another, which divided your force, and so could secure nothing. The Portugueses own'd the Englishman was in the right, and that made them sometimes rail at their government, and complain of their having cast off our king.
 Upon S. Anthony's day we set sail, rather trusting to God, and the assistance of the faint, than to our own strength. What hap'n'd to us, I will set down in the following chapter.

CHAP. IX.

My Voyage from Macasar to Macao.

Portu-gueses.

1. IT is most certain that the Portuguese nation are devout, godly, and religious, which I know by experience, and the first of it I had this voyage. I was treated by them with great civility, courtesy and generosity; and what is more, I prevail'd with them, never to discourse before me, even at Macao, about the differences then betwixt the two kingdoms. Aboard the ship the third part of the Rosary was said every day kneeling, and our Lady's Litany was sung every day. I took upon me to preach to them, which I did daily, as long as we were upon the sea; this and my retiring to my apartment, made them over-fond of me. Our voyage was as good as could be wish'd without any mischance.

Tacar-
 abaca.

2. When we had pass'd the dangerous flat of Tacarabaca, which signifies the knife of hell, and is a long sharp rock, where many ships have perish'd, the pinks parted, two one way, and two another, though ashore, they agreed always to keep together. It was a brutal action in the opinion of all men. The third day after we dis-cover'd astern two light frigats that gain'd upon us amain. We put our selves into a fighting posture, tho' we wish'd there might be no occasion for it. The sails were hoisted up to the round-tops, and they werted to make the more way. We begg'd of God the sun might not stand still, as it had done for Joshua, but that it would set presently. It set, and when it was somewhat dark we alter'd our course, steering eight points more to windward, which we held all night. Next morning we found our selves all alone, and clear of our enemies. Three days after that we spy'd another great ship, but made the best of our way and escap'd it.

3. Our pilot was a Cbinese, and in truth a man of extraordinary virtue, and good fortune;

fortune; he was extremely meek, humble, calm, and knew those seas admirably well. He was alive in the year 1670. but very old and blind. We had all of us extraordinary comfort in him. A pilot at sea is like a physician to sick men. We came to the place of the Samatras; so they call the fierce winds that prevail at that season. There is no describing their fury: did one of those gusts last an hour, no ship could keep the sea; they always bring much rain with them, which is the cause they soon fall: our small vessels scudded upon the foam of the sea.

4. We were four religious men in the cabin; there was no going to bed all the voyage: I us'd to lie down by a bale of stuffs; one morning I wak'd, and found it on the wrong side of me: I presently concluded with my self, there had been some extraordinary hurricane that night. In came a Franciscan looking pale and sad; and saluting us, I ask'd him, How he had pass'd the night without. He told me, the vessel had been at the point of foundering, and it was a miracle we were alive. The business was, the pilot lay down to sleep a little, and order'd that as soon as ever they found it rain'd, they should furl the sails. The night prov'd so dark and dismal, that there was no discerning which way the vanes stood, tho' never so near; and it being mizzling weather, it could not be distinguish'd whether it rain'd or not. It pleas'd God that he who supply'd the pilot's place was sensible of some noise upon the stern, and cry'd, furl, there's rain at hand. They let the tacks run, and immediately the Samatra follow'd; so that had not the tacks been loose, we were all gone. At this time the bale which was by me tumbled, but I did not wake, which was a great mercy, since we were not to be drown'd; for the fright and dread would not have suffer'd me to close my eyes again.

5. When we came in sight of the kingdom of Cbampa, the sky was clear, and the weather alter'd. Those who had been there said, there was a wonderful idol-temple near that place. It is a concavity betwixt rocks, very large, long, wide and strong. A few days after we discover'd the monstrous rock of the kingdom of Cocbinchina, it is upon the top of a mountain, and reaches a prodigious height above it. The passengers aboard had abundance of Cacatoos and apes, which made some diversion. It was very pleasant to hear those birds talk, and a fine sight when they were made angry, nothing can be more pretty. On the other side the monkeys made some sport. During this voyage I receiv'd full information concerning that religious man who brought a young Chinese as his servant into Europe, and being come into these parts NAVAFETTE set him up for the emperor's son, which made a great noise, and turn'd to his advantage. At Macaçar I had a satisfactory account that other missionaries of Japan had given out, that some Christian merchants that came with them were great princes. They impos'd upon all the princes of Europe, as the pamphlet said, who believ'd what they were told, and generously offer'd them rich presents and things of value. During this voyage I was told a notable story, it was confirm'd when I return'd in the year 1670. It was, that a sailor then aboard, who sail'd every year backwards and forwards betwixt Macao and Macaçar, which is at least thirty days sail, never eas'd his body till he came ashore. He eat and drank heartily, made a great deal of water, but never the least of going to stool. There is no doubt but the sea binds up the body, as well for want of exercise, as because of the nature of the food; but it is strange it should do it to that excess, without throwing up fumes to the head, or producing some other distemper.

6. In a book I read by chance, I observ'd the reason why less sustenance serves in hot countries, than in cold. That it is so appears by constant experience, and so it appears that in those countries the natives live upon a little rice, sago, and some shell-fish, and are as plump, fat, and strong, as those who in cold countries eat flesh and bread, and drink strong wines. The cold it's certain drives in the heat, which helps digestion and causes hunger. This is not so common in hot countries, there is a sort of decay or faintness, but no hunger, because the heat spreading over all the parts of the body, that which remains in the stomach has not strength for digestion, for which reason it needs not so much to prey upon, as when it is strong and vigorous.

7. We had a sight of the island Xan Choang, where S. Francis Xavier dy'd, and upon friday the thirteenth of July at night we entred a narrow strait. We sail'd out of danger to all appearance; the pilot ask'd, How wind ye? The steerman answer'd, North. Furl the sails, quoth the pilot, and drop anchor, or we are lost. It was done in a moment. In the morning we found our selves within musquet-shot of the shore. From thence to Macao was five leagues; our captain, who was a handsome youth, spent all the time we were failing them, in dressing himself, and he had enough to do it with. He was almost dress'd, and the vessel, with all its colours and streamers aboard, when a boat came from shore, and brought the news that his father was dead. The extravagancies that man committed, were the greatest I ever beheld:

NAVA- beheld: He grew as furious as a tiger, and RETTE. tore his fine-clothes with hellish rage, there was no comforting, or appeasing of him; a few days after a small distemper seiz'd him, and in less than two months sent him to his grave. There was aboard an ancient venerable Portuguese, who us'd to be familiar with me, and told me, that a few years since a curate, who was a Jew, had been burnt at Lisbon, who had baptized very many without any intention to confer the sacrament; which was the cause that orders were sent to all parts, that all who had been baptiz'd in such a parish during such a certain number of years, should be rebaptiz'd, which abundance did, and among them one who was governor of Diu, to whom the news was brought as he lay a dying, which was a great happiness. He said further, that four of the inhabitants of Macao, and he among them, discoursing upon this subject, they began to argue whether the curate that baptiz'd them had a good or bad intention. To remove all doubts, and remain free from any scruple, they resolv'd to go to S. Francis his well, and privately baptize one another. They did so, and were well pleas'd. Was it not very well done of us father, quoth the Portuguese? No, it was very ill done, said I.

The good old man was very much troubled at my answer. Strange things happen in the world.

8. We landed, I went with those of my order to our monastery, we had need of rest. That afternoon, it being saturday, I receiv'd great satisfaction in hearing the Rosary said, the Litany and Salve Regina sung. It is very well perform'd among us, as well as in the Philippine islands, new Spain, Italy, and other parts, but much better throughout all India. Upon all saturdays, festivals of our Lady, and first sundays of the month, the brothers meet; and they are all such, they put on a long robe of white silk with an image of our Lady, embroider'd on the breast, and every one with a torch of white wax in his hand: thus they accompany the holy image in the processions, and the singing of the Salve, at which the superior in a cope carries a little one. I lik'd it better and better every day, and it increas'd my devotion.

9. I shall hereafter write a particular chapter concerning what the city Macao is at present, and what it was, its situation, strength, monasteries, churches, and what else it contains; this to save repetitions. In the ensuing chapter I shall speak of other things I observ'd there.

CHAP. X.

Of my Stay at Macao, and first entring the great Empire of China.

1. ALL the while I stay'd at Macao, I had a great deal of trouble in preaching and hearing confessions, most people came to me. One day I heard a good lady, who said to me, Father, some years since, when I had riches to spare, I had enough to hear my confession, now I am poor I can't find one. I was much troubled at her words; I offer'd her my service as often as she pleas'd, and perform'd it. I heard some others, who told me they came by stealth, because their masters confin'd them to certain confessors; others that their former confessors might not chide them for going to a new one. I mislik'd both, and I found so much of it, that I was forced to give a hint of it in the pulpit.

2. A few months after they sent a confessor into Cbina; he had several spiritual daughters, and from thence writ, exhorting them to virtue, and advising them not to go to confession to such a church and monastery. I thought this very ill advice, and it was dislik'd by a person of note, when he heard of it.

3. I was there inform'd, that in a certain church of that city they had given the blessed sacrament three times to one woman upon Christmas-day. I was ask'd my opinion concerning it, and answer'd, It was very ill done, and a breach of a precept of the church there is to the contrary. That there was a particular reason for priests saying three masses that day, which did not extend to the laity receiving. This point is particularly handled in its proper place.

4. At that time there happen'd a misfortune that might have prov'd of ill consequence. The Tartar soldiers take more liberty at Macao, than they do in Cbina; they uncover womens faces, as they go along the streets, and even in processions, and there is no body can hinder them, tho' in Cbina they look upon it as a heinous offence for a man to look upon a woman. Some of them went to see the church of the society, which is a very good one, but not so extraordinary as F. Rodas makes it. They stay'd longer than the Sacristan would have had them, he grew impatient, and was something rough with them, which they resent'd, and waited an opportunity to revenge. It is no prudence in a strange country to abuse those that are masters of it. Those soldiers got together some more of their gang, and walking about the streets that afternoon, met two fathers of the society, on whom they took full revenge for the

the wrong done them; they cudgel'd, dragg'd them about the ground, and tore their clothes. This alarm'd the city, some substantial citizens took up arms, the temporal coadjutors went out with spears, fell upon the soldiers, who had secur'd themselves with their captain in the house where they quarter'd; they assaulted the house, threw in hand-granadoes, and beset them, but the house being over the sea, they easily made their escape at night, and acquainted the petty king of Canton with the matter. He immediately order'd the magistrates of the city, and fathers of the society to appear before him. Each sent two as deputies. The religious men were kept close prisoners several months, the townsmen follow'd the suit. It was compounded for three thousand ducats in silver, which the society paid with an ill will. This was the end of that business, and it might have prov'd worse.

5. I saw a monstrous sight there, which besides that it griev'd me to the soul, put me out of patience. A Chinese corrector liv'd there, whose nick-name given him by the Portugueses was Boneca. He seeing our processions, resolv'd to make a festival to his idols, and to this purpose borrow'd jewels and relics of the Portugueses, as I suppose deceitfully. With these things he adorn'd a bier to be carry'd on mens shoulders, on which he placed an idol, and calling together the infidels, they carry'd him about the streets and market of the city, with musick. I was an eye-witness to it, and bewail'd the miserable condition of that place. A citizen whose name was Texera, an honest man and good Christian, laid hand to his sword, but check'd himself. He afterwards said to me, I had not valu'd being cut in pieces, but bethought myself, that the whole city would perish, and that stopp'd me, otherwise I did not want courage to break the idol, and kill the idolaters. A few days after I preach'd, and I believe they remember what I said to this matter, and about the women lending an infidel their relics,

6. All church-men and laity there pay ground-rent for their houses and churches, as is usual all over Cbina, but above all the people of Macao, who are strangers, and had the place given them upon that condition. The magistrates receive it from all persons, and pay in the money. They came to a monastery to ask their quota, and they oppos'd it vigorously; the magistrates argued the case, and intreated, urging the example of the cathedral, parishes, and other monasteries. All would not do, the others alledging it was contrary to Bulla Cæna. The magistrates gave their reasons, and at last the city paid the money because the religious men could not NAVARETTE. be brought to hearken to reason. They put this case to me, without my being acquainted with the particulars of it; I answer'd, as I thought fit, and what I would answer at this time, which was, that those fathers should go to the Tartar emperor, and notify that bull to him, and if he allow'd of it, they might enjoy their privilege, and not pay. Such a question deserves no other answer. I have always said the things that happen in those parts are incredible. Is there any such thing as Bulla Cæna in the world, that concerns the receiving of my ground, or other rent? I was in the right to believe that was not the effect of ignorance so much as of wilfulness.

7. I found abundance of violent Sebastianists in that city, Sebastianists. (so call'd for that they expect king Sebastian slain by the Moors above one hundred years since will return again.) I stood amaz'd to hear the arguments they us'd to prove he was still alive. One who was a good Christian argu'd thus to me: Father, no king ever dy'd but his obsequies were perform'd, none have been perform'd for king Sebastian, therefore he is not dead. The major is undeniable, the minor plain, so the consequence, &c. When I discours'd this point with F. Gouvea a jesuit he deny'd the minor, and said the obsequies were perform'd at the monastery of Betlehem near Lisbon. Others have told me they were not perform'd by the kingdom, (this seems a quibble.) When I return'd out of Cbina, they were still of the same mind, and expect him daily.

8. Another thing I thought strange at Macao, which was that a widow gentlewoman, whose name was Elizabeth Raigoto, having a law-suit about a considerable quantity of sandal, with the procurator of a certain order, another of the same house took part with the widow, and pleaded for her. So that one was for, and another against the widow, in the same house. F. Gouvea told me he had seen the like at Lisbon, in a great suit there was with the collector, with whom F. Suarez sided, and did him all the service he could. And another very learned man of the society was violent against him. There is no doubt but there may be two probable opinions, and one hold the one, and another the other.

2. When I declar'd I would go into Cbina, the whole city was concern'd at it; and there was a layman that said, I ought to be stopp'd, for the general good of others. I was oblig'd to them for their love and many favours. Having no knowledge of that vast kingdom, I was necessitated to have recourse to them that had, for directions

NAVARRETTE. rections how to travel. They gave me written instructions very willingly; but I found the contrary by experience. The paper specify'd the provinces of China as far as Tartary; without mentioning any city, town, or village, as if a man should direct another how to travel from Madrid into Germany, and should write, You must go into Catalonia, thence into France, so into Flanders, &c. This did not discourage me. I took a Chinese, who spoke a little Portuguese, agreed with him, and order'd our affairs to set out. I us'd all my endeavours to go as far as Canton with another missionary, who was to build a church in that metropolis. He and his superior promis'd I should, and that they would give me timely notice. I was ready and expected to be call'd upon some days, but they never perform'd; perhaps they could not be as good as their words. The other went away, and I remain'd somewhat baffled but not out of hopes. I found an infidel who conducted me with a very good will, and for a small charge. I consider'd by my self what difference there is betwixt the sentiments of God and man. A catholick priest and missionary would not take me along with him, and God order'd that a gentile and idolater should carry me, and use me with all the respect in the world. Some Tartar soldiers went in the same boat, who carry'd themselves very civilly towards me. I was destitute of all human dependance, and was the first that ventur'd among those heathens in this nature, and openly: Which father Gouvea of the society often admir'd, and declar'd as much in my hearing. So that all the missionaries who had enter'd China till that time, either did it privately as the Franciscans and those of my order, or else under the protection of some mandarines, or as mathematicians, as those of the society. It was certainly a special goodness of God towards me, otherwise it could not have been done.

10. As soon as we were out of Macao, we came to an idol temple the heathens have there, and as we pass'd by it, the sailors offer'd their sacrifice, and perform'd their ceremonies for obtaining a good passage. Macao was never able to remove that eye-fore; and yet they boast they are lords of that island. In two days we came to the metropolis of Canton. I was astonish'd to see that prodigious city. We run up the river under the walls, they extend almost a league and a half from east to west. I spoke something of this city in the first book.

11. When I went hence I was assisted by the black soldiers who were Christians; they were very uncivil to me, they stole from me fifty pieces of eight, my church-stuff, and other small things. I was upon my guard against the infidels, but not against Christians, which was the cause this misfortune befel me, which I found out twenty four hours after, when I had sail'd some leagues; I made some enquiry, but to no purpose, so my sufferings began. In the metropolis I found a black who made a practice of baptizing all the children he met in the streets, and had done so to many. There is no doubt but all that dy'd in a state of innocence were sav'd, for he baptiz'd them well. I blam'd him for it, but know not whether he was the better. I sail'd up the river nine days with three Tartar soldiers, and declare it, they could not be civiler, tho' they had been good Christians. I was astonish'd at their courtesy, calmness and good behaviour. All that way I never gave any man the least thing; but he return'd some little present; and if he had nothing to return, there was no persuading him to accept of a morsel of bread. This is the general custom throughout the kingdom. I came to the river of the watering engines I mention'd in the first book.

12. I travel'd afoot for want of money, where there was no river. One day I went up a vast hill, which tir'd me very much; on the top of it was a good house, where soldiers lay to secure the roads, of which that nation is very careful. The captain saw me going by, came out to meet me, was very courteous, invited me in, and led me by the hand; I sat down, he presently order'd their drink made of Cha to be brought, shew'd compassion to see me travel afoot, and limping with weariness: he ask'd my Chinese companion how I came to travel after that manner, was sorry that my things had been stolen, conducted me out, and took his leave with much civility and concern for my loss. I went on much comforted with that kindness, went down the hill, which was tedious and craggy, that quite lam'd me, so that I was not able to stir. We came to an infidel's house (I met with no Christian till we came to Jo Kien) whilst they were boiling a chick for me to eat, I fell down and fainted, and tho' I presently came to my self, they thought I should have dy'd there. The infidel presently went in and brought clothes, he made me a little bed, on which they laid me, and I went to rest. I was astonish'd to see with what care and diligence the infidel attend- ed me, no more could have been done in any town in Spain. I eat and gather'd strength, that man did wonders with me that night, he gave me his own room and bed, which were very good. True it is, I slept but little, being in care to rise betimes.

betimes. He made much of me, and would take nothing for my lodging. This is very much among infidels.

13. Next day as we were entering a great town, my Cbinese and he that carry'd the small baggage went before, and I was left in a desperate condition, sad, and out of patience, among thousands of Cbineses, without knowing how to enquire for my company, or answer their questions; I had an ill afternoon of it, but no man was uncivil to me: I have said it, and must repeat it a thousand times, that this nation out does all others in the world in this particular, and some others. Next day it being very cold, for it was past the middle of October, we came to a river; I took off my shoes and stockings, and waded it with the water up to my knees, and very sensible of the violent cold. The company that travel'd together, spy'd a mighty tiger, that lay on a rising ground close by NAVA- the road; I saw it, and was much daunted, RETTE. it was as big as a large calf. That day we came to a stately and populous town, seated on a stately river, on which there were thousands of vessels. I endeavour'd to hire a boat presently, but could not, because the people were in an uproar, by reason a company of robbers were abroad. The war was hot there against the sea-Cbineses, who would not submit to the Tartar. I went into a lodging, and after night we went away very hush to a boat. At break of day we got out, sail'd down the river all day, continually seeing great numbers and variety of vessels. At dark night we anchor'd under the walls of the famous city of Cbang Cbeu, where we rested a little, and will begin another chapter to conclude this voyage.

CHAP. XI.

My Travels continu'd as far as Fo Ngan.

1. THE city Cbang Cbeu is very famous and renown'd in Cbina, all the Cbineses that trade to Manila are of it and its territory, and are therefore called by us Cbincheos, by corruption of the name; it is part of the province of Fo Kien, and cost the Tartar dear. He took it once, but lost it to the Cbineses of Cabella; but he coming a second time with great force, made himself master of it again. True it is, it cost abundance of lives on both sides, for it was strongly garrison'd, being a frontier town. At the dawn of the day we went out of the boat; to continue our way we went about a great part of the city, and on a sudden found my self in a street, the longest, finest, and fullest of people that ever I saw. I was astonish'd and surpriz'd, especially hearing all people say, This is a father of Manila. And considering how ill the soldiers at Manila use the Cbineses, I concluded, it would be well if I came off with a good beating. I went on apace to escape the danger I fancy'd hung over me, and thought the street had no end, it was little less than half a league long: It is all the way at twenty paces distance adorn'd with stone arches curiously wrought. Troops of horse march'd out of the city with much noise and confusion, and I could not think what would become of me. One lodging would not entertain us, and the worst was, we had a river to pass in a great common boat. I went into the passage-boat very much concern'd, and there was aboard a great many people who took not their eyes off me. I waited two hours till the boat was full; we went down the river three or four leagues: when I got ashore, I thought my self in another world. Having travel'd about two leagues, I met with the tallest and fiercest Cbinese to look to I had yet seen, he prov'd to me an angel sent by God. He came to me, made much of me, comforted me, and by signs gave me to understand that I should be merry and fear nothing, for he would take care of me. I understood something, and my Cbinese explain'd it to me very well. In the lodgings he gave me the best room; when he eat he gave me the best morsel; he took me by the hand and plac'd me on his right side, and always took as much care of me as if he had been my tutor or guardian; I never saw a better-natur'd man. Two days after another, nothing inferior to the first, join'd us; I was very well pleas'd with such good company. Being come to the city Civen Cbeu, I was amaz'd to see such a vast place; the whole appear'd from an eminency, and it look'd like a little world. When the Tartar took it, the walls were ruin'd, and he caused them to be new built; they were finish'd in two years. I believe it impossible for any European prince to compleat such a work in four or five. The form of them is like ours, with curtains and bastions. We travel'd under the walls, crossing the narrowest part: As I went I counted the cannon; I reckon'd as far as seventy, and observing I was not come half way, left off to take notice of other things. About the year 63, the floods swell'd so high, that they overflow'd the walls, and drowned a great part of the city. Having pass'd this place we came to that wonderful bridge I mention'd NAVARRI. mention'd in the first book. Three days after we met the general of Fo Kien, who was marching to Cbang Cbeu with twenty thousand men. I was in great confusion and distress upon this occasion, considering in what condition a poor religious man must be in such a strange kingdom, and amidst an army of idolaters. Those two Cbinese were so assisting to me, that were it not for them, I know not what had become of me, nor that any man spoke to me, or offer'd the least incivility, but because the dread and disorder that multitude of Gentiles put me into, in regard I could not speak, or give the least account of my self, if occasion had requir'd. I pass'd in sight of the general, who was near the shore with the greatest gravity and state imaginable. It was prodigious to see his sumptures, camels and horses. When we were pass'd the body of the army, and thought all was over, from an eminence I discover'd another party, which was no small trouble to me, they were all pikemen, and drawn up on both sides of the roads. I went through the midst of them all alone, because my companions were behind seeking their saddles, and my Cbinese our baggage. When I was pass'd, I said, and still say the same, that I had rather go thro' two armies of Tartars, than one of ours. We saw country houses and villages with their fruit, and meat set out in the shops to sell, as if never a soldier had gone that way. Then, and often since have I made reflection upon it; it is never known that soldiers in that country wrong the subjects, and therefore tho' an army marches through a city, town, or village, none of the inhabitants are the least disturb'd. The handicraft minds his business, he that sells fruit keeps his station, and so others; no man dares touch any thing without money in hand, and paying the usual rate. The following year a soldier paid a half-penny short in a little rice he had bought; the seller complain'd, and having made it out, the soldier was beheaded. The Cbinese, and at present the Tartars say, soldiers are to defend the people from the enemy, and to prevent the harm he may do them; but if the soldiers do the same harm, the people will be expos'd to two enemies: so that it is better not to raise forces, that the people may have but one enemy, whom they can better oppose than two: this is evidently true.

2. Before I came to the metropolis of Fo Chen. Fo Kien, call'd Fo Cbeu, I sent my Cbinese into the city to find out the church, and know whether there was ever a father at it. It was long before he came back, which troubled me very much. My companions carried me to an inn, a better than which there is not in all Italy; we pass'd through two courts, and found a table covered with a thousand dainties. I was concern'd that it was the eve of S. Simon and Jude, though I was in such a condition I might without any scruple have forbore fasting. My countenance expressing my sorrow, those infidels ceas'd not to comfort me with signs and motions. It pleas'd God the Cbinese return'd, and with him a Christian of that city, which fetch'd me to life again. The religious man, I think, hid himself, so that I neither saw him, nor went to his church; such are the humours of men. I was not a little afflicted, because I was desirous to confess and say mass. Perhaps he had nothing to help me forward in my journey, and consider'd it, but I stood not in need of him. Two days after I set forward, having been well treated by a Christian physician, and receiv'd some small gifts from others: I cross'd the city, which is extraordinary beautiful, though the least metropolis in Cbina, they say it contains one million of people: the suburb I came in at was a league in length; the concourse of people, without one woman among them, was incredible. The street I went through was exceeding broad, long, well pav'd and clean; shops on both sides of all sorts of things a man could wish for. Going along it, I met three mandarines at a good distance from one another. I was order'd to get out of my sedan or palanquine, and stood astonish'd to see with what gravity, state, and attendance they went. I look'd upon them earnestly, which I ought not to have done; in that country it is counted unmannerly: but being ignorant of this, and many other matters, it is no wonder I err'd. I got out of that fright, and the city, and travell'd more easy in the open country. Soon after I met a Christian whose name was Charles, who came from the place where those of my order were; he was a great comfort to me. I travell'd five days longer over hills that reach'd the clouds, but God be prais'd no body did me the least displeasure. The last night we lay in a little castle, in which were about fifty soldiers; it is incredible what civility I met with there. The commander quitted his own room, which was a good one, for me to lie there. I endeavour'd to excuse it, but he prevail'd, and went to lie in another place. I was amaz'd at this usage from infidels, among whom Europeans are accounted barbarians; these and such like passages were always the subject of my observation, they very well deserve consideration and reflection. Next day the commander and others came down to the door to take leave of me, begging my pardon for the slender entertainment.

Women.

I went up and down seven hellish mountains that day; at the last of them it rain'd hard, at the top of it we rested a little. I was very hungry and weary, for they had deceived me in the number of leagues. I saw a Cbinese eat boil'd rice in the morning, and as cold as ice; I took a good parcel and eat it, methought I never eat any thing more dainty in all my life-time. As we went down the hill, which was very tedious, it rain'd again, and I met a company of horse-men, who all saluted me after their manner. We found the gates of Fo Ngan shut; we went late in a dark night and very cold to a suburb, where we had a bad night of it, because there were not necessaries to be had, nor could we dry our clothes. Wet as I was, I lay down upon some straw, and the cold being intense, I could not get heat into me; I never had so bad a lodging in forty days I had been travelling, and it was good fortune to get any, because there were abundance of soldiers quarter'd. Next day being the third of November, I went into the city, came to the church, where I found three fathers of our province of Manila; the very sight of them rejoic'd me, and made me forget all my sufferings during the journey.

