non-treaty Indians, shall be competent witnesses; but no penalty shall be incurred in case of sickness where the intoxicant is made use of under the sanction of a medical man or under the direction of a minister of religion."

Mr. BOWELL suggested that the word "may" in the 34th line having relation to imprisonment should be altered to "shall."

The change was agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD called attention to the extraordinary powers given in this clause to a single magistrate who could sentence to two years' detention in the penitentiary;
this did not apply to stipendiary magistrates, and the power was certainly too great.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE--In the Act of 1874, the magistrates contemplated were stipendiary magistrates, who have the power, rank and standing of County Court Judges.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD---But the clause does not mention stipendiary magistrates, and it applies to all parts of the Dominion, to the County of Brant as well as to Manitoba.

Mr. BORRON agreed with the right hon. member for Kingston that this provision was not sufficiently guarded.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE replied that in certain circumstances the power of magistrates could not be too great. American traders who had brought whiskey into the North-West Territories had recently been punished as extremely as the law permitted, and the entire salutary effects of this step had ever since been felt in that region. Some amendment might be made; but that extensive power should be given to these magistrates was, he thought, beyond a doubt.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD observed that it applied to Lambton as well as to Manitoba. He quite agreed with the Premier that no punishment could be too excessive for the description of persons to whom the hon. gentleman had alluded, for whom hanging, indeed, would not be too severe a punishment.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE, with reference to the Province of British Columbia, remarked that the hon. member for Westminster had pointed out, some months ago, a want of stringency as existing there in this relation, as persons convicted of this offence could not be sentenced to hard labour. It was undoubtedly necessary that the ordinary unpaid magistracy should have more extensive powers even than stipendiary magistrates in these remoter districts.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—There are stipendiary magistrates in British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—True; but the area is very extensive, and recourse must often be had to other magistrates.

The clause was allowed to stand.

Clause 80 was passed without discussion.

Clause 81—

“When it is proved before any Judge, Stipendiary Magistrate or Justice of the Peace that any vessel, boat, canoe or conveyance of any description upon the sea or sea coast, or upon any river, lake or stream in Canada, is employed in carrying any intoxicant, to be supplied to any Indian, or non-treaty Indian, such vessel, boat, canoe or conveyance so employed may be seized and declared forfeited, as in the next preceding section, and sold, and the proceeds thereof paid to Her Majesty for the purposes hereinbefore mentioned,”

being taken up,

Mr. BORRON suggested that the words, “with the knowledge of the owner and master of the vessel,” should be inserted.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—It cannot be done without the knowledge of the master, of course.

The clause was passed.

Clauses 82 and 83 were passed without discussion.

Clause 84—

“No appeal shall lie from any conviction under the five next preceding sections of this Act, except to a Judge of any Superior Court of law, County or Circuit or District Court, or to the Chairman or Judge of the Court of the Sessions of the Peace, having jurisdiction where the conviction was had, and such appeal shall be heard, tried and adjudicated upon by such Judge without the intervention of the jury; and no such appeal shall be brought after the expiration of thirty days from the conviction,”

being taken up,

Mr. BORRON stated that when such severe penalties were in question, an appeal to a jury should be allowed.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—When an appeal is taken before a Judge, the appellant is quite safe.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—Such an appeal is contemplated in connection with an error regarding points of law, and not with respect to evidence, no matter how improper or insufficient it may be.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The practice has shown that it is a matter of extreme difficulty to obtain a conviction.

The clause having passed; the Committee rose, reported, and asked leave to sit again.

DUTIES ON PETROLEUM.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT moved the House into Committee of Supply.

Mr. COLBY then rose to propose an amendment, of which he had given notice some weeks ago, in reference to the duties on petroleum. He made this motion believing it to be his duty in the public interest. He had given ample time for the consideration of the subject in order that no one might be taken by surprise, and that certain interests might have an opportunity of being represented in the House and presenting any reasons from their stand point why this resolution should not be favourably entertained. It was well known for every member of the House was practically a consumer of petroleum, that the duties which had been paid on this article for many years were now exceptional in their character and a grievance to the consumers of the country. At the time the present specific Customs duty of 15 cents per gallon was imposed, refined petroleum was worth in the market 40 cents a gallon. At that time there was also an excise duty of five cents per gallon, so there was a protection to the infant manufacture of that day of ten cents per gallon, which would be twenty-five per cent. on the product. The duty at the time it was arranged was not at all disproportionate to the general policy of the then Administration; but it had, by accident it might be said, or by the great decline in petroleum, become at the present time exceedingly disproportionate to all other duties which prevailed in the country. On examining the Blue Books he found the quantity of petroleum refined in Canada last year was 5,135,395 gallons. That was subject to an excise duty of five cents per gallon. The quantity imported from the United States upon which custom duty was paid was 691,960 gallons. A large unknown quantity was brought into Canada which paid no custom's duty, owing to our extended frontier. That was an amount it was impossible by any statistics to ascertain; but any gentleman resident upon the frontier knew that the quantity which appeared by the public returns to be imported from the United States, was very small as compared with that actually brought into the country. For the purpose of the present discussion they might assume that the quantity which was smuggled into the country was twice the quantity upon which duty was paid. Upon that assumption, then, the total amount of petroleum consumed in the country would be somewhat over seven million gallons. The present revenue from excise was $268,552, and that from customs $103,665, making a total of $372,217. His proposition was to reduce the Custom's duty from 15 cents per gallon to 7½ cents; and he believed that to any gentleman who carefully considered the data he had submitted it would be apparent that this reduction of duty, instead of being attended with a loss of revenue, would result in an increase, because the House would remember that the amount imported, and which paid 15 cts. per gal., was insignificant as compared with the amount produced at home which only paid an excise duty of 5 cents. To illustrate this point, supposing the change of duty from 15 to 7½ cents did not affect the ratio of production and consumption in Canada as compared with the importation into this country, they would get from the five millions which was produced and consumed in Canada $268,000.52, the same sum as at present. It must be evident that a very high duty was productive of smuggling, and that a low duty would nearly annihilate a contraband trade; therefore, it might be fairly assumed that double the amount from the United States would pay duty. If we receive from the United States twice the quantity now entered at the Custom House we would get precisely the same revenue as that we now obtained. He, however, thought that the reduction of the duty would result in a larger importation from the United States, and the revenue would be increased. For every gallon so imported, and which would displace an equal quantity, we would derive a revenue of 7½ cents instead of 5. He thought it was clear that this reduction would not lessen the amount derived by the Treasury from the duties upon this article. At the same time it would give to the refiner a higher degree of protection than any other industry the country enjoys. The amount of protection would be the excess of the Customs over the Excise duties, and would be over 2½ cents per gallon. Oil to-day at Cleveland, which might be considered one of the great marts, and which established the value of oil, was 10 cents per gallon, United States currency. Upon that basis, the refiner, under 7½ cents duty, would receive a protection of from 20 to 25 per cent. Other manufactures in the country were generally protected to the extent of 17½ per cent.; and oil refiners, instead of being placed in a worse position by the reduction than other manufactures, would still remain in a more favourable one. It was a fact demonstrable beyond contradiction that the consumer in this country had for the past three years paid 15 cents more per gallon than equally good oil could be bought for in the United States. It was clear, from comparison of prices on the other side of the line, that the Canadian refiner had added 15 cents to the cost of American oil regardless of the cost to himself. In order that he might make it more evident, he would read from a recent commercial article published in the Montreal Herald, which was as follows:—

“The trade in petroleum during 1875 has been on a somewhat considerable scale; but the article has been mostly manipulated by the Western combination, a very large proportion of the oil used in this city and neighbourhood being supplied through their agents. The stock being thus during almost the whole year under the control of the association, a higher range of prices was charged.”

He had, moreover, a statement of prices paid in the United States, and of those paid in Montreal at the same time. The average price in Montreal in September, October, November and December, 1873, according to the Montreal Herald, was 29 cents, gold. The average price in Vermont, further east than Montreal, was 14 cents United States currency, leaving the price of oil in Canada 15 cents more than across the line. For the same months in 1874 and 1875, the price of petroleum in Montreal was 24½ in gold. In Vermont during the same months it was 12¾ United States currency, making a difference that year of 11¾. In Montreal for the same months in 1875, it was 27 cents in gold; and in Vermont 11 cents United States currency, being a difference in favour of the American consumer of 16 cents gold. Taking these three years and considering the difference in currencies, he laid it down as a fact that the Canadian consumer for the last three years had been paying 15 cents more in gold than the United States consumer. From these figures it would be seen that the loss to the country was $1,100,000, in consequence of the condition of affairs he had explained, being a net loss over and above all revenues derived from that source of $750,000. Canada now and during the period he referred to, had been paying higher for this most necessary commodity than any other civilized country on the globe.

This tax fell very seriously on the individual consumer as well as on the whole country. The man who consumes a gallon of oil per week—and thousands do that, and more—pays $5 a year as a tax to support the refiners who control the prices in Canada. The estimated individual taxation in Canada is about $6 per head for all purposes, and this is therefore a serious condition of affairs worthy the most careful consideration of the Government. If a new Budget were coming down it might be urged with great propriety that light should be placed on the same basis as other necessaries of life. There is nothing that contributes more to the comfort and happiness of our people, especially the poorer classes, than cheap light during the long winter evenings. A duty of 7½ cents would be almost 100 per cent. on its market value of 10 cents United States currency. If a tax of 80 or 100 per cent. were imposed on articles of food it would be considered preposterous. The present condition of the trade is due to what is called the London Combination. It is well known there exists a combination of gentlemen who have taken advantage of the liberality of the Legislature and the high rate of tariff to control the entire market in this country. In order to accomplish this they have subsidized and closed up all the refineries of the country, but the very few which are now in operation in their interest. Of forty-four refineries only about four are in operation, and the rest, which are closed up, are paid from two to four thousand dollars a year. They have bought off all competition and organized a system of extortion upon the people of this country. There they stand between the producer and consumer, dictating to the producer, on the one hand, what he shall receive for his crude oil, and to the consumer, on the other hand, what he shall pay for his refined petroleum. For the first time in Canada a ring has been organized for the purpose of regulating and controlling prices. This arises out of the exceptional condition of the tariff—the fact that this was made a specific instead of an ad valorem duty. Owing to the rigidity of the rate they could see, no matter what the cost of production might be, precisely the margin of profit, and availed themselves of it to dictate to the consumers what they should pay. Under the circumstances it is the duty of the Government and of Parliament to administer a lesson, quick, sharp and decisive, to those gentlemen who, for the first time in the history of Canada, have organized a ring for the purpose of preventing competition and monopolizing the market.

Mr. JONES (Halifax)—That is the fruit of protection.

Mr. COLBY admitted it was the fruit of excessive and undue protection, and not of the reasonable policy which had been advocated by the Opposition in this House. It was the fruit of the protection which he had repudiated, and the Protectionists were consistent with their principles in denouncing this libel on a sound policy. It was their duty to remove this blot from the tariff and not permit those who differed from them to point to it as the fruit of protection. He doubted whether the hon. member for Halifax would be equally consistent with his free trade principles, when he came to vote upon this question. It was clear the present rate of 15 cents per gallon was injurious to the consumer of oil in this country, and it was also injurious to the revenue of the country. A larger amount could be collected from a 7½ per cent. duty, because there would be less smuggling. But if no change should take place in the volume of importation in consequence of this reduction the loss to the revenue would be only $50,650 at the very worst. It was not only injurious to the consumer and to the revenue, but also to every town in which the refineries were closed in consequence of this combination. In short, it was injurious to the whole community with the exception of those gentlemen who now controlled the trade.

In bringing forward this resolution he did so purely in the public interest and with no desire to embarrass the Government. Could any one doubt it was in the interest of the country to have this inordinate tax upon one of the necessaries of life lessened, and the cost of it to the consumer reduced one-third? How could hon. gentlemen decline to remedy this unmitigated evil? How could they go to their constituents and say they had voted to allow this abuse to continue twelve months longer? But some might say this motion would inconvenience the Government. He would be sorry that any man's convenience should stand in the way of the public good. However, this Government had not taken the position that they would not remedy a grievance of this kind. They had decided not to increase taxation, but they had never declared they would not consult the interest of the people in a case like this. It might be said it would not do to open the door for one change lest others should be proposed; but this Government was strong enough to remove this abuse without touching the tariff at any other point. If they would say to their followers "vote according to your convictions," he believed there was not a man in this House who would not vote for this proposition or something similar. Such a course would strengthen the Government, and he hoped they would pursue it. He moved:—"That the Speaker do not now leave the chair, but that it be resolved it is expedient in the public interest that the Customs duty on refined petroleum be reduced from 15 cents per gallon to a rate which shall not exceed 7½ cents per gallon."

Mr. SCRIVER, as the seconder of the motion, desired to say a very few words on it, though fortunately the hon. mover had so fully explained his grounds, and so clearly established the justice of his cause as to make it unnecessary for him to speak at any length. In consequence of the present high duty, an illicit traffic prevailed to an alarming extent, to his own knowledge, along the frontier; and he had learned since he came to Ottawa that it was even more extensive than he had supposed. He was confident that if the duty were reduced to one-half of its present amount, the revenue from this source would be greatly increased. The illicit traffic was due to the fact that the American was far superior to the Canadian oil; and though it seemed unpatriotic to say so, yet he was bound to tell the truth and state this circumstance. Any one who used the American would never use the Canadian article. Loss to the revenue was not alone the result, but the effect of this practice on the morals of the people was very injurious. Conflicts had even occurred between the smugglers and revenue officers; and one of the latter who had been injured in a recent encounter—not in his own constituency, however—had not yet recovered. He did not desire, as might be supposed, to embarrass the Government in any manner; but he had not understood that their declared policy would exclude a case so plain as the present, and he hoped that they would take it into consideration and suggest any measure of relief that they might consider advisable.

Mr. MACMILLAN was rather astonished to find the hon. member for Stanstead proposing such a motion. As on all previous occasions when an amendment was moved to the tariff, the hon. member had consistently voted for protection. He (Mr. Macmillan) for his part, intended to continue consistently in the course on which he had set out, and oppose this motion. The hon. member for Stanstead had singled out two or three constituencies in the Dominion—those of the Premier, the hon. member for Bothwell and his own, at which to direct his attacks; but the hon. member had been, in his argument, in a great measure mistaken. Operations at the Oil Springs, had begun about ten or fifteen years ago, and a very large number of people were now in consequence furnished with employment in that connection. In the infancy of this manufacture the quality of the oil did not compare favourably with the American, and it was only in 1870 or thereabouts, that a solitary gallon of it was exported. During that year ten millions of gallons were manufactured, and considerably over one-half of it had been exported, bringing into this country actually one and one-quarter millions of dollars. In its manufacture it was moreover to be remarked that no raw material was purchased, as was the case in the refining of sugar. In 1872-3 we exported very nearly ten millions of gallons of oil, for which about two millions of dollars were paid. His hon. friend had stated that when this custom's duty was levied on oil, there was also imposed an inland revenue of five cents per gallon; this was not the case, as this was not ordered until a considerable period after the manufacture of this article was commenced.

The inland revenue and the inspectors' fees raised this duty to something like six cents per gallon. His hon. friend proposed to reduce the customs duty one-half; but when we were competing in a foreign market with the American oil, we had invariably had from $1\frac{1}{2}$ to 2 cents per gallon against us, and why?—for the reason given by his hon. friend from Huntingdon: the stronger odour of the Canadian article, and the fact that it occasioned a discoloration of the lamp chimneys. By reducing the duty to $7\frac{1}{2}$ cents per gallon, with the inspector's fees and the inland revenue, nearly 6 cents per gallon, we would apparently have $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents per gallon in favor of the Canadian oil, while in reality, there would actually be from $\frac{1}{4}$ to $\frac{3}{4}$ cts. per gallon, in favor of the American article. During the first years of the existence of this manufacture, from 1,000 to 1,500 people were directly and indirectly engaged in it; this number was increased in 1872-3, to 3,000 or 3,500. Owing to the over production of oil in Pennsylvania in 1873-4, and to the striking of the strata known as the fourth sand rock, when thousands of barrels flowed daily, the price had materially decreased. In Canada, however, the wells were far from being so productive, and we were consequently shut out of the foreign market altogether. Although we had exported so largely it had all gone to German and Mediterranean ports. Another reason for a strong protective duty was that the American crude produced some 92 per cent. of refined against from 62 to 65 per cent. produced from our Canadian crude. The Americans enjoyed another advantage; the Canadian manufacturer could only charge their stills twice a week, whilst they were using the same labour and the same amount of fuel.

The Americans, on the other hand, charged their stills six times, and ran off 90 per cent against our 62 to 65 percent. Therefore, they had a very great advantage, and unless it was the intention of the hon. member for Stanstead to crush the Canadian trade out it would be utter folly for the House to undertake to reduce the duty to the extent that he proposed. If the hon. gentleman desired to be generous to the consumer of this product let him introduce a measure repealing the imposition upon Canadian oil of the inland revenue tax, as well as reducing the customs duty to 7½ cents. He would be happy to support such a measure, but it was utterly impossible for their refineries to remain open one day if this amendment passed. He sincerely hoped, and he had not the least doubt, the Government intended to oppose this measure, and in doing so he would accord them his hearty support.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he was not disposed to deny that there was considerable weight in what had been said by the mover and seconder of this motion. There was no doubt that the duty on this article was somewhat high, and it was true there was a considerable amount of this product smuggled into the country, but not to so large an extent as the hon. gentleman believed. Sufficient had been said to induce the Government to take the matter into consideration, and to make them anxious to take such steps as would protect the revenue, and if possible remove the cause of complaint. But it was absolutely necessary for the House, in taking the customs duty into consideration, to also consider the advisability of reducing the excise tax. With respect to the general question, he thought his hon. friend from Stanstead had rather exaggerated the amount of the tax paid when he put it at as high a figure as $11,000. He did not think that statement was quite warranted in view of the facts. In 1873 Canada produced for home consumption, and which had paid a duty, 4,500,000 gallons; in 1874, 5,200,000 gallons; in 1875, 5,135,000 gallons; and in the eight months ending March 1, 1876, they produced 3,800,- 000, as nearly as might be, which paid a duty to the Government. It would be seen they had produced during these eight months quite up to the average quantity, while they had actually imported during the six months ending December 31, 1875, a few thousand gallons more than was imported during the six months ending Dec. 31, 1874. He thought the fact that their native consumption which had paid a duty, had lately increased, and that the article imported had also slightly increased, would go to show that the supposed amount of smuggling had been considerably exaggerated. Of course it was a matter of extreme difficulty to arrive at the extent of the illicit trade. No doubt in the country along the frontier, a very considerable amount of smuggling was carried on. It was possible also that in certain portions of the Maritime Provinces a considerable amount of smuggling went on. He was not disposed to deny these facts, nor that there was a case made out for the consideration of the Government. That consideration the Government were disposed to bestow upon it, but he did not think it wise or expedient for them at that late period of the Session to be called upon to enter upon the consideration of a question which he could assure the House was more complicated than his hon. friend supposed. The Government did not think this was an expedient time to go into a reconstruction of tariff. Looking at all the circumstances of the case, he thought his hon. friends, the mover and seconder of the motion, ought to be satisfied with the assurance which on behalf of the Government he was willing to give that they were disposed to consider the question. The Government thought a sufficient case had been made out for their consideration, but they did not think it was in the public interest that they should be called upon to re-open the tariff question. There was no doubt that whenever there was a large difference between the value of the article on one side of the line and the other, there was a very considerable temptation to smuggling. That part of the hon. mover's remarks he thoroughly endorsed. In such cases the increase of the taxation of the country would not tend to increase the revenue. Petroleum was a very bulky article. A 40 gallon cask would only pay a duty of about $6, and if petroleum was smuggled with so small a profit, what would be the benefit if they added to their tariff on articles which were of much smaller bulk and could be smuggled with a greater profit and much greater ease. He did not think it desirable to enter upon the discussion of the minor points named by the hon. gentleman, but begged to state to the House that the Government was quite willing to consider the matter, but they could not bring down any measure in the direction indicated at this period of the Session.

Mr. GILMOR thought many of the grounds taken by the hon. mover of the resolution in regard to the high duties on this article were good, but there were other circumstances connected with this motion. The motion was one that was very embarrassing to many hon. members in the House, and the fact of its being an attack on the Government influenced his vote to a very considerable extent. It was well known that the policy of the Government, as announced on the introduction of the Budget Speech, was one which met with his hearty support, and one that he thought was fully endorsed by the Maritime interests. He had never seen a Government pressed so closely since he had been a member of the House as they were on that question, and he was proud to say that they resisted that pressure although they probably went contrary to the wishes of many of their supporters in Ontario. He felt that the Maritime members were now called upon not to desert the ship. He did not profess to be a very strong party man, but it was impossible to be blind to the fact that there were two parties in the Dominion. A compromise had to be made on that occasion, and if they expected to sail their vessel safely they would have to stick together.

The arguments urged were very good, but the motion was calculated to embarrass the Government and force them to re-open the tariff question. If they undertook to adjust the rate on coal oil, they would be asked to do more.

The policy of the Government being in the interests of the whole country and of the Maritime Provinces especially, the representatives from that section were called upon to oppose any attempt to re-adjust the tariff. He thought there would be more revenue collected under a lower rate of duty. At St. Stephen, the merchants had very little trade in petroleum, the opportunities of going to the other side being so convenient. Most of the oil consumed in that section was no doubt smuggled into the country. It was the general expectation at the meeting of Parliament, that the tariff would be increased, but since the Government had declared they could carry on the Government without increasing taxation, and in consequence of the promise of the Government, that between now and next Session the subject of duties upon petroleum would be considered with a view to meeting the complaint, he would vote against the motion.

Mr. FARROW said he was heartily in accord with the mover of this resolution. The members from the Maritime Provinces seemed to be averse to having a tax put upon anything they used—salt, for instance, of which they used large quantities—yet although this tax on petroleum weighed heavily on them, in order to support the Government they would swallow it. If there was one plank in the platform of the Reform Party on which hon. gentlemen had insisted more than another, it was “a cheap breakfast table and encouragement to the farmers.” Now farmers rise early and use a good deal of coal oil, yet their professed friends refused to cheapen it by reducing the tax on it. The present duty on coal oil is about 100 per cent. It should be reduced to say 25 per cent. If the salt manufacturers could only get that much protection they would be satisfied. The defence of the Finance Minister was lame, and would not satisfy the country. It was an admission that his policy was wrong, and a request to leave the matter untouched till next Session. The evil was one which required a prompt remedy.

Mr. SINCLAIR said the hon. member for Stanstead had used strong arguments against protection to the manufacturers of the country. He had shown it would even corrupt the morals of the people by encouraging smuggling. Hon. gentlemen opposite had advocated reciprocity in tariffs. Here was an illustration of what the effects of it would be. In the United States the duty on coal oil was 40 cents per gallon; on this side 15 cents, or about one-third of that rate; yet the effect of it was to increase the cost of the article to the consumer and to create monopolies. This one instance of protection should be kept as a beacon light to show the practical effects of such a policy. He was not in favor of protection, and he did not think this interest should continue to be more protected than any other, but for one year he believed it was better that the people might know what they had to expect if the Opposition should succeed in carrying out their policy.

Mr. MACDONNELL said he intended to vote against the motion. He would do so on the promise of the Finance Minister that the Government would take this matter into consideration.

The House then divided on the amendment, which was rejected on the following division:—

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC MONEY.

Mr. CIMON stated that before the Speaker left the Chair, seeing that it was the moment afforded them for making any complaints which they had to prefer against the Government, he desired to protest as strongly as was in his power against the unjust manner in which the Province of Quebec was treated by the present Administration. At the risk of being accused of sectionalism, he wished to allude to the rights of the Province from which he came, and to claim its legitimate share in the distribution of the public moneys. He wished to declare boldly in the House, what all his friends the Liberals of Quebec, including Hon. Mr. Cauchon, said in the Province, but what they had not the courage to proclaim with energy here, that Quebec was badly treated by the present Government, and refused the grants which were its due, for the construction of its public works.

He knew how delicate was the question which he was about to raise, but with a Government like the present, containing Lower Canadian Ministers, who possessed so little of energy, and who showed such a want of zeal in securing the rights of their Province, he believed that he was justified in demanding justice for it, and in laying it down as a principle that the Government as far as was possible, should cause to be executed in each Province proportionately the Public Works which are required, and it was high time that the rights of Quebec ceased to be misunderstood.

Certain hon. members would undoubtedly accuse him of sectionalism. Last year, when the hon. member for Terrebonne demanded justice for Quebec, he was also so charged; but this accusation had only served to raise him in the esteem of his fellow citizens, and had only increased his influence over the electors of that section of the country.

Daily they heard hon. members from Ontario, the Maritime Provinces, Manitoba or British Columbia, taking such a position with regard to their respective Provinces; they did not fail to do so, and that in a bold tone, and why should not hon. members who come from Quebec do as much? This was no sectionalism. Each Province had its representatives in this House, and why? To consider the interests of the whole Dominion he would be told, undoubtedly, but also particularly to guard the interests of their respective Provinces; and this hon. members of the other Provinces were doing, in fact, every day in this House.

He was bound to admit that the President of the Council had advised him to take such a stand. In point of fact, some time after the closing of last Session he had read in the Journal de Quebec an article written by the President of the Council on the subject of the two first Budgets of this Government in which he stated, "Let us say at once that Lower Canada is far from obtaining its legitimate share in the distribution of the public moneys, and that it is the duty of every public man and of every elector to claim it energetically."

The President of the Council then made this admission, which every person who examined the Public Accounts and Estimates, would confirm.

In opening the report of the Minister of Public Works, for the year ending the 30th of June, 1875, the first entire fiscal year during which the Liberals were in power he found on page 3 a statement indicating the amount expended on public works during the year, when in the Dominion was so expended the sum of $10,615,429.19. Everyone would admit that Quebec should have obtained, at least, one quarter of this amount; this was only just. He had made a calculation, an easy matter, and he discovered that of this amount Quebec only received $720,674; not one-twelfth of the whole. He should add that this $720,674 was employed in completing public works which were commenced by the Conservatives. If this had not been the case how much would the First Minister have expended in Lower Canada? Almost nothing, if they were to judge from the estimates submitted to the House.

In order that he might be the better understood he would make a comparison between Lower and Upper Canada, and defied any one to deny the accuracy of the following figures in connection with public works constructed during the year ending 30th of June, 1875; and he found in the report of the Minister of Public Works that there had been spent in Ontario exclusively during that year in connection with the following three items: On canals, $1,300,318.84; on harbours, $241,383.89, and on public buildings, $639,783.75; a total of $2,181,486.46. Similar expenditures in the Province of Quebec during the same year were : On canals, $335,290 ; on harbours, $12,093.33, and on public buildings, $179,025.78 ; total only $546,409, leaving the enormous difference of $1,635,077.35 in favour of the Province of Ontario. The grand total was $2,727,895.57, and on these three items only, Ontario had so received five times as much as Quebec. The other items would be judged after the same standard, and in consequence, it was clear that the Province of Quebec had not obtained its rightful portion.

During the same year, in the Maritime Provinces, on Public Works, about four millions of dollars were expended ; also considerable sums in Manitoba and British Columbia ; Quebec alone had been badly treated in this relation.

He did not complain of the expenditures made in the other Provinces ; without doubt they had been useful and necessary, but on the other hand Quebec formed a great part of the Dominion, and was in need of the execution of important and necessary Public Works. He merely made complaint because this Province was shamefully neglected. Taking up the Estimates they would see what the Government proposed to give to it during the following year. He did not meanwhile take into account the sums which, having been voted during preceding Sessions had not been spent, and which were to be found anew in the Estimates of 1876 as re-votes, because this would be an unjust comparison. During the past year, for instance, the Estimates contained the item of $1,600,000 for the Lachine Canal and $2,000,000 for the Welland Canal, while the Government were only willing to lay out $400,000 on the former during the present year, though on the latter $1,900,000 were to be expended. The estimates under consideration contained as a re-vote, $1,200,000 for the Lachine Canal, only the balance of the sums voted by the Conservatives during former years which the Liberals, since they had attained office, had not yet expended ; whilst of $2,000,000 allotted to the Welland Canal only $100,000 was a re-vote—hence within two years the Welland Canal received $3,900,000 against $1,600,000 for the Lachine Canal. He would add that the estimates they were to vote did not comprehend a single additional sum for the Lachine Canal, while the Welland had $1,000,000 additional.

The Government proposed to spend during next year on public works in the Dominion, not including re-votes, $4,441,000 on capital account, and $978,950 to be laid to the account of revenue, making in all $5,419,950, a heavy decrease compared with the year ending 30th of June, 1875. This was the economy assumed by the Government, effected to the detriment of Quebec, as he would establish. Of this $5,419,950 how much was allotted to the Province of Quebec ? It was incredible, but, nevertheless true, that it would receive only $100,000, distributed as follows :—On public buildings, $60,000 ; on fortifications, $5,000, and for divers matters, $35,000. This was all ; not a single cent for their harbours, their wharves, their telegraph lines and their other necessary public undertakings—not even a fiftieth part of what the other Provinces obtained. Ontario, however, was not forgotten ; it was well provided for, and the other Provinces were treated liberally.

He again selected as points of comparison between Quebec and Ontario, in connection with the Estimates for the approaching year, the three items which he had already mentioned. For the latter, besides re-votes, there were allotted for canals, $1,900,000 ; public buildings, $410,000, and harbours $62,000—in all $2,372,000 ; and for the former, in addition to re-votes, for canals, nothing ; for public buildings, including fortifications, $5,000, and for harbours, nothing—in all only $65,000 for Quebec against $2,372,000 for Ontario.

To the Maritime Provinces, Manitoba and British Columbia were apportioned considerable sums, larger in proportion than the amount accorded to Ontario. Quebec alone was neglected and forgotten. He did not know why ; and despite this fact he was glad to observe what was being done for Ontario. He was not jealous on this account, but on the other hand Quebec had also rights which should be respected by the Government. Hon. members should understand that Confederation could not prosper if Quebec was forgotten or its claims assailed; all could not be given to the other Provinces and nothing to Quebec.

The supplementary estimates were not yet submitted, but Quebec would certainly not have much consideration in them, and $60,000 would not be sufficient to satisfy this Province. It was true that the President of the Council, during the unfortunate excursion which he made to Charlevoix on the occasion of the last election, declared at Eboulements that Quebec had been ill-treated, but now that he was in office would it secure its share? They were aware of the influence exercised by this hon. gentleman—this he had shown in succeeding so cleverly in ratifying a contract of $1,500 he made with Mr. De Celles, hence they could count upon the influence and energy which the hon. gentleman had exhibited under these circumstances.

The injustice which was committed could hardly be magnified if the name of the Province of Quebec was struck from the list in the Department of Public Works. The time had arrived to protest vigorously in this relation. Without granting anything in return, the Government, nevertheless, collected the last cent of the revenues which Quebec contributed to the Federal Treasury. And what were these revenues? It was time to make them known, for they had no reason to be ashamed of them.

To this end he opened the Public accounts. The only two sources of revenue which it was desirable to consider were those obtained from Excise and Customs. There were besides the postal and canal revenues, &c., but these could not serve the purpose of comparison, for if in one port they were very considerable, the expenses equalled or exceeded them.

He had calculated the Customs and Excise revenues for Quebec and Ontario from the 30th of June, 1870, to the 30th of June, 1875, and the figures were as follows:—

Quebec—Customs, $31,501,689.83;
Excise, $7,949,815.85. Total, $39,451,504.69.

Ontario—Customs, $21,047,426.44;
Excise, $14,476,618.61. Total, $35,524,045.08.

Thus during this period Quebec had contributed $3,927,460.61 more than Ontario to the Federal coffers. If the public moneys were apportioned according to the revenue of each Province, Quebec should receive the largest allotment. He might be told, as the First Minister gave them the other day to understand,—that no Public Works were really required at present in the Province of Quebec. To this he would reply—ask the Lower Canadian members, and he would say to them, rise and speak. Say whether in your respective counties public works are not needed. The hon. member for Sorel, those from Soulanges, Joliette, the Ottawa district, the district of Three Rivers and the Eastern Townships, would assert that in their counties there are improvements required which they had long been asking the Government to have executed, but which the Government refused to execute. Were there not in Montreal and Quebec public works which the Government knew it was their duty at once to proceed with? The President of the Council knew well what the city of Quebec awaited as the price of his election. He defied the Hon. the President of the Council to say before the House that the City of Quebec is not crying out for the execution of certain public works which the Government neglect to carry out; and could not the member for Levis convince the First Minister of the necessity of building a post office at Levis, and to construct there the terminus of the Intercolonial Railway? The counties of Saguenay and Chicoutimi, which he had the honour to represent, had sent to the Department of Public Works numerous petitions for improvements needed in the interests of commerce and of navigation. In the interest of navigation they required a line of telegraph from Anticosti crossing to the North Shore and then up to Malbaie. In the interest of navigation and fisheries the Government ought to construct a maritime route from Sant au Cochon to Moisie; a breakwater was, moreover, required at Escoumains and another at Tadousac. Piers were also required at l'Anse St. Jean, Grande Baie, St. Anne and St. Fulgence. For two years he had been beseeching Government to send an engineer to the Saguenay River to examine that point known as the Bras de Chicoutimi and report how vessels could be enabled to reach Chicoutimi at all tides. Chicoutimi is the best commercial point on the river, with a population of nearly 4,000 and is the chief county town. Every year it was visited by about 50 sea-going vessels which loaded wood manufactured there. The population of the county is 22,000, and the county is about 180 miles from Quebec and 75 from the St. Lawrence; the only means of communication with the rest of the Province being through the Saguenay. The works required were the removal of boulders and the deepening of the channel. It would be idle of the Government to attempt to excuse itself on the grounds that no public works are required in the Province of Quebec. Last year the Government made a grant to the Northern Railway Co. of upwards of $2,000,000; and, moreover, had undertaken to construct a branch line of the Canada Pacific Railway from Georgian Bay to the Eastern extremity of Ontario. Within three years Ontario had received for public works at least $7,000,000 more than Lower Canada. In the Maritime Provinces, under the pretext of the Intercolonial Railway, we are building up branches which form a net work all over New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. Indemnities had been paid to these Provinces and to Manitoba; a railway had been made in Prince Edward Island, but all the while Quebec was ignored. The last-named Province is contributing to the utmost of her resources towards the completion of the North Shore Railway and the Northern Colonization, notwithstanding that these lines are understood to form part of the Pacific line. When the Liberal party came to power their chiefs asserted that these lines would be completed at the expense of the Dominion Government as forming part of the Pacific Railway, and if he was not mistaken, even the President of the Council had made this assertion. The Quebec Liberals, including Mr. Joly said likewise. In November last Mr. Joly presented the following motion which received the support of the Liberal party in the Local House, in regard to these lines:—"This House

Mr. CIMON.

"is of opinion that after the great sacrifices made by the Province of Quebec to promote this great enterprise, the Dominion Government should assist us in view of the fact that the North Shore and Northern Colonization Railways are virtually part of the Pacific Railway." The Prime Minister in his address to the electors of Lambton gave utterance to something in the same sense. He said, after having stated that he will construct the Georgian Bay Branch: "This included the construction of a short line from the mouth of the French River, on the Georgian Bay, to the south-east shore of Lake Nipissing, and a grant to encourage the extension of the projected lines from Quebec and Ontario." Doubtless the Premier did not offer these remarks solely with a view to carry the elections of 1874. Up to the present the hon. gentleman's promise so far as Ontario is concerned, has been fulfilled. If the Liberal party of Quebec were as sincere as they professed, the Province of Quebec, in consideration of the building of these two railways, would receive an indemnity of some millions. Thus the Local Government after having built the North Shore and the Northern Colonization, would be in a position to complete promptly the other necessary lines in the Province, amongst them the Quebec and Lake St. Jean Railway, which would open up a country capable of sustaining half a million souls. The Abbé Maurault thus writes of this territory:—

"What a fine country is this Lac St. Jean. Arriving on its beautiful shores one is struck with admiration. The eye cannot reach the extent of the immense sheet of water, for the atmosphere must be perfectly clear to see the opposite shore. The lake is 40 leagues in circumference; and the lands which are bathed by it, rising several leagues, are covered with maple, beech, poplar and elm, all attesting the fertility of the soil. The temperature is as mild as at Montreal; and grain and fruit ripen easily. There are to be found grapes, apples, plums, and such other fruits as we have in the district of Three Rivers. What a number of poor Canadian families could find a home and abundance there."

His object in thus diverting to this subject was to give an idea of the country he represented. Apart from the county of Simcoe there was none other in the Dominion which produced so much corn, as was testified by the census of 1871. The railway from Quebec to the Lake was necessary to the future prosperity of the Province of Quebec, as he could demonstrate were he permitted by the rules of the House. He protested against the injustice done his Province. The Lower Canadian Ministers who slept in their chairs, instead of watching the interests of the Province, were to be blamed for this injustice, for they seemed to have at heart everything but the interest of the Province. Better times would come. At present those on his side of the House could only protest. That is what he did, and what the people in their turn would do at the next election.

Mr. BARTHE said there were many things pointed out by the hon. gentleman which really ought to receive the attention of the Government. The complaints, he understood, were not new, and the grounds for them existed under the administration of the old Government. That they had so existed he very greatly regretted, as he also did that they should have been continued by the present occupants of the Treasury Benches. He had some time ago heard the hon. member for Bagot make a speech, in which he threatened the Administration with the vengeance of the people of the Province of Quebec—in which, indeed, he predicted that the Liberals would be swept from the polls, and all who supported the Government would be beaten. He did not believe that, but if anything would tend to defeat supporters of the Government in Quebec this would. The people of that Province paid a large share of the taxation of the country, and the same justice should be done to them as to the people of the other Provinces. He understood the task of the Government in this large Confederation was a difficult one, but the rural districts of Quebec wanted but little and on y what was fair and just. Justice ought to be rendered to them accordingly. The Maritime Provinces had had better terms and a large share of the public money, and it was time some attention was paid to the demands of Quebec. He would not vote for any motion which could be interpreted as a motion of want of confidence, but he appealed to the fairness of the Government to do justice to Quebec. He appealed to the members of the other Provinces to grant the same justice to Quebec as this Province has rendered to the others. This was the only way to maintain harmony in this great Confederation.

Mr. GAUDET said that in looking at the Budget of this year, he was obliged to say the Government, like an individual after some years of extravagant expenditures, was now in a bad pecuniary position. It was really to be regretted that a larger sum was not this year appropriated for public works, for the people of this country are in great misery, crying out for employment. The City of Montreal proved it in asking the Government to commence without delay the works on the Lachine Canal, in order that the poor people could have some means of gaining their subsistence. Quebec has also proved the same thing, for its highest dignity, the Lieutenant Governor, instead of giving his annual ball, sent the costs of it to a committee of relief to the poor. This was a generous and noble action which will pass to posterity, to his and their honour, and will show that this high dignitary is not a Conservative as described by the member of Drummond and Arthabaska, whose time was devoted to saving his own soul and damning his neighbours', but a true Conservative doing good among the people. He thought that his hon. friend from Chicoutimi complained with good reason, regarding the relative treatment of Ontario and Quebec. He would draw attention to another matter. One of the past cries on the hustings in the Province of Quebec, among the Liberals, had been directed against the extravagance of the Conservative leaders, and about the alleged waste of the public moneys; but what proved to be the case when one glanced over the Estimates with regard to the boasted economy of the present Administration? They found that the expenditure had been increased in connection with the various Departments in the following manner:—In legislation, $92,345; contingent expenses of Senate and Commons, $23,931; staff of the Sergeant at Arms $2,321; expenditures authorised by statutes, $5,000; Secretary of the Governor General, $2,198; Privy Council, $2,890; Department of Justice, $6,650; Department of Militia and Defence, $4,676; Secretary of State, $2,412.50; Secretary of the Provinces, $22,760; Receiver General, $3,472.50; Finance Department, $2,796; Customs, $2,665; Inland Revenue, $5,207.50; Public Works, $6,374; Postal Department $18,580; Marine and Fisheries Department, $3,805; Department of the Treasury, $150; and contingent expenses $25,000; total $273,231.50. If he had looked more in the two budgets, probably he would have found some things yet more extraordinary; but he thought he had said enough to call the attention of this House to this extravagant increase in the Departmental expenditures. If this amount was to-day added to expenditure for public works, we could employ a large number of people and thus give them assistance. The decrease of expenditure for public works and the general misery prevailing, were the causes of the exodus of Canadians to the United States through the Province of Quebec; and surely, if a proper policy were pursued, the contrary would be the case.

SUPPLY.

The House then went into Committee of Supply,—Mr. Scatcherd in the chair.

On item 80, Intercolonial Railway Extension into Halifax, $175,000,

Mr. YOUNG asked if it was the intention of the Government to have a formal opening of the Intercolonial?

Mr. PICKARD suggested if there were such an opening, it should be deferred until July, when the snow might be off the ground.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE supposed if the hon. member for Halifax invited them they must go to that city. Seeing the hon. member for North Ontario in his place, in justice to the officers of the boundary survey he would take this opportunity of stating that he had received a letter from Edward Eeles denying that Sunday was systematically desecrated on that service. From previous knowledge he had reason to believe that Major Cameron had devoted a great deal of care to this particular point, and it was but fair to that officer and those under him to make this statement.

Mr. GORDON said he would have been glad if this question had been set at rest by this letter. The writer had made statements directly at variance with his information, and he would require stronger proof before he receded from the position he himself assumed.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK asked if the item before the House included the purchase of the right of way?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said that had been paid over. The work was mostly under contract.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN enquired if that sum would complete the work?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said it would complete all under contract.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER asked whether it was proposed to deal with the interests of the Halifax City Railway Company by referring their claim to arbitration?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE was not aware that they had any claims; but if they had they must be dealt with according to law. A letter had been received from Mr. O'Brien complaining that certain rights would be violated by this extension; but no formal claim had been preferred.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said he had received a communication from Mr. O'Brien stating that the company had certain rights under the Provincial Act with which this Act seemed to conflict.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said Mr. O'Brien considered he had the right to the whole line of Water street, and that the Government had no right to intercept his track without offering compensation. He proposed to make a claim for damages. The line not yet having crossed the track of the company, he could understand why the Government had no formal intimation of their claim.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE pointed out that there was no special legislation with reference to the Halifax Street Railway; the same general laws applied to that company as to others.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said he would bring the matter up again on concurrence.

The item was then adopted.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RAILWAY.

On item No. 82, appropriating $200,000 for the Prince Edward Island Railway, Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the state of this railway when it came into the hands of the Government was most unsatisfactory. Messrs. Brydges and Ryder surveyed the road and reported that it would require at least an expenditure of $84,000 in order to put it in an efficient state of repair. After some negotiations with the Island Government another examination of the road was made by well-known engineers who reported that $500 a mile would be required to put it in a proper condition, and $5,000 to do work that the contractors were required to do by their contract. The first winter the Dominion Government had the road under control an extent of snow was developed that was quite astounding. It made it utterly impossible to work on the road. During the present winter great difficulties had been experienced, and it had been necessary to have snow protection in the shape of high fences. New fences had been put up along the road, but they had been found to be entirely useless, and they had to refence the entire line. The sum required would be expended as follows: high fencing for snow protection, $70,000; engine-house, Charlottetown, $20,000; additional rolling stock, $75,000; trackmen's houses, $10,000; additions to stations and some new stations, $10,000; other improvements, $15,000. This expenditure was considered to be absolutely necessary in order to work the road.

Mr. SINCLAIR said the Prince Edward Island Railroad had been taken off the contractor's hands in a bad condition. The rolling stock was inferior, and the engines were breaking down before they were three months working. The depth of the snow the first winter was so great the road was entirely blocked, and this winter it was only partially in operation. He hoped, however, when it was put in proper working order it would cover the working expenses, and after a few years might yield a small revenue. The Province was charged with the full amount for the construction of the road; whatever was gained by the building of the road being imperfect was by the contractors.

Mr. McKAY (Colchester) asked why the Government had built houses for the trackmen employed on the railroad? It was not done on the Intercolonial.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said it was necessary to build them where there were no houses for them to live in. There were several built by the Government on the Intercolonial Railroad.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said there were great complaints among respectable people in the neighbourhood of Bathurst at the manner in which water-tanks and other works on the Intercolonial had been built. It was alleged that instead of calling for tenders and giving them to the contractors who offered to do them for the lowest price, they were built by days' work and private jobbers. He merely mentioned this to the Premier that he might investigate the matter.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he had examined the buildings himself and found the cost of construction very moderate indeed. With regard to the station at Campbellton, which was built of brick, the party who originally took the contract failed, and the building was put up by days' labour at a lower price than the original contract. There might have been some irregularities, but if so he did not know of them. Some of the complaints referred to had reached him, and he had given strict injunctions to Mr. Schriber, an able and honest engineer, not to give out any work whatever except by public tender.

Mr. DOMVILLE — Who were the locomotives ordered from?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE — The Kingston Locomotive Works, as being the lowest tenderers.

Mr. DOMVILLE asked what was the policy of the Government in disposing of old material on those railroads? He asked this because there was a very large amount of iron that came off those roads, and the Premier had laid down as the policy of the Government that they would ask for tenders for the sale of such material. He (Mr. Domville) did not think that had been carried out, a very large amount of old stock in the shape of rails, wheels, &c., having been sold privately.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said his policy was not to sell any rails except such as were unfit for use. Those the Government sold had brought about $20 a ton, but they proposed, in the course of a few days, to ask the sanction of Parliament to furnish such rails to the lines immediately connecting with the Intercolonial, which would be supposed to bring traffic.

Mr. DOMVILLE wished to know how the Government intended to dispose of such old material as could not be re-used. What was the policy of the Government?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Our policy is to take the highest price we can get.

Mr. DOMVILLE—By tender or otherwise?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the price was originally fixed by tender. There were no rails sold that he was aware of. The Government were using a good many of them for the Prince Edward Island Railway.

Mr. DOMVILLE said he wanted to know whether the employés and officials under the Premier had a right to dispose of old material by private sale? He (Mr. Domville) was credibly informed that a large amount of these rails had been sold without being offered to public competition, no proper valuation having been arrived at. He wished to know the policy of the Government on this point.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—My policy is to get the biggest possible price. If we can get a larger sum by selling to an individual than by public competition, we will take it. The price has been $20 per ton, and I happen to know that is what the Grand Trunk Railroad Company have been selling their rails at.

Mr. DOMVILLE said he had private information which he believed would be sustained by the papers which the Government would bring down shortly, that a small amount of rails was put up to public competition and a certain price having been obtained for them the remainder were sold at the same rate. At Halifax the same pernicious system was carried out in procuring supplies, and in the purchase of the iron roof for the station at that city.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the iron roof was bought for $12,800; it was 400 x 80 feet span. The reason why no tenders was asked for was that it could not be purchased in Canada, and the Philadelphia firm from whom it was obtained had the patterns that suited the Government.

Mr. JONES (Leeds) said it was desirable that old stock should be sold by public tender, as was the case with private railroad companies in Ontario. With regard to the iron roof, he agreed with the Premier, there was no chance of getting it in Canada, for the iron used in such a work as the Chaudiere Bridge at Ottawa was taken from this very section, sent to Cleveland and brought back in a manufactured state. Without protection there would be no such industries in Canada.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said he knew that a large amount of old stock had been disposed of at Halifax last year by public auction. With regard to supplies he also happened to know that down to the smallest article contracted for, public tenders were invited. The complaint was that all this business went to St. John, although tenders were asked for at Halifax.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said it did not follow because there was no establishment in Canada that manufactured iron roofs, that tenders should not be invited. There was sharp competition in that business in the United States. With regard to old rails, he had stated the other day that he entirely approved of the Government policy with regard to the disposal of them. It was a mistake to sell old rails that would answer branch roads, which would be feeders of the Intercolonial. The correspondent of a newspaper in St. John, who misrepresented almost everything he said, had stated he (Mr. Mitchell) was opposed to the Richibucto branch of the Intercolonial getting the old rails for the completion of its track. He wished it to be distinctly understood that he had never said anything of the kind, but, on the contrary, was in favor of this important feeder getting the old rails. It was a matter deeply to be regretted that the road did not pass nearer to Richibucto.

Mr. DOMVILLE said one company had owed for rails 12 months. These sales should be by public tender, so that there would be no chance of buying rails in this fashion. He was sure the Premier did not endorse the transaction.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he did not know of any private sale.

Mr. DOMVILLE—Then the hon. gentleman ought to know.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Does the hon. gentleman think he can stand there and make every sort of insinuation without any definite charge?

Mr. DOMVILLE—I make the charge now.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Let the hon. gentleman move for his papers. These continual insinuations are improper and intolerable.

Mr. DOMVILLE—I am not prepared to be brow-beaten. I am able to make a charge as well as any other man, and I make the charge that a quantity of old rails were not paid for for 12 months. Furthermore, I make the statement that they were not paid for 30 days ago. The hon. gentleman had no right to say I made an unfair charge; I did not wish to make one; but I now place that charge flatly before the House.

Hon. Mr. BURPEE supposed the hon. gentleman meant 100 tons which were bought by Mr. Fairweather. The rails were sold by public auction at $26.26 per ton, and not the slightest advantage was given the purchaser. With reference to the iron rail matter, Mr. Shanly said the contract had been fulfilled. If they desired to change the grades, covers, &c., it was their own fault.

Mr. DOMVILLE said he made no charge against Mr. Fairweather of buying rails at improper or low prices. Furthermore, he would state that Mr. Fairweather never bought one ton of rails, and the hon. gentleman knew it.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. member for King's County, N.B., first made a charge in blank. If his charge related to Mr. Fairweather, he could say that that gentleman's company obtained a small quantity of rails. They asked first if they could obtain a loan of the rails, and this he declined. He enquired several times about payment, and then directed Mr. Brydges to enter suit unless the amount was paid immediately. That was some months ago, and he believed the money was paid.

Mr. DOMVILLE said he was prepared to prove, from public documents, that that gentleman never got one ton of rails, and the hon. Minister knew it.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he had Mr. Fairweather's letters on the subject.

Mr. DOMVILLE said the railway that got the rails was the River du Loup.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Well, he was the party who applied for them.

Mr. DOMVILLE said there was no item in the Public Accounts to show that Mr. Fairweather bought the rails.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—They are charged to the company.

Mr. DOMVILLE—He is not the company.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—He is the President of the company.

Mr. DOMVILLE—He is not the President.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—At any rate he acted as business man for the company, and communicated with the Government. The hon. gentleman might quibble out his point until he was tired, that fact remained.

Mr. DOMVILLE said he had been accused of making vague charges, but he should be backed up when he stated fact. He asked the hon. Minister to confine himself to the letter. There could be no harm done; he merely asked that the Government should have a proper system of doing this business. The rails were not sold at the highest prices.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—They were.

Mr. DOMVILLE—They were not.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Then I give a flat contradiction to the assertion.

Mr. DOMVILLE—The hon. gentleman may contradict as much as he pleases; I should like him to show during what period he based his prices.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE reiterated his statement, the rails were sold at the highest price.

Mr. WORKMAN claimed to know something about the price of rails. He negotiated for the purchase of 2,000 tons of second-hand rails, and he refused them delivered in Montreal at $16.50 per ton.

An Hon. Member—When was that?

Mr. WORKMAN—During last year; I had my choice of several kinds.

An Hon. Member—Were the rails sold to Mr. Fairweather?

Mr. WORKMAN—They were rails used by the Grand Trunk.

In answer to an hon. member,

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he could not state the price obtained for the rails in question.

Hon. Mr. BURPEE—They were sold at $26 per ton.

Mr. WORKMAN—That is $10 more than what I refused rails for.

Mr. DOMVILLE said it was a most pernicious system when a member of the Government should be a co-partner in a company, and that rails should be sold to the company, which did not pay up for months.

The item was then passed.

LACHINE CANAL.