3. Some at Macao look'd upon it as a rashness in me to undertake that journey, others were of opinion I could never perform it. I my self was doubtful of the event, which prov'd more fortunate than any man could imagine; the circumstances make it the stranger, for it is certainly very strange that I should travel forty days over mountains and valleys, upon rivers, thro' great and small towns, for the most part near the sea, when the war was hot between the Tartars and Cbineses of Cabello, and abundance of horse and foot marching, and that no body seeing a stranger, should speak to or do him the least wrong, but rather should all behave themselves courteously, civilly and kindly. Till I met the army at Fo Kien, I travell'd with my beads about my neck, a cross of that sort they call of S. Toribuis, and a medal hanging to it; it was made of jet, and in Cbina there was none of it; they look'd upon, touch'd it, admir'd what it was made of, and there was an end. As we were going through the army, my Cbinese friend took ^{NAVA-} it off, and made signs to me to lay it up; ^{RETTE.} I did so, because there was no necessity of carrying it openly. All men knew I was a preacher of the evangelical law, and my interpreter told them as much, without being ask'd. All the journey I us'd to rise very early, so that I had said most of the divine office before I came out of my lodging; at night I perform'd what remain'd. I never wanted time to do this duty, and I found afterwards that the infidels were very much edify'd by seeing me pray. I said other prayers in the day time upon the road. When I din'd or sup'd, there commonly came some poor body; I gave some small matter, and this was matter of edification to the standers by. I gave my companions some small gifts; they were thankful, and made some return.

4. During this journey I saw innumerable cities, towns, villages, and country houses; it was rare, but we were in sight of some. The plenty of fruit, flesh, fish, cakes of several sorts, and other varieties, was wonderful. At one inn I stood a good while to see one mince bacon to put into the meat he dress'd; since I was born I never saw such activity, expedition, cleanliness and neatness as that Cbinese's; I was quite astonish'd. Along the roads I saw several paper-mills: what I admire in those people, as to this and other particulars, is, that they set up a paper-mill and other such necessaries upon half a dozen stakes, and work it with the least rivulet of water; among us we have a thousand utensils.

5. I forbear writing many small matters, not because they will tire the reader, but because I am tir'd my self: I have seen them so often, that they are very common to me, which makes me have the less inclination to write them. I spoke in the first book of the multitude of temples and idols I saw. The famous idol call'd San Pao, which has been represented as an image of the most blessed Trinity, is exactly the same with that which is on the high altar of the monastery of the Trinitarians at Madrid. If any Cbinese whatsoever saw it, he would presently say, the San Pao of his country was worship'd in these parts.

C H A P. XII.

My Stay at Fo Ngan, till I went up to Che Kiang.

1. SOME things I gave account of in the first book, which I will not repeat in this place; but I forgot to write one remarkable to us Europeans, which is, that during the forty days I travell'd, I never saw any more than three women, ther in towns, upon the road, or at the inns. One as I went thro' a village, another on the road, and another at a distance from me near a town. Among us it will seem incredible, among them it will seem too much that I saw three.

NAVA-
RETTE. 2. The town, or as others call it, city of Fo Ngan, is very renown'd in the province of Fo Kien; it suffer'd much upon the coming in of the Tartars, twice they took it, and twice the Cbineses beat them out, the third time, the latter submitted. The Tartars capitulated to hurt no man, drew up, and order'd all that bore arms to appear; they did so, and fourteen thousand of them were destroy'd. The first of them was a good Christian, and a very learned man, who was a commander. The Tartar had a good opinion of him, and he would have been preferr'd, had he submitted at first. A soldier as he was going to make his appearance, had some business, and said to a townsman, I am busy at present, do you appear for me, and here is a ryal (six pence) for you to drink. He did so, and was put to death, the other escap'd; it was very fortunate for the one, and very unlucky in the other.

3. Liu Cbung Zao, the Cbinese general, a man of great learning, and brave, finding himself in distress, resolv'd to poison himself; he invited some friends to do the same, and among them the Christian I spoke of before, whose name was John Mieu. They all excus'd themselves, and he took the poison alone, died in his chair of state, where the Tartars found him sitting, and leaning against a table; they made many obeisances to the dead body, and extoll'd his loyalty, since he chose to die rather than to deliver up the city to an enemy.

4. In one of those sieges the venerable F. F. Francis de Capillas, of the monastery of S. Paul of Valladolid, and born at Villaquerin de Campos, suffer'd martyrdom. I saw the place where they cut off his head, and kiss'd the ground. His business lies now before the holy congregation of rites at Rome. In this place my order had their first church in Cbina: here they sow'd the seed of the word, and did, and still do reap a plentiful harvest. What relates to this particular being written in our history, I will proceed, but shall say something more in the second volume.

5. I was there told a very remarkable story, which is as follows; Liu Cbung Zao, whom we mention'd before, going to fight the Tartars, a missionary attended him with the title of mandarin of the powder. He took up his quarters at our church, where he had the best entertainment they could give him. He being so great, and those of my order so poor, the infidels began to doubt whether he and the rest were all Europeans. To clear this doubt, it was resolv'd that one of ours and he should meet in some publick place, and talk together. The time and place were appointed; F. Francis Diaz, a worthy missionary and labourer in God's vineyard, got up early, and travelled afoot two leagues of very bad way; he was cloth'd in cotton, not in silk, and came sweating to the place appointed, where the other was in great state in his sedan, with attendants like a mandarin. Our father faced him; and when the father mandarin saw him from his sedan in that garb, and without servants, he despis'd him, and went on without taking any notice of him, leaving him out of countenance in the presence of a thousand lookers on, and some Christians who expected by that means to have gain'd honour to their spiritual fathers. Afterwards a good Christian ask'd the father mandarin, how it came he had put so great an affront upon the Dominican father? He answer'd, Why should I go out of my chair to pay a compliment to a man in that garb?

6. Another time the general spoke ill of us in the hearing of that mandarin missionary, and of a Cbinese Christian. The reason the general had for it was, because a concubine had left him, and was become a Christian. The father hearing what the infidel said, and perceiving he bore us ill-will, said, Sung ta men ki pa, which is as much as if in our language he had said, Turn them out of the kingdom, and let them be gone. The infidel star'd, the Christian amaz'd fixt his eyes on the father. Observe how the infidels us'd me, and how one missionary uses another. In short, Figulus figulum odit. Notwithstanding all this, he afterwards desir'd our fathers to procure him a faithful Christian servant to wait upon him. They got him one, he brought him into Europe, made him pass for an able physician. He was with him at Rome, where he forbid him going to our monastery of Minerva. Our father general sent us this intelligence into Cbina; I saw, read, and had his letter in my hands.

7. I came to the church the third of November, as I said above, and presently apply'd my self to the study of that most difficult language; there are few but find great discouragement in it, I labour'd all I could. Mattins were certainly said at midnight; and it was usual with me to sit in my chair after them till morning at my study. Continual application overcame the difficulty in great measure. It pleas'd God I preach'd in the church the second Sunday in lent, which but two months before I thought impossible to be done in two years. I was commanded to study the character, and thought it a difficult task; began with infinite reluctance, but in a few months was so fond of it, that I could not be a moment from my books. This study is so necessary, that without it there is no coming to a right understanding of the errors they profess, nor opposing them, nor conversing with the learned. In two years I continu'd in that province, I came to hear confessions, preach'd with some ease, read some books, and discours'd concerning matters of faith with heathens and Christians.

8. I observ'd during that time that the *Chinese*s confidently reported that their emperor should die in the eighteenth year of his reign. The *Chinese*s reckon their emperors lives by the years of their reign, as we do the pope's; but it is not true to say they have no other computation of years, as F. Trigaucius, Cornelius à Lapide, Tirinon and Kircher affirm. We know they reckon the year by moons, allowing twelve to a year, and thirteen to the bissextile or leap-year, wherein they agree with the Jews, as Cornelius à Lapide in Exod. proves. Their moons are some of twenty nine, and some of thirty days. The name mensis, a month, is well known to be deriv'd from the Greek, taken from the name of the moon, as S. Isidorus says, lib. V. de orig. c. 33. The Jews counted by moons, as the *Chinese*s do at this time. The day according to the Egyptians, says the saint, cap. 30. began at sun-setting: according to the Perians, at sun-rising: according to the Athenians, at the sixth hour of the day: according to the Romans, at midnight. This last is the method the *Chinese*s observe. In the thirty seventh chapter the saint speaks of the lustrum, which was every five years. The *Chinese*s have the same, and call it si. The Jews reckon fifty years an age, as the same saint observes, we make it a hundred; the *Chinese*s allow but thirty. The Greeks began the year at the autumnal equinox, says S. Isidorus, cap. 6. de natura rerum; the *Chinese*s, as has been said before. Certain it is, they have other computations beside the years of their emperors reigns. To conclude, the Chinese prophecy prov'd true, xe pa chung, that is, he will end the eighteenth year of his reign. They also gave out they would banish the law of God, it was talk'd of three years before it happen'd. This was easier to be known, because our enemy was then contriving the mischief.

9. At an examination of batchelors, some things remarkable happen'd to certain Christians; One of them liv'd near the church, was an extraordinary good Christian, and being old us'd spectacles: He went to the examination without them, through forgetfulness; the man was utterly undone, for there was no avoiding losing his degree, being whip'd, and undergoing the shame that follows of consequence. I was told he clap'd his hands upon his face, and offer'd up to God that NAVATR trouble and affliction he was fallen into, after he had many years continu'd in his degree with honour and reputation. He pray'd, then open'd his eyes, and thought his sight was very clear; so taking the pencil, he began and ended his exercise, admiring at himself; and it prov'd so good, that he receiv'd a premium for it. There is no doubt but it might happen naturally, and God might specially assist him.

10. Another, who was newly baptized in his rhetorick, committed a gross fault, which deserv'd a whipping at least. He offer'd up his prayer to God, and made up his paper the best he could. It was a strange thing that the fault was not perceiv'd; and his composition was not only approv'd of, but he was prefer'd a step higher for it. The other Christian batchelors, all of them had premiums that year, which the infidels took notice of.

11. I was alone a few days in a town, where that happen'd to me which I mention'd in another place, which was, that an infidel bid me go preach at Manila, where there was more need of it than in their kingdom. I was out of countenance; it was in this town I baptized the child I spoke of, that was expos'd to perish. As I was one day at my study, two infidels open'd my cell-door very softly; on my table was a crucifix, they stood looking at it; and making some little noise, I look'd about, saw them, and rose to ask what they wanted. They said, they were going to see the church, and had a mind to see me, but that they were surprized at the sight of that image, which had mov'd their hearts to some tenderness. What I write is the very truth, let others write or say what they please. Before this, when I was at Fo Ngan, the same thing happen'd to me twice; and when I spoke something concerning that divine mystery to those infidels, they knit their brows, and paid respect and honour to that holy image. This point is particularly handled, and I would have the curious reader reflect upon what S. Thomas writes on Joan. xii. sect. 4. on the words, But Jesus answer'd, &c. About this time a heathen batchelor, who lay very sick, sent for me; he had read some books of ours, and God touch'd his heart. He earnestly desir'd to be baptized; I instructed him the best I could, and caus'd some who were Christians of long standing to discourse him. Ten days after he had devoutly receiv'd the sacraments, he went to injoy the sight of God, as I charitably believe.

12. As I went one day to see him, some Christians and infidels went with me. I heard an infidel batchelor say to a Christian, NAVA-RETTE. ftian, Is it poffible none can be faved without being of this religion, and that all our forefathers and predeceffors who had no knowledge of it, were damn'd? This is a hard cafe. If GOD be fo merciful as thefe men preach, and one perfon was incarnate to fave thofe men, had it not been proper that another fhould have taken human flefh here to redeem us, and not leave us fo many thoufands of years in a desperate condition? I was much troubled that I was not fo perfect in the language at that time, as to answer fully and fatisfactorily as the cafe requir'd. Nevertheless that he might understand fomething of it, I gave him a book that treated upon the very fubject. He went his way hammering upon this point, and GOD calling him, came afterwards and defir'd to be baptized, his wife and two fons were alfo baptized; fo all came into the church, and after them their fons two wives. The whole family was fenfible of GOD's fpecial protection in an affault of fome rebels.

13. There was in that place a Christian batchelor, whose name was Thomas, a man of an excellent wit, and much reputation. I once practifed the language, and expounded to him the mystery of the incarnation. When I had fpoke what was material to the point, he took me up very fhort, and faid, If it is fo that GOD fhew'd his infinite love and charity in this mystery, it had been more convenient that the Holy Ghofit had become man, fince love is his peculiar attribute, and not the Son, whose attribute is wifdom. The Cbinefe made a good reflection, and prefs'd it home; for my part I was amazed, and fo were others. What I had read in S. Thomas upon that fubject occurr'd; he brings as a reafon of conveniency, 3 p. art. 4. That the reparation might be answerable to the creation. The creation of the world was for the Son, In the beginning, that is in the Son. It was proper the creation, or reparation, fhould be answerable. The Cbinefe understood it, and was fatisfy'd.

14. Near to the church there liv'd an infidel batchelor who was above the exercifes; he liv'd very retir'd, was much of a ftoick, and therefore in great eiteem. He had a good opinion of the law of GOD, infomuch that he himfelf in my time, perfuaded his wife and two fons to be baptized; thefe two I baptized, and my fuperior the wife: Yet he could not resolve as to himfelf, and all his objection was, that he thought it very indecent for GOD to be prefent in the hofit, and expos'd to be receiv'd by ill Christians. Very much was faid to him upon this account, but ftill he was obftinate, till it pleas'd GOD to move him effectually. The perfecution was then beginning, when one would have thought he fhould have been the further from embracing our holy faith, as being condemn'd by the emperor, and endeavour to make his wife and children forfake it. Then it was GOD fhew'd his mercy towards him, enlightning his understanding, and inclining his will to receive baptifm, as he actually did. Above two hundred and fifty were baptized during thofe two years, and had not the wars happened at the fame time, the increafe of Christianity had been great. They burnt five churches of ours, two in my time, one of the then biggeft there ever was in Cbina. It was built by an excellent Christian Cbinefe, who had been at Manila, and feen our churches; he return'd into his country, came to be a mandarin, and in his own town he built a church exactly like that he had feen at Manila, in bignefs, fhape, and ornament. A Christian woman liv'd with her family in a country-houfe near the fea, her manner of living was fcandalous; when all the family was afleep, a tiger got in and carry'd her away; the Christians look'd upon it as a judgment.

15. In Auguft I was fent for to a fmall town, to hear the confeffion of a fick woman; I went and gave her the viaticum, and all the family confeff'd and receiv'd. They were all extraordinary good Christians, and well inftructed in the faith. The inhabitants of the next houfe were their relations, but profess'd enemies of the law of GOD, yet it pleas'd his Divine Majefty they foon after came in and were baptized. As I return'd it rain'd hard, and the north-wind blew; and the cold and rain pierced me, and being afoot in fome places the water was half way my legs. Being come home before I had time to refit me, I went to hear the confeffion of a poor old man, and gave him the extreme unction; this ftruck me into an ague, which was very troublefome. After the feaft of our Lady in September, news came that relief was fent us from Manila; it was a great comfort, for in truth we were in want. It pleas'd GOD, as a punifhment of my fins, that when it was a fhore fafe from fea-robbers, as it came up a river all was loft, but one hundred pieces of eight a Christian hid; the thieves were taken afterwards, and confeff'd this robbery among others; they were put to death; but we remain'd eleven religious men of us with only one hundred pieces of eight among us. In November following F. John Polanco, a notable miffioner and religious man, went over to Manila; he dy'd, after having labour'd very much, at Sevil in the year 1671, being then bifhop elect of New Caceres in the Philippine iflands. I was order'd to go up to the province of Cbe Kiang in his ftead, as accordingly I did, and fhall relate in the next chapter.

CHAP.

C H A P. XIII.

My Journey to Che Kiang, and stay there till the Persecution.

1. I Now speaking the language, and my beard being grown, this journey was easier to me than the first, tho' I went in some fear, because I carry'd wine with me to serve for saying mass, and half the money that had been sav'd. With me went two Christians and an infidel who was upon his conversion; they were countrymen of the inland, and most excellent natur'd men. The second day I came to the highest mountain I ever saw in my life. This and several others I cross'd in eleven days; travelling tir'd my very soul. At every half league or league we found resting places cover'd, and so neat that nothing could be finer for the purpose. All Cbina is furnish'd with these conveniencies, and has good roads. I saw several temples of the bonzes, some upon high mountains, and the ascent so rough and difficult, that it was terrible to look at them. Others were in deep vallies, others close by the road. These last had hot water at the doors, with the herb cha for passengers to drink. At some certain places there were bonzes in little houses, where they had idols, and the same sort of liquor; the bonze offer'd it very courteously, and with much gravity and modesty. If they gave him any thing, he took it, making a low obeisance, and returning thanks for it; if not, he stood stock still, without stirring. I never gave these people any thing, the reason I shall assign in its proper place.

2. We came to the limits of the province of Che Kiang, the gate was betwixt two vast high rocks, there stood a guard of soldiers; in the middle between that and another gate were their quarters. There we stopp'd a while, they gave us cha and very courteously said, There is no doubt but this gentleman has an order to pass this burden. The infidel Cbinese answer'd, It has all been search'd, Sir, here are the certificates. Enough, enough, said the soldiers. To say the truth, nothing had been search'd. They spoke not a word more, we took our leaves according to their fashion and went on. This was done by heathen and idolatrous soldiers, we shall see in its proper place how Christians have behav'd themselves. I observ'd that and other such passes, and methinks it is impossible for an army to force them against a handful of men, tho' they had no weapons but staves; they are so narrow two cannot go a-breast; the Cbinese with but indifferent valour might have made them good against innumerable multitudes of Tartars. Soon after we came to another narrow pass like the former, but the guard was much more numerous. Here we rested, and warm'd our selves at the sun. I saw a temple there was there, every body made obeisance to me, but none ask'd me any question. During that time I observ'd, that a woman was coming up from a deep valley, and as I could guess she was going to a temple that stood on a hill hard by. She came up to the soldiers, they all stood up, and very gravely bow'd to her, which she answer'd very modestly, and went on. I was astonish'd that this should happen among infidels, when at the same time there is so much impudence in our countries. We ought all to be asham'd and confounded at it.

3. I was notably made much of in that journey. In one inn I saw a woman, which was the first and the last I ever saw in an inn, tho' I lay in very many.

4. I arriv'd at the city of Kin Hoa, that is flower of gold, because there is a hill by it that bears abundance of gold flowers, or walwort. The church there had not been founded a year, so that there are but few Christians. I baptiz'd some, and among them a licentiate, a bachelor, and a taylor. I baptiz'd one more, who was a merchant, but he came to naught. The case was, that he learn'd the necessary answers for baptism; a violent sickness seiz'd him, he came to the church desiring me to baptize him; I made him return home, instructed, baptized, and gave him beads, pictures, and holy water, and encourag'd him to expect death, with great assurance that GOD would be merciful to him. A brother of his who was an infidel dislik'd what was done, went to his house, made himself master of it, and deny'd me admittance; he call'd the bonzes, who perverted and made him an apostate, he soon dy'd and went to hell baptiz'd: O the depth of the riches of God's wisdom and knowledge! &c.

5. A few months after I went to a village, where there were good Christians, there I apply'd my self to writing of some books which I thought very necessary. They were the four volumes I mention'd in another place; in which explicating Christian truths, I impugned the errors of that nation. I am satisfy'd they were approv'd of by learned Christians of the society, and others of ours. An ancient Christian bachelor of the society, whose name was Matthew, read them, and when he had done, said, Till now I was not perfectly instructed

NAVA- instructed in the law of God. I preach'd RETTE. often in that village. A youth who proved a good Christian was baptiz'd, and an ancient woman, besides others who relapsed.

6. Here it is to be observ'd, that in a dispute we had at Canton touching some ceremonies, whether they were political or superstitious, in the answer F. Faber gave in opposition to my opinion, he puts the question, What gentiles I had baptiz'd, since I held that opinion? Or how many infidels I had converted at Kin Hoa? This he started after I came out of my confinement.
What I would have answer'd him there, I will shortly insert here, reserving the principal matter for the second tome.

7. In the first place, God did not command me to convert, but to preach: Preach the gospel, &c. Cajetan observ'd it, and says, that conversion is the work of God, not of the preacher, which answers the question, granting I preach'd and taught the doctrine and points ascertain'd at Rome. (2.)
It is a receiv'd opinion, that the apostle S.
James converted but only seven persons in Spain, which does not make it lawful to slander the doctrine he preach'd. (3.) That during that time I sow'd the seed of the word, both by preaching and writing, which I hope in God will yet yield a good crop. (4.) I ask'd of him we speak of, and others, what conversions they had made by preaching their opinions? It is well known, there were only three learned men that were tolerable Christians at Xang Hai.
And of two thousand that had been bap-tiz'd in Jang Cbeu, only seven or eight frequented the church, as F. Pacheco a mission-ner own'd in that city.

8. (5.) I gave in answer the words of Corn. à Lap. in 1 Cor. iii. 8. where he handles this point very learnedly, and says more than I need. The curious reader may see it there; and if we add to it what Cajetan writes in Mat. xxv. concerning the equal reward the master of the family gave to him of the five talents, and him of the two, which is admirable to the purpose, with what S. Thomas in his Cat. Aur. quotes out of Origen on the same chapter, my opinion will be still more strengthened. To which may be added what S. Paul teaches, 1 Cor.
iii. 7. Neither is he that plants anything, &c.

9. The reader may also see S. Thomas in
xvi. ad Rom. l. 2. in fine, in 1 Cor. iii. lett.
2. & in i. Joan. 2. prope finem, & Cajet. in xi. Joan. together with F. Sylveira in xii. Joan. Tom. 6. p. 613. n. 77. And if I add I am still preaching in Cbina in my books, I shall not be in the wrong. Read Sylveira Tom. 1. in Apoc. cap. 10. q. 17. and Tom. 2. cap. 8. l. 4. q. 10. n. 71. If more be requir'd it is easily found, but the reader will meet with enough in the second tome, to answer this and other points.

10. The learned Christians in that village put such questions to me, as amaz'd me.
One concerning the light of glory; another concerning the species impressa, for seeing of God; another about the distinction of angels, whether it was specific, or numerical. But what I most admir'd was, that I being once reading in a book of F. Ada- mus, (that is in the Chinese character) whether there had been the virtue of penance in CHRIST, and he answering in the affirmative, according to Suarez his doctrine; Linus, a batchelor above his exercises, very well known to all the fathers, came up and ask'd me, What is it you read, Father?
The answer I gave him was, the book it self, pointing to the place. He read it, and being disgusted at it, said, F. Adamus might well have forbore writing this. If CHRIST did not, nor could not sin, how should he have sorrow and repentance for sins? Truly I was amaz'd to see, that at once reading he should understand the difficulty, and give that reason of his doubt.

11. After some months I return'd to the city; I had a catechist who was a good scholar, with whose help I carry'd on the putting of my books into good language.
My church was kept as clean, neat, and well adorn'd, as our religious poverty would permit. The people that resorted to it were very numerous, and shew'd a good inclination towards the law of God. I was sent for in all haste to the towns and villages. The extraordinary poverty and want we had endur'd for three years last past, was a sufficient reason not to go out of doors. If it were usual to preach there, as we do here and in other parts, nothing would stop us; the devil makes his advantage of this particular. This will not satisfy some men, but what I say is most certain.

12. I began to print my catechism, because it had pleas'd God to send us some small relief in the year 1664, when on a sudden and altogether unexpectedly news came from court, that our enemy had presented a memorial against F. Adamus and the law of God. The very infidels were astonish'd. Many comforted me the best they could, the Christians did the same.
Many thought it would all come to nothing, but when I observ'd they laid rebellion to his charge, I was convinced that affair would run high, so my impression stopp'd.

13. The case was, that F. John Adamus being president of the college of mathematicians, who had the charge of, and every year set out the almanack, by which the whole empire is govern'd, as well in political as religious respects, assigning lucky and unlucky days for every thing they are to do, tho' some excus'd the said father as to this particular; It happen'd that a prince had dy'd some years before that court was order'd to appoint a proper time and fortunate hour for his funeral. All the Chinese are very superstitious in this respect. It was appointed, but not lik'd; or, as others say, the president of the court of rites alter'd it, the mathematical court being subordinate to his. Soon after the prince's mother, and next the emperor himself dy'd, The Chinese imputed these two persons death to the ill timing of the prince's burial. This was in reality the principal and only occasion of the persecution; to which they added blasphemies against God and his holy mother, as shall be instanced more at large in chap. xv.

14. These news being spread abroad, the Christians grew cold and withdrew; they have not the courage of the Japoneses and others, the infidels fled from the church, and from us. One, who tho' an atheist was an honest man, said to me: Father, forty days hence there will be a fresh order, you have nothing to do but to expect it courageously. One day three mandarines came to pry into our house and church; I shew'd I was sensible of the business, we discours'd about it, and to say the truth they were concern'd we should be disturb'd. The resort to us being grown less, I stay'd at home, spending my time in composing a little book; and truly in it I disprov'd all the extravagancies our enemy alledg'd against the law of God, except some which were altogether chimerical. The second advice came, and brought news that the cause was depending, and F. Adamus in prison. The other three fathers then at court, were at the point of going to keep him company. After forty days more, the third advice came, with orders to carry us all to court. The civil magistrate of Lan Ki, which is six leagues down the river, and where two of my order were, was then in the city; he sent to apprehend and put them into goal immediately, which was done that very night with great noise and tumult, fifty troopers besides foot-soldiers being at the taking of two poor religious men. They told me they would do the same by me, I thank God I was not concern'd, I was only troubled that the holy images and church-stuff should be left there. I waited all night with a Christian young man; a little before break of day perceiving there was no noise of people, I went to say mass; that day pass'd over, and nobody spoke a word to me. The infidel I spoke of advis'd me to present my self to the supreme civil magistrate; he writ my memorial, I went away with him to his court. He receiv'd me favourably, and presently sent me away, bidding me be quiet in my house, and he would dispatch me when their new year was over, giving me to understand the emperor intended to banish us his empire. This quieted me, and I liv'd the following days more at ease. They brought the two fathers that were down the river, to present them before the governor; they gave me an account of their imprisonment, and the next day they sent them back to their house. By the advice of my infidel friend before mention'd, I presented another memorial to the supreme civil magistrate of the city, in which I intimated that I had not money to bear my charges on the road, and therefore would sell my household-goods. He consented to it, I sold some wheat and rice, gave some things to friends and poor Christians, and others I made nothing of. The church-stuff was what concern'd me most, it pleas'd God I sent it all to a Christian, who liv'd in that village where I had been some time.

15. After the feast of the new-year, I was busy one morning, ordering some small things to send to the corregidor, or supreme civil magistrate of the city, when on a sudden he came into my house, attended by officers, executioners and soldiers. I went out with my present, and said to him, I was putting this trifle in order to send it to your lordship. He look'd on every thing, lik'd it, and order'd it to be kept: The whole value I believe amounted to two pieces of eight. His courtesy to me both before and after deserv'd much more. Tho' he had often seen the church, he ask'd nothing about it. He acquainted me with the emperor's order, and deliver'd me to the head of that quarter, enquiring first, whether there was ever another European there besides my self. The officers ran in like so many ravenous tigers to lay hold of what they could, but found only my breviary, primmer, S. Augustin's meditations, and other small matters which I had thought to be safe, but they carry'd all away, and left me for some time free from the duty of saying my office. The headborough was a very honest man, at night he lock'd my door on the out-side, without minding a back-door I had; and would say to me, Father, I know you will not run away, I do this only that those who pass by may see I obey my orders. Then they brought me before the superior judge, who allow'd a boat to carry me to the metropolis. I believ'd I escap'd the best of any as to the manner of my imprisonment. I imputed it to my sins that God would not permit me to suffer somewhat for his holy name, when all others did.