On item 85, Lachine Canal, $1,200,000.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN asked the First Minister to explain the position of that work.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said sections Nos. 1 and 2 were in the hands of the contractors to whom the hon. gentlemen had let the work, and they had made very bad progress indeed. A re-arrangement was made with an additional partner this last season. They were about cancelling the contract, but hoping that better headway would be made, they allowed this new arrangement to be entered into and the work had progressed better since. On No. 3 very little progress has been made, and very little could be done. Nos. 9 and 10 were let about the time the House met. Nos. 11, 8, 9, 7, 4, 5 and 6 are all being let at the present moment, and they hoped they would be under contract before the House was prorogued.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER asked whether the policy of the Government had not been changed with reference to the widening of the canal, instead of making a new cut.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman would remember that Mr. Page, in his report of 1874, recommended a new canal a little above St. Gabriel's Lock, to enter there on the north side, and traverse the whole distance to Lachine. Mr. Page afterwards modified his opinion, and believed it was better to have one canal with a larger sectional area, than two canals with the area as at present; in other words, that two canals of the ordinary width would be equal in carrying capacity to one 175 feet wide at the top, and 100 feet at the bottom. A great deal of discussion took place on the point, and it was finally resolved to adopt Mr. Page's later recommendations—to make the canal wider than was originally intended, and have one instead of two. The engineer had a fear that by passing into the low ground between Montreal and Lachine he would get into a place where it would be difficult to find a good bottom, and that after an artificial bottom had been made the fissures in the rocks above would cause the water to escape, and there would be complaints for damages. The present canal passed a little above Coté St. Paul, which was chosen on account of the good bottom, and the plan was to enlarge that and thereby avoid possible suits for damages from the escape of water through porous soil.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL asked to what extent the working of the canal would interfere with the mills?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said it was one of Mr. Page's objects in the first place, in recommending the double canal, that after a certain time the water might pass through the canal and supply the mills, but he came to the conclusion that the utmost good was to be gained by the present scheme. The mills would be interfered with for one winter.

Mr. JONES (Leeds)—What arrangements have the Government made with reference to the mills?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Some of them have the lease of such water as the Government can spare. Some have a claim for damages on that account. I am not prepared to say to what extent it may or may not be the case. It involves a legal question, and it would scarcely be proper for me to give any opinion on it.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK enquired whether the Government had changed the plans with reference to the enlargement of the Lachine Canal?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE I have already explained all, that we are not going to make a new cut, but enlarge the old canal.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK—Will it be necessary to purchase any property?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Oh yes; a little here and there.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK—On each side?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—On both sides. In some cases, we have a great deal more than we want, and in others, we have not enough.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL, as he had done on a previous occasion, asked whether No. 3 section of the Lachine Canal would be deepened to 19 feet, as sections 1 and 2 were to be—in order to meet the requirements particularly of the coal trade between Montreal and the Maritime Provinces? This was also a matter of great importance in the interest of the manufacturers; as such an improvement would save heavy expense in the way of cartage. At all events, this should be done at some future time.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE did not consider that it was the duty of the Dominion Government to furnish a harbour for Montreal, but they were bound to provide a canal suited for the traffic carried on along the River St. Lawrence and on the Lakes. From St. Gabriel's lock down, it had however been thought advisable to make two large basins, and one large, triangular basin, of sufficient depth to enable heavy craft to enter to that distance; but to add another mile and a half, or rather three miles of wharfage to Montreal harbour, seemed to him to be a work entirely outside of the responsibilities of the Government. This the Harbour Commissioners should do; the lock on section No. 3 would, however, have a depth of 14 feet on the mitre sills, in anticipation of having this depth at a future time.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK asked whether the proposed enlargement of the canal according to the present plans, required an expropriation of any land involved in the suit which caused considerable comment last summer?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—We will need very little of this land, but I think we must take a little in two or three points. Our own border is irregular there—in a zig-zag line; some must be taken from both sides.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK—But a very small portion?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Yes; from 25 to 30 feet, and in some places, perhaps, 40 or 50 feet.

Mr. MASSON—But for an inconsiderable distance?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—We are making the canal wider—to Coté St. Paul 200 feet, and 175 feet, I think, above. I cannot tell the exact quantity of land which we will need.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL, with regard to section 13, thought that the Premier's reasons for not deepening it to 19 feet were not very logical. The hon. gentleman did not conceive that it was the duty of the Government to increase the harbour accommodation to the extent of $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles, but this the hon. gentleman had given, although sufficient accommodation was not provided, in his opinion, taking the requirements of our future trade into consideration.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—This would not be providing for the commerce that passed through our canals, but for that which, coming from the east, cannot pass up the canal to the point desired.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—The hon. gentleman has stated such provisions must be made by the Harbour Trust; but this Commission is the creature of the Government, which was not satisfied with the system adopted under the late Administration, when the shipping, the city and other public interests had the majority on the Board which public opinion controlled.

Now, public opinion has no control over the Board which is a creature of the Government, and subject to its will and law; and you ought not to tell us that it is their duty.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Why should I not?

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—For this reason—they are under your control.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—No; not as to the harbour.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—The hon. gentleman knows what has happened; he has removed some of them, and he thus controls the majority. His dictum is law on the Board. If the latter had been left as it was it would have been controlled by public opinion; now this is not the case.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Because public opinion did not control them they were removed.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—My impression was that it was for an entirely different reason. If I chose I could give it, but that is not the point I am now discussing. The great shipping interests of the country demand the deepening of the Canal as mentioned; and if this was done it would be looked upon as a boon.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER called attention to the hour, and thought it was a great mistake to endeavour to press forward the work of the Session too rapidly, as they could do justice after this fashion neither to the country nor to themselves. The items under consideration were important, and required a good deal of attention at their hands.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Hon. gentleman are beginning to ask when we are to get through. Thirteen days have already been spent over the Estimates. Never on any occasion since Confederation has so much time been taken up with them.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—There has not been much discussion on the items.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—The hon. gentleman's supporters occupied the time of the House at considerable length before we went into Committee of Supply.

Mr. MASSON—What are we here for if not to lay our views before the country? We are not here to register the decrees of the Government. If any complaint is to be preferred it ought to be made in Parliament.

On item 86, appropriating $60,000 for the St. Lawrence Canal, Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE stated that the entire estimated cost of working these canals, 10 feet draft, excluding the Welland Canal, was $18,058,347.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—Does that include the deepening of the river?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE replied in the affirmative. The cost of deepening the canals to 12 feet would be $12,540,900, making a difference of $5,000,000. The estimated cost of deepening the Welland Canal to 12 feet was $9,250,000, and the 14 feet estimate was $12,250,000; total cost for the 14 feet draft $30,290,347, and for the 12 feet navigation $21,790,000. He might as well say that they were making certain works on the Welland Canal 14 feet, whilst the locks facing the mountains would be made to 14 feet by raising the walls. In all places where they could raise the walls two feet they would do so. The Government had decided to test the power of a chain tug at Williamsburg, and it was said that a chain tug would overcome the Cedar Rapids. If this were so it would have the effect of materially lessening the cost of the locks.

The House adjourned at Thirty minutes past Two o'clock p. m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, March 31, 1876.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Ten minutes past Three o'clock.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE moved that when the House adjourns it shall stand adjourned to Saturday, April 1st, at two o'clock in the afternoon, and that Government Measures shall have precedence on that day. He remarked that he did not propose that the House should sit in the evening.

The motion was carried.

THE STEEL RAIL PURCHASE.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT having moved the House into Committee to consider the ways and means for raising the supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Mr. BOWELL stated that before the Speaker left the Chair, he begged to bring under the notice of the House a question which in all probability would have been brought before it in another shape had the papers, which were moved for by the hon. member for Cumberland sometime ago, been brought down. On the 18th of February, the hon. member for Cumberland had placed on the notice paper a motion asking for all papers and documents, and advertisements and all other matters connected directly or indirectly with the purchase of a large quantity of steel rails. A short time afterwards the motion was made by his hon. friend, and passed by the House. Since then, however, they had not been brought down.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—What has not been brought down?

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—The papers connected with the steel rail purchase.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I laid the whole of the contracts on the Table six weeks ago.

Mr. BOWELL—The Hon. Premier is in error. The papers asked for have not been brought down. What was asked for was contained in the motion which was carried, and was as follows :—

“Return of copies of all correspondence relating to the contracts entered into by the Government of Canada or any Department thereof, for the purchase of steel rails in the year 1874, including correspondence, if any, with parties before the advertisement for tenders—copies of all the advertisements and names of newspapers in which they were published, with date of first insertion in each of them; all correspondence on the subject of further delay in the time of receiving tenders, copies of all advertisements postponing the time for receiving tenders, with name of newspapers in which such notice was published; copies of all tenders received for the supply of steel rails, with all correspondence in relation to them; and names of persons by whom or through whom such tenders were submitted or made; all correspondence with any of the parties tendering, as to the quantity of rails to be supplied by them; copies of contracts entered into and of all correspondence relating to them; copies of contracts for the transport of steel rails from Montreal to the different parts of the Dominion, with any changes made in such contracts, and correspondence relating to such changes at the time the contracts were entered into, with a statement of the dates of payment of all moneys on such contracts, the present location of the rails, and all charges for transport or storage of the same.”

Surely the Premier did not pretend to say these papers had been laid before the House. Had they been, they would have been laid before the Printing Committee, printed, and distributed among members long before this.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I am quite sure that I called the attention of the hon. member of Cumberland at the time to the fact of their being there.

Mr. BOWELL—To what do you allude?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I remember handing the hon. gentleman the report of the Chief Engineer, and stating as I laid them on the Table, that it would be difficult to obtain any further report, until towards the close of the Session, if even then. I perfectly recollect making that statement.

Mr. BOWELL did not remember this; but supposing that this was said, it did not change the fact, that the papers asked for were not laid on the table, nor did it meet his point. The motion asked for certain papers, which had not been submitted. The only document he had seen in this relation, he held in his hand, and it was nothing more nor less than what appears in the Public Works' report. There must be some correspondence in this connection, and it could not be so voluminous as to require a couple of months to get it ready. He should, therefore, before the Speaker left the Chair, make the following motion, seconded by Mr. Kirkpatrick:—

“That the Speaker do not now leave the chair, but that it be resolved, that the purchase by the Government of 50,000 tons of steel rails, without the previous consent of Parliament, was an unconstitutional exercise of the Executive power, and that such purchase was premature and unwise, and has caused great pecuniary loss to the country.”

The best evidence—it ought to be at least, to those on the Treasury Benches to show that this motion embodied the views which had been held by the gentleman who has now governed the country, could be given by reading short extracts from the Premier's own speeches, containing these declarations of opinion and principle when in Opposition. It must be in the recollection not only of every member of the House, but of every elector, particularly in Ontario, that during the late elections one of the principal planks in the platform of the hon. gentlemen opposite, when they went to the people was, that public money should not be taken or used by any Administration without the previous consent of Parliament. They remembered very well that the Parliament of Ontario had passed an Act, placing at the disposal of the then Administration, of which the late Hon. John Sanfield Macdonald was leader, the sum of $1,500,000 to aid in the construction of railways in that Province, and the principal objection taken to the constitutionality of that Act, by the gentlemen now in power, was that the Government was empowered by Parliament to distribute that money without first coming down to the House, and asking for additional authority to do so. Not only was this said to be a breach of the constitution, but also a usurpation of power, that could be used not only to the detriment of the people, but to keep them in office, and no man denounced the principle more strongly than the Minister of Justice. Discussing this matter, the Premier on the 5th July 1872, in the city of Montreal, employed the following language:—

“The policy of the Liberal Party is to make Parliamentary Government supreme, to place the Cabinet directly under the control of Parliament, and to take from them the power of using any portion of the people's money without a direct vote for its service. I might point out as an instance of the course the Liberal Party will pursue, that in Ontario, when the Reform Government came into power, they repealed a portion of the Act granting aid to railways, so that all grants had to receive the sanction of the House before a farthing could be paid.”

This declaration of opinion held by the hon. gentleman when in Opposition, was received, as the report mentions, with immense cheering and thundering applause. At a later period the same hon. gentleman made use of the following language:—

“What had been the great issue during the election. It was the same as during the Ontario election of 1871. It was simply to decide whether the thirteen ministers at Ottawa were to usurp legislative as well as administrative authority—were practically to become a political oligarchy at the head of our system of Government. They assumed to have the right to have the money not only voted to them as a Government, but voted to them in such a way as to give them the disposal of it according to their own views.”

This was also received with great cheering as the fundamental principle of the party. In this instance not only had the present Premier spent money without it having first been voted by Parliament, but he had entered into contracts for the supplying of large quantities of material to the value of nearly $3,000,000, portions of which, it was supposed, would be required before this time, but other portions not for years, and on this he spent a sum of money amounting to between $2,000,000 and 3,000,000 without consulting Parliament until after the contracts had been entered into. It had been said in justification of that purchase that the market at that time was falling, and that a great saving was affected by their going into the market at that time. Exception, however, was taken to that declaration, and subsequent events have shown that those who took the objection were right. The Finance Minister in his budget speech of 1874, prognosticated in doleful language a stagnation in trade. It was evident from that fact that he must have considered that the prosperity which had created the high prices paid for all kinds of goods was likely to take a turn downward. And if the Premier had paid any attention to the markets of the world, he must have come to the conclusion that he was going into the market to make a heavy purchase when he was not justified in doing so. Perhaps there was no better authority than the London Economist, from which he would read to shew that the market was then rapidly falling, the issue of which for October 10th, 1874, said:---

"If prices are any guide in the course of business in the iron trade, that industry is still on the decline; buyers are naturally unwilling to place orders for iron now when the market is continually becoming more favourable to them."

The same paper also made the following statement with regard to the market:---

November 7th—"Finished iron, especially rails and heavy iron, is in so extremely low demand that many factories are closing."

December 5th—"No revival has occurred in the demand for finished iron, prices still giving way."

December 26th—"The production of finished iron, though sustained at fair rates in some districts, is on the whole dull and depressed."

January 2nd, 1875—"The gloom and depression now reported in the iron trade on the whole appears to arise from the poor prospects manufacturers see of returning activity at anything like profitable rates."

February 6th—"Notwithstanding the cessation of work in two counties of South Wales district, no special activity is apparent in the others. In the finished iron a fair trade is reported, but the same consideration as to dropping prices of fuel have effect."

March 6th—"Prices of iron are held up by the cessation of work at South Wales, but the tendency would otherwise appear to be still downward. Orders given out are all reported small, and of the kind denoting a restricted demand in the absence of confidence as to prices."

April 3rd—"Consumers await a further reduction of quotations, and producers find coal getting cheaper and cheaper, and wages are steadily tending in a downward direction."

May—"Market steadier."

June—"Assumed a more demoralized appearance."

July—"Dull and unsettled."

August 7th—"Prices still tend downward."

September—"More orders, but for prompt delivery prices still tending down."

October 2nd—"Little appearance of activity."

November 6th—"Large manufacturing firm closed for want of orders."

December 4th—"A little increased activity to complete contracts before Christmas, and partly from a fall in prices."

January 1st, 1876—"Iron manufactures remain depressed."

February 5th—"The price of iron is still giving way."

February 26th—"In the iron trade there is increased dullness. Prices continue to fall without showing the least tendency to check themselves."

That depressed state of the trade should have been known at least to those who were going to invest so largely as the Government had done. It was also well known that the high prices paid in 1871, 1872 and 1873 had the effect of establishing some 14 new Bessemer steel works in the United States, and the result of such increase in the manufacturing power of the country ought to have suggested to the Hon. Premier that prices would go down. Surely the Hon. Prime Minister before entering upon an expenditure of two or three million dollars should have obtained information on the subject. If members would turn to the report of Mr. Brydges in regard to the purchase of rails for the Intercolonial Railway they would find that he used the following language:--

"There is no doubt whatever that at the close of 1873 and the beginning of 1874 that the steel rail market in England was well known to be in a declining condition, and no prudent man would buy rails at that time unless he wanted them for immediate delivery."

Yet this report made by his own officer, in his hand, he rushed into the market, and did that which Mr. Brydges said no prudent man would do. The price paid for these 50,000 tons of steel rails was $54.60 per ton delivered in this country. That amounted to the sum of $2,730,000. None of these rails, so far as they knew, had yet been used for the purpose for which they were purchased. It was true it was said that a portion of these rails were to be used in the completion of the Intercolonial Railroad. But it was evident the Government having got into the difficulty were desirous of getting those rails out of the way in some manner or other, and this was the mode they had adopted to do so. It was stated that rails had been bought in England free on board for £7 15s., or $37.72 Canadian currency, per ton. If they allowed, what was giving a wide margin, $4 a ton for freight and insurance, that would give as the price at the present time, $41.72 per ton, making a total of $2,086,000, or an actual bona fide loss, without considering the question of interest, of $644,000 in this purchase alone, but when interest was considered it would be found to exceed $1,000,000. He knew it had been denied that such rails could be purchased for £7.15 per ton, free on board, at the present day.

Mr. WOOD—You can get them cheap if you get them for that.

Mr. BOWELL said he made the statement on the authority of Senator Macpherson, who had given that as the price in a speech delivered recently in the Upper House. That gentleman had assured him (Mr. Bowell) that he made the statement on the authority of the contractor who had made the purchase, and whose name could be furnished if necessary. One of the principal reasons given by the Minister of Public Works for going into the English market at the time he did, was that he had been strongly advised to do so by Mr. Darling and Mr. Workman of Montreal. That statement was made in the House of Commons on the 12th of March, last year. Now, it seemed to him (Mr. Bowell) that the report of Mr. Brydges should have guided the Premier instead of the advice of hardware men, if any were given, who were expecting to make a profit out of the transaction. In a letter written by Mr. Darling and published in the Montreal papers on the 15th October, 1875, that gentleman has used these words:

“On the third of October I obtained an interview with the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie for the purpose of requesting that the time for receiving tenders be extended to such a date as would permit parties here corresponding with the manufacturers in Europe which could not have been done in sufficient time had the date originally fixed upon been adhered to.”

It was evident that Mr. Darling knew nothing whatever of the intention of the Government to purchase these 50,000 tons of steel rails until after he had seen the advertisement in the Montreal Herald. Immediately after reading it he proceeded to Ottawa and had that interview with the Premier. Mr. Workman also, during the contest in Montreal West, was reported in the Herald to have said:—

Mr. BOWELL.

Mr. WORKMAN said he had no fixed date in his mind when he made that statement. He might also be permitted to say the report as given in the Herald was not taken verbatim, but was carried to the office without any notice having been taken at the time.

Mr. BOWELL said it was not a question as to date. What he wished to point out was that the hon. member for Montreal West, like Mr. Darling, had not given any advice to the Premier upon the propriety of the purchasing of these steel rails until after he had seen the advertisement in the Herald. The hon. member was reported to have said:—“He saw at once that the time was too short, as hardware men could not acquire the proper knowledge to enable them to make the tenders properly.” These declarations showed that there was a discrepancy between the Premier and the hon. member for Montreal West and Mr. Darling, who had had an interview with the Hon. Minister of Public Works, and he (Mr. B.) would leave the contradiction to be settled between them.

Mr. WORKMAN—I never had any interview with the Minister of Public Works on the subject, and I never said I had.

Mr. BOWELL—That only makes it stronger against the Minister of Public Works, because we are told by him that Messrs. Darling and Workman strongly advised the purchase.

Mr. WORKMAN—I did so in a letter, but had no interview.

Mr. BOWELL asked if that letter had not been sent after the appearance of the advertisement.

Mr. WORKMAN—It was after the advertisement came out. I have no copy of the letter. It was one of those impromptu letters.

Mr. BOWELL said it was after the appearance of the advertisement, and consequently after the Government had decided on their policy, and therefore the advice alluded to could not have been given. The Premier had also remarked that he was guided by Mr. Fleming's advice, while on the other hand, Mr. Brydges, who had certainly paid closer attention to the markets of the world, and who had great experience in the purchase of railway iron, reported to the contrary. What made the matter look somewhat singular was the fact that the policy having been adopted to purchase two or three million dollars worth of rails, the notice for tenders should have been advertised in only one paper, so far as he could learn, and for a period of seven days only, including the date of its first appearance and the day on which the tenders should be at the City of Ottawa. The advertisement though dated Ottawa, Sept. 29th, did not appear in the Montreal Herald until the 2nd of October, and the tenders were to be opened on the 8th of October. When the Minister of Militia required some $150,000 worth of military clothing, he had advertised in newspapers all over the country, paying some seven or eight hundred dollars for that purpose; and yet the Minister of Public Works, calling for tenders involving an expenditure of two or three millions of dollars, advertised in but one paper and for only seven days. In a telegram published by the hon. gentleman in the Ministerial press, the following sentence occurs:—"No steel rails were purchased by me from any Montreal firm." The impression left on his (Mr. Bowell's) mind on reading that was, that the contracts had been entered into with the English firms exclusively, without the intervention of the Montreal merchants.

But before passing to that he desired to refer to all facts connected with this matter, for fear that he might be misunderstood. After Mr. Darling had had an interview with the Minister of Public Works, and after the letter was written by the hon. member for Montreal West to this Minister, asking for an extension of time, which was given, advertisements inviting tenders were inserted in a number of papers in Montreal and elsewhere. He had omitted this fact when dealing with that point. Coming back to where he started, he found that immediately after that telegram had appeared, the hon. member for Montreal West was reported to have said in one of his election speeches:—"That the firm of Cooper, Fairman &

"Co. tendered at £11 5s., or £11 4s. 9d. under him (Mr. Workman) and they obtained a contract for a certain quantity of those rails." Now, no one having read the statement of the hon. member could come to any but one conclusion.

Mr. WORKMAN—Would the hon. gentleman allow me to make a remark. I did not know the facts of the case when I made those statements. That report is not correct; that was not what I stated.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—What did you state?

Mr. WORKMAN—That Cooper, Fairman & Co. were agents of a Company in England, and merely acting as agents. I believe it was the Mersey Steel and Iron Co. which obtained a commission—this was what I said. I beg the hon. member not to quote remarks which I never made.

Mr. BOWELL—It is somewhat difficult for one to know what the hon. gentleman did say, as he denies the correctness of the report of his own paper.

Mr. WORKMAN—I tell you what I did say.

Mr. BOWELL was very much afraid, if the hon. gentleman's interpretation was correct, that he could not discover what he really did say during the election. This course was apt to justify the charge too often made, that gentlemen seeking the suffrages of electors indulged in language which they should not use, and stated as facts that which were not such. The hon. gentleman should not complain when quotations are made from reports of speeches made by the hon. gentleman which were published in the organ of the party of which he was a member, and which had given him its undivided support during that election.

Mr. SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman stated distinctly that he was not correctly reported; and I think that this is sufficient.

Mr. BOWELL—I understand that; but the main facts as stated in the report are nevertheless the same.

Mr. WORKMAN—Yes.

Mr. BOWELL—That Cooper, Fairman & Co., did tender and receive a contract for these rails, and although he might not have stated so distinctly a contract for rails had been reserved by them. The hon. gentleman now tells the House that this company acted as an agent for an English firm. He did not suppose that any one in the House or country supposed for a moment that Cooper, Fairman & Co. manufactured these rails, as it is known that a large proportion of the wholesale men act as agents in connection with such matters. If he recollected right, the hon. gentleman stated in another speech that he (Mr. Workman) was an agent for a large number of persons. He found that the hon. gentleman stated also during the same contest that he had hoped to have received a contract.

Mr. WORKMAN—Yes.

Mr. BOWELL—But others were lower, including the firm of Cooper, Fairman & Co., of which Mr. Workman said in his speech one "Charles Mackenzie was a partner, although not a full partner, and that this firm were the agents for the West "Cumberland Iron and Steel Co."

Mr. WORKMAN—That was a mistake. I afterwards learned that it was for the Mersey Iron and Steel Co.

Mr. BOWELL was quite prepared to accept this explanation, but what he desired to point out was, that though the purchase was made through these agents, they benefitted by the transaction, and that it was an actual purchase from or through them. He had shown by quotations from the speeches of the hon. gentlemen opposite—which could be multiplied by the score, not only of the Minister of Public Works, but also the Minister of Justice, that the use and expenditure of public money, without the assent and vote of Parliament, was an unconstitutional act, deserving condemnation at the hands of the country; by reading extracts from the London Economist, showing that the markets were continually falling, when this purchase was made; by quotations from Mr. Brydges' letter, that at the very time the Government went into the market for this purpose, he (Mr. Brydges) had reported strongly against purchases being effected, and that too, sometime previously to the actual purchase, on the ground that the markets were steadily declining, and that no "prudent man" would then buy rails; and further, from public documents, evidence that the declarations of the Minister of Public Works in the House last year, and the letters of Mr. Darling, and the speeches of the hon. member for Montreal West, that the statement of the Premier was not accurate.—These gentlemen could decide among themselves who was wrong and who was right. He had also established from facts, and the circumstances surrounding the giving of the notice and the advertisements for tenders, that if it were done by any others than persons connected with the Government, it would be looked upon at least with grave suspicion; for he could not conceive, nor did he think the country could understand how any commercial man, or any business man, much less the Government, when asking for tenders for the supply of materials to the value of two or three millions of dollars would give only three, four or five working days, or seven at the extreme, for tenders to be sent to the city of Ottawa; also, that none of the rails purchased for the Pacific Railway had been used for the purpose for which they were purchased. And more, that the contracts for the construction of the road which had been given out were of a very limited character; consequently the rails could not be used, perhaps, for one or two years to come; the result being an actual loss to the country of over a million of dollars. That those who supported the Government would sustain this policy he had no doubt; still he was quite satisfied that no prudent man, to use the language of Mr. Brydges, would have gone into the market under the same circumstances, and no matter what the vote of the House might be, the country would echo the sentiment that no Government had the right to use the public money as it had been employed in this instance without the consent of Parliament, more particularly when the articles purchased were not needed, and would not be required for years to come.

Mr. WORKMAN hoped that he would say nothing during this discussion that would irritate or annoy any hon. member. The continual harping on this subject which had taken place, was, in his opinion, both unaccountable and unjustifiable. He had read the Government's advertisement for tenders in the Montreal Herald in the beginning of October, and seeing that the time allowed was too short, he wrote to the Premier accordingly, and before he received a reply, which was within two days, the time was extended nearly five weeks, showing clearly that there was no disposition on the part of the Premier to give the contract to friends. Having large transactions in iron he was naturally anxious to secure a part of the contract.

Mr. BOWELL---Was that after the interview with Mr. Mackenzie?

Mr. WORKMAN---I did not see or speak to Mr. Mackenzie on the subject, as he was in Ottawa and I in Montreal. I wrote to him, however, and received a prompt reply. He (Mr. Workman) now held in his hand a letter from his London bankers, dated October 24th, 1874, in reply to one he had written on this steel rail contract, which showed the then state of the market, and the means taken to secure the fullest information on the subject. The following is an extract from that letter:---

"We have taken the greatest possible pains with the view of getting quotations for the steel rails. In most instances we have found masters decline to quote, on the ground of not desiring to commit themselves so far ahead. In the few cases where we have been able to get offers the price has been put up to the exorbitant figure of £12 per ton. The only way in which, as far as we can see, you would have any chance of doing business is, if you are willing to buy the rails now, to be started at the works during the winter, and shipped to Canada in the spring if you got the contract. On these terms we could buy 5,000 tons at about £9 10s. per ton, and we would be willing to grant our six months' acceptance for a small commission. If you failed in getting the contract, the rails would be suitable in pattern for the American market. We have not been able to get much information regarding the price at which markets are likely to tender. They are losing money at present prices, £9 10s., and it is difficult to believe they will take so large an order at a loss. You should cable us if you desire to operate in the manner instructed."

In reply he had cabled as follows:—

"Purchase the rails as specified in your letter of 24th, at price quoted. Please give makers' names."

To which he received in reply:—

"Present price £10 net; we wait your reply; do you notice the stipulation regarding inspection. Reply by cable."

Acting on this telegram he again cabled, and ordered the purchase at the rate named, but he did not even then succeed, because in the meantime he had applied to Ottawa for the Government specifications concerning these rails.

That specification required the rails to be of best quality, and that 90 per cent of them should be in lengths of 24 feet, 26 feet, 28 feet and 30 feet. These were very unusual lengths. They were more easily laid and more difficult to make. The stringent condition of the specification undoubtedly added to the price of the rails, probably to the extent of six shillings a ton. With regard to his statement at a public meeting in Montreal, in reference to the unjustifiable charge against the Premier, he desired to say that he made it at a moment's notice, without looking to dates or consulting any one upon the subject. He considered it only simple justice to vindicate at once the Hon. Premier's action in this matter.

In reference to the contract, he maintained that it had been accepted with the possibility of only a very small profit. He, himself, was willing to accept a profit of one and a half per cent.; yet he did not get the contract, and he did not complain, because his tender was not the lowest. He took a good deal of trouble before tendering, to ascertain what the freight would be, and he was unable to make a contract with either Messrs. Allan or the Dominion Steamship Company on this side of the Atlantic. The Canada Shipping Company undertook to contract for 5,000 at $22 a ton by steamer, and $20 a ton by sailing vessel. Bar iron they undertook to carry for $17 a ton by steamer, and $15 by sailing vessel, and this difference was caused by the rails being more difficult to handle. When he (Mr. Workman) saw the amounts of the lowest tenders accepted by the Government, and published in the Montreal papers, he then stated that they were the lowest prices at which steel rails had been purchased within his 40 years' experience. At this time he wrote to the Hon. Premier congratulating him as having made the best purchase of steel rails that could be made at that time, or ever had been made, quality and specification considered.

Mr. BOWELL—Would you purchase them under the circumstances when they were not required for many years?

Mr. WORKMAN said that was another question. The hon. member for Hastings had given them a re-hash of a speech delivered in the Senate a few days previously, and he had stated that steel rails could be bought in Liverpool now at £7 15s. sterling. The previous day he had received a circular from England, dated 15th March, in which steel rails were quoted at £9.10. This was for the same quality as required by the Government. There were what were called "job lots" of rails which could be bought for less than the market price; but during the present months when the hon. gentleman said steel rails were £7 15s., Staffordshire bar iron were £8 10s. The hon. gentleman had said that no prudent man would have made the purchase at that time. He (Mr. Workman) called himself a prudent man, but he had entered into contracts when the market was as low as he thought it would go in all human probability. It, however, continued to fall, and to-day he could replace the same goods at prices far below what he then paid. In conclusion, he reiterated that these rails were of the best quality, and had been bought from some of the best makers in the world, and at the lowest possible price at which they could be obtained at the time.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he had proposed to devote a little time to this matter on going into Committee of Supply, but as the hon. gentleman had again endeavoured to block the way, he would deal with it now. Perhaps it was better to consider the events consecutively in the order of their occurrence. He would in the first place read the memorandum of the

Mr. WORKMAN.

Chief Engineer on the subject. It was as follows:—

"CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,
"OFFICE OF THE ENGINEER-IN-CHIEF,
"OTTAWA, March 24, 1876.
"Memorandum—Steel Rails.

"During the summer of 1874, advices from England shewed a great decline in the price of steel rails. It was generally considered that they had all but reached the lowest rate, and that an excellent opportunity presented itself of providing a quantity of rails at lower prices than they could in all probability be obtained for at any future period.

"Early in August, 1874, the Chief Engineer mentioned the matter to the Minister of Public Works, and advised that steps should be taken to secure such quantity as might be deemed advisable. On the 13th of the same month he renewed his recommendation and furnished a draft specification to be acted on if thought best.

"The Chief Engineer was absent from Ottawa until near the end of September, when he again renewed his recommendation to secure the rails.

"A notice calling for tenders on the 8th of October was advertised on the 29th September. On the 3rd of October the time was extended for receiving tenders until the 16th November, and specifications, dated October 3rd, were printed; by the latter, a copy of which is attached hereto, it was provided that tenders would be received on the 16th November following.

"It was felt that to advertise for tenders for rails for the Pacific Railway, or for any considerable portion of it, would defeat the object in view, viz:—to secure rails at a low rate—and hence the character of the advertisement and specifications—"Pacific Railway" is not mentioned in either, and tenders for a large quantity are not invited.

"Tenders for the delivery of 350,000 tons were received, the prices ranging from $53.53 to $82.73 per ton, delivered in Montreal.

"The average rate was $57.00 per ton.

"The lowest tenders were:—

From Cox & Green, for West Cumberland Co.....	$53 53 per ton
" Jos. Robinson, for Ebbw Vale Co.....	53 53 " "
" Cooper, Fairman & Co, for Mersey Co.....	54 26 " "
" Post & Co., for Guest & Co.....	54 62 " "

"Contracts were entered into with these parties at the above prices for all the rails they were willing to deliver, viz:—

West Cumberland Co.....	5,000 tons
Ebbw Vale Co.....	5,000 "
Mersey Co.....	20,000 "
Guest & Co.....	10,000 "

Total..... 40,000 tons.

"In addition to the above, it was arranged to accept the most favourable terms for the delivery of rails, f. o. b., in England, for transportation to British Columbia. Accordingly contracts were made as follows :—

“ West Cumberland Company 5,000 tons at.....$48 67 per ton.
 “ Taylor, Benyon & Co., 5,000 tons at.....$51 10 per ton.

“ It may be stated that it is no uncommon occurrence to secure rails for a great public work in advance of the time that they can be used.

“ The case of the Intercolonial Railway might be mentioned. On the 21st November, 1870, tenders were received for steel rails, and it was stipulated that they should be delivered as follows :—

6,000 tons must be ready for shipment not later than 15th March, 1871.
 6,000 tons by the 15th July, 1871.
 10,000 tons by the 15th March, 1872.
 10,000 tons by the 15th April, 1872.
 8,000 tons by the 15th May, 1872.

40,000 tons—Total, 1872.

“ Thus it will be seen that 12,000 tons were to have been ready by the 15th July, 1871, while the quantity actually laid during the whole of 1871 was only 1,092 tons.

“ Again, the whole 40,000 tons required for the Intercolonial Railway, were to have been ready by the 15th May, 1872; while the quantity actually laid eighteen months afterwards, viz: to the end of 1873, was less than 15,000 tons, and the whole quantity contracted for in 1870, was not actually used before the end of 1875.

“ The geographical position of the Pacific Railway is so different from that of the Intercolonial, that there is far greater necessity for an early purchase of the rails in the one case than the other.

“ On the Intercolonial, the line can be approached by sea-going vessels at many points, while the Pacific Railway is a long way inland, and it is consequently a difficult and expensive matter getting the rails taken forward to points where they can be used, involving a great deal of delay.

“ It is not always advisable to wait until an article is wanted before it be secured—an enormous additional expense may be, and often is, the consequence of such a policy.

“ In building railways, a degree of foresight is indispensable. This is especially the case in a railway situated like the Pacific line. If the purchase of rails was put off until the road-bed was ready for them, a much larger price would almost certainly have to be paid, not only for the rails but also for their transportation.

“ There can be no doubt that the mode and time of purchase of the rails was by all considered most judicious. In the public interests nothing could have been more carefully considered.

“ If it should have turned out contrary to all expectations, that the price of rails has not rebounded to its former high rate, this

 “ Chief Engineer.”

Had the purchase of Intercolonial rails been put off about a year the increase would have been about £2 per ton, which would amount to $400,000; if put off two years the increase, £5 per ton on the whole purchase, would amount to $1,000,000.

“ Statement of the number of tons of Rails delivered and laid, up to the end of each year on the Intercolonial Railway :—

1873.....	3,436	3,832

Price delivered this side :—

Barron Co.....$58 30 per ton

If the Intercolonial rails had not been contracted for at the time they were—if their purchase had been put off for a year, as it might have been—if the policy had been not to buy any rails until they were wanted—(and having been bought they could be delivered on the Intercolonial at any time on six weeks notice)—$400,000 would have been lost; and had the purchase been put off for two years, a million of dollars would have been lost on the 40,000 tons required for that line of railway. He might rest the case there. His accusers had done precisely what they accused him of doing. They bought rails before they were required, and the rails lay for years without being used, and were none the worse for it. The iron work for the Miramichi bridge was on the ground and paid for three years before a single particle of it was used, and the Government had to pay $2,000 for the rent of the place where it was piled. An hon. gentleman opposite would know where it was situated. The advertisement was said by the member for Hastings to have been inserted only in one paper; instead of having been published in the Herald only as stated, it appeared in the following papers:—The Herald, Witness, National, Bien Public, Trade Review, and Negociant Canadien of Montreal; the Mercury, Journal de Quebec, and L'Evenement, of Quebec; the Times in Ottawa; the Nation and Globe in Toronto; the Coal & Iron Record, the Herald, and the Scotsman of New York. These papers were recommended as amply sufficient, and there was no necessity for inserting it in a large number of papers inland where iron firms were not represented.

Mr. BOWELL—Was that the first advertisement, or the one published after the postponement?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—It was both the first and the last.

Mr. BOWELL—No!

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he depended upon the report of his officers, and he had no reason to suppose it was incorrect. At all events, those were the directions, and the officers assured him they were carried out. The advertisements were sent by telegram to New York. The chief engineer in the first place pressed upon his (Mr. Mackenzie's) attention, the necessity of procuring these rails. The price had been £12; it reached £10, or nearly so at the time the advertisement was decided upon. It had never reached that point on any previous occasion from the very commencement of manufacturing steel rails, except in April, May and June, 1870. It was £10 then; but the actual cost of the rails purchased for the Intercolonial was in excess of that. The amounts paid for Intercolonial rails were $58.30, for 37,600 tons; and $60.07 for 7,000 tons. The very fact of requiring a rigid inspection and long lengths made prices dearer than the ordinary market rates, by at least 10s. sterling. If it had turned out subsequently that the rails could have been purchased lower, he would never have dreamed of blaming the Government. The present Administration had given out contracts on the canals a year and half ago, which could be given out now twenty per cent. lower, yet no one would think of casting a reflection on the Government on that account.

In an article published in the Montreal Gazette, he had been charged with "purchasing 40,000 tons of steel rails from a firm in that city, of which his brother was a partner." He had characterized the statement then, as he did now, as a deliberate falsehood. He considered a purchase meant going into some person's office and buying a quantity of anything at a price agreed upon there and then; but this was no more a purchase than the contracts given out on the canals. Tenders had been deliberately advertised for and received, and contracts were entered into with those who offered to supply the rails at the lowest prices. The practice of his department was to let his chief officers open the tenders, and it was only when the tenders were afterwards brought before him with the recommendation of his chief officers that they were dealt with. He invariably took the lowest; and in accordance with that practice Mr. Trudeau placed himself in communication with Messrs. Cox & Green, the lowest tenderers, and they were offered the whole lot at the same price, but they refused to take them. They then passed on to the next lowest. It was the usual practice of iron firms in England to act through agents in this country. The Government did not receive a single tender from any of the principals in England. There were two from manufacturers in the United States. He believed all, or nearly all, the tenders were sent in through agents.

Mr. WORKMAN—I sent mine in my own name.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he had declined to make any contracts with agents. The contracts were sent to England for approval, and deposits were made as security for the performance of them, and then they were signed. Greater care could not possibly have been taken to guard the public interest and insure the fulfilment of these contracts. The advertisement calling for tenders provided that about one-half should be delivered in 1875, and the remaining half in 1876. Considerably more than half had been delivered. About 32,000 tons had been delivered here and in British Columbia, leaving 17,500 tons yet to come. The Government knew in connection with the purchase, that in the event of rails getting higher, or in the event of their not being able to use them as fast as they had anticipated, they would require a very considerable quantity to complete the Intercolonial. The hon. gentleman opposite had insinuated that the Government were taking up old rails, and giving them away for nothing, in order to find a place for a quantity of the new rails. It had been the policy of the late Government, and was the policy of this Government, to proceed as fast as possible in laying steel rails on the railroads of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and that policy had neither been delayed nor accelerated by this purchase. Work was going on steadily, and 10,000 tons would be required in addition to what was on the ground there. Now, as to the price. He had made an enquiry very recently, through a friend, of the President of the Great Western Company, the Right Honorable Mr. Childers, and found the Great Western Company had very recently purchased some 11,000 tons, requiring them to be inspected in lengths, something like our own, and they had to pay £11 sterling, delivered in Montreal—almost exactly the same price as was paid for those which this Government had contracted for in the winter of 1874. He believed now, as he did then, that the transaction was a wise one. Hon. gentlemen opposite, however, had asked what right the Government had to make this purchase without the authority of Parliament. Well, it so happened they did not pay any money without the authority of Parliament. Not a dollar was paid on these contracts until the 13th of April, 1875, and the House adjourned on the 7th or 8th of that month. The contracts for the steel rails were laid on the table in due course. Hon. gentlemen might conscientiously say that they had no constitutional right under the Pacific Railway Act to do as they had done; but he maintained the contrary. It was for the House to determine who was in the right.

As to the wisdom of making the purchase at that particular time, he would say that he had been guided by the views of prominent officers in his department, when they at all accorded with his own, and he had never seen any reason to deviate from that rule. The Chief Engineer had advised the purchase as absolutely necessary. They discussed the matter for many days, and he came to the conclusion that the Chief Engineer was right. They then expected to be able to lay the entire Pembina Branch during the past year, but it would be observed that if they had obtained connection with the United States railway at Pembina, notwithstanding the time of the purchase, they could not have got the rails on the ground in time and laid 60 miles. They had also expected last summer to transport them from Montreal to Duluth, and from thence into the interior; but with all their exertions, they were only able to have 2,180 tons delivered at Red River; and if they had connection made as they anticipated at Pembina, they would be unable to have railway communication with Winnipeg until nearly the close of the summer. At present some 2,600 tons of rails were at Duluth, and several months would be required to remove them to the spot where they were wanted; and even then when there these would not be sufficient to complete this one branch from Pembina to Fort Garry. They also hoped, when the policy was adopted of which he should speak (he dwelt upon it during the last previous Session), concerning the construction of the Pacific Railway, they thought they would have at least 70 miles east of Red River graded during this coming summer. About 25 miles were now completed, graded and ready for the ties and rails, and before the end of next summer the entire 70 or 77 miles would be so prepared. It would be utterly impossible for the Government, notwithstanding all the exertions which they might make during the coming year, to get the rails there for laying this part of the road. They expected also previous to next summer to have the road graded to Lake Shebandowan from Fort William. He would deal with this question more fully in Committee, and he would simply say this—that twenty-five miles were now completely graded, on which rails would be laid the moment spring opened. The forty-five miles embraced in this contract could be easily graded during the coming season; this would show the extent to which they were prepared to use the rails, and the foresight and wisdom of the Chief Engineer in making the recommendation he did. He would read a memorandum prepared by the Chief Engineer only two or three months ago, which had lain in his office, but of which he was not aware until two or three weeks after it was there:—

"CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY, }
 "OFFICE OF THE ENGINEER IN CHIEF, }
 "OTTAWA, JAN. 21 1876.

"F. Braun, Esquire,

"Secretary Public Works Department:

"SIR,—I would wish to draw the attention of the Department to the necessity of making arrangements for the transport of rails, as soon as the navigation opens.

"The rails are required at places so far inland that it becomes necessary to forward them in advance of the time when they can actually be used, in order to prevent delays.

"To illustrate what I mean, at the close of last season we had graded and ready for track-laying about 80 miles in the Province of Manitoba, requiring, with provision for sidings, about 7,500 tons of rails; but the total quantity of rails we succeeded in getting to Red River, up to the end of last year, was only 2,188 tons.

"In the event of the Government deciding to contract for extending the construction of the line to Rat Portage and to Lake Manitoba, a great extent of the grading is so light, especially between Selkirk and Lake Manitoba, and that it is quite possible to have 280 miles in all, ready for rail-laying in the Manitoba Districts before the end of the present year; so that if a total of 26,000 tons of rails could be delivered there this year, it would be quite possible to use them. I do not think, however, it would be practicable at any reasonable cost to deliver so large a quantity by the existing means of communication; but I desire to direct the attention of the Department to the importance of entering into arrangements without any loss of time, for the transportation of as large a quantity of rails as possible during the coming season.

"Immediately northwest of Lake Superior we have already graded about 18 miles, requiring (including sidings) about 1,700 tons. By the end of the present year we may possibly have 50 to 60 miles in all graded, requiring 5,000 tons of rails, in that district.

"These two estimates would give a total of 31,000 tons, which if forwarded before the end of the present year, might be laid as they arrived, or soon afterwards.

The total quantity of rails sent forward to Duluth and Thunder Bay (of which 2,188 tons have reached Red River) for the work above referred to in Manitoba and northwest of Thunder Bay, is 10,383 tons, so that the forwarding of an additional quantity of 20,000 tons may soon be required.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE.

"The following quantities of rails have, up to the end of last season's navigation, been received:—

	Tons.
" Piled at Lachine Canal.....	10,978
" " Kingston.....	4,806
" " Montreal.....	311
Tons.....	16,095

"If from those be deducted 8,000 tons which the Government has undertaken to furnish for the Georgian Bay Branch, there would remain only about 8,000 tons to go West, and I would advise that steps be immediately taken to secure the transportation of at least that quantity on the best terms.

"I am, &c., &c.,

"(Signed), SANDFORD FLEMING."

He gave these statements from the officer in charge to show what was his opinion of the transaction, and the necessity of making the purchase at that particular time. If it should prove otherwise, if this officer was then as greatly deceived as had been the Commissioners of the Intercolonial Railway, and if the Government were deceived as to the quantity they could use on the Intercolonial Railway—the cases were entirely parallel—what was there in this? Was it supposed that they were to be infallible, and that it was impossible for them to make any error? He did not believe that he had erred; he was prepared to defend his course, and he defied any man—there or anywhere else—to show a single improper action or a single wrong statement in connection with the transaction from first to last. He knew the object many gentlemen had in view; they had been quite willing, if they could, in order to make political capital, to attack and sacrifice his personal character; but he hoped that in his course, as Minister and member of the House, he had carefully avoided anything which could, by the remotest possible implication, subject him to the just censure of any honest man.

He had nothing further to say on the matter, save again to express his earnest hope and firm belief that the large majority of the members of the House (and might, he not also hope a majority of the hon. gentlemen opposite, who were opposed to him politically?) would not hesitate at once to record their disapproval of the means taken to attack the Government and himself personally, for political ends, with reference to this transaction.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER was not surprised to find that hon. gentlemen opposite were quite as ready to accept in advance the defence of the hon. gentleman as to endorse it after the hon. gentleman had taken his seat. The enthusiasm with which the hon. gentleman, on rising, was greeted, was he thought if anything greater than that which accompanied the conclusion of the hon. gentleman's statement. He was not at all surprised, because he was certain that there was not one hon. gentleman on either side of the House, who with the facts and history of this transaction before him, could for a single moment endorse the statement with which the hon. gentleman closed his remarks—that he was now prepared to defend what he had done. When the hon. gentleman said that he was not infallible, and that he was liable to make mistakes, he (Mr. Tupper) thought that he (Mr. Mackenzie) had carried the House with him; when in view of the facts as they now stood before the people of this country with relation to this transaction, the hon. gentleman said that he had nothing to regret in this connection and that he was prepared to defend it. He (Mr. Tupper) maintained that the hon. gentleman took a position which no commercial man in this country would endorse. When the hon. gentleman complained of some statements made by his hon. friend from Hastings when opening this discussion, the hon. gentleman ought not to forget that if mistakes were made no one was so much to blame for it as the hon. gentleman himself. The hon. gentleman ought to remember that on the 18th of February he had put a motion on the notice paper calling his attention to the fact that the most minute information touching the whole of this transaction was to be asked for by the House; and yet, though this was the 31st of March, and the information required could have been laid on the table in twenty-four hours, this motion, carried by the House, remained unanswered. The hon. gentleman had not been just to himself; if the hon. gentleman felt that the course he had pursued could not be successfully impugned, and that he had nothing to regret in the whole of this transaction, it was due to himself, to the great party he led, to the Government of which he was a member and to the characters of the public men of all parties that he should have laid on the table, in response to the demand of Parliament, the most full and explicit information. The hon. gentleman instead of regarding his motion as an attack ought to have accepted it in the spirit of friendship. The hon. gentleman knew the condition of the public mind as well as any person in or out of the House, and it was no secret to the hon. gentleman that there had been widely diffused over this country, in fact from one end to the other, the impression that there were features connected with this transaction which were not creditable to him as a public man, or to the high position he occupied.

Hon. Gentlemen— No! no!

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—Was there a man in the House, who would deny that abroad, over the face of this country, were hundreds and thousands of men who had been most painfully impressed with this transaction?

The hon. gentleman himself would not endorse a statement to the contrary; the hon. gentleman had stood in his presence on the hustings, when men of the highest respectability and of the highest character had impugned the hon. gentleman's motives with regard to this transaction. He accordingly asked the hon. member for Hamilton if he or any other hon. gentleman dared to assert that he (Mr. Tupper) was not speaking within the strictest bounds of accuracy when he said—whether rightly or wrongly, however mistaken their impression might be—there did exist a most painful impression, spread broadcast over this country, that features were connected with this transaction, which were most reprehensible and indefensible. They were, nevertheless, left in ignorance, without a particle of information with relation to it. He could not undertake to controvert the statement of the hon. gentleman that this first advertisement was published in the papers the hon. gentleman had mentioned; but he believed the hon. gentleman to be entirely in error. The hon. member said that he did not speak from his own personal knowledge, but that he had instructed officers in the department to do so, and that he assumed it was done. He (Mr. Tupper) did not believe that the first advertisement had been sent to New York, and he would give his reasons why. It would seem simply absurd to advertise in New York for the purpose of obtaining tenders, on the 29th of the month, to be received on the 8th of the month following. Was this possible? Why, the hon. member for Montreal West had stated that he was obliged to come up here for the purpose of examining the specifications on which to base his tender.

Mr. WORKMAN—Pardon me; I never came here at all.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—Very well. He said Mr. Darling came up for the purpose of examining the specifications.

Mr. WORKMAN—I beg your pardon; Mr. Darling came up on other business.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—I would like to ask on what he tendered if he had no specifications?

Mr. WORKMAN—I wrote up from my office, and I asked for a copy of the specifications, which I obtained.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—That would do. The hon. gentleman, who lived within a day's communication of Ottawa, wrote to secure information in relation to the specifications; but what would people in New York do under such circumstances.

The hon. gentleman knew that in Chicago one of the largest rolling mills on this continent was to be found, and he believed that if the hon. gentleman would investigate this matter he would learn that he could have bought and delivered rails for the Pembina road cheaper in Chicago, and of the same description, than through the mode the hon. gentleman had adopted for the purpose. These mills rolled out something like three miles per day; at least they possessed such capacity.

He would now draw the attention of hon. gentlemen of the House, to a circumstance which had produced the most painful impression on the public mind with regard to this transaction, which was utterly unworthy of the business talent, to say the least of it, and of the public character the hon. gentleman enjoyed in Canada. This was a matter of fire-side gossip all over the country, and therefore the hon. gentleman, in his own vindication and in vindication of the high position he occupied, of the reputation of Canadian public men, to whatever party or section of the country they belonged, was in the best possible position to meet these points, and to deal with the things which suggested themselves under the circumstances if he was satisfied that everything in this connection was not only pure and straightforward, but reflected credit upon the high position he occupied. They had the fact that when the hon. gentleman was sitting on that side of the House he voted for the resolution declaring the Pacific Railway must be built by a private company aided by a grant of public lands and money, and that it never should be built in any other way. He gave his pledge as a statesman in regard to the mode of carrying out this work to the people of this country. But immediately after he obtained power he ignored his pledge and changed his policy in an hour. During his Ministerial election he declared that they had determined to build the road as a public work. When Parliament met one of his first measures was to abolish the Commissioners of the Intercolonial Railroad and put that road under the sole control of the Minister of Public Works. He did not say the hon. gentleman did not do this in the public interest. He was merely calling his attention to the sequence of events. The hon. gentleman, when he brought forward his Pacific Railway policy, repeated his pledge that no expenditure of public money should take place without a direct vote from Parliament. On the 9th of May, 1874, he said:—"They proposed to do nothing by this Bill without Parliament directing them" (hear, hear). What did they move "time after time when on the other

Hon. Mr. TUPPER.

"side of the House, and when the hon. gentleman was sitting on this side? "They submitted that the plans and contracts should be submitted to Parliament and approved of (hear, hear), and that, too, before a single dollar would be expended upon the work. The hon. gentleman said they only provided certain contracts, but he must have failed to read the first clauses of the Bill, or he could not have made the assertion. The Government proposed to ask a vote of the House for every cent of money before it was expended."