16. Before I proceed to the next chapter, because

NAVA- because I forgot it in the first book, I will RETTE. here briefly mention the most usual, common and cheap sort of food all Cbina abounds in, and which all men in that empire eat, from the emperor to the meanest Cbinese, the emperor and great men as a dainty, the common sort as necessary sustenance. It is call'd teu fu, that is, paste of kidney-beans. I did not see how they made it. They draw the milk out of the kidney-beans, and turning it, make great cakes of it like cheeses, as big as a large sieve, and five or six fingers thick. All the mass is as white as the very snow, to look to nothing can be finer. It is eaten raw, but generally boil'd and dress'd with herbs, fish, and other things. Alone it is insipid, but very good so dress'd, and excellent fry'd in butter. They have it also dry'd and smok'd, and mix'd with caraway-seeds, which is best of all. It is incredible what vast quantities of it are consum'd in Cbina, and very hard to conceive there should be such abundance of kidney-beans.

Kidney-beans.

That Cbinese who has teu fu, herbs and rice, needs no other sustenance to work; and I think there is no body but has it, because they may have a pound (which is above twenty ounces) of it any where for a half-penny. It is a great help in case of want, and is good for carriage. It has one good quality, which is, that it causes the different airs and seasons, which in that vast region vary much, to make no alteration in the body, and therefore they that travel from one province to another make use of it. Teu fu is one of the most remarkable things in Cbina, there are many will leave pullets for it. If I am not deceiv'd, the Cbineses of Manila make it, but no European eats it; which is perhaps because they have not tasted it, no more than they do fritters fry'd in oil of Ajonjoli (a very small seed they have in Spain and India, which we have not) which the Cbineses make in that city and is an extraordinary dainty.

C H A P. XIV.

My Journey to the Imperial City, and Residence there.

1. AS soon as a boat was order'd, and officers appointed to conduct me, these began to contrive to get money of me. This sort of people is covetous all the world over; but there is a difference, for in Cbina any officer of the civil magistrate is satisfy'd with a little and thankful for it; but in other parts a great deal goes but a little way, and they undervalue it.
 I will relate what happen'd to me there:
 They assign'd me an officer, who I fancy'd was too busy, and I fear'd would be troublesome and uneasy upon the way.
 This matter depended on the clerk, I sent him a message, and a little money desiring him to appoint another who was more courteous and civil. The man deliver'd the message, and only two ryals plate (a shilling.) He consented, order'd another in his stead, and said, Your master has a sharp eye; since he knew that man, I will appoint one who shall please him in all things, and serve him. So it prov'd; would they do the like to a Cbinese in these parts?

2. I forgot to relate how the city Kin Hoa had held out bravely against the Tartars, and it cost them dear to take it.
 When taken, the Tartar general having prom-is'd to spare all men, call'd together all the citizens; and when they were all in a place, gave the signal to his men to fall on, they butcher'd forty thousand. He was a cruel man, his name Ma Tie To; some years after he was put to death at court.
 That city was much impair'd, however in my time it paid fifty thousand ducats a year taxes. The town down the river where my two companions resided, surrendred without drawing sword, and so escap'd un-touch'd. Its trade is great, the duties there amount to seventy thousand ducats a year.

 The best liquor of all Cbina is there made of rice, and is so good that we do not miss the wine of Europe. Their gammons of bacon are the best in the empire, nothing inferior to the choicest in Spain. The price is certain, a pound containing twenty ounces cost a penny, and so a pound of the best wine; if it rises it is but a small matter.

3. I took boat from the metropolis, not imagining what I was to meet with there.
 Next morning I saw my two companions, the supreme civil magistrate of the town being still at variance with them. I had endur'd much cold that night in the boat.
 I went thence alone, and that day saw the pleasant fishing with sea-crows, which I mention'd in the first book. (I guess these be calls sea-crows, may be either cormorants or barnacles.) Three nights I lay in my little boat, every morning the hoar-frost lay upon us, for it was in February, and very frosty weather. My two companions overtook me, and we came together to the metropolis on the twenty seventh of February, being the fifteenth day of their new moon. The next day they put us into prison; eight days I lay under a bed where two were: I laid a few boards on the ground which was wet, and laying one blanket

blanket over and another under me, slept comfortably. I have already given an account of what happen'd to me in this place. On the twenty first of April we were taken out of that prison to be sent to the imperial city; and tho' a boat was allow'd us, they made us pay to get a good one. True it is, the father of the society who had suffer'd much there being sick, manag'd this bargain, we consenting to it something against our will, for indeed we valu'd not how they carry'd us, being resolv'd to endure all that came. They appointed us a guard of soldiers, who rode always in sight of our boat, and every now and then were reliev'd. In their behaviour they were like very good Christians; they offer'd not the least incivility, but rather sometimes help'd us when we stood in need of it.

4. Being come to the famous city Zu Cbeu, we rested there five days, being much made of by five fathers of the society who were detain'd there by the judges, in order to perform the same journey with us. We sail'd as far as the red river, the sight whereof frighted us, and no less the violence of its whirlpools. When we left it, we met two more fathers of the society. It is impossible to number the vessels we saw, both great and small; sometimes we had a great deal of trouble to get through them, especially at a custom-house; it is incredible what a multitude there was in that place, they cover'd all the water for a large space. Two Tartars were there, who, as our officers told us, got five hundred ducats a day each, in presents passengers made them. We argu'd against it, believing it was too much; but they gave convincing reasons for what they said. We travel'd two hundred leagues along a plain country with carts, because the water was low in the cut river. The weather was hot enough, but every half league there was cool water, and delicate apricots, and eight or ten eggs for a half-penny. After this I read in a letter writ by the V. F. F. Dominick Coronado, that at Zi Ning, where he founded a church, he bought three bushels of wheat for half a piece of eight, and a pheasant for a half-penny. Nothing can be beyond this, and we thought a great fat pullet cheap at three-half-pence: I don't doubt had we stood hard, they would have given it for five farthings. At a city before we came off the river, a Christian mandarin made us a present of a sheep, rice, and some small things. His father was an infidel, came to see us in the boat, was old, and had almost lost his nose; he would not be a Christian because he had not a mind to part with his concubines.

5. It was wonderful to see what swarms of people we met with on the road, some upon mules, others upon asses, others in *NAVY-*litters, and others on sedans. We were RETTE. known to all men by our beards; some comforted us, saying, our cause was accommodated, others said it was in a bad posture, which was what we imagin'd. Others told us, one of ours was dead; by the name they gave him, I always suppos'd him to be the V. F. F. Dominick Coronado; and I was apt to believe it, because he was sickly. On the eve of S. Peter and Paul in the morning, we came into the imperial city of Pe King. We came time enough to the church of the fathers of the society to dine, and found the death of our companion was certain, but precious in the sight of our LORD. Six fathers of the society gave it me under their hands, that he had dy'd a martyr to the best of their knowledge. It is well known it belongs to his holiness to ascertain it.

6. By degrees those that liv'd in other provinces join'd us, and we met five and twenty of us, besides the four that resided in the imperial city, and five of my order that hid themselves at Fo Kien; another of ours, who not long before had founded a church in Ziven Cbeu, having no conveniency of absconding, went over to Manila in a Dutch ship then in that kingdom. We continued in the imperial city till the thirteenth of September, on which day we set out, being banish'd to Macao. Most of what besel us has been writ before, it will be proper in this place to mention some things that have been publish'd without any ground for them; one is, that the bonzes gather'd thousands of ducats to suborn the members of the court of rites against us. This was enquir'd into at the imperial city, and no other ground could be heard of it, but that a Christian heard an infidel say so in a tavern. Upon this some believ'd it as if it had been a certain truth, and as such have printed it. A strong argument against it is, that at the same time they persecuted the bonzes, so that they had enough to do to mind their own business, without minding what did not concern them; and if they brib'd, it was likely to save themselves, not to hurt others. Besides, what harm has the law of GOD hitherto done the bonzes, when there are so few Christians? It has been given out too, that when they sign'd the warrant to put us to death, a fiery ball fell upon the palace, and did great mischief, &c. which is all false and groundless. I was at the imperial city with the rest, and we neither saw nor heard of it. And tho' this be a negative, yet it is convincing, because we often pass'd under the palace walls, we convers'd with Christians and infidels, and

NAYA-our servants and others told us every thing that happen'd, and all that was talk'd of us very particularly; how then should we have had no account of such a prodigy?

7. Besides the very foundation is false, for sentence of death never pass'd against us, all the judgments the court of rites gave against us were revers'd by the four governors, who only approv'd of that of banishment. F. Adamus was adjudged to be cut in pieces, the judgment was not approv'd; they brought it down to quartering of him, that was reject'd above; nor would they admit of the last, which was, to banish us all into Tartary.

8. I have also read several times, that F. John Adamus often excus'd himself to the emperor from being concern'd in the mathematicks, and that he had the employment against his will. Why should any body give this out, when his own brethren are of the contrary opinion, and own it? What I write is so true, that father Verbieft making his excuses from attending the mathematicks, on account that he was a religious man; and the emperor alledging that F. Adamus was so too, and yet follow'd that employment; this father answer'd, That was the reason he had ever liv'd in sorrow and discontent. This answer being afterwards known at Canton, where we were altogether, F. Gourvea superior of that mission, and F. Faber who had been so before him, both said in my hearing, F. Verbieft ly'd, and deserves to have his head cut off for it: Does not he know that this punishment is due to him that lies and imposes on the emperor of Cbina? This is a clear case, there is no need of palliating it, nor any reason for it. It is requisite to be cautious in reading other things which have been publish'd in Europe, and shall be taken notice of in their due time.

9. That a comet appear'd several days before the persecution, is true, but the same appeared in these parts. It is true, that a well shap'd cross was seen some years before in the metropolis of Xan Tung. So it is, that about that time there were earthquakes; and that whilst we were in the imperial city, the rains were so great, that part of the second wall was ruin'd, so that shall be mention'd hereafter. My opinion is, and F. Luvelis of the society is of the same, that Christianity is not yet so far advanced there, that God should work miracles in defence of it.

10. Five and twenty of us sail'd for Macao. Those four who had resid'd in the imperial city remain'd there; they had all eaten the king's bread, and therefore were left there, according to the Cbinese policy. F. Adamus was a cripple, he soon dy'd, the other three were kept close prisoners almost two years. We were six months and twelve days going to Macao; we were all a terrible winter in the boats, and suffer'd great hardships, which if I should write it would fill many sheets. Being brought before the supreme governor of Canton, who was in his chair of state, with greater majesty, attendants, and respect, than any prince in Europe; he said to us, The emperor orders me to send you over to the people of Macao; at present we are at variance with that city, stay here the mean while, and I'll take care of you; when the affair of Macao is adjusted, I'll send you thither. They carry'd us to a house that had been the church of the fathers of the society; it was night when we came to it: We had much ado to find every one of us his rags, and compose our selves to rest; there was neither fire, nor candle, nor a morsel to eat, nor a drop of water; we did nothing but stumble and fall, but very well pleas'd. Blessed be the LORD, for whose sake we suffer'd.

11. We spent some days very uneasily. The governor at twice sent us two hundred and fifty ducats in silver; it was a noble alms, and well tim'd for us. Who would imagine a heathen should be so good to us? With this supply some little cells were contriv'd, in which we liv'd very contentedly. The dispute with Macao prov'd very dangerous to that city, they were about destroying it, and bringing all the inhabitants into Canton. The news from court was various and confused; the opinions of the missionaries very opposite to one another as to the event of our affair. Some, with good reason, thought it was ended, since we were banished by the emperor's order. Others fancy'd it would all come to nothing, and we should all soon be restor'd to our churches. In this confusion we pass'd our time in study and prayer; our life as to the world being sad and dismal, but happy with regard to God, for whose faith we had lost our liberty.

12. A year and a half after there came to Macao an ambassador from Goa, as from the king of Portugal. He was brought into Canton, meanly treated, and look'd upon as a sham ambassador, upon which account there was something to do. He was brought sick, and his secretary, one companion and the chaplain, saw the governor, who commanded them to bow both knees, and touch the ground with their foreheads, which was a great affront. The governor enquir'd after the ambassador's quality; the chaplain thinking it a great honour, said, He had been a captain of horse. The governor laugh'd and answer'd, My servants are captains of horse, and some of them greater officers. And he was in the right; he

he sent them to the metropolis, with orders they should be receiv'd within the walls, and care taken of them; they had a mean house assign'd them, and the governor sent advice to the emperor. Tho' this be notorious and publickly known, yet the following year the Portugueses writ to Goa, giving an account that the ambassador had been receiv'd with the greatest honour in the world; that the petty king came out himself to meet him, with galleys full of musick, with flags and streamers, and had receiv'd him into them; and that afterwards they lodg'd him in a sumptuous palace, and much more to this effect. We stood amaz'd when we heard this account afterwards; but we could not discover the author of the report, tho' he was shrewdly guess'd at. He that has seen such things will not be surpriz'd, tho' they should write there was no such place as Cbina in the universe. Another strange passage happened at the imperial city: Some letters from Europe came thither by the way of Macao; one was for F. Francis Ferrari of the society, a Savoyard, born at Coni; in it they told him that a letter had been writ to the duke of Savoy by order of Pope Innocent the tenth, wherein his holiness congratulated with him for having a subject in Cbina, who was a great favourite of the emperor's; through whose means it was hop'd he and all his empire would be converted to our holy faith. This was meant of the aforesaid F. Ferrari. He, who is a very good religious man, was astonish'd, and smil'd. He shew'd the letter openly, and we had good sport with it, being certain he had never seen the emperor, nor been within his palace. How can it be found out who writ such an invention? perhaps he who writ several other things F. Kircher relates was the author of all.

13. Let us return to our ambassador. He design'd to visit the petty king, and then took into consideration what respect he was to pay him. He sent a message to us about it: opinions vary'd; mine was, that he should not contend about it, but submit to what the petty king thought fit, taking it for granted, that he would rather exceed than fall short in civility. The Cbineses are very obliging in this particular. He follow'd his own head, articul'd that he was to carry colours, trumpets, and many other things. They told us the interview was fix'd for the next day; I never could be persuad'd it would come to any thing, because of the precautions he had us'd. Next day he and his family dress'd themselves very gay; and when they were ready to set out, a message came from the petty king, to tell him he was busy, and could receive no visits. This was a great mortification. This was the occasion that no NAVARRETTE Mandarin visited him.

14. I profess'd my self his friend in a particular manner, gave him good advice, but he endur'd some trouble and affronts. He was detain'd two years, during which time he was expensive to Macao, that city being at the charge of the embassy. Orders came from the emperor for him to go to court, but the present he carry'd, of which the particulars had been sent up, seem'd very mean to the emperor; and yet to say the truth, it was worth above thirty thousand ducats. But a little before he had receiv'd a great one from the Dutch, which perhaps made this seem the less. He prepar'd for his journey, but before he set out, a pleasant passage happen'd. The king of Portugal's letter was read before the supreme governor (this was a new one, for his predecessor had hang'd himself) and the viceroy; when it was read, they took notice, that before signing he did not subscribe himself, YOUR MAJESTY'S FAITHFUL SUBJECT. They ask'd how those letters came to be omitted. They answer'd, it was not the custom of Europe. They sent the emperor word, and he order'd, that in regard the ambassador had been long there, he might go to court, where they would examine into the omission of the letters. I had no account afterwards what came of it. Two Dutch ships arriv'd there about that time; advice was sent to court, and immediately a strict order return'd for them to be gone immediately, without buying or selling any thing. All trade with strangers was absolutely prohibited. The captain's name was Constantin Noble; he visited us, and design'd to return to Europe the following year; but I heard afterwards at Musulapatan, that he was dead, and had taken a journey to hell.

15. In October 1669. the emperor's order concerning us came down, which made all despair of returning to the mission. The fathers at court having seen the emperor, found means to get some petty kings and counsellors to put in a memorial in our behalf, which they did. The contents of it were, that our enemy had accus'd F. Adamus wrongfully, touching the mathematics: That the Christians were a good people: That during all that time none of them had made any commotion, wherefore there was no cause to apprehend a rebellion: That we who were banish'd to Macao, should be carry'd prisoners to the imperial city. The design of it was, that we might stay in the kingdom; for when we were come thither, they design'd to propose, that since we were grown old, and many of us sickly, we might be suffer'd to return to our churches,

NAVA- churches, to die there. The three fathers RETTE. had before writ from Pe King, that all would certainly go on our side, and to the greater glory of our holy faith. F. E- manuel George and I were of opinion it would not be so; others held the contrary, and knew not what to think of it. A copy of the emperor's order came to our hands: I understood it as the rest did, but none of us hit the right sense. What was bad in it, could be understood in the main at least. As we were afterwards sailing one day, I look'd over and consider'd those letters, and with no little surprize hit upon the meaning. On S. Teresa's day I overcame another difficulty there was in that paper. The emperor's words were, Fang Kuang Sien (that was the Cbinese's name who prosecuted us) deserves death, but in regard he is very aged, making use of our magnanimity and bounty, we forgive him at present, and also remit the penalty of banishment to his wife and children (when a man is put to death, his wife and children are banish'd.) It is needless to bring those twenty five that were sent to Macao back to the court. As for the law of the LORD of heaven, F. Verbiest and the other two may follow it, as they have done hitherto.
 Any further I am apprehensive of allowing them to re-build churches in this or the other provinces, or bringing over people to the said law, to propagate it as before.
 Let it be made known to them, that they are forbid preaching: the rest as it is in the memorial.

Punishment.

16. We afterwards consulted among our selves, whether we should go to Macao, or stay there. The most were for going, for we had been there some time upon our own account, and were at liberty to go.
 Many thought it convenient to stay, that we might be nearer at hand, in case some overtures should in process of time be made for restoring of us to our churches: It was put to the vote, there was much canvassing, and nothing resolv'd on. I then heard many things, and observed some against it proved useful to repeat them. All truths are not to be spoken, if no benefit is to come of them.

Earth-
 quakes.

17. There had been already great earthquakes, towns overflow'd, mountains divided, and a great mortality. One city was swallow'd up by the earth. There was a report that a wonderful dragon had dropt out of the air; the news was sent into Eu- rope, but it was a false and mere fiction.
 An extraordinary comet was seen for three or four nights; I was the first that saw it in our house, and it was seen at Macao, it pointed to the east. Soon after we all saw a strange cross in the air, but very perfect and compleat, the head of it was to the east; every night it continued a considerable time, and then vanish'd by degrees.

 The sad news was then come too of the loss of the missions of Tunquin and Cocbin- china. There were some famous men who gave their lives for the love of God in the latter; something shall be said of it in another place.

18. We had receiv'd good and bad news from our religious at Fo Kien. The provincial vicar went out to assist some Christians; the servant that went with him was taken and by that means they discover'd the father. He was apprehended, and when I left Cbina had been above six months in prison. Afterwards I saw letters, giving an account that he was carry'd to Canton among the rest, and nothing further had been done against the Christians. I had some comical arguments with F. Gouvea; he was provoking, and said, That his society had founded the inquisition in Portugal; that our inquisitions were much improv'd since they join'd with those of Portugal:
 That the university of Salamanca gain'd reputation by fellowship with that of Co- imbra: That in Spain there is no devotion of the most blessed sacrament, and other such fopperies. They are men bred in a corner of the world, have seen nothing but Lisbon and Goa, and pretend to know all the world, whereas they err grossly in things as plain as the sun. This old man was insufferable, I always shun'd him, and when I could not, thought it the wisest way to hold my peace.

19. During all that time the fathers of the society manag'd the expence of the house, they were more in number, they had more servants, the house had been theirs, and it was convenient for us, especially because they were able to supply us when we wanted, wherein they were very kind, and did it with a great deal of charity, tenderness, and affection, as I often writ to the general of the society and ours; and should not I and my companions own it, the stones themselves would make it known. But it is not fit some impertinent person should take a fancy to write into Europe, as they say it has happen'd, that those of the society were at the whole expence, and that we and the religious men of the order of S. Francis bore no part. I have no inclination to touch upon this particular, but it is fit the truth of the whole matter should be known, and I have the accompts by me to this day. The V. F. F. Dominick Co- ronado was some days in the imperial city, he was taken out of prison sick, and carry'd to the church of the fathers Magalla- nes and Bullo; his distemper increas'd, and eight or ten days after God took him to him. I am assur'd he was attended with extraordinary care and diligence. I coming afterwards to that church, F. Bullo gave me the account of what was expended in medicines, physicians, and the funeral, and acquainted me the deceas'd had given them a very fine large looking-glass, valu'd at fifty crowns plate in our church of Lan Ki, and besides a piece of silver filigreen-work, valued at six or seven crowns more. It was afterwards propos'd to erect a tomb to him, after the manner of that country, for the building of which I gave F. Bullo all the silver he ask'd. This does not agree with what F. Grelon writ, that those of his order had taken nothing for the medicines bought for that sick man. My two companions, three servants and I continued in the imperial city from the twenty eighth of June till the thirteenth of September. During this time, bating fish, flesh and wine, the emperor allow'd all our expence, as well as theirs; so that we had rice, wood, herbs, oil, and that they call tea fu in abundance brought in to us; so that when we went away the fathers of the society that remain'd were stock'd for a great while with rice, wood, oil and vinegar. Nevertheless I gave them forty pieces of eight, which they receiv'd five or six months after, being carry'd six hundred leagues at our expence. Towards the journey to Canton I contributed thirty crowns in silver, of ten ryals each. During the time of our confinement we paid NAVA-thirty five ryals plate a head per month. S. RETTE. Antony of S. Mary paid after the same rate for himself. And when F. Gregory Lopez of my order, now bishop of Basile, set out from Canton to visit all the Christian plantations of the society, I supply'd him with fifty crowns, F. Antony with twenty two, and those fathers with only sixteen, with which money he spent above two years in the service of the society, without so much as a letter, or God reward you, from its superior. I could write more, were I not asham'd to handle such things. I am very sure the fathers Fabro, Brancato, and Balat, would never mention these things. Certain I am we should not have spent the third part of this at our churches. I would never take pen in hand to write of such a subject, were I not in a manner forced to it by the great scrowls some men have writ, perhaps confiding that they would not come to my knowledge.

20. We had often disputes during our confinement, which was what we ought to do, both to spend our time well, and to agree and settle what we were to do for the future, if it should happen we were restor'd to our churches. In the second tome I shall treat of these and other disputations that have been held in that mission, it being so material a point.

CHAP. XV.

The Articles our Chinese Enemy, who rais'd the Persecution, charg'd upon our Holy Faith.

1. IT is requisite that all missionaries and those who design to go over to those countries, should be well inform'd in these affairs, that they may be provided against all things that shall occur. That wicked Jang Kuang Sien, so he was call'd, in the year 1659 printed a book in the imperial city of Pe King, the title of it amounts to this, Take heed of false prophets, (so I translated the Cbinese characters, Pi Sie Lun) all there lik'd my version, and to say the truth this is the genuine interpretation of those words. In order to translate the said book, and the second, which shall be inserted hereafter into our language, we join'd four fathers of the society, one of the order of S. Francis, and I, and we all agreed to this following sense of it.

(1.) First article. "That heaven has no other principle but the matter and form, from which it naturally flow'd without admitting any efficient cause, distinct from the heaven it self, to produce it.

2. (2.) "That what we missionaries call the LORD of heaven, is nothing else, but one of the two parts which compose

"heaven; which being so, it is not possible it should produce heaven without the help of the copart.

This is a very material point, its difficulty will be made appear in the sixth book, and more shall be said of it in the second tome.

3. (3.) "That if JESUS is GOD, how can we say he is a man? And if he is truly so, who govern'd the universe from heaven during the thirty three years he was on earth?

A mandarin put this question some years before to certain missionaries. I writ largely to the point, judging it convenient so to do. The Cbinese did not dive into what is writ in the books of our holy faith.

4. (4.) "That it was convenient GOD should have become man at the beginning of the world, to redeem Adam, and all mankind, and not so many thousands of years after.

A common argument the Cbineses use every day. F. Emanuel Diaz handles it very well in one of his books printed in the Cbinese character, where he quotes the causes

U u u

NAVA-causes of conveniency the saints assign, and RETTE. those S. Thomas has, p. 8. q. 1.

5. (5.) "That from the beginning of the world till an emperor living in these days, there have past millions of years.

The Cbineses assign an infinite number of worlds, past and to come; the duration of every one, according to the learn'd sect, is three hundred sixty-six thousand years, and something over. In the second tome more shall be said to this point.

6. (6.) "That it is scandalous CHRIST should have no father, since even brute beasts have one.

In this place he runs into enormities, like a barbarian void of the light even of natural philosophy. The Jews according to Theophil. in cat. D. Thom. in Joan. viii. were guilty of the same blasphemy.

7. (7.) "That there is neither heavenly glory, nor hell. That heaven is nothing but the goods of this life; and hell only its evils and sufferings.

This is the doctrine of the learned sect, as shall be made out in the second tome. Some missionaries positively assert the contrary, tho' they oppose their own body.

8. (8.) "That sins cannot be altogether forgiven; and if they are quite forgiven, and ill men are sav'd, thro' the intercession of our Blessed Lady, heaven will become a filthy loathsome place.

Cajetan in Heb. xiii. says, Herein consists all Christian faith, that JESUS CHRIST be believ'd true GOD and true man.

9. (9.) "That it is false, to say there were prophets, who beforehand foretold the birth, life and death of CHRIST.

10. (10.) "That GOD did ill in creating Adam proud, knowing he was to be the cause of all mens calamities.

He had not read the printed books concerning our holy faith.

11. (11.) "That GOD ought to have created all men virtuous, and that CHRIST ought to have apply'd himself to virtuous actions, that the people might imitate him, and not have employ'd himself, without knowing the important part of virtue, in curing the sick, raising the dead, and preaching up of heavenly joys and pains of hell, whence it follow'd he was put to death for his crimes.

But the natural man receiveth not the things of the spirit of GOD, 1 Cor. ii. 14. The Manichees maintain'd the same error, according to S. August. lib. cont. Faust. A brutal and extravagant reflection.

12. (12.) "That since CHRIST pray'd and kneel'd in the garden, he could not be GOD, being inferior to him he kneel'd and pray'd to

This inference would be good, were there not two natures, and two wills in CHRIST. The Arians alledg'd the same. See Silvius in iii. p. D. Thom. q. 21. art. 1. and Suarez Tom. 1. in iii. part. disp. 33.

13. (13.) "That the visible heaven is the beginning of all things, and there is no Lord above it, and therefore it ought to be ador'd as Lord.

He handles this point at large in two places, and proves it out of their Confucius. Yet some Europeans would know more than the Cbineses, of what relates to their own sects. It is the general opinion of this sect, that there is no first efficient cause.