The House would agree with him that after such a declaration as that the country would be naturally startled when they heard that this same gentleman had, without a vote for a single dollar, made a contract for 50,000 tons of steel rails costing $2,665,000. In another place the government had undertaken to meet this statement by saying that the money was voted before it came due. The hon. gentleman would hardly venture to make so puerile a statement as that in the House, because he knew he was bound to make no engagements to spend a single dollar without the consent of Parliament. His hon. friend from South Wentworth amused the House the other day by putting the public debt in silver and then calculating the number of teams it would require to draw it. He would like the hon. gentleman to put these $2,665,000 into cents and then calculate the number of teams it would take to draw this violation of the law by the Ministry he so faithfully supported. The next event in the course of this transaction which attracted public attention was the fact that the brother of the hon. gentleman left his home at Sarnia and went some 500 to Montreal to form a special copartnership for four years with the firm of Cooper, Fairman & Company.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—It is not true that he went there to form a copartnership.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—What is the fact?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Whatever partnership there was, was formed two years before and was then about terminated.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER was glad the correction had been made, because he was under the impression that the partnership was formed subsequently. The fact, however, remained that the hon. gentleman had a brother in company with Cooper, Fairman & Company. He regretted having to refer to this portion of the subject at all, but the hon. gentleman had made a most unjustifiable assault on a gentleman who was not in the House.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Yes; and I would do it again.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER, after condemning the conduct of the Hon. the First Minister in this respect, said the hon. gentleman had undertaken to justify the steel rail contract by reference to the Intercolonial Railroad, but there was no analogy between the two. The rails for the Intercolonial were not ordered until it was supposed, in accordance with the mode in which the works were being carried on, that they would be required. The contract under consideration involved the purchase of rails and their being delivered years before they could be used. He had in his hand a note from one of the Intercolonial Railroad Commissioners. It was as follows:—"The arrangement with manufacturers for Intercolonial rails was to manufacture and deliver as they were required for laying. The figures named prevented Government from calling for more than that quantity within the time (to save interest and rust)." He trusted this would show the hon. gentleman that he had quoted this contract in vain as a comparison. He had overlooked the fact that the Intercolonial contract was made on a rising market, while the one under consideration was made on a falling market, and was, consequently, an unsound commercial transaction and utterly indefensible.

It being six o'clock the House rose for recess.

AFTER RECESS.

PRIVATE AND LOCAL BILLS.

Bill to enable Ozro Morrill to obtain a patent for certain inventions and improvements in sewing machine shut-

Bill to change the name of the the Security Permanent Building and Savings Society to that of The Security Loan and Savings Company, was read the second and third time and passed.

THE STEEL RAILS CONTRACTS.

Hon Mr. TUPPER resumed his speech. He said he had been calling attention, when the House rose for recess, to the uncommercial character of the transaction, and the discrepancy between the statements of the Premier and of Messrs. Darling and Workman. He (Mr. Tupper) did not impute intentional inaccuracy to the hon. gentleman, having seen enough in Parliament to be convinced that such imputations were generally made to sustain a weak cause. The Chief Engineer had been quoted by Mr. Workman as the principal one who had advised the purchase. From the following statement of Mr. Workman in his elective address, it would appear that the Premier had sent for Mr. Fleming. The circumstances attending the purchase of the rails were as follows:—"About September, 1874, Mr. Brydges, the Chief Commissioner of the Intercolonial Railway had represented to the Minister of Public Works, who was the Premier, that a certain quantity of steel rails were required, and that the price being very low, that was the best time to make the purchase. Mr. Mackenzie sent for Mr. Fleming, an engineer of the highest repute and Chief Engineer to the Government railways, and he also advised it was a judicious time to make the purchase." That was the account of the transaction given by the hon. member for Montreal West, who had evidently been instructed either by the Premier or by Mr. Brydges himself. He (Mr. Tupper) was very much surprised to hear the Premier quote as a precedent for this that the late Government or the Commissioners of the Intercolonial Railway had purchased iron for the Miramichi bridge a long time before it was required. The hon. gentleman knew that the delay in connection with that bridge arose from the discovery, as the work proceeded, of what at one time was supposed to be an insuperable difficulty that threatened to prevent the building of the structure at that place at all. It was scarcely in point to quote this as a justification.

The hon. gentleman had ordered 50,000 tons of rails, sufficient to lay 550 miles of roadway, and it would be years before they would be required, judging from the present position of the Canadian Pacific Railway for which they were purchased; and he did not think that he went too far when he said that they would not be required for several years. He would assume that interest only required to be paid for two years, and this allowed, he thought that all he or any party had ever claimed, that from a commercial point of view a loss to the country had been incurred in connection with this transaction, would be fully established. He did not think that any hon. gentleman on the Treasury Benches, or any hon. member who had any knowledge of the present position of the railway, would venture to say that it would be possible, with all the exertions which the Government could make, to prevent a loss in this relation of interest on the average of two years. The portions of the Canadian Pacific which at that time it was proposed to construct comprised 45 miles, from Thunder Bay to Shebandowan; 144 miles from Rat Portage to Red River; 55 miles on the proposed line from Nanaimo to Esquimalt, and 85 miles from Burnt Lake to Georgian Bay—in all 339 miles. The construction of 65 miles of railway between Pembina and Fort Gary was also intended; and yet the extraordinary course was adopted of providing for the 339 miles of road sufficient steel rails for 550 miles. The Minister of Public Works knew, when he laid the contract on the table of the House two years ago for the building of the Georgian Bay branch, he (Mr. Tupper) ventured to tell him that what he proposed was wild in the extreme. This contract provided for the building of 85 miles of road through an unknown country, over which the foot of an engineer had never travelled; and yet its construction within eighteen months was pledged. No person could expect that this was possible to be accomplished ; and what was the result ? These 85 miles were abandoned, and not even one mile of it had been located. This was a standing monument of the hon. gentleman's incapacity, to say the least of it. Where, also, was the Nanaimo and Esquimalt Railway ? He would not have felt it necessary to dwell on these matters as he was doing if the hon. gentleman had frankly told the House that he had acted with the best intentions ; that he, as were all men, was liable to err, that he had made a serious mistake, and thrown himself on the House to be judged by his intentions and not by his success ; but this was not the course the hon. gentleman had pursued. On the contrary, the hon. gentleman had declared that he was prepared to defend the course he had followed, and refused to admit that he had committed the slightest error. What had the hon. gentleman to say to the British Columbia feature of the question ? He thought that he was correct in saying that from 5,000 to 10,000 tons of rails—he could not say which, but he believed that it was the former figure—had been shipped from London to British Columbia after the defeat of the Bill in the Senate. The fact remained that this road had been abandoned, and to retrieve the blunder he had committed in placing the Act in this regard on the Statute Book, the hon. gentleman had attempted to buy his peace with $750,000 more of public money. They had lost besides $750,000 at least on the steel rails, and this made in all one and a half millions.

They had been told that the great policy of the Government was to utilize the water stretches, as otherwise we would in vain seek the means of constructing the Canadian Pacific Railway at all. While the hon. gentleman and his colleagues were proclaiming to the world that Canada was in a most disastrous and ruinous position in consequence of the engagement to build this road, the hon. gentleman volunteered to locate 65 miles of railway from Pembina alongside of the finest water communication to be found in any part of the country and equal to any traffic. The result was that portions of the road were being washed away. It was utterly useless to proceed with the work and lay the track unless the hon. gentleman had some assurance of an immediate intention to provide railway communication between the American line and Pembina ; and the hon. gentleman who rushed into these wild, extravagant and irrational contracts so incapable of completion, bought 50,000 tons of rails on the English market to be laid on roads which it was well known could not be built, and which in two cases had been abandoned and in another deferred ; yet the hon. gentleman defended his policy and claimed credit for making an excellent bargain. It was insulting to the intelligence of any hon. member to tell him at this moment that the evidence in this connection did not stand as if written with a sun-beam, clear and incontrovertible ; that a great mistake had been made, and that a great loss had been inflicted on the country by the purchase of these rails on a falling market. The Intercolonial Commissioners had purchased on a rising market, showing their wisdom, and thus had succeeded in their venture. The hon. gentleman, however, had bought on a falling market, and the transaction would remain as long as Canadian history was read as one of the gravest blunders any public man in Canada ever committed. The Hon. Mr. Smith, speaking in another place, stated that within his own knowledge, steel rails of good quality, to the amount of 25,000 tons, had been purchased for £7 15s per ton ; and before he (Mr. Tupper) had ventured to say a word in public on this question, he had the authority of a contractor engaged in building a railway, for his statements. Without reference to this transaction, he had asked this contractor what his prospects were, and the reply had been that if he (the contractor) only could raise the money now, he could get the rails on the most advantageous terms. The best of steel rails at this moment made by the Ebbw Vale Company could be purchased for £8 per ton.

They had heard the statement of the hon. member for Montreal West, who said that he was prepared to stand up and pledge his reputation as a sound financier and a commercial man of high standing, that this transaction was a good one. The hon. member had been a remarkably cautious and successful merchant, but could not claim infallibility as a commercial man, when everybody knew that within the last two or three years the hon. gentleman himself, in one transaction, having bought in a falling market, had sunk $97,000 of his own money; hence the hon. gentleman must not expect his ipse dixit to be accepted as infallible evidence that a transaction must be good because he ventured to express such an opinion. He held in his hands some correspondence that had passed between Mr. Bickford, of Toronto, and one of the largest and most successful iron merchants in this country. It was dated Suffolk Lane, Cannon Street, London, 11th of February, 1876. When he mentioned the name of that gentleman, he mentioned one whose opinion was as valuable an authority, certainly, as that of the hon. member for Montreal West or the hon member for Hamilton, who seemed to question his opinion. In this it was stated—"Steel rails are very low." He asked the hon. gentleman whether any one undertook to controvert the truth of this statement made by a man on the spot in London? Was not the Great Western Railway of England the finest in Great Britain, and was it not most particular as to its rails and locomotives, &c., everything being of the very first quality?

This gentleman continued:—"The Great Western Railway Company wanted some 13,000 tons, which they got from the Dowlais Company of Ironmasters, one of the first in Great Britain, at £8 3s. 6d." He asked whether, with evidence of this kind, any person in this country could stand up and endorse the statement of the First Minister that he had secured these 50,000 tons of steel rails at a favourable price. At the very lowest calculation over $500,000 was sunk in the purchase. They must, moreover, pay interest on these rails for two years at least; and at four per cent. on the amount mentioned by the First Minister, this would be $133,250 a year, or $266,500 for the two years. It was impossible for any person with the slightest knowledge of the present condition of the Canadian Pacific Railroad to come to any other conclusion than that we had lost two years interest on this transaction. He was satisfied that he was below the figure when he said $750,000 had been lost to the country through the want of judgment on the part of the Minister of Public Works. With regard to the amount paid for steel rails for the Intercolonial Railway, the General Superintendent had authority to purchase everything required for the maintenance of the road, and the late Government had nothing whatever to do with it, and more than that the quantity was purchased after the present Government came in. The Hon. Minister of Justice had stated at a public meeting in Toronto:—"Instead of that they had, with regard to the Intercolonial Railway, one of the finest finished roads in point of construction on the continent, and laid with steel rails of a very good quality, as they ought to be, seeing they cost about 50 per cent. more than the first class rails which were now about to be laid on the Pacific Railway. (Cheers.)" An addition of 50 per cent. to $54.65 would give $81.97, but the record showed that the rails used on the Intercolonial cost only $58.16 per ton, $3.51 more than the cost of the rails purchased for the Pacific Railway. The hon. member for West Montreal had referred to a circular as an authority for the price of iron, but a circular was no evidence as to the lowest rate at which iron could be bought. In proof of this statement he referred to a statement made by Mr. Crawshaw, an influential iron master in England, to his operatives, in which he said that while the prices were put in the circular everybody knew that those prices were not obtained, and that the actual purchases were made at figures altogether below those contained in the circular. But it was stated by the hon. gentleman that it was intended to use some of the steel rails for the Intercolonial Railway. Now, under the law, he was precluded from using a single rail for any such purpose. Parliamentary Government was not worth a rush if Government could ask for a vote for rails for the Canadian Pacific Railway and use them on the Intercolonial Railway.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER.

Everyone had an interest in protecting the reputation of our public men. A party could not be struck down by assaulting the characters of its leaders without inflicting an almost irreparable blow on the whole country. If there were people all through the Dominion who were ready to believe statements against the reputation of our public men, it was largely owing to the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite, in their anxiety to obtain power, had set the example. He was not disposed to follow the same course. It was in the interest of Canada that those who occupied the Treasury Benches should be able to show a clear justification of their public acts, and no one would be more happy than himself (Mr. Tupper) if the hon. gentleman could free himself from the charges made against him. As for the commercial character of the transaction, it was but right that public attention should be drawn to it, and public sentiment should be so expressed as to prevent this or any future Government from dealing with the funds of the people in such an utterly indefensible manner, and not only expend public money without authority, but at the same time injure the very principles of Parliamentary Government upon which our free institutions are based.

Mr. WOOD believed the vindication of the Premier would be satisfactory to everybody who wished to look at this matter in a fair light. It had been said that steel rails could be bought for £8, but it was not stated how they were made or to what inspection they were subject. First-class rails could not be had for any such price. He had had 30 years experience in the iron trade and handled a good deal more than the hon. members for Hastings or Cumberland, and he denied that first-class steel rails could be bought for £8 per ton. When the hon. member for Hastings, during this debate, made the statement that they were sold for £7 15s., he (Mr. Wood) was astounded, and telegraphed to his buyer to ascertain the quotations in Liverpool. This was the reply:—"No bonâ fide quotations lower than £7 17s. 6d. for bar iron." The last circular, dated about the same time as the quotation given by the hon. member for Cumberland, gave from £9 to £11 per ton as the price for steel rails in Liverpool, f.o.b. The rails purchased by the Premier were delivered in Montreal at $53.53. The quotations given by the hon. member for Hastings were no criterion at all, because the length of rail and inspection entered into the cost of rails. The steel rails which could be purchased for £8 per ton were not fit for the Intercolonial or the Pacific Railway. It had been asserted that in Chicago there was a rolling mill which would deliver rails at Thunder Bay, Duluth, or the mouth of French River cheaper than they could be supplied by English firms. The same firm had a rolling mill at Cleveland, and while visiting that establishment he had enquired what they would deliver rails for. They replied $75. When he reached home, supposing it might be $75 currency, he telegraphed to the firm and received a reply that it was gold, and the price of rails were very little lower now than when the Government bought. He denied that the iron market was a guide to the price of steel rails. He had seen iron selling at £6.15s, while steel rails cost £16. The transaction was most advantageous. As a business man, he heartily approved of it. About the same time he had purchased some iron himself thinking the price low, but he could have bought it cheaper if he had waited a month longer. The Government had acted wisely in the matter and were entitled to the thanks of the country for their prudence and forethought.

Mr. THOMPSON (Welland) said he was slow to believe charges against a Government. They might err in judgment, but he believed they always acted in the best interests of the country. It could not be said that the purchase of twenty or thirty thousand tons of rails involved a matter of principle. In his opinion the Government had acted according to their judgment, just as any merchant might have done. Even if the Premier had made a bad bargain he was not deserving of censure on that account, but the hon. gentleman had shown it was no mistake to buy at the time. As there was no trick or dishonesty about the transaction, it was a paltry thing for the Opposition to make such a charge against the Government.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria) said the hon. member for Hamilton seemed desirous to atone for his late rebellion against the Government. The hon. gentleman no doubt had considerable experience in the purchase of iron, but it was doubtful if he had ever bought a rail in his life. He (Mr. Cameron) was quite satisfied the hon. gentleman did not understand that market.

The hon. member for Cumberland had stated that the rails the price of which he quoted, were supplied to the Great Western Railway of England, and he thought that this was quite sufficient to show that their value and quality were at least equal—and more probably far superior—to the quality furnished for the Pacific Railroad. The Mersey Company steel rails were of very inferior quality, for he happened to have some knowledge of these matters, and he knew also that his hon. friend from Hamilton must be entirely ignorant of the subject. Steel rails were not at present quoted at £9 11s per ton; this was a great exaggeration, for no such quotation had been made for many months—at least not during the past twelve months. There had never been such a difference between the highest and lowest ratings as from £2 to £3 per ton; the usual difference between the inspected and the ordinary rail in England was from 5s. to 10s.

The hon. member for Hamilton showed that he was not familiar with the subject; the hon. gentleman had been led on to say what he did by a desire to atone for his act of rebellion a short time ago.

Mr. DYMOND wanted to know what dependence was to be placed on the statements of a gentleman who, like the hon. member for North Victoria, showed a purely partisan spirit by prefacing his speech on a simple and practical question by an offensive attack on the motives of an hon. gentleman who happened to differ from him. There was no ground whatever for the insinuation that the hon. member for Hamilton was seeking to atone for a vote cast conscientiously on a recent occasion against the Government. He did not know how wise the hon. member for North Victoria might be on the subject of steel rails, but he fancied that the hon. gentleman's information was, after all, only obtained at second-hand. The real question at issue was not the price at which rails could now be purchased, but what was a fair price at the time they were bought. They knew now that there had been the fullest advertisement of the tenders, the most ample time for communication with the manufacturers in England, and that so far from any favouritism having been shown by the Government to the successful contractors, the tender of so warm a supporter as the member for Montreal West had been rejected, although he had been willing to supply the rails at a mere commission profit of one and a half per cent. But the fact was this whole agitation had its origin in political feeling, as was clearly shown by the time and manner of its first introduction into public notice in the report of the speech of one of the candidates for Montreal West, and which was reported in the Montreal Gazette, the accusations were in effect that the first thing the Premier did after attaining power was to purchase these rails without tender and without contract; that the Premier bought 40,000 tons from a firm of which his brother was said to be a partner; and that though ostensibly obtained for the Pacific Railway, they were then lying on the banks of the Lachine Canal, all of which was untrue. On a subsequent occasion, he believed, the gravamen of the charge was qualified by its originator, who had argued that no specific accusation of corruption had been made; but looking at the political use made of this affair in every part of the country it was impossible to see in the motive any other than a direct and deliberate attack on the character and honour of the foremost public man in the Dominion. He thought that honest and respectable people were generally disgusted with the conduct of the Opposition in this matter. He had no fear for the result of the vote, and he hoped that for once even some-

hon. gentlemen opposite would rise superior to pure partyism, and show that they did not endorse this miserable steel rail slander. The speeches of the hon. members from Hamilton and Montreal West had made it unnecessary to ask whether there had been scandalous negligence, gross ignorance, rashness or recklessness shown by the head of the Government and Minister of Public Works. There was no longer a shadow of reason for any such imputation.

The motion, in effect, asked the House to turn out the present Government and put in the hon. member for Cumberland. Now, what did the hon. gentlemen opposite do when they were in power, and when they required steel rails for the Intercolonial Railway? They required rails to the value of £100,000 stg., and the Government manager of that road was empowered to make the purchase, not only without contract or tender, but even without reference to the Minister to whom he was directly responsible. He obtained a bill of exchange for £6,000 from the financial official of the railway, which was placed in the safe of a Liverpool firm, of which his own brother-in-law was the head, without one dollar of security being given that the transaction would ever be consummated, the firm in question being instructed to use their own discretion in giving the order for this large quantity of material. The policy of the late Government with regard to that business was sufficient evidence to the House that it would be better to sustain the present Ministry than replace them with gentlemen who were concerned in such transactions as those which took place in regard to the purchase of steel rails from the firm of John Haws & Company.

Mr. MACDONALD (Toronto) said the hon. member for Hastings had moved an amendment by which it was evidently intended to leave the impression upon the minds of hon. members that the advertisement for steel rails had only appeared in one paper; that it appeared in that one paper for not more than five days; and that as a result of the hasty way in which the matter was negotiated, the country had sustained a loss of a million dollars. The hon. member for Montreal West had stated that he called the attention of the Premier to the fact that the time was too short, and that it should be extended for four weeks; but it had been extended for five weeks before the First Minister's reply was received; while the latter gentleman explained that instead of the notice being in one paper only, it appeared in fifteen. It was a matter for gratification that gentlemen like the hon. member for Montreal West, were able to give explanations as to the value of rails, which were not only satisfactory to the House but to the country; and the fact that hon. members who were perfectly conversant with the subject were able to refute these statements, precluded the possibility of a wrong impression going to the country. The hon. member for Montreal West, as well as his hon. friend from Hamilton, stated that this transaction was one not only to be defended, but was a transaction altogether unprecedented in the commercial world for cheapness, considering the relative value of the material. It had been said by the hon. member for Cumberland that no commercial man in the House would have sustained such a transaction. He was prepared to defend it upon commercial principles. He maintained that it was highly uncommercial for anyone to wait until he wanted a certain article before he bought. A commercial man anticipated his wants; if he desired to act prudently and buy carefully, he took time to ascertain upon what conditions the goods could be delivered. He considered that the Government acted wisely in purchasing when the chief officers of the department reported that the market was favourable. They learned from the First Minister himself that long and earnest deliberation took place in reference to the purchase of these rails, and he considered that any unprejudiced man on the floor of the House must in view of the whole circumstances be prepared to defend the purchase.

The First Minister had stated that portions of these rails had to be delivered in British Columbia and at the Pembina branch, and that even with all the care and management they could exercise, it would require the whole of next season to have the rails now at Duluth delivered at the latter place. What a mistake it must have been, therefore, to have delayed the purchase of those rails until they were wanted.

Reference had been made to the low price of rails at present. He challenged any member of this House to prove that contracts could be made based upon present prices for delivery 12 months hence. In view of the facts as they presented themselves to his mind, he would in the interest of this House and of this country vote against the amendment.

Mr. DOMVILLE said that before voting on this question he wished to state that he considered the purchase was a bad one. It was true that success was the touchstone of merit, and by the world the end was considered to justify the means—he meant to say that if a man made a great coup and was successful, the world endorsed him, but if he failed he was blamed. That was one ground why he would vote against the Premier that night. A good deal of money had been lost to the country by this transaction, and he contended that the Government should have waited until they wanted the rails before they made the purchase. With regard to the transaction to which the hon. member for North York had referred, he desired to state that the bill of exchange was not endorsed when it was put in the safe of the firm at Liverpool, and that it was not endorsed until it was required for use.

The question was, did the Premier buy those rails properly? Was the transaction constitutional? Did he make a good bargain? Being a young member, he would leave such experienced gentlemen as the hon. members of North York and Hamilton to discuss the constitutional point. As a business man, representing a business community, he (Mr. Domville) could not endorse this purchase of steel rails. He might go further and say he did not endorse the building of the Pacific Railroad, but the faith of the country was pledged to it, and if it should break us the work must go on. If the road had been constructed under the first arrangement, the cost of it to the treasury could not exceed $30,000,000 and 50,000,000 acres of land. Companies might be ruined but the country would be the gainer. Now, however, the country was saddled with the undertaking and might be ruined in carrying it through.

He thought before those rails were bought it would have been better to see if we could not manufacture them in our own country. By anticipating the requirements of the country, not only was a large sum lost to the Treasury, but a grievous wrong was done to our people, especially those of Nova Scotia, who possessed all the materials for manufacturing rails.

Mr. PLUMB said that in voting in favour of the resolution he disclaimed any intention of imputing improper motives to any member of the Government connected with the transaction in question, but he desired simply to speak of and judge it as a matter of business, and to support the resolution because it affirmed a sound business principle, which he trusted would be emphatically endorsed by this House. It was the duty of the Government to buy its supplies when they were required within a reasonable time, and no Ministry was called upon or expected to be responsible for a rise or fall in the market, if this principle, the only safe one, were adopted. The Government was a strong purchaser, buying for cash, and could always obtain the most favourable terms. It ought therefore to be governed only by its requirements, and should not be tempted to buy in advance of its needs. It was evident there was a great departure from this principle in the purchase now in question, because although the contracts were entered into in the autumn of 1874, the rails were still unused, and although the House was informed that 26,000 tons would be laid, probably, in the course of this summer and autumn, that did not show there was any necessity for purchasing them when they were bought. He thought it would be a very dangerous principle to establish, even by implication, that the officers of the Government were to judge speculatively what would be the proper time for purchasing the articles required for the public use. He did not agree with the hon. members for Hamilton and Centre Toronto in the opinion that the Government should act as commercial men. It was a lame argument for the Premier to use in excuse for not having obtained the sanction of Parliament for the purchase, to state that no payment was made before the contracts were submitted to Parliament. The contracts were entered into six months before Parliament met last year, and nobody, of course, would think of repudiating a transaction which was completed. A good deal had been said about the quality of the rails; but about one-half of them had been purchased from the Mersey Company at $54 26. There were other manufacturers who turned out rails much superior to theirs. The member for North York had ridiculed the hon. member for North Victoria for assuming to speak about the market for rails. It was a mistake to assert that because the hon. member for North Victoria was a lawyer he knew nothing about steel rails. The hon. gentleman had long experience in the business, and during the last few years had purchased over 15,000 tons, and was in constant communication with the large English iron brokers. Though this transaction had, no doubt, been made in good faith, this House ought to mark distinctly and emphatically its judgment upon a purchase made so far in advance of the necessities of the country and which was speculative in its character. Such a large transaction as this made so hastily, apparently under pressure, should be condemned. The very fact of going into the market in that way, and for such a large quantity of rails, was enough to realise a difference in prices and cause an advance in the market. Comparing the prices paid for the rails with the prices now ruling, and the ocean freight with the present low prices of freight, stated to be from ten shillings to twelve shillings a ton, the loss, including interest at five per cent, would be nearly a million of dollars. The Premier cited the neglect to purchase the rails for the Intercolonial in 1870, and the purchase at a higher price in 1871. This argument goes for nothing, as he stated also that the rails were not then needed. He also alluded to the Welland Canal contracts which he said could now be made for twenty per cent. less than when they were entered into. This argument does not strengthen his case. If the contracts were made for work then to be undertaken at prices then ruling, and if they were made under the usual regulations, no blame can be attached to the Government if the prices of such work have since declined. The hon. members from Montreal West and Hamilton had given us a history of their own purchases, and they had been so much alike that we might have supposed that they had been operating in joint account. They had intended to justify the Government purchase by asserting that although prudent business men, they had lost money on theirs, and at the same time they had urged that the price of iron had not declined. In fact they had either proved too much or too little.

The hon. member for Welland thought it was not worth while to take up the time of the House with such a trifling matter. It might appear so to that hon. gentleman, but to persons of more limited ideas the sum involved, involving a loss of nearly a million of dollars, seemed quite worthy of consideration and discussion. Rails had been purchased for about 600 miles of railroad, apportioned at the rate of 90 tons per mile, but where was such a railway being built? There had been no route, no location determined upon. He wished that this railway would be vigorously pushed forward, he would be glad to see the work go on, but it was impossible under the circumstances to utilize within reasonable time the large purchase which was under discussion. He should feel bound to support the motion, and he did so merely upon the grounds he had mentioned, as a matter of duty and with great reluctance. He did not wish to cast the slightest suspicion on the conduct of any hon. gentleman on either side of the House.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) thought the discussion had elicited the fact that the price paid for the rails was reasonable.

Mr. SCHULTZ remarked that owing to the contradictory statements that had been made by hon. members, who might be supposed to know something about these matters, it was almost impossible for any one not familiar personally with the questions at issue to form an opinion; in view of this difficulty, the only course left to pursue was to do as had been done in many other cases, give the accused the benefit of the doubt. Arraigned by his hon. friend from North Hastings, the Premier, while admitting a portion of the charge, had pleaded in extenuation that an urgent reason in favour of the purchase of these rails lay in the expectation that they would almost immediately be required for the Pembina branch. If this was the case, he would admit that the excuse was reasonable and a good argument, but he was obliged to take the hon. gentleman to task regarding this matter. Sometime since a deputation from Manitoba had waited on the Premier in connection with this matter and the erection of a bridge over the Red River, but while giving them a flat and not very courteous refusal to all requests made him, the hon. gentleman stated that it was useless to lay the rails on the Pembina and Fort Garry branch while there was no prospect of the rails being laid from St. Paul, on the Northern Pacific line, to connect with it. After this deliberate statement, scarcely had the gentlemen who composed that delegation returned to their homes, when they heard that a contract had been given for the transport of rails to be laid on this branch; and this was done without any other information being had that there was any change in the position of the railroad to which he had referred. Even supposing, however, that the hon. gentleman had received private informations during the month intervening, that it was likely these rails would be required, another difficulty arose: if they were needed, as the hon. gentleman stated, for the Pembina branch, how was it that the hon. gentleman had made the contract for the delivery of rails not for that branch but for the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway in Manitoba, where it crossed Red River, 23 miles away from any portion of the direct line between Fort Garry and Pembina? This showed clearly that there was nothing whatever in the argument used by his hon. friend, and this plea must be dropped by the hon. gentleman—as he thought it would be done—from the line of defence the hon. gentleman had chosen to take, when accused in this relation by his hon. friend from North Hastings.

A vote was taken with the following result:—

The House went into Committee of Supply—Mr. Scatcherd in the chair.

THE PACIFIC RAILWAY.

On motion of Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT, the House went into Committee of Supply.

On item $2,810,000, Pacific Railway,

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said—In submitting this item to the Committee, I desire to make a very short statement in regard to the present position of the surveys and works of construction of the Pacific Railway, and the policy which the Government have in view for the future, as well as some reference to what we have had in view in the past. At the time we assumed office we found, notwithstanding our earnest protestations, the extraordinary obligations assumed by hon. gentlemen opposite staring us in the face. From that day to this our single endeavour has been to go as far as it was possible, having due regard to the resources of the country, in carrying out the solemn obligations to which the late Government had committed the Dominion. We have endeavoured to do this in the face of, perhaps, the most violent opposition that was ever offered to any Government—offered, too, by the very parties who originally created the obligation and caused all the trouble and expense to which the country had been put. I cannot say I have been much surprised at this, though somewhat different treatment might have been accorded to a Government coming into office with such difficulties staring them in the face. We have felt from the first that while it was utterly impossible to implement to the letter the engagements entered into by our predecessors, the good faith of the country demanded that the Administration should do everything that was reasonable and in their power to carry out the pledges made to British Columbia, if not the entire obligation, at least such parts of it as seemed to be within their power and most conducive to the welfare of the whole Dominion, as well as to satisfy all reasonable men in the Province of British Columbia, which Province had fancied itself entitled to complain of apparent want of good faith in carrying out these obligations. In endeavouring to accomplish this result we have had serious difficulties to contend with, to which I shall shortly allude. I called the attention of the hon. members for British Columbia, in the first Session of this Parliament, to the utter impossibility of commencing the actual works of construction then. This Government succeeded to office some five or six months after the time had elapsed within which the Government of Canada were bound by the Terms of Union to commence the construction of the Pacific Railway. And yet, at that time we found that the surveys in no part of the territory, from Lake Nipissing to the Pacific, were in such a condition as to justify the Government in taking any steps whatever towards placing any part of the line under contract. I believed, and so expressed myself at all times, that it would be a fatal mistake to do what the late Government had done—give the contract for building the road to a mere speculative company that never intended to invest one dollar of their means in it, but merely to use it as a stock jobbing undertaking, without much reference to the ultimate operations to be carried out.

I also believed, so expressing myself at all times, and Parliament supported me in that opinion, that we were bound to obtain a thorough exploration and if possible an instrumental survey of the country to be traversed by this long line of railway. Let me say so far as the work itself is concerned that I have always been an advocate of the construction of a railway across the Continent, but I have never believed that it was within our means to do it in anything like the period of time within which the hon. gentleman bound Parliament and the country. I believe the bargain was an act of madness—of utter insanity, and an evidence of political incapacity that has had no parallel in this or in any other country, that I am aware of.

Under these circumstances we had, as I have remarked, to face these difficulties imposed on us by the preceding Administration. After careful examination, I found that while there was comparatively little difficulty in ascertaining the probable character of the prairie country, say from Lake of the Woods westward to the Rocky Mountains, it must be a work of Herculean magnitude to ascertain the exact character of the country through British Columbia and from the Lake of the Woods eastward to Lake Nipissing. I have stated in my speeches on this subject in the country and during the first Session I had the honour of leading Parliament, that for the present we should abandon the construction of the road from the western end of Lake Superior to Lake Nipissing. Not that it should be entirely given up, but that for the present it was to be considered a part of the line altogether unnecessary to be constructed, and that in the meantime we should use the water which Providence has placed at our disposal with such munificence.

Mr. BOWELL—To use the water-stretches?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Yes, the phrase was not mine, though I used it; and I consider the idea is an exceedingly happy one. We desired as far as possible in the first place to utilize the Lakes on the east as a permanent highway, for perhaps many years to come, as a means of reaching the western end of Lake Superior, and afterwards to utilize the smaller lakes and rivers in the interior of the continent, where they might lie in the line of the ultimate road, and be used temporarily for the purpose of furnishing a complete line of travel between the two extremities of the continent, pending the completion of the railway across the entire country. I am aware there has been a great deal of misrepresentation concerning our intentions with regard to the use of these water-stretches. It had been stated over and over again that we proposed to build a link of railway here and there, without any intention ultimately to make a complete all-rail route, or without considering the distances to be traversed between one point and another, which would ultimately become leading places on the railway when it was finished, if it ever were completed in our day. The shortest route had always been kept in view. British Columbia has felt herself peculiarly interested in this matter, more so, perhaps, than any other Province in the Dominion, and the Columbians were inclined to look upon the Terms of Union more as a contract to build the railroad within a given time than as a joint compact to be observed for the benefit of the Dominion. I need not further refer to our policy as it is sufficiently explained in the papers recently presented to Parliament, which papers continue the narrative from previous correspondence.

I have now to refer to the difficulties encountered in making these surveys. During the time which has expired from the initiation of the project to the present time, there has been expended in surveys the following sums, up to 31st December, 1875, east of the Rocky Mountains:—

From beginning, to June 30, 1872	$194,125 40

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE.

Making a total expenditure, west of the Rocky Mountains, of..... $1,010,016 38

The total expenditure on surveys over the whole line $2,286,907 54

So that the survey of the 600 or 700 miles west of the Rocky Mountains, cost within a quarter of a million of the entire amount expended from these mountains to Lake Nipissing.

Now, Sir, with regard to these surveys, let me say that when I first had to give my personal attention to this subject, it appeared to be all but settled that the Jasper House Pass would be the one by which we might pass the Rocky Mountain range, and that any road that was likely to be built would reach the point known as the Tête Jaune Caché to the west of this pass, and that it would diverge southward till we struck the North Thompson and, generally speaking, follow that river down to the Frazer River. Thence, it was believed, we should follow that river till we reached the delta below Westminster, or else that we should turn sharply to the west, 60 or 70 miles from Tête Jaune Caché, by the Clearwater Lakes, to near the mouth of the Chilcotin River, and from there seek an outlet at Bute Inlet, or some other point to the northward. It was supposed when the surveys were first commenced that a nearly direct cut from Tête Jaune Caché to the Chilcotin would be found, but the explorations developed the fact that on this particular line there were mountains 9,000 feet high, with enormous glaciers, interposing physical difficulties which it would be quite impossible to overcome. We therefore abandoned all attempts to seek an outlet in that direction. We afterwards made a careful examination of the Upper Frazer valley, as well as the Thompson River route. From Tête Jaune Caché, northwestwardly to Fort George the distance is about 200 miles; here the river turns gradually nearly due south. From this point downwards what is known as the Frazer Valley can scarcely be called a valley in the ordinary acceptation of the term. There is the water-shed of the Frazer, to be sure, traversed by numerous large rivers from east and west falling into the Frazer, but the valley itself is rather a gorge or cleft in the plateau which constitutes the interior of British Columbia. The route by the Thompson and Lower Frazer Rivers, first mentioned, proved by the surveys to be the most expensive one by which to reach the ocean; but this much could be said in its favour, that better grades could undoubtedly be obtained by their taking that cleft and following it down to the sea than by any other route; but an enormous amount of tunnelling would have to be done, as well as a large quantity of other expensive works, such as high retaining walls and deep excavations in the hardest of rock. These difficulties proved to be so numerous and so great that we were, with considerable reluctance, obliged to seek a more favourable route. Our attention was then directed more particularly to the route from Tête Jaune following the Frazer River towards Fort George. The route along this part of the Frazer River, a distance in round numbers of about 200 miles, proved singularly favourable; that is so far as getting a comparatively easy grade was concerned, while the works would not be nearly so rough and heavy. From Fort George there were several routes possible, one was to follow up the Stewart river which flows almost due east into the Fraser at this point, and reach the upper branch of the Gardner Inlet at the mouth of a small river called Kemano. This was a very short route, it reached a part of the ocean which for all eastern, or as we might call it, western trade, it is doubtless the shortest line on the sea to Japan and the Asiatic Coast, while it is somewhat shorter by land; but the difficulty of obtaining an easy gradient for the last few miles proved almost insuperable although it is not impossible. It may, perhaps, be feasible, and we intend to make a further examination in order to satisfy ourselves more fully as to the rocky range on the sea coast at that point. In making the exploratory surveys, we have always borne this in mind that if they should turn out to be comparatively useless for railroad purposes, they give us an intimate knowledge not merely of the topography of the country, but also of its agricultural resources, its mining wealth, the character of its rocks, and fauna and botany. This knowledge, if nothing else were gained, would undoubtedly be of considerable service to British Columbia as a province and through it to the Dominion as a whole. Another route followed the Stewart River a short distance, and then diverged southward, touching on the Nachaco River and reaching the south branch of Gardner Inlet by the valley of a small river called the Killope. This route has already been partially examined, and it is being further surveyed, but our information at present is not such as to justify us in coming to a conclusion as to the character of the line to be obtained there. The next route was one which crosses the Frazer River, also at Fort George, ascends the Stewart River till it reaches the junction of the Chilacoh river, which river it ascends to the junction of the Black Water River, and ascending to the head waters of that river very nearly due west, it reaches the valley of the Kamsquat or Salmon River, and descends into the north branch of Dean Channel. This, I may say, so far as our present explorations go, is shown to be the most favourable route for reaching the ocean from Fort George west. It traverses the same route for a distance of about 70 or 80 miles from Fort George, as that taken to reach Bute Inlet; then it trends directly westward, or very nearly so, from that route, and descends by a tolerably easy grade to the sea, at Dean Inlet. The highest grade upon this line is a little under a 100 feet to the mile, while highest grade on the Bute Inlet route is 107 feet. There is also a less distance to traverse with the higher grades on this line than by the Bute Inlet route; but the sea is reached at Dean Channel, through the Kamsquat Valley, by a distance of 50 miles shorter than the route by Bute Inlet. I have been thus somewhat particular in describing operations in British Columbia in detail, as they have a most material effect on the ultimate realization of the project of building the Pacific Railway and its ultimate use to that Province and the Dominion. There is this difficulty to be remembered in comparing the Bute and Dean Inlet routes; that the former may be said to strike Vancouver Island very near the middle, while the latter, into which the Kamsquat River falls, is about 100 miles north of the extreme end of the Island, and that route traverses a portion of British Columbia which is little settled, if settled at all, except, indeed, where it passes down the Fraser Valley in the neighbourhood of the gold mines of Cariboo District and the settlements near the mouth of Quesnell River.

The Bute Inlet route was surveyed almost completely last year, except a distance of some sixty or seventy miles, regarding which we obtained some information after Parliament rose last Session. This route is one that we knew tolerably well last year. It has been somewhat carefully surveyed from the head of the Inlet by the valley of the Homathco River. Between thirty and forty miles from the head of the Inlet the river divides into two branches. The west branch was surveyed to Tatlayoca Lake. On this route we found the most favourable grade that could be obtained was about 115 feet to the mile, for a distance of about 15 or 16 miles, with a considerable amount of tunnelling. This river passes through a very narrow gorge. It is comparatively small, but in some places there are enormous canons to be encountered, with rocky sides rising several hundred feet above the water, perfectly precipitous. It was thought desirable to examine the east branch of the river during last year and make an instrumental survey of it. This has been completed, and we now know we can get a more favourable route by the east branch, the highest grade being about 107 feet to the mile, and that for a distance of 2 or 3 miles less than the high grade by the west branch, with the additional advantage that there is a level rest of about three-quarters of a mile in the long, steep grade which makes it very favourable. It requires, I think, somewhere about 70 miles to reach what may be called the summit level, or what we regard as that, the height there being about 3,460 feet. Between that point and the place where this line would touch Stewart River, a few miles west of Fort George, the line is comparatively favourable, although a considerable detour will have to be made to avoid some hills that rise in the middle of the plateau. The lowest level reached in any place between the summit at Lake Tatlayoca and Fort George is 2,800 feet above the sea, and the highest point passed over is 3,750 feet. This was supposed last year to be the most favourable route that could be obtained. It is in some respects the most favourable yet.

We thought it advisable last spring to send out the Dominion geologist with a party to examine the country in various parts of British Columbia. That officer was also directed to make an exploration of the pass known to exist, and of which very little information could be obtained, except some of a comparatively little consequence from Indian tribes. This is known as the Pine River Pass, which crosses, or is supposed to cross the Rocky Mountain Range sixty or seventy miles south of the great bend of the Peace River where it passes through the Rocky Mountains. An examination of this locality developed the fact that at this point the Rocky Mountains practically disappear, and though the country is somewhat rough with an undulating hilly surface, there are no mountains properly so called. The highest hill examined was only 1,900 feet above the level of Pine River while that stream itself, at this place is probably 1,600 or 1,800 feet above the level of the sea. This party examined the Pass and also Peace River and the country bordering on it for a considerable distance eastward. Much of that information has been given in a lecture recently delivered, and by newspapers which had information from the party. I refer to that chiefly for this reason, that the attention of the Engineer-in-Chief was directed to this part of the country some years ago, and he dispatched one of his staff in that direction who obtained a considerable amount of information respecting the country near the Peace River, but not of the Pine River pass. The knowledge we now have is probably as much as can be gathered by a mere exploratory survey, and further investigation will not be proposed unless it should be found desirable or expedient in the public interest to undertake a more elaborate instrumental survey, with a view of adopting a new line further to the north.

Of course as you ascend to the north you traverse the continent by a much shorter route, as the lines converge towards the pole, and it is considered by many who are intimately acquainted with the country that the true line for a Pacific railway would be to cross the North Saskatchewan in the neighbourhood of Fort La Corne, proceed somewhat north of Beaver River and Lac La Biche, pass Lesser Slave Lake, crossing Smoky River, probably 15 to 20 miles from its junction with the Peace, and proceeding to Pine River Pass, reach the western slope of the Rocky Mountain Range, thence ascend the Parsnip River, which is the south branch of the Peace River, and from thence descend almost due south by Lake McLeod to Fort George. Fort George appears to be the objective point for all the lines converging from the east if the Thompson River, route is abandoned. I may say that a line taken this way is supposed to traverse the best agricultural country of the North-West, and is quite as short as the one we have adopted so far by Jasper House Pass, with this additional advantage, that it would cross the Rocky Mountains, or what was supposed to be that range, at a much less elevation. But this route is open to the objection that if we were to decide upon surveying that country, it would be practically putting off the construction for some time longer than would be necessary by adopting the line we have already surveyed. If British Columbia were to act with consideration for national interests with regard to the obligations assumed by the Dominion at the time of the Union, it undoubtedly would be the policy any administration would seek to carry out to examine the country more thoroughly before action. With the irritation that is felt by many in British Columbia, and the constant complaints made, it is doubtful whether the country would be justified, even for a permanent advantage, unless that were of so very decided and conclusive a character as to be apparent at sight, in pursuing such a policy. Assuming, therefore, for a moment—and assuming what I may call almost a certainty—that the Jasper House Pass will be the crossing place in the Rocky Mountains, we have the line tolerably clearly defined from east to west.

I have observed from the debates in another place, that there has been an extraordinary amount of—I was about to say ignorance—if that would not be too strong a term to apply—I mean a manifestation of extreme want of information by certain gentlemen who have spoken with the greatest positiveness with regard to the route in the neighbourhood of Lake Superior. It has been assumed, as a matter of course, that it was a great mistake to begin building a road at Fort William, and that it necessitated a branch of from 70 to 100 miles long before it would reach the main line passing Nipegon River. The fact is in this particular quarter the main line can pass by a shorter route from Red Rock at the mouth of Nipegon River, onwards toward the west than it could by ascending the Sturgeon River and pursuing the tortuous course of that stream and its tributaries immediately west of Lake Nipegon. The line we have adopted now from Fort William will ascend the Kaministiquai Valley for about twenty miles, in round numbers. Then diverging somewhat sharply to the right and touching the north-east corner of Lac de Mille Lacs. Up to this point the gradients have been found most favourable and the country highly so. From that point westward to within forty miles of Rat Portage we have found, perhaps, the most favourable country for building a railroad that has been surveyed anywhere on the whole route, unless it be some parts of the prairie country, which, of course, cannot be equalled by any portion of the wooded region. The line here can be made so straight, the grades so easy and the construction will be so light that we will be able from Red Rock to reach Red River by a distance not any longer, certainly, and I believe somewhat shorter than by the former route that was proposed ascending Sturgeon River, near Lake Nepigon, and proceeding in a northerly direction for a long distance in the effort to obtain a passable line.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—Where do you strike the line between Thunder Bay to Red River?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—About that we have no exact information, as no exact surveys have been made from Nepigon to Dog Lake, but so far as we are able to form an opinion, at present, it will reach that line, probably 25 or 40 miles from Thunder Bay. It may be twenty-five, it may be twenty; we are not absolutely sure, but it will not be more than the highest figure I have given. It will be remembered, also, that east of Nepigon there is a long lake called Long Lake, which lies very nearly due north and south. The lake is sixty to one hundred miles long, its exact length is not determined, but any line must pass either north or south of it. The route originally surveyed passed north of this lake and had to take a sudden bend in a southwesterly direction in order to reach the crossing between Lake Nepigon and Lake Superior or pass to the mouth of Lake Nepigon. In 1874 we had a survey made from the Nepigon along the shores of Lake Superior to the Pic River where we found a line quite practicable. From that point the country has been partially examined on a line very nearly as straight as it can be drawn from Pic River to Lake Nipissing. Taking Fort William as the objective point, from there by the old line via Long Lake to the eastern terminus, the distance is 660 miles. From Fort William by the Pic River (the new line) the distance is about 620 miles. Then, if the line were to deflect from the Pic southward so as to follow the general outline of Lake Superior and reach the Sault and there traverse the borders of Georgian Bay to Lake Nipissing, the distance from Fort William would be about 720 miles, as near as can be ascertained. A party was sent out by the Chief Engineer to examine the country between the Pic River and the Sault. That work is not yet complete, nor is it in such a state as would justify us in giving any positive opinion upon it. I have no doubt, however, that it is practicable; but the other route I have indicated is one there is no doubt about. I believe it is quite as easy as the former one, while it is shorter.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—Where are these 720 miles route ?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—From Fort William round by the Sault Ste. Marie to Nipissing; but by leaving Lake Superior at Pic River we can reach Lake Nipissing in 620 miles. The old line north of Long Lake was 660 miles.

Of course these distances in each case are based upon rough calculations. We know the exact distance from Nipigon to the Pic River, but from that point eastward the distances are calculated, allowing to a certain extent for curvatures. To this extent the eastern portion of the road, from Fort William to Nipissing, has been considered. Though that portion in the present condition of the country is not necessary, we still consider it desirable in the public interest to ascertain its probable route. The surveys, so far as they went, gave us a good deal of information about that country which may be of service in the future.

As to the present position of the works, the contractor for the Georgian Bay Branch, as has been stated to the House some time ago, has had his contract cancelled. He has, however, made a very considerable exploration of the country, and to a great extent, an instrumental survey; and as he would probably refer to this matter at another time in the House, he would now simply say this—that what was published in many newspapers, as to engineering difficulties encountered in this relation, was entirely fallacious. No difficulty had been experienced in obtaining the grade that was required in the original contract. The gradient not exceeding 26 feet per mile for the country eastward, and 52 feet per mile for the country westward. In only two places was there any difficulty in securing these gradients; and these, the engineer assures me, can easily be overcome. The explorations in the immediate vicinity of French River shows that the line traverses a rocky, though not a hilly country. The navigation of this river is very good for 26 miles up to a bay known as Canton's Bay, and this might suit very well as a terminus of the road, especially as crossing the river at that point or one near it would ultimately be more favourable for proceeding westward than crossing at its mouth as was originally intended. The modifications required in the contract were so serious that the Government did not consider it proper to go on with it, and they therefore decided upon its cancellation. From Fort William westward, as I have already stated, we have found a singularly favourable country for constructing the road.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—What does the hon. gentleman propose to do with relation to that matter ?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I will state that at a future time.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—To-night ?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—No. For twenty-two miles west of Fort William the road is completely graded, at an expenditure so far of $111,417. This, however, does not pay the entire cost of grading the twenty-two miles. A percentage has, no doubt, been kept back, but still it is pretty close to the real figure.

The 13th contract was to build 45 miles towards Lake Shebandowan, it being supposed that this would be the shortest route westward; but the explorations made show that it would have to wend northward, and we decided to stop short of it about 15 miles. The contractors had the option of taking those 15 miles in the direct line, but this they have declined to do, and at this distance the contract will now cease. From that point westward the road, passing by Lac des Mille Lacs, would become the subject of a new contract, if we consider it wise to ask Parliament to take this step. This matter must be considered at a future time. On the 14th contract, from Red River coming eastward, about 25 miles have been completely graded and a considerable amount of work has been done between that point and Cross Lake. The entire length of this contract is 77 miles. The expenditure on the 14th contract for these 25 miles has been $94,221, which very nearly represents the cost of the grading. The location of the line, it will be remembered, from Rat Portage to the junction of the 14th and 15th contracts at Cross Lake, has been carried on during the summer. It will be recollected that the Government asked authority, during the last week of the Session of last year, to let this as soon as we should complete the surveys. The tenders received for the contract as originally advertised were all so very high that the Government declined to accept them without making further surveys. Two lines have been surveyed during the last season—one to the south of the original line and the other to the north. The former presents a somewhat more favourable country, skirting the shore of the Lake of the Woods; but, on the other hand, it is the longest route by five miles. The line surveyed to the northward is fully longer also, and does not present a much more favourable appearance for construction than the original line. It is probable, therefore, that we will adopt the line originally intended, but raise the surface of the road in order to avoid, as far as possible, the excavation of rock, and we hope by this to very materially reduce the cost as compared to the estimates of last year.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—What is the number of miles?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Thirty-seven miles between Rat Portage and Cross Lake.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—No, no; from Red River eastward, and how many miles north?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Seventy-seven miles are already, and 37 miles more are to be placed under contract. The branch line from Pembina down to Winnipeg is all but completed for a distance of nearly sixty-five miles. The entire amount included in the last certificate paid for these sixty miles, is $178,483, from which it will be seen that the grading of the road has been done with singular cheapness, and I am told that the character of the work is equal to the very best of English railways. A further expenditure of $5,000 is, however, required to build some small bridges, not included in the contractor's agreement. This contract has all been performed on schedule prices.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—What is the distance between Pembina and the main line?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—About 85 miles altogether. These three prices represent the amount of work and expenditure upon the only parts of the line, the grading of which had been proceeded with. The construction of the telegraph line has necessarily made a progress equivalent to that of the instrumental surveys. The section between Lake Superior and Red River is being built from both ends. The last certificate for work done amounted to $47,907. The length from Fort William to Selkirk will be 414 miles. The work of erecting the telegraph between Winnipeg and the town of Livingstone, known as Fort Pelly, being very near the latter, has made considerable progress. The wire is now about hung from end to end of this section. Only a small gap requires to be completed at the crossing of the narrows of Lake Manitoba, and this, I presume, is finished by this time. Still, however, a considerable amount of chopping and cleaving has to be done in the wooded quarter through which the lines run. A large portion of this country has been found to be very heavily wooded, to a much greater extent than was anticipated, and the contractors have not cut out the full width of two chains, so that the chopping and clearing is not all done. The amount paid under this contract is $56,677. The entire length of the line from Selkirk to Livingstone is 266 miles, and for this distance we have the survey of the railroad entirely completed. In profile this part of the country is perhaps the most favourable for the construction of a railway, as far as cheapness is concerned, known in the world. The line of the railway has been approximately located from Livingstone to the longitude of Edmonton, or near there, to a place known as the Hay Lakes. It will not go to Edmonton, but will strike the Saskatchewan at a small river, the White Mud River, about 15 or 20 miles south of Edmonton. The exact location survey is nearly completed to the Saskatchewan crossing, west of Edmonton, and the telegraph line is erected to a little beyond Battle River, a distance of 354 miles. This, added to the 266 miles mentioned, will make the entire distance over which the telegraph line is erected, 620 miles. The section from Battle River, westward, to the crossing at the Saskatchewan, where the line is not actually located, passes through an easy country, and although we have no profile surveys, may be said to be located. Last year it was supposed, judging from some passages in the work of Lord Southesk, that a route would be found up the valley of the Brazeau River from the junction with the Saskatchewan, and reach the valley west of the Jasper House Pass by a somewhat shorter line. Mr. McLeod's party explored this part of the country but found the information referred to was entirely erroneous and that no pass existed in that direction. We are therefore obliged to cross the Saskatchewan and turn somewhat suddenly to the northward, crossing the water-shed of the Frazer River and of the Saskatchewan some 30 or 40 miles from the latter river. We will then pass by Chip Lake across the McLeod and Arthabaska Rivers, somewhere about 50 or 60 miles northwest of the Jasper House Pass. From this point, westwards, we are at present directing our surveys. Parties are engaged there at the present time; and probably the survey will be completed within a few months. The telegraph line will again proceed westward from thence without difficulty, and be continued down the Fraser River. I may say that from Jasper House Pass, westward, engineers are engaged in the work of locating the line, and the instrumental surveys, as I stated before, have proceeded very favourably, considering the general rough character of the country through which the line passes in British Columbia. It will be seen from what I have said that the route of the railroad is practically determined from Lake Superior to Fort George in British Columbia, and assuming what I have stated to be the ultimate policy of the Government, which is more than probably, the total distance is about 1,730 miles. The construction of the telegraph line over this distance has made considerable progress, the lines having been strung over 700 miles. The distance from Fort George to Bute Inlet, assuming that to be the terminus, is about 300 miles, and I have already explained the various surveys which are being made and the results which are being obtained in that section. From Lake Superior, westward, as far as the line is located, the grades, both west and east, have been singularly favourable, the only places where physical difficulties have been encountered—and certainly they are very great—are on both sides of the Winnipeg River, or what is known as Rat Portage, for a distance of, probably, 40 miles on each side.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE.