14. (14.) "That we call heaven GOD's slave, whereas the holy Cbineses call their emperor the son of heaven.

The antient Europeans gave Jupiter the same title.

15. (15.) "That we command the Christians to break the tablets of heaven, earth, the king, parents and masters.

This belongs to the second tome.

16. (16.) "That we do not worship heaven, because it has no head, belly, hands and feet; nor the earth, because we tread and throw all filth upon it.

This point is expounded in the books of our holy faith.

17. (17.) "That we do not honour the emperor, because he is the son of a slave, that is heaven.

This was a malicious insertion, for the contrary is contain'd in the books of our faith.

18. (18.) "That we do not honour our parents, because CHRIST had no father.

He could not chuse but have read the contrary in our books, which highly commend obedience to parents and superiors.

19. (19.) "That heaven and earth weep, seeing us trample upon the law of nature.

The heathen raves.

20. (20.) "That any ordinary man may be accounted king of the upper region, with more reason than CHRIST, who was crucify'd as a malefactor.

He plays the Gentile and the Jew; observe the opinion they have of their king of the upper region, whom some have preach'd up as our GOD.

21. (21.) "That there never was a holy man punish'd for his crimes.

The wicked wretch invents all these blasphemies, tho' he had seen in our books what motives CHRIST had to lay down his life for us.

22. (22.) "That if CHRIST being GOD could govern the world, how came “ came it he could not govern himself?

As if he had said, He bath saved others; &c. as the Jews did, who were certainly more to blame than this infidel, having been eye-witnesses of so many miracles.

23. (23.) “ That the books of the law “ of GOD do not treat of CHRIST’s pas“ sion, because it was shameful; but on“ ly of his miracles, resurrection, and as“ cending to heaven.

He speaks in this place of the books of the ancient missioners, not of those who have writ for forty years last past. F. Emanuel Diaz writ very much concerning the passion of our LORD. That is also later which F. Henao quotes de divin. sacrif. disp.
29. sec. 17. n. 219.

24. (24.) “ That it is a mere fiction “ that CHRIST heal’d the sick, and rais’d “ the dead, and that it was unbecoming “ GOD to be so employ’d.

25. (25.) “ That it is a matter of “ small merit to relieve sinners, and that “ it had been very meritorious if CHRIST’s “ benefits had reach’d the whole people “ for ever, like those of their emperor Ju, “ who drain’d Cbina.

26. (26.) “ That it had been a greater “ benefit of CHRIST to cause men not to “ fall sick, or die, than to heal or raise “ them again.

I said enough to these three points in my apology.

27. (27.) “ That F. Matthew Riccius “ suppress’d the passion and death of “ CHRIST; which he did to impose upon “ the people.

It is plain that great man had no such design.

28. (28.) “ That we give Christians “ crosses in token of rebellion.

A false calumny.

29. (29.) “ That we impose upon the “ mandarines, and gain the good will of “ mandarines with the curiosities of Europe, more than the truth of our doc“ trine.

Watches, harpsicords, looking-glasses, prospectiv glasses, tweezers, and other presents, brought this affront upon us.

30. (30.) “ That the mandarines are “ mistaken in looking upon us as learned “ men, who are nothing but great talkers, “ mountebanks, and make use of their Cbinese learning.

Some have deserv’d the reflection.

31. (31.) “ He speaks of F. Adamus, “ adding, that he accepted of the office “ of a mandarin, tho’ we boast we will “ not accept of employments.

32. (32.) “ That the Portugueses of “ Macao were plac’d there by F. Riccus.
This is a known falshood.

33. (33.) “ That of late years the “ walls of that city were demolish’d, and NAVA“ the inhabitants turn’d out.

“ The first part is true, but the second false. RETTE.

24. These are the principal points he mentions, but adds much more, using a great deal of rhetorick and artifice, which is sufficient to incline people, who have no better light, to believe it, dazzling their understanding.

It is very plain that nothing here concerns Dominicans, Franciscans, or Casti-lians; nor is there any mention of the king of Spain, America, or the Philippine islands; so that some people may be brought to look upon what they read of this nature as mere fiction.

This book spread through the imperial city, and other parts of that empire. The fathers who liv’d in the imperial city did not mind to answer, or take any notice of it. F. Antony of S. Mary, a Franciscan, heard of it (we had it very late, as being far from court) he writ to those fathers to know why they were so silent, intimating that their silence would be interpreted a tacit confession: All signify’d nothing.
When we were all at the imperial city, it was propos’d to write an answer when it was too late, and impossible to publish it.

36. They had before put out a little book, of which mention has been made, and at which our enemy was enrag’d, who immediately printed another with this title, Po Te I, that is, as a faithful subject I cannot forbear appearing and speaking the truth. Among the rest he said in it.

“ That CHRIST was crucify’d for at“ tempting to usurp Jewry, which he re“ peats several times; and that he fled in“ to the garden to escape from those that “ came to apprehend him.

“ That the people who applauded him “ on Palm Sunday, forsook him after“ wards, fearing he would be punish’d for “ encouraging rebellion.

“ That he contriv’d to kill the king,
“ that he might usurp the crown.

“ That ours is a rebellious law, and owns neither parents nor kings.

“ That there are so many people at “ Macao in order to a rebellion; and that “ to this purpose we have such and such “ churches in Cbina, where father Adamus “ accepted the office of a mandarin, that “ he might disperse the fathers throughout “ all the provinces.

“ That we go in and out of Cbina, “ privately, and our designs unknown to “ any body.

“ That by degrees we take draughts of “ the fifteen provinces, and inquire into “ the number of soldiers, strength, &c.

“ That such people were never admit“ ted

NAVA- "ted into Cbina, and that we had hidden RETTE. "arms.

W " That father Riccus went into Cbina
" the foregoing years, and had quoted his " bible and comments of his saints to pal-
" liate his bad doctrine; and that they
" who compos'd the book above-mention'd
" had done the same. He condemns us " for saying that Foe (the founder of the " idolatrous sect) is in hell, and urges that " we only say so out of envy.

" That the heavenly joys, and pains of " hell, the sect of Foe preaches up, are " nothing but a politick invention to keep
" the people in awe, not that there really " is any such thing.

The sectaries themselves hold the same.

36. Not one of all these articles is particularly charg'd upon Franciscan, Dominican, or Castilian. He speaks against the Portu-gueses, and their city Macao; so that all men will be satisfy'd that we shar'd in the persecution, passively and not actively; and that the particular Cbineses bear no particular hatred to the Castilians, as some have written and given out.

37. After this he presented other memorials, in one of which he said, we had been banish'd Japan for attempting to possess our selves of that kingdom; and that the Europeans (without specifying Castilians or Spaniards) had seiz'd the Philippine islands, and that some years before the fathers of the society had been banish'd out of Cbina.
Here he speaks of the banishment in the years 1617, and 1618, when no friar had yet entred upon that mission.

38. Before I conclude this chapter, I must in this place take notice, that among the Cbinese sects, whereof I said something in the second book, there is one more which is convenient to be known, in order to what we shall treat of in another place.
The founder of it was born at King Hoa in the province of Fo Kien, his name was Ling, and it is about a hundred thirty six years since he laid the foundation of it.
The temples of it are call'd of the three legislaters. This sect unites and incorporates the three principal sects of Cbina, which are those of the learned, the idolaters and the sorcerers, whose origin is in reality the same, tho' they express it after several manners. The learned Cbineses agree to this.
F. Longobardus proves it sufficiently, and F. Riccius does not dissent, as shall be proved in its place. On the altars of this sect are placed the images of the three legislaters, Confucius, Lao Zu, and Foe; this last as a guest and stranger is in the middle.
F. Athanasius Kircher has the cut to the life.
There are very many of this sect; F. Gou- vea told me he had seen of them. Some learned Cbineses profess it, who are very modest in their demeanour. Whilst I was in Cbina, a Christian of the imperial city writ a book, the design whereof is to unite and incorporate our holy law with those three we have spoken of; they all tend to the same end, says he. It is likely that author follow'd the advice of doctor Michael, mention'd by F. Longobardo in his treatise. Linus, whom I spoke of before, read this book, and disapprov'd of it.

Any man that values himself upon being a Christian, must be of the same mind. I treat of this and other points more at large in my second tome.

As the Romans had a law against allowing any strange religion, upon which Trajan and Adrian persecuted the Christians, as Spondanus writes, Ann. 120. n. 2. so have the Cbineses; but they observe it not any further than in not following that of our LORD.

39. S. Leo, serm. 1. in nativitat. Apost. Pet. & Paul, says of Rome, It follow'd the errors of all nations, and seem'd to it self to have taken up a mighty religion, because it reject'd no falsehood. This in some measure might be said of the errors the Cbineses have admitted. F. Arias, tom. 1. tract. 8. cap. 12. writes, that the Cbineses are most ignorant ^{Religion.} and stupid in point of religion and virtue, do not know one GOD ruler of all things, are full of superstitions and idolatries like the other Gentiles, adore heaven as god, and men who have been among them governors, judges, and brave soldiers in war, and such as have led a hard and penitent life; and in their temples have idols, the statues of these false gods, of whom they beg temporal blessings, and offer sacrifice to them. It is wonderful that they who are so witty, sharp, and ready for worldly affairs, should know nothing material of what relates to their salvation, GOD, and another life, as if they had no manner of reason in this particular. In his thirteenth chapter he says, The Gentiles that have been dis-cover'd as to idolatry and the worship of devils, follow the same errors and superstitions the antient Gentiles did: This is the opinion of the ancient missionaries of the society. In short, that nation is so full of fopperies and absurdities, that nothing can outdo it, and they would have receiv'd more had more come to their knowledge.
But in respect to the law of GOD, they are deaf and dumb to all that is said to them.
GOD of his infinite mercy and goodness enlighten their understandings, that they may confess, worship and adore him.

C H A P. XVI.

My Departure from Canton to Macao.

1. THE fathers of the society very well knew my intention, as to going out of Canton, because I had made it known upon several occasions, and writ about it to their F. visitor Luis de Gama who was at Macao, giving him sufficient reasons for my going to see him. This my resolution being known, the fathers consulted whether my going away might be prejudicial or hurtful to them, as F. Lubeli told me. They and I both knew it would not, but it was a kindness to them, for they brought in another of their own in my stead, as I was afterwards inform'd, and I had my self urg'd before. That which made me most eager to be gone, was, that I knew F. Intorceta was gone for Rome the year before, after the disputations we had held; and there being many points in which I and others could not agree, I was troubled I could not go to Manila to confer about them with my superiors, for to manage this by letter is endless. I also design'd to discourse the F. visitor upon the same subject, and to propose accommodating some matters betwixt us. F. Antony of S. Mary a Franciscan desir'd the same. I afterwards slacken'd in this part at Macao, by reason of some idle stories that were carried backwards and forwards at Macao.

Having consider'd the business, which was not easy to compass, tho' there was no difficulty in going about it, and having communicated it to persons of undoubted reputation, I made use of a Christian Chinese merchant, not very considerable; and the time being fix'd and agreed upon, I went out very cunningly upon pretence of visiting the ambassador. This was easily credited, because I often did it: being come to the Christian's house, some Portugueses visited me that afternoon, but nothing was done that night. Before break of day we went into a passage-boat, which sail'd at sun-rising with so fair a wind, that by noon we had run ten leagues. We stopt at a village, where we lay that night very uneasily, for the weather was very cold, and the room was so good, that we could see the stars thro' seventeen several places; there we staid for the passage-boat till noon. All the country is cut across with rivers and lakes, so that there seldom wants boats. We found a very great one, and full of people, which I did not like at that time. They took me in, the commander immediately came out to receive me, put me into his cabin, and made very much of me.

V O L. I.

2. The ebb came on, and our vessel stuck upon the owse; we were oblig'd to stay for the flood, which was a cruel check, considering my haste and impatience. We came to the town of Hiang Xan Ngao, which is the capital of the island in which Macao stands. Abundance of soldiers were about there, they all look'd at me, and I pass'd thro' them more afraid than ashamed, till I got into an inn. The next day I did not travel for want of a sedan, and it was God's mercy, for I must of necessity have met with the mandarin, who has charge of Macao, who came thither that day with an hundred sedans, and some horses. Tho' the days are so short in December, yet this seem'd to me a whole year. The next day we set out by land, I was easily to be known in that country, so that I was not a little afraid, especially because all intercourse with Macao was cut off. The Christian was a bold man, and attempted any thing, tho' never so rash; I follow'd his opinion, though with some reluctance. At the midway there was a company of soldiers in a house, and just opposite to them the Christian took up his resting-place; the same did the chairmen who carried me, following his example. I was much troubled at it, being in great fear, but no body came to look into the chair. We eat at another place, where there were houses of entertainment; but I came not out of the chair, because the foregoing year F. Intorceta was known there, and I was afraid the same might happen to me. I went away to a village, where I waited two days expecting how to get over; during that time I scarce ate or slept. They put me into a straw-loft to secure me against the soldiers, where I lay in great fear and consternation. We resolv'd, through my impatience, to travel two leagues by night to another village, to seek some conveniency there: the gates were shut, and a guard within, we expected in two hours to have them opened; it was then the 17th of December, I was hot and weary with walking. We saw a light in a little house without the gate, and I ask'd for some water; I drank near a pint, and wonder it did not kill me; besides we were in no small fear of the tigers. We got into the village, hir'd a close sedan, went down by-ways to the shore, that we might cross over from thence to Macao, to which was about half a league by sea. I saw Macao, heard the bells, and was forced to turn back, because all about was full of soldiers; I absolutely despair'd

of

NAVA-
RETTE.

NAVA- of getting over, and return'd to the straw-RETTE. loft. The Christian was not discourag'd in the least, he did not like of that day's journey; it was my contriving, but rash and foolish. That afternoon a vessel the Cbinefse had bespoke the day before, came near to where we were: because it had out-staid its time half a day, I thought the infidels would not be so good as their words, and that was the reason we took the course I have spoken of. We went aboard at nightfall, and rowing as still as might be, pass'd by the guards that were along the shore.
 The wind came ahead, and put us into some fear; the little boat took in water, and though we laded it out continually, yet we could not keep our selves in safety. It pleas'd God we landed at nine of the clock that night at the captain-general's door.
 Because I would not disturb the monastery, I went to a friend's house, where they were amaz'd to see me. I came weary, thin, and hungry, and all was well when I found my self free and among catholicks; this was on the 18th of December, on which day died brother Reyes the famous procurator of a monastery in that city, who had been the cause of great troubles and disorders there. No body lamented his death, and as the captain-general told me, he left above fifty thousand ducats without his house.
 A considerable history might be writ of this man, perhaps we may give hints of some small particulars. The next day my arrival was publickly known, by means of some Cbineses who had seen me on the other side; several judgments were made upon it, some for, some against me, and some indifferent; certain priests particularly de-clar'd against me, which made me backward in communicating some points concerning the mission with them. I was visited by persons of note, and the superiors of religious orders. I contracted a particular friendship with D. Alvaro de Sylva captain-general of those forts, which prov'd very advantageous to me. He made much of me, fitted me out, found me convenient shipping, and join'd me in a mess with some worthy friends of his, most excellent persons.

3. The governor of the bishoprick, formerly my intimate friend, and now a pro-fess'd enemy, for some good and holy considerations, endeavour'd to do me a mischief with the captain-general, putting him in mind of what others had quite forgot, which was, that through my means that city had been about submitting to Manila, which he altogether imputed to me; therefore he said I was a traitor to the king of Portugal, and the peace having not been yet proclaim'd there, it was enough to breed ill blood. The captain-general

2 answer'd very well, saying, He is no traitor, but a very loyal subject to his king; to endeavour the delivering of this city to his king, was a good piece of service. If I could deliver Badajoz to my king, would it be treason, or a good service done my king?

The honest governor us'd his endeavours with the government of the city not to let me go: but they answer'd him with a letter the embassador's secretary had writ to them, declaring that city was very much oblig'd to me for the service I had done the embassador, and embassy, which was very true. The embassador writ to the captain-general to the same effect, so that F. Emanuel de Angelis was very much sham'd.

My design being only to go over to Manila, I agreed with some masters of Siam, to whom I deliver'd books, clothes, some baggage, and other curiosities, though but few, for them to carry to Siam, whence I was to cross over to the islands. The Dutch at Malaca would not consent to it, for I have heard no more of them since; it is most likely all I sent is lost.

4. On the 11th of January the captain-general carry'd me aboard the ship, where I thought my self free from impertinent people, though I had a great deal to go through. One thing I was much surpriz'd at in Macao, and had it not been told me by one of the gravest citizens I had not be-liev'd it. Vasco Barbosa de Melo, who is well known to be honest, well born, and a good Christian, told me, that the foregoing year 1668, some persons had taken out certificates, that we had ruin'd the mission of Cbina, and were the cause they had no trade or commerce. As to the last point, I do not concern my self with it, because it belongs not to me; let them look to it.
Alexander the seventh, Clement the ninth and tenth, have issued their Bulls, repeating what Urban the eighth order'd in his of 33, be it for these or those. As to the first I say, it is no new thing in the-world for men to lay their own faults upon others, to excuse, and endeavour to conceal them. Let us cast our eyes upon Adam, Gen. iii. He excus'd himself, laying the blame on Eve, she on the devil, or serpent.
 Let us go on to the thirty first chapter, Laban said to Jacob, Why hast thou done so? Corn. à Lapid. v. 16. Observe here in Laban's words the bumour of the world; for tho' he knew he by his perfidiousness had given the just man cause to fly, yet he dissembles it, and casts all the blame upon the just man, &c. So the world palliates its own faults, and lays all the blame on the godly. So Ahab charges Elias with disturbing Israel; when as he, wicked king, was the cause of all evils. Read S. Cbryostom in cat. aur.

Joan.

Jean. i. 29. and Lippomanus in Gen. xlii. 12. The king of England complain'd of S. Thomas of Canterbury, that he could not enjoy peace for one priest in his kingdom; whereas he himself was the only cause of the discord.

5. The manner of obtaining those certificates, make the thing yet more foul and criminal. Vasco Barbosa having attended the ambassador two years in Canton, and knowing this business perfectly well (the second is known to all the world) he spoke with the judge who had sign'd those certificates; the Portugueses call him Veador, and said to him, how came you, sir, to sign such a thing, when you so well know the contrary? He answer'd, Mr. Vasco Barbosa, I was sick in bed, and somewhat cast down; two, to wit, N. and N. came to me and said, Sir, we bring you some papers of small consequence; you must sign them. I, sir, sat up, and sign'd without reading them; who would imagine that such men should impose upon me? (I bring God to witness that what I have writ is true.) I then said to Vasco Barbosa, Sir, who was most to blame in this affair? This gentleman, who did not read what he sign'd, or they that tender'd the papers, desiring to have them sign'd? Doubtless the latter, first because they sin'd deliberately and designedly. (2.) Because they sin'd maliciously. (3.) They deceiv'd in a matter of consequence, and to the detriment of a third person. (4.) In regard they were priests. (5.) Because of the motive and end, which could be no other than worldly honour and vain glory. (6.) Because they were the efficient forcing cause that the judge sin'd. (7.) Because of the scandal of such proceeding; and if the matter be further look'd into, other deformities will appear. The layman may alledge many excuses, and the reader may reflect on them, without inserting them here.

6. Knowing this case. I thought it requisite and necessary to prepare my self to make a defence; this is nature, and no doubt in many cases we are bound to it, lest silence seem to imply guilt. And this being prejudicial and dishonourable to a whole religious order, the defence is more absolutely necessary. S. Thom. ii. 2. quest. 26. art. 2. corp. says thus, For any part has a principal inclination to a common action to the benefit of the whole. Any man is bound to appear upon such like occasions. Especially, because as S. Ambrose says in epist. ad Pbilip. He is cruel who slight his own reputation. And S. August. de bono viduit. They are not to be bemarken'd so who cruelly despise men's reputation, because our life is useful to our selves, our good name to others, our conscience to our selves, our reputation to NAVA-our neighbour. This suffices for our purpose; RETTE. it were easy to add more, but it being a common case and out of dispute, I think it needless.

7. For these reasons I obtain'd fourteen certificates from the clergy, superiors of orders, the captain-general, and others of the principal men of that city, who all upon oath testify and declare, who were the cause that the missions of Japan, China, Tunquin, and other places in the east were lost. I had duplicates of the said certificates, one parcel I deliver'd to the holy congregation de propaganda fide, by order of cardinal Ottoboni; another parcel I have by me, beside an authentick copy taken at Rome. If any curious person pleases to read them, I will lend him them very freely.

8. As for the mission of China, I will write the matter of fact briefly, as all men own'd it who were there when the persecution began. When they told us the news of our banishment in the imperial city, F. Gouvea said to F. Canari, I being by at the same time; F. Matthew Riccius brought us into China by the mathematicks, and F. John Adamus now banishes us by his.

9. F. Gouvea discoursing with me at Canton, told me, That the strangers of his society, who were in China, had ruin'd the mission. Another time he explain'd himself further, and told me plainly, That their French fathers had been the cause of it: and perhaps it was because of the division there was among them about superiors, a little before the storm rose. F. Humbertus Augeri talking with me concerning this point, said, What have we French done? Our want of unity and mutual love, has ruin'd this mission. F. James Faber who was superior at that time told me, When I was at court, I perceiv'd that when F. Adamus dy'd, there would rise a great persecution. I look'd upon it as certain, and so I writ to our father-general. The fathers Canavari and Balat imputed it to the law of God's being imperfectly preached in that kingdom. Besides all this, the fathers of the society several times said in my hearing, that the little book the four fathers who resided in the imperial city had publish'd, was the only cause of all that disaster.

10. Our Chinese enemy in his memorials quotes F. Adamus, and charges him as has been writ; he quotes F. Matthew Riccius his books, and others of the society. The emperor's edict that was brought up, expressly names F. Adamus, and F. Verbieft, and their two companions, and no other except F. Antony of S. Mary, not because he was a Franciscan, but because his name was the first in the paper, because he came

NAVA- to the imperial city before any other. The RETTE. petition that was presented in our behalf was F. Adamus's. The Dutch who went to court after we came from thence, and knew all that had happen'd in their Mercuries, mention none but those of the society. The mathematicks, whence the dispute sprung, were follow'd by the society, not by us, or the Franciscans. The presents that were made in Cbina, with which our enemy says we infatuated the Cbineses, were given by those of the society, not by us, who had scarce bread to eat. Who put the society has made use of the Cbinese learning in the books of the law of God, which our enemy says we do to palliate our ill doctrine? These articles are made out in the foregoing chapter.

11. Did not the first imprisoning begin with F. Adamus, and the other three in the imperial city? it must be understood that of eleven there were then of my order in Cbina, only four went up to court. One fell sick to death in prison, he was taken out from thence with leave from the judges, and carried to the church of F. Magallanes, who was then in it, where a few days after he gave up the Ghost. We three came afterwards, the judges never put any questions to us. Now how are we brought in here, but only to suffer, to lose all we had, and leave our Christians expos'd to our enemy? It is a necessary duty to observe what the Holy Ghost says, Ecclus. xxxvii. 20. Let a true word go before thee in all works.

12. It may be urg'd that those of the society had contriv'd to return to their churches, for which they deserve much praise and honour. I say it is but reason they should have it, and that it has been an heroicke action, and suitable to their zeal, yet this does not detract from the truth of what has been written. It is well known there were no Dominican, Franciscan, nor Au-gustinian missionaries in Tunquin, Cochinebi-na, and other parts, so that the loss of those missions cannot be imputed to them.
 I shall say somewhat to the point of persecutions in the second tome. Leaving aside several stories I heard at Macao during my stay there, and other matters that were given me in writing, before I put to sea, it will be convenient in this place to make one particular chapter of the city Macao.

CHAP. XVII.

Of the City Macao, its Situation, Strength, and other Particulars.

1. I Have hitherto observ'd, and will for the future, what I lately quoted out of Ecclesiasticus; wherefore no man need make a doubt of what I write, but ought rather to give entire credit to it. Cajetan in Pres. in Luc. says, For it is most reasonable, that all credit be given to those who have not only seen, but whose duty it is to testify to others what they have seen. As I am a religious man, priest, apostolical missioner and preacher, tho' unworthy in all respects, what I relate deserves and ought to be look'd upon as undoubted truths, especially in regard I am an eye-witness.

Trade. 2. The Cbineses from all antiquity had prohibited the admitting of strangers into their kingdom, and trading with them; tho' for some years, covetousness prevailing, they have sail'd to Japan, Manila, Siam, and other parts within the straits of Sincapura, and Governador in the sea of Malaca, as I have observ'd before: but it has always been an infringement of the ancient law, the mandarines of the coast con-niving at it for their private gain. This is the reason why when the Portugueses began to sail those seas, they had no safe port, nor any way to secure one. They were some years in the island Xan Cboang, where S. Francis Xavier dy'd; some years they went to the province of Fo Kien, another while to the city Ning Po in the province of Gbe Kiang, whence they were twice expell'd, and the second time ill treated.

 They attempted the place where Macao now stands, but without success; they re-turn'd, and the mandarines of Canton sending advice to the emperor, he order'd they should remain there undisturb'd, paying tribute and customs for their merchandize.
 Thus they settled there, and had continued till my time the term of a hundred and thirty years. Many of the inhabitants of Macao say that place was given them, for having expell'd thence certain robbers, who did much harm to the neighbouring Cbineses, to which they say they oblig'd themselves, whence they infer that place is their own. The Cbineses disown it, and so does the Tartar, who is now the lord of it. And if the grant was upon condition, they should pay tribute and custom for merchandize, as they have always done; the difference is not much. At best they are like the Cbineses, among whom no man is absolute master of a foot of land.

3. The place is a small neck of land running off from the island so small, that including all within the wall the Cbineses have there, it will not make a league in circumference. In this small compass there are ascents and descents, hills and dales,
 and

and all rocks and sand. Here the merchants began to build: The first church and monastery built there was ours, of the invocation of our Lady of the Rosary, and the Portugueses still preserve it. Afterwards there went thither fathers of the society of the orders of St. Francis, and St. Augustin. Some years after they founded a monastery of St. Clare, and carry'd nuns to it from that of St. Clare in Manila: The foundation was without his majesty's leave, he reſented it when it came to his ears; and not without reason, for a country of infidels, and ſo ſmall, is not proper for nuns. That monastery has of late years been a great trouble to the city. Before I proceed any further, I will here ſet down what was told me by the licentiate Cadéna, a great prieſt of that city. When the Tartars conquer'd Cbina, thoſe nuns fearing leſt they might come over to Macao, and ſome diſaſter might befall them, petition'd the city to ſend them to ſome other place. Having weigh'd and conſider'd the matter, they answer'd, That they need not be in care, for if any thing happen'd, they would preſently repair to the monastery with a couple of barrels of gunpowder, and blow them all up, which would deliver them from any ill deſigns of the Tartars. An excellent method of comforting the poor afflicted creatures!

4. There are in the city five monaſteries, three pariſh-churches, the houſe and church of the Miſericordia, or Mercy; the hoſpital of S. Lazarus, and ſeminary of the ſociety; one great fort and ſeven little ones: The plan is very bad, becauſe it was built by piecemeal. It was afterwards made a biſhop's ſee; the firſt biſhop was of my order, and till my time no other proprietor had been conſecrated to it. It ſhall be argued in another place, whether that lord biſhop has a ſpiritual juriſdiction over all Cbina, or not; as alſo whether Tunquin and Cochinchina belong to him. At preſent it is certain they do not, for his holineſs has divided Cbina into three biſhopricks, under whom are Tunquin, Cochinchina, and the iſland Hermosa. And tho' the Portugueſe reſident at Rome oppos'd it, he could not prevail.

5. That city throve ſo much with the trade of Japan and Manila, that it grew vaſtly rich, but never would vie with Manila, nor is there any compariſon between the two cities. I find as much difference in all reſpects betwixt them, as is betwixt Madrid and Vallecas (much the ſame as between London and Hammerſmith) and ſome-what more, for the people of Manila are free, and thoſe of Macao ſlaves.

6. I take it for granted, that what Emanuel Leal de Fonſeca, knight of the order of CHRIST, ſaid in my hearing, upon Maun- day Thursday at night, in our monaſtery of NAVAMacao, is certainly true, That the governor of Manila had more employments to give than the Portugueſe viceroy at Goa, even before the Dutch had taken ſo much from them. It is alſo certain that his majeſty has more lands and ſubjects in the Philippine iſlands, than the Portugueſe had ſixty years ago throughout all India. Theſe things were unqueſtionable.

7. The trade of Japan failing, Macao began to decay; and that of Manila ceaſing, it almoſt fell to the ground. I was told ſo in that city, and it was viſible in the wants they endur'd. The monaſteries which ſome years before maintain'd twenty four religious men, in my time with much difficulty and want maintain'd three. The two trades above being at an end, they took up with ſandal of Timor, ateca of Siam, roſamulla, rota (all drugs) and ſuch-like commodities, which the Cbineſes bought, and they took ſilks, calicoes, and other merchandize in exchange, which they ſold at Siam and Macaſar to the Spaniards by a third hand.

8. Macao ever paid ground-rent for the houſes and churches to the Cbineſe, and anchorage for ſhipping. As ſoon as any ſhip or pink comes into the harbour, a mandarin preſently comes from the metropolis, and takes gage of it, and receives the duty according to his computation of the burden. When the ſhip goes out, he takes the dimenſions again, and receives freſh cuſtom. Every year their meaſures alter. Is this any thing like being abſolute maſters of that place? They have loſt what they had, and would appropriate to themſelves what is none of their own.

9. They complain and alledge, ſay the embaſſador Emanuel de Saldanna ſaid in my preſence, that our king employ'd all his ſtrength in the West-Indies, and ſuffer'd the East to decline, becauſe it belong'd to Portugal. But I confuted him with my answer, and ſaid, If the king of Spain was lord of both Indies, and his grandeur conſiſted in maintaining his dominion from East to West, why ſhould he ſuffer that to decline which he poſſeſs'd as abſolute lord and maſter? for that would be leſſening his own greatneſs, which he ſo much valu'd.

10. Secondly, When D. John de Sylva was governor of the Philippine iſlands, his majeſty order'd all the force of Manila and Goa ſhould rendezvous at Malaca, and that the governor and viceroy ſhould go aboard in perſon, in order to fall upon Jacatra, and drive the Dutch quite out of India. The governor came with five mighty ſhips, the beſt men in the iſlands, ammunitions, proviſions, and all neceſſaries. He arriv'd NAVA- at Malaca, where he expected the viceroy RETTE. two years, but he is not come yet. D. John de Sylva went away sad and troubled to Siam, where he was forced to fight some ships of that country and Japan. After which he dy'd for grief of the disappointment; many more dy'd, the rest return'd to Manila, having been at vast expence. All that ever spoke of this subject say, that if his majesty's orders had been obey'd, the Dutch had infallibly been ruin'd and expell'd India.

11. Thirdly, About the year 1640, one Meneses a gentleman of Goa came to Macao, in his way to Japan, whither he was going ambassador. He proceeded no further, because of the ill success of another embassy the year before. This gentleman talking with F. Antony de Santa Maria, a Franciscan, of the power of the Dutch in India, told him, that our king had writ into India, to acquaint them that if they thought fit he would send them a strong fleet, and in it D. Frederick of Toledo, as viceroy of Goa, Malaca, and Manila, who would scour the sea, and make it safe to them from East to West. We would not accept of what was offer'd for our good, said Meneses, and that was the reason we are in such a poor condition. The ambassador answer'd me, I did not know all that.

12. After this on Midsummer-day, I being invited with F. Gouvea, and two others of the society, the said F. Gouvea maliciously insinuating, That our king could not recover Brasil, and their new king had done it: The ambassador said, I was a soldier in that mighty tho' unfortunate fleet king Philip the fourth set out for that purpose. The Portuguese general was one Mascarenbas Count de la Torre. who was in fault that it was not recover'd. The Spanish commander was to keep the sea, the count to act ashoar, and to that purpose had thirteen thousand chosen men. The Spanish general offer'd him three thousand musquetiers of his men; he several times desir'd him to land, and he would secure the sea, but he never durst. It was the count's fault, concluded the ambassador, that Brasil was not then recover'd. I was very well pleas'd to hear it, and what is it now they complain of? I often heard it said, that Malaca was lost during our king's government in the year 1639. Bento Pereira de Faiza the ambassador's secretary, said before all the Portuguese then at Canton who were in that error, It is not so, fathers, for the revolt of Portugal was in December 1640, and Malaca was lost the following year. I was well pleas'd at the answer.

13. Discourfing about the loss of Mafcate, Emanuel de Fonseca a worthy Portu- guese told me at Canton, That it had been lost, because, contrary to our King's orders, they had tolerated a synagogue of Jews there. Avarice made them connive at those infamous people.

14. At Diu, said the same man, they allow'd of a Moorish mosque on the same account, and contrary to his majesty's commands. Speaking of the loss of Ceilon, the bare-footed Franciscan gave the account I set down in another chapter. I afterwards heard it over again, That it was well it was lost, for otherwise fire must needs have fallen from heaven, and consumed it all.

15. Talking about some towns along the coast, F. Torrente said, the Portuguese commanders us'd horrid injustice towards the natives.

16. Upon discourse of the losing of Ormuz, F. Ferrari related, That he being at Malaca, heard some who had been present at the action, and among them the enemy's admiral, say, If the Portuguese the day after the fight had come upon us again, they had certainly catch'd us all, for we were undone; they went off and left us conquerors and possess'd of all.

17. Father Antony Gouvea talking at Canton of the loss of India, said, God had taken it from them for two reasons; one was, the inhuman usage of the natives, especially of the women, towards the blacks, and the other for their lust.

18. These and such-like things F. de Angelis might have inserted in his general history; what the Spaniards did in America we know and abhor. It is unreasonable to see the faults of others, and be blind to our own.

19. We being altogether at Canton there was some discourse with the ambassador's gentlemen concerning the loss of Cochin. The Portuguese fathers of the society imputed it to ill fortune, and to the natives assisting the Dutch. A layman who was by took up the business, and said, Alas, fathers, we Portuguese are the most barbarous people in the world, we have neither sense, reason, nor government. He went on with much more to this purpose, and concluded, They overcame, slew, and took that country from us, as from base and mean people. The society was much blam'd; all the religious orders spent all they had to relieve the soldiers and townsmen, the society not one grain of rice. The Dutch entred the place, and took all they had.

20. We talk'd of the miserable condition Macao was in of late years (I design'd this city for the subject matter of this chapter; but because one thing draws on another, and all tends to make known what I saw and and heard in those parts, it is convenient to write all) the ambassador's secretary said to F. Gouvea, Father, the truth of it is, that brother Reyes, and his Cbinese friend Li Pe Ming, are the cause of the ruin of Macao: He had not a word to answer. All this has been inserted here, to prove they have no reason to complain, that our king was the cause of their losing India.

21. The miserable state and wretched condition the Portugueses do now, and have liv'd for some years in those parts, might make them sensible, if prejudice did not blind them, that their own sins, and not those of others, have brought all these misfortunes upon them. They liv'd some years at Macaasar, in great subjection to the Mabometans, neither the laity nor clergy had the least authority, so the governor of the bishoprick of Malaca who resided there told me, his name was Paul d'Acosta. Upon Maunday Thursday when I was in the church, a company of Moors came into the church and went up the sepulchre to see what was in the custodium, no body stirring to oppose them. When they searched for any criminal, the sumbane sent five or six thousand Moors, who look'd into the privatest closet without sparing any place. They always watch'd at night to secure themselves against the Moors, who stole all they had. They told me above four thousand Christians had turn'd Mabometans in that country. When expel'd thence by the Dutch, some of them went over to Camboxa, submitting themselves to such another king, others to Siam, where they live in ill repute, and despis'd by the natives and Cbineses that are there. Some would fain get away from thence, but are not suffered by the king, who says, they are his slaves; and the reason is, because some Portugueses have borrow'd money of the king to trade, and pawn'd their bodies for it. The king easily lent it them, and it is his maxim, that all who in that manner receive his money, are his slaves, and have not the least liberty left them.

22. Those who live in Cochinchina and Tunquin were expel'd thence. In the year 1667, this I shall now relate happen'd in Cochinchina: The women there being too free and immodest, as soon as any ship arrives, they presently go aboard to invite the men, nay, they make it an article of marriage with their own countrymen, that when ships come in, they shall be left to their own will, and have liberty to do what they please. This I was told, and F. Maceret who had been a missionary there affirm'd it to me to be true. A vessel from Macao came to that kingdom, and during its stay there, the Portugueses had, it is likely, so openly to do with those infidel harlots, that when they were ready to sail, the women NAVARETTE complain'd to the king, that they did not pay them what they ow'd them for the use of their bodies. The king order'd the vessel should not stir till that debt was paid. A rare example given by Christians, and a great help to the conversion of those infidels! Another time they were so lewd in that kingdom, that one about the king said to him, Sir, we know not how to deal with these people; the Dutch are satisfy'd with one woman, but the people of Macao are not with many. F. de Angelis may take these virtues of his countrymen along with him.

23. Whilst the government was in the Cbineses, the people of Macao own'd themselves their subjects; now the Tartars rule, they are, and confess themselves their subjects. When the city has any business they go in a body with rods in their hands to the mandarin who resides a league from thence, they petition him, and that on their knees. The mandarin in his answer writes thus: This barbarous and brutal people desires such a thing, let it be granted, or refus'd them. Thus they return in great state to their city, and their fidalgos or noblemen with the badge of the knighthood of the order of CHRIST hanging at their breasts, have gone upon these errands; and I know one there to this day of the same rank, who was carry'd to Canton with two chains about his neck. He was put into prison, and got off for six thousand ducats in silver. If their king knew these things, it is almost incredible he should allow of them.

24. Ever since the Tartars made the people retire from the sea-coasts up the inland, to avoid the attempts of the Cbineses of Caballo, as was writ in the first book, they began to use rigor with Macao. At a quarter of a league distance from that city, where the narrow part of that neck of land is, the Cbineses many years ago built a wall from sea to sea, in the middle of it is a gate with a tower over it, where there is always a guard, that the people of Macao may not pass, nor the Cbineses to them. The Cbineses have sometimes had their liberty, but the Portugueses were never permitted to go up the country. Of late years the gate was shut, at first they open'd it every five days, then the Portugueses bought provisions; afterwards it grew stricter, and was only open'd twice a month. Then the rich, which were but very few, could buy a fortnight's store; the poor perish'd, and many have starv'd. Orders came again that it should be open'd every five days. The Cbineses sell them provisions at what rate they please.

25. The Cbineses have always liv'd in Macao, they exercise mechanick trades, and are NAVARRETTE. are in the nature of factors to the citizens. They have often gone away with all their trust. Sometimes the Chinese government has obliged them to depart Macao, which has much ruin'd that city: Because several inhabitants, and some monasteries have nothing of their own, but a few little houses the Chinese live in, when they were gone they lost the rent of them.

26. It would take up much time and paper to write but a small epitome of the broils, uproars, quarrels and extravagancies there have been at Macao. Among other things our enemy alledg'd in his memorials presented to the emperor, one was that F. Adamus had thirty thousand men conceal'd at Macao to invade Cbina. No doubt but it was a great folly. He added that some years before the city had rais'd walls, which were demolish'd by the emperor's command. This was true. In another memorial he accus'd us, that the Europeans resorting to Japan, had attempted to usurp that kingdom, for which many were punish'd, and the rest banish'd; and that we had possess'd our selves of the Philippine islands. But never any particular king in Europe was mention'd; nor was there any naming of religious orders, or religious men. They always made use of the general name of Europe and Europeans.

27. The two councils of rites and war, put in a memorial, advising it was convenient the people of Macao should return to their own country. The government answer'd in the emperor's name, That since they had liv'd there so many years, it was not convenient to send them away, but that they should be brought into the metropolis, for as much as their own subjects had been drawn from the sea-coast to the inland. This was the beginning of much debate and confusion. The mandarines make great advantage of the inhabitants of Macao, and would not have them change their habitation. At court they insisted on what has been said, and order'd a place should be assign'd them to live in. One was appointed near the river of Canton, the worst that could possibly be found. Notice was given to Macao, the city divided into two factions. The natives and mungrels were for going, the Portugueses against it. The supreme governor beset them by sea, order'd their ships to be burnt; accordingly ten were burnt before their faces, and they seiz'd the goods seven of them had brought the foregoing year.

28. We at Canton, and they at Macao, were in great confusion, things growing worse and worse every day. The city promis'd the supreme governor twenty thousand ducats, if he could prevail that they might continue in their city. Interest mov'd him to use all his power to obtain it. He obtain'd leave for them to stay, but that they should not trade at sea. The governor demanded the promis'd money; they answer'd, they would pay it if he got them leave to trade. This enrag'd the governor, who endeavour'd to do them all the mischief he could. He shut up the gate in the wall, allowing it to be open'd but twice a month. It pleas'd God, or rather it was his permission, that the governor having been at variance with the petty king, hang'd himself the ninth of January 1667, upon which Macao recover'd some hopes of bettering its condition. The ambassador's business was at a stand the mean while; he was full of trouble, especially because he had brought but two thousand eight hundred pieces of eight with him, and had above ninety persons to maintain out of it. Macao could assist him but little, and afterwards excus'd it self. All complain'd of the society, which had advis'd that embassy. True it is that this complaint being made before me to those that were in Canton, F. John Dominick Gaviani a Piemontese answer'd: Gentlemen, all the society had not a hand in this embassy, some particular persons had, you are not therefore to condemn the whole society. Pereira the secretary, who was all fire, reply'd, We do not blame the society in Rome, France and Madrid, but that in Cbina. Your reverences procur'd this embassy, and that Macao should bear the charge of it, which has ruin'd us; therefore the complaint is made here, not before the fathers in Europe. One of the greatest troubles the Portugueses had, was to see and hear how they us'd their ambassador. They call'd him a mandarin, that was going to do homage, and pay an acknowledgment from the petty king of Portugal. When he went up to the imperial city, there was a flag or banner upon his boat with two large characters on it, which according to our way of speaking signify'd, This man comes to do homage. All ambassadors that go to Cbina must bear with this, or they will not be admitted.

29. I write what follows for F. Emanuel de Angelis. The vilest, basest, and most infamous action that has been heard of in the world, was done at Macao: The revolt of Portugal being known there (I will not insert in this place what F. Gouvea told me to prove and evince, that his brethren had brought about this action, as allowing it for a certainty among them and many others, tho' the governor of the bishoprick of Macao would attribute that action to his family; read M. Seneir of the order of S. Augustin, cap. iii, iv, & v.) they painted our king under a gallows, and their own as hangman hanging of him; this picture was expos'd in a publick place of the city. Some mislik'd, others were asham'd of it, as I suppose, because of the honourable employment they had given their king; so it was taken away and hid. I had made many reflections upon this passage, which at present I lay aside, but must observe that in Cbina the gallows is for noble and great men, and base people are beheaded, just contrary to what is practis'd in Europe. To be hangman is the vilest thing that is throughout the world. The Cbineses are in the right in calling the people of Macao barbarous and brutal, this action alone is enough to entitle them to it. I suppose some mungrels were the authors of it, and not others, whom I have heard talk of our affairs with all imaginable reverence. What the people of Macao did in Japan is well known, and they ingenuously confess it; they own'd it to me in that city, and F. Gouvea told it me at Canton. It was, that till the ships return'd, they publickly without any shame keep common women in their houses. A good help towards the conversion of those people! F. Torente told me they did the same at Tunquin.

30. But a little before I came to Macao the governor of the diocess had committed to prison a woman for living in open sin with a Tartar soldier; the soldier with others of his companions came to the goal at noon-day, broke it open, and carry'd away the woman, no man daring to open his mouth. About the same time a maiden daughter to one of the principal inhabitants of that city, run away into Cbina with an infidel. Of late years many women expos'd their bodies to infidels for bread. The governor banish'd sixty of them; the third day the ship sail'd she was cast away, and not one of the women escap'd.

31. Some years before a great many arm'd Portugueses assaulted the captain general's-house; he hid himself under the stairs, they found and stuck him in several places. After this an ordinary fellow with a black murder'd the town-mayor. A man flying from his enemy took into our church, and stood berwixt the altar and the priest that sung high mass, who had consecrated; his enemy pursu'd, and murder'd him in that place. Many base murders have been committed in that city. In my time one dismal enough, and soon after at noon-day the curate of the great church was murder'd. About six or seven years since a Portuguese kill'd the curate their nation has at Siam. The curate of Macaos was very familiar with the Dutch, he told them he had two daughters at home, and the governor had one, and yet they think God will not punish them. For they are humbled for their iniquities, Psal. cvi. Excepting Goa and the northern parts, which is as much as nothing, they have not one foot of ground in all India, but are every where subject to Gentiles, Mabometans, or Hereticks, and by them crush'd, contemn'd and despis'd. Kingdoms, says S. Thomas, lib. IV. Opusc. 41. are lost through pride. Who is ignorant how guilty that nation was of it?

32. Thus Macao may be sufficiently known, and several particulars relating to that city and other parts. We may say with S. August. ser. 6. ad frat. that all is, and has been a great mercy of God. It is a mercy if God scourges, that he may correct, if he delivers from sin through tribulation, if he permits hypocrites and tyrants to reign. For God does all these things in his mercy, being desirous to give us life everlasting. The Tartars entering Cbina to afflict those Gentiles, and distress Macao, the Dutch possessing themselves of India, and other accidents we have seen, are all the mercy of God, and for our good, if we our selves will with patience, humility and submission, make our advantage of what his Divine Majesty ordains and disposes.

33. To conclude this chapter I will add certain revelations, as they call them, in great vogue at Macao, and other parts of India; I do not look upon them as such, nor can I find any ground to allow them the name. These revelations are pretended to be made to Peter de Buffos at Malaca, about the years forty and forty two. (1.) Four years before the revolt of Portugal, say they, he foretold it, almost in the same manner as it happen'd; it was reveal'd to him by God in the consecrated host. The revolt was in the year 1640, the revelations began at the same time, then how could he foretel it four years before it happen'd? (2.) That in the same consecrated host he saw a stately throne, and our king Philip the fourth sitting there on a pine-apple, from the bottom whereof issu'd four branches of thorns, which growing up by degrees, prest him so hard that they cast him from his seat, and that he heard a voice, saying, The monarchy of Spain is at an end.

34. This brother saw our king in a better place than the people of Macao had assign'd him. God's will be done, but we see he was a false prophet, for the monarchy still continues under Charles the second, and we hope for much prosperity in his time. (3.) That there would in a short time be a pope of the society: That new missions shall be discover'd, and those that are lost restor'd; and that there should be mighty conversions in India, so that the society should not be able to go through the work, so it should be prosperous.

NAVA- 35. All that relates to the society I look RETTE. upon as likely enough, and there needed no new revelations for it. The daily experience we have of their increasing in learning and virtue, may be ground enough for us to hope as much. As for the missions, the time is not fulfill'd; for tho' he says shortly, it may be many years to come, and yet be so call'd.

(4.) That the Portugueses and Dutch would be as close as the nail and the flesh; That he saw a mitre and other episcopal ornaments with the arms of Portugal over Jacatra.

36. The first article I can expound no otherwise, than that the Dutch are the nails that have claw'd off all the flesh the Portugueses had in India. The missionaries in Canton us'd to laugh at the second.

(5.) In the year 1640, he prophesy'd the miserable state of Macao, and that India should be restor'd to the condition it was formerly in.

37. The first part we are eye-witnesses to, and it was a necessary consequence of the loss of its trade with Japan and Manila. The second is at present worse than it was then, for that year they lost Malaca, after it Ceylon, and lastly Cochin.

(6.) In the year 1641, he said, a way would be open'd into Japan, because the Holy Ghost appear'd favourable to that kingdom, and that he saw many things relating to it in the consecrated host. No part of this prophecy has been verifi'd to this day.

38. He says further, That he saw F. Cyprian in the consecrated host on the right hand, cloth'd in glory, with many rays of light coming from him; and Bustos said, That father was a great saint, but that he was not yet perfected, nor did he know which way God would guide him, but yet he was much belov'd by God.

39. This spoil'd all the rest, and proves they are fictions and frauds, and no revelations, for Cyprian was a great knave, hypocrite, and cheat: it is wonderful what false miracles he gave out, and how he counterfeited sanctity; let it suffice that he is at this time in the prison of the inquisition at Goa, and condemn'd to perpetual confinement there. The ambassador Emanuel de Seldanna told me, he was a treble herefiarch. There it is he will be perfected.

(7.) In the year 42 he prophesy'd the martyrdom of five persons, but two of them gave an ill account of themselves.

40. Those men believe, applaud and extol these follies.

41. Just before my departure from Cb-na, some news arriv'd out of Europe; one piece was, that Bandarra had been a notorious Jew, that his tomb was thrown down, and his prophecies suppress'd.

42. That the English at Bombay overthrew the churches, and cut to pieces the pictures of the altars. I was afterwards told at Goa, who had been the cause of it; perhaps in another place I may give a hint at it, and perhaps not, for all truths are not to be writ: All things are lawful to me, but all things are not convenient; it is enough it be known in those parts of the world.

43. That the infidels attack'd Goa, took two thousand Christians, and kill'd a Franciscan, and that the viceroy did not behave himself well.

44. Considering the present condition of India, we may well apply it to the words of Macchab. i. 40. As had been her glory, so was her dishonour increas'd, and her excellency was turn'd into mourning. And those of chap. ii. v. 12. And behold our holy things, even our beauty and our glory is laid waste, and the Gentiles have profaned it.
Mabomentans, Gentiles, and Hereticks, have all defil'd the beauty and glory of our religion in those kingdoms and provinces.

CHAP. XVIII.

My Voyage to Malaca, and Stay there.

1. THE captain and pilot of the ship's name was Stephen Diaz, a man in great repute at Macao, but he lost much of it this voyage. There are many ill-grounded opinions; because four or five say such a man is an able pilot, or good soldier, they presently applaud him as such,
and when occasion offers, he appears to be a mere ignoramus. Certain it is, he was an honest man and good Christian; so that doubtless God favours him, which is knowledge and good fortune enough. He never swore nor curs'd, a thing rare enough in an European and Portuguese sailor. When angry he would say, I vow my soul to God.

He pray'd incessantly, his beads were never out of his hands, and he delighted in hearing talk of spiritual things. He offer'd me all he had aboard; I stood not in need of it, but was thankful for his good will, and did him all the service I could. When the Tartars oppress'd Macao, he put to sea, and to save his ship and men's lives, he went to Manila, which port he put into upon the security of a pass he had from the governor D. James Salcedo; who did not observe

serve it, but took his ship. All men disapprov'd of this action, and when that governor was seiz'd, he that succeeded him, restor'd the ship to the right owner, and he return'd in it to Macao in August 69. I had good accommodation given me in the great cabin, where there were some other passengers, who all were extremely kind to me. The first night he steer'd east, and then tack'd and stood away to the south, thinking he had left the flats of Pulisi astern (they are famous in that sea, and extend below Camboxa) here it was he began to lose the reputation of being an able seaman. A great pilot who went aboard as a passenger, said to him, Captain, how can you expect in one night's sail to come up with the flats along the shore? The pilot still fell off to leeward, which was making up to the flats. One night when the pilot was gone to rest, after having given his orders to the steersman; the pilot who was a passenger, his name Vincent Fernandez, ask'd for his sword, and bid his men take his spear, and be on the watch; he was persuaded we should be upon the flats, and design'd to betake himself to the boat. He came up softly without any noise to the bittake, and said to the steersman, We are running right upon the flats, pray bear up eight points to windward; and if the pilot says any thing, tell him the ship flew from the helm. Under God this precaution sav'd our lives, for notwithstanding that bearing away eight points one morning, we found our selves within a stone's throw of the points of the flats, the current running off it, we were all much frighted. Every day the rosary, salve, litany, and other prayers were said kneeling, few days pass'd without saying mass, we had frequent sermons and exhortations, and often going to confession and communion. We arriv'd at the island Pulocondor, which is large and well wooded; the natives came out to us with some refreshment of fruit: they brought with them a little animal the Portugueses call perguiza, that is, sloth; it was very strange and odly shap'd, its slow motion and looks seem'd to be the very emblem of sloth. It brought forth a young one aboard, the young one clung fast to the dam's belly, and she with it hanging crept up the shrouds extraordinary leisurely.

2. We made thence for the strait of Sincapuera, our pilot had never pass'd it; we came within musket-shot, and no sign of a passage appear'd: he was about to tack and steer away for the new strait call'd del Governador, which is wider, and at present most people go that way. Some aboard were satisfied the strait was there, as having pass'd it sometimes; but honest

Stephen Diaz was so positive, he would believe no-body. At a point of land which conceal'd the passage, there was a great number of fishermen there call'd Salfetes, who always live upon the water, and in their boats carry their wife, children, cats, dogs, hens, &c. as I mention'd in the first book many liv'd in China. One of the boats made to us, the master of it came aboard and carried us thro' very safe. That country belongs to the king of Jor, who has abundance of pepper. Having discover'd the passage, which we admir'd to see how close nature has hid and conceal'd it, we sail'd easily along. I had heard it said at Canton, that when ships sail'd thro' there, the yard-arms hit against the trees on both sides, and that the current was so violent, it whirl'd a ship about with all her sails aboard. The first is a mere fiction, the second is false; though perhaps when the south-west winds reign there may be something of it, but it is not likely considering the position of the continent and islands about it. The passage is scarce a bow-shot in width, two ships cannot pass it board by board; it presently grows wider, and abundance of islands appear. Our obstinate pilot would needs keep close under the shore; he lost the channel, and the ship struck upon the sand; being it sprung no leak, we were not much troubled. As soon as this happen'd, abundance of the Salfetes took their posts to observe us, to make their advantage in case the ship were cast away. Practice had made them very expert at it; the flood carried us off safe. On saturday, being the eve of the Purification, or Candlemas, we came to an anchor in sight of Malaca. I went ashore that afternoon, and told the governor I desir'd to make my way thence to Manila, either thro' Siam or Camboxa. He would not consent to it; I us'd all my interest and art, but in vain, which made me very melancholy: I spoke to the chief domine, who did all he could for me, but obtain'd nothing. I was in a passion one day, and said to him, So it is then, that your lordships in this place tolerate Gentiles, Mabometans, and all barbarous nations, and will not admit a Spanish religious man for one month, tho' we are at peace with you; what reason is there for it? there is none but their profession and our meanness.