Before concluding, I will say a few words about the policy the Government has pursued in reference to letting out the contracts in regard to the purchase of steel rails, about which so much has been said to-day. Our policy was this: It is utterly impossible to commence the construction in British Columbia until we have overcome the initiatory difficulties by carefully surveying the country and ascertaining the line which would have ultimately to be adopted. From the statement I have made, it will be seen that an enormous force has been engaged and a large amount expended in surveys in that Province, and it is unjust in the people of British Columbia to complain that we have not prosecuted this work with all due diligence. Directions were given by the Government to the chief engineer, and by him to his staff, that everything that could be done, was to be done in order to push the work forward as rapidly as possible. But pending the settlement of the route in that section—pending the settlement of difficulties which necessarily arose in connection with crossing the Rocky Mountain range—the Government felt it was desirable in the meantime that we should make some progress with the work in other directions; and as it was comparatively easy to obtain labour, materials and surveys east of Red River, and to have the Pembina branch graded, we deemed it advisable to have these works carried out. The Act of 1874 prescribes that the Government may build the road on contract in the ordinary way, or it may be built on the terms set forth in section 8, which provides that the Government may pay $10,000 in money and grant 20,000 acres of land per mile, with four per cent. for twenty-five years upon any additional amount in the tenders, to a company to construct portions of the line. The intention of the Government was, as soon as the surveys were in a sufficiently advanced state, to invite tenders for the construction of such portions of the line as, in the judgment of Parliament, it might be considered desirable to go on with; and that in the meantime the money that has been spent in grading should be held to be a part of the $10,000 a mile, referred to in section 8. Whether the Government would be in a position during the coming season to have contracts obtained and submitted to Parliament for the whole line at its next Session is, perhaps, problematical. We can only hope for the best, and by pushing on the work we are placing ourselves in a position to do this as rapidly as possible. All the money expended in the meantime will be a charge on the $10,000 a mile for which we suppose we will be able to obtain some parties to construct the portions of the line which are most necessary as parts of the ultimate great Pacific Railway. Whether it would be wise to proceed with the construction of the railway west of Red River, which could be done for a considerable distance at a cheap rate, is a matter for consideration; but in view of its probable construction at an early day, it certainly is necessary that we should get steel rails carried into the interior of the country. It took the whole of last season to get 2,108 tons to the banks of Red River, and it will take a great portion of the coming season to get the same quantity carried inland, transportation being very slow.

With regard to the section of railway proposed to be built between Esquimalt and Nanaimo, an Act for the construction of which this House gave its assent to last Session, that question was determined when the Bill was thrown out of the Senate, and certain action on the part of the Government was rendered necessary, regarding which I do not deem it necessary to speak to-night, for our policy has been sufficiently declared, and may form the subject of approval or attack by the hon. gentlemen opposite. It has been assumed that as this road is not to be constructed, the rails shipped to British Columbia are therefore utterly useless. That is a great mistake. If we are able to commence the work of construction this coming year in British Columbia these rails would be required. It may be said to be impossible to commence the construction of the road in British Columbia without having rails on the spot. From Bute Inlet up the Valley of the Homathco there is not an acre of ground for seventy miles where it is possible to grow anything for the sustenance of life; so all that is required in the way of supplies for the force will have to be transported to wherever they are at work. It fortunately happens that there is some good timber at almost every place where timber will be required. But anything else must be taken from the seaboard, and it is of the utmost importance—in fact a necessity—that the rails should be on the spot in order to enable us to proceed with the work and carry supplies and materials forward as the work proceeds. There are five thousand tons in British Columbia and if we have erred in sending them there, we have simply erred in our earnest desire to show the people of British Columbia that we are desirous of keeping faith with them, that our speeches were not mere empty promises and that we were resolved to place ourselves in a position they could not misunderstand. I will not say anything further to-night. I confess after a week's work I feel a little tired, and I shall be glad either on this or any other item of the Estimates, to offer the fullest information I can to any hon. gentleman who may desire it.

Mr. BUNSTER said he was astounded at this item being so small. In the place of its being a little over two millions it ought to have been five millions at least. It was well known that there was a large sum raised in England last season with a view of building the Pacific Railroad; therefore it could not be on account of the want of money that the road was not proceeded with. The item was particularly small as it related to British Columbia. Another item he saw was nil, the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railroad. There had been a good deal said about it, and the sooner the Dominion set about building that road the better, as in his opinion it was part and parcel of the Canadian Pacific. He was glad to see there was a feeling growing in Canada that would force the Government to build this road and carry out its pledges to British Columbia. The sooner the Dominion Government built the Esquimalt and Nanaimo road the better. The rails were on hand, and he was sorry that the Government did not proceed with the work notwithstanding the adverse vote from the other House.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said the Hon. the Minister of Public Works had given the Committee some very interesting details in regard to the progress of the survey, but he had left them in entire ignorance as to the policy of the Government, and he had been very careful to conceal any intention of the Government in reference to the work. They were then as completely in ignorance of what the Government proposed to do as they were when the hon. gentleman rose to address the Committee. He contended that the Committee could not pass this item until the hon. gentleman took them into his confidence with reference to the above question. The hon. gentleman had refused to take the Committee into his confidence and furnish them information relative to the Georgian Bay Branch and the intention of the Government with regard to the contract. That was the essence of the whole question.

He (Mr. Tupper) was prepared to show that if the railway were to be carried to Sault Ste. Marie, the expenditure on the route between Thunder Bay and Red River would be $20,000,000, as completely lost as if it had been thrown into Lake Superior. The hon. gentleman should say what he proposed to do. Then, with reference to British Columbia, elaborate correspondence had been laid on the table shewing everything had been brought to a dead-lock there; but he had not told the House what he intended to do to meet that difficulty. He could not ask this Committee to discuss this question without giving some slight insight into the policy of the Government.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he had stated distinctly the Government had no intention of building any portion of the road from Fort William to Lake Nipissing. The British Columbia question had been before the House for weeks, and was perfectly understood by everyone who desired to look into it. With regard to the Georgian Bay branch, the policy of the Government was in nowise changed.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said he had followed the hon. gentleman closely and failed to learn what was proposed to be done in regard to the great question of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The British Columbia papers merely showed that the Government had succeeded in bringing matters to a dead-lock, and the Premier was bound to tell the House, before asking it to vote this large amount, what he intended to do.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—The last paragraph in the papers will show.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I said our policy from the first was to do everything in our power to keep the bargain the hon. gentleman and his friends made, and nothing will be lacking on our part to bring it to a successful conclusion in British Columbia. I have shown pretty conclusively that nothing I am aware of has been left undone that could be done. I do not know what the hon. gentleman wants.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said if the Premier insisted on going on with the discussion he would be obliged to address the House, even at this late hour. The hon. gentleman had begun his remarks as usual by denouncing the late Government for entering into serious obligations with British Columbia. According to the most recent declaration of the hon. gentleman on this subject, no such obligations were imposed upon him by the late Government. The difficulties were of his own assuming. Instead of lessening the obligations he had increased them in a most extraordinary degree. From the day this Government was formed, down to the present time, they had floundered from one difficulty into another. Only the other day, as it were, the Premier quoted a resolution passed by the late Government, to show that whatever obligations were imposed upon the country by the admission of British Columbia were subject to certain qualifications. In a Minute of Council, dated Sept. 20th, 1875, the following appeared:—

“ It must be borne in mind that every step in the negotiations was necessarily predicated upon and subject to the conditions of the Resolution of the House of Commons, passed in 1871, contemporaneously with the adoption of the Terms of Union with British Columbia, subsequently enacted in the Canadian Pacific Railway Act of 1872, and subsequently re-enacted (after a large addition had been made to the rate of taxation) in the Canadian Pacific Railway Act of 1874; that the public aid to be given to secure the accomplishment of the undertaking ‘ should consist “ of such liberal grants of land and such “ ‘subsidy in money or other aid, not increasing “ the then existing rate of taxation, as the “ Parliament of Canada should thereafter “ ‘determine.”

He asked the Premier if the Government could shelter themselves under that resolution, and at the same time continue to charge the late Administration with having imposed such enormous obligations on the country. Those who would read the able speech delivered by the honorable member for Kootenay would notice that the hon. gentleman had not only quoted that resolution, but shown that Mr. Trutch, who was present when it was passed, had expressed his entire concurrence in it. On the same occasion the hon. member for Kootenay had remarked that the people of British Columbia, provided a straightforward and systematic effort were made to redeem the country's pledge, would be entirely satisfied. But the Government on obtaining power changed their whole policy in relation to the Pacific Railway. Their predecessors had limited the obligations of the country to the use of certain limited and definite means for the construction of the railroad. When the present Government came into power they found, as they admitted in this Minute of Council, that the obligations of the country were qualified and limited; that the road should be built by a private company, and the subsidy should not exceed $30,000,000 and 50,000,000 acres of land. The Premier now spoke of some future effort being made to obtain a company to take it up, but he knew very well everything he had said when introducing his Bill relating to the construction of this work was calculated to deter any private parties from ever undertaking it. That was the first difficulty, and the Government were hardly able to take advantage of this resolution they quoted, in connection with the law they had now on the statute book. The preamble of that Act recited the resolution declaring it should not be done by the Dominion Government but by a private company. They then declared and quoted the resolution that no increase should be made to the existing rate of taxation. They then introduced another preamble declaring the rate of taxation had already been increased, and they went on to take power to build the road as a Government work. The effect of a law which conflicted with a resolution in the preamble was to destroy the resolution.

Then there came Mr. Edgar's mission, to negotiate new terms in British Columbia. The Premier had declared there was no obligation to carry the road west of the head of Bute Inlet. Mr. Edgar proposed to entail upon the country the cost of constructing the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railroad.

He (Edgar) coupled that announcement with a letter, in which he stated that the Ottawa Government would not secure any alteration in the terms without the sanction of the people of the Province. Here was such a declaration on the part of the delegate from this Government, and yet hon. members had the fact before them in connection with the proposal to abandon the whole of the arrangements made with Lord Carnarvon, with relation to the Nanaimo and Esquimalt Railway, that the hon. gentleman withheld this information from the people of British Columbia although the elections were about to take place, until it was too late for the people themselves to have any opportunity of expressing an opinion regarding the matter.

A Bill was introduced last session for the purpose of providing for the construction of the branch from Nanaimo to Esquimalt. The hon. gentleman said that evening that the Government was unable to act upon it because it was defeated in the Senate. There was a very curious feature in connection with this question, and it was this: In the first place the hon. gentleman never required to go to the Senate with this Bill at all. The hon. gentleman had stated in reply to the hon. member for Bruce—now Minister of Justice—when the latter enquired what he proposed to do with regard to the terms agreed upon with Lord Carnarvon, that he (Mr. Mackenzie) had nothing to ask from the House; and that he relied upon the House to sustain the Government in the policy they might follow. The fact was, that under the Bill which the late Administration had placed on the statute book, the Government had the power to fix the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway on the Pacific coast, where they pleased, by an Order in Council—at Esquimalt for instance—and they could have constructed a railway from Nanaimo to Esquimalt without further authority from Parliament, yet the hon. gentleman had come before the House, and having passed his Bill through it, sent it up to the Senate, where it was defeated by the friends of the Government—by the votes of the two of the strongest supporters they had in the House.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—Twenty-two and not two defeated it.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—The twenty without the two could not have defeated it.

The majority that defeated the measure was secured by the support of two of the strongest and most confiding supporters that the Government have in that end of the building; and taken in connection with events which transpire in this House, the people of British Columbia might naturally come to the conclusion that this was not unexpected and not undesired by the Administration itself.

What was the next change in the programme, and the next blunder committed? The first was to have constructed this work as a Government work; and the repeal of the clause which protected this country from incurring any obligation whatever, or being brought into any ruinous financial difficulty in connection with the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. While the terms were adhered to that the late Administration had embodied in the Statute Book, and while the resolution placed by them on the Journals of the House remained in force, it was impossible that the interests of Canada should suffer financially with reference to any obligation they had imposed on the country or assumed. The second blunder was the mission of Mr. Edgar, who was authorized to change the Terms of Union and add to the enormous work of building the Canadian Pacific Railway, the construction of a road from Nanaimo to Esquimalt. An hon. gentleman, who he believed was a civil engineer of very considerable ability, had given them the benefit of his opinion in reference to this matter; and what did the hon. gentleman say? That it was stated in this House that the Island road could be built at the rate of $30,000 per mile, and that upon a survey being made it was found that it would cost nearly three times that amount. What would this add to the expenditure? Take sixty-five miles at $90,000 or $80,000 per mile, which was considerably within the estimates of a gentleman well qualified to judge, and it would be found that this Government had added to the cost of the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway a work which would cause the expenditure of no less than $5,200,000. He thought this was pretty good evidence that the position of the gentlemen on that side of the House who voted that the contract should not be made, and would have deprived the Government of the power of making it, without submitting it to the House, was well founded; they were well warranted in taking that course, and fully justified when the Government refused to bring before the House the information desired as to what the road could be constructed for, in withholding their support from such a measure. This was not all; they had the Georgian Bay Branch. The Government had undertaken to construct this road through a section of the country on this side of the terminus fixed by Parliament for the Canadian Pacific Railway, involving the construction for 85 miles of roadway. He had at the time ventured to tell the Minister of Public Works, who professed to have such great familiarity with these matters, that this was a monstrous absurdity, and, to use his hon. friend's expression with reference to the late Government, "an act of insanity," to build a road 85 miles in length where no survey had ever been made, and over which no person had gone with a view of locating such a line. The hon. gentleman had, however, forced it on the House and insisted in making the contract. The hon. gentleman placed on the table of the House a document, binding the contractor to agree with him to complete this line within eighteen months. They had heard a good deal about the ten years' limit, and about the extravagance of supposing that it was possible by any power to construct a road to the Pacific within ten years. Yet the hon. gentleman was prepared to provide for the construction of the Canada Central line of 120 miles in length with a subsidy of $12,000 per mile, and of 85 miles of railway through a most difficult country—so difficult, indeed, that despite the enormous subsidy offered by this Government, the contractor found it impossible to obtain money in England to go on with the work which he was obliged to abandon.

He would like to know whether the hon. gentleman had carried out the principle he (Mr. Mackenzie) had laid down, that contractors must deposit with the Government certain sums of money, which if their contracts were not performed were forfeited. The fact, however, remained that although the Government had such an enormous and gigantic undertaking on their hands, the hon. gentleman had, in addition, taken on his shoulders the construction of some 90 miles of railway—the length this Georgian Bay route turned out to be in reality, instead of 85—at certainly not less than $50,000 per mile, which would involve the expenditure of $4,500,000. The hon.

gentleman had also provided a subsidy of $1,500,000 for the Canada Central; but this had been found insufficient—so insufficient, indeed, that not a blow had been struck, and not a mile had been graded, although only one year now remained, a six months of summer he might say, for the completion of this whole line of 225 miles in length, from Douglas to the Georgian Bay. The whole of these undertakings had so far ended in nothing.

The fact remained—the hon. gentleman himself made a contract and led this House to believe by making this binding agreement, which was laid on the table, that on the 1st of January, 1877, this road would be finished and in operation; and despite all this they were told that no progress had been made and that the matter was begun de novo, though they were denied information as to what the Government proposed to do; this, however, being essentially pertinent to the subject they had under consideration.

Then they had the Pembina branch. As if it were not sufficient to undertake to build a road 225 miles in length from Douglas to Georgian Bay in connection with the gigantic work of the Canadian Pacific, the hon. gentleman added to it the Pembina branch. The hon. gentleman might say that provision was made for this enterprise by the late Government. True, this was done, and very properly done, because the late Administration considered that the parties who undertook to construct for a certain amount the Canadian Pacific Railway from end to end, were entitled to connection at that point. It was then known that efforts were being made to bring the American railway down to Pembina.

And while he was entirely of the opinion that when this was effected it would be wise to have railway connection with Fort Garry and the Canada Pacific wherever it might be, there was no necessity whatever for the Government loading the public Exchequer and burthening the revenues of this country with the expenditure required for that work. An Act was placed on the Statute Book in reference to this matter—placed there through exertions of men of ability, of means and of influence in the money market of the world—and all that was required was simply the passing of an Order in Council making this law and enabling these gentlemen to take up and complete the road for themselves, without the assistance of the Government, certainly, as far as money was concerned. All who knew anything of this question were perfectly aware that had the Government given 20,000 acres of land per mile in the North-West for the line from Winnipeg to Pembina, these parties, who had already obtained an Act of incorporation, only required in addition the passage of the Order in Council he had mentioned, to enable them to push forward and complete the undertaking; but as if determined to load the Exchequer down and destroy the country by an enormous debt, this Government had undertaken, in the first instance, to build these 65—which are now 85—miles, as a main line running along the side of the Red River; and this, too, when the people of that settlement themselves would have been better pleased if they had the opportunity of dealing with it themselves; and if a land grant had been made, no difficulty whatever would have been experienced in this relation.

Then there was this Thunder Bay Branch. The hon. gentleman that night had spoken in very harsh terms of the ignorance alleged to have been exhibited in another place by an hon. gentleman who had discussed this question. Did not the hon. gentleman think that there was some excuse for ignorance touching this matter? For this House down to the present moment, and during a long period, had not possessed a particle of information, either from the report of the Chief Engineer or from the Government, or from any other source as to what had been the result of the surveys made. He thought that the hon. gentlemen had forgotten himself a little when he charged people with such ignorance and with inability to debate these matters intelligently in the absence of such information. It now appeared that this binding contract had been abandoned; also, that at about 22 miles from Thunder Bay they had deviated from the route which had been chosen. He had followed the hon. gentleman as carefully as he could; but he failed to see how he was going avoid increasing the length of this portion of the line by 70 miles.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—No.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—What was it then?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—How does the hon. gentleman calculate it?

Hon. Mr. TUPPER had taken the calculations of the surveyor, and he could take the map and show that the hon. gentleman could not build a line from Thunder Bay without traversing a distance of something like 70 miles; not only that, but there were 60 miles between Red Rock at Nipegon and the mountain. So they must either come down to Thunder Bay, according to the surveys and maps prescribed therein, lengthening the distance something like 70 miles, or have a branch of 70 miles. Then taking the 85 miles of railway from Pembina to the main line at $40,000 per mile, and as the hon. gentleman himself had stated that the railway from Duluth to Red River traversing a prairie country had cost $48,000 per mile, he would see that he was taking the figures the hon. gentleman had himself furnished in his speech submitting the Canada Pacific Railway policy, and that he (Mr. Tupper) was under the mark when he said this would involve an expenditure of $3,400,000 in all, or something like $17,000,000 in addition to the cost of building the Canadian Pacific Railway proper. Then they had the terms made with Lord Carnarvon. The hon. gentleman complained that although the obligations the late Administration had incurred were qualified by the resolution they found it very convenient now to quote, under this they could not shelter themselves; and notwithstanding that resolution, the hon. gentleman knew that the question was re-opened and that he (Mr. Mackenzie) had undertaken on the part of the Government to make a binding contract with Lord Carnarvon for the construction of this road, which according to the hon. gentleman's own statement that evening was over 2,000 miles in length from the shore of the Pacific Ocean to the shores of Lake Superior, within 15 years. Fourteen years of this period—up to 1890 —remained to expire, within which the faith of Canada was pledged, not only with British Columbia but with the Imperial Government to carry out this great work. Hon. gentlemen would observe that this agreement was entirely unqualified, and what had been placed on the Statute Book had naturally repealed the resolution passed by the late Administration to qualify their obligations. He had examined the papers submitted and had been unable to find any qualification whatever in these terms. The hon. gentleman had himself stated in Parliament last Session that the conditions imposed by Lord Carnarvon had been accepted, requiring an expenditure of $2,000,000 per annum in British Columbia, the building of the road from Nanaimo to Esquimalt, and the completion of the line from the shores of the Pacific to Lake Superior by the year 1890. So that these hon. gentlemen who complained so loudly of the great obligations imposed on the country by the late Government and of the ten years' limitation had undertaken to make an unqualified contract with the Imperial Government and British Columbia to build these 2,000 miles of railway in the course of 15 years, of which 14 had yet to elapse.

They had in connection with that matter the statement that at the end of two years the hon. gentleman had succeeded in grading 2½ miles of road from Thunder Bay to Lake Shebandowan, and 25 miles from Red River eastwardly. Out of the 2,000 miles to be completed by 1890, according to the terms of the unqualified pledge given to the Imperial Government, they had now only 47 miles of the road graded in two years, and yet the hon. gentleman ventured to speak of the improvidence and insecurity of the late Government in making the engagements they did. There was a more important feature connected with this than any he had yet referred to. Before the hon. gentleman brought down his plan for carrying the road to French River, he (Mr. Tupper) hoped he would take into consideration the question of reaching the navigable waters of the Georgian Bay by a more expeditious and economical road. The completion of that portion of the Ottawa navigation, from

Hon. Mr. TUPPER.

Ottawa to the Georgian Bay, between that Bay and Nipissing, could it had been estimated be effected for under $1,000,000, probably about $800,000. It was perfectly obvious that the proposition of the Government would cost from $4,000,000 to $5,000,000. The line of railroad could only be operated during the summer months, and consequently the completion of the water route would be equally as available, and save to the country three or four millions of dollars. He could not see the object of having a road to French River, unless it was intended to carry it to the Sault Ste. Marie.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—My object is to get the cheapest line.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said he would show the House that Sir Hugh Allan proposed, a long time ago, in a speech at Peterboro, that it would be a wise thing to carry a line to Sault Ste. Marie and there form a conjunction with the American lines. The Globe immediately denounced that plan as fatal to Canada, as it would leave Canada dependent upon a foreign country, and that if that policy were carried out it would only be a question of time as to how soon that vast North-West Territory would be a part of the United States. If that was good logic then it was good logic now. The Globe in commenting on this said, (Feb. 21st, 1873):—

“A very cursory examination of the country to be traversed by the American road from the head waters of Lake Superior will show how fallacious all such arrangements are, and how, not only the line through British territory may be carried through from strictly commercial considerations, but must be, if British authority is to be maintained on this continent, and our new Dominion made practically as well as in theory a great fact. Apart from all other considerations, the very fact that the line under consideration is through American territory would be a fatal objection to its being made the grand trunk line for the Canadian North-West. Those who had the command of it would in a very few years command the country. All the intercourse, both social and commercial, of the people of the North-West region would be directly with and through a foreign people, and what might at any moment become a hostile country. By a mere stroke of his pen a foreign ruler might lay an embargo upon the whole intercourse of that part of Canada with what lies to the east. The bonding system, as we have lately had hinted at in connection with a region nearer hand, might be stopped capriciously, and on very short notice; the tide of emigration might be turned away from our border, to a certain extent at any rate, while everything would conduce to make the absorption of the whole territory by the States a mere question of time, and of time very short at the longest. The connection of all that region with the more eastern parts of the Dominion would be merely nominal, and when the pear would be ripe, it would naturally fall, as from the first had been desired, into the lap of our very astute and enterprising cousins over the way.....The proposed route for that undertaking is, on an average, four hundred miles north of that now being made from Duluth, and instead of being, as a large part of both American lines must be, through an irreclaimable desert, it runs through a country which in fertility and climate will compare favourably with any part of the North American continent.

"When this has been stated, nothing else is necessary. Any person of ordinary intelligence can see at a glance that a railway which never throughout its whole course comes within a hundred miles of the border lines of a country can do very little to develop the resources of that country. It is better than nothing, but that is all that can be said in its behalf. The immediate territory through which it runs would be benefitted chiefly and in the first place, and all beyond only incidentally, and after the lapse of many years.

"Instead of the fact that the 'North Pacific' is under construction, being an argument for allowing the Canadian project to lie in the meanwhile in abeyance, it affords the strongest reason possible for its being pushed through without delay. Politically, it is a manifest and pressing necessity, while commercially it is as evidently of the very highest importance for Canada. In this way alone can this country have any chance for her fair share in the lucrative trade with the North-West which will assuredly spring up, and in the varied traffic with the Pacific world which to a great extent will pass through Canadian territory, if once what will be the shortest and easiest route from ocean to ocean is in working order.

"Our neighbours know the value of the prize involved, and are making gigantic efforts to secure it exclusively for themselves. Our rulers will be traitors to their country and to British connection if they lose a single season in making it practicable and convenient for settlers to go to Fort Garry through our own territory, and in putting things in a fair way for the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is a question not merely of convenience but of national existence. It must be pushed through at whatever expense. We believe it can be so pushed through, not only without being a burden pecuniarily to Canada, but with an absolute profit in every point of view. Without such a line a great British North America would turn out an unsubstantial dream; with it, and with ordinary prudence and wisdom on the part of her statesmen, it will be a great, a glorious and inevitable reality."

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—Has the hon. gentleman ever quoted from that before?

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said he had, and he would keep it ringing in the ears of the people of the country until the Government were brought face to face with the fact that they would be branded as traitors if they subordinated means of communication between the great North-West and the older settled portions of Canada to the Northern Pacific Railroad. But the hon. gentleman has at last decided as rapidly as possible to build the road from Thunder Bay to Red River. The House must be glad to learn that the more that line was explored the less difficulty would be experienced to get it through. But what position would this country be in after expending $20,000,000 on this line when the railroad was extended to Sault Ste. Marie? Would any one leave the railroad at the Sault, embark in a ship and spend days on the lake, then disembark at Thunder Bay and take the line to Red River, when he could continue his journey without changing his car by the Northern Pacific Railway and be landed at Winnipeg in two days.

The Premier was bound to announce his policy with reference to this extension to Georgian Bay, and whether that is a link of the chain to the Sault Ste. Marie. If the Government has not taken us into their confidence the Toronto Globe has announced their policy in the following terms. On the 21st of last month that organ of the Government says:—"The railway to French River is a part and a material part of the whole scheme. It is one link in the chain. Another will take us to the Sault Ste. Marie neighbourhood, and so on to the head of Lake Superior." This statement requires no comment. The other night the House had heard leading supporters of the Government, one after another, denouncing in the strongest terms the construction of the Pacific Railway on any terms, yet only two short years ago they had sustained the Government in putting a law on the Statute Book making it a Government work, and adding to it a provision for the construction of 360 miles additional.

Only a year ago the same gentlemen ratified an agreement with the Imperial Government to construct the whole of this gigantic work in fifteen years. It was too late, with the facts patent on the records of this country, to say that the undertaking of the late Government was not a rational one, and that the scheme of the present Administration was not extravagant and dangerous in the extreme. The people of this country would hold the hon. gentlemen opposite strictly responsible for wasting the public money and accomplishing nothing except to grade some forty-seven miles of road and purchase $7,665,000 worth of steel rails. On a former occasion the Premier had stated the life of an iron rail was 8 to 10 years, and of a steel rail something longer; but the hon. gentleman did not seem to be aware of the fact that any rails last longer in moderate use than when they are piled up, as oxidation proceeds more rapidly in the latter case. The Premier would find it hard, with the facts now before the country, to show that economy entered into any part of his policy in relation to this great work.

Mr. COCKBURN expressed himself well pleased with the explanations of the First Minister as far as they went, but he would like to have heard the Premier's views on his intended policy with regard to the Georgian Bay branch. It appeared, however, that the hon. gentleman was determined to be reticent on that question to-night. With reference to the Government policy to be pursued in the remaining portion of this great scheme, he thought that the Government were doing all they possibly could to keep faith with British Columbia, a step he heartily approved of; and he desired here to express his sympathy and goodwill towards the people of that Province and their representatives in this House. He (Mr. Cockburn) strongly urged the Government to lose no time in constructing a railway from Lake Superior to Lake Winnipeg, in order to provide a cheap and expeditious course into the heart of the Prairie Province. He thought that Canadians had just reason for feeling a strong national pride in the country of which they are the happy possessors. We have the largest extent of unoccupied lands, well adapted to sustain human life, of any country in the world. The boundless fertile regions of the Peace and Saskatchewan Rivers of the great North-West, the vast wealth of timber, mines and fisheries of British Columbia were a great inheritance and demand the intelligent and energetic attention of our people with a view to their development at the proper time. Coming nearer home he was amused and astonished to hear the opinions of some prominent men in another place with reference to the expediency of the construction of a railway from the Ottawa Valley to Georgian Bay. It had been alleged that the country lying between the Capital and the Georgian Bay was worthless and would never furnish any traffic to a railway. He spoke advisedly in the emphatic contradiction of these views. There exists a large area of valuable lands for agricultural purposes, with groves of valuable pine scattered throughout. Even without any through traffic from the North-West or United States, a large local business will be done in the settlement of the country, the transportation of settlers and their goods, supplies for lumbermen and probably square timber and sawn lumber. His experience was that railways through a new, well-timbered country often paid better than lines through a pretty well settled country. This proposed line when built would confer immense advantages upon the Dominion, and upon the Province of Ontario in particular, but while he approved of the construction of a railroad from the Capital to the Georgian Bay, he did not think that the Premier had made a judicious selection of a western terminus and harbour. He would advise the hon. gentleman to change his terminus to a more southerly place where he would find everything well established, ready to hand, with an excellent harbour sufficient to accommodate the marine of all the great lakes; also with colonization roads in every direction, and the country pretty well settled and organized, which would greatly facilitate railway construction. But the greatest reason of all he urged in favour of the adoption of Parry Sound harbour was that it would involve much less expense, as the mileage to this point was shorter than by any other route. He hoped that the First Minister would give these suggestions serious, impartial and favourable consideration, which would result in a large saving of money and afford satisfaction to the settlers of the free grant lands.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL enquired of the Premier whether the hon. gentleman alluded to him when he spoke of $2,000 having been paid for the rent of a place where the iron for the Miramichi bridge had been stored for three years?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE replied that he had merely referred to the hon. gentleman, knowing the iron was there, as placed on his property. They had paid the rent because they considered it was due, the material having remained there so much longer than was necessary before it was used.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—The hon. gentleman does not mean to say that the Government paid me any rent?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—No; I merely said that an hon. gentleman on the opposite side of the House knew something of the matter.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL complained that $2,000 had been paid to Clarke, Reeves & Co. which should not have been paid.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE stated that owing to the lateness of the hour, in answer to the hon. member for Cumberland, he would merely notice the salient points contained in the speech of the hon. gentleman. He trusted that the hon. members for British Columbia and elsewhere, and the country at large would thoroughly appreciate the declaration which the hon. member had made in opening his remarks, and which they were to assume, unless it was repudiated, was endorsed by those whom the hon. member frequently led in the House, and for whom the hon. member was an active and energetic spokesman. The hon. gentleman, on behalf of his late colleagues, stated that in connection with their obligations to British Columbia they were absolutely controlled by the resolution which had so frequently been referred to. He trusted the country would now understand what was alleged by the hon. gentleman—that those were the terms comprised in the articles of Union providing for the commencement of this railway within a period of two years, and its completion within ten years; if they had found it impossible to do so without increasing the taxation of the country they would not have been under any obligation whatever to British Columbia to build a mile of this road. This, at present, was the statement of the hon. gentleman. He knew that the hon. gentleman had previously made the declaration in the country, but this was the first time when this interpretation had been made in the House by a gentleman occupying his prominent position in his party. With this he would contrast a statement made by the hon. gentleman's leader on the occasion of the general elections of 1874, when the the right hon. gentleman addressed his constituents with reference to a declaration made by his hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie) to the electors of Sarnia regarding the Terms of Union, to the effect that the compact made with the late Government was impossible of fulfilment, and that some relaxation of these terms was requisite. The right hon. member for Kingston then held that this declaration would entitle British Columbia to secede from the Union; that the faith of the country was pledged to the fulfilment of these conditions—not as the hon. member for Cumberland had qualified them a few moments ago, but to the commencement of the railway within two years and to its completion within ten years. He would also contrast the statement of the hon. member for Cumberland with another statement made by the right hon. member, and they knew these contrasts were sometimes of the most striking description. The hon. gentleman had made a speech during the previous Session with regard to the exposition of the Pacific Railway policy of the Government by his hon. friend the First Minister, and he had then alluded to the arrangements made with British Columbia which he qualified in another tone this evening. The hon. gentleman now held that the arrangements made with Lord Carnarvon were onerous, extravagant and improvident, and that the contract made with the the Imperial Government largely increased the burdens of the country as they existed under the terms in question. On page 514 of the Hansard would be found these remarks, made by the hon. gentleman:—

“But, Sir, the fact that the engagements which the First Minister has just stated were entered into with British Columbia during the past season, sets at rest forever any question as to whether we are in a position that would allow to doubt and hesitate a single instant, what course to pursue. I am not going to call in question the propriety of this engagement for a moment:—onerous, extravagant and improvident and unnecessarily and largely increasing the burdens of the country, as the hon. gentleman now held should be. The hon. gentleman continued: I feel that the Ministry of the day are entitled to the support of this House, and especially the gentlemen who sit on the Opposition benches, in any measure which is required to carry out the pledge—perhaps a somewhat imprudent pledge—that was given by their predecessors in relation to this great work; and I feel they may look with confidence to this side of the House for the most energetic support of the measures they have taken—I believe wisely taken—for the redemption of that pledge.”

He (Mr. Blake) had not occupied the position of an enthusiastic admirer of the Carnarvon terms at that time, although a devoted follower of his hon. friend the Premier; he had never hesitated to say so, but the position taken by the hon. member for Cumberland then did not agree with the position he took to-day. While dealing with the question of past and present utterances, he would make another elegant extract from the utterances of the hon. member upon the second reading of the Bill touching the Carnarvon conditions. A motion was made by an hon. gentleman who sat behind the hon. member for Cumberland, that the Bill should not be read the second time that day, but that it be read the second time that day three months; the hon. gentleman and his leader voted against that motion, and for the second reading. Immediately afterwards the hon. member for Cumberland said:—“That although this road “from Esquimalt to Nanaimo was outside the obligations entered into by the “late Government with British Columbia, he regarded it as an effort made “in good faith to arrange for the “redemption, as far as possible, of “pledges made with British Columbia, “and such being the case, he felt “obliged to give what support he could “towards carrying out those arrangements.”

The hon. member for Cumberland then stated that the measures wisely taken by his hon. friend the Premier received his hearty and energetic support and were entitled to receive such from his friends; nevertheless the great mass of the hon. gentleman's supporters voted against the Bill. He (Mr. Blake) had no doubt that the hon. members from Kingston and Cumberland did all in their power to secure a contrary result; after their public declarations this was their duty, and their situation was indeed painful. He was, however, obliged to hold the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House responsible for the loss of the Bill, because their friends in the Senate voted against it, with one or two gentlemen who usually supported the Government. The hon. gentlemen were in some embarrassment in dealing with the question of the construction of this railway owing to divisions in their ranks; and the opinion of the right hon. member for Kingston was known to be directly opposite to that held by the hon. member for Cumberland. The right hon. member for Kingston had publicly declared that he always thought that the road might be constructed and operated as a Government work; and that advantage had been taken by his absence at Washington on public business to introduce a contrary provision.

The hon. gentleman stated that the mission of Mr. Edgar to British Columbia had relation to an additional charge upon the people of this country with reference to the proposal to build the Nanaimo and Esquimalt Railway, and also that the Government had the power by an Order in Council to fix the terminus at Esquimalt. Was there then an additional burden proposed? No. They stated that under the Terms of Union the Railway was not proposed to be carried beyond the bounds of the Pacific, and he said so still; but the policy of the late Government was to go beyond the Pacific seaboard. Their policy was to go to Esquimalt, and it was unnecessary to consider what patriotic motives dictated that policy, what was the situation of members in the House, and what amount of pressure was brought to bear from British Columbia? It was surely extreme audacity for the hon. gentleman who deliberately added this to the other obligations of the country, to complain because a part only of that which he endeavoured to engraft upon the arrangements was proposed to the British Columbians with a view of getting some relaxation of the other too tightly arranged Terms of the Union. The hon. gentleman answered that very easily by saying that the pledge to the Province was of no consequence at all. The position assumed was that to construct the road by the Government was a ruinous undertaking, but it would be profitable for a company.

Then the hon. member stated that the Pembina branch was needlessly added when private enterprise would have constructed it. The line was valued at $40,000 a mile, but he believed as it was being built, with rolling stock, it would only cost about $13,000 per mile. The hon. gentleman also said the arrangements as to the Thunder Bay branch have already been altered and a binding contract broken up. The contract was a schedule one, and was prepared to meet the exigencies of the situation. The contractors were required to go as far as they could with the work, and their maximum amount of work was performed. Then, it was alleged that the arrangements made with Lord Carnarvon were extravagant. As to some provisions of that arrangement every one knew his opinion; he thought it an imprudently liberal bargain. The hon. member for Cumberland was in favour of the agreement last Session because he thought it wise, and now he opposed it because he thought it foolish. In their Minutes of the 20th December and the 30th March, the Government stated clearly and distinctly what they thought that arrangement to be—that in their view, as negotiators entrusted with executive powers, they were not enabled without the consent of Parliament to alter stipulations, and they conceived that the terms were based upon the resolution that the taxation should not be increased in the prosecution of the work. Had it been otherwise they would have come to Parliament in order to obtain assent. This was the interpretation they gave to the Carnarvon terms and upon which they were prepared to act, as clearly stated in the papers, which had not, to his mind, been satisfactorily impugned. The hon. gentleman complained that the Minute of 20th September was withheld until after the general election. The papers brought down stated the facts on this point, which it was unnecessary to reproduce. It would be unworthy of the Government to answer such a statement as that made by the hon. member. The hon. member, if he held that view, should formulate his charge in a proper way, and not bring it up in debate at 2 o'clock in the morning. If they had been guilty of the alleged offence, let them receive the punishment, which, under the circumstances, would be due to them.

What was the policy of the Opposition, as the hon. gentleman propounded it? First of all, to affirm there never was a contract with British Columbia which bound this country to build a mile of railway, unless by a private company on the specified terms of $30,000,000 and 50,000,000 acres of land. They had made no bid for the support of the British Columbia members. They had been longing to do their duty to the Province and fulfil their pledges. Their view of the resolution was that although it was not inserted in the contract, it had the same binding force as if it had been inserted. He had always stated that the country was committed to the construction of the road; but the Terms of Union did not imply that they should drag the country into ruin, and the Government would not do that. No power should induce them to bring down any proposition they conceived the country was incapable of bearing. But at the same time they would do what they could.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER asked what the Government would have done had the resolution carried which declared that the road should be built by a private company, and not otherwise. What would hon. gentlemen have done had they been pledged to that course and been unable to find a private company to carry on the works. He proceeded to condemn the Government for taking the work into their own hands after their accession to power, and stated that he voted for the first reading of the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway because he was satisfied the work would be put up to competition; but when they found the Government were going to assume all the power of making the contracts for the construction of the road, they claimed they were entitled to use all their influence in order to defeat the Bill.

But the hon. gentleman could not suppose that it was necessary to formulate an accusation against this Government. After what had been witnessed of the readiness of hon. gentlemen in this House, who, a few nights ago, were loud in their denunciation of any expenditure on the Pacific Railway, to endorse such a transaction as the purchase of the steel rails, the Government could court the gravest charges that could possibly be formulated, with a full assurance they would be sustained by their supporters. But charges would be formulated before a tribunal to which the Opposition had appealed, and not in vain, on several occasions during the past two years. The hon. gentleman must suppose his friends were easily convinced, if he thought to persuade them there was any parallel between a proposition to take money out of the public Treasury to build 65 miles of railway and a proposal which only required an appropriation of $20,000 per mile for the whole of that line on the Island.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—Where was the rest of the money to come from?

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said the hon. gentleman should ask Senators Christie and McMaster and the Minister of Customs behind him. All these gentlemen—his (Mr. Blake's) own friends—were fighting for the possession of this contract. While this was the case it would not do to say the proposition of giving 50,000,000 acres and $30,000,000 was entirely an unpractical and senseless scheme, and this country would never see the Pacific Railway constructed by any other means. If that great work should ever be accomplished, as he trusted and believed it would be by wise and judicious measures, it would be by bringing the great capitalists of England into the scheme by means of a company, organizing immigration and utilizing the immense resources of the Saskatchewan country. There was every reason why a work of such national importance, not only to Canada, but to the empire to which we belong, should attract capital from abroad, but would it ever be done by a Government who abused the position they occupied by proclaiming to the world that this was so utterly ruinous that no persons would be found so senseless as to undertake it with a grant of 50,000,000 acres of land and $30,000,000? If the people of British Columbia were ever to have a railway connection with Eastern Canada they must get it by the means provided by the late Administration, and by the people of this country bringing back into power men who had confidence in securing the success of the great undertaking.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER.

At the request of Mr. DEWDNEY, the debate was allowed to stand over.

The item $2,000,000 for Welland Canal was passed without discussion, and the Committee rose and reported progress.

Mr. SCHLUTZ requested permission to return to an item in the Estimates already passed for the purpose of asking a question. It would be seen that the enormous reduction of $170,000 had been made in the vote for Dominion Surveys, while all the other votes which affected Manitoba had been decreased in the same alarming proportion. He desired to know whether the amount voted would be increased in the supplementary Estimates?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE replied that it would not be increased.

Mr. SCHULTZ said that he must protest against such wholesale reduction in all the Estimates affecting Manitoba, and enquired whether the Government intended to increase any of these amounts in the supplementary Estimates?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the expenses connected with the Province were already so great that he could not increase any of these amounts in the supplementary Estimates.

The Committee rose and reported, and the House adjourned at Fifty Minutes past Two o'clock a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

SATURDAY, April 1, 1876.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Two o'clock.

RAILWAY LANDS IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD introduced a Bill respecting Dominion Lands on the line of the Pacific Railway in the North-West. He explained that its object was to enable settlers to go on the land reserved on each side of the railway. Eighty acres would be given as a homestead on three years' settlement, and the settler could purchase as much as 320 acres, on the understanding that he would have to pay the price subsequently arranged by the Government with the contractors.

Mr. BUNSTER asked if this applied to the valuable lands reserved for railway purposes on Vancouver Island?

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said he did not understand the Government held any lands on the Island.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) thought it very desirable that settlement along the line of railway in the North-West should be encouraged.

Mr. SHULTZ was pleased that the Government had introduced the Bill, but regretted that homesteads could not be made in the usual way, and urged that no restrictions be placed on the portion applicable to Manitoba.

The Bill was read the first time.

RETURNS.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD complained of the delay in bringing down returns. Some 108 had been granted and less than one-half of them were before the House.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said there were piles of returns being made out in the departments, which required some time and supervision. He gave eighteen hours a day to attending to his duties, and the fact was the returns were brought down as rapidly as ever they had been in former Sessions. Many of them were merely nominal, having been moved for the purpose of bringing the questions they referred to before the House. It was utterly impossible to have all the returns asked for brought down promptly.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD replied that the trouble was his hon. friend represented a one-man power, fancying that he must surpervise and overlook everything. His hon. friend undoubtedly gave a great deal of time to his duties—probably more than the country could claim, or had a right to expect. His hon. friend need not take the course he did, for surely he could trust his colleagues. At the time his hon. friend (Mr. Tupper) moved for the papers, he (Mr. Tupper) enquired whether he should give his reasons; he replied, no, certainly not, as the discussion would take place when the return was made.

THE INSOLVENT ACT.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE moved the second reading of the Bill to amend the Insolvent Act of 1875.

Mr. PALMER suggested that an amendment should be made to enforce the orders of County Court Judges in New Brunswick. It was entirely useless to empower them to issue orders which they could not enforce.

Mr. BARTHE suggested that sections 4 and 9 were somewhat anomalous, and he hoped that section 9, which was very hard upon many people in Lower Canada, would be repealed. He pointed out that the assignees got such a large percentage of the estates in their charge, that with the other numerous disbursements necessary, a very large proportion of the assets were swallowed up before a cent could be apportioned to the creditors. Since the Government appointed official assignees, the Government ought to pay them. This, at any rate, would meet the requirements of the smaller creditors; whether it would be equally welcome to the larger ones he doubted very much. He also suggested a change in regard to the publication of insolvent notices, which he contended ought to be published, in at least, in one local newspaper as well as in the Official Gazette. The Gazette was but little read by the public, but if it were insisted upon that these notices should appear in that publication, the law ought to be that they should appear there once and once in a local newspaper. The great objection against the Insolvency Act in Lower Canada was that it was too expensive, and as one of the provisions which led to this result he called attention to the fact that an assignee could only appoint his deputy upon the order of the Judge. To get an order of the Judge required the services of an attorney, and of course the attorney required his fees. He suggested that this provision be amended so as to simplify the law and render the expense in question unnecessary.

The Bill was read the second time.

THE QUEBEC TRINITY HOUSE.

On the motion of the Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE, the House went into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—That as the duties formerly discharged by the Trinity House of Quebec, whose warden was a salaried officer, now devolve on the Quebec Harbour Commissioners, it is expedient to provide that the said Harbour Commissioners may, from time to time, appropriate out of the Harbour Revenues, a sum not exceeding two thousand dollars to the payment of an annual indemnity to the President of the Board of Harbour Commissioners.

The resolution was agreed to in Committee and reported, and notice was given that it would be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Trinity House Bill.

PLANTING TREES IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD moved the second reading of a Bill to amend the Dominion Lands Act, which he explained was intended to encourage tree planting in the North-West. In the United States, and especially in Minnesota, they had done a great deal in this direction, and about half a million of acres had been set apart for that purpose. From the reports which had been published on the subject, it appeared the attempt had, on the whole, been eminently successful. As to the desirability of doing something in the same way in our own North-West, he quoted from the report of Mr. G. W. Dawson, of the North-West Boundary Survey, and he mentioned that to the suggestions of that gentleman were owing the leading provisions of this measure. There were other provisions in the Bill which would be explained in Committee.

In reply to Sir John A. Macdonald,

Hon. Mr. LAIRD stated that the Law was pretty much the same as in Minnesota, but scarcely so exacting.

The second reading was carried and the Bill referred to Committee of the Whole—Mr. Young in the chair.

Clauses 1 and 2 were carried without discussion.

On clause 3,

Mr. SCHULTZ thought the provisions were very unfair to the recipients of bounty warrants, to whom the grants had been made without any such conditions as were now proposed to be imposed.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) said if these warrants were in the hands of those to whom they were originally granted, there would be some force in what was said by the hon. member for Lisgar; but, unfortunately, they were too frequently in the hands of speculators who held them for speculative purposes and prevented settlement.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said it was manifestly unjust to any party who had purchased these warrants that their acquired rights should now be interfered with in this way.

Mr. SCATCHERD agreed with this view of the case, and could not understand upon what principle his hon. friend could propose such an interference with vested rights.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD contended that it was in the interest of the country that there should be some restrictions upon the power of speculators holding those warrants to prevent settlement. If the rule laid down by the right hon. member for Kingston were to be strictly applied, it would prevent the reservation of lands for railway purposes in the North-West.

MR. BARTHE.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) urged that there should be some means of preventing speculators from locking up whole townships, which there was a tendency to do with a view to holding them until settlement around them would make them more valuable, which really interfered very seriously with populating the country.

Mr. SCHULTZ said he had studied the section over the more carefully on account of the anxiety of the hon. member for Selkirk to have it passed, and that anxiety was accounted for by the fact that it affected the Hudson Bay Company's lands, and which could thus be held until they were surrounded by settlement, and thereby greatly enhanced in value.

Mr. SMITH said his hon. friend had at one time likened him to a celebrated character in history, "the ancient mariner." He might liken the hon. gentleman to another character of some note—a character who was always professing his readiness to fight—he referred to Sir John Falstaff.

Mr. SCHULTZ suggested that the following words be added to the clause: "After the passing of this Act."

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the clause would be allowed to pass pro forma, and the amendment of the hon. member for Lisgar, as well as one suggested privately by the right hon. gentleman from Kingston, would be considered before the next stage of the Bill was taken.

The 4th and 5th clauses were passed without discussion.

On the 6th clause, providing that claims to homestead rights on account of actual settlement must be made to the local officer within three months from the completion of the survey,

Mr. SCHULTZ thought the time was too short.

The section, after some discussion, was allowed to stand over.

On section 9, with respect to settlement by communities,

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) suggested the addition of the following words:—"Provided always, that in such community the provisions respecting improvements by cultivation and otherwise shall not be less stringent than "those exacted in the case of individual homesteads."

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE promised that the suggestion would be considered before the next stage.

The remaining clauses of the Bill were passed with little discussion.

The Bill was then reported, and the amendments read the second time.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed, an amendment having been added providing that the provision referring to county warrants would refer only to those issued after the passing of the Act.

SUPPLY.

The House then went into Committee of Supply—Mr. Scatcherd in the Chair.

Item 88, providing $160,000 for St. Anne's Canal, was agreed to.

On item 89, $330,000, Carillion and Chute à Blondeau Canal,

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the progress of the contractors was very unsatisfactory, and he had been doing all he could to hurry them up.

On item 90, $200,000, Grenville Canal,

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said it was hoped the whole work would be completed this year. The late Minister had left a very disagreeable legacy upon his hands in this connection, but the work was now progressing very satisfactorily.

On item 91, $6,000, Rideau Canal,

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said this work would undoubtedly demand the attention of Parliament at an early day. Its usefulness was now nearly at an end, the railways having taken away its traffic. It cost the country a considerable amount more than its revenue, and it was neither useful nor ornamental.

On item 92, $35,600, Culbute Canal,

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said a greater amount would be required to complete the canal than was now asked, but the vote under consideration would, he thought, enable them to have the canal open for navigation. His information was not very distinct, but he understood that during the coming year the canal could be used.

Item 93 was passed without discussion.

ST. PETER'S CANAL.

On item 94, $50,000, St. Peter's Canal, and in reply to Hon. Mr. Tupper, Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE stated he had directed enquiries to be made as to the larger sizes of vessels likely to pass through this canal, and it was very probable the plans would be changed to meet the case. He could not say exactly what the width would be, but in all probability it would be such as would accommodate all the vessels in question.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said he was glad to hear there was a probability of such a change, but he took the opportunity of protesting against the principle involved in the decision of the Premier. He admitted the right of the hon. gentleman to change the plans of his engineer, but after this House had agreed to vote a sum of money for a public work, based upon certain specifications, he held that it was unconstitutional and deserving of censure to alter these specifications. Here was an instance in which this had been done, and the result could not fail to be a considerable loss to the country.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said there would be no loss.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER contended that loss must inevitably result from the change, it having been made not only after Parliament had voted an appropriation for it, based upon certain specifications, but after the work was under contract.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman evidently did not know what he was talking about.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said it was a habit of the First Minister to throw insulting taunts across the House in this way, and if other hon. gentlemen had made up their minds to tolerate it he for one was not going to submit to it without complaining and protesting. He appealed to this Committee to know whether he was stating that which commended itself to their judgment—

Hon. Gentlemen—No, no.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said hon. gentlemen were ready to "yes" or "no" just as their leaders on Treasury Benches directed, and upon this occasion they had not waited to see whether what he was about to say commanded their approval or not. What he did desire to know was whether he was not saying that which would commend itself to the judgment of the Committee when he asserted that the change of a plan by the Minister of Public Works after it had been passed upon by Parliament, and after the work to which it had reference was under contract, was not likely to result in loss to the Public Treasury. And when he made that statement the First Minister told him he did not know what he was speaking about. The hon. gentleman's information on this subject was evidently deficient, and when he (Mr. Tupper) put it to the House whether the course being taken was not likely to involve a loss of public money, the hon. gentleman had no answer to give except that he (Mr. Tupper) knew nothing concerning what was under discussion. Conduct like this was unbecoming any person holding the position of Leader of the House, and was calculated to degrade Parliament in the eyes of the country and of the whole world. It was calculated to degrade the House itself.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he had only to reply that nothing the hon. gentleman could say would degrade any member of the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the language of the First Minister was unbecoming any member of Parliament, and especially unbecoming the Leader of the House. It would not be tolerated in the British House of Commons, where even Dr. Kenealy would be protected from such insults as were thrown across this House. In fact, the language was not fully characterized when it was called insulting. The hon. gentleman forgot himself—forgot the position he held, when he used language of that description. It would be unparliamentary in a private member to utter such expressions, to say nothing of the gentleman who was the guardian of the rights and privileges of the House. During his (Sir John's) long experience in Parliament he had never known of a case of more wanton insult than that of which the First Minister had been guilty just now. He condemned the policy of interfering with plans after money had been voted to the works to which they referred, and held it to be an abuse which might lead to very disastrous consequences. It was, in fact, as much an unauthorized expenditure as if there had been no appropriation at all. The Government might as well decide that a railway for which Parliament had set aside certain moneys, believing it was to be a 4½ foot gauge railway, should at their pleasure be changed to a narrow gauge.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he did not even know the width of the canal at the time the vote was taken, nor until the dimensions had been reduced and the House had met. The estimate was based upon the schedules, without any reference to plans. As to the lecture read by the member for Kingston, he thought he could find the right hon. gentleman some specimens of his own language which would show he had little room to speak. The hon. member from Cumberland never spoke without wounding the feelings of hon. gentleman upon this side of the House, and if he thought he could indulge in those offensive epithets—a kind of warfare that would disgrace a Hottentot Legislature—without hon. gentlemen retaliating, he was much mistaken.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER appealed to the House to say whether he had used any expression justifying the language of the Hon. the First Minister. When the hon. gentleman was at a loss for an answer he fell back upon insults, and if he persisted in that course, he (Mr. Tupper) would, not fail upon every occasion to bring it before the House. He called attention to a discrepancy between the explanations of the First Minister with regard to St. Peter's Canal and the statement of the hon. member for Richmond, who was reported in the Official Report on the occasion of his having brought the subject before the House to have stated in the most distinct terms that the plans and specifications were before the House when the money was originally voted for this purpose. The hon. member had upon his arrival at Ottawa this Session invited his (Mr. Tupper's) co-operation in this connection, and he had a right now to sustain what had been said.

Mr. FLYNN said he felt grateful to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper) for the assistance he had received from him, as would every hon. member for Cape Breton. In 1874 he (Mr. Flynn) had inspected the plans of the St. Peter's Canal, and during that Session $75,000 was voted for the work based upon those plans. This was what he had said upon that subject. With regard to what the hon. gentleman said about inviting his (Mr. Tupper's) co-operation, he had met the hon. gentleman after arriving here, and was informed by him that he had a motion prepared on the subject for submission to the House. He (Mr. Flynn) had then suggested to the hon. member that the subject would be better brought up by a member from Cape Breton, which was agreed to between them. Beyond this he had not invited the co-operation of the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman had also stated that it was the intention of the Government of which he was a member to carry out the plans of Mr. Perley. There was no discussion at the time these estimates were passed in 1874 and 1875.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE quoted from the reports published in the newspapers to show that, in 1874, when asked for the plans and specifications, he had distinctly stated there were none then prepared.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said the hon. member for Richmond had stated distinctly that "plans were then laid on the table of the House," which was certainly a contradiction of the Premier's statement. The hon. member had correctly stated the arrangement that had been mutually made as to bringing this matter before the House. This work, however, was not a local or Provincial undertaking, or only affecting local interests; it was a Dominion work, and the hon. member was aware that the Provincial Government of which he (Mr. Tupper) was a member was the Government which had constructed it, and that it was being rapidly carried to conclusion at Confederation, after which it was followed up by the then Dominion Government. He repeated the history of the circumstances which had led to this matter being passed over without explanation for the past two Sessions, showing that it was laid aside, from time to time, at the request of the Premier. He had heartily co-operated with the hon. member in respect of this work, for which he had been repaid by having his motives in agitating the subject impugned. He hoped the hon. member would not abuse a favour of this nature in the future no matter by whom given. He remarked that it was perfectly evident the Minister of Public Works had based his advertisements for tenders upon the information before the House in 1874.

Mr. MACDONELL (Inverness) said the same assurances given to-day upon this subject had been given already. He saw no good arising out of this discussion. In fact, it was clear that it was brought about for some other object than merely to forward the interests of the people of Cape Breton. The hon. gentlemen had referred to unparliamentary expressions, and in the same breath he had insulted hon. members by telling them they were ready to say yes or no to anything the Government might desire. If the hon. gentleman did not speak of what he did not know, he would have remembered that only the other day the Minister of Public Works had distinctly stated that the schedules only were laid upon the table when the vote was asked for in 1874.

Mr. FLYNN said in his remarks asking for papers regarding the St. Peter's Canal, he had made use of the term "plans and specifications," and had said these were laid upon the table. It would be remembered, however, that his complaint was directed to the width of the canal, which had been reduced, and although he made use of the terms in question, what he meant to have spoken of was the engineer's report. He thought this explanation would be sufficient to meet the charge of contradictory statements as between himself and the Hon. the First Minister. He was ready to give the hon. member for Cumberland all due credit for what the Government, of which he had been the leader, did for the St. Peter's Canal, but the work had been undertaken, although for certain reasons abandoned, before the hon. gentleman was in public life.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said the members from Cape Breton were satisfied with the explanations of the Premier, and so should the member for Cumberland, who appeared to be very deeply concerned about that county, for what reasons it was easy to understand. He thought they might well say, in the agony of their spirits, in this case, "save us from our friend."

Mr. MACDONALD (Cape Breton) said he was not satisfied with the explanations of the Premier, and he was doubtful if all the other members from Cape Breton were. This discussion was caused by the Minister denying that in 1874 the dimensions of the canal were known and fixed. It was according to his (Mr. Macdonald's) remembrance that in 1874 these dimensions were publicly stated, and that the discussion with regard to them was taken part in by several members from Ontario. It was currently reported that the Premier had changed the plans, not only without consulting the members from Nova Scotia, but even without consulting his own colleagues. That statement was not contradicted up to the present time.

The item then passed.

Item 95, $10,000, miscellaneous canals, was passed without discussion.

THE PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

On item 96, $331,000, Public Buildings, Ottawa,

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE stated that he hoped the library would be completed within the fiscal year. $18,900 was a revote which had not been expended, and there was a new vote of $6,000, which it was roughly calculated would suffice for the completion of the work. The amount of $296,000 was required for the extension of the Western Block, now under contract, and that building would be fully required for the accommodation of the engineering staff of the Public Works Department. He remarked that a mistake had been made in laying out the interior of the Departmental Buildings from the beginning. The rooms were too small, and in most cases quite unfitted for the work to be done in them. There ought to have been several large rooms where the majority of the clerical work could be done, and where supervision would be much simpler and more complete. This had been attended to in the new wing.

The item was agreed to.

MILITIA ESTIMATES.

Unopposed items under the head of Militia were then taken up. Items 62, 63, 64, 65, 66 and 67 were passed without much discussion.

On item 68

Mr. IRVING suggested that some militia officers, young men not below the rank of captain, might have accompanied the Major-General in his trip across the country, and the cost of it would have been small in comparison to the advantage. The Major-General might at an early day go to some other quarter of the globe, and the information he had acquired would thus be lost. Instances of this kind happened already.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL desired some information as to the expense of that trip, which the Minister of Militia said he would give, but it would not be in the Public Accounts until next fiscal year.

Mr. BOWELL called attention to the inferior character of the cloth used in making the uniforms of the force, on which subject he quoted from Major General Smyth's report. He also stated with regard to that report that it contained many excellent practical suggestions, from a man who evidently knew what he was writing about, more so, indeed, than was shown by any similar report presented to Parliament.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the defect in the cloth to which the hon. member for Hastings had called attention required some explanation from the Minister of Militia. There could be no excuse for this, and he was sure if it had been inspected by Col. Walker Powell he would never have allowed such clothing to be taken from the hands of the contractor. There was no reason why cloth should be accepted that a single rain would change from scarlet to black, and reduce the caps to pulp. The Minister should explain who was the contractor, who was the inspector, and how such articles were allowed to pass.

Hon. Mr. VAIL said the object in the first place in getting the militia clothing made in this country was to give to Canada the benefit of the work. It originated before he came into office, and he was happy to endorse that policy. Tenders for cloth manufactured in Canada had been extensively advertised, tenders to be received by sample, the lowest had been accepted and the contract was carried out in good faith. It must be understood that Canadian manufacturers had not arrived at the same degree of proficiency in making cloth as they had in England, especially scarlet cloth, which was the most difficult in the world to manufacture so as to stand the effects of sun and rain. The fact was the Canadian cloth had not come up to his expectations. As to the caps, they had been bought cheap as an experiment, as a substitute for the Glengarry caps which in hot weather exposed the men's necks and faces to the sun too much.

Mr. MACDONALD (Toronto) objected to the statement of the Minister of Militia going abroad respecting Canadian cloth, as it would have a prejudicial effect. Canadian cloth was equal to cloth made in any part of the world. It was quite true that we had not arrived at the same proficiency in dying as they had attained in the old country, but it did not necessarily follow that because British soldiers wore scarlet uniforms that our militia men should be dressed in scarlet also. Why not dress our men in national grey cloth, that could be produced here most effectively. Give the manufacturers a chance and they would produce an article equal to anything manufactured in the world for durability and comfort.

The item was carried.

On motion of Mr. MILLS, the time for receiving reports of Committees on Private Bills was extended until the 8th of April.

The House adjourned at Ten minutes past Six o'clock p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, April 3, 1876.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

INSOLVENT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Mr. CARON moved that the Bill to amend the Insolvent Act of 1875 be read the second time on Thursday next.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE questioned whether such motion was in order without due notice being placed on the paper, the Bill having been negatived on a previous occasion.

After some discussion,

Mr. SPEAKER not having had time to consult the authorities, was disposed to rule that the motion was in order.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE then moved in amendment that all after the word "that" in the motion be struck out, and the words "three months" inserted instead thereof.

Mr. CARON said non-traders were excluded from the operation of the Insolvent Law of 1875, and if it were decided that this provision must continue a portion of the Act, it was only fair that they should not be obliged to accept any compromise or composition which might be apportioned to traders under that Act. If they could not avail themselves of the advantages of the Act, if advantages they were, they ought not to be subjected to its disadvantages. What would be the result if they were? The result would be that while a farmer was compelled to accept a compromise—to accept a very small proportion of the debt due to him—he was himself compelled to pay to the very same class of men one hundred cents on the dollar, and could be forced to pay whatever balance might be due at any time he could be got at. It was but right and just under the circumstances that a farmer should only be compelled to accept a dividend upon an insolvent estate as part payment of the debt due to him, and that he should be entitled at any opportunity to claim payment in full.

Mr. MACDONALD (Toronto) said it was very clear that the passage of this Bill would simply render the Insolvent Act utterly inoperative, and would prevent a merchant who had got into difficulties from getting a new start. A non-trader refusing to give discharge would prevent an insolvent trader from getting a settlement, and from beginning business again. He thought it a great pity that minor amendments should be forced upon the consideration of the House in regard to a law so recently passed. He had received many suggestions from his constituents for amendments, but he regarded it as the better course to take all these suggestions into consideration during the recess, and if alterations were necessary, to have them made after the law had been fairly tried.

Hon. Mr. POPE was quite in favour of providing that the farmers should not be put in a position to become bankrupt, but he also thought they should not be obliged to accept as a final payment of a debt any compromise which might be offered by an insolvent trader. If the farmer was to be compelled to accept of such a dividend as final payment, he ought to himself have the benefit of the Insolvent Act.

Mr. COLBY did not think the Insolvency Act was for the public benefit, but if we were to have it at all, it would be better not to engraft such an amendment as this upon it. With such a provision as this he could not conceive of a more mongrel law than the Insolvent Act would be.

Mr. PALMER thought it would be a pity if such an arbitrary precedent as that which the motion of the Minister of Justice constituted were to be established. He, however, thought it a perfect monstrosity to pass such an amendment as this, and he was in favour of giving the farmer the benefit of the Act, if any benefit there were.

Mr. POULIOT supported the Bill upon the ground that the farmer was at present placed in a very unfair and unjust position, and ought not to be compelled to accept a dividend of an insolvent trader as final.

Mr. WOOD said this matter was referred to a Special Committee last year and received very careful consideration and the Bill as reported also received careful consideration by the House. He thought therefore it would be unwise to tamper with the measure now. If the law was changed as proposed they might as well sweep it off the Statute Book altogether. It would be a great calamity to allow any farmer to go into insolvency. The law should not be interfered with until after a proper trial as to its utility.

Mr. WHITE saw no objection to the amendment, and indeed thought it would be in the interests of the agricultural community. It was only just that farmers should have the same rights and privileges as merchants, and he hoped the hon. Minister of Justice would allow the motion to carry.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said during his long Parliamentary experience he had never heard a motion like that of his hon. friend for Quebec County objected to before. When the motion was placed on the Orders of the Day would have been the proper time to introduce the amendment. The course of the Minister of Justice might introduce an undesirable precedent.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE thought the right hon. member for Kingston was scarcely correct in suggesting that the course was unprecedented, and gave two instances of similar motions. He quite agreed that they should not avail themselves of such an amendment unless the House had an opportunity of discussing the matter; but this bill had already been debated and decided adversely. There was another Bill in respect to the Insolvent Act which was now in Committee. The Government had declared its policy in regard to this Act at an early stage in the Session, which was to allow it to operate for another year with only the slight amendments which it was generally necessary to incorporate into such measures. He thought the second reading of the Bill in question having been negatived, he was consulting the convenience of the House and country by proposing to reach a conclusion at once on the subject.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER suggested that the motion should be allowed to go on the Notice Paper, when the principle for which the Hon. Minister of Justice was contending could be more properly discussed.

Mr. GALBRAITH thought the farmers, who did not come within the provisions of the Act, had no right to suffer from its operation. Wholesale merchants in dealing with the agriculturists generally realised a large profit, but the latter made very little by these transactions, and he did not believe it was fair or right they should suffer.

Mr. SPEAKER quoted from the English Hansard of 1864 with regard to the question of procedure, and ruled the present motion in order.

Mr. SCATCHERD thought the question invoked by this Bill had received but little consideration; at any rate it had not been brought forcibly to his attention before. He did not understand the principle that one man should be discharged from his debts and another man should not have the same privilege. He was opposed to the Insolvent Law, which he did not think was required in this country, and as the motion was in the right direction and favoured the placing of the farmers on an equality with the mercantile community, he would vote against the amendment.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE withdrew his amendment, and the motion was carried.

SEWING MACHINE SHUTTLES.

Mr. COLBY moved the second reading of the Bill to enable Ozro Morrill to obtain a patent for certain inventions and improvements in sewing machine shuttles.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the Department would take means of satisfying itself that the improvements were of such a nature as might reasonably cause a doubt to be entertained as to whether the former patent did or did not cover the object sought by this measure. If not, the patent would be granted, but otherwise the present arrangement would not be interfered with.

With this understanding the Bill was read the third time and passed.

LONDON AND CANADA LOAN AND AGENCY COMPANY.

The House went into Committee on the Bill to amend the Act 35 Victoria, chapter 108, intituled: "An Act to amend the Act incorporating the London and Canada Loan and Agency Company (limited)"—Mr. Mills in the chair.

The Committee rose and reported the Bill, and the third reading was fixed for to-morrow.

ST. LAWRENCE BANK.

The House went into Committee.—Mr. Bowell in the chair—on the Bill to amend the charter of "The St. Lawrence Bank," and to change the name of the said bank to that of "The Standard Bank of Canada" (as amended by Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce).

The Committee rose and reported the Bill, which was read the third time and passed.

On item four being called,

House in Committee on Bill (No. 71) ---An Act to incorporate the Synod of the Church of England, Diocese of Rupert's Land (as amended by Standing Committee on Private Bills,)

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said this Bill, with measures of a similar character, had been under the consideration of the Government, and he would suggest to his hon. friend from Cardwell the expediency of not proceeding further this Session. It would be within the recollection of the House that a year since a measure was passed to incorporate the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society, giving them power to hold lands throughout the Dominion, and to carry on their operations. Another measure was introduced at an earlier period, containing similar provisions. These measures were not much debated at the time, but there was considerable doubt on the part of the legal members as to the constitutionality of the

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE.

Federal Parliament dealing with the subject. It was obvious that if this present unsatisfactory condition of affairs continued, the difficulties surrounding such legislation would become greater, year after year, as those applications would become more numerous and the demands with reference to land holding, &c., would become more exacting. The Government proposed, during the recess, to look into the question of constitutionality, and to obtain an opinion on the subject from the Judges. If it were determined that Parliament had the right to grant the powers asked by this and other Bills, a general law dealing with the question would be introduced. To attempt to pass an Act this Session would, in a measure, defeat the end of carefully considering the subject, and would leave the door open for injurious consequences.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON (Cardwell) said he would not press the measure in the face of the objections raised by his hon. friend the Minister of Justice. He, however, remarked that this Bill really provided for nothing which was not contained in the Bill for the union of the Synod for the Lower Provinces with that of the Upper Provinces, which had been agreed to in this Parliament. He moved that the order be discharged.

Mr. MILLS said, with the amendments proposed, he had supported the measure in the Private Bills Committee, but the hon. member for Cardwell would remember that he had already expressed an opinion adverse to it on the constitutional point.

The order was then discharged.

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the Bill to incorporate the National Loan and Life Assurance Company of Canada—Mr. Blain in the Chair.

The various clauses of the Bill were agreed to, and reported with some verbal amendments.

The Bill was then read the third time, the name having been changed to the Union Assurance Company of Canada.

The Bill to incorporate the Canada Assurance Corporation also passed through Committee of the Whole, was read the third time and passed; as were the Bill to incorporate the Chartered Bank of London and British America, and the Bill respecting Loans by the British American Land Company.

BRAS D'OR LAKE LIGHT-HOUSE.

Mr. TREMAINE enquired whether it is the intention of the Government to build a dwelling for the keeper of MacKenzie's Point Light House, north side Bras d'Or Lake, County of Victoria, N. S., and if so, when?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—It is the intention.

VETERANS OF 1812.

Mr. BARTHE enquired why the Government have refused to pay to the Veterans of 1812, who reside temporarily in the United States, their share of the bonus voted in 1875, the Act making no distinction? Why the Government have refused to pay to Michael Heroux, of the Parish of St. Robert, County of Richelieu, the amount of his claim?

Hon. Mr. VAIL—I stated some time ago in answer to a question, that we found the English practice is not to make payments in cases of this nature, and I fancy the same principle will apply with propriety in Canada.

QUEBEC POST OFFICE.

Mr. CARON enquired why, and in accordance with what instructions does the Postmaster of Quebec refuse to sell postage stamps at the said office, contrary to the Act regulating the Postal Service? Also, whether it is the intention of the Government to provide a remedy for this breach of the law?

Hon. Mr. HUNTINGTON—The Government has no knowledge that the Postmaster at Quebec refuses to comply with the law. On the contrary, the Government is under the impression that he is acting in accordance with the law.

Mr. CARON said he doubted if the Postmaster General understood the question, from the nature of his reply.

Hon. Mr. HUNTINGTON—The Government is under the impression that the Postmaster of Quebec is acting according to his instructions.

MINERAL RESOURCES OF CAPE BRETON.

Mr. TREMAINE enquired whether it is the intention of the Government to send a geologist to Cape Breton to report upon the mineral resources of the Island.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD—The Department has had a geologist in Cape Breton for the last two years, and it is probable there will be one there for a short time this season also.

DUTY ON BRITISH COLUMBIA FISH.

Mr. DECOSMOS enquired whether negotiations are now pending or do the Government intend to open negotiations with the United States with the object of extending the Treaty of Washington to British Columbia, in order that the fish and fish oils of that Province may be admitted into the United States, duty free?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—There are no negotiations pending at the present time with that object. Very recently it was decided by the United States Government that the Columbia fish could not be admitted to their markets under the Washington Treaty, which opinion was coincided in by the Imperial Government. I may add, however, that we will be very glad to do anything we can to have the privilege extended to British Columbia also.

ST. OUR'S LOCKS TOLLS.

Mr. CHEVAL enquired whether it is the intention of the Government to continue in force the unjust law regulating the amount which each steamboat has to pay in order to pass through the St. Our's Lock, under which two steamboats of the same size pay, the one 32 cents and the other $1.95?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The intention of the Government is, of course, to conform to the law. As I understand it, some of the vessels have been measured under different Statutes, and in this way an apparent injustice arises. The matter has been under the consideration of the Fishery Department and the Department of Justice.

REPRINTING OF THE STATUTES.

Mr. POZER (in the absence of Mr. Béchard) enquired whether it is the intention of the Government to cause to be printed in French and published in a separate volume, all the Criminal Laws relating to the Dominion; as was done in English last year? Also, whether these two volumes, English and French, will be distributed like the ordinary Statutes?

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said the circumstance which called for the reprinting in English of the Criminal Statutes last year arose out of the admission of British Columbia, Manitoba and Prince Edward Island after the passing of these laws. Application for the Criminal Statutes had been made by some of these Provinces, and the reprinting was mainly to meet this want. The attention of the Government had not been called to the subject suggested by the hon. member's question.

RAILWAY TOLLS.

Mr. OLIVER rose to move that the House go into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolutions:—

"1st. That whenever the tolls on any Railway in Canada, now or to be hereafter constructed, and subject to the jurisdiction of Canada as respects the matters hereinafter mentioned, are reduced or raised by by-law in accordance with the provisions of any Act of the Legislature of the late Province of Canada, or of the Parliament of Canada, such reduction or raising of the tolls shall in no case be made to apply to any particular section of the railway, but shall apply pro rata to the entire length thereof.

"2nd. That every railway company shall, according to their respective powers, afford all reasonable facilities to all corporations and individuals for the receiving and forwarding and delivery of traffic upon and from their railway; and no company shall give or continue any preference or advantage to any particular corporation or individual in any respect whatsoever, nor shall any Railway Company subject any particular corporation or individual to any prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatever; and any agreement made between any railway company and any corporation or individual contrary to the foregoing provisions, shall be unlawful, null and void.

"3rd. That if any railway company, or any officer, servant or agent of any Railway Company in any way contravenes the provisions of the next preceding sections, such railway company, or such officer, servant or agent, personally, shall, for each such contravention, incur a penalty not exceeding fifty dollars over and above the actual damages incurred, which penalty may be recovered with costs, in a summary manner, before any Justice of the Peace, by the party aggrieved by such contravention, to and for the use of such party aggrieved.

"4th. That every railway company heretofore, or which may be hereafter incorporated, or whether their railway has been heretofore constructed or is hereafter to be constructed, having granted any facilities to any express company, shall grant equal facilities on equal terms and conditions to any other express company now incorporated, or hereafter to be incorporated in Canada, demanding the same."

In doing so, he said this subject had already engaged the attention of the House on two occasions. It had also engaged the attention of the Committee on Railways and Telegraphs; and from statements made by Ministers last Session before that Committee, he had no doubt it had also entered into the consideration of the Government when they were preparing their Common Carriers' Bill—a Bill which in his estimation was of very great importance to the people of this country. He very much regretted that the House was not to have an opportunity of passing the measure in question through this Session. He had no doubt some of the resolutions he had put upon the notice paper some time ago found their way into that Bill, although what he conceived to be the principal one did not. The subject had commended itself of late to the earnest consideration of the commercial community, and the Dominion Board of Trade had it brought before them at their late meeting in this city the following resolution:—

"Mr. Farrell, then moved, seconded by Mr. Lukes:—'That, considering the injustice done to the majority of shippers of produce in Canada, a memorial be presented to the Government, asking them to take the subject of preferential railway freights into their consideration.'"

This resolution had been carried, and although he was not aware that it had been pressed upon the attention of the Government by the Board, he had come to the conclusion that the simple fact of their having passed such a motion was enough to impress the Administration with the reasonableness of the proposition. Another very important body, the Millers' Association, at their meeting in Toronto last year, had also arrived at similar conclusions in regard to the existing state of the carrying trade, and agreed to the following motion on the subject:—

“Whereas some railways of the Dominion being largely subsidized by public funds are in the practice of giving preferential shipments and rates on foreign freight; also, private preferential rates and shipments on local and through freights to certain individuals of the Dominion, the former being a manifest injustice and flagrant breach of faith towards the people of this country by the diversion and use of public moneys for purposes which were never intended or designed—the latter as being unfair toward the majority of producers, manufacturers, and shippers by monopolizing prices, markets, and freights. And, whereas, the aggrieved parties who are daily suffering and being imposed upon are powerless in their individual capacity or influence, to remedy the abuses, that this Association do instantly and earnestly call the attention of the House of Commons and the Government to the palpable injustice to the community at large.”

It appeared, however, that instead of pressing this wise resolution upon the attention of the Government, instead of coming down here and asking for justice with respect to railway rates, they had petitioned Parliament for protection.

There were many grievances against the railways of which the people of this country very justly complained in regard to the carrying trade. Foreign freight was carried at a very much lower rate than Canadian freight, there were local differential rates distinguishing between places in Canada where there was and was not competition, and different individuals even, although residing and doing business in the same town, were accorded different rates. The rolling stock of the through railways were for the most part employed in carrying foreign produce to the markets of the Eastern States, and it was impossible for the Canadian shippers to get accommodation. These complaints were heard upon every hand, and referred to in strong terms in the public prints. That the produce of the Western States was carried at a very much lower rate over Canadian railways than was Canadian produce would not be presumed be denied, but he would point out a few notable cases. Let us take the article of wheat, and it would be found that it had been carried over the Grand Trunk from Chicago to Liverpool for less than Canadian railways carried it from

Guelph to Toronto—less, indeed, by one cent and a half per hundred pounds. This was stated, not only on his (Mr. Oliver's) own authority, but upon the authority of Mr. Boulton, a prominent gentleman engaged in the grain trade, whose opinion was thus reported in the newspapers:—

“Mr. Boulton said that the railways were continually apologizing for the necessity of their cultivating a through trade, but he did not see how the rates could pay them; if they did, then by the local rates they must be making fortunes. He said that wheat had been carried from Chicago to Liverpool at one and a half cent less than it had been carried from Guelph to Toronto.”

It was also stated upon good authority that grain had been carried from Detroit to Portland over the Grand Trunk for \$13 per car load less than from Toronto to the same place. Pork had also been carried from Chicago to Ottawa for 25 cents per barrel less than from the city of London to Ottawa. It was stated upon authority which could not be disputed, that the freight per barrel of flour from Chicago to Portland was 69 cents, while from Toronto to Portland it was 70 cents. At a manufacturer's meeting in Toronto recently, it was stated that the invariable practice of the railway companies in this country was to carry all kinds of manufactured goods from the United States to all points in Canada at a less rate than they carried goods manufactured in this country. If any one were inclined to dispute this, they had but to examine the published proceedings of the annual meeting of the Great Western Railway Company in London. It was there stated that there were eight through freight trains from the west to the east and but two local freight trains. The earnings of the through trains were 60 per cent. of the whole, while the earnings of the local trains formed 40 per cent., thus showing that each through train only earned $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the income from freight, while each local train earned 20 per cent. There was no room to doubt that the rolling stock of the Canadian railways was being used to convey foreign freight to our own and foreign markets, to the utter neglect and great disadvantage of our own products. It would be remembered that a few years ago the City Council of Montreal appointed a Committee to investigate this matter, and a very valuable report was published, in which there appeared a correspondence which had taken place between themselves and the Manager of the Grand Trunk. At that time it was proved that the commercial men of Canada had lost an immense sum of money in consequence of the proportion of our Canadian rolling stock employed in carrying the produce of the Western States to the markets of England and the Eastern States, to the exclusion of Canadian produce. At non-competing points it was ascertained that freight had to wait the convenience of the railway companies, and that the necessary facilities were afforded only after the Western produce had been carried to market. That was a grievance of which the people of this country had a right to complain. The people were being yearly taxed to a great amount on account of these railways. The Grand Trunk owed us, principal and interest, some thirty millions, having received a subsidy of \$15,000,000, or \$15,000 per mile; and we loaned money to the Great Western, cancelling \$1,250,000 in the settlement of the debt. Surely when all this was remembered it would be admitted to be a fair and reasonable proposition that these railways should carry the products of this country upon at least the same terms as they offered to foreigners.

Another complaint made by millers was that the railways gave preference to wheat as compared to flour in the matter of rates. The milling interest in this country was of great importance. We have about 1,000 mills of different capacities, in which there are perhaps six millions of capital invested, giving employment to some 16,000 or 17,000 hands directly and indirectly. It was stated upon good authority that during the time navigation is closed, the railways did everything in their power to favour the English manufacturer of flour, and that they carried 220 pounds of wheat for 25 cents from Toronto to the seaboard, while for a barrel of flour of the same weight they charged 40 cents. This was a direct bonus to the manufacturers of England and the Eastern States, and operated injuriously against the millers of this country, without benefitting the producer of wheat a single cent. He took three points on the Great Western Railway as an illustration of the unfair system upon which rates were levied. Barley, per 100 pounds, from Paris to Detroit, 160 miles, costs 16 cents; from Woodstock to Detroit, 140 miles, 19 cents; from London to Detroit, 160 miles, 13 cents; thus showing that there is a preference given to competing points against those which are not. Another instance was quoted by the President of the Millers' Association of a dealer who had a contract to fill a large order for a firm in Boston. He had a quantity of flour at Guelph and another at Rockwood, seven miles to the east. The freight from Guelph to Boston was 50 cents per barrel, and from Rockwood to Boston 78 cents. What this trader did was to ship that portion of his consignment lying at Rockwood to Guelph, re-shipping it from thence to Boston, and thereby realizing a handsome profit.

Dairy producers, in his (Mr. Oliver's) constituency had to ship their cheese, intended for export, to London—a competing point—and thence re-ship it to Liverpool, in order to have the advantage of a reasonable rate.

He might also state that it was found on certain sections of the Great Western Railway, in consequence of the enormous rates for local freight, more profitable to resort to the old system of conveying articles of manufacture from one point to another, and not to make use of the railway at all. As an instance he quoted from a Dundas newspaper the following extract:

Mr. J. P. Bellington, of Dundas, who is extensively engaged in manufacturing grain drills, and who sells largely in Waterloo and Wellington counties, is now shipping his drills to Galt, Preston and Guelph by teams and saving about $1 on each drill; and this, too, over bad roads and with tolls to pay every five miles."

It was unnecessary for him to go over any more instances wherein railways had been unjust to the people of this country. It was universally admitted that such was the case, and that the injustice was done, not simply to one interest, not simply to one locality, not simply to particular individuals, but to the general public. He would make one honourable exception. He found the Canada Southern, built with foreign capital, and controlled by Americans, did more justice to the people of this country than roads which were built with Canadian capital and worked by parties sent out from the old country to manage them.

It was easy to see how one district was placed at disadvantage as compared with another. London, for example was a competing point. Every effort was made to draw traffic to that city. It was an easy matter, when a railway company owned property in any town or city which it was desired to make valuable, to draw traffic to that point at the expense of other places. If one commercial man had the ear of the company, too, it was quite possible for him to drive all his competitors out of the market. This was more especially the case in the commission business. In this way one or two men were able to control the markets in the towns, and get prices regulated just to suit themselves. Mr. Boulton, of Toronto, in a recent letter to the press, gave the following instance :

"Within the last fortnight two brokers were negotiating for the purchase of a lot of flour for shipment to the Maritime Provinces. One of the parties on application to the Grand Trunk agent here, was refused a concession of five cents per barrel which would have enabled him to fill an order for the purchase, and his chance fell through; the other, for some reason best known to himself, was granted the very same abatement. Surely it is a glaring impropriety that these discriminations should be made in matters of personal competition; but I contend, moreover, that the public, from their peculiar interest as investors in the Grand Trunk stock, have a right to insist that from the highest to the lowest all should be treated alike."

It was stated it was nothing but fair and right that competing points should have the advantage of reduced rates which competition gave them. That might be very well if the railways were private commercial undertakings, but they were the property of the people, and more or less under the control of the legislature of this country. In Oxford County they paid about $12,000 interest yearly on the debt of the Grand Trunk and Great Western Railways, and yet they had to pay $50,000 a year more for the carrying of their produce than if they were placed at a competing point. So long as these railways were built in the interests of the people, they ought to deal with the public in all sections upon equal terms. It was stated in extenuation of the conduct of the railways that they were bankrupt, or, at any rate, in greatly reduced circumstances. He need scarcely ask from what this arose. He need not inform the House it was not in consequence of carrying the freight of Canada, but of the ruinously low rates at which they carried the freight of other countries. The recent investigations with reference to the Great Western and Intercolonial Railways revealed a sort of management which, if the same were carried out upon all the railways in Canada, it was no wonder they were bankrupt. Why, the Great Western had invested in some of the most extraordinary and unproductive works. When the idea of building the Canada Southern was mooted, the Great Western undertook to prevent it, and, failing in that, built a competing line from Glencoe to Fort Erie, which was quite unnecessary for their work. The toll by-law was a dead letter, in so far as it was supposed to afford protection to the public interest, for the railway companies just charged what they pleased.

He might be allowed to say that he was not wedded to the resolutions he had placed on the paper. A grievance existed, and he was not particular as to the remedy so long as one was applied. His resolutions were not introduced, as had been stated by some hon. gentlemen, with a desire to bring about a pro rata Bill; they simply provided that if any reduction took place it should be pro rata, and that if there was any increase it should be pro rata. So far as the people were concerned, he believed such an arrangement would remove their grievance. If any hon. members had a more preferable position, or if the Government would state that they would take the matter under serious consideration, he would be perfectly satisfied. In certain sections the people had endeavoured to cure the existing evil themselves by building local railways to compete with the Trunk lines. But the latter brought all their power to bear on the destruction of those projects. Even when the inhabitants of various sections were willing to tax themselves for the construction of lines, with this object the Great Western and Grand Trunk railways tried in every way to defeat that laudable object—even going as far as to destroy the railway credit of the country in the English money market. We were at present, and would be for some time to come, at the mercy of the Trunk roads, and every effort should be used to break up their disastrous monopoly. The Local Government of Quebec had done all they could in this direction, coming down with a bold policy, and declaring they would not have the local lines, which were calculated to benefit the people, destroyed in consequence of the influence of the Grand Trunk road in the English market; and they introduced a scheme by which those lines should be constructed by the Local Government. In Ontario certain lines had remained in abeyance owing to the exertions of the trunk railways, and would probably not be completed until these were willing to withdraw their opposition. There was no other remedy but an appeal to the Federal Government at the present time, and he trusted they would make every effort to assist the people in this very desirable way. It had been stated at Boards of Trade and Miller's Association meetings that the Government have no control over railways, but no railway in this or any other country could be constructed without the permission of the Government; railways could not levy a dollar toll without the consent of the authorities, and were, in fact, completely under their control. The same grievances from which Canadians were now suffering were experienced in England. Previous to 1873, all disputed cases were referred to the courts, which was found a tedious operation, but in that year commissioners were appointed to investigate into every grievance from railways, canals and shippers, and such matters are dealt with promptly at the present time. If our Government would follow the example of Great Britain in this particular, as we ought to follow it in everything which would conduce to our good, he was confident they would confer a great boon on the country. When prices went up in England or in Boston and other eastern cities, we are at the mercy of the trunk lines; we cannot get our products into those markets in time to be benefitted by the advance. The productions of the Western States are carried in until the markets become glutted, and we have to wait until it suited the convenience of the railways which the people of Canada built to transport our products. This was a state of affairs which should be remedied, and he trusted the House would favorably consider the resolutions he now moved.

It being six o'clock, the House took a recess.

AFTER RECESS.

On the debate on Mr. Oliver's motion being called,

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he quite admitted many of the grievances complained of by his hon. friend from North Oxford, and had hoped that they would have had an opportunity to discuss those matters relating to the carriage of goods upon a Bill, which, however, had not passed the ordeal of another place, and would consequently not be brought before them for discussion. He supposed from the remarks of his hon. friend that he also expected to reach a debate upon the introduction of that Bill promised in His Excellency's Speech to Parliament. At present he could only say to him that they had had the matter under consideration, and would have it again under consideration, but he was not able to say precisely what they might be able to do in the premises. It was, however, entirely too late in this session to attempt to introduce any measure with the slightest prospect of success, and while he was not prepared to say that the Government would be able to do anything except to direct the attention of the proper officer to the table of rates and charges of the respective railways, he hoped he might ask his hon. friend not to press the motion upon the House at the present time. The hon. gentleman could accomplish nothing by it; he had brought the subject very fully before the House and the country, and had exposed the necessity that to his mind existed for some change which would ensure absolute justice to every person having goods to carry on the railways. He did not agree with the hon. gentleman that it was possible to obtain a pro rata system throughout, because our leading railways have to contend with leading railways carrying the produce of the Great West to the ocean, and greater or less divergence from the pro rata system was necessary, in order to give them any business to do. With regard to the carrying trade within our own borders, the case might be different. He was aware the pro rata is in existence in regard to passenger traffic, with a slight difference in favor of long distances, and while it was more difficult to apply it to articles of merchandise carried on local railways, still there might be abuses that could and ought to be redressed, and so far as they could effect that purpose, the Government were willing to direct attention to it.

Mr. IRVING (Hamilton) said the question was one of considerable difficulty, in consequence of the impossibility, or rather impracticability or want of will on the part of Parliament to legislate at variance with what are recognised as vested rights. We had in the first place chartered railways, giving them authority to collect tolls at certain rates, viz., tolls which they shall fix subject to the assent, or disapproval of the Governor in Council. Having permitted the railway to borrow money upon the faith of those tolls, it became almost an impossible task to a Legislature such as this to legislate in a way which might almost be looked upon as confiscation. But although the railways generally in the cases complained of did not levy tolls to as high a rate as they could by law, the difficulties arose by reason of their charging freights which are too low in one sense, and yet not low enough for those localities which have not the benefit of competition. The question that was open to examination was whether or not the rates they levied are at variance with that branch of the law which directs that they shall not levy tolls giving preference to one party over another. The law is that "the same tolls shall be payable at the same time and under the same circumstances upon the goods of all persons, so that no undue advantage, privilege, or monopoly may be afforded to one person or class of persons by any by-laws relating to tolls." Many of the complaints which the hon. member for North Oxford made resolved themselves into an undue preference given to certain classes of traders, therefore the only way of altering that was by giving the public some simple and easy remedy whereby the difficulties complained of might be easily adjudicated upon. At present there is no tribunal by which the suitor or wronged party can conveniently take up the matter. So seriously was this felt in England that a tribunal of three experienced men was appointed to sit all the year round as arbitrators, to examine into the details of these questions, and make certain rules which are capable of being carried into effect. He was not proposing that this very expensive system should be introduced into Canada, but he thought some simple practice and procedure might be adopted whereby judges of experience might have the power to deal similarly with a question of this kind subject to appeal to some tribunal in cases of doubt. He was inclined to think if the Government took up this question they would allay very extensive dissatisfaction which prevailed among all persons who are in the habit of shipping goods over railways. There would be nothing revolutionary in such a system; it would be but the providing of means to carry out the law, and would in no way encroach upon the vested rights of the railways. It would prevent them from making mistakes on the one hand, and shippers from making unjustifiable claims on the others. With reference to the statements of the hon. member for North Oxford, we only heard of those matters from newspaper letters and correspondence. There had not been, that he was aware of, any petitions emanating from Boards of Trade and so forth, calling upon Parliament to take up the question. No doubt some of those newspaper statements had some foundation in fact, but he was not aware that ever the matter had been brought before the attention of Parliament in a way that it might be considered a living, burning question except through the occasional remarks of the hon. mover. He thought the matter was of sufficient importance, however, to induce the Government to give it full consideration by the next Session of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon member for Hamilton had referred to the inopportuneness of the time for making those charges, considering the position of the several railways as a very important element in the discussion. Some of the leading companies, as was well known, were in financial difficulties on account of the depression in the carrying as well as other trades, and any legislation looking to an abrupt termination of rights, if exercised at the present moment, might have a prejudicial effect on railway securities.

Mr. IRVING said nothing would justify interference with their vested rights, but his argument was that if they were required to carry out the law, it should be carried out in its integrity, and there should be no discrimination.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government had given their attention to obtaining accurate railway statistics, which seemed to him to be the first requisite to enable them to deal with the railways. Those statistics had hardly been obtainable up to this time, and it was scarcely possible yet to obtain them without statutory power. They might find it necessary to have some further authority to obtain the perfect information required, and which it was in the interest of the public in the first place, and ultimately in the interest of the companies, should be furnished. He had given some personal attention to this matter, and intended to devote even more attention to it. In the meantime it would be in the public interest if the hon. member for North Oxford withdrew his resolutions.

Mr. OLIVER said he was aware it was too late in the Session to press an important measure of this kind upon the House. He was also cognizant of the fact that if it were pressed now it could not reach maturity. He might state that the hon. First Minister was rather mistaken with reference to the meaning of the resolutions. He did not ask for a pro rata rate, but that the rates fixed by the Governor in Council should be adhered to, and if any deviation took place, if a reduction was sanctioned, then that reduction should be pro rata, and the same with any increase. That was the real meaning of his resolutions, and his opinion was that instead of being injurious such arrangement would be beneficial to the companies. The country was not opposed to the rates fixed by the Governor in Council, but they were opposed to one individual having to pay those rates and another getting his freight carried for about one half. With reference to the statement of the hon. member for Hamilton that the companies had obtained money upon the assurance that those rates would be continued, he did not think that was the case. He believed every railway charter was subject to any legislation that might in future take place with reference to such railways. The hon. member stated that no petitions had been presented to the House. Very strong resolutions were passed by the Board of Trade in favour of the idea embodied in the resolutions, and an expression of an important body like this was equivalent to a great number of petitions to Parliament. He hoped that the Government during the recess, would take this subject fully into consideration, and ere long give the country the benefit of a proper Common Carriers Bill. At the request of the First Minister he would ask leave to withdraw the resolutions.

Leave was granted, and the subject dropped.

THE SUGAR REFINING INTEREST.

Mr. DESJARDINS moved for copies of correspondence, petitions and memorials relating to the Sugar refining interest. He said that some remarks were necessary with a view to the proper understanding of this matter. It was a well known fact that after the Budget Speech of the Finance Minister the most important sugar refinery in the country had to close its doors, leaving useless an invested capital of over $1,000,000; and 300 men permanently employed were left without further occupation. The census of 1870-71 shows that the annual products of that establishment amounted to $2,620,000; $2,400,000 being the value of importations; that the salaries then paid in the establishment amounted to $71,000; that $120,000 was paid annually for cooerage, and $14,000 for iron works and general repairs. When the establishment was in operation 14,000 tons of coal, carried by our ships from the Pictou Mines, were annually consumed. In view of these facts it would be idle to contend that in this case a private interest merely is concerned. On the contrary not only was our home trade seriously affected thereby, but also our commerce with foreign countries, more especially the West Indies. Moreover, our merchant navy was deprived of the benefits to be derived from the transport each way of material. After the abolition of the Treaty of Reciprocity in 1875, when it became known that the American market was closed to our productions, a Commission was appointed by the Government then in power to visit the West Indies, Brazil, and other countries, with a view to ascertaining whether it would not be possible to establish direct commercial relations with them, in order to replace the trade until then maintained by the intermediary of the United States. It was then established beyond doubt that if we could export some of our produce, such as timber, beef, &c., and bring a return cargo, we could diminish the cost of transport, and compete successfully with the United States and other countries. The principal product of the West Indies being sugar, the attention of the Government was directed to the fact that by establishing and encouraging the development of sugar refineries here, a fleet of vessels would find employment in carrying home produce to the West India Islands, while they brought return cargoes of raw material for the refineries. There already had existed for a number of years a refinery at Montreal, which the census of 1860 shows manufactured to the value of $450,000 only. It would, therefore, be evident that trade had very considerably developed up to the year 1871, when, at Montreal, the value of sugar refined there rose to nearly $4,000,000. Since that period, instead of increasing, this branch of industry had languished year by year, and one establishment, that of Messrs. Molson and Smith, had to be closed. The cause of this decline is very generally attributed to the changes which were made about that time in the tariff. The other refinery continued in operation with some difficulty, while petitioning at frequent intervals for an alteration in the duties. For some months past the latter establishment had struggled for existence in the hope that that had been awakened by supporters of the Government, that this Session would bring with it the much required change in the tariff. Unfortunately for that establishment and for the country, they were deceived in their expectations, and the establishment has been compelled to close rather than to carry on at a direct loss. In order to show that by the closing of this establishment more than the proprietors and employees were the losers, he would read from a letter already brought under the notice of this House. It was addressed to his hon. friend from Montreal West, and signed by the largest sugar importers of Montreal. They said:—

“ We desire to bring under your notice, and, through you, under that of the Minister of Finance,—the difficulty—we might say, the impossibility—which we experience in carrying on direct trade with Canada and the West Indies. The difficulty to which we refer is the want of modification here for Mascavado sugar, which constitutes the main export of the West India Islands. This article, which must be regarded either as a raw material for manufacture or as a necessary of life, is now subject to a combined specific and ad valorem duty equivalent to about 50 per cent. on its first cost. It may fairly be estimated that, were the tariff modified as we suggest, not less than 75 additional vessels would annually arrive at Montreal and Quebec.”

Since 1872 our commerce with the West Indies has been stationary, never exceeding $6,700,000. But in the four years succeeding our trade amounted to $25,000,000, being $16,000,000 worth exported against $9,000,000 imports, leaving a balance in our favour of $7,000,000. The transport in connection with this trade was done by Canadian ships, which adds to the balance in our favour. The importance of fostering by every means in our power relations with the West Indies, and of promoting and extending this trade, could not more forcibly be shewn than by the figures just quoted. As to the manner in which the maintenance of sugar refineries in this country affected the interests of retailers and consumers respectively, he quoted from the letter of a gentleman, who, from his long experience, was eminently qualified to form an opinion.

Mr. Alex. McGibbon in a letter lately published, says:—

“The question is now asked, Will the consumer be as well served with or without a refinery of our own? After a long experience it can be said without a doubt that should the refinery have finally to close up, the consumer will not be as well served as if in full working order, for, so soon as it is closed, just as sure will prices advance.”

In the same letter, dealing with the objection that sugar has never been cheaper than at present, he says:—

“I would remark that when Redpath made dry crushed or broken loaf, it was supplied at the same prices as the ground sugar; the price of the latter is now; Redpath's, 8½¢; Imported, 8¼¢ to 8½¢; but the moment Redpath stopped making dry crushed, the price of the imported advanced to a cent, and sometimes a cent and a half more than the ground.”

Thus the general interests of importers, retailers and consumers are clearly shown to be identical; and the bounden duty of the Government was to afford the necessary measure of protection to this struggling branch of industry, which had so repeatedly been asked for. Amongst the anomalies pointed out as the cause of so much of the uneasiness that prevailed, was the difference in duty on raw material, and imported refined sugar. While the imported refined article is taxed only 40 per cent, the low grade is only taxed at 50, giving thus an advantage to foreign industry. Add to this the heavy drawback accorded by the United States Government to exporters, and it can easily be understood at what disadvantage Canada is obliged to compete. As regards the workmen employed in these establishments, claims on the consideration of Government are very strong. After some years' labour in this line, a man became totally unfitted for any other branch of trade, on account of the high temperature in which he is accustomed to labour: so that the closing of the refineries would have the effect of driving him to seek elsewhere a field for his labour, which could not be had at home. Our annual expenditure for immigration being so considerable, there could be no reason why a diminution of revenue should not be suffered rather than permit these valuable hands to quit the country. To conclude, protection in this case cannot meet with objections from free traders, since it implies not taxation, but reduction of taxation in favour of the consumer. He concluded by moving his motion.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) stated that he had listened to the observations of the hon. member for Hochelaga with great interest, and he only regretted that the hon. gentleman had spoken in a language which all the hon. members did not understand. His hon. friend and himself did not usually agree on public questions, but at last they were able to meet on common ground. The considerations involved in this question did not apply to perhaps any other branch of trade, and in it the Maritime Provinces were largely and peculiarly interested. It had a Dominion aspect besides, as it very closely affected our foreign trade, and undoubtedly if we lacked this, the progress of this country would be very seriously retarded. An honorable member had suggested the importance of opening up trade relations with the West Indies by means of subsidies to be given lines of steamships; but he (Mr. Jones) contended, that the only means of establishing such a traffic in a satisfactory manner, was for the Government to arrange the sugar tariff so as to enable our ships to bring return cargoes. The trade of the Maritime Provinces with the West India Islands amounts annually to three and a half millions of dollars. Previous to the existing depression, this branch of our commerce had been in a flourishing condition, but the change in the tariff had considerably interfered with it, and at the same time he had heard that since the change he had mentioned had occurred, the consumers in this country have been obliged to pay a higher price for their sugar. The French and Belgian Governments having established drawbacks in favor of their refiners, a deputation representing the British sugar interests had waited on Lord Derby and represented that the trade relations of Great Britain with the West Indies would be seriously affected by their continuance, and the Imperial Government announced that while they were willing to trade with all nations on fair terms, they were not willing to allow foreigners to possess undue advantages over their own manufacturers, nor to consent to the utter annihilation of English interests. A correspondence took place with the French and Belgian Governments, and the result was a convention and the abolition of these drawbacks, the agreement having taken effect on the 1st of last March.