3. That afternoon the stewards of the brotherhood of the Rosary invited me to go up the river at eight of the clock at night, where most of the Christians live, there to sing the salve and litany of our Lady. I could not avoid it, but went; their church was adorn'd: after the rosary, the salve and litany was sung very well, I being in a cope, brought out the image of our blessed Lady, which was a very beautiful one. Then I heard some confessions, and having taken my leave of the people, went away to rest at the house of an honest Portuguese, who was married to a Malaye woman. I was twelve days ashore; the evening and morning was spent in hearing confessions. I said mass every day but one, and administer'd the blessed sacrament: the rest of the day I visited the sick, and that they might all be pleas'd, said mass one day in one house, and the next in another; thus we secur'd our selves against a French dominic who was watching of us. There was another Portuguese dominic born in Algarve, who was more truely, and a better friend to his countrymen. At Jacatra, as I was there told again, though I had heard it before, there were two other dominics, they were both of considerable families. It is well known who the governor was originally, who has govern'd those parts several years.

4. There were about two thousand catholicks in that place, as I was told; the women were extraordinary good Christians, some of the men were so too; many did not confess, because it was easy to them to resort to an Indian clergyman who was disguis'd there: I am persuaded some as lukewarm in the faith, by reason of their conversing with the Dutch. Heresy, says St. Paul, is like a cancer, it is a plague and poison that insensibly infects. I shed tears as I walk'd those streets, to see that country possess'd by enemies of the church, for it is a mere garden, and paradise for worldly pleasure; in spirituals it was once a great colony, and the church has many children there still, but they are among bloody wolves. The women wish they could get away from thence, but are so poor they cannot; those who have some wealth are pleas'd and satisfied.

5. That place is in two degrees and a half of north-latitude; the climate is charming, the place where the catholicks live the best in the world. The coco-trees grow up to the clouds; there are orchards full of orange, limon, and plantane-trees, papagos, xambos, and other sorts of fruit. They have two other places there, but not so pleasant. The fruit then began to come forwards, there were very good and well-tasted pine-apples. The Christians furnish'd me with several necessaries against I went aboard, and some money given me for masses. Another religious man of my order, took up his lodging in an acquaintance's house; he and I took all the pains we could, and had we staid there much longer, we had found enough to do. Among the rest there was a woman, an extraordinary good Christian, she furnished bread and wine for the masses. She had a daughter whom she had educated with all possible care; yet when grown up, she married a heretick, who soon perverted her, and she prov'd a mortal enemy to catholicks.

6. The Dutch gave good alms even to the catholick poor, but almost oblig'd them to be present at their service. A poor lame man said to me, Father, I cheat them very handsomely, for being lame, as I go up that hill I feign my self lamer, and sit down to rest every step, so that I never get to the top, nor never will. Upon funday-nights the hereticks make their feasts in the streets. As I was going home with some friends, we found a jolly Dutch man with his table and bottles in the cool air; he invited us, and I accidentally ask'd, Are you married, sir, in this country? He answer'd me very pleasantly, Yes, father, I married a black; since I cannot eat white bread I take up with brown. Some of us from a catholick's house, saw a Dutchman lash two blackamore women most cruelly, they seem'd to be catholicks; he had ty'd them to coco-trees, and beat them unmercifully: one of them call'd upon Jesus and Mary, and we saw him for that reason lash her again in a most outrageous manner.

7. Anthony Marinbo a Portuguese told me, That Emanuel de Sousa Coutinbo had basely lost that place of so great moment and consequence. He that has it commands the Strait, and that place is the general rendezvouz for all the kingdoms of India. When all was taken by the Dutch, three fathers remain'd there; two of them I knew very well, the other who was a Frenchman, dy'd some years since in Europe. They demanded a place where they might administer to the catholicks; the Dutch had sent to Jacatra for orders to give them a church, and it is reported they design'd it should be that of S. Anthony; but the fathers being too impatient of delay, tho' the Dutch themselves advis'd them to be moderate, they threaten'd the Dutch they would take from them the water of the well of Batabina, which is the best they have, and is always guard'd. These threats provok'd the Dutch, who sent them to Jacatra, where they were forbid saying mass. The French father, who was over-zealous even in the opinion of his own brethren, continued saying of it. They grew angry at him, took away a crucifix he had, and the villains burnt it publicly; the father himself was at the foot of the gallows, happy he, had he ended his life there.

8. The compass of Malaca is small, but the situation strong. It is encompass'd with good walls and bulwarks, it is in the shape of a sugar-loaf, in the upper part stood stood the houſe and church of the ſociety; the monaſtry at preſent is a magazine: It was a great annoyance to the Portugueſes, as they themſelves ſay, that they had not levell'd that eminence. Among the hereticks there was one who always valu'd himſelf upon his wiſdom, tho' he had none; he obſtinately urg'd that woman was more perfect than man, without alledging any reaſon but his repeated affirmation. He expos'd the error he had in his heart; but when the words of St. Paul, 1 Cor. xi. For man was not created for woman, but woman for the man; and man is the head over woman, and let women be ſubject, &c. were urg'd againſt him, he had not one word to ſay for himſelf. NAVA-

RETTE.

9. The hereticks adminiſter baptiſm and matrimony to the catholicks. I found there ſome Indians of Manila, they enjoy their liberty, and are free from taxes and other duties that lie upon them in their country.

10. On the 11th of February we went aboard again, and the 12th with a fair gale left cape Rocbado aſtern, it belongs to Malaca, and is poſſeſt by the Hollanders. Now we begin another voyage, therefore it will be fit to conclude this chapter, and begin another.

CHAP. XIX.

My Voyage from Malaca, as far as Madraſta Patan.

1. THEY told us at Malaca, the ſeaſon was too far advanced for us to reach Goa, ſo that we went in fear and dread. To encreaſe it the more, we had a dead calm in that narrow ſea: we caſt anchor at ſun-ſetting, and at ſun-riſing again weigh'd very leiſurely. Thus we came to an iſland uninhabited, call'd Pulo Pinang, well wooded; there we took in water very leiſurely. We continued there two days, and one of them the wind blew very fair, and we afterwards miſs'd it to compaſs our deſign. On the firſt of March, after ſun-ſetting, the wind blew terribly, and we being juſt ready to paſs betwixt two of the iſlands of Nicobar, the pilot was afraid and back'd his ſails, ſo that we loſt way every moment. The ſecond of the ſaid month, as we ſail'd betwixt the ſaid iſlands, ſeveral boats came out to us with freſh proviſions; our people dealt for hens, cocos, plantanes, and ſome amber, all for old rags. The veſſels were extraordinary fine, ſome had thirty oars, and row'd to the admiration of us all. The people were ſomewhat black, and had red hair, which is wonderful; among them that row'd there were women, all naked, ſaving juſt before and behind, where they had ſome dirty rags. As they ſaid aboard our ſhips, thoſe people were ſo warlike, that they had boarded a Dutch ſhip. It is certain they devour the Europeans they catch alive, as near as they can. The pilot told me there was a ſtrange well in an iſland we ſaw there, whatever is put into it, whether iron, copper or wood, comes out gilt; I do not remember whether that gilding is laſting, but it is very remarkable. The weapons thoſe people uſe are their oars, which we ſaw were very ſharp-pointed; the wood is very hard, I believe they will ſtrike thro' a mud wall.

2. The wind held us the two following days, and we wanted forty leagues of paſſing the gulph of Ceylon. The third day we were becalm'd, and endeavour'd to avoid the currents, which they ſaid ran toward the Maldivy iſlands; we fell ſixty leagues below cape Gallo, and all things conſpir'd to thwart our courſe. We had been three days making for the iſland Ceylon. On the 9th of March, when the pilot leaſt expected to make it, the captain accidentally went out of the cabbın, and bent his ſight to diſcover land. The pilot ſaid to him, It would be a miracle to ſee land now. The captain cried out, Land ahead; had we ſail'd one minute longer, the ſhip had been aſhore. They furl'd the ſails, and dropt anchor with all poſſible expedition, then we plainly ſaw the ſhore. It rain'd apace, the wind blew hard, and was right aſt. It was very ſtrange, we diſcover'd a league below us two ſhips at anchor as well as we; one of them weigh'd immediately away, and ſail'd to windward of us. We lay there till next day; the weather clear'd up, and we ran along the iſland with a fair gale. On the 25th of March we left cape Gallo aſtern, with terrible thunder and lightning that blinded us; three men ſpent that night, till ſun-riſing the next day, at play, without riſing off the ground; the reſt of us were very fearful, for the wind ſtill encreas'd, ſo that we had a diſmal night of it; but the three being intent upon gaming, minded nothing.

3. The waggoners directed to coaſt cape Gallo, then along by Columbo, and to hold on to Nigumbo, as the beſt way to ſtrike over to cape Comori. The pilot would not ſteer the uſual courſe; and it ſucceeded accordingly, tho' the reaſon he gave for it ſeem'd good enough in regard to the voyage he was to make; but new ways are always dangerous. Next we had calms and hazy weather; we met a pink bound

our

NAVARRETTE. our way: every body was for making up to it to get some information, but the pilot thinking it a lessening of him, would not consent. They are strange people, tho' they perish by it, they will not ask advice, nor follow it. The sea ran as swift as an arrow towards the continent, and the pilot thought he should fall upon the Maldivy islands. One night two lights on the coast were seen, so near were we to it: we tack'd and in the morning found ourselves near land, but knew it not; in the afternoon two blacks came up to us in a Catamaron, which is only three pieces of timber, on which they go out to sea. They told us we were off of Comori and Tutucori. The wind came to south-west, so that in eight days we did not advance a foot. We had sight of cape Comori, but could not possibly weather it at that time. It was then propos'd to make for the coast of Coromandel. Lent was near at an end, no body in the ship eat meat so much as once, all did the duty the church imposes. That Lent I said mass thirty one times, and preach'd nineteen, which is enough at sea. I bless'd palm on palm-sunday, and we did the best we could.

Catamaron.

4. A council was held about going into port; they had before talk'd of and resolv'd upon it, yet none would give his opinion in publick. I took upon me to shew the reasons that oblig'd us to put into a harbour, which afterwards all agreed to. That night we sail'd before the wind, and if they would have done as the pilot advis'd, which was to go to Columbo, it had been better for us. We sail'd as far as the flats, which are fifty leagues above cape Gallo; all the business was in passing them. On the 8th of April so furious a wind rose with the moon, that we were forced to run before it. The next night we found our selves against Gallo, we were willing to put in, but no body knew the way; they design'd to winter there. We pass on to Columbo. Columbo, cast anchor; some went ashore, but they would not give leave for the priests, and we were three of us. There are above three thousand catholicks there, they have had no priest among them ever since the Portugueses lost that island to the Dutch, as basely as they had done Malacca: So I was told aboard the ship. Some blam'd Antony de Sousa Coutinbo, brother to him that lost Malacca; others said it was a judgment, as I have mention'd before. His own countrymen report it of Philip de Masearenbas, who had been governor there, that he us'd to say, The king of Candea, who was lord of that noble island, should be his footman and groom. There are men of wonderful pride in the world; they say the king, tho' a heathen, begg'd peace of him with a crucifix in his hands; what more could a Christian expect from that pagan? yet the Portugueses complain'd that the natives of the island took part against them; what reason had they to favour them? it were no wonder tho' the elephants and wild beasts had fought against them. General Macbuca who took that place, and afterwards Cochin, two months before our arrival, made war upon the blacks of Tutucori, kill'd fourteen thousand of them, built a strong fort, garrison'd it, and return'd to Columbo. He came aboard us civilly, gave us wood of the cinnamon-trees; we chew'd many of the leaves, and they tasted like fine cinnamon; we were supply'd with all things. Some catholicks came aboard to confession; the women shew'd much devotion, sent beads and candles to bless; ask'd for holy water, written gospels: some were for sending their sins in writing, others for telling them to the seamen, that they might confess by a third hand. An honest Frenchman and his wife writ to me very feelingly, and presented me; I sent them beads and pictures. Another Frenchman, whose name was Bertran, very old and honourable, had been fourteen years a slave to the king of that country; he fled, I heard his confession, and got him some alms of the Portugueses. They hang'd two blacks on the shore in sight of us: they were catholicks, and some Portugueses who were ashore told me, that a heretick preacher going along with them, one of the blacks turn'd to him and said, Do not preach or talk to me, I know what I am to do, I am a catholick, and so I will die. There was oil of cinnamon sold there, but under half a Quartillo (that is, half a pint and half a quartern) for seven or eight pieces of eight: the scent was enough to raise a dead man; I twice anointed my stomach and nostrils with two drops of it, it burnt my bowels, and I was forced to rub my self very well with a cloth, my nose swell'd and burnt. Had these two anointings been one some time after another, I had never ventur'd upon the second; but they were presently one after the other, which made the effect the greater.

5. The island is eighty leagues in length, and sixty in breadth; it is one of the best in the world, if not the best, the temperature incomparable; fields green all the year, the waters many and pleasant; it produces precious diamonds and rubies, and another rich stone they call cais-eye; it has the mines of gold and silver, crystal, and the best cinnamon in the world; abundance of rice, coco-nuts, fruit; the choicest elephants, to which those of other parts pay homage. Some few months before the

Dutch

Dutch had been a hunting of these creatures, they drove a hundred and fifty of them down towards the sea, sixty took into the places they had enclosed for them, where they were tam'd; they sell them to the Moors for three or four thousand ducats a-piece; there are ships that carry four and twenty of them: They are very good at sea, because they always bear up against the upper side, and being so heavy do much good, and are a stay to the motion of the ship.

6. Many Portugueses live in the Hollanders pay. At present they own how careful our king was of preserving that island: He was us'd to say in all his orders, Let all India be lost, so Ceylon be sav'd. He was in the right, for that island alone is worth more than all they had in the east. We were told there were above four hundred Portugueses at Candea, which is the king's court, and is in the middle of the island, with their wives and children, and maintain'd by the king; but they affirm he is jealous of them. He was at war with the Dutch. In the year 1669 the Dutch took the prince; eight days after they sent him to Jacatra, in order to be sent into Holland. Unhappy prince, what a disaster befel them!

7. All spice, as cinnamon, cloves, nutmegs, &c. are in the power of the Dutch; but the English and French deal in pepper, because it is to be had in many places. In Ceylon there are abundance of horses, cows, sheep, asses. The Portugueses said they had five thousand slaves only to work at their fortifications.

8. The principal places in that island are Nigumbo, Columbo, Gallo, Mature, Matature, Triquimal, and others of less note. Besides this, the Dutch are at present possess'd of Manor, all the kingdom of Negapatan, Jafanapatan, Java, Tutucori, Cocbin and Macaçar. They have abundance of factories in those eastern parts, the greatest of them are Peru, Queda, Vargueron, Vencclam, Pegu, Racon: Fifty in the kingdoms of Bengala, Vipelapatan, Cararga, Palacot, Clicaceli, Mabilapatan, Carcal, Napapatan, Calipiti, Caimal, Calature, Batacolor, Punta de Piedra, Caulon, Carneculom, Peria, Castel, Cangranor, Canonour, Bingorla; in all these places they have forts and garisons. Paliacate, Musulapatan, Golocondar, are only factories; Suratte, Congo, Bandarabassi a port in Persia, are also factories: So they have at Hispaan the court of Persia, Basora, Meca; Agra the Mogol's court, Borneo, Siam, Tunquin, Cocbinchina and Japan.

9. The English are at Congo, Suratte, Bombaim, which was part of queen Catherine's dowry, Carbat, Cape de Rama, and near Goa, Madraſtapatan. Here they have NAVA- a very fine fort, with a good garison, and RETTE. heavy cannon; Musulapatan, Madapalam, Velaſor, Ugali, Bantam. When I came a-way they quitted Siam, they lik'd not the country and trade: They have also footing in the island Hermoſa. The French begin French. to have a trade in India; they have factories at Suratte, Rogiapur near Cocbin, Musulapatan, Bengala, Siam and Batang. Not long ſince I was inform'd, that the fleet I met at the island of Madagaſcar had put into Ceylon, where they built a fort, with leave and permission of the king of the country; but the Dutch deſtroi'd it, took their men, ſhips, and other things. Afterwards underſtanding the wars were in Europe, they kept all they had taken, and the French remain'd priſoners. The other part of that fleet laid ſiege to the city S. Thomas, and took it, the infidels being unprovided. Afterwards a great power of infidels came down, and beſieg'd the French; what the event was I know not, but it ſeems impoſſible they ſhould maintain themſelves without a miracle. They have no proviſions but what the country muſt furniſh; and the Dutch will uſe all means, and preſs at Golocondar that they may be expell'd.

10. When the Dutch had taken Columbo, they ſent an embaſſador to the king of Candea. He ſuffer'd him not to depart his court in eleven years. By degrees he made an orchard and garden to his houſe, planted fruit-trees, and curiouſly adorn'd his habitation. The king gave him leave to return to Columbo, and he, that the natives might not enjoy the fruits of his labour and induſtry, cut down the trees, pull'd up the flowers, and ſpoil'd all. The king being told of it, was very much concern'd, and for a puniſhment order'd he ſhould ſtay there till the garden and orchard were in the ſame condition they had been before he had ſpoil'd them. He aſked of the Dutch a ſmall ſhip to ſee the ſhape and manner of thoſe uſed in Europe. They made a fine one lin'd with copper, and ſent him word it was all gold. He found it was not, reſented the fraud, and conceiv'd an ill opinion of thoſe people. What a folly it was to think he ſhould not diſtinguiſh betwixt gold and other metals! He left two kingdoms and retir'd into the heart of the island. Not long before his own people had aſſaulted him in his palace, deſigning to kill him, but he made his eſcape, and abſconded for a month. Then he return'd, found means to execute ſome great men, and put their wives to death, by which he ſecur'd himſelf. The Portugueſes told us thus much during the twelve days we ſtay'd in the port.

11. The Dutch judge aſk'd the captain of NAVARRETTE. of our ship, whether the pope had power to take away king Alfonso's wife, and give her to his brother prince Peter. The Portugueses had not one word to say, as he himself told me.

12. The coin that pass at Columbo was six-dollers, rupies, S. Thomas's, pagodes, pieces of eight, and a particular coin for the country like that they had at Malaca. I sent a sample of it to the governor of Manila, that he might see the metal and form it, in case he would coin any like it, which has been talk'd of many years, but is not yet begun. There is no comparison between the Philippine islands, and Malaca or Columbo, or others of the same stamp; and yet these have coin'd a current sort of money, which never goes out; and in the Philippine islands for these hundred years, they have had no coin, but the silver of new Spain. I have seen a memorial at Madrid, which treats of this subject.

13. Francis Caron a Dutchman took Nigumbo. He himself told me the manner of it, and said, the Portugueses might easily have hindred them landing, and then they could never have hurt them; but they scoffed at them, and cry'd, Let those drunkards land, and then we will treat them as they deserve (it is great folly and pride to despise an enemy) they landed, drew up, the fight began, and the Portugueses fled. The river of the fishery is near Nigumbo, the Dutch are masters of all. Our pilot being old and worn out, ask'd for a Dutch able pilot, who knew those seas at Columbo. He design'd if the weather would permit to put into Gallo, and lie there till September. There is a port, tho' none of the best, and plenty of provisions. We came near the mouth of the harbour, the wind was scant and we were to leeward, therefore we dropp'd two anchors. That night was one of the dismallest, that ever man had at sea. The ship was foul of the cables, the sea ran high, the motion was so violent that a man was safe in no place, there was not a bed or couch but broke, the lashers, boxes, chests, jars, and every thing was beaten to pieces. The worst was, that every time the sea beat against the ship, we imagin'd she would founder. It bore much, and at last began to leak so fast that the pumps could deliver the water.

14. Thus we continued till one of the clock next day. Good GOD, what falls and bangs we had! It pleas'd GOD we had leisure to weigh. We sail'd quite round the island with a stiff gale, and so to Jafanapatan. Opposite to New Port a Dunkirker came up with us, she put into that port, and we pass on. That day we discover'd S. Thomas's mount, and saluted the faint with five guns. On the second of May we anchor'd before Madraſtapatan. I had an extraordinary desire to be ashore. A Portuguese came aboard, and I got into the boat that brought him, so did others. Those are very odd boats, they have no nails or pigs, but the boards are sew'd together with ropes made of Coco outward shells; and tho' the infidels assur'd us they were safe, yet we could not but be in great fear. When they come towards the shore, they take the surges, which drive them up so that we step out of the boat upon the dry sand. Thousands of souls waited there to know the ship, and who came aboard it. I went immediately to the church of the French capuchins, who resided there, to give GOD thanks for having deliver'd us from the sea.

CHAP. XX.

My Stay at Madraſtapatan.

1. WHEN we came to this place, we found it besieg'd by the king of Golconda's army, but without his orders; their design was to extort something from the English, but they were disappointed. It is on the coast of Coromandel, half a league short of the city of S. Thomas, otherwise call'd Meliapor. Here the English have a noble fort; they have also other walls but small within which live all the Portugueses, who after the losing of Jafanapatan, Negapatan, and St. Thomas, went to seek places to dwell. The English receiv'd them, and they live under their protection and government. They stand the English in stead, for upon occasion they make use of them, as they did at this time, when all men took arms and guarded the walls. The enemy had stopp'd all the avenues, so that provisions grew scarce. There is neither port nor water, this last they get out of some small wells they have digged. Ships lie safe six months, then they go away till the fair weather comes again. The English allow a publick church, kept by two French capuchins; and tho' there are several clergymen, they all say mass there, with no small subordination and dissatisfaction: but the English who are masters there, favouring the religious men, they must have patience per force.

2. Two years before, there had been a great contest there betwixt two English governors, both of them would govern the place, and there was no reconciling of them. The Portugueses were divided, some favour'd the the one, and others the other. One got the better, and baniſh'd many of the Portugueſes that oppos'd him, together with the French Capuchins. Above a year after he gave them leave to return.

3. It is in about twelve or thirteen degrees of north latitude, and an excellent climate, any nice man may live there; the conveniency of buying clothes is great, all thoſe people living upon it. I took up in a little room the religious men gave me, there I ſtudy'd, and eat what an honeſt Portugueſe ſent me. Another maintain'd the religious men. There I found a Biſcainer, whoſe name was Dominick Lopez, an honeſt man in good repute, had a wife and two children, but was poor. He told me very great hardſhips he had endur'd among the Portugueſes. I advis'd him to ſend his ſons to Manila, what he did I know not. I alſo found a German who was a mighty mathematician, ingineer and good ſoldier; he did the Portugueſes good ſervice, but they requited him ill. Knowing who he was, and how well look'd upon, I propos'd to him to go away to Manila, where he might come to preferment with eaſe. He agreed to it, I writ to the governor about it, and directed him how to ſend his answer.

S. Thomas. 4. I went with him to S. Thomas, we were firſt in a church of Franciſcans, which they call our Lady of light; there was a religious man there poorer than I, he gave us to eat, and me his hat, becauſe I had none. I ſpoke with the governor of the biſhoprick, who told me he would go the next day to the mount. We ſpent that evening in a houſe of the jeſuits, but there was never a one in it. There we ſaw the fountain the holy apoſtle made between two rocks, and drank of it with much ſatisfaction; we alſo ſaw two croſſes cut in the hard rocks, the workmanſhip of the ſame ſaint. We went into the cave where we pray'd, it was very ſmall, they afterwards cut the rock and enlarg'd it. On one ſide there is a breach in the rock, which made a ſmall window. They recount for a certain truth, and receiv'd tradition, that when the infidels came to kill him, he would transform himſelf into a peacock, and get out that way.

5. In the way hither it is that happen'd to me which I have often told. A pair of little curious Cbineſe wallets ſlipt off the little horſe I rode on, and in them my breviary and ſome other little things; I did not obſerve it, but met two Moors with their ſpears, they ſaluted me, and went their way: ſoon after I heard loud calling out, which made me turn about to ſee what was the matter, and perceiv'd the Moors pointing with the ſpears to my wallets. I return'd, and made ſigns to them to reach it up to me, they would not touch it. I made ſigns NAVA- again that they would reach them me upon RETTE. the point of their ſpears. They underſtood me, and one of them taking it up with his ſpear gave it me. I thank'd them by ſigns, and went my way. What European would have done ſo much here, or there?

6. That evening we came to the mount, there are two little houſes at the foot of it uninhabited, beſides others gone to ruin. When the infidels took the city, they deſtroy'd all about it, but durſt not meddle with the apoſtles church, nor with that of our Lady of light I ſpoke of before. The aſcent of the mountain is ſteep and difficult, but well provided with ſeats and reſting-places at certain diſtances. On the top is a ſmall flat or plain, kept in good order, wall'd about breast-high, with good ſeats, and large trees to make a ſhade. In the middle is a curious little church, with a houſe for a prieſt and two ſervants. The proſpect all about the hill is incomparable, and extends as far as the ſight can reach. To lie that night, we went down from the mountain, and took up under a tree upon the bare ground. Our reſt laſted not long, for a violent ſhower came on, which oblig'd us to get into a little houſe, into which we felt our way, and fear'd to meet with ſome vermin. It ſecur'd us from the rain, but we had a troubleſome night of it, for we were engag'd with the knats which never ceas'd tormenting of us.

7. Next day we went up the mount again. The governor came, we ſaid maſs, I diſcover'd the holy croſs and picture of our bleſſed Lady. The holy croſs is exactly as hiſtorians deſcribe it, part of it is bloody, they ſay it is the apoſtles blood; I worſhip'd and touch'd my beads, and other that were brought me to it. Our Lady's picture is painted upon board, very beautiful, but the colours ſomewhat decay'd. There they ſaid, it had been found at the ſame time with the croſs, which is a mighty evidence againſt ancient and modern hereticks, who oppos'd pictures; we worſhip'd, and I touch'd the beads to it. The ſecond maſs being ended, the tabernacle in which thoſe great relics are kept, was cover'd and lock'd up. The good prieſt made much of us, we ſpent another night there upon the bricks. The bed not being very eaſy, we got a horſeback betimes in the morning; I went to ſay maſs at our Lady of light, there I ſtay'd till evening, being left with only my Cbineſe, and that holy religious man, for the German went home, carrying my horſe with him. We went to ſee the city of S. Thomas, the Moors would not let us in; from the gate we ſaw ſome good buildings, the walls are very fine. A gentleman that was with me lamented that

loſs

NAVA-lofs very much. The English are not so RETTE. strong at Madraſtapatan, yet they hold it and are like ſo to do. What ſignifie walls and bulwarks, where there is no government? I ſaw ſome curious temples of the natives, and wonderful large, deep, and wide ponds, with artificial iſlands in the middle curiouſly contriv'd. I walk'd homely along thoſe habitations of infidels, obſerving what was worthy of it. This was the twenty firſt of June, and on the twenty fourth I was to travel by land.

8. But before I ſet out it is requiſite to obſerve ſome things and to know them, not to follow, but reject them. The inhabitants of the city of S. Thomas came to be very rich, and conſequently grew very proud. It is generally reported of one woman that ſhe grew to that height of vanity, that when ſhe went to church attended by many women-ſlaves, one went before with a cenſor perfuming her with burnt-ſweets. Can any madneſs be greater? She had, ſay they, ſo many S. Thomas's, (they are crown-pieces with the effigies of the apoſtle) that ſhe meaſur'd them by the peck. What follows is worſe; many told me, (would to GOD it were a lie, and I had not heard it) that catholic men were pimps to catholic women, with Mabometans and Gentiles. F. de Angelis will do well to note this; A beautiful and honeſt maid was forc'd out of her father's houſe, and deliver'd to a Mabometan. The king of Golconda has a concubine to this day, the daughter of a Portugueſe. At a proceſſion of the holy week in the city of S. Thomas, they drew their ſwords one againſt another; a ſpecial proceſſion and good example! It was common to permit the infidels to make proceſſions within the walls, and ſo it was to be godfathers at chriſtnings, and fathers at weddings; in heretick churches along that coaſt. At Travancor one Portugueſe kill'd another cloſe by the altar, as maſs was ſaying by F. Michael John, who had then conſecrated, and whom I viſited, ſaw and diſcouſ'd with at Madraſtapatan.

9. The Capuchins are not belov'd by the Portugueſes, one of them holds ſome odd opinions. One is, that the apoſtle S. Thomas did not feel our Saviour's wounds, and therefore he does not paint him as we do, but with his hands join'd. I had never heard of any ſuch opinion before. We have in our office an Antiphon to this ſaint, in which are theſe words: O Thomas, qui meruiſti Chriſtum tangere, &c. S. Gregory in his homily upon this ſaint particularly mentions it. I had a mind afterwards to be ſatisfy'd as to this point. I look'd into Cornelius à Lapide, who propoſes the doubt; and tho' he quotes two or three authors for the negative, yet he proves the affirmative by the common conſent of ſaints and doctors. Tirino does the ſame. Read Sylveira tom. 5. lib. IX. cap. 5. num. 31. where he mentions the holy doctors and others. Is not this enough to make a man follow the opinion, if it were only for quietneſs ſake? Neither would he admit of carv'd images in the church. I fancy'd perhaps they might not be us'd in France, but was convinced they were.

10. There was a great and ſcandalous contention about who ſhould be governor of that diocēſ, two competitors ſtrove for it. Silva was one of them, and Diaz of Canara the other. The latter was at Trangamba, the firſt near S. Thomas, and is the ſame that went with me to the mountain, when I viſited that holy place, F. Peſoa favour'd him; and the Franciſcan, Auguſtinian, and Dominican fathers having ſpoke for the other at Goa, Peſoa ſaid, they were all ignorant fellows. Peſoa went away to Madraſta, and affirm'd that Silva was legally excommunicated by F. Diaz, who was the lawful governor. Notwithſtanding all this the next day he admitted him to ſay maſs in his church. Peſoa's companion ſided with Diaz. He writ a large paper in defence of Diaz, and his opinion, and challeng'd the French Capuchins, who ſtood for Silva, to diſpute that point with them, appointing the English preacher judge betwixt them. Was ever the like heard of among the barbarous blacks?

11. Diaz took the ſhort cut, and had recourſe to the Mabometan king of Golconda to uſe force; he ſent his officers, who carry'd away with them F. Sylva, two jeſuits, and above forty Portugueſes men and women priſoners. They were brought before the king, who bid them chuſe one of the two in his preſence, and obey him. They did not agree, were caſt into priſon, where one Portugueſe kill'd another; they gave very ill example, one jeſuit was expell'd the ſociety, ſome men and women dy'd of the fatigue of the journey. F. Ephrem a Capuchin aſſur'd me that above fourſcore had been foreſworn upon the evangelists in that quarrel.

12. Diaz afterwards betook himſelf to the English governor of Madraſta, and ſought his protection. He ſolicited the aſſiſtance of a Mabometan and a Heretick. The diſpute is ſtill afoot. I left two governors, I know not whether either of them is dead, this is the only way of adjusting that difference.

13. It is a ſad thing to ſee the Portugueſe nation; formerly ſo famous, and dreadful in thoſe parts, now ſo oppreſs'd and trampled on by thoſe people.

14. F. Silva, the day we were at S. Thomas his mount, told me ſome paſſages that had had happen'd at Goa, concerning some wills made there; but many things were said, which are not prov'd, we must not believe all things.

Madraſta. 15. At Madraſta I ſpoke with the Mala-bar maſter the Capuchins had at their church to inſtruct the natives. Inquiring into ſome particulars, I found that nation owns five elements, fire, earth, water, air, and wind. They adore the ſun, moon and ſtars (tho' Mabometaniſm is introduced there, yet moſt of the natives ſtick to their paganism) they have a great reverence for cows. They ſay, a certain god took fleſh upon him in one of them, and that they are that god's horſes. The greateſt oath kings ſwear, is by a cow, and they never break it. They kill no creature, undervalue thoſe that eat them, and deſpiſe thoſe of their country NAVA-RETTE. that become Chriſtians. The greateſt reproach they caſt upon a Chriſtian, is to tell him, he eats beef. When they are near death, they endeavour to have a cow near at hand, and they clap her fundament as near as they can to the dying perſon's mouth, that as he breathes out his ſoul at his mouth it may go in at the cow's back-door. They honour the lion, ſaying, another god rides on him; and they pay a reſpect to deer, dogs, mice and kites. Many days they will not break their faſt till they have ſeen a kite. When they yawn they call the dog, ſnapping their fingers, which is calling of the god that rides upon the dog, who has power to hinder the devil from entering the body when the mouth opens.

CHAP. XXI.

My Journey to Golconda.

1. WHEN we arriv'd at Madraſta-patan, our pilot ſaid he would make a voyage to Tenaſeri, or ſome other place, to make amends for the great expence he had been at; his reſolution was diſlik'd. For this reaſon, and to avoid the ſea which had quite tir'd me, I reſolv'd to go to Goa by land: They gave me ſuch a deſcription of the road, that it would have put any man into the mind of ſeeing it, tho' he had never ſo little mind to travel. I fold ſome rags at a poor rate, left ſome books and papers with my friends, borrow'd eight pieces of eight to be paid in Goa. I went to the Engliſh governor, rather to beg an alms, than to take my leave; told him my want and deſign, he immediately with much courteſy gave me five pagodes of gold, which amount to little leſs than ten pieces of eight. A native of Canara gave me two, ſo I thought I had enough for my journey. The day before I ſet out, I took more notice than I had done before of the practice of the European factors in thoſe parts; they are all ſerv'd by the natives, who are moſt faithful, ſubmiſſive, and punctual in doing what they are commanded. Some factors have above a hundred ſervants; they are very chargeable, every one has a piece of eight and a half, or two pieces of eight wages a month; all theſe come together in the evening to bid good night to the factor, governor, or commander, and take their leave to go to their own homes to bed. They rank themſelves over againſt the fort; ſome have lighted torches in their hands, others beat kettle-drums, others ſound trumpets, others play on fifes, the reſt beat their ſpears and bucklers together for above a quarter of an hour. After this a great lanthorn was put out on the top of the governor's palace; he appear'd at a balcony, they all made him a low bow, and there was an end of the ceremony, which indeed was pleaſant enough to ſee. Thoſe gentlemen take great ſtate upon them, I thought it too much.

2. I bought a horſe to carry me my journey for eight pieces of eight, for four I hir'd an ox to carry my Chineſe, and a Gentile who ſpoke a little Portugueſe. A poor Portugueſe went along with me to add to my charge. On Midſummer-day at three in the afternoon we ſet out of Madraſta. During this journey, which held me twenty four days, God be praiſed nothing happen'd amiſs. The lodging houſes, which they call chauril, were not all alike, but all open alike, without any door free to all the world: Nevertheless we always lay quiet and ſafe, and ſometimes in great towns, without being moleſted by any body in the leaſt, which would be rare among Chriſtians. The Portugueſes had a ſmall leather-bottle Leather-bottle. for water; they are made at Golconda, they would be of no leſs value in our part than in thoſe hot regions. When the water had been an hour in it, tho' the weather were never ſo hot, it became ſo cool, I daily admir'd it anew, and in two or three hours it was very cold; thus we never wanted good drink all the way: I afterwards bought one, which laſted me a long time, and was well worth my money; at Suratte I gave it to an Indian of Manila: they would ſave a great expence of ice in Europe. Our food was not good, for there was nothing but milk, whey, curds and onions; but abundance of theſe things, as well in towns as on mountains, on which there is abundance of cattle. When we ſaw a cottage, at the leaſt call out came the ſhepherds

NAVA- herds with a pot of milk, four of us drank RETTE. our belly full for a halfpenny.

3. A very remarkable passage befel me with the gentile, who was owner of the ox: He carry'd his pot to dress his meat (so they do all) wrap'd in cloths, and put into a sack: My man touch'd it over the sack, the heathen saw it, and came to me in a rage, complaining that his pot was defil'd, and there was no pacifying of him. At last he pull'd the pot out of the sack, and with wonderful rage dash'd it against the stones, I was forced to buy him another. I said enough to have convinc'd a stock, but those people are harder than steel in the observation of their barbarous customs. There are three ranks or degrees of people in that country: The banianes are the nobility and gentry, they are great fasters, and abstain from flesh all their life-time: Their ordinary food is rice, four curds, herbs, and the like. Others are call'd parianes, these neither eat nor drink any thing that another has touch'd, nor out of a vessel that another has touch'd, tho' there be many clothes over it. My heathen ox-driver was one of these, he would never eat any thing from my hand, nor drink out of any vessel of mine; he broke the pot because it had been touch'd. Among these parianes, there is one sort who are look'd upon by the rest as base and vile people. These on the roads, when they see one of the others, step aside and give them the way: In towns they come not to any body's door but their equals; in the streets as soon as ever they see a man that is not of their own rank, they run or hide themselves. They are despis'd and hated by all men, and look'd upon as leprous and contagious persons. I heard say, they had been formerly the noblest people in that country, and that for a piece of treachery they committed they were so cast down; in so much that the others will not admit of them as servants or slaves; and if it were made out that one of them had been within the house of one of the others, he would immediately pull down the whole structure. They are the most miserable people in the world; the greatest affront is to call them Parian, which is worse than among us dog, and base slave.

4. It is wonderful what numbers of great and small cattel we met with in the fields; I saw two species of sheep and goats, some like those of Spain, others much bigger. There are also of those sheep which are in many other parts, and we usually say have five quarters. The goats are vastly taller than ours; the she's had at their throat two little dugs longer than their ears. As the Egyptians kept ewes and cows for their milk and wool; so do these people for the same reason. A Lapide, in 47 Gen. v. 17.

5. There are infinite groves of wild palm-trees. At Manila they are not minded, and here they are the greatest riches of the earth: They draw from them a great deal of the liquor I said was call'd Tuba at Manila, which yields them good profit. They also produce a sort of fruit which I saw not in any other place, and is like snow, the coolest thing in the world. It is wonderful to see what woods there are of tamarine-trees, we often travel'd a considerable way under their shade. I gather'd the berries as I rode, and eat them with a gust. Near them we often found stately ponds all of stone; when it rains they fill up to the top and that water lasts all the dry season; there travellers stopt, rest, drink, and water their beasts. They told me they were the work of great and rich heathens, who being mov'd to compassion seeing there was no water for travellers in several places, had caus'd those ponds to be made to supply this defect and want.

6. The tamarine trees are planted very regularly; the natives make use of their shade to weave their webs in it, sheltered from the sun. Their houses are little and dark, they cannot see in them to weave so fine, nor is there room for the looms, therefore they have provided that shade for this purpose. They make much use of the fruit in dressing their diet.

7. We also saw stately and antient temples, and wonderful mosques of the Mabometans. The further we travel'd the greater towns we met with; in some of them there was a mighty concourse of passengers, horses, elephants, and abundance of camels, which in that country carry all burdens. The Mabometans travel with great state; the governors of large towns had royal attendance: They were always very civil to me, I had occasion to speak to one of them; I took off my hat, he would not hear a word till I was cover'd and sat down by him. In some places I met Persians and Armenians, fine men, graceful, tall, well-shap'd, very courteous, they have the best horses in the world.

8. About the middle of July, near a town, we found a little brook so clear and cool we were surpriz'd at it; I guess'd the spring was near; we drank unmercifully, and our diet being slender it did us harm, but me particularly; we were forc'd to stay a day there. Next day a scorpion stung the Portuguese I really thought he would have dy'd, and this somewhat retarded our journey. We came to a river so wide and deep, that the horse who was but small, could not carry me over: It was some hardship, for we waded with the water up to our our breasts; the current was rapid, the Portuguese a poor heartless man began to cry out, the water carry'd him away; and it was so; we had all enough to do to bring him off. After this we pass'd another not so deep; for more safety I deliver'd the papers and letters I had to my man, charging him to be very careful: No sooner was he in the river, but he fell, and left all he carry'd in the water. I was much concern'd at this misfortune; to remedy it in some measure, I laid all the papers in the sun, and some Chinese books, which being of extraordinary fine paper suffer'd the more; in this place we spent some hours. To mend the matter we came afterwards to a lake, the Gentile was positive we must cross it to shorten the way; I was so unlucky that my horse fell, and I too, with my wallets that carry'd the papers; I gave all for lost, tho' with some trouble and loss of time all was reasonably retriev'd.

9. By the way we met a Pagan youth of a good presence; the horse he rode on was very fine, his attendance numerous; he was going to court to be marry'd, and had with him for state a mighty elephant, well adorn'd with clothes and bells. This was the second I had seen till that time; when we stop'd, I drew near to take a full view of him; This I did particularly one afternoon; as soon as I came near him, his governor spoke one word to him which I did not understand; but the consequence shew'd what he had said, for he presently fac'd me, and made a profound reverence, bowing all his four feet at once; I saw them give him meat and drink. It happen'd a native, without reflecting on it, was going to pass before him; as he came up the elephant stretch'd out his trunk, and gently gave him a blow on the forehead, which sounded like a good cuff on the ear. The man's colour chang'd, and he stagger'd backward a good way as if he had been besides himself. Our laughing brought him to himself, and he kept off from the mountain of flesh. I fancy'd the elephant thought it unmannerly to go by so near him, and therefore he friendly warn'd the man to look before he leap'd. I was much astonish'd at what I had seen.

10. After this we came to a mighty river, the boat was lost the day before, for they had swam an elephant over, ty'd to the boat; and he growing angry, carry'd the boat down the river; then he got to the shore, broke the rope, and ran about the fields; his driver went to catch him, but the elephant being still in a fury, took hold of him with his trunk, cast him up into the air, of which he died. There are two other ferries there, and the comicallest that can be imagin'd; they were round wicker baskets, cover'd without with cow's hides; we hired one, put in all our baggage, more people came up, and fourteen passengers of us went into it; the horse and ox swam, we holding by the halters; we struck afloat over, and sail'd a quarter of a league whilst one might say the creed three or four times. The current was violent, we all quak'd for fear, and were cram'd together without the least motion. We landed, I paid our passage, the owner took his basket out of the water, and clapping it on his head, walk'd up the river to carry over to the town others that waited for him.

11. Four leagues short of the court we stop'd at a great town which they call the Queens's Palace. The mother or grandmother of the king then reigning had built that sumptuous palace, from which the town took its name. We could not go in, but the front and all we could see of it might vie with the best in Europe: Before it is a square not inferior to any in Spain. We went to a most beautiful and spacious court almost square; in the midst of which was a stone mosque well built, with a porch before it. The court is like a cloister, arch'd all round except where the gates interrupt it. At every six foot distance there are stone arches, and in the hollow of the six foot there is a fine cell within vaulted like the rest, and all white as snow. I counted a hundred and eighteen cells in all, well contriv'd, and curious and exact windows and doors. The floor was very hard plaster; those rooms were for the king's followers, when they came thither to divert themselves. The square was in the same nature, but had a storey above which the court had not.

12. In one corner there was a door which led to a large and deep pond cut out of the said rock, with stairs cut in the same stone to go down for water, all we passengers drank that water; I don't doubt but what we saw cost many millions. I would have seen the mosque, but as I was going in a Moor came out, who would have thrown me down the stairs and said nothing, but desisted. Before I came to this town, and from thence to court, I took notice of another thing of which the Portuguese had given me a hint, and was, that I saw several parcels of horses, mules and asses, loaded with the tuba of the palm-trees I have mention'd, all running as fast as they could; and the drivers, who strain'd their hearts, with their lashes took care the beasts should not stop a moment. This they do that the liquor may come sweet before it sours; abundance of it is consum'd at court, especially

RETTE. of it. The drink is very pleasant, it would take more at Madrid than mead or sherbet.
Those people say the king's greatest revenue comes out of it.

13. To save time and charges we did not go through a great gate of the court, all that come in through these gates, wait for leave from some great men, have all they carry search'd and pay duties. I was not concern'd for the search, though something must be always given. We went almost two leagues about, which was a great trouble; nevertheless we pass three custom-houses, but they said not a word to us. Being come to the fourth, they talk'd big to us, but were satisfied with a few pence. Half a league further we came to the place where they sold horses, there was a pleasant grove, divided by four large and spacious walks, in which were abundance of people, and very fine horses, which they rode about to shew them. Then we pass a river, and saw a multitude of people on the bank; we drew near, and it prov'd to be the funeral of a young woman, who lay barefac'd on the bier, very well set out and adorn'd with flowers; next to the corps were musicians and dancers. There was one (perhaps the husband) whose body was dy'd of several colours, and he skip'd and made a thousand motions. Other ancients wept when a child was born, and rejoic'd at its death, so did those we saw. At last we came to a little church, where one Martinez a Portuguese priest resided; he receiv'd me with all possible kindness, and great tokens of affection. There I rested a little, but not so much as I had need.

CHAP. XXII.

My Stay at Golconda, and Journey to Musulapatan.

1. I Was inform'd there was in those parts one D. Felix Enriquez, a native of Madrid, whom I had been acquainted with in the apothecary's shop of S. Paul at Valladolid, tho' I could not call to mind his name. He was physician and surgeon to the king's army there. I presently sent him a note, his answer was very civil, next day I went to his house. It is a long league from the city to the forts, where the king is always close for fear of his subjects, as I was told. The road, besides its being very plain and broad, was so full of people, that there were scarce more in the cities of China, all of them clad as white as snow, most afoot, several in half coaches, half carts, drawn by oxen, and well cover'd, and many on mules; some Persians and Moors excellently mounted, and well attended. Some great men were carry'd in rich and sightly palanquines; instead of umbrellas they use large shields gilt and painted of several colours, the servants carry them on their arms, and lifting them up defend their masters from the sun. They carry plumes of peacocks feathers with the quills stuck in silver, which serve to drive the flies away, they are properly fans. All the European captains and factors in those countries make the same use of those feathers. It all look'd to me like court-grandeur. There were about that place abundance of great and lesser elephants, I was much diverted with the sight of them, and admir'd their motion; I rode upon a good horse, and had much ado to keep up with their walk.

Elephants.

2. I took notice that there was abundance of people on the one side of the way, and that more continually flock'd to them. I ask'd the black that went with me, what it meant? He answer'd, Father, the saints of this country are there. I drew near, and saw they were men quite naked, as if they had liv'd in the state of innocence; perhaps they were Adamites. Their habitations were on certain mountains, whence the men came down at certain times to beg alms. They walk'd among the people stark naked, like brute beasts. When I return'd to the church I saw them again, and women looking at them very devoutly. Presently I discover'd a sumptuous palace, and beautiful towers and pinnacles all cover'd with lead. The palace of Segovia is not more beautiful, I admir'd nothing so much in that country, methought I was looking upon Madrid. I came up to the great fort where the king's apartment is; I went not in, but it had a fine outside, and look'd great, the walls were strong and stor'd with cannon, the situation high, the ditches wide and deep. They told me the king had nine hundred concubines within there, and among them the Portuguese woman of S. Thomas I mention'd above. Next I met some *Portuguese*s who expected me, many of them serv'd in that king's army for bread. They carry'd me to D. Felix's house, which was very little, low, and inconvenient, like the rest of the commonalty. He receiv'd me very lovingly and truly, I knew him again, tho' I had not seen him in twenty four years, he had a good mark to be known by. He gave me an account of part of his life, had been in Ceylon physician to the Dutch, marry'd there, left his wife at Colambo, and went over to Madraſtapatan, was there phyſician to the Engliſh, and then went to Golconda, where he received the king's pay, twenty pieces of eight a month, beſides what he made of his ſalves. Hard by was a mighty army commanded by the great Nababo, (that is as much as the great duke of that kingdom) he was an eunuch and man of great parts, he govern'd all; the king kept in his Mabomet's paradise among women, muſick, dancing, and other ſports, all unbecoming the duty of a king. It is a ſhameful thing, ſays S. Thomas de Erudit. Princ. lib. I. cap. 10. that he who is lord over others, ſhould be a ſlave to his ſenſes. And talking of muſick, he tells how Antigonus maſter or preceptor to Alexander the great broke his lute, and ſaid, He that is of age to reign, may be aſham'd to be ſubject to theſe paſſions. The ſaint has much very good to this purpoſe. The king of Golconda lives in worldly pleaſures and paſſimes, without the leaſt regard to the government, having committed the whole charge of it to the great Nababo; what can this king expect, but what Job ſays, cap. xxi. They take the timbrel and harp, and rejoice at the ſound of the organ: They ſpend their days in wealth, and in a moment go down to hell? The moment that puts an end to their pleaſures, begins their eternal torments. What an unhappy and wretched caſe! The ſame will befall all that follow ſuch a courſe. There cannot be a double glory, that of the life to come is not the conſequence of the worldly. The words of Tertullian are common: After gall the honey-comb. - CHRIST taſted not the ſweetneſs of honey till he had gone thro' the bitterneſs of his paſſion. What can be the conſequence of dancing, muſick, plays, feaſting, and the pleaſures of this life, but the neglect of one's duty, forgetfulneſs of one's ſoul, and future calamities? The Cbi-neſe is much more vigilant and careful of the government, and if he forgets himſelf, they mind and reprove him, as appears in the ſecond book. Two years before this one of the Nababo's teeth dropt out, he ſent it with ſix thouſand ducats to Mecca an offering to Mabomet's rotten bones. At this time another dropt out, and it was reported he would ſend it with ſix thouſand more. He order'd a temple to be built, which I ſaw, but it was not yet finiſh'd, becauſe they ſaid he had dream'd he ſhould die when the building was finiſh'd, ſo he order'd the work to ceaſe. He was then ninety years of age, pay'd the ſoldiers punctually, and gave the Persians great wages. In that country there is abundance of very fine ſilver, and they ſay abundance of rich diamonds, I was aſſur'd the Mabometans gave above fifty thouſand ducats for ſome.

went

3. I diſcourſed D. Felix about my journey to Goa, he repreſented it very eaſy; RETTE. others objected difficulties, and no doubt but there were enough, eſpecially in going from one kingdom to another. Next day I ſaid maſs in a chapel the Portugueſe ſoldiers and ſome mungrels and blacks had there. They gave me to underſtand it would pleaſe them I ſhould ſtay there three months, till it were time to go away to Goa, and they offer'd to aſſiſt me according to their power, which was ſmall. I had certainly ſtay'd there, had not what I ſhall write preſently happen'd and I believe it had gone but ill with me. I went that afternoon to ſee the Dutch factor, for whom I had a letter. I went on D. Felix his horſe, which was better than mine. I again obſerv'd what I had ſeen before, and again was aſtoniſh'd at the multitude and diverſity of people. I croſs'd all the capital city, which is very large, and in it at ſmall diſtances excellent buildings, and innumerable multitudes of people. The great ſquare was very beautiful; the royal palace, an admirable ſtructure, fills one ſide of it. They ſhew'd me a glaz'd balcony, and told me the king ſometimes ſhew'd himſelf there to his ſubjects. It was a long time before I came to the Dutch factory. Thoſe men had a fine palace there, and richly furniſh'd. The factor was a mungrel begot on a Japoneſe woman, and ſhew'd it in his carriage. We diſcourſ'd a while with a great deal of coldneſs on his ſide; the European Hollanders did not ſerve me ſo, and this appear'd preſently, for within half an hour another Dutchman came out of a room who was infinitely obliging; he gave me cha of China to drink, and ſome of the wine they made there, he courteouſly ſhew'd me the orchards, gardens, and a ſtately bath. There I was inform'd of the great modeſty and reſervedneſs of the women of that country, not much inferior to that of China, as they told me. A great ſhame for European Chriſtian women.

4. When I took my leave he aſk'd me, Whether I had viſited the French that were in that city? I aſwer'd I had not, nor thought of it, becauſe I knew none of them, nor had any buſineſs with them. He earneſtly deſir'd me to viſit them, I did all I could to excuſe my ſelf, but ſtill he urg'd it. I to avoid that viſit, wherein my happineſs then conſiſted, ſaid, Sir, I neither know their houſe, nor have I any body to conduct me to it. I'll ſend a ſervant of mine, ſaid he, to wait upon the father, and ſhew him the houſe. There was no withſtanding it any longer, I went thither directly, they receiv'd me with ſingular kindneſs and affection; brought out fruits of Persia, dates, almonds, raiſins, NAVARETTE. They treated me well, I thank'd them, and took leave. They would not suffer me to be gone presently, so we held on our discourse. The director spoke good Spanisht, he had been several times at Cadix, and carry'd millions of pieces of eight from thence into France, and told me how he dealt with our ships and ashore. It is a shame to see how many officers manage the king's business. He freely offer'd me passage in his ship as far as Suratte, and thence into Europe, with all the accommodation his people could afford me. I went back to lie at the church, and he sent me in his palanquine with twenty four servants to attend me. Perceiving how difficult a matter it was to go to Goa, and that the difficulty every day increased, because a rebel whose name was Subagi rang'd those countries with a powerful army; I made those gentlemen a second visit, and finding a fit opportunity accepted of the favour they offer'd me. They assur'd me they had orders from their king to be assisting to the missionaries, and that they went to India for that purpose. There is no doubt but the end is very good and holy.

Subagi.

5. We left the royal city on the 28th of July, there went twenty two carts loaden with goods and necessaries for the journey, six officers of the company a horseback, four stately Persian led horses with rich furniture: One of them dy'd by the way, that had cost five hundred pieces of eight: Four colours, four trumpets, four waits, two kettle-drums, sixty servants, and five palanquines, with five or six men to carry each of them, it was a train for a king. We cross'd a wide but shallow river, there were a great many elephants washing in it. We observ'd with how much ease those mountains of flesh tumbled in the water, and started up again. All the carts were covered with oil'd cloths, so that not a drop of rain-water came through. The palanquines had the same covering. There is no such easy way of travelling in the world. We pass'd through the middle of the royal city with all that noise, attendance and musick, and went to lie at a stately orchard. Half a league of the way was among fine trees, the rest of the way very plain and easy. We came to a noble stone-palace, which had beautiful halls, rooms, and balconies, and much ornament in several curious riches, with several figures of plaister and stone. The orchard was vastly big, full of abundance of fruit-trees and innumerable oranges and limons. The walks were wide and very clean, with ponds at distances, and water-works continually playing; it appear'd to me a place fit for any prince. Two days we stay'd there, and spent the time in observing, at leisure, what I have writ in short.