While a Free-Trader he (Mr. Jones) thought that they had abundant proof that whereas in this case on the raw material 50 per cent. duty was paid, only 40 per cent. was paid on the refined article, affording foreigners a very considerable advantage. The Government would be justified in asking the House to authorise them to impose on refined sugar a duty equal to the bounty granted to their refiners by foreign governments. He was willing that we should trade with the United States on fair terms, but if by a bounty system they tried to control our market and utterly ruin our interests, it was the duty of the Administration to levy such duties as to place Canadian on an equal footing with foreign manufacturers. He gathered from the observations of his hon. friend that the abolition of the sugar duties had had the effect on the sugar refinery at Montreal which he had anticipated, and the result had been an advance of one per cent., or $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound, on the sugars manufactured in this refinery. This was natural and was to have been expected. The qualities of sugar which had been manufactured in Montreal were excellent; and it was to be remembered that inexperienced people could, with ease, be led to believe that sugar was of high, when it was in reality of an inferior quality. A Custom's duty and a bounty were very different things, and were to be dealt with very differently. He was happy to find that the session had not been allowed to close without discussing this very important question.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said he had at last heard a speech from his hon. friend from Halifax to which he had listened with very great pleasure. There was a time in the past when the hon. gentleman and himself were sufficiently in accord to enable him to listen to all his utterances with pleasure, and from the sentiments which he had just given expression to, there was apparently room to hope that such a time would come again. As to the question before the House, he contended that if this Dominion is ever to secure this valuable West Indian trade which lies ready to be secured, if proper steps to that end were taken, it must be by adopting the policy just enunciated by the hon. member for Halifax. Canada furnished all the staple articles imported into the West Indies—fish, coal and lumber—and we had the shipping of our own to convey them there. He was not now going to discuss the question of consistency or inconsistency, and he hoped that, having the able co-operation of the hon. member for Halifax, the advocates of this policy would be able to make a stronger impression upon the Government than they had succeeded in doing heretofore. The hon. mover of the resolution spoke in a language with which he (Mr. Tupper) was unfortunately not very familiar, and the hon. member for Hochelaga would therefore excuse him, if in his remarks he referred more particularly to what had been said by the hon. member for Halifax. It was not unimportant to see that capital should be kept in this country, and not carried away and invested in foreign nations. If that result were to be obtained in this instance, it must be by a radical change in the legislation of the Government. We had a practical illustration of the ruinous effects of that legislation in the removal from this country of the skilled labour necessary to produce refined sugar, which went to build up the manufactures and commerce of our neighbours across the line. With a wise policy on the part of the Administration, the vessels which transported our staple articles to the West Indies would be able to take return cargoes of raw sugar, whereas they were now compelled to come back in ballast, or take freights for United States ports. It was important in this connection to know that such a reduction in the rate of duty on the raw material as would enable this industry to be carried on in our own country would not necessarily decrease the revenue. As a practical proof of the correctness of this position, he referred to the case in which Sir Robert Peel made such a large reduction in the sugar duties, the result being such an increase in the consumption of the article and the amount of duty paid thereon, as to actually leave the revenue from that source in its normal condition; and he contended, as a general principle, that any reduction in the cost of the necessities of life necessarily stimulated the consumption to a very great extent. The reduction of duties and the increase in consumption having, in England, pretty well kept pace with each other, he thought the same thing would hold good in Canada. The duty upon this article in England had been greatly reduced until it was altogether removed, and in that ratio the amount consumed had gone on increasing. Sugar was not a mere luxury, but necessary to the health and comfort of all classes of the community, and a re-adjustment of the tariff in order to secure the successful prosecution of the refining business was what the country and the country's interests called for. His hon. friend from Halifax had called the attention of the Government to a very strong illustration of the necessity of a change of policy in the closing of the Redpath refinery in Montreal, which had already had the effect of increasing the cost of certain brands of sugar in that city, and he would ask the hon. gentleman to say if the same principle did not apply with equal force to other industries in this country. Had the hon. gentleman not adduced the most cogent reason that could be adduced that we must foster our young and struggling industries in order to enable them to live?

Hon. Mr. TUPPER.

Mr. JONES—Other industries have a tariff of $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent in their favour, while this one has ten per cent. against it.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said the principle was still the same. The hon. gentleman had given an illustration, and he could not confine it to this particular case. Perhaps the principle applied more strongly here than to the others, but the illustration was pregnant of information as to the inevitable consequences of persisting in a policy which drives our own manufactures out of the market and leaves us at the mercy of foreigners. It was quite evident by taking the other course we should be protected from loss in the long run. Although no gentleman could possibly have gone further in his advocacy of protection than had the hon. member for Halifax upon this occasion, still it was hoped that there would be no hesitation on the part of Free Traders in joining hands with Protectionists in regard to this matter. He believed himself that the Government should be armed with power to meet such exceptional legislation on the part of foreign countries as that which affected our sugar refineries at the present moment in a fitting manner—come that legislation from where it may—so that they might be enabled to exercise that control which would preserve to us one of our most important industries, an industry by means of which a very large foreign trade might be built up.

Hon. Mr. HUNTINGTON said, as might have been expected, this question had received a fair and most dispassionate discussion by the hon. member for Hochelaga. He had not heard the whole of the hon. gentleman's argument, but he assumed its effect was that the policy of this Government had closed up the sugar refineries of the country, and put an end to our manufacture of the article in Canada. But when the fact was known that the manufacture of sugar had for a considerable time been confined to one establishment, and that one doing a very limited business in comparison to its capacity, the result would appear much less startling. The Government, indeed, had undertaken, at the expense of considerable unpopularity, to reach out a helping hand, and endeavoured to keep that one establishment alive. It would still be fresh in the memory of hon. members how the Administration were attacked last year when, with this end in view, they had given that refinery all the assistance it was in their power to give without going that extreme length which was resorted to in the United States. Immediately after this arrangement was made he (Mr. Huntington) met the leading partner of the Company in Montreal. The latter remarked that the Government were being very much abused for what they had endeavoured to do on behalf of the sugar refining interest of Montreal, but there was nothing that could be done for them which would enable them to get on—

Mr. JONES—Except my proposal.

Hon. Mr. HUNTINGTON said the gentleman had not mentioned that proposal, but had simply stated that nothing the Government could do for them would enable them to continue in face of the drawback system of the United States. So long as the Americans were prepared to sell sugar to the people of this country at the expense of their Treasury, he (Mr. Huntington) believed it would be a very difficult matter indeed for us to establish sugar refineries. The extent to which the Government went last year in their endeavour to preserve and protect this industry was the utmost limit to which they would feel justified in going, and yet we had the evidence of the refiners themselves that it was impossible for them to continue with the United States system of drawbacks.

Mr. WOOD rose to congratulate the House upon an important acquisition to the Protectionist party in the person of the hon. member for Halifax, and from the able way in which the hon. gentleman had presented the question to the House it would no doubt secure the support which it so clearly deserved. He (Mr. Wood) hoped that by the meeting of Parliament next year the tariff would be so rearranged that justice would be done to all parties, and that then the hon. gentleman would be willing and able to support a measure which would be fair to the manufacturing industries of this country. He would be ready to support the hon. gentleman upon this question, and hoped there would be reciprocity to the extent which he (Mr. Wood) had demanded from the House on more than one occasion.

Mr. YOUNG understood the hon. gentleman from Halifax disclaimed asking for protection to the sugar interests in the case he had just presented to the House. At the same time what his hon. friend asked would have the effect of raising the price of sugar throughout the country, and would be a direct violation of the principle that the people should not be prohibited from buying in the cheapest market. The argument in favour of protection to the sugar refining interests was very small indeed. In fact, the industry in question was in quite a different position from any other throughout the length and breadth of Canada. There was but one refinery in the Dominion, and but about three hundred people found employment, either directly or indirectly, in connection with it. There was not a single one of what were termed our struggling industries on behalf of which so little could be said. It must be remembered, too—indeed, it was perhaps the most important consideration in discussing this question—that a very large proportion of our whole revenue is derived from the duty upon sugar, and if we consent to such a rearrangement of the tariff as would compel the people to consume sugar manufactured in Canada, that large proportion of our revenue would disappear, and additional taxation to meet the deficit—taxation of a more burdensome nature, too—would at once become necessary. It was stated by the hon. member for Cumberland that the direct result of the reduction of sugar duties in England, by Sir Robert Peel, had been to produce a corresponding increase in the consumption of the article. The same result would not necessarily follow in Canada, for the simple reason that the purchasing power of our people was considerably greater than the purchasing power of the people of England, especially in the time of Sir Robert Peel, and therefore not so easily affected by slight reductions in the cost of an article of this description. He (Mr. Young) felt satisfied that the arrangement of the tariff as proposed, would cause a serious falling off in the revenues of the country, and entail the imposition of fresh duties upon a great many other articles. If the effect were to give employment to a large number of men, and the investment of a large amount of capital to build up the trade of Montreal, there would be at least a stronger ground for the appeal now made to the House and the Government; but to make such an appeal on behalf of an interest which only, at the highest calculation, gave employment to some 300 men, would be simply absurd. It was, in fact, a proposition to compel the whole people of Canada to pay more for an article of which they each consumed a large amount daily in order to give employment to 300 people, and make fortunes for the one or two individuals who would reap the profits. He could scarcely think the hon. member for Halifax would advocate legislation of such a purely and strongly Protectionist character. He had only to say in conclusion that those who really believed this interest ought to be protected, so that we could produce the article consumed by our people in Canada, should go in for protecting everything brought into the country; for the Protectionist argument with respect to this was weaker than when applied to any other interest in the country.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said he might be labouring under a misapprehension, but he understood the hon. member for South Waterloo on a former occasion, when he introduced his motion relating to the West India trade, to allude to sugar refining interests as likely to be greatly benefitted thereby. If the hon. member was in earnest in his proposition to subsidize a line of steamers then, he could not understand his position now. The hon. gentleman had said that but 300 persons were interested in the sugar trade, but if the number of vessels engaged in this large commerce with the West, and the men indirectly connected with the business were taken into account, we would find that number swell into thousands. He thanked the Hon Postmaster General for the stand he had taken on this question. If the refinery in Montreal could have worked under the present system no application would have been made, but it had been sufficiently demonstrated that it was impossible to keep open refineries in the face of the bounty allowed by the United States. It was no use tinkering with the tariff, but the Government should be prepared to deal with the American system which was annihilating our trade. When $2.50 duty per 100 pounds was paid, and a drawback of $3.60 was allowed, which was equal to half a cent per pound, it was plain to be seen that no tariff would enable a refinery to exist in Canada. Unless a duty was imposed equal to the bounty it would be no use trying to do anything. He was glad to hear through the Postmaster-General that the Government comprehended the situation, and he hoped that they would deal with it in a way which would build up this important industry.

Mr. MILLS drew attention to a statement made by the hon. member for Cumberland, that the United States Government had allowed sugar refiners a large drawback, and that it was impossible, under these circumstances, to carry on this business in this country, unless we granted a bounty or some other compensation. He (Mr. Mills) was unable to perceive that any drawback was given in the States, and he would quote figures from the Trade and Navigation Returns which proved that this was the case. No refinery in the Dominion could be closed owing to the policy pursued by the American Government. Supposing that the American refiner obtained 55 cents of drawback per 100 lbs., this put $2.50 into the Public Treasury. What system must be followed to secure, instead of 70 lbs. or 88 lbs. of the highest quality, 13½ lbs. of inferior variety, and 11¼ lbs. of syrup from 100 lbs. of the unrefined article? and if an inferior article was used a larger quantity must be produced to obtain the same result. This was sufficient to show that the statement with reference to the bounty afforded under that system was postposterous. With regard to the tax on sugar he found, from the Trade and Navigation Returns, that on the sugars ranging above No. 13 Dutch standard a duty of something near 43 per cent. was levied; or Nos. between 13 and 9, 40 per cent.; and on Nos. below No. 9, something like 39 per cent., while on Melado the duty was 36 per cent.

Mr. JONES (Leeds) could not agree that this question should be put off till next Session. He could not at all understand the object of the remarks of the hon. member for Waterloo, who said in effect that because it would only help a few hundred people, therefore they should not receive fair play, neither could he understand the figures laid before the House by the hon. member for Bothwell. Looking at the question in a plain matter-of-fact sort of way, he (Mr. Jones) thought when we were paying 25½ per cent. per pound on the commonest grades of sugar coming into this country and the United States were allowing a drawback of 2½ to 3½ per cent, they were thereby ruining us. Not only were the manufacturing industries depressed by such a policy, but our shipping trade was not fairly encouraged. We were losing the West India trade by the course we pursued, and what was true of the sugar interest, applied to other industries. A readjustment of the tariff was necessary in all, because drawbacks were allowed to everything manufactured in the United States. He felt that the Government of the day had not done their duty with respect to the tariff. The last hours of the session were approaching, and hon. gentlemen were beginning to say we must leave this matter until next year, but the Government ought to have taken it in hand promptly and given relief to the suffering industries of the country.

Mr. BLAIN expressed the great satisfaction with which he had seen certain gentlemen adopting the principle of political economy he held, and he hoped he would soon be able to congratulate the Government on a protective policy—on a desire to legislate in the interests of the country regardless of what might be in the interest of other nations. It was idle to talk as the hon. member for Bothwell was disposed to do, about settling this question by figures; the question to be answered was—Why did the refinery close? There was a logic in this event proving a fact which no amount of figures could destroy. If the Government admitted it was their duty to legislate on this question, the whole principle of protection was conceded by them. If it was found that it is our duty to put on a drawback equal to the bounty allowed by the United States, that would be conceding all the Opposition had claimed on this question of protection. He congratulated the House and the country on the reversed action of supporters of the Government in this respect.

Mr. WORKMAN was glad to find that the hon. member for Hochelaga had brought forward this question, which was of the utmost importance, and he hoped that it would receive most earnest consideration both from the Government and the House. The astute calculations of the hon. member for Bothwell had been founded on the results of a commission of American experts; but it was well known to those who were engaged in the business, that these experts had laboured purely in the interest of American Refiners, acting on false principles, and not giving a correct statement of the facts of the case; consequently the hon. gentleman's deductions were erroneous. If the large American bounty did not afford a profit to the American refiner, how was it that their trade had increased so enormously? And to such an extent had this been the result, that they had closed up many British refineries owing to their large exportations to Great Britain, despite the great facilities it offered to its refiners. The Americans notwithstanding the cost of exportation, realized a large profit; and the export of sugar had advanced from one million to eight million pounds per month. It had been said that only 300 persons had been employed in the refinery at Montreal, but the Premier had in his possession a petition in this connection, signed by 2,800 persons, who had been either directly or indirectly employed by the proprietors of this establishment. Two refineries had formerly existed in Montreal—one was compelled to close owing to the change in the tariff, and the other had lost money during the past five years, the operations failing to realise five per cent. on the amount of capital invested. It had also ultimately been obliged to shut down, necessitating the discharge of its employes, and producing a great deal of distress and misery in the city. The interests of our commercial marine were largely concerned in this matter, for if the sugar refining business was transferred from Montreal to New York, our West Indian trade, which was very important, would be wholly destroyed. If the hon. member for Waterloo had stated that 30,000 instead of 300 men were given employment in connection with this business, he would have been much nearer the mark. The refineries in Canada did not demand protection, but they simply asked to be placed on the same footing with other manufacturing industries in this country. At present a direct bounty of 30 cents per 100 lbs. was given by the American Government on sugar exported into this country; and it was quite impossible, under these circumstances, for the Canadian to compete with the American refiners.

When the French and Belgian Governments granted large drawbacks to their refiners, what did Lord Derby do?—He warned them that if this system was not altered, a duty equal to these bonuses would be imposed on their sugars imported into Great Britain; and what was the result?—these drawbacks were at once removed. The consumption of all sugar, including that of the maple, in this country, amounted to something like 27½ lbs. per head, compared with 56 lbs. per head in the British Isles. It was true, that this consumption had there increased enormously when the duty was abolished, but nevertheless it was to be borne in mind that the British refiners could not compete at present with those of the United States. If the Government did not introduce some measure with a view to counteract the depressing influences he had mentioned, our West Indian trade, as well as our Canadian sugar refining business, would be totally annihilated.

Mr. WORKMAN.

Mr. SNIDER did not consider it wise to adopt the system asked by the refiners. Sugar was never sold so cheap as it is to-day, and he did not see why the majority of the people should be taxed for the benefit of the few. His principle was to buy in the cheapest and sell in the dearest market. In his opinion the Government had acted wisely with regard to the tariff, and they deserved a great deal of credit.

Mr. PLUMB said the hon. member for North Grey had enunciated one of those popular fallacies which had taken public attention for many years in regard to all questions of free-trade and protection. It was easy to say we should buy in the cheapest and sell in the dearest market, but all the conditions of production, and the necessities of taxation and the tariff were to be taken into consideration when that maxim was announced. Until we knew these conditions we did not know how to deal with this question.

Mr. DAVIES said no doubt the sugar refiners had a great deal to complain of as compared with other manufacturers. Take the manufacturer of iron for instance. Pig iron came in free, but the raw material of sugar had a duty of 17½ per cent. imposed. If that duty were taken off we would see a number of refineries spring up. But where would we get our revenue if that policy were adopted? We would have to resort to direct taxation, and allow everything to be imported free. He could not agree with the hon. member for Halifax, and would indeed be sorry to see a system of bounties inaugurated.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said he merely advocated the imposition of duties equal to the American bounty.

Mr. DAVIES said that was the same thing. It would be bad to establish a principle of that kind, as other manufacturers would apply for bounties. We had better adhere to the principles of free trade. The Province he came from was isolated for manufacturing purposes, and it would be hard for them to pay extreme duties in order to bolster up manufactures in other parts of the Dominion.

Mr. DESJARDINS thanked the hon. member for Halifax for giving the weight of his influence in support of the resolution. He was surprised at the attitude assumed by the hon. member for Waterloo, which was antagonistic to the position he took in regard to the West India trade on a former occasion. All they had asked was to diminish the duties upon the raw material and those qualities of sugar that enter into the consumption of the great mass of the people. This question involved large interests, and he was glad of the general concern which had been manifested in it.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he had no objection to the motion going, but he was afraid it would not obtain all the information he desired. The correspondence on the subject had been rather limited; there had been a good deal of verbal discussion, but not much correspondence. With respect to the general question, he would simply say that the consideration of the Government for a considerable time had been given to the two-fold question of whether they could make any alteration consistent with the present tariff, and also to see what could be done for the encouragement of the direct trade with the West Indies, which, as the House was well aware, the Government were naturally anxious to encourage. At the same time he might remark that where a revenue of $3,000,000 was concerned, the House under the present circumstances of the country must necessarily proceed with very great caution. A very small reduction in the duties now imposed would cost $500,000 to $600,000 to the country, a loss which we were not at the present moment in a position to stand. As to the assertions made with respect to the consumption per capita of sugar, and the large increase in the price within the last few days in Montreal, all he could say was, that very different assertions had reached the Government. They were informed on equally good authority that this increase, if it existed, was entirely local, and this was a matter which would settle itself one way or the other in a very short time. In regard to the direct question involved, whether they could safely reduce the duty with the expectation of deriving proportionate terms from the increased consumption which might follow, he entertained great doubt whether this would result. The consumption per head in Canada was, if not as large as that in England, much nearer to it than the House was probably aware. During the years 1864 to 1868 the highest point reached in England, while they had any considerable tax, was about 40 lbs per capita. In Canada, in addition to the consumption of sugar imported from abroad, there was a very considerable, although uncertain amount of maple sugar manufactured. This had been put as high as 20,000,000 to 24,000,000 lbs per annum. He was not prepared to say these figures were literally correct, but he believed the amount was much more considerable than some hon. gentlemen supposed. Then there was another thing to be considered. We imported nearly $1,000,000 worth of molasses, which answered in many respects the purposes of sugar, and which was larger relatively than the amount imported into England. In estimating the amount of saccharine matter consumed by our population, we had to take these two points into consideration, and when this was done our total consumption per capita would not fall short of that in England. Then the consumption of meat in the two countries was very different, and it was not to be supposed that our people would consume, even if it were free of duty, as much sugar in proportion as the people of England. Taking all these things into consideration, he thought the House would see that no great reduction in the duty on sugar could be effected without a considerable loss of revenue, and that we are not in a position at the present time to encounter. There was no doubt, on the other hand, that the duty on sugar—which is one of the necessities of life—is high, and if the circumstances of the country would admit they would be glad to reduce it; but whether it could be reduced in the direction indicated by hon. members on both sides of the House was another question, and one on which at the present moment he must reserve an opinion. With respect to the report of the American experts referred to, without at all pledging themselves to its accuracy, he might state that it was made in the special interest of the American Government and had resulted in a reduction, although not a large one, of that drawback which the United States have been in the habit of giving on refined sugar. Whether this drawback does or does not exceed the duty paid on the quality of sugar manufactured by refiners, was a very moot question; but however that might be, taking any scale of figures the House liked, he thought they would find that the duty paid on the raw material used in manufacture is considerably less than the duty we levy on the products of that raw sugar imported into this country, and the higher the American drawback is, the higher would be the import on the products of each 100 lbs imported here. Therefore, in any case, he thought it would be found that the Canadian refiner is not heavily weighted down in the competition with the American. The United States are much nearer to the sugar producing countries, with which they carry on a large trade, and it was possible in this way they obtained advantages over the Canadian manufacturer. He was glad on the whole that this discussion had occurred. It was desirable that the attention of the House and the country should be directed to this question and that it should be ventilated as much as possible. Every one knew that the question was one of the most complicated and perplexing in the whole realm of finance, and that the British Government were to a great extent influenced in their final determination to abolish the duties through the extreme difficulties they found in arriving at a satisfactory conclusion as to their mode of levying them on that article.

THE WALLACE ACCOUNTS.

Mr. BERTRAM moved for an Order of the House for a statement of the condition of the Wallace Accounts, shewing whether they have been balanced or not, said Accounts being a record or part of the Canadian Pacific Railway Survey expenditure.

Mr. WALLACE (Norfolk) said before this motion was put to the House, he desired to say a few words. He agreed with this step, because the more thorough the investigation, the better it would be for him. He had no fear of investigation, for he knew nothing could be truthfully shown that would prove he had done a wrong in connection with this matter. If this had been a question personal only to himself, he would not have intruded upon the House, but would have sought redress elsewhere and in another way; but he felt it was due to the constituents he had the honor to represent, who had so generously sustained him in the face of the basest calumnies, that he should exonerate himself from the blame attached to him in this particular. It was said he was a defaulter to the extent of something like $60,000, and this was stated upon the strength of a letter written by the hon. Premier. Although the letter that gentleman wrote might not have justified the inference drawn from it, when he saw, as he must have seen, the infamous use which was made of it, the First Minister had not the manliness or honour to come forward and declare the inference was incorrect, but allowed it to go abroad throughout the country that he (Mr. Wallace) had been guilty of misappropriating the public funds of the country with which he had been entrusted. To endeavour to secure the election of a supporter by unworthy and dishonourable means, as the Premier had done, was a wrong to Norfolk and to Canada, and unworthy of that hon. gentleman himself.

If he had sought revenge, he had got it, when, having written this letter the Hon. Premier stated in this House, that he did not know there was any deficiency in his (Mr. Wallace's) accounts, when he said he did not know there was any charge against him, and when before the Committee he said in reply to a question from the hon. member for North Hastings, that he had no reason to suspect Mr. Wallace of peculation, and that he never said so or thought so.

It must, he thought, be evident to every one that the letter was written to influence the election in Norfolk. It was especially unjustifiable when he was sustained by so large a majority in this House. All men are liable to err, but he is a true man who acknowledges and apologises for his wrong. This the Hon. Premier never had done, and his conduct in this matter had been degrading to his high position and to his country. The Committee formerly appointed to investigate the matter had found no deficiency in the accounts, and for the Premier to prefer an infamous charge against him was unworthy of him and the position he held.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE was surprised at this ebullition of the hon. member for Norfolk. He (Mr. Mackenzie) stated the accounts were shamefully mismanaged, and he repeated it now. He had alleged nothing improper against the hon. gentleman other than that, and the accounts proved that fact beyond question. The hon. member drew money from the department of Public Works without his knowledge, and held public money in his name at one of the banks at a time when it ought to have been paid over to the country. This fact was developed in the Committee, and he said it was an improper transaction. He never alleged any other impropriety.

Mr. WALLACE said the accounts were not shamefully mismanaged. Every cent of the money he had received had been accounted for; and as to having money in one of the banks, he had no settlement with the department. He could tell the hon. gentleman that the department owed him money in connection with the survey.

Mr. BERTRAM said he had endeavoured to get down to the motion some time, but had been only able to reach it to-night. It would be remembered that a special committee inquired into this matter last Session, when it was found impossible to obtain any definite and complete knowledge as to the condition of the accounts. The ledger could not be balanced by $116,000, and an accountant was engaged to write up the books. It was understood that this operation would take some time, and what conclusion had been arrived at? He had placed his motion on the paper in order to have put on record the statement of that clerk. It was quite as much in the interest of the hon. member for Norfolk, as the public, that a proper statement of the accounts should be made.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD had no doubt the hon. member for West Peterborough was anxious to have this matter cleared up; his kindness was worthy of appreciation, and he had no doubt it was appreciated. It was unfortunate, however, the hon. gentleman did not move this before, and not have postponed it until the end of the Session when there was no opportunity of having the matter thoroughly examined. The hon. member said they had not come down to the motion before, but that was not the case. They had gone over the list several times and the hon. gentleman said "let it stand."

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said it was due to the hon. member for West Peterborough to say that he had asked to have this statement on the Public Accounts, but he was informed that it had no right to a place there, not having any connection with the current year.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. gentleman had had an opportunity of moving this motion over and over again. The House appreciated his kindness in making it at the present time.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said this motion was never reached before. It was agreed one night to go over the unopposed motions, and when this notice was called the hon. member for Norfolk got up to speak, and it was passed over.

Mr. PLUMB said the Premier had admitted there was no imputation of a stain upon the character of the hon. member for Norfolk. It was a mere matter of account. It must be satisfactory to the hon. member to know that even the First Minister was now fain to admit that no more serious charge could be issued against him than a mere irregularity in his accounts.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I said impropriety.

Mr. WALLACE—I know that no attempt has been made to balance these books. I know that they must and can balance. I know that when the Departmental clerk who appears to have charge of them was before the Committee, he said he had only once gone over the ledger, and that he had not undertaken to compare it with the entries in the journal. We are told they are writing up new books from the same data. The thing is an absurdity. If the data of the books can be used to make new books balance, there is no reason why the old accounts should not be balanced without new books. Whatever may be the opinion of the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government as to my book-keeping capacities, this I do say, I defy any man to say that I have done anything wrong, anything of which I have reason to be ashamed, in connection with this transaction.

Mr. BOWELL said there was another consideration involved in this matter with which he thought this House had to do—something beyond the vindication of the personal honour of the hon. member for North Norfolk. He (Mr. Bowell) was a member of the Committee on the Wallace accounts, and when the hon. member for West Peterborough stated that these books would not balance, he ought to have stated that even up to date of the sittings of the Committee, all the accounts necessary to make the books balance had not been sent in to the Department, and that when the hon. member for South Norfolk ceased his connection with the Pacific Railway survey, it would be impossible to have the accounts squared. The Premier had distinctly stated before the Committee that he never had any suspicion that the hon. gentleman had done anything wrong, and the Chief Engineer went even further, stating that the hon. member for Norfolk had only been too economical—that if he had not been so strict and so saving of the public money, the probabilities were that the books would have been written up and balanced.

But the point to which he desired to direct especial attention—what the House and the country had to complain of—was this:—That the Minister of Public Works, leading the Government of this country, should have lent himself to the furnishing to a candidate at a Parliamentary election of information that could have been only within his own knowledge, and for the purpose of influencing the election. In 1872 the First Minister placed upon the Journals a resolution declaring that it was not only improper, but that any Minister of the Crown who would interfere or use his influence to assist in the election of any candidate for a seat in Parliament, deserved the condemnation of this House; and yet we find the same gentleman actually furnishing information that it was impossible to find except from his own books—furnishing it to a political supporter of his own in order to influence the electors of South Norfolk. A few evenings ago the Premier had informed an hon. member that he had no right to see the books of any Department, and yet what was refused to a member of this House was considered quite a proper thing to give to a political supporter during an election contest. Whether this was consistent with the professions of the Hon. First Minister, or the principles which ought to guide a Minister of the Crown, he would leave it to the House and the country to judge.

There had been a regular system of persecution of the hon. member for South Norfolk, which was unworthy alike of those who inaugurated it, and those who followed it up. He was not going now to enter into the manner and mode in which the investigation by the committee had been conducted. If the gentleman who acted as chairman had a seat in the House, as he did not now have, he (Mr. Bowell) would have no hesitation in expressing an opinion of that matter freely, and it was enough to say that the manner in which the hon. member for South Norfolk had been treated was something of which there was great ground for complaint. If he were a defaulter, as the letter of the Minister of Public Works indirectly intimated, it was the Minister's duty to prosecute for the crime. It was all very well after that letter had failed in its object, and after every effort to ruin the character of the member for South Norfolk had turned out to be fruitless, now to turn round and say he had done nothing wrong. That was neither a just mode, nor a mode which would satisfy the country, of receding from a charge which had been fulminated with so much recklessness and to a certain point prosecuted with so much boldness.

Mr. MILLS said he was not going to make any observations with regard to the manner in which the accounts in question had been kept, for he knew nothing about that. It was, however, a proper subject of inquiry if they had been irregularly kept, although such an inquiry implied no imputation upon the character of the hon. member except that he kept his accounts badly. But there was another aspect of the case which appeared to him to be very much more serious. At the time Mr. Wallace was keeping these books he was a Member of the House of Commons. There was a law upon the Statute book which made it illegal for any hon. member of this House to hold an office of emolument under the Crown, and yet the hon. member for South Norfolk while representing a constituency in Parliament was drawing a salary from the public treasury. Whether the books were properly or improperly kept, the other was an act which was not only illegal but wholly unjustifiable. The hon. gentleman ought to have resigned his office the moment he became a candidate. But the law went further than that, and enacted that a penalty of two thousand dollars per day should be imposed for every day any hon. member sat under such circumstances. That in his opinion was the most serious aspect of this case.

Mr. MACDOUGALL (Elgin) said he had heard the Premier's letter referred to frequently before. He desired the hon. member for South Norfolk to say whether he was prepared to say that the allegations contained in that letter were false in fact. As to the inferences which might be drawn from the document, the Premier was not responsible for them. The impression had been attempted to be created outside of this House that the allegations were false in fact, and if the hon. member was prepared to say so, or any one was prepared on his behalf, now was the time to say so.

Mr. MASSON said that was not the question, nor was it the question whether his hon. friend from South Norfolk had the right to sit in this House and hold that office. The question before the House was—Why did the Premier write that letter? When he (Mr. Masson) became aware of its contents, he must confess he came to the conclusion that there was something wrong about the accounts. Both the Premier and his friends had been afforded an opportunity of giving the necessary explanations, but had not taken advantage of it. The real question before the House was as yet unanswered.

Mr. BUNSTER hoped this matter would be dropped and the more important business of the House gone on with.

Mr. BERTRAM desired to make a personal explanation with regard to what had been said by the right hon. member for Kingston, but was not allowed to proceed.

Hon. Mr. POPE said it appeared to him clear that the Premier's letter was written with the intention of affecting the election, and the hon. gentleman was bound to make any explanation respecting it. Although the First Minister was forced to admit the hon. member for South Norfolk had done nothing wrong, still he had not apologised in any way. The Committee on Public Accounts last year, doing what they had never done before, had appointed various Sub-Committees mainly to enquire into charges against the predecessors of the present Ministers, and to one of these Sub-Committees was referred the Wallace Accounts. After a most rigid examination into the matter, they dared not make a report against the hon. member for South Norfolk, yet after a whole year had been passed over, the subject must again be dragged up by the hon. member from West Peterborough, and that not early in the session either, but at the last moment when hon. members were getting impatient and desirous of returning to their homes. And then he spoke of the hon. member for Norfolk as if he were a criminal worthy of being held up to the reprobation of the people of this country. The hon.

member for Peterborough had gone a little too far, and it was anything but creditable to the hon. gentleman to stir this matter up again.

Mr. CHARLTON said he had imputed no dishonesty to the hon. member for South Norfolk, but the position in which the case now stood reminded him very much of the boy when he went to see the elephant. He was very anxious to "see the menagerie," and he got his father's consent. He got up very early in the morning, would wait for no breakfast, and instead put a piece of gingerbread in his pocket. On arriving at the menagerie he saw the elephant, and going up close to inspect him, the animal quietly put out his trunk and took the gingerbread from the boy's pocket. The boy was astonished. There was the trunk on one end and there was the tail on the other. "Confound you" said our young friend, "if I knew which end of you was your head I would hit it." So it was with the accounts of the hon. gentleman from South Norfolk. He could not tell which end of his financial elephant the head was. The fairest way to treat this question was, perhaps, to say that these accounts got so hopelessly muddled that they could not be straightened up, and that they furnished an evidence of wretched book-keeping rather than of dishonesty.

The motion was then carried.

SEIZURE OF NETS BY INDIANS.

Mr. COOK moved an Address to His Excellency the Governor General for copies of documents relating to the forcible seizure and detention of nets and fish belonging to British fishermen by Indians residing on the shore and Islands of Georgian Bay, and all correspondence resulting therefrom.

The motion was carried.

HALIFAX STATION—IRON ROOF.

Mr. CARON, in the absence of Mr. Domville, moved an Address to His Excellency the Governor General for a copy of the contract for the iron roof of the Station House to be erected at Halifax, together with tenders for the same.

The motion was carried.

Hon. Mr. POPE.

ALLEGED VIOLATION OF THE TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) moved an Address to His Excellency the Governor General for copies of all correspondence between the Government of the Dominion and the Government of the United States respecting the alleged violation of the Treaty of Washington. In making the motion, he said that last year he called the attention of the House to what was admitted by all hon. members who took a part in the discussion was a gross violation of the Treaty of Washington, with regard to the duty which the American Government had placed upon packages containing certain kinds of fish. The Government then promised to draw the attention of the Washington authorities to the subject; and he now moved for the correspondence in order to ascertain in what position the question stood at the present time.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the cause of the correspondence was that a vessel attempted to land a cargo of, he thought, canned lobsters at Philadelphia, and duty was charged upon the cans. If the owner of the vessel had paid the duties under protest, it would have left the Government in a better position to deal with the difficulty than they were in as it happened; but instead of that, the owner withdrew his invoice and left it open to the United States authorities to allege that the lobsters were cured in oil, and therefore subject to duty. The pretence that they were able to charge duty on the packages was another branch of the subject. For this they excused themselves by quoting an Act of Congress passed since the ratification of the Treaty. They seemed to attach more importance to their own law than to treaty obligations, whereas their statutes expressly gave precedence to treaty provisions.

It seemed to be all but impossible to procure an enlightened carrying out of the Treaty of Washington by the Americans. The papers would show how the various difficulties arose, as well as the fact that had the Treaty been worded differently with respect to canals we might have had a better hold upon them. A disposition had been manifested to give as little as possible and take as much as they could. This must be attended to in future negotiations, so that no obligation could be avoided.

Mr. JONES (Halifax)—Will the United States Government levy this duty in future?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I am not in a position to say exactly, but I think it would be better that our people should act as if they had no right to levy it, and if it is insisted upon, appeal to their own Government for protection.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the first Minister was right as to the effect of withdrawing the cans, which left no question to be submitted to the American authorities. The suggestion of the Premier was the right one. He believed the Canadian Government would be quite justifiable in pressing the matter before the Supreme Court of the United States. Treaty obligations were considered by all countries paramount to their own laws, and were the question tried before the Supreme Court of the States—a tribunal which was above suspicion—he had no doubt it would be so decided. The wording of the Washington Treaty in regard to the use of the canals, was the same as in the original Reciprocity Treaty.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the wording of the 30th clause of the first mentioned Treaty, when used in connection with the wording of the 27th, placed us at a disadvantage. The 27th provided that the Government of Her Britannic Majesty undertook to urge upon the Government of the Dominion to secure the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence and other canals in the Dominion, to the citizens of the United States on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion; while the Government of the United States engaged that the subjects of Her Majesty should enjoy the use of the St. Clair Flats Canal, and further engaged to urge upon the State Governments to secure to Her Majesty's subjects the use of the State Canals connected with the navigation of the lakes or rivers traversed by or contiguous to the boundary line. On the other hand, in the 30th article, we had this express provision :—

The Government of the United States may suspend the right of carrying, granted in favour of the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty under this article, in case the Dominion of Canada should at any time deprive the citizens of the United States of the use of the canals of the said Dominion, on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the said Dominion.

No matter what the United States might do, they were not subject to any penalty or bound to represent to the different States anything further than giving us the use of their canals contiguous to the boundary line. Under the provisions of the Treaty American vessels now came up the Hudson, the Champlain, Chambly and Ottawa Canals, and could be seen loading at our wharves in this city every day, while our vessels were compelled to unload at Whitehall when carrying freights for the same destination. The authorities of the State of New York, when applied to for the use of their canals, very promptly and liberally informed the Government that there was no restriction in their State Law which would prevent Canadians using their canals, and they also offered to pass any measure which might be considered necessary in order to give us that advantage. But the Federal Authorities, who at first shielded themselves behind the State Authorities, immediately upon this decision being arrived at, found that their Customs Laws—which they placed ahead of their Treaty obligations—prevented any of our vessels passing the first port on American territory, where they had to unload. At first, when remonstrated with, they denied that any of our vessels had been prohibited from going freighted through the first port, and when the Government of the State of New York replied that no such hindrance had been imposed by them, the Canadian Government were asked for evidence. That was furnished, and it was then that it was discovered that their Federal Laws did not allow vessels of a foreign power to pass the first port without unloading. Subsequently they found a law upon their own Statutes which permitted this to be done; but it had never been allowed, and it was not likely to be.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) asked if the Treaty granted them the use of our rivers? If not, we had the matter in in our own hands.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said when we granted the use of the canals, he thought we must also grant the intervening space. It was only the parts above the canals there could be any doubt about.

Mr. MILLS said the question really seemed to him to be whether any other canal than that which belonged to the State of Michigan was meant. He thought more than that was intended.

In reply to Mr. Jones,

Hon Mr. MACKENZIE said he was inclined to think a number of entries of canned fish had been made, since the cargo to which he had referred in an earlier portion of the discussion, upon which no doubt the duties had been paid under protest, but the information had not yet reached the Government in an official way.

The motion was then carried.

ST. VINCENT DE PAUL PENITENTIARY.

Mr. OUMET moved for an Order of the House for copies of all official correspondence and of all instructions issued in relation to the completion or finishing of the buildings and out-buildings of the Penitentiary of St. Vincent de Paul (Quebec), and in relation to the building of a house for the keepers and employees of the said Penitentiary; also a statement showing the amount expended for repairs on the residence of the Warden of the said Penitentiary—the whole from the establishment of the said Penitentiary to 1st January, 1876.

The motion was agreed to.

HARBOUR ON LAKE ERIE.

Mr. STEPHENSON moved an address to His Excellency the Governor General, for copies of all Reports of Engineers, plans and correspondence in possession of the Government relating to the construction of a Harbour at some point on Lake Erie between Rond Eau Point and the Village of Clearville, in the County of Kent.

The motion was carried.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE.

ESQUIMALT AND NANAIMO TELEGRAPH LINE.

Mr. BUNSTER moved for an address to His Excellency the Governor General for all correspondence between the Government of British Columbia and the Dominion Government respecting the construction of a Telegraph Line from Esquimalt to Nanaimo; also all Orders in Council or correspondence with any other officer or person respecting the same.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he was not aware that there was any correspondence on the subject. If there was any, it would be brought down.

Mr. DEWDNEY said he was under the impression that application had been made for the construction of the line. He believed such a line would be in the interest not only of that section of the country, but of the whole Dominion, for the existing cable, which was laid in a very unfavourable part of the channel cost, $9,000 or $10,000 last year. A much more favourable route could be found between Nanaimo and Burrard Inlet.

The motion was carried.

THE APPLE BARREL.

Mr. OLIVER moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolutions:—

1. A barrel of apples or other fruit shall, from and after the first day of July, 1876, be held to mean a barrel of the following dimensions, that is to say: Diameter at each head seventeen inches, diameter at midlength of the stave twenty inches, length between the heads twenty-six inches, or of such other dimensions as will give a capacity of not less than twenty-five gallons.

2. Every bargain for the sale and purchase of apples or other fruit by the barrel shall be for barrels of the above dimensions.

3. Any person who shall use for packing apples or other fruit, for sale, barrels of less dimensions or capacity than are herein stated, shall be guilty of an offence, and shall for the first offence incur a penalty of five dollars for every barrel so used, and a penalty of double the amount for every subsequent offence.

4. All such forfeitures and penalties shall be imposed and appropriated in the same manner as forfeitures and penalties are recoverable and appropriated under the Weights and Measures Act of 1873.

He said the resolution required no explanation. He had been petitioned by those of his constituents interested in this matter to make the amendment in question to the law last year, but it was then too late to think of it. The resolution would compel those selling apples to use a uniform size of barrel. The amendment had the sanction of the Acting Minister of Inland Revenue.

Mr. GOUDGE said there was a Statute of Nova Scotia regulating the size of the barrel in that Province, with which this might conflict.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER also urged the same objection, which he claimed was worthy of great consideration in view of the importance of the apple trade in Nova Scotia.

The resolutions were then agreed to in Committee, and a Bill founded upon them introduced and read the first time.

THE POSTMASTER OF BLOOMSBURY.

Mr. WALLACE (Norfolk) moved for an Order of the House for all correspondence with the Postmaster General or with the Department, in reference to charges preferred against the Postmaster at Bloomsbury, in the County of Norfolk; also for the evidence taken by the Inspector who investigated the charges, together with his report thereon. He said the investigation in question had revealed sufficient to justify the dismissal of the Postmaster, yet he was still continued in office.

The motion was carried.

DOMINION LANDS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. BUNSTER moved:—That owing to the location survey having been made on Vancouver's Island, B.C., for the railroad from Esquimalt to Nanaimo, the Government are enabled to select their lands according to the Carnarvon terms, which have been agreed to on the part of this Government and the Government of British Columbia, it is very desirable that the Dominion Government should at once take steps to have the Dominion lands of the Island sold, and that the Government instruct their agent in the Province to dispose of them to intending settlers and purchasers with the utmost facility.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government could not allow this motion to pass, and it was withdrawn.

OFFICERS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. BOWELL, in the absence of Mr. Kirkpatrick, moved that the Clerk do lay on the table a statement shewing the ages, names, present salaries and length of service of each officer and permanent clerk in his Department.

Also the age, names and salaries of the Extra or Sessional Clerks at present employed in the service of the House of Commons.

Also a statement shewing the ages, names, salaries and length of service of the Officers, Clerks, Book-keepers and Messengers of the Department of the Sergeant-at-Arms whether employed permanently or otherwise.—Carried.

EXPENDITURES IN THE DIFFERENT PROVINCES.

Mr. BUNSTER moved for an Order of the House for a return of the revenue and expenditure on account of Consolidated Fund for each year since Confederation in the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and in the Provinces of Manitoba and British Columbia for each year since they became Provinces of the Dominion; also the amount of expenses in each of the said Provinces yearly during the same period on Capital Account.—Carried.

BOARDS OF TRADE.

The amendments made in Committee to the Bill amending the Act relating to the incorporation of Boards of Trade were read the second time and concurred in, and the Bill read the third time and passed.

RETURNS.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government had been charged with being remiss in bringing down returns. He had taken the trouble to compare the results of the present with previous Sessions, and he found the following facts to bear out the position he took when formerly attacked: At this period of the Session in 1868 there 49 returns brought down; in 1869, 33 returns; in 1870, 26 returns; in 1871, 46 returns; in 1872, 44 returns; in 1873, 45 returns; in 1874, 41 returns; in 1875, 49 returns, and in 1876 (the present Session), 52, being three more than the highest number that had ever been brought down in the same time. Some of the returns this year were very voluminous, too. The highest number previously granted was in 1874, when 104 were allowed, and 41 brought down up to the same time.

The House adjourned at Five minutes past Twelve o'clock p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, April 4, 1876.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

MONTREAL HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE introduced a Bill respecting the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal. He said the Bill of last Session was amended in the Senate only a day before the prorogation, and it was to remove doubts as to that amendment that this Bill was introduced.

The Bill was read the first time

CUSTOMS IN MANITOBA.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE introduced a Bill to amend the Act relating to customs in Manitoba. He explained that its object was to empower the Lieutenant Governor of Manitoba, under certain circumstances, to issue licenses to persons carrying liquors into or out of the North-West Territories.

The Bill was read the first time.

THE DESJARDINS CANAL.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE introduced a Bill respecting the Desjardins Canal. He said the charter of the company which constructed this work would soon expire, and by its terms, the canal would then become the property of the people. This Bill was to empower the Governor in Council to deal with the work as was thought best.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE.

THE NORTHERN RAILWAY.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE introduced a Bill to amend the Act of last Session respecting the Northern Railway Company. He explained that it was simply to extend the time in which they should furnish the amount specified in the Act of last year.

RAILWAY STATISTICS.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE introduced a Bill to amend the Railway Statistics Act. He explained that it was to enable the Government more effectively to carry out the Act of last Session.

RAILWAY LANDS IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Hon. Mr. Laird moved for a Committee of the Whole for to-morrow to consider the following Resolution:—

"That it is expedient to make special provision respecting Dominion Lands withdrawn from the general provisions of the Dominion Lands Acts, as to sale and settlement, for purposes connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and to provide that two-thirds of all cash received for such Lands shall be carried to a special fund for such purposes as aforesaid, to be dealt with in such manner as may be deemed expedient by the Governor in Council."

Carried.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE moved, that for the remainder of the Session Government Measures shall have precedence of all other business after Routine Proceedings.—Carried.

THE INDIAN LAWS.

The House resumed consideration of the Bill entitled "An Act to amend and consolidate the laws respecting Indians," in Committee of the Whole, Mr. Young in the Chair. Clause 86. Whenever any Indian man, or unmarried woman, of the full age of twenty-one years, obtains the consent of the Band of which he or she is a member to become enfranchised, and whenever such Indian has been assigned by the Band a suitable allotment of land for that purpose, the local Agent shall report such action of the Band, and the name of the applicant to the Superintendent-General; whereupon the said Superintendent, if satisfied that the proposed allotment of land is equitable, shall authorize some competent person to report whether the applicant he or she is an Indian who, from the degree of civilization to which he or she has attained, and the character for integrity, morality and sobriety which he or she bears, appears to be qualified to become a proprietor of land in fee simple; and upon the favorable report of such person, the Superintendent-General may grant such Indian a location ticket as a probationary Indian, for the land allotted to him or her by the Band, being taken up.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN stated, that after three years of probation, if he remembered right, the Indian would obtain under this Act full title to his property; consequently he might sell it at any time, and white men purchasing might intrude on the reserves. He knew that this had been the objection to the law as it now stood, and which was enacted in 1869. The consent of the band to enfranchisement would not be obtained for this reason: it would introduce whites on the reserves, and bring about all the evils which followed the mingling of the two races. Great difficulty, at least, would be experienced in obtaining the assent of a band to the enfranchisement of one of their number fitted to enjoy this privilege. He was aware of the delicate nature of this question, but it nevertheless must be settled. They should have in view the gradual enfranchisement of all the Indians living amongst us. He thought that the intention of the Government was good, but he did not consider that the result would meet the views of the Minister of the Interior. He drew attention to these matters, because this clause of course contained the principle of this section of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD agreed with a great portion of the remarks of the hon member for Charlevoix; but in the first place the Government thought that it would be very undesirable to frame any scheme for enfranchisement which would not be acceptable to the Indians. If this were done regardless of the consent of the band, confusion, want of harmony, and dissatisfaction would be produced. They knew from experience, and from the deliberations of the Council held the other year at Sarnia, that the Indians generally in these Provinces, were willing to accord enfranchisement to intelligent members of these Bands. By the 88th clause of the Bill, while the enfranchisement enabled them to hold their lands in fee simple, they also had the right to sit in Council and draw their annuities; and this was precisely what the Indians desired. The hon. member remarked that white men might settle on the reserves if these provisions were enforced; but if the great privilege in question was not accorded they would run counter to the whole policy of the Government regarding the surrenders which had existed for years. It was our boast that we did not take an acre of land from the Indians without their consent; and if this privilege were denied them, they would have a right to complain. This Act was in entire harmony with the surrender principle; and he did not think that much trouble would be met in carrying it into effect. The Six Nation Indians did not seem quite prepared for it, but when they saw other Bands accept it, they would soon follow their example. As regarded the North-West Territories, Manitoba and British Columbia, they did not expect that these provisions would be applicable to the Indians living in these regions for some years to come. This was the best that they could do under the circumstances; and while they could offer counsel and advice to the Indians at all times, he thought that they should not attempt to act in any way contrary to the views of the Indians, at least as far as their rights to property were concerned. This was the policy of the Administration.

Mr. PATERSON remarked that in 1857 the right hon. member for Kingston had introduced a Bill, in which this feature of enfranchisement was recognised. This law was amended by the hon. member for Charlevoix in 1869, and though the principle was recognised, the law had remained inoperative—in fact a dead letter in this respect. Only one Indian he believed had sought to obtain this privilege under it, but when he had secured it, no land was allotted to him. The Minister of the Interior dwelt upon this subject in his report in language full of eloquence and of truth, stating that he was firmly persuaded that the true interests of the aborigines and the State alike require that every effort should be made to aid the red man in lifting himself out of his condition of tutelage and dependence. It was the duty of the Government then to consider whether every aid was given the Indian seeking enfranchisement. He feared that in some of the tribes the consent of the majority of the Band required by the Acts would not be given, and thus the desire of the Indian seeking enfranchisement be denied.

He would suggest that it should be so amended that when the majority of the tribe refused to allow one of their number the right of enfranchisement, he could have the right of appeal to the General Superintendent; without such a remedy the Bill would, he feared, be defective.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said this Bill was found to meet the wishes of the Indians themselves, and consequently they expected it to be more effective than the Bill of 1857. If it was found after a year or two that the suggestion of the hon. gentleman would be any improvement the law would be easily amended.

Mr. FLEMING said the Indians of the Six Nations were too shrewd and intelligent to accept of the enfranchisement offered under the Acts of 1857 and 1869. If we would enfranchise the Indians we must offer them such inducements as would make it worth their while to ask for. They should first be located on their reserves; first decide what land they should have, and let them feel that this land was theirs forever, but do not give them the power to alienate it to white men, and as soon as they knew exactly what they possessed then they would look for enfranchisement; but the most intelligent Indians were debarred from it by this clause, which would put them in a worse position than they now occupied.

Mr. SCHULTZ said that as the discussion on this Bill had already occupied much time, he would content himself with making some observations generally on the clauses under the heading of enfranchisement. The clauses under this head, he thought objectionable for the following reasons:—They are merely a repetition in a modified form of existing rules which have been found to be utterly inapplicable, and are so complicated and cumbersome that it would be next to impossible for an Indian, however well qualified otherwise, to become enfranchised under them; and this is proven by the fact that although the law has been long in existence, no Indian, as far as he knew, has ever availed or attempted to avail himself of its provisions. Again, these clauses would make enfranchisement contingent, not only on the breaking up of the reserves into separate freehold allotments, but also on the Indians ceasing to be Indians under the meaning of the Statutes. It would therefore follow that Indians, no matter how wealthy, intelligent or well-educated, must continue to be without civil rights, unless they comply with rules which, even if they could be complied with, would have the effect of breaking up the whole system of Indian management, thus depriving the Indians of the protection they have hitherto enjoyed, and it is well known, or at least, generally supposed that these rules were adopted in the first instance, with a view to breaking up the tribal system and enabling the white man to get possession of the lands of the Indians.

Again—these causes being, as proved by practical experience of similar ones, inapplicable, will continue to be inoperative, in fact a dead letter, except in so far as that they will, as heretofore, deprive a large number of very deserving people in Ontario at least, of civil rights, and a well-to-do Indian will still have the mortification of seeing his white labourers voting at elections, while he, the son of the soil, finds himself in an inferior position, branded in fact as an outlaw, and unfit to share in the common privileges of a white man. The Act will thus have the very opposite effect to that which was no doubt intended. Instead of imbuing the Indians with a sense of self-respect, and leading them to feel that when they have advanced in civilization they are to stand on an equal footing with the white man, it will have a tendency to degrade them in their own eyes and in the estimation of those around them. The Indians are everywhere so attached to their tribal system that they will not abandon it, and some way should be found of leading them to civilization and independence without trenching on this, their most cherished institution. In Ontario the Indians have, in many cases, passed the probationary period and are in a position to exercise the franchise as judiciously as the majority of white men.

The interpretation of the word "enfranchisement," section 3, subsection 5, does not make the matter any better, but the clause might be relieved to some extent of its objectionable features by using the words "freehold" and "freeholder" for "enfranchised" and "enfranchisement;" and it should be left entirely to the Provinces to say who shall, or who shall not vote at elections, which is the spirit at least, of the present election law.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said that the term "enfranchised" was defined in the Bill, and in view of his hon. friend's representations he proposed introducing an amendment.

Mr. SCHULTZ said he was aware of it, but the definition did not relieve the objectionable features of these clauses. However, he was glad to learn that, in view of the different condition of the Indians of the North-West as compared with those of the older Provinces, the hon. Minister intended to make an amendment to the Bill, and as he (Mr. Schultz) had before explained the different circumstances of the Indians of the North-West, he hoped the amendment would be of such a character as would render the Bill applicable to both.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN said the Minister of Interior would agree with him it would not be wise to give the Superintendent General the power to enfranchise Indians who had been refused that privilege by the band. It would be better to fix a time—say a period of fifteen years—at the expiration of which all the members of a band should be enfranchised.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD—They would not all be fit.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN said there were many white men who were not fit for enfranchisement, yet they enjoyed all the rights of freemen. By being educated all the members of a band would become fit for taking their places in Society. The object of this Bill was to keep the Indians, with the exception of a few, in a state of tutelage. Looking to the future of the race, he believed the true policy should be to do away with that system, by the gradual emancipation of all the Indians who lived in villages and were settled on lands.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said that would offer no inducement to them to become fit for enfranchisement. Under this Bill they were given some aim to better themselves, and he believed that was the true policy.

Mr. PATERSON said at the same time it struck a blow at the very root of the tribal relation. The very fact of an Indian seeking enfranchisement implied that he no longer wished to be recognized as an Indian.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD—An Indian is not cut off from his band by enfranchisement. He belongs to the tribe as much as ever he did.

Mr. PATERSON said it was impossible at the same time to preserve the tribal relations and facilitate the enfranchisement of the Indians. If the Government were prepared to take the position that the tribal relations must continue for all time to come, then it was a mistake to do any thing in the way of enfranchisement at all. It was evident the proposition of the hon. member for Charlevoix would have to be adopted ere long—a time must be fixed when all Indians living in the midst of civilized communities and refusing to move to the North West, must be enfranchised. Take the Brant reserve for instance. The Indians there are increasing rapidly, and something must be done to meet their case. They would not remove to a larger reserve, and there remained only the alternative of enfranchising the whole band at a certain time.

The clause passed.

On the 88th clause,

Hon. Mr. LAIRD proposed an addition providing for the child's right to the land, if, at the end of the probationary period the Indian was not qualified for enfranchisement.

The clause, as amended, was carried.

On the 89th clause.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD proposed to add a clause to carry out the principle of the preceding provision, declaring the form in which the child should hold the land.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN asked if it would not be well to introduce a clause to allow a medical man or educated Indian to hold land and have the privileges of enfranchisement outside of the reserve of his own land.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD explained that there was nothing in the present law to prevent an Indian enjoying this privilege.

The clause, as amended, was carried.

The 90th clause was carried without discussion.

On the 91st clause,

Hon. Mr. LAIRD moved to strike out the words "allow for each single Indian a like proportion."

The clause was carried with this amendment.

Clauses 92 and 93 were carried without discussion.

On clause 94,

Hon. Mr. LAIRD introduced a new section, providing that this enfranchisement clause should not apply to Manitoba, British Columbia, or the North-West, until by proclamation of the Governor in Council.

The clause, as amended, was carried.

Clauses 95 and 96 were carried without debate or amendment.

The 98th clause, the Governor may, from time to time, appoint officers and agents to carry out this Act, and any Orders in Council made under it, which officers and agents shall be paid in such manner and at such rates as the Governor in Council may direct out of any fund that may be appropriated by law for that purpose, being taken up.

Mr. COSTIGAN called the attention of the Minister of the Interior to a matter which he had previously brought before the Committee. The appointment of the agent in New Brunswick was at present not convenient to the Indians, whose money to a large amount was used to pay this officer, who resided at a great distance from the reserve. He had understood from the Minister of the Interior to-day that no change had been made because this state of things existed under the late Government. This was correct. The late Mr. Howe had divided the Province of New Brunswick for these purposes into two districts, to which he had objected at the time without avail. The Indians had afterwards petitioned against it with a like result; and he had during the following Session directed the attention of the Government to the question, showing the inconsistency of appointing an officer with a high salary to do what had been performed by resident commissioners previously without salary. A Mr. Craig, who lived on the reserve, was to have been appointed when the late Government was defeated; and that gentleman unfortunately died before any steps were taken in the matter. He had then fully discussed this question.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD fully appreciated the hon. gentleman's remarks. The state of affairs with reference to the New Brunswick agencies was not satisfactory, but as yet he had not been fully prepared to recommend any change until the Superintendent had settled on a certain plan regarding this Province. It did not seem desirable to dismiss officers or lower their salaries. An official report was required before anything could be done, and the mapping out of the whole Province with a view to a new arrangement. He had thought that he would have been in a position last summer to visit that section of the country for this purpose; but this had been impossible, and he would send an agent of the Department to look into the matter. It was not a pleasant thing, as the hon. member for Cumberland knew, to dismiss officials.

Mr. COSTIGAN added, that complaint was made because this matter seemed so difficult to deal with; he did not ask for the dismissal of any officer. A Commissioner, resident on the reserves, could be appointed with a salary of $100 a year, whereas the present officer received $400. He could not see why they should wait for a change until the locality was visited by a Minister or an agent. He had received a number of letters on the subject, during the present and the last Session, expressing a hope that a resident Commissioner would be named. The sum of $1.—a very high rate—per thousand was now paid on the reserves for stumpage, and the agent in addition charged 98 cents per thousand for travelling expenses. The only party who was benefited under the present system was the Commissioner. He had drawn up petitions in this connection, and previously stated the facts of the case; nearly three years had elapsed since the question was first mooted, and the Indians could not understand why their demand could not be granted.

The clause was passed.

On clause 66,

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said he proposed to amend it so that any person selling an article to an Indian who could not advance more than one-fourth or one-half the payment should have the right to take security for the balance on such article alone. For instance, a person selling an Indian a horse, and receiving one-fourth down, could take security on the animal for the remainder.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said that while they generally treated the Indians as children, in this matter it was proposed to treat them as men, which was inconsistent with the general policy.

The Committee rose and reported the Bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were read the third time and passed:—

An Act to amend the Act 31 Victoria, Chapter 5, as respects the Public Accounts.

An Act to amend the Act 31 Victoria, Chapter 3, respecting the indemnity to Members of both Houses of Parliament.

An Act to remove doubts under the Acts therein mentioned respecting the Corporation of the Quebec Harbour Commissioners (from the Senate.)

MILITIA ESTIMATES.

On the item $40,000 for military stores,

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT explained the item had been reduced from $60,000 to $40,000, which was the smallest sum that would answer for the purpose.

The item passed.

On the item $52,000 for public armories and care of arms, including the pay of storekeepers and caretakers, storemen and the rents, fuel and light of public armories,

Mr. MASSON asked if it was the intention of the Government to carry into effect the recommendation made by the Major-General—that a skilled armorer should go round and see to the arms—and whether it was their intention to follow the suggestion made by Col. Jackson with respect to the care of arms?

Hon. Mr. VAIL said the suggestion was a good one, but he could not say whether it would be carried out.

Mr. MASSON said it was a recommendation made last year, and the House ought to know whether it would be acted upon or not.

Hon. Mr. VAIL said it would be carried into effect as soon as the Government thought it was for the advantage of our militia system.

Mr. FLESHER said a great deal of the deterioration of arms arose from climatic causes. They were stowed away in places which were unfit for the purpose, and being exposed to damp were speedily covered with rust. Proper places should be provided for the storage of arms.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said some 636 armories would have to be built if that suggestion were adopted.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL thought the Minister of Militia had not treated the hon. member for Terrebonne fairly in not stating specifically whether the Government intended to adopt the recommendation of their responsible officer or not.

Mr. BROWN did not see how the present system could be improved upon without a large increase in the expenditure. The captain of a company was held responsible for the arms. He received $40 or $50 for looking after them, and this money was paid to some trustworthy man to discharge the duty.

Mr. WRIGHT (Pontiac) enquired what had been the result of negotiations between the Minister of Militia and Defence and the corporation of the city of Ottawa, respecting the present armories, which were quite inadequate for the purpose?

Hon. Mr. VAIL replied that nothing definite had as yet been done. The matter was certainly important in the interests of the city, and he could not but say that the armory and drill shed were in a disgraceful condition.

Mr. FLESHER thought that it was neither expedient nor necessary to establish new armories at every point; but he fancied that the arms in those which now existed could be better preserved by securing greater isolation from the damp, at slight expense.

Mr. BOWELL thought that it would be more satisfactory to the House and country if something like an answer were given to the question of his hon. friend from Terrebonne. The suggestions in question were not new; they were made last year with reference to the care of arms, and the appointment of sergeant-majors or permanent adjutants, in the different districts, to look particularly after Government property. The hon. gentleman stated that he had the matter under consideration; one year had passed, and he supposed that another year must be allowed. The Major-General reported that a large portion of the arms were unfit for service. It was impossible to take arms to and from, and use them at camps without injury; and the saving that would be effected in the department by a skilled armorer would far exceed the remuneration received. A great waste was due to the circumstance that volunteers were permitted to retain their military clothing in their possession, particularly with regard to great-coats, which were used for common wear. He supposed that they would be compelled to be satisfied with the reply which had been obtained.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—We ought to have a more explicit answer.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—The hon. gentleman has stated that he has taken the matter into consideration.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—I do not think that this is an answer which a free Parliament should be satisfied with. The hon. gentleman should say whether he intends to carry out the recommendations of a responsible officer or not. The hon. gentleman has no right to make the reply he has given.

Hon. Mr. VAIL—I am afraid that no answer which I can give will be satisfactory to the hon. gentleman. It is not the time to appoint a permanent salaried officer when we are reducing the expenditure in connection with this item. This is a very good reason for not doing so at present; another is, that $40 is allowed per company, which is paid on certificate of the Brigadier-Major, who is responsible for the arms. The matter will be looked into and the suggestions in question will be taken into consideration.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—I quite approve of the explanation as far as it has gone. I do not think that it is desirable to add additional officers to the staff of the militia, and I believe that if a good many of them were discharged it would meet with the approval of the country. I understand that the hon. gentleman does not intend to accept the suggestions of his responsible officer. I hope, however, that whatever he may do, he will not increase the expenditure with relation to the militia service, or add to its charges on the revenue of the country.

Mr. MASSON said the reply of the Minister of Militia was almost an attack upon himself, that he had recommended a course that would create a great deal of extra expenditure on the Militia force. He had had some experience in Militia affairs, and had to see that the officers under him took care of their arms. If the hon. gentleman thought this was not a proper time to take care of these arms he would tell him it would be far better to withdraw them from the force, and store them in the Government armories. The arms could not be properly taken care of without the expenditure of money, and he feared if the course he had suggested were not adopted the House would see next session the arms would be reported as being in bad order.

Mr. WRIGHT (Pontiac) said the Captain of each particular Company should be held responsible for the good condition and state of the arms in his charge.

Mr. BOWELL said he fully concurred with the Hon. Minister of Militia that this was not the time to add permanent officers to the staff. He thought it was already too large and expensive for the work which they had to perform. He had understood the Hon. Minister of Finance to state a few minutes ago that there were 636 armories through the country to be looked after, to each of which he proposed to give $40 towards looking after and taking care of the arms. That amounted to $26,440. Two or three well skilled armory sergeants could perform the duty more satisfactorily and keep the arms in better condition for a very much smaller sum of money, and then more could be saved by dropping out a portion of the staff.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said the House should have some statement from the Government as to their policy with regard to the care of these arms. The Major General had made a very serious charge, that a large part of these arms were unserviceable, and this House should consider the best means of remedying the evil. The present system was not satisfactory, and the arms should either be called in from the country companies and concentrated in the battalion armories where they could easily be inspected; or if it were considered desirable that the arms should remain at Company headquarters, then there should be an inspection once or twice a year by a competent armory-sergeant. In cases of isolated companies the arms should be treated in the same way.

Mr. WRIGHT (Pontiac) said the arms were so simple that they could not get out of order, and all that was necessary was to keep them well oiled and free from rust.

The item was passed.

On item, $50,000, for contingencies and general service not otherwise provided for, including assistance to Rifle Associations and bands of efficient corps,

Mr. WRIGHT (Pontiac) enquired if there was any of that amount for the Wimbledon team.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said provision was made for the different Rifle Associations of the Provinces in a general way amounting to some $18,000 or $20,000, but he did not think a vote for that special object had ever been taken specifically.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL asked for an approximate statement of the cost of Major General Smythe's trip across the Rocky Mountains.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said it was distributed over two or three Departments, the Mounted Police, Militia, &c., but he would be able to get the statement before concurrence was taken. He was of opinion that it would not exceed $7,000.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said he had heard the expenses of the Major-General and staff across the continent amounted to between $30,000 and $40,000. He hoped it was not true.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT thought this was a great exaggeration.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL would be glad to hear so, and hoped a detailed account of the cost of the expedition would be submitted to the House.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT promised, if possible, to bring down the items on concurrence.

Mr. FLESHER remarked that it was an essential condition to the efficiency of a corps that it should possess a target, and enquired what steps were taken to supply regiments.

Hon. Mr. VAIL said they were anxious to provide targets wherever their necessity was pointed out. There had only been two applications, and the amount expended was less than the appropriation. It was necessary to apply for them through the ordinary channel and not to the department.

Mr. BUNSTER called attention to the fact that the Nanaimo corps had neither drill shed nor target. The Captain had informed him the company would be disbanded unless they received some consideration in this respect.

The item was carried.

On item 75, Military College, $26,000,

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT gave the items of this estimated expenditure, and remarked that this was purely an experimental vote, and the whole amount might not be required next year.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER enquired if the professors were appointed, and when the college would open.

Hon. Mr. VAIL said the college would open by the 1st of May or a little later.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT stated that all the professors had been appointed with the exception of the professor of modern languages.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN wanted to know how many cadets had passed their examinations, and whether the regulations, conditions of examination and qualifications had been changed. Those conditions originally militated against the young men of the Province of Quebec. Unless a candidate could translate French or Latin into English he could not pass his examination, which was scarcely right, as a college of this kind should be for the benefit of all classes of the community.

Hon. Mr. VAIL said there was no intention to shut out any one from the advantages of the college. The great difficulty last year was that the cadets who came forward were not up to the French requirements. He did not see how the regulations could act detrimentally to the interests of any youth in Quebec, as he was sure the ordinary course of instruction in that Province would enable him to pass the examination. Provision was made for 20 cadets. Last year there were 12 candidates, but only eight came up to the required standard. The standard had been placed rather high. It was fixed at an average of 50, but at the next examination, which would take place on the 28th of May, it would be lowered to 35 or 37. If the hon. gentleman had some better arrangements to suggest he would be glad to listen to them.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN said that the conditions were much too stringent, and they were not just to the French population. To translate Latin into English, it was necessary to have a complete knowledge of the latter language; yet this was what French Canadian candidates were required to do before they could be admitted to the college.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT admitted there was force in what the hon. member for Charlevoix said, and no doubt it would be taken into consideration. The hon. gentleman, he supposed, did not object to a reasonable knowledge of English. That would be admitted to be a necessity.

Mr. BABY said there was a great difference between asking a candidate to know the English language, and to know it so perfectly that he would require to have so many marks at an examination and not less. It was very well to say, "we will have English officers;" but the French Canadians should have leaders in whom they had confidence, and there were none who would be likely to lead them so successfully as their own countrymen. He hoped the Minister of Militia would not exact a more thorough knowledge of English than would enable the candidates to understand their instructors.

Hon. Mr. VAIL said the matter would be taken into consideration, and although a great deal of attention had been given to the subject, it was quite possible they might be able to make a change in the direction suggested, before the next examination.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said it was evident the conditions of admission were too rigid, and it was a question whether they should not be modified in some respects. The very fact that only twelve persons had applied for admission to the institution, indicated that the difficulties to be encountered were too great.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said it was now too late to consider whether or not it was expedient to establish the Military College. Both parties in this House were committed to it and had voted for the Bill establishing it. It could not be denied, but that there was an impression that it was in advance of the times. He, however, believed that it had every prospect of success. The professors had been well chosen, and were well qualified for their positions. The only rock of danger ahead was the want of students, and that must be avoided by holding out greater inducements to young men to enter the College. What was offered by the present regulations to the best student after finishing his course of instruction was a sword, to the next best to antedate his commission in the Militia one year. This was altogether inadequate. Parents would not send their sons to spend four of the best years of their life—from 16 to 20—in a college where they were not specially trained for any profession or occupation that would enable them to earn their fortunes in this country. The Government should offer them some inducements. The staff should be selected from the first students of the college, and the scientific men required on the great public works likely to go on for years to come should receive their education there. He offered these suggestions with a desire to aid the college, and he hoped they would be considered by the Government.

Mr. WRIGHT (Pontiac) said the Government had removed the highest prize in the service—the position of Major-General—from the reach of Canadians. He had no fault to find with the gentleman who now filled the position, but what he did object to was, that nobody could aspire to the position who had not attained a certain rank in the regular service of the Empire. It was a practical exclusion of Canadians from the position. With reference to the suggestion of the hon. member for Frontenac, that parents should be offered greater inducements to send their sons to the college, he (Mr. Wright) thought the country was doing enough in giving them such an excellent education.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN stated that the Minister of Militia and Defence would see at once that the regulations were framed without any regard whatever to the interests of the French population, and in such a way as to lead to the supposition that the race did not exist in the country. He did not say that this was intentional, but it was the result. Successful candidates were obliged to be able to write English correctly and in a legible hand; if French replaced English he wondered how many English-speaking young men could pass this test; probably not one out of a hundred. Then they should be capable of writing an essay, exercise, or letter in English; this was not fair to French-speaking youths. He did not like to speak of these distinctions of nationality, he never did; but both populations were on an equal footing, and this college was intended to supply training for our young men generally. These regulations would, in fact, exclude French Canadians from the college. He asked whether out of the six or eight candidates who had presented themselves there was one a member of this nationality. French and German, under clause 13, were to be considered as alternative subjects, and proficiency in either was sufficient; and if this was so arranged as to permit the writing of translations and essays in French, a knowledge of English or German otherwise being optional, it would be satisfactory. The officers who commanded the French Canadian militia should speak their language; and they all knew that effective service could not be expected if the men had no confidence in or sympathy with those who commanded them. He hoped that the regulations would be changed to meet these suggestions; they were also too stringent—more so even than those prescribed in connection with the liberal professions.

Mr. IRVING had understood the Minister of Militia and Defence to concede the propriety of the remarks of the hon. member for Charlevoix. Nothing would be more gratifying to the English-speaking population of the Dominion at large than to hear that their fellow-subjects of Quebec could enter the College at no disadvantage whatever compared with themselves. He did not think that the standard of examination should be lowered; it should equal those required of boys who sought to pass from the High Schools of the Provinces generally into the Universities. He wished to draw the attention of the hon. and, he would add, accomplished member for Charlevoix to the fact, that the student who stood highest on the list, and who had outstripped his competitors almost in the proportion of 2½ to 1, was a young gentleman from the Province of Quebec, educated in the City of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. VAIL replied that he would take a note of the suggestions made and would consider the subject more fully, if that were in his power. The examinations, when they next took place, would be less rigorous; but they desired to keep them at as high a standard as possible. The hon. member for Frontenac wished them to make promises and offer inducements to these students, but it was to be remembered in this relation that we did not have a standing army. The object was to give as good an education as could be obtained in ordinary colleges at five times the expense and he was sure that the institution would be a great advantage to the country. It would besides be dangerous to make promises, which a future Government, if there was a change, might refuse to honour.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER remarked that the hon. member for Frontenac had brought forward a very important question. It was not to be forgotten that we were attempting to establish something like another West Point in Canada, and the latter had been extremely successful, not alone because it furnished students with a first-class education, but also because they had an army in which the young men could secure situations. We, however, had no standing army, and he hoped that it would be very long before this would become necessary. The College, to be a success, must attract young men of character and standing, and of talent. For many years to come this country would have extensive public works in progress, and the preference might be given by the Government in bestowing employment to engineers who had passed through this institution; while a similar system might be adopted in connection with the Civil Service. There was an additional reason—the ulterior object of the administration should be, to put it in their power when any emergency arose, to lay hands on trained and skilled officers for the defence of the country.

If these young men after being educated in this Military College had no inducements held out to them to remain in the country, they might be attracted over to the neighboring republic, and their skill would not only be lost to the Dominion Government, but in certain contingencies it might be turned against us. Measures should be taken to keep these young men in the public service, so that their services might at any moment be available to the country.

The item passed and the Committee rose, reported progress and asked leave to sit again.

VETERANS OF 1812-14.

On concurrence, on item $50,000 to meet the probable amount required for pensions to veterans of the war of 1812,

Mr. MASSON said some of the veterans were not paid last year because the vote was exhausted; he wished to know if the vote of this year provided for the payment of such arrears, or if in the meantime a veteran who was unpaid had died, could his family receive the amount.

Hon. Mr. VAIL said it would be impossible to make a payment under the circumstances, as the man might leave a wife and children, and it could not be decided who was entitled to receive the money. In the first place the Department had advertised in every direction to give every veteran a chance to prove his claim. A large number did prove their claims and others did not, and an advertisement was published in the papers to the effect that all claims that were not proved on or before the 14th or 15th November could not participate in the pension of that year. After the expiration of the term indicated the $50,000 were divided amongst the veterans to the number of 2,500, giving them $20 each. Every man who proved his claim was paid, and if others were not it was their own fault, as they had been given sufficient opportunity to do so.

Mr. GORDON said the method of paying the veterans last year at the centres rather acted to their disadvantage; last year some of those paid at Toronto came from Napanee. The consequence was that a large portion of their $20 went in travelling expenses.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT thought there was some mistake in this; the veterans from his own knowledge were paid at the chief places in each county in Canada, and he believed in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

Hon. Mr. VAIL would be glad if when the members returned to their constituents if they would furnish him with any information they could obtain with regard to the old veterans.

Mr. BOWELL asked whether there was any date as to which the distribution of the money should be made, and whether the Government intended to adhere to the sum of $20 as the gratuity to be paid to the veterans, or whether the same vote would be distributed among those living at the time of the distribution.

Hon. Mr. VAIL said the money would be payable after 1st July. If the party died between that time and the receipt of the money, he did not think the Government would enquire as to who obtained the money. He did not think out of the present grant he could promise to pay more than $20, but he was not prepared to say what the Government would do in the future.

THE DAWSON ROUTE.

On item 98, $75,000 for Lake Superior and Red River route,

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said he understood the policy of the Government was practically to abandon this route.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said even for the use of contractors where work on the railroad was going on, this route would be valuable.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN regretted that this route was not to be maintained for general communication between the east and west. The result of this new policy of the Government would be to throw our traffic into the hands of the Americans, and to subject our emigrants to the North-West to the temptations of the United States agents who might wish to induce them to settle in Minnesota. We should not be dependent upon the neighbouring country for means of communication with Manitoba.

Mr. MILLS did not at all concur in the opinion of the hon. member for Charlevoix. The route had been kept open for a very long time at a heavy expense, and very few passengers had availed themselves of it. People could not be induced to forsake the all rail route for such a road as that. Even though it were maintained at a great outlay, as under the old regime, nine-tenths of the emigrants to the North-West would go by Duluth. The temptation to settle in the North Western States had been over-rated. No difficulty of that kind had been found to arise from a portion of the route of the Grand Trunk lying in Maine. Our people did not interfere with United States emigrants who passed through the western section of Ontario, and no sensible American would think it at all unpatriotic to travel on the north shore instead of the south side of Lake Erie. The idea was preposterous, and Manitoba would be likely to suffer more from the Government undertaking to send emigrants over the Dawson route than from all the temptations to which they might be subjected by American agents. He had conversed with persons who had travelled over the Dawson route, and they said when they reached Manitoba there was not an article of clothing in their trunks that was not rotten.

The sending out of such reports by persons who had gone over the road would lose to Manitoba ten immigrants to the one that would be lost by American influence in going through American territory. He thought there was very little danger from any such influence, for when a man left his home in Europe to go to Manitoba, where possibly some of his relations had gone before him, he was not likely to be influenced to stop at any intermediate station as long as he had a comfortable journey, and he would not care much whether it was through American or Canadian territory he was travelling to his destination. He thought it was only a waste of money to keep such a road open to show our loyalty and inconvenience travellers.

Mr. McCALLUM said if this proved anything it was the death blow of the Premier's water stretches policy, and that we should have a through rail route to Manitoba in Canadian territory.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said the position which he took was this: that if the road was to be abandoned the expense should also be abandoned, and the $25,000 wiped out of the estimates.

Mr. MASSON said the remarks of the hon. member for Bothwell were a direct attack on the Minister of Public Works, as that hon. gentleman had advocated the keeping open of the Dawson Route to prevent immigrants to the North-West from being subjected to American influence by going over their roads. It was for the same reason the Government adopted their railway policy, in order to have the route through our own territory opened up as rapidly as possible. The hon. Minister of Agriculture had stated in the Senate:

"That the Government was now in communication with the steamboat companies to obtain the lowest price at which immigrants could be carried to Prince Arthur's Landing or Duluth. Precautions would be taken to prevent combinations of American railway companies from taking advantage of, or imposing upon our immigrants passing over their lines. The Dawson route would be kept open and a regular mail service would be established, so that if any attempts were made to put up the prices on American lines the immigrants could still avail themselves of that route."

This was a proof that the Hon. Minister of Public Works was not in accord with his colleagues in the other House.

Mr. SPEAKER called the hon. gentleman to order, as it was against the rules to refer to what had been said by an hon. gentleman in the other chamber.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said reference could be made to speeches made in the other House, by avoiding saying that a member of the Senate had made the statement in the Senate.

Mr. SPEAKER said he knew there were Parliamentary modes of avoiding Parliamentary rules.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said there was no discrepancy between the statements of the members of the Government in this matter. They deemed it expedient to keep the route open and have a weekly mail service established across it. The House would observe there was good reason for this policy of maintaining communication with the North-West through our own territory, for the purpose of sending over troops or emigrants if necessary. The cost of the road in 1872 had been $165,000, next year $198,000, the year following $120,000, and the year after that $100,000. They now had parties employed at the two ends in repairing the road, and they thought that $25,000 would be sufficient for the Dawson route this year.

Mr. SCHULTZ said that he had not had an opportunity of discussing this item in Committee, he would have called attention to the item of $25,000 for the Red River bridge, which had been dropped from the estimate immediately preceding it. He had hoped till he heard the explanation of the Minister of Finance, that perhaps this vote related to it, for it would be remembered in connection with this Red River bridge that under the late Administration, $50,000 had been voted for it, and that soundings had been taken in the Red River with a view to its expenditure as a part of the Dawson road. This amount had been revoted once; then it was cut down to $25,000 and its connection with the Dawson road denied, and now it was taken out of the estimates altogether. He felt that the Province, and particularly the city of Winnipeg, had been badly used in the matter. It would be remembered that last winter a deputation waited upon the Premier, and in urging the propriety of the Pembina Branch crossing at Winnipeg, made on behalf of the city of Winnipeg the extremely liberal offer of one-half of the cost of a railway bridge. In effect the Premier replied that if the line was found to be no longer, or not inconsiderably longer he would be disposed to meet their views and promised to have a survey made. This survey he (Mr. Schultz) believed had been made, but no reports had been made to the House, no answer given to the Council of the city of Winnipeg, and the first indication of the action of the Government is the cancelling of the amount voted in the Estimates of last year. He contended that this was not acting in good faith, nor even in courtesy to Winnipeg, that the line was scarcely any longer with a crossing there, and that it was in every way the best route to take; and would urge strongly that an amount sufficient for one half of a railway bridge be put in the supplementary estimates, or if that could not be done that there should be at least a revote of the $25,000.

In the matter of the Dawson route itself, he believed the vote would not be sufficient to put the road in repair, and that the contract to Carpenter & Co. must now be conceded to have been an utter failure. Out of 5,000 immigrants last year only 38 came by that route, and it could easily be accounted for by the treatment which immigrants received and were likely to receive from parties, whose interest it was not to carry, rather than to carry the immigrants. It was urged that the stipulated rates for freight at $2 per hundred made with the contractors served to keep down the rate by other routes, but this was not the case to any great extent. Returns just brought down showed that while the rate over the Dawson route was $40 per ton they had without allowing other lines to tender, contracted with Kitson line for the transportation of 5,000 tons of rail from Duluth to Fort Garry at $15 per ton, while at the same time by the Merchants line on the Red River other parties were importing heavy freight the same distance for $10 per ton, thus showing that $25,000 of public money had been uselessly spent by the failure of the Government to put this large contract up to competition. Notwithstanding the large cost of the Dawson route under the old Administration, the services it rendered must not be forgotten, and apart from those he had mentioned on former occasions, the settlements on the Rainy Lake River, and elsewhere along its line must be placed to its credit. He trusted the matter of the bridge at Winnipeg would receive consideration, and good faith be kept with the people of Winnipeg.

Mr. PLUMB observed that the argument of the hon. gentleman from Bothwell had been quite unfair; the immigrants should pass through and remain in our own territory. There was immense competition in the States to secure the sale of cheap lands. Immigrants were subject to every kind of influence in this connection. Representations were made to them at every turn and corner, and every inducement held out to them to remain in the United States. The First Minister had acknowledged that this road was completely impracticable as it stood; if this $25,000 was intended to make the route available for the purposes for which it was originally intended, it was too little, and if simply to provide for the transport of the mails too much, the vote being about $1,000 a week during the open season. If the Government desired to keep the route open during four, five, or six months, when the magnificent water stretches in this region were not ice stretches, the appropriation was altogether too limited.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD explained that he had passed over this route during the season, when the hon member for Terrebonne went to Manitoba. A large number of Mennonites had gone over it at the same time, and as far as he could see, they were kindly and well treated. He saw no inducements held out to prevail upon them to settle in American territory; at all events, it was without success, because every one of them went to their destination. Had the Government spent $500,000 a year to keep this road open, following the example of the late Administration, he did not believe that the immigrants would have passed over it to any great extent, nor would this be the case until we possessed through-rail communication with the North-West. The railway would be built as soon as possible, and this was the intention of the Government. As to the lines of steamers running on Red River, the opposition line was only started last year, and then he also understood late in the season, and one of its boats had sunk. It was the interest of the Government to see as much competition as possible, but every company could not expect to be encouraged in the manner mentioned. It was simply absurd to talk of shipping steel rails over this route, and in this relation he could not but think that the hon. member for Lisgar had been perpetrating a huge joke. He did not consider the road at present was in a worse condition than when the late Government left office.

Mr. TROW thought that when the hon. member for Lisgar said that passengers were sent by way of Duluth, by the contractors of the Dawson Route, he had been drawing on his imagination. He had made a trip in that direction last year, and he was satisfied that passengers would not, under present circumstances, pass over the Dawson Route, and they would, moreover, be great fools if they did. They wished to go by the quickest possible route, and with the least possible inconvenience; and to try to induce them to go by this route to Manitoba would be the best means to ensure their settlement in the United States. It was absurd to think of sending steel rails over this road; and in urging this as possible, he was also of opinion that the hon. member for Lisgar did it as a joke.

Mr. SCHULTZ observed in reply that steel rails were not longer than the boats or heavier than articles which had been conveyed over the Dawson Route. As to the charge with regard to the rate of freight, he would venture the statement that the First Minister would not get the rails shipped at the lowest possible rate.

Mr. BOWELL remarked that the question with reference to the returns showing the rate as $10 per ton, while the Government paid $15, had not been answered.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said that had nothing to do with the question under discussion. All questions arising out of that would come up with much more propriety on the Pacific Railway.

The item was concurred in.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The report of the Committee of Supply of the 22nd March was next taken up.

Items 119 to 124, inclusive, were concurred in without debate.

On item 125, winter service of steamer between Prince Edward Island and the Mainland, $15,000, Hon. Mr. TUPPER asked what arrangements had been made for this service.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT thought they would have to undertake it themselves. His impression was that they would have to build a steamer especially adapted for the purpose.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL remarked that there was a report that a contract had been given to a gentleman to construct a steamer for $50,000. Was there any foundation for this statement?

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT could simply say that negotiations were going on with a view of procuring a boat fit for the service, but no arrangements had been made, and the assent of the House would have to be obtained before they could make any such arrangement.

The item was concurred in.

Item 126 and 127 were concurred in without discussion.

On item 128—to provide for the examination of Masters and Mates, $4,250, Hon. Mr. BLANCHET wished to know whether the Government intend to close the School at Quebec.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he believed that was the intention of the Government, the number attending being so very small.

The item was concurred in.

Item 129 was also adopted without discussion.

On item 130, to provide for investigation into wrecks and casualties, and collection of information relating to disasters to shipping, $1000,

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said he knew of but one case into which any enquiry was made into such casualties. Either these investigations should be made or the item should be wiped off.

The item was concurred in, and the remaining items under the same heading were adopted without discussion.

THIRD READING.

Bill to amend the Act 35 Vic., Cap. 108, intituled: "An Act to amend the Act to incorporate the London and Canada Loan & Agency Co. (limited,)" was read the third time and passed.

The House adjourned at 12 o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, April 5, 1876.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

THE INDIAN BILL.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD moved the third reading of the Bill respecting Indians.

The Bill was read the third time and passed.

PACIFIC RAILWAY.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Cartwright, the House went into Committee of Supply.

On item No. 83, appropriating $2,810,000, for Pacific Railway Survey,

Mr. McCALLUM said he was in favour of building a railroad through our own territory, from ocean to ocean, but he was not in favour of pushing the work on so fast as to embarrass the resources of the country. He said he would like to see this money expended on the main line before these branches were undertaken. He objected particularly to the Georgian Bay branch. The Hon. Premier said the other day that the building of the Pacific Railway was an insane scheme, but he (Mr. McCallum) was of opinion that if ever there was an insane undertaking it was the building of the Georgian Bay Branch. The road would be of but little use, as no freight from the North-West would come by this route. It would involve a large expenditure, and be less available than the existing routes, for no vessel coming from Lake Superior with a cargo would go to French River when they could get a better harbour at Collingwood, Southampton, Kincardine, Goderich and Sarnia, and these places are already connected with railways running east. When the Welland Canal was finished large vessels could go down by the lakes to Montreal, and the completion of this canal would revolutionize the carrying trade of our inland waters and of the country. He visited the French River section last summer, and thought it a very inhospitable country. He would advise the Hon. Minister of Public Works, if he sent any employees up there, to enter into a contract to have their bodies cremated, as soil enough to bury a man could not be found in twenty miles square. He wanted to see the main line from Lake Superior proceeded with. He condemned the policy of the Government in proceeding with the construction of the line as a Government work, and said that when the policy was first adopted the Government held that the profits, which would otherwise have gone to the contractors, would under their scheme accrue to the country. They had got the first instalment of these profits in the loss sustained by the steel rails purchase, and they would have the second in the expenditure of a large amount of money unnecessarily in the useless Georgian Bay branch of the Canada Pacific line.

Mr. DEWDNEY complimented the Premier on his clear description of the Surveys that had taken place during the last year on the Canadian Pacific Railroad, especially through the Province of British Columbia. He was sorry that the members of the House had not been put in possession of a synopsis of the work, together with a skeleton map of the different routes, as it would have assisted them to follow the Premier more intelligently.

He was glad to find that the surveys were so far advanced as enabled the Government to state that a favorable line had been obtained and practically located between Fort William, on Lake Superior, and Fort George, on the Frazer River. He had been astonished to hear the exorbitant estimate of the cost of a Pacific Railway given by some hon. gentleman the other evening. He proposed to give what he considered it could be built for. The Minister of Justice had stated that the line between Pembina and Fort Garry could be built for $13,000 per mile. It was well known that 800 miles of the road on the main line between Fort William and the Pacific coast were quite as easy. However, placing it at $16,000 per mile, it would give $12,800,000 for that portion. Then the 800 miles of rolling country could be built at $30,000 per mile, giving $24,000,000 for that portion. The 400 miles of mountain country he estimated at $45,000 per mile.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Is that in British Columbia?

Mr. DEWDNEY said the greater part of it was. This would cost $18,000,000; the total cost of the 2,000 miles from the Pacific to Fort William being $54,800,000 to be faced by the Dominion Government between now and 1890—(Lord Carnarvon's agreement) or about $4,000,000 per annum. Mr. Fleming had estimated the cost of the line from British Columbia to Lake Nipissing at $100,000,000. The section from Fort William to Lake Nipissing, 550 miles, described in Mr. Fleming's report as having only 30 miles of heavy work, he contended might be built for $30,000 per mile or $16,500,000—add to this the estimated cost of the line from Bute Inlet to Esquimalt (which is now abandoned) $27,500,000 and the $54,800,000 estimate from the Pacific to Fort William, would give you a total of $98,800,000. His impression was the road could be built for that money and he would give his reasons for saying so. It was well known the Union and Central Pacific Railways were built for the money raised on the first bonds received from the United States Government. They got $16,000 per mile for the portion west of the Sierra

Mr. DEWDNEY.

Nevadas, $48,000 per mile for the mountain district, and $32,000 per mile for the section east of the Sierra Nevada. The men who built that line were now all millionaires. When they commenced the undertaking they had great difficulty to raise $20,000 to lobby their charter through Congress. The work was now a commercial success. Three years ago it paid six per cent. on the amount it cost, and the traffic was increasing wonderfully. On the Union Pacific it had increased last year $1,275,000, and on the Central Pacific in ten months $2,259,000 making a total for the two of $3,534,000. The same parties who had built the American road had made an offer to build a line on the 32nd parallel for 12,800 acres of land. The experience they have gained on the northern route no doubt induced them to make that offer. He would now ask the attention of the Minister of Public works to the routes in British Columbia. Two years ago, at his (Mr. Dewdney's) request, the Premier had consented to have a survey of the Frazer River route made. During the summer instructions were forwarded to the engineer to carry on that survey, but, unfortunately it was delayed, and all that was done that year was to locate sixteen miles. The same year a party made a trial line from Yale to Burrard Inlet, but it was not in connection with the Frazer River line. The distance from Tête Jaune Cache to Burrard Inlet was 466 miles, and of this the Government could have information respecting only the sixteen miles located by Mr. Cambie in 1873 or '74. These were the sixteen miles which the Premier had spoken of as a fair average of work on the Frazer route. So far from that being the case, it was the most difficult on the Cascade range section. If the line had been run twenty miles further, it would have taken them out of the most difficult portion of the canon, and up the country was much more favorable. He therefore urged the Premier to continue the survey of that route. The only way to reach the northern seaboard of British Columbia was by building round the big bend of the Frazer, but the banks of the river are flooded at high water and a line would have to be forced back to the mountains and very heavy land slides would have to be contended with. There was nothing equal to it in the lower country.

Then as to distance, it was 466 miles from Tête Jaune Cache to Burrard Inlet, while the distance between Tête Jaune Cache and Bute Inlet was 546 miles. The grades on the Frazer River averaged but eight feet per mile, while on the Homethca River they were 104 feet to the mile. The line from Tête Jaune Cache to Kamloops—216 miles—was of a very easy description, while on the route from Tête Jaune Cache to Fort George it would be found much heavier than the Government had anticipated. The distance for which there would be heavy work on the Frazer River route would be about 80 miles; on the Bute Inlet route about the same, probably a little less, but the advantage in favour of the former was that it terminated at a harbour unequalled in British Columbia, whereas there was bad anchorage at the harbour of Bute Inlet, the proposed terminus. Navigation from the Southern part of Vancouver Island to Burrard Inlet, was excellent. Of this he would give an illustration. A ship called The Nation's Hope sailed from Australia to this inlet by the chart, entering without a pilot on board. It carried an order for lumber at Moody's Mills, and when the captain asked where he should anchor, the answer was "anywhere." This harbour was two or three miles in width, and ten or fifteen miles in length. It was approachable at any time, and far superior to Bute Inlet. Last year Admiral Cochrane made a trip to Bute Inlet in a small gunboat, admirably suited for this purpose, in company of Lieutenant Governor Trutch, and on his way the former remarked that if Bute Inlet became the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway it would be impossible for the eastern trade to pass by it, as accommodation for steamers 300 or 400 feet in length should exist, and it was difficult for that small boat to make the passage. The day was foggy, and they were compelled to pass from one side of the Island to the other. He had mentioned this matter to the Minister of Marine as soon as he had arrived at British Columbia, and he had advised the hon. gentleman to communicate with the Admiral regarding this matter. Another point in favour of this route was that the land in this vicinity was equal to the most magnificent in the world. The delta of the Frazer River was situated within a few miles of the Inlet. He had made estimates for a California Company, which had proposed to purchase and reclaim a certain number of acres. These were tide lands and comprised 1,500,000 acres. The Premier had admitted that for 70 miles near Bute Inlet the land was not sufficient for their purposes, but the hon. gentleman had not stated that after the 70 miles they reached a plateau where the water froze in July, and where it was impossible to raise anything to assist in supporting settlements. Another matter in favour of the route he advocated was to be considered—the distance was shorter by 82 miles than the Bute Inlet route, and 34 miles shorter than the Dean Channel route, and the expense would be considerably lessened if it was chosen.

He would read what the Minister of Public Works said last year with reference to these Northern routes:—

"Several passes through the Cascade Chain, from Dean and Gardner's Inlet, have also been explored; but no route entirely favourable for the railway has yet been reported. But even if it had been found favourable, any route so far north as this is open to the serious objection that it would reach the Pacific from fifty to sixty miles north of the northern extremity of Vancouver Island; it would be entirely beyond the present populated portion of the country which is further to the south; and it would be so situated that we could scarcely hope to compete for certain branches of the trans-continental trade which a more southerly line would secure.

Besides the shortness of route, he must draw the Minister's attention to the cost of operating these long lines for all time. He trusted that the hon. gentleman would consider what he said, and order further surveys to be made. When he brought up this question two years ago, he had made a statement which he would repeat:—"A railway terminating at Burrard Inlet could, without difficulty, connect with the lines running through Washington and Oregon territories, but this would be impossible if the terminus was fixed north of that Inlet."

He would now refer to the British Columbia question generally. He deeply regretted the step taken by the hon. gentleman from Victoria last week, and he thought that this hon. gentleman's resolution deserved its fate. Several hon. members during the debate had complained that the British Columbian members spoke very frequently on the floor of the House. Many remarks had been made in this relation which were uncalled for and not calculated to bring about such a feeling as should exist between their Province and the rest of the Dominion. He did not think that they took up a great deal of the time, and as regarded the hon. member for Vancouver, he did not see why that hon. gentleman should not speak when he felt inclined. Again, they had only one Bunster, while the hon. gentlemen opposite had many Busters. British Columbia had also been greatly misrepresented in the Press of the Dominion. A short time since, a letter full of the vilest misrepresentations and falsehoods in this regard appeared in the Globe. A gentleman well acquainted with the Province refuted these false statements, but the Globe nevertheless, in reply, went out of its way to abuse still further this Province. A great deal could be said on both sides touching the British Columbia question. One thing was certain—the Province had a certain amount of right on its side. A contract had been made and broken, though British Columbia had faithfully carried out her part of the agreement. He had examined the matter carefully, and he could not perceive where either the present or late Government had intentionally wronged the Province. The magnitude of the engineering difficulties encountered—which were greater than were anticipated—was the real cause of the troubles that had taken place. It was well known when the contract scheme of the late Administration failed, that it would be impossible to carry out the terms of the union. About that time the Reform party came into power, a party who from the first, although as far as he recollected never opposed the admission of British Columbia in the Union, or the construction of the Pacific Railway, took very strong grounds in opposing the time limit for the completion of that Railway. They fought that through every stage and at every opportunity, and it had been stated by a member of the present Government and not contradicted by any member of the late Government that the 10 years limit clause could not have been assented to by the House without a promise that a resolution should simultaneously be passed stating :

"The aid to be given to secure the undertaking should consist of such liberal grants of land and money not unduly pressing on the resources of the Dominion as the Parliament of Canada shall hereafter determine."

He also found in the last minute of Council of March 13th, of the Dominion Government, in answer to one of January 4th from British Columbia:—

"The Committee would observe that the resolution in question was passed within a few days of the time at which the terms of Union were assented to by the House of Commons; that it was well known that in order to secure the consent of a majority of the House to these ruinous terms, the Government of that day were obliged to promise to their supporters the introduction of such a resolution; and that the then delegate, now the Lieutenant-Governor of British Columbia, was present and aware of, and doubtless an assenting party to the arrangement."

He had heard both members from Victoria say that they had the authority of Lieutenant-Governor Trutch for the statement that he (Mr. Trutch) had never been in a position to give his consent to this resolution.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I understood the hon. member for Cumberland to say, the other evening, that Lieut. Trutch was a consenting party to that resolution. I may, however, have misunderstood the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Dr. TUPPER—And more than that; I quoted from the speech of the hon. gentleman himself, giving evidence that Mr. Trutch was a consenting party, and that he cordially assented to it in public after the resolution had passed.

Mr. DEWDNEY replied that Mr. Trutch had assured him more than once that in the speech to which reference was made, he (Mr. Trutch) expressed the feeling concerning this resolution which he still entertained. The hon. member for North York had not the full text of the speech in his hand when he referred to it the other night. The House must remember that that was the only opportunity Mr Trutch had to give public expression to his opinion with regard to the terms. At a dinner given to him in Ottawa on the 16th of April, in referring generally to this question, Mr. Trutch said:—

"Now, Sir, I speak with special care, as I desire that full weight should be given to every word I utter on this point."

This statement was meant to go to British Columbia as his interpretation of the resolution. He continued:—

"That is to say, as to the understanding which I had when this clause was framed, and still have, of the intention of this engagement by the Dominion to construct the Canadian Pacific Railway within ten years. When we came to you in June last, we proposed that you should at once build a coach-road from Fort Garry to the Pacific, and within three years begin a railway, and we sought to bind you to spend $1,000,000 annually on the section of this railroad in British Columbia, and complete its construction with the utmost possible despatch. We fully understood then that when once the road was commenced, it must be urged to its completion as a matter of course, as a business necessity, and that instead of $1,000,000 being spent, probably $5,000,000 would be yearly expended in British Columbia. We knew, in fact, that if the road were to be completed at all it would have to be proceeded with at a far faster rate than $1,000,000 a year would insure. But there were those in British Columbia who thought that Canada would not undertake the work at all, and it was to satisfy their doubts—to secure their adhesion to the scheme that the guarantee of the expenditure of the $1,000,000 annually was asked. The Government in the conference with our delegation, at once expressed their readiness to commence at once the railroad to the Pacific and to complete it as soon as it was practicable to do so, but the coach-road was objected to as an unnecessary expense, in view of the immediate construction of the railroad. We from British Columbia were pressed to accept the amendment of the scheme, and we accordingly proceeded to calculate the time it would probably take to build the railroad, and we agreed upon an estimated period of ten years. If it had been put at twelve or fifteen years, British Columbia would have been just as well satisfied, and if the estimated period had been reduced to eight years she would scarcely have been better pleased. But some definite period for the completion of this work the British Columbians required, as a necessary safeguard to our colony in entering into the proposed union. To argue that any other interpretation will be placed upon this railway engagement by British Columbia than that which I have given to you as my construction of it; to argue that she expects it to be carried out in the exact interpretation of the words themselves, regardless of all consequences, is a fallacy which cannot bear the test of common sense. [Hear, hear.] The case stands thus:—British Columbia is about to enter a partnership with Canada, and one of the terms of the articles of partnership is that we are, under the partnership, to construct a railway under certain conditions. Is British Columbia going to hold her partner to that which will bring ruin and bankruptcy upon the firm? Surely you would think us fools indeed if we adopted such a course. I would protest, and the whole of British Columbia would protest if the Government proposed to borrow $100,000,000 or $150,000,000 to construct this road (hear, hear), running the country into debt and taxing the people of British Columbia, as well as the rest of the Dominion, to pay the burden of such a debt. Why, sir, I heard it said the other evening that British Columbia had made a most Jewish bargain with you in these terms, but even Shylock himself would not exact his pound of flesh if a portion of it had to be cut from his own body. (Loud cheers and laughter.) I am sure you will find that British Columbia is a pretty intelligent community, which will be apt to take a business view of this matter; she will expect that this railway shall be commenced in two years, for this is clearly practicable, and she will also expect that the financial ability of the Dominion will be exerted to its utmost, within the limits of reason, to complete it in the time named in the agreement; but you may rest assured that she will not regard this railway engagement as a 'cast-iron contract,' as it has been called, or desire that it should be carried out in any other way than as will secure the prosperity of the whole Dominion of which she is to be a part. (Cheers.) I have understood this railway engagement in this way from the first, and I still so understand it. I believed when we negotiated this clause in the terms of union last year, and I now believe, that it is not only practicable for this road to be built by a liberal land grant and moderate money subsidy, but that it will be so built and completed within the estimated period of ten years. But if a mistake has been made in this estimate, do not think that British Columbia is going to put a strained interpretation upon it to her own material injury; that she is likely, as the saying is, to bite her own nose off to spite her face."

That was what he (Mr. Dewdney) considered a fair interpretation of that resolution, and as it ought to be considered by British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Did I understand the hon. gentleman to state a little while ago that he was authorized by Mr. Trutch to deny that this was his opinion?

Mr. DEWDNEY—Oh, no; on the contrary, I stated that in conversation with the Governor he said:—"These "are my opinions still in regard to the time limit—that the work should be carried on so as not to be detrimental to the whole Dominion."

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Then another hon. member for British Columbia—I am not sure which—said he was so authorized.

Mr. DEWDNEY—I think the hon. member for Victoria stated that he was authorized to say that the Governor was never in a position to agree to this resolution. He (Mr. Dewdney) had been attacked in British Columbia for attaching too much importance to the resolution, being told that as it was not in the terms it could not affect the Province. He thought the resolution was a very proper one, and he had, moreover, taken every opportunity to explain to his constituents that it was in existence. He was rather surprised to hear the member for Victoria state that he was not aware of its existence until he became a member of this House, and that quite a number in the city of Victoria were in exactly the same position. When the Minute of September the 20th reached that city, his little pamphlet was distributed, and many persons told him that it was the first time they had heard of the resolution. All that a great portion of the people of the Province knew was that an agreement had been made to commence a railway in two years, and to finish it in ten. They did not look beyond that; they did not consider the political difficulties or the difficulties brought about by the failure of the Allan scheme, nor take into consideration, as they should have done, the financial aspects of the case. One section of the country endeavoured to force the Government by every means in their power to commence the railroad on Vancouver Island, believing it to be part and parcel of the Pacific Railway; another party knowing that a severe blow would have been dealt to them had that policy been adopted, opposed it.

Had it not been for this sectional feeling, he believed the people of British Columbia would have held, as the majority do to-day, that until the engineers were in a position to recommend a line it would be impossible to commence the work of construction.

Mr. DEWDNEY.

The first protest that came from British Columbia was as soon as the two years were up, and the Local Government did (what he believed was their duty) put on record a protest against the non-fulfilment of that part of the agreement, but when they went further and endeavoured to force the Dominion Government to commence work before the surveys were completed, they acted, to say the least, with very poor judgment, and not in the interest of the Dominion or of the Province. The House would remember the continual protests that were made, and eventually, to satisfy the people of the Province, a gentleman was sent from Ottawa, whose advent he looked upon as an earnest that the Federal Government wanted to come to an understanding, and to stop the continual insinuations that they were endeavouring to break faith with a weak Province, when everybody acquainted with the facts knew that the fulfilment of the terms was really impossible. It had been stated that Mr. Edgar went to British Columbia without credentials. He distinctly denied that. When their Premier went to London to negotiate with Lord Carnarvon, they never heard of Mr. Edgar's want of credentials. The day that gentleman arrived in the Province, he was waited upon by the Premier, to whom he showed a letter from the Hon. First Minister, and stated he had letters from His Excellency the Governor-General to the Lieutenant-Governor. He also produced a letter from the Hon. First Minister to the Lieutenant-Governor. Mr. Walkem felt at that time that in case an offer was made (in case there was any alteration of the terms) they would have to go to the country. With that knowledge, he told Mr. Edgar that there were reasons why he should not deliver the letter to the Lieutenant-Governor. And while that interview lasted, he explained to Mr. Edgar that there were reasons for not delivering Mr. Mackenzie's letter to Mr. Trutch. He stated that an unfriendly feeling existed on the part of the Governor to Mr. Mackenzie, and contended that he was the proper party to be consulted in the matter. About that time Mr. Walkem, in his public utterances, had claimed to be friendly with the Dominión Government, and no doubt Mr. Edgar thought it was immaterial whether the letter was delivered; that he had other documents which explained his mission, and consequently he did not deliver it.