6. My company carry'd good provision and plenty, which made the way easy to me, and made amends for the want I endur'd in my journey to the royal city, whence we now came. One morning we came to a place, where there was the liquor of palms I spoke of in the last chapter; we drank to our hearts content, it was as cold as ice, and sweeter than honey; it did us much good, for it purg'd us to the purpose. We pass'd over a mighty river with some trouble but on the further side found the best olives in the world, for a penny a pound. It is incredible what quantities of delicate painted and plain calicoes there were in every town, they came out to the roads to offer and press us to buy.

7. In every town we found women that play'd on musick and danced. There are certain women there, who alone can follow this trade, for which they pay a duty to the king. When any guests of note come, they presently repair to their house, make their obeisance, and immediately some begin to dance, and others to play. They were well dress'd, and had gold and silver enough about them, spent two or three hours in this exercise, were well paid, and went their ways. I was seldom present at these entertainments, but indeed they were worth seeing and hearing.

8. It was also very common to meet with many tumblers that shew'd tricks of activity; they have no settled place of abode, but ramble up and down like gypsies. Sometimes we met them under the trees in the field, sometimes near towns in the barracks made of wicker, which they always carry about with them. As soon as they see any likely people, they make to them, and offer to shew their activity; then they set up their sticks and canes, and play wonderful tricks. Both the men and women would certainly be much admir'd in Europe. Two women, one old and the other young, did such things in a town, as amaz'd us all. One man besides many strange tricks, took a stone betwixt his teeth; his companions threw others up, which he catch'd in his mouth without ever missing a jot; afterwards he lay'd it upon one eye, and on it receiv'd the others that fell from above, and never miss'd in all the time. Another thing astonish'd us yet more, and we thought the devil had a hand in it, he ty'd a stone of about a quarter of a hundred weight to a stick which had another cross it; he alone laying hold of the stick with one hand held up the stone in the air, and kept it without the least motion; then he put together eight or ten men, and gave them the stick to hold as he had done, and they

they could never bear it up tho' they put all their strength to it, but the stone bore them all down. We could never find out what art that black us'd to do that which we saw with our eyes.

9. There are another sort of men, who make a trade of carrying about snakes that dance; they are ridiculously dress'd, wear feathers on their heads, and little bells about their body, all naked but their privy-parts, and daub'd with several colours. They carry a little trumpet in their hand, and two baskets cover'd on their shoulders full of hideous snakes; they go where they are call'd, open their baskets, and as the trumpet sounds the snakes rise, using several motions with their bodies and heads; sometimes they cling to their master's arm, or thigh, and set their teeth in it. I saw one of them whose body was all over as if it had been pink'd by the snakes. A strange way of getting their living! At first it was dreadful to me to see that dancing. They give them a half-penny or a penny, the snakes return to their baskets, and away they go. I observ'd several times, that as soon as they catch'd and laid them in the basket, they roll'd themselves up and remain'd immoveable; and tho' they open'd the basket, they never stir'd without the trumpet sound-ed. Some were thicker than a man's wrist, they say those that carry'd them were a-nointed with the juice of several herbs, so that tho' they bit they could do them no harm. There are others who have dancing cows, and get their living by them.

10. One night we lay in an idol-temple, one of the beautifullest in the world; it had jasper-stone and marble, as curiously NAVAWROUGHT as any in Italy, and three chapels RETTE. dedicated to three gods. There were in it some cows cut in stone as black as jet, and as lively as possible. The priest came to us, and we discours'd him with the help of some servants of the French company, who spoke several languages. He gave a very bad account of the origin of those three gods, made them all men, and said they came thither upon the waters of the sea from very far countries, and had produced the world. We objecting, how it could be made out that they had produced the world when there was before them a sea, and other countries from whence they came thither; He answer'd, It was so written in their books. Speaking of the parents of his gods, he asserted they were of other countries: and we answering, Then there were men before those gods; he laugh'd and said, I say nothing but what is in this book. Two leagues short of Mufulapatan we found a great many Frenchmen in a noble orchard, expecting their director and companions. There was musick, dancing, and a plentiful entertainment. That afternoon we went into the city, it was the eighth of August, past over a wooden-bridge, little less than half a league in length, a wonderful crowd of people came out to see us. English, Dutch, Persians, Armenians, Portugueses, Mungrels, Mabometans, Gentiles, Blacks and natives, were all spectators. The factory was a stately large house, the people many in number. There was a great confusion that night, however we had some rest.

CHAP. XXIII.

My Stay at Mufulapatan.

1. THE city of Mufulapatan is famous all along the coast of Coromandel, it is seated sixty leagues north of Madrastra, a very populous place, and of great trade. The English and Dutch, and at present the French have considerable factories there. Some years ago besides these the Danes had one too. Some Portugueses, Mungrels and Blacks, who are catholicks, live there, and have a little church where there was a father of the order of S. Augustin. Some English and Dutch, who have discharg'd themselves from their companies, have settled there, and live with their families. The climate is very bad and unhealthy. They said, the heat from August till April was intolerable. All that country abounds in wheat, rice, sheep, hens, geese, fish, and fruit, all at reasonable rates. I stay'd with my Chinese in the French factory, where I said mass to them every day, and din'd and sup'd at their table; they treated me in health and a small sickness I had, with extraordinary kindness, love, and affection. Afterwards some Frenchmen fell sick; and I assisted them with a great deal of care and good will. The ship that was to sail for Surat lay six leagues lower at Rospor, it was to be sheath'd, and they had not yet began to work upon it, which troubled me extremely, and I repented my leaving the Portuguese ship, which I was inform'd was bound for Goa.

2. There were in the factory abundance of monkeys, which serv'd to divert us; sometimes they would be as furious as lions, sometimes they play'd, and did a thousand tricks. After dinner they commonly carry'd them to a large pond in the middle of a great court. It was pleasant to see what pranks they play'd there, they swam just like men, and would leap D d d d into

NAVA- into the water, dive and come up again RETTE. exactly like them. They had also a little deer, which a servant fed with milk, he once amaz'd us all. The servant came into the court, the deer saw, and immediately went to him; it was beyond all belief how he made much of and caref'd him; he would leap up on both sides, lick his hands and feet, and put his nose to the man's face, all tokens of gratitude for the kindness he receiv'd from him. Good GOD, how even wild and savage beasts teach us gratitude! F. Mascarenbas the Augustinian kept the feast of the nativity of our Lady and the Octave, and it was perform'd with all imaginable solemnity; all the catholicks resorted to it, and I gave a sermon.
 About that time arriv'd ships loaded with elephants. One Mabometan merchant alone brought thirty in one ship, which is a mighty stock; they carry them up the country, where they sell them at great rates, and get much by them.

3. There were two directors in the factory; one whose name was Macara, an Armenian, had been at Rome, Florence and Paris. This man procur'd the settling the factory at Golconda, under the same privileges the Dutch and English enjoy'd; He was a catholick, and had a son and nephew both catholicks. The other was a Frenchman of the territory of Roan, his name Francis Gouxon; he had orders from the director general residing at Suratte, to apprehend Macara, on account of expences he had made. He being a stranger, and those who had been his friends become his enemies, because he knew not how to preserve their friendship; every body was against him, which he was sensible of, and therefore was jealous, and fearful of what happen'd. He might have prevented it by staying at Golconda among his country-men and Mabometans of note, who had a kindnefs for him. I told him so afterwards, he was sensible of his error and all his repentance could not mend it. In short upon S. Mai-thew's day, after baptizing a godson of his with great solemnity, they seiz'd him with a great deal of noise, and seiz'd his son. Macara's servants fled, and gave an account of what had happen'd to the Moorish governor of the city. The French immediately sent advice to the captain of their ship to be upon his guard, and it stood them in good stead, for without it the ship had fallen into the governor's hands. Next day he sent three hundred men commanded by the supreme civil magistrate to beset the factory, hinder any provisions from being carry'd in, and by that oblige them to set Macara at liberty.
 The French took up arms, which was a rashness in a strange country, where they had no force, nor so much as a ship in the harbour. They fell to blows; a handsome young Frenchman, and good Christian, was kill'd, and another much wounded.

 Of the infidels four or five were slain, and several wounded; this made a great uproar.
 The governor seeing the fury and resolution of the French, caus'd his men to draw off, and sent to acquaint his king with what had happen'd; the French sent too. Whilst the answer came back, they arm'd themselves very well, and provided fire arms, which the English and some other friends lent them underhand. The governor was for composing the matter, and would have them send some persons of note to his house, or me. The French were afraid to trust him. As for me, they an-swer'd I was a Spaniard, and no way con-cern'd nor understood that affair. It was fear'd they might attack us in the night, and fire the house. I was not a little concern'd for it, but much more to see my voyage, which I was so eager upon, obstructed.

4. The director was indispos'd, these troubles made him worse, so that in eight days he dy'd on Michaelmas day, having receiv'd the sacraments. I lost more than any man, because he had a particular kindnefs for me. I was also much oblig'd to him that succeeded in the post. His funeral was great; First went two horses in mourning, then the kettle-drums and trumpets making a doleful sound, above a hundred servants Portugueses with lights in their hands; I went along with only one Frenchman, the rest stay'd to secure the house and themselves; the Dutch and English attended the funeral. The body was left in the church till eight at night. The tide flow'd, and we went over in boats to an island, which is the catholick burying-place. Those people will not allow any to be buried in towns.

5. The king's answer came, he order'd no words should be made about those that had been kill'd on both sides, and that the French if they pleas'd might carry away Macara, but should pay what he ow'd, which amounted to two thousand ducats.
 Several odd things happen'd during that time, which I would here relate if I had more leisure. The country is singular, and there being such diversity of nations, there falls out something new every day, among Persians, Armenians, Moors, &c. That city resembles Babel in the variety of tongues, and difference of garbs and customs, but I lik'd the natural inclination of them all.
 I sometimes went to the church, which was a considerable distance from the factory, met several sorts of people by the way, and they were all courteous and civil. I talk'd with some English and Dutch, visited them, because it was necessary, and found

found them very obliging in words, and some no less in their actions. Two came to take their leave, the night we went aboard; one of them took me aside, we talk'd a long while, he offer'd me all his interest at Suratte: when we were parting, he said to me with much humility and submission, Father, I know I am a heretick; but I beg the favour of your blessing. I was surpriz'd and answer'd, Sir, if you are a heretick and design to continue so, why would you have my blessing? He reply'd, That's true, Father; but for all that I beg you will grant me this satisfaction. He press'd very earnestly, I gave him my blessing, spoke a few words to him, which he requited by embracing me, and went his way. I heard them censure some churchmen. We ought all of us to be very cautious of our carriage among such people for they pry into every action. They told me two passages, and one of them very trivial, at which they were very NAVA-much scandaliz'd; but they do not reflect RETTE. upon their own heinous faults they commit every day; yet this is no excuse for us, who ought so to order our lives, that they seeing our actions might glorify God the author and cause of all good.

6. It pleas'd God our ship came, in two days all was ship'd, and I had thought it would have taken up eight at least; the weather was calm, which help'd to expedite our business. On the 17th of October, at eleven at night, we went aboard; I had so much interest, as to get three Portugueses in. The night was so dark, we had much ado to find the ship. That very night we fail'd, all of us well pleas'd to leave that base country, and draw near to Europe. From that place, according to the course we took, it is above six thousand leagues. Being upon a fresh voyage, it is requisite to begin a new chapter.

CHAP. XXIV.

My Voyage to Suratte, and other remarkable Occurrences.

1. IN the way from Golconda, I heard several disputes concerning matters of religion between Frenchmen, I took them to be all catholicks; doubtless they were not all so, for I never heard any thing of that nature between Spaniards and Portugueses. Several reports went concerning Macara, who was prisoner in our ship; some maintain'd he was half a Mahometan, others that they did not know what religion he was of. He always own'd himself a catholick to me, and so heard mass, and said the Rosary, but upon several occasions he said unto me, Father, whilst I took care to serve God, and perform'd the duty of a Christian, God assisted me, and I thrive, but declin'd when I fell off; it is some time since I neglected all things that belong to a Christian, and therefore I believe God has punish'd me, and I am now in irons. Hence I took occasion to comfort and exhort him to patience in his sufferings. They treated him too cruelly, not allowing him the means of defending himself. They examin'd and laid things to his charge with four pistols at his breast; he answer'd, not the truth, but what they would have him say, as he own'd to me. The general director was his mortal enemy, his judge, and a great heretick.

2. There was a youth in the factory, whose name was Portal, all the rest look'd upon him as proud and haughty, and I had grounds to believe him so. He contracted friendship with me, and told me many things I was no way concern'd with. He was a good grammarian, lov'd reading, had some books, and among them Matthiavel and Bodin, which he study'd more than the rest. He was for reducing all religion to policy, like the Chinese, and those authors. I often told him my mind friendly, and sometimes hastily, for I thought him ill grounded in matters of faith. At Suratte he went aboard a ship that had no chaplain, and dy'd by the way to Madagascar, where the ship took harbour, as ours did. I was much troubl'd at it, but something comforted, because they told me he had prepar'd himself for death.

3. I often heard it said at Musulapatan, that the French own'd no superior but God and their king. Upon which I us'd to call them schismaticks, for not owning the Pope. They answer'd they did in some things, but not as the Spaniards did, who dreaded his censures. This I took as an honour. Those French were merchants and no divines, they knew not how to distinguish betwixt the spiritual and temporal power.

4. Some divines at Paris in May 1614 sign'd the following propositions. 1. That the king of France holds his dominions of God and the sword only. 2. That the king in his dominions owns no superior but God. 3. That the Pope cannot interdict the king, nor absolve his subjects from their oath of allegiance. 4. That the Pope has no authority direct or indirect, mediate or immediate, coactive or coercive over the king, upon any account whatsoever.

5. One Molfese said in my hearing, that God was cruel in making the pains of hell everlasting;

NAVARETTE. everlasting; and why should he condemn them for sins of the flesh, which were natural to man? And that since man in comparison with God was less than an ant, why should he be offended at them? And tho' they offended, why should he damn them eternally? I was much provok'd, and told him my mind, but less than he deserv'd. He said he was a catholic, and his father a heretick, but his words prov'd him a liar, as to himself. Many of them learn grammar, and thrust themselves into higher sciences. The quality of a grammarian, says Spondanus, is pride, that sets them against God himself, which is the property of that horrid vice. There was an ancient error, that God did not punish sensuality, and this Mofese follow'd it. S. Paul, Heb. xiii. condemns it, Whoremongers and Adulterers God shall judge. Read S. Thomas on this place, lett. 1. For the rest he would revive Origen's error, who said the pains of hell should have an end; which CHRIST condemns, saying, They shall go into everlasting fire. The hereticks of these times do not maintain the extravagancies that man did.

Mogol. 6. It is fit to say something of the great Mogol. He that now reigns, put his father in prison, where he dy'd, and he usurp'd the crown. This man has a son who governs a province eight days journey from Golconda, towards Bengala, which properly belongs to the prince, who designs to follow the example his father set him, and get all into his own hands. Antony Coello a Portuguese, who had serv'd under him, told me he had already two hundred thousand horse and three hundred thousand foot. A brave army, if they are but good men. He designs to join in league with the rebel Subagi, who is very great and powerful. I mention'd in another place, how he attack'd the territory of Goa, and carry'd away two or three thousand Christians and a Franciscan. He sent to demand of the viceroy of Goa, to make good a ship of his the Portuguese had taken. The viceroy was in a passion, and beat his ambassador, an action no body could approve of. The English governor of Madraſtapatán told me that infidel would make war upon Goa by sea and land, and make slaves of all the Portuguese men and women he could light of. Subagi may do it; and the Mogol better, but he will not take small things in hand. The king of Golconda is more to be fear'd, because Coromandel and all those coasts are subject to him. This being a considerable point, an account of it was sent several ways to Goa and Madraſta.

7. I heard much of the kingdom of Bengala as to its fruitfulness and plenty of corn, rice, sheep, cows, fruit, silk, and cotton. This country, as I said, belongs to the great Mogol's eldest son. There are in it fathers of the order of S. Augustin, who administer to the Portuguese, and Mungrels. Some of these are of note, and wear the badge of the order of knighthood of CHRIST, but are basely used by the natives, for the least matter they drive them to prison with a cudgel. There are also Indians of Manila in that country, I saw one at Musulapatan; I said at Lisbon, there was no need of carrying people to India because there were infinite numbers dispersed thro' those countries; but the secretary of state answer'd me, Will it be easy to bring those together that are scatter'd abroad? I reply'd, It would not, for they all fled from Goa, where they wanted bread; but if he would allow them a sufficient maintenance, they would rather serve their own king, than infidels and hereticks, as they did for want.

8. The Mogol is a mighty prince, his dominions are vastly large, his people numberless, his wealth inexhaustible. A Portuguese, who had serv'd in his army at Agra, which is the seat of the court, asur'd me, he had three hundred thousand horse there besides other vast numbers. Some years since on the same day he declar'd war against the Turks, Persians, and Portuguese. What more could Alexander the great have done? He has many tributary kings under him; and it is not long ago that the king of Golconda having conquer'd the empire of Narsinga, which had been famous in those parts, the Mogol took it from him, and it still continues under his dominion. The Mogol's dominions extend above three hundred leagues in length.

9. I was told that at Ispahan, the Persian court, there were missionaries of the orders of S. Augustin, Carmalites, Jesuits, and Capuchins. They do no good upon the natives, but serve the Armenians that are there, who are made very small account of. The emperor sometimes goes out to Pecorea, but first orders the Armenians to repair to such or such a place; the women stay at home, and the emperor goes to sport and divert himself with them. They that are grounded in the love of God, have a good opportunity of obtaining the crown of martyrdom. A Capuchin father is in great esteem at that court, on account of the mathematicks. Let him have a care he comes not off as F. Adamus did in Cbina.

10. In the year 1663, when I was at Rome, there came thither two Armenian religious men of my order, who brought letters from the Sopbi of Persia and his secretary for his holiness, in answer to those

our Armenian arch-bishop carry'd four years before. His holiness writ to him again, thank'd him for his kind usage of Christians, and exhorted him to continue it. I read the letter cardinal Allieri writ to the secretary upon the same subject, it was in easy and elegant Latin, so finely pen'd the best scholar would admire it. The Sopbi now reigning is almost always drunk; tho' I was told by the French he had caus'd abundance of vineyards and house-vines to be destroy'd, others say it was his father.

11. Let us now return to our voyage. The fourth day a furious gust of wind started up about evening, but lasted a very short space; for had it held us three or four hours, there had been an end of our voyage. Being come to Suratte, we understood by letters brought over land, that four ships, which were at anchor at Musulapatan, were cast away, and all lost that were in them. The same fate had certainly attended us, had we been near that coast. Every year infallibly about that time eight days sooner or later, there is a terrible storm upon that coast, they call it Bara. The wind was spent when it came to us, and fallen with the great rain, which was our good fortune. The eighth day we discover'd the island Ceylon, and for fear of the north east winds which reign about that time, stood out to sea a day and a night, and got out so far, that we were afterwards eleven days before we could come in sight of the land again, tho' it was in another place. We pass'd cape Gallo, which is in sixty degrees north latitude; there we lay five days without advancing a foot, and met the ship of Macao bound for Goa, we hal'd one another with a great deal of satisfaction. Before we could make cape Comeri, we had furious north winds, terrible currents, and after all dead calms. They made the cape, the water run against us like an arrow out of a bow. I having seen so much of the sea, took upon me to play pilot, and contended to have us get in under shore. I argu'd, Who would run upon an enemy's sword? That the best way was to avoid and come in with him; that there we lay opposite to that point which did us all the mischief; that we should remove from it, and expect a wind, for since it must come from shore, we should be so much the more to windward. This was accordingly done; one night a furious north east wind blew, we were but a league and a half from the cape, and yet were above five hours weathering of it, so rapid is the current. On the 22d of November, by break of day we had the cape astern. The Portuguese ship stood so far to sea, that we lost sight of her, and she was two days longer a getting clear. The NAVY- north east wind abated, and within two REFTE. hours we had a fresh gale at east. A little boat of Blacks came ahead of us; our men looking at it off the poop, perceiv'd the ship was running directly upon a rock that lay under water; they were all surpriz'd, and the wind freshned as if some evil spirit had sent it to destroy us all; they stood in to shore, and in a moment I saw the rock a stone's throw from the ship. The Blacks were astonish'd, as if they concluded we were either blind or mad. It was God sent those Blacks, for had they not come we had ended our days there. The rock is mark'd down in the chart, but they were so joyful they had weather'd the point, that no body thought of it, and it was very strange that as soon as ever the danger was over, the wind ceas'd and the sails flagg'd.

12. That afternoon a little boat came aboard with a Dutchman, who brought fruit, and stuffs, and told us abundance of news, but all prov'd false. That they call the coast of Malabar is very pleasant and delightful, we wanted not for fruit, fowls, and other refreshment whilst we run along it; it lies north and south. every night we came to an anchor, which makes it toilfom sailing along that coast. On the 27th of the month we lost our anchor, the 28th we appear'd before Coulan with a good gale, the Dutch fir'd two guns at us. On S. Andrew's day we sail'd before Cochin and Calicut, where we were inform'd that the king of the country was engag'd in a bloody war with the Dutch. In the night we got up to Cananor. Here I might write some things memorable enough. Those who were acquainted with that coast said, that when some persons marry'd, the husband carry'd his wife before he had to do with her himself, to the king, who kept her eight days in his palace, making use of her at his pleasure; and that time being expir'd, the man came for his wife, taking it as a great honour and favour that his king would make use of her. In other places they carry them to the temples of the idolatrous-priests, and left them there the same number of days to the same purpose; this sanctifys them, and the husbands carry them home well pleased. Those priests seem to act like the sons of Eli, 1 Sam. ii. 11. They lay with the women that assembled at the door of the tabernacle; but the difference was, that in India the women and their husbands are consenting, and look upon it as no sin.

13. When the husband dies, the wife Funerals. must die too, but after several manners, the dead body is burnt, and if he was a noblerman, the woman is seated in his lap,

and

NAVA- and then they lay the wood about, set fire RETTE. to it, and they are both burnt, the one dead and the other alive. Other women clap their arms about their dead husband, and are burnt with him. The third manner is, when the body is burning in a pit, the wife walks round weeping, attended by her kindred and friends; in the height of it one of the next kindred thrusts her into the pit, then they heap wood upon her, hollow and shout, and there the wretch perishes. It is look'd upon as a great infamy not to do so. Not many years since, as they were carrying a woman at Rogiapur near Goa to be burnt with her husband, it happened that some Portugueses who came to that part seeing the train, had the curiosity to draw near; the woman seeing them by themselves, left her people, and running embraced one of them, begging they would protect her. They did it very handsomely, defended themselves against the infidels, and carry'd her off. She went to Goa, was instructed, baptiz'd, and marry'd to him she had fled to. She was living in the year 1670, when I was at Goa.
 A most fortunate woman!

14. During those days we had some disputes aboard, and the pilot pretended to play the divine, asking why there were several religious orders in the church? What need the Pope had of money, since the kings of Spain and France would support him? Why the Jews were not tolerated in Spain? Why God did not work miracles? I answer'd sufficiently to every point, and left them muttering; but they had not a word to say, when I ask'd them, Why there were several military orders, and why several heresies were tolerated in France?

15. On the 14th of December, we come to an anchor two leagues from Goa opposite to the bar, because we wanted water.
 It was very lucky for me, and the Portu-gueses. We went to the fort they call Agua-da, which is very fine, and had the best brass cannon in it I had ever seen. There was one piece carry'd a bullet of ninety six pound, the French were amaz'd. We spoke with the commander, and taking our leave went up the river, which is one of the finest in the world, both the banks being cover'd with towns, fightly temples, and lofty trees. I stay'd in the college of

S. Thomas, which is a quarter of a league from the city. A most delightful feat as can be imagin'd, built upon the edge of the water. After noon I went up to the monastery of our F. S. Dominick, it may vie with the best in Europe. The French said there was not the like in all France (it is likely they had seen but little there.) They afterwards shew'd us vestments, chalices, a rich bier to carry the image of our Lady, with other church stuff, which was very surprizing. But what I most admir'd was an ivory crucifix all of one piece except the arms, the rarest thing that can be ima-gin'd, not so much for the curiosity of the workmanship, as its bigness; to all appearance, the tooth that piece was cut out of must weigh at least three hundred weight.
 The prospect of the city is very fine, and the buildings sumptuous, but not so much as a missionary has writ, who affirms it out-does Rome. We all went away well pleas'd and treated, the French own'd themselves oblig'd to me for the kindness those of my order shew'd them; it did me a kindness afterwards, but they did not like the vast revenue they were told a certain family enjoy'd. On the 16th we weigh'd for Suratte, I lightned my self, leaving the Cbinese Christian I had brought with me at Goa, that I might not see the misery he endur'd at sea, his sufferings afflicting me more than my own. We sail'd before Bengala, and the 2^d day we lay by at Rosapor a French factory. A Black came to us from the factory but empty handed. The wind fail'd us some days. The captain my friend told me what base things his countrymen did at Madagascar and Musulapatan, taking marry'd women from their husbands, whom they threatned with death if they complained. They are inordinate in this particular.
 We lay some days in the sight of Dabul a strong and handsome fort belonging to Subagi: we went on to Bombaim, Bazaim, and on the 8th of January by break of day were before Daman. On the 11th we passengers went up to Soali in a Dutch boat that came to us. There we entred another region, under another government, saw other sorts of people, and had trial of several humours. God grant we may find a place to take some rest in.

CHAP. XXV.

My Stay at Soali, and setting out again for France.

1. I Came to Soali much tir'd, and had a mind to stay at Suratte to wait for a religious man, who design'd to travel by land; but the next day I had a letter from him giving me an account he had not been able to come by land, by reason of Sub-agi's army which lay in the way, he having already drawn near to Golconda, and destroy'd many towns and villages about that court. This made me take another course,

which was to make my intention known to the director-general, who tho' a rank heretick, had been civil to me, and always gave me place at table above others; he drank to me first, and gave me the best bit off his plate. At first he made some difficulty of giving me my passage in the company's ship, but was prevail'd upon by a French gentleman, who was bound the same way as my self: From that day forward he was daily kinder and kinder to me. On the 20th of January he gave a farewell treat, at which were all the officers of the company. After several healths he drank to the captain of the ship, charging and intreating him to take care and make very much of me, as he would do by him if he were aboard. I thank'd him for so extraordinary a favour.

2. On the 21st in the morning the director-general sent for me. I was surpriz'd, but went to him; the captain of the ship, and the gentleman I mention'd before, were with him; he shut his door, drank several healths to us three in delicate wines; order'd the captain to give me a place in the great cabin, and charg'd him to make much of me. I went aboard with the captain well pleas'd, but with some concern, because there was no other priest for so tedious a voyage. Caron miss'd me at noon, and I not being to be found, he was told I was gone aboard, at which he seem'd concern'd that I had not staid to dinner.