For two months Mr. Walkem negotiated with Mr. Edgar, and the latter's authority was never questioned, but when a definite proposition was made, he turned round and said:—"Where are your credentials?" This difficulty was the cause of considerable correspondence, and it ended very properly, he thought, in Mr. Edgar being recalled. It might be said that it was not his place to show up the delinquencies of his Province, but when he saw the people of British Columbia attacked and called unreasonable, it was time that the blame should be put on the shoulders of the parties deserving it. Next came the appeal to England, which he believed was made contrary to the wishes of the majority of the people of British Columbia. At that time there had been formed at Victoria what is known as the "Terms of Union League." By paying $2.50 one could become a member and be enabled to vote. When this question of appeal to England was brought up, Mr. Walkem was looking to the League for support. A meeting of the League was called, and after considerable discussion, the matter was deferred until the members for British Columbia returned. He thought the majority of these members urged the Government not to send the petition to England, and he himself expressed the opinion that they would be acting contrary to their own interests, and that they would never see a line on Vancouver Island if they did petition the Queen. He thought it looked now as if his prognostication was about to be fulfilled. At the time this question was brought up before the League, the meeting was packed by the union supporters of Mr. Walkem and a vote was carried favouring the appeal. That was the only support that British Columbia gave to that transaction that he was aware of. With regard to the adverse vote given in the Senate to the Bill, by means of which it was intended to give effect to the promise made to Lord Carnarvon, both parties in the House shirked the responsibility of the defeat of the Bill. The Government laid the responsibility on the Conservative majority, and the Conservatives said that if it had not been for two or three Government supporters the Bill would have been carried. He, however, was not desirous of shirking any responsibility in the matter. He objected to the road because he considered it a part and parcel of the Bute Inlet road. That road would not have been in favour of his constituents, and would never have paid expenses. After the defeat of the Bill, nothing further was made public in British Columbia until the publication of the Minute of Council of September the 20th. That Minute was at any rate capable of two interpretations, and he objected to the action of the Local Government in reference to it, because it placed on it an interpretation he did not think it capable of bearing, namely that the Government intended repudiation. They stated "that an indemnity, however, to the amount of $750,000, the cost of about twenty miles of railway, has been offered to British Columbia for any future delays which may occur in the construction of the railway, and that this sum will, subject to the assent of Parliament, be paid as a cash bonus to the Province, if the agreements for yearly railway expenditures and for completion of the railway to Lake Superior by 1890 be surrendered by the Province." That he regarded as a forced interpretation of the Minute. They also said "that by reason of the repeated violations by Canada of its railway engagements with this Province, all classes of our population have suffered loss; provident anticipations, based upon these engagements, have resulted in unexpected and undeserved failure, and in disappointment of a grave and damaging character; distrust had been created where trust and confidence should have been inspired; trade and commerce had been mischievously unsettled and disturbed." Now, he contended that was not the case. The hon. member for Victoria had spoken of the Province being exceptionally prosperous this year; that their revenues had increased, and that they were the most prosperous Province in Canada, and the Local Government were wrong when they made that statement. They also said "that with respect to the proposed active prosecution of the surveys, your petitioners have no authoritative information upon which a correct opinion can be based." Now, there was not a gentleman in that Ministry who did not know the exact number of men there were making surveys that year. There were eight surveying parties out, consisting probably of 240 men; therefore he thought that statement was altogether unreasonable. The Minute in Council and the memorial were both drawn up by the Walkem Government. The agitation which had been created by Mr. Walkem and his friends forced his successor in office not only to forward the memorial but to use every exertion to obtain the construction of the Vancouver Railway, and he (Mr. Dewdney) had no doubt that he would use his best endeavors to do so. He thought several mistakes had been committed with regard to their Province. The first mistake was with regard to the terminus selected by Order in Council by the late Government, and the second was that Mr. Edgar was sent to British Columbia and authorized to make propositions for the construction of that piece of road. By his doing so the Government admitted that British Columbia was entitled to some compensation. He did not think she had any right to expect any compensation; all they would ask was that the work should be proceeded with as rapidly as possible consistently with the interests of the Dominion. As the right of British Columbia's receiving compensation had been admitted, he trusted that as soon as a communication had been received from Lord Carnarvon, who could not but see the memorial to Her Majesty was framed on a false basis, an amicable arrangement might be arrived at; and he hoped the Local Government of his Province would be relieved from the financial difficulties left them as a legacy by their late improvident predecessors. He still entertained the same feeling of attachment to his first political love—the late Administration—and he believed he would continue to do so; but with regard to this railway matter, as long as he found the Government were endeavouring to use every exertion to carry out their engagements, he would only be too happy to give them his assistance in this House, and also in the Province from which he came. He was in hopes that the surveys were so far advanced that a portion of the road might have been proceeded with. He thought there was a portion of the contract which might be proceeded with, and he thought if this were done it would go a great way towards quieting the agitation that had been threatened in British Columbia.

Mr. MASSON regretted that this question should have come up at so late a period in the Session, when every member in the House was desirous of leaving. He deprecated the attack made by the Premier, not only on the preceding Government, but on those who voted with that Government. He was one of that solid phalanx which had voted for the late Government's policy in reference to the annexation of British Columbia, and he desired to give to the House some of the reasons why they voted for that policy. When the terms of union were first submitted in this House, the Dominion had just acquired an enormous territory in the North-West, and it was well understood that it could only be peopled by building a railway to connect with it. Consequently, when the British Columbia resolutions were submitted, the Dominion was morally pledged to build a railway to the North-West. We had acquired half a continent, and we proposed to settle it as our neighbours peopled their vast country—by running railroads in advance of population. The day for carrying emigrants by a train of carts had passed, and a railroad was now requisite to settle a country. That was why the majority from Quebec approved of the construction of the railway. The scheme of the old Government was a wise one. There are two ways to build railroads:—In a small but wealthy and populous country, by money; in a vast but comparatively poor and thinly-settled country like ours, by giving lands. The late Government proposed to build our Pacific Railway principally with the lands in the North-West; and if the Hon. Premier considered they were not worth enough to build the road, why did he join hands with the right hon. member for Kingston for the annexation of the North-West Territories. An effort had been made to discredit the idea of the late Government of putting a price of $2.50 an acre on the land in the vicinity of the railway, in order to give value to the land grant given to the company in aid of construction. He did not see that the intending emigrant could complain of such a condition; and if the hon. Premier would ask the tax-payers of the old provinces if they would object paying $2.50 an acre for land, provided they had a railway, he would soon convince himself that the former plan was a just one, both to the settlers and the inhabitants of the older Provinces. Everybody knew that no difficulty was found in getting companies to undertake the work; in fact, the only difficulty arose from the rivalry of two parties of capitalists who wished to get possession of the contract. Sir George Cartier had remarked to the people of Quebec that it would not do to merely build up a nation in the great North-West, but we must create it for Canada. If we must spend our wealth on it, it was not to contribute to the trade and greatness of the United States. The Conservative Party thought it would be suicidal to build the railway if they did not run it on the north shore of Lake Superior. To create a nation in the North-West and have it dependent on the United States would be to lead to the belief that its interests were identical with theirs and not with ours. The ultimate result of such a sentiment would be separation from the Dominion. There was another reason why it was desirable the route should pass north of Lake Superior. We have two Wests on this continent—the Great American West, and our Great American North-West. The trade of the latter naturally belongs to Canada, and its natural channel is through Canadian territory; the more trade was allowed to go by way of Duluth, the more it would be diverted from Canada. The people of the United States were moving to secure that trade, and the only way we could counteract it was by making the distance shorter to reach our vast territories in the North-West. Everything done to influence trade to pass to the south of Lake Superior was so much done to the detriment of the Dominion. One of the great difficulties in building the route north of Lake Superior was suggested on second thought by the Premier himself. He (Mr. Masson) said "second thought" because the hon. gentleman, before this question bore a political aspect, had re-echoed the words of the Globe—that a route from the Atlantic to the Pacific, a grand Canadian Pacific Railway, was easier and cheaper of construction and far shorter completely on British territory than any other trans-continental route; but when the late Government came to give effect to this very idea, the present Premier immediately contended that a road by the north of Lake Superior was an insane enterprise. But on that, as on many other questions, the hon. gentleman had spoken too dogmatically. Explorations having been made, Mr. Fleming reported:

"It is now established beyond a doubt that a favourable and comparatively easy route, considering the line as a whole, has been found from the Ottawa to Winnipeg, on the north side of Lake Superior. This result is most satisfactory, as unfavourable impressions had been created regarding portions of that line, many considering it impracticable for railway construction; that it will be possible to locate a line direct from the north side of Lake Superior to the prairie region without immense and expensive works."

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE — Hear! hear!

Mr. MASSON said the hon. gentleman would hardly undertake to say that it was as bad as British Columbia. He would read the concluding part of this report, relating to British Columbia, and he would show that either Mr. Fleming spoke of what he knew nothing about, or that the Premier was wrong in the position he took:—

"The practicability of establishing railway communication across the continent, wholly within the limits of the Dominion, is no longer a matter of doubt. It may indeed now be accepted as certain that a route has been found generally possessing favourable engineering features, with the exception of a short section approaching the Pacific coast, which route, taken in its entire length"—he drew particular attention to this remark—"including the exceptional section alluded to, will, on the average, show lighter work and require less cost in construction than has been necessary on many railways now in operation in the Dominion."

If this settled the point at issue for British Columbia, it must also settle that of the route by north of Lake Superior. Another reason had been given in favour of the present policy—that the road would cost more if it was built north of Lake Superior; but suppose that it, in consequence, cost $20,000,000, it would be cheaper for us—as it would secure the passage of the trade of the West through our own country—than if it cost $10,000,000 and the trade was thereby thrown into the hands of foreigners. If we wished to build up the North-West Territory, the Pacific Railway must be constructed. Prudence should be observed, of course, and it should pass the north of Lake Superior. The late Government fell; the plan was changed, and the time for recrimination arrived. The Premier then found his past policy in his way, and accordingly, to-day, matters were at a stand-still, and the only thing to be done was to cast recriminations on the policy of the late Administration. The only flaw discovered in it was the time limit. Every member from Quebec and Ontario knew what ridicule had been made of the idea of the late lamented Sir George Cartier with reference to this limitation. In every transaction, however, a time limit must be entered. This was done in all ordinary transactions of life, and in dealing with all public questions of the kind. It had merely been made to show that we were thoroughly in earnest, and it had been so understood by the people of British Columbia. He had been present at the dinner when Lieut.-Governor Trutch, in eloquent terms, communicated to them the wishes of the people of that Province. That gentleman had said that if they enforced a Shylock bond with Canada, they were well aware they must themselves furnish the pound of flesh. Another proof could be supplied of this understanding. When the contract was passed with Sir Hugh Allan, as the Premier well knew, provision for an extension of time, to be fixed, if it were necessary, by Parliament, was made. The Liberal press had charged the Conservative leaders with the com- mittal of an insane act in limiting the time as mentioned. We had before us the example of the United States, and he did not see why, when Quebec was charged with being in so back- ward a state by Liberals, the latter were not willing to follow this example. The Americans, notwithstanding the fact that they had just passed through a serious war, had built their Pacific Railway in less than five years in reality, because almost nothing had been done on the line between the years 1862 and 1865; and had we the money, the Premier would admit that the road could as easily be built, if the surveys were completed, in ten as in fifteen or twenty years. He wished this question to be set at rest once for all. When the Government were la- bouring to obtain a realization of terms from British Columbia their best argu- ment appeared to be that the right hon. member from Kingston had taken a sound position in this relation, as the ten years' limit was not binding on the Dominion, being directory, not mandatory, and yet to-day, the fol- lowers of the Premier reproached the Conservative leaders with binding the country hand and foot with regard to the construction of the railway within that period. Nevertheless, the friends of the Government had approved of a treaty with the United States, which contained a similar provision, requir- ing the completion of the Caughnawaga Canal within five years, and this was not on conditions agreed upon with a part of the Dominion, but with a fore- ign country. Its fulfilment was also considered by many an impossibility. A great deal has been said about the clause providing that the taxation should not be increased, prudently in- troduced by the late Sir George E. Cartier. The Conservatives had not intended to exaggerate this stipulation. At the time our finances were in a pros- perous state, and it was believed the road could be built without increasing the taxes, but it was never stated— never meant, and never dreamt of that it should not be constructed if taxation was increased; it was simply intended that this increase should not be due to the carrying out of this great enter- prise. The intentions of the Conservatives in this relation were fair and honest. The Conservatives were not responsible for the present state of things; they had acted prudently and wisely; events had disappointed their expectations, but this was not their fault. The difficulty experienced had not been produced by the Old Provinces, but by British Columbia, because its people did not believe that the Government were sincerely desirous of building the line at all—with good reason. When the Premier declared that he was determined to construct the railway, he would be the last man to question the gentleman's word, but events were against the hon. gentleman. The Premier's first remark when the enterprise was mooted, had tended to disparage that Province in the face of its envoy, seated on the floor of the House. The hon. gentleman declared that the country was not worth buying, and that it was too rocky and mountainous for advantageous settlement, quoting the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie. Sir Alexander was a great man, of whom Canada and England might well be proud, but he had gone up the Peace River and had seen only a very small part of the section of the continent in question. The hon. gentleman refused to accept what more modern visitors had stated, but there was no room for doubt as to the value and importance of the Province. The whole Liberal press, at least in Quebec, at every election, both Local and Federal, denounced the payment made in favour of British Columbia in disparaging language, including Manitoba also in their adverse criticism, and could the people of that Province, under these circumstances, have any confidence in the good will of the Administration in their regard, especially when an hon. gentleman occupying so high a position as the Minister of Justice used such imprudent language—to say the least of it—concerning British Columbia, which would one day be an unquestionable source of wealth to the Dominion? He denied the correctness of the hon. gentleman's criticism; it might be all very true, but it was not a fit statement to be uttered by a gentleman in his position, and he quite understood that the people of the Province should have their confidence shaken in the present Administration. The mission of Mr. Edgar was sufficient to take away the last particle of their confidence. An envoy was not usually sent to a people having constitutional government, but to the head of affairs. It was not usual, as the Hon. Premier had done, to tell an envoy to feel the pulse of the people to see what they wanted on the subject, and after Mr. Edgar had made his proposition, he thought the action of the Hon. First Minister in withdrawing him was—he would not say coarse or rude, but impolitic under the circumstances.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The hon. member for Yale differs from you.

Mr. MASSON—That may be, but I am giving my opinion, and I think the country will approve of it. The country does approve of what we are doing this moment. Mr. Edgar, continued the speaker, should have been furnished with credentials, which he could produce when necessary, and the Government in British Columbia informed that his offer when made would be binding on the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—We did.

Mr. MASSON—I deny it.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Well, the hon. gentleman may deny it, but it is the fact.

Mr. MASSON said British Columbia had another reason to distrust the Government, owing to the act of the envoy. The hon. member for Yale said they had never dreamed of the Nanaimo and Esquimalt line being part of the Pacific Railway. Any person who read the letter of Mr. Edgar to Mr. Walkem, which expressed the real wishes of the Government, would have no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that it was intended that that line should be a portion of the Pacific. In that letter the following passage occurred:—"Feeling the impossibility of complying with the time limited for completion, the Government is prepared to make new stipulations and to enter into additional obligations of a definite character, for the benefit of the Province. They propose to commence construction from Esquimalt to Nanaimo immediately, and

"to push that portion of railway on to completion with the utmost vigor and in the shortest practicable time." What was that a portion of, if not a portion of the Pacific Railway?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—It means a portion of the Esquimalt and Nanaimo.

Mr. MASSON—Oh, then the railway from Nanaimo to Esquimalt is a portion of the railway from Nanaimo to Esquimalt? The people of British Columbia understood this question as he did, but there were other things which confirmed the impression that the Government were not anxious to keep faith with the Province; there was no greater enemy of the railway than the hon. member for Montreal West, but the hon. First Minister had helped that gentleman in his candidature, knowing him to hold the views he did on the question. There was still stronger proof; as soon as the Hon. Premier passed his Bill in 1874, it was said in the Province of Quebec that the plan was such an ingeniously contrived one that it would ruin the Pacific Railway entirely. The organ of the party in Quebec, whose editor would probably before long have a seat in the Government, in another chamber said:—"The resolutions relating to the Pacific Railway will be discussed on Tuesday. The resolutions have been prepared with the greatest care, and the arrangements to protect the public interest have been so well taken that I think the enterprise will be smothered in the narrow meshes tightened together by the hand of Mr. Mackenzie; the misfortune would not be very great." This was the position taken by the Liberals of Quebec, and did the hon. gentleman mean to say that the public opinion of that Province did not pass over the Rocky Mountains into British Columbia? He knew the opinions of Conservatives penetrated that far. Such utterances, together with the general attitude of the Ministry, justified him in saying the people of British Columbia had no faith that the road would be constructed. If they had seriously thought there was an intention on the part of the present Administration to build the road, the difficulty of

to-day would not exist. The people of that Province are as reasonable as any others, and they would have agreed that the work should be undertaken and prosecuted with the prudence the affairs of the Dominion demands at this moment. We had to construct the railway now as a Government work and had to proceed with caution; but if British Columbia had confidence in the Administration they would not press that anything should be done until the completion of the surveys. He thought the policy of the Hon. Premier on that point was wise, and would be so recognized by the people of the Province. The majority of the people of the Dominion were determined that the road should be constructed, if not in ten or fifteen years, in twenty years, but not to burden the country thereby. British Columbia would understand that their interests and ours are welded together, and would not press for too much; the pound of flesh would be taken from their breast as well as our own. A few days ago, as everybody remembered, the Hon. Premier announced the grave fact of the cancellation of the Georgian Bay Branch contract. If there was any enterprise entered into recklessly and in spite of the remonstrances of engineers and all interested in the work, it was the Georgian Bay Branch. To-day we were reaping the result of that improvident and reckless conduct. Mr. Foster had given up his contract, and required 26 miles of water-stretches to be used for the railway; they were at the end of the Session, but had not received any information from the Government on this matter. Why was this? Because it had been found difficult, if not impossible, to reach the mouth of French River: at any rate, they had found it was much easier to reach the French River 26 miles above its mouth. The contractors required other alterations, and it had been proved that the road could not be constructed according to the terms of that contract. He called the attention of the House to a resolution he submitted last year. That motion, however, was lost, and he bowed to the decision of the House; but what was the position taken by hon. gentlemen opposite. He was taunted by an hon. gentleman opposite who held a high position—and his views were re-echoed by his supporters—that he was animated by a sectional feeling, and that he was only looking to the interests of Quebec. He, however, merely asked fair play for the Province, and the result of the effort of the Government proved that the hon. gentleman had recklessly changed the policy of the late Administration; in changing that policy, they stated that the course that they intended to pursue would be just as favorable as that of the late Government, and that lines would be subsidized in Ontario and Quebec to join the terminus of the Pacific Railway. It was said in this House last year, by the Hon. Minister of Justice, that the plan which had been propounded by the Government at the polls and in the Lambton address, had been conducive in carrying the elections; therefore that should be the policy of the Government, and that the Government had no right to alter that policy. He maintained that the duty of the Government, before proceeding with the Georgian Bay Branch, was to have had the surveys thoroughly completed, in order that they could give the contractors some idea of what was before them. Unfortunately this had not been done, and the result was, as he had anticipated. He (Mr. Masson), has accompanied a deputation to the Minister of Public Works, in 1874. The hon. gentleman said that deputation went away satisfied. He (Mr. Masson), could prove they did not, and they would have been very foolish if they had, because they were refused everything they asked. They stated that Mr. Legge, an engineer of the greatest ability, had informed them that by adopting another route the road could be built for $30,000 per mile, whereas, by the height of land route, it would cost at least $40,000. When the Premier came to the House, he said the engineer did not know what he was speaking about; that the route by Burnt Lake was the very best that could be adopted and had the easiest grades. It was only necessary to look at the map to see where the height of land was, and when the deputation pointed it out as the place where the Bonnechere, Madawaska, Muskoka and other rivers took their rise, the Premier turned round and said they did not know what they were talking about. The hon. gentleman did more; when he (Mr. Masson), in this House, cited the opinions of Sir William Logan and Mr. Shanly, and said these gentlemen knew more of the subject than Mr. Hazlewood, who was stopped by the smoke and only made a cursory survey of the greater part of the route, the hon. gentleman was discourteous enough to say it was not true. Here Mr. Masson quoted from page 528 of Hansard.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I am quite sure I never was guilty of the discourtesy of saying that the hon. gentleman's statement was not true, and if I had been, I would have apologised to the hon. gentleman for doing so.

Mr. MASSON said he was happy to hear the hon. gentleman say so, and he (Mr. Masson) withdrew the charge of discourtesy. The hon. gentleman now informed the House the route was to be changed, and French River was to be utilized for 26 miles from its mouth. Under the circumstances, that was a step in the right direction; but would it not be wiser and better to improve the navigation of French River up to Lake Nipissing? Mr. Shanly, who surveyed the river with a view to reporting as to the feasibility of the Ottawa Canal, estimated the cost of the entire work from Georgian Bay, on the lower Ottawa, at some twenty odd millions, but did not give an opinion as to what sum would be required for the improvement of French River; but Mr. Clarke, the engineer who made the survey in 1860, reported the cost at about $860,000. No doubt a larger sum would be required at this day, but it could not exceed $1,500,000. By this outlay the Georgian Bay Branch would be rendered unnecessary. While it would be a commencement of the great Ottawa Canal, it would enable lake craft to reach the south-east corner of Lake Nipissing, the original eastern terminus of the Pacific Railway. The question would then naturally rise whether the Premier should subsidize existing and projected lines in Ontario and Quebec to reach that point, as had been indicated in the policy announced to the electors in December, 1873; if he would subsidize but one, let the hon. gentleman decide in his own mind the one which it would be most in the public interest to aid and by which the seaboard could be most directly reached. He hoped the hon. gentleman would order further explorations, and if it then appeared that the line the hon. gentleman had chosen was best, he would have no objection to it. He did not wish to be sectional, and such he never had been; he was completely in accord with the Legislature of Quebec in this connection, and it only asked for fair play with regard to Lower Canada. The line which passed through Quebec was the shortest and best, and if this was selected, he was sure that the people of the Lower Province would not demur if a line running through the centre of Ontario was also subsidized. If the Government kept faith with British Columbia, without ruining the country, and secured through rail communication with the North-West via Fort William and Fort Garry, as soon as possible,—kept in view the building of the line by the north of Lake Superior, and so arranged their policy that every step taken at the present moment would ultimately conduce to the completion at a future day of that part of the undertaking, and the commencement of the Ottawa Ship Canal, he thought they would deserve the hearty support of the country in that undertaking, and would at all events have his support.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew), as a representative of an Ottawa valley constituency, desired to say a few words touching this question, and the construction of the Georgian Bay Branch. As long ago as 6th March the Premier had informed the House that the contract for the building of this branch had been cancelled, and up to the present, although he had carefully read the newspapers of the country, he had not been able to discover that advertisements had been issued inviting new tenders. This fact led him to the inevitable conclusion that some modification in the plans was intended by the Administration. Though it was true that the hon. gentleman had not communicated his policy in this relation, for which the vote of a million was requested, as had been stated by the hon. member for Terrebonne, the indications were that this policy would be changed to the extent of providing for the improvement of the navigation of French River from its mouth to a point some twenty-six miles distant, upwards. He thought that if the plan mentioned by his hon. friend from Terrebonne was adopted, it would not only be in accordance with the views of the constituency he represented, but also with those of the whole country. He desired the improvement of navigation up as far as Lake Nipissing; and he did not think that it could be shown that this would not afford all the advantages obtainable by building the Georgian Bay Branch to the mouth of French River, while a considerable saving would thereby be effected. The distance from the eastern terminus of this branch line to the mouth of the river mentioned was 99 miles; and the cost of the line, at the rate of \$40,000 per mile, would be \$3,960,000. The distance from this point to the south-eastern corner of Lake Nipissing was 25 miles; and at the rate of \$40,000 per mile; the cost of a railway connecting the two points would be \$1,000,000. The expenditure required, according to Mr. Clarke's estimate, to improve the river, with locks 250 feet in length, 45 feet in width, and 12 feet in depth, would be \$886,117; and if they compared this with the \$3,960,000 to be expended on the branch line in question, it would be seen that the adoption of this plan would effect a large saving. The improvement of navigation from the mouth of French River to Cantins Bay would cost according to Mr. Clarke's estimate \$139,870; and of building 86 miles of railway to Cantins Bay, \$3,440,000, making in all \$3,579,870; the saving which would be effected by adopting the plan of the hon. member for Terrebonne would be \$1,693,753. It might be said that Mr. Clarke's estimate with reference to the improvement of the Ottawa navigation was very much less than that of Mr. Shanly, and this he was prepared to admit, but the whole length of canal required according to Mr. Shanly, exclusive of the Lachine Canal, was $49\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and the canal on French River one mile in length; while Mr. Clarke estimated that the whole length of the canalization would only amount to $20\frac{8}{10}$ miles, and $\frac{8}{10}$ of a mile for the canal on French River. Mr. Shanly estimated the canal on French River as 1-49th part, and the distance according to Mr. Clarke was 1-25th part; the cost as estimated by Mr. Shanly doubled the estimate of Mr. Clarke. He thought that it would be readily seen by any person that the cost of improving French River would not be doubled by Mr. Shanly's calculation compared with that of Mr. Clarke; but if it were, it would be found that a saving would be secured, by this plan, compared with the cost of building the road from the eastern terminus to French River over 1,000,000, and from thence to Cautin's Bay, \$950,000. It had been stated by the leader of the Government that it was not the intention of the Government at present to undertake this work—the improvement of the navigation of the Ottawa and in view of the large extent of the Public Works undertaken by the Administration, and the present state of our finances, he did not blame the Government for refusing at this particular juncture to undertake a work of such great magnitude; but if any part of the scheme be broached, could it be extended by the present Administration without involving the country in any undue expenditure it should be done.

AFTER RECESS.

The following Private Bills were read the third time and passed:—

To amend the Act of Incorporation of the Banque St. Jean Baptiste.

To amend the Act Incorporating the London and Canada Bank.

To incorporate the British Canadian Loan and Investment Company.

SUPPLY.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Cartwright the House went into Committee of Supply.

Mr. WHITE (North Renfrew) resumed the debate. He stated that the question of Ottawa navigation was one which must engage the attention of the Government of this country, as it had engaged the attention of former Governments. In 1858 a report was made by Mr. Walter Shanly in which he made a comparison between the cost of transportation from Chicago to Montreal by the Ottawa route and by the Lachine Canal. He made the distance 368 miles in favour of Ottawa; in time the difference was 44 hours, and in cost $37\frac{1}{2}$ cents per ton. He had heard the hon. member for Monck state during this debate that there were very great impediments in the way of obtaining an entrance to the mouth of French River, and that there existed at that point no good harbour. He also stated that there were other harbours on the shore of the Georgian Bay which were much preferable to that harbour. He might, perhaps, be permitted to quote from the opinion of Mr. Shanly with reference to the harbour at the mouth of French River:—

“The Indians of Lake Nippissing in going to and from their homes and Shibewhenaning, on the Sault Ste. Marie, commonly enter or descend the French River by the ‘Mouth,’ so designated by Bayfield, that route affording the best shelter for their canoes; in going to or returning from Penetanguishene they as commonly choose the passage by the ‘Key,’ the waters of which, although they do not belong to the French River, approach so near to it at some distance up as to render it accessible for canoes by an easy portage. In pursuing my examination of the coast I placed myself entirely in the hands of my pilot, a sagacious Algonquin of Lake Nippissing, perfectly familiar with every rocky island and inlet of the myriads that stud and indent the inhospitable Coasts of the Georgian Bay, merely giving him to understand that my desire was to enter the river by its widest and deepest outlet. Passing the ‘key,’ which he indicated as the shortest route to Nippissing, my guide bent his course for the Bustard Islands; and from thence steered directly for the ‘large river’ already referred to, the way into which from the Island being perfectly clear and unembarrassed. It thus for the first time became known to me, that the French River had at least one outlet independent of those assigned to it by the chart, and that the large river which was most probably considered by Bayfield as a distant stream, is in reality that arm of the former by which, if ever it is to be adapted to the purpose of modern commerce, vessels will have to enter it. As for the other mouths, I have ascertained that they were rightly pronounced to be inaccessible, save, as before observed, by the Indian in his canoe. On reaching the mouth of the river I landed, and looking back upon the bay over which I had just passed, it certainly did seem to fulfil all the conditions of a noble harbour. The Bustard Group completely protects it on the south and south-west, while a heavy sea, grinding angrily against a projecting headland of granite on the north-west seemed to announce some shelter against the violent gales which so frequently assail the lake from that quarter. The bay within was perfectly smooth and unruffled, while without the water was still heaving and swelling from the effects of a night of storm."

"The entrance to the harbour is studded across from the Bustards towards the main shore on the north by a few rocky islets, great broad channels between which give every indication of very deep soundings."

"A vessel of whatever class, steamer or sailing craft, once within the Georgian Bay, could in any weather at least as easily make the Bustard Islands as any of the more southerly ports, Owen Sound, Collingwood or Nottawassaga, while in the sweeping gales from the North-West, the scourge of Lake Huron, the run from Cape Hurd to the Bustards having the shelter of the Great Manitoulin Island, would assuredly be far safer than that to any of the three lower harbours named. Under the lee of the Bustard Orange, vessels could anchor or moor in the most complete safety, blow the wind from what quarter it might, and to drop thence into the river, the depth and directness of the channel being assumed as sufficient, would be practicable under any condition of weather short of actual storm."

He thought that settled the question as to whether a good and available harbour was to be obtained there. It was also stated that there was no land fit for settlement in the locality which would be opened up by this railway. He was not prepared to say what the quality of the land might be in the immediate vicinity of the Georgian Bay, but it was a well known fact that in the vicinity of Lake Nipissing, and especially north and west of the Lake, large tracts of arable land existed. Mr. Walter Shanly made a report to this effect in 1857, and he had in his hand a letter from a gentleman employed for many years by the Government of Ontario surveying this country. He referred to Mr. Bell, the Provincial Land Surveyor, who said:—

"Along the Amable du Fond River and several miles west of it, there are extensive flats of rich loamy soil, thence, westward, a beautiful undulating country extends to Lake Nipissing and South River, and a considerable distance west of that river. The soil is generally a sandy loam on the higher lands and clayey loam on the flats. In some parts the timber is pine, mixed with hardwood, and in many places hemlock, hardwood and balsam. From Lake Nipissing the country ascends gradually to the south, and at a distance of 15 miles from the lake in that direction, extensive ridges of maple, birch and beech occur, mixed occasionally with hemlock and balsam, pine being seldom met with. The soil is a sandy loam. The whole country described above is fit for settlement. On the south side of Lake Nipissing and Mattawa River a large tract of country extending northerly to Lake Temiscamingue is covered chiefly with hard balsam and spruce. Pine is most abundant near the Ottawa, but a few miles west of that river it becomes scarce. Over a large proportion of this tract the soil is a clayey loam of good quality, and nearly all of it is suitable for settlement. In my opinion there is no part of the unoccupied lands of the Crown which affords so large an unbroken tract of country suitable for settlement as the territory described herein."

That was the opinion of a practical land surveyor who had explored this country year after year. By adopting the suggestion of the hon. member for Terrebonne and locating the terminus of the road on the shore of Lake Nipissing, a large tract of country suitable for settlement would be opened up, and a large quantity of valuable timber now inaccessible would also obtain an outlet to the markets of the world. In discussing this question it was his desire to do so entirely free from party ties and without any wish to do and say anything which might tend to embarrass the Government. It had been said in a discussion which arose upon this question in another place, that the result of the election which recently took place in his county was a condemnation of the Government policy in reference to the opening up of the communication with the eastern terminus of the Pacific Railway. He denied that proposition, but admitted that there might have been some colour for the statement. It had also been stated that the people of North Renfrew desired to have the communication made by way of Pembroke, because the people of the South Riding desired it should be made by way of Renfrew. In discussing this scheme he did so without reference to this means of communication. Much could be said in favour of the Pembroke route, but he had carefully avoided discussing that particular line, as the Government had given no indication that they proposed abandoning the Bonnechere route, and he thought he was reflecting the opinion of the people he represented, when he said they did not desire to view this question from a local or sectional standpoint. Upon the Government, and on the Government alone, must rest the responsibility of determining the route which they believed to be the best in the interests of the country, and if they honestly intended to carry out this project of opening up communication between the existing system of railways in Ontario and Quebec and the great lakes of the West they would receive his support whether they adopted the suggestion of the member for Terrebonne by improving the French River navigation (which he believed would be most conducive to the interests of the country) or whether they carried out the original scheme.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) said before the House met, a portion of the Canadian press had given the public to understand that the Government were about to repudiate its agreement with British Columbia. There could be but one opinion, that the faith of the country was pledged to British Columbia and must be maintained. He was exceedingly pleased to hear from the hon. members for Yale and Terrebonne that while they expected the road should be built, the burdens of the people ought not to be increased in order to do so. Any other policy would not commend itself to the people. It had often been asserted, however, that this Government intended to break faith with British Columbia. He had watched their policy closely, and failed to observe any indication that they intended to do anything of the kind. They had expended large amounts in surveys, purchased a quantity of steel rails, and shown every desire to push forward the work as fast as the resources of the country would permit them to go. Some hon. members from British Columbia—and especially the hon. member for Vancouver, who seemed to be the champion of the Province—had charged the Government and their supporters with attempting to depreciate that portion of the Dominion, but he (Mr. Ross) failed to see anything of the kind. The road must be regarded either as a commercial undertaking or a national work. If it was viewed in a commercial light, the House was obliged to look at the resources of British Columbia. When they came to consider that the trade of that Province—including imports and exports—was about $4,000,000, they at once enquired what traffic there would be for this railway, and how far British Columbia could contribute to make this commercial undertaking a success. Again, looking at it from a national standpoint, it became a matter of sentiment, and the House was obliged to consider whether for the mere sentiment of connecting British Columbia with the Eastern Provinces the Government would be justified in entailing such burdens on the people as would retard the development of other sources of wealth and cripple the commerce of the country. For his part he was not prepared to sustain any such policy. There were some indications of a change of opinion on the other side of the House, and they were now talking of utilizing the water stretches which they had spoken of so contemptuously when the policy of the Government was first announced. This frequent change of base indicated the Opposition had no settled policy on the subject, and that the only judicious course was to endeavour by moderate and common-sense measures to construct the road without necessarily increasing the burdens of the country. The hon. member for Terrebonne was exceedingly anxious to imitate the Americans and push railways in advance of settlement, the reason given being that it would settle the Valley of the Saskatchewan. He (Mr. Ross) admitted the Illinois Central and other railroads in the United States had been built in that way, but before adopting such a policy here, we had to consider whether the tide of immigration was as great now as it had been in the past. Any one who had watched the flow of immigration for the last four or five years must admit it was beyond the range of probability that anything like the number of emigrants would settle in America during the next ten years as in the last decade. The immigration of the last year was not one-third of what it was the preceding twelve months; and it was unlikely to increase in the future, the wages of the working classes in Great Britain and other European countries having largely increased of late, and their condition being much improved. The inducements for people in the old world to emigrate were, therefore, not so great as they had been in the past. Looking at these facts we could not expect the same results to follow the adoption of the system by which Illinois had been settled.

It had been said it was a great mistake to undertake the construction of this railroad—that the resources of the country were not sufficient for the work. That was not the question now. This House had to consider that in order to keep faith with British Columbia, and discharge the obligations we had undertaken with that Province, we were bound to proceed with the construction of the road as quickly as possible, acting with prudence and forethought in carrying on the work.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN did not think this could be considered a question of sentiment. It had never been so considered by the late Government or Parliament, nor did he think it was so considered by the present Administration or this House. It was regarded by the late Government as a work of necessity. This Dominion was bound by a solemn treaty with one of the Provinces to build the railway within a certain time. Some had said it could not be done within the specified limits. That might be, but the people of British Columbia would be satisfied with a reasonable effort to do it. The policy of the late Government was to build the road by means of a private company, aided by land grants and a money subsidy. He was still of opinion the lands of the North West should contribute largely to the building of that railway, and that the country should not be called upon to aid it with a larger sum of money than $30,000,000. It was a treaty obligation entered into, not for the sake of British Columbia, but for the sake of the Dominion. It was entered into by the late Government because they knew it was necessary for our national existence. They knew that such a railway would be required to knit together the Provinces of the Dominion, and extend their authority completely over the country from the shores of the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean; it would also be a connecting link between Europe and Asia. The hon. member spoke of this as sentiment; the hon. gentleman might use that term, but others would term it practical common sense. This line would yet bring—for it must be constructed—through the Dominion the trade of the two continents, Asia and Europe, besides the local traffic of our Provinces. He had listened with astonishment to the quotation by the hon. gentleman who had just spoken of the trade of British Columbia, as a reason why he (Mr. Ross) supposed that the late Administration intended to build this road. This circumstance had not entered into their calculations. They did not consider whether there were ten or twenty thousand people in the Province, or whether its trade was small or large. They knew full well that this railway would build up British Columbia—a wealthy region, full of resources—and though a distinguished member of the Government had called it a sea of mountains, yet if the hon. gentleman visited it, he would see that this sea of mountains was a sea which would give a large revenue to this country. To-day it was the weakest, but it would yet be one of the foremost Provinces of the Dominion. Its representatives could under certain circumstances be hardly heard in the House. This he regretted, for humble though any of them might be, he was entitled to the same attention and respect as any other, and as any prominent hon. gentleman, when he advocated the rights of his Province.

A few years ago another important Province, Nova Scotia, occupied a similar position, and the complaints and grievances of its representatives were heard night after night with the greatest attention and respect, and even with a view of meeting them and trying to remedy the evil; and though some want of respect was shown in this instance to this section of the Dominion there must be, he thought, in this Parliament a desire to meet its wishes and remedy the evil which existed. This railway was considered by the previous Government and Parliament as a necessity in view of our position, and as required by treaty obligation. When they gave the contract to Sir Hugh Allan and his twelve associates, they bound themselves to give the Company $30,000,000 and 50,000,000 acres of land to construct a railway from Lake Nipissing to Esquimalt, between which points lay the route of the Pacific Railway. If reference was made to the Act they passed incorporating certain companies during that year, it would be seen that they were intended to build railways from Lake Nipissing to the Pacific Ocean, with power of extension to Esquimalt, and of building besides branch lines. The portion of the line from the inner waters of British Columbia to Esquimalt, was not considered, and was not treated in these acts as a branch, but as an extension and a portion of the railway. He would go further—and these were matters of fact and history. When the Government of which he was a member was called upon in this House by the present member for Victoria to state whether we had determined upon the western terminus of the line, he was instructed by the Cabinet to announce—as he did do openly—that they intended to make Esquimalt the terminus. Moreover, an Order in Council was passed to that effect, and in the correspondence, laid the other day before the House, it was so stated in a Minute of Council of the present Government. When the question came up under the present Administration, if he was not mistaken, the same course was followed. It was necessary at this stage to refer to a report of a Committee of the Honourable the Privy Council, dated the 20th of September, 1875, wherein it was stated:—"The proposed Railway from Esquimalt to Nanaimo does not form a portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway as defined by the Act; it was intended to benefit local interests, and was proposed as compensation for the disappointment experienced by the unavoidable delay in constructing the Railway across the Continent."

This did not apply to the late Government, because in their time no such disappointment was experienced. They had begun to put the Act into effect, and, therefore, no compensation was required; this only occurred afterwards. Nevertheless, on the 25th of March, 1875, the present Ministry requested the Local Government to grant a belt of land between Esquimalt and Nanaimo for the construction of a railroad, evidently considering that this was a portion of the Pacific Railway. To obtain all the advantages possible from this line, it must not be arrested at the Pacific coast. It was said one of the two lines mentioned by the hon. member for Yale must be selected—either the line to Bute Inlet, or the line to Burrard Inlet. The hon. gentleman considered that if the railway ran to Bute Inlet, the Nanaimo and Esquimalt line must be constructed; but that if it ran to Burrard Inlet no such necessity would exist. He differed with the hon. gentleman regarding this important point; but he would not take this position had he not visited the Province. If the railway ran to Bute Inlet, the line to Esquimalt on the Island must be built, and if possible, the Narrows should also be bridged. If this, however, cost too much, or if it could not be done, a steam ferry, as at New York, must be established. The railway on the Island would be necessary, because if the line was stopped at Bute Inlet, as the terminus, the trade of the East could not be secured. We must compete with the Americans at their own doors; Bute Inlet was too far distant from the point, the trade of the Pacific and of the east would reach, as it would pass by the straits of Fuca; but if the course he urged was not followed, we must be content with the local traffic of our own Provinces. War with the United States was a contingency which, of course must be taken into account, and in this event, the Straits of Fuca, and the harbour of Esquimalt would be inaccessible to us, but Bartley Sound being a harbour directly on the Pacific Ocean, could be kept open by the fleets of England, enabling us to defy any attempts the Americans might make against the terminus of our railway there. If this were fixed at Bute Inlet, we could not secure the trade of the Pacific Ocean, because it would pass by the American Sound, and ships would not go around to Vancouver Island by the Straits of Georgia to Bute Inlet, but to the most direct harbour, which was in the hands of the Americans.

Then with regard to the railway coming from Bute Inlet to Burrard Inlet. The latter, as the hon. member for Yale had said, was a magnificent harbour, but there we would have the same difficulties as at Esquimalt, and for this reason:—If there was a war with America our vessels could not reach Burrard Inlet without passing under the guns of San Juan Island. We could not escape that position, and we ought to try and avoid having our trade destroyed for a whole year. The true policy was first to place the terminus where we could easily reach the trade of the east and compete with the Americans and not be afraid of its interruption in the contingency of a war with the United States. Besides, if we had the terminus at Bute or Burrard Inlet, we would increase the insurance and the time required for the trip from the east. He still adhered to the opinion that it was a necessity of our position that the Pacific Railway be built not only to Bute Inlet but on the island to Bartley Sound and Esquimalt. At the latter place we could compete with the Americans in times of peace. If it should be determined that the road must come to Burrard instead of Bute Inlet, we would have to ferry across to Nanaimo, which would occupy one hour and a half.

He would now come to the east end of the proposed railway, and speak of the Georgian Bay Branch. The plan of the Government was to build the road to about 26 miles from the mouth of the French river, and from there to Sault Ste. Marie, about 200 miles. From Burnt Lake to French River, he thought, was about 90 miles.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Who said we would go to Sault Ste. Marie?

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN—That is what we understood last Session.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I was not aware of it.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN said judging from the discussions on the subject in Parliament last year, that seemed to be the policy of the Government.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE asked the hon. gentleman to point this out.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN—If that is not the policy of the Government, I am glad of it.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The hon. gentleman must not state that that is our policy unless he is prepared to show it.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN—My remark on this point was more interrogative than affirmative.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Then I fail to understand English.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN—Perhaps the hon. gentleman does not understand my English; perhaps he would understand my French better. I know that the hon. gentleman has supporters not only in the House but out of it, who take this view. Some of his supporters are at the head of public prints which are considered the mouth-pieces of the hon. gentlemen of the Government.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Oh, no; we have no mouthpiece.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN said it was a very easy thing to profit by the support of newspapers, and then to throw them over. He knew a newspaper, the Toronto Globe, which was under the influence of a gentleman who had always been considered a great authority, and a power behind the throne. That newspaper, in February, said:—“The railway to French River is a part, and a material part of the old scheme. It is one link in the chain; another will take us to the Sault Ste. Marie neighbourhood, and so on to the head of Lake Superior.” He thought that showed he was not far wrong. In his speech on this subject, in March last, the Hon. Premier said:—

“We, therefore, fixed upon that part as the terminus for two or three reasons—for the reason just assigned, in the first place; and in the second place, for the reason that if the road should be continued westward, those 85 miles that would be built by the Government as a Government work will be, generally speaking, in the line to be followed; and which may be carried out whether we pass slightly north-east of Sault Ste. Marie ultimately, or diverge northerly by the route to Long Lake, and passing from the south of Long Lake to Pic River, or by the north of the Lake where the surveys of last season terminated.”

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Certainly. I say that now.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN—Well, well; then we agree.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I think we do not.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN said he stated that the policy of the present Administration was to build the railway to French River, and then to Sault Ste. Marie, by which he meant in that neighbourhood. The Government gave the contract to Mr. Foster, under certain conditions, which were considered very liberal at the time. It nevertheless appeared that after negotiations in England, the contractor could not raise the money, and gave up his contract, and they were now trying to have the conditions changed. He was glad the contract was not to be finished, not on account of the contractor or the Government, but in the interests of the line itself. It gave time to the Government to reconsider the matter, and see whether the true interests of the country did not require a change of direction. When the contract was given to Mr. Foster, if he was not mistaken, the line was not located, and if he was rightly informed the surveys had demonstrated that the route would not be a favourable one, but that a line more to the north would be preferable. They were told that a route had been found to pass between the Rivers Ottawa and Petewawa, which would bring us very near the east or the south-east end of Lake Nipissing. He hoped that such was the case, and that we could be put in communication with the lake in such a way.

If that course were adopted then the line from Lake Nipissing to French River in the direction of Sault Ste. Marie might be saved. French River could be so improved as to give communication from the east end of Lake Nipissing to the Georgian Bay. As it had been said by his hon. friend from Terrebonne, by the improvement of French River and Lake Nipissing, it would be so much done in the direction of the canalization of the Ottawa, and it would be in accordance with the policy of the previous Government and of this Government as well; for they were continuing it by the works at Culbute, which were for the purpose of obtaining a long stretch of navigable water on the Upper Ottawa. The improvements that were being made at this end, coupled with the improvements on French River and Nipissing, would certainly be in the proper direction, and we might look forward to a period when we would have through navigation from the Georgian Bay to Montreal via the Ottawa. The advantage of this plan would be to save all that portion of the railway which would be extended from the east end of Lake Nipissing to Sault Ste. Marie, and would make so much more money available for the main line of the Pacific Railway, from the east end of Lake Nipissing towards the West, passing North of the Lake as was originally intended. If the railway were constructed to Sault Ste. Marie the result would be that when passengers from the East would be carried by rail to that point they would not care for transshipment on board a steamer to be carried to the other end of Lake Superior, and then by railway again to Fort Garry, when instead of doing so they could continue their route by rail from Sault Ste. Marie through the United States. The half rail, half water route from Thunder Bay would be too expensive for freight, and it would not satisfy the convenience of passengers. This was another reason why the railroad should not be built towards Sault Ste. Marie. The same argument would apply to the line from Thunder Bay to Fort Garry; unless the line were brought to Nepigon Bay where it would connect with the main line from the East, it would be of no use, except as a local railway, when the main line was constructed from Nipissing to Fort Garry. They knew from surveys that had been made that a route had been found between Lake Nepigon and Lake Superior which would not necessitate their going north of Lake Nepigon. He considered it would be a great mistake to build the railway to Sault Ste. Marie, which would give the benefit of trade that should be ours to the United States.

If the road was to be built to Sault Ste. Marie, it was a proof that the Government had no intention of even building the Pacific Railway from Nipissing to Fort Garry, or they were wasting money in constructing a railway at Thunder Bay that never would be a portion of the main line.

The plan he had suggested he considered was the one that was best in the interests of the Dominion. They were bound to build the road to Esquimalt on the west, which was the terminus fixed upon at the time; he would go further and say that they were bound of necessity to build it to that point in order to compete successfully with the American railway for the trade of the east.

Mr. ROSCOE said the hon. member for Yale had called the attention of the Committee to the fact that two years ago he had moved a resolution asking for a fresh survey of the Fraser River route, and that the Government had accepted that resolution. But he had not stated that it was agreed to reluctantly, and it had established the fact that they could not build the railway there without enormous expense. He did not oppose the resolution at that time, and would have supported it, but now the hon. gentleman, after an interval of two years, came forward again and asked for further surveys of the Fraser River route, he would have to oppose it. He would no doubt be told by the hon. gentleman that he was actuated by a selfish feeling for his own constituents; but it was not for the interests of his own constituents, but for those of the people of British Columbia that he opposed it, as he considered such a survey would be a useless expenditure of money and a further loss of time. The hon. gentleman being a Civil Engineer had an advantage over him in discussing this question, but he had not yet met with an engineer connected with the Pacific survey or otherwise, who had not very strong opinions that the railway could not be constructed down the Fraser river without enormous expense. If the Government accepted the hon. gentleman's proposal they would be open to the charge of wasting time and money in British Columbia; that they had no bona fide intention of locating the line and proceeding with the work, and that they were glad to lay hold of any excuse for delay. If they consented to have another survey of the Fraser River route, it would be an excuse for fresh surveys of other routes—the Howe Sound route, for instance—being demanded, and he did not see how the Ministry, if they were going to reconsider the Fraser River route, could refuse a reconsideration of the others also. He did not believe that any survey would be satisfactory to the hon. member for Yale-Kootenay district or his constituents, that did not locate the railway down the Fraser River.

The hon. gentleman had made another proposal to the Government, however, which he would support. The Government had located a part of the line in British Columbia on which they could commence operations this year. Now, by the Railroad Act of 1874 the Government could not accept contracts without their being laid before Parliament; but if the Government came down and asked the House to pass a resolution allowing them to spend $1,000,000 in actual construction this year he did not see how the House could refuse. Nothing would go so far to allay irritation which existed in British Columbia as the actual commencement of the work in that Province. He was pleased to hear that the Government had actually located the line and had abandoned the more northerly route. In speaking of the reports of Professor Selwyn he said such reports could not be satisfactory unless they were made by men who were engineers by profession. As an example of this, Mr. Selwyn had reported that the road could be made along a valley. It was found by a subsequent survey that the route he recommended would have to cross perpendicular glaciers and rocks 1,000 feet high.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—What valley is that?

Mr. ROSCOE said he did not remember; all he could say was that he had received information to that effect. It was also proved that the route he had proposed would have to be diverted in one place 24 miles in order to cross a gorge.

He did not think that, with the exception of the surveys made on Vancouver Island by Mr. Richardson, the geological surveys of British Columbia had been carried on efficiently. British Columbia had enormous mineral wealth. Several valuable silver mines had been discovered in the country, and he suggested that Mr. Selwyn's services should be utilized in making a geological survey of British Columbia instead of being sent to find a route for the Pacific Railroad. If Mr. Selwyn was sent out to find a route for the Pacific Railroad he could only suggest that Mr. Marcus Smith, the able and efficient chief engineer of the railroad in British Columbia, should be sent out to make a geological report. He was sure that Mr. Smith's geological report would be worth more than Mr. Selwyn's report of the railroad route.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he thought his hon. friend was unjust to Mr. Selwyn. That gentleman had never made any report about the location of the line, nor was he ever asked to do it. They simply made use of his opinion regarding the topography of the country. He took a great many photographs of particular places, and the Government was desirous of obtaining a knowledge of the character of the rocks and other deposits generally on the route from Fort George to McLeod Lake, and along east Pine and Smoky Rivers. Their information with regard to these localities was very indefinite. Their instructions related only to the topographical observations Mr. Selwyn might make, and were not about the construction of a railway.

Mr. ROSCOE said he understood the hon. gentleman to state that the Government had sent out Mr. Selwyn to make a survey with the object of locating the line. We had heard from the Minister of Public Works the satisfactory statement that the line was located from the Yellowhead Pass to Fort George, and it only remained to decide between Bute Inlet and Dean's Channel. He had little to say about the choice between these routes, because he had always admitted that this would have to be decided by the Engineer's report. He would, however, point out to the hon. gentleman one important consideration, that is, it was not known for certain whether Dean's Channel did not get frozen up during some winters. An expedition had been sent there this winter to ascertain this, but this winter in British Columbia had been an exceptionally mild one, and nothing, therefore, could be satisfactorily ascertained on this point. Dean's Channel is considerably north of Bute Inlet, and if the map be referred to, it would be seen that the isothermal line which passes the head of Bute Inlet goes west, while the isothermal line passing the head of Dean's Channel runs north to Alaska. The Government will have committed a great blunder if they fixed the terminus of the railroad at a place liable to be obstructed by ice some winters.

The hon. member for Yale had referred to the statement made by him (Mr. Roscoe), that Mr. Trutch had told him he had never in any way agreed to the resolution about not building the railroad if the rate of taxation was to be increased, and the hon. gentleman had stated that he was on more intimate terms with Mr. Trutch and was more likely to know the facts. Now, he was not prepared to discuss on the floor of the House this question, but he could simply report what he had stated before, that Mr. Trutch had distinctly contradicted the statement that he had agreed to this resolution. Mr. Trutch had certainly at the dinner referred to, made some remarks about British Columbia not wishing Canada to incur a hopeless load of taxation to build the railroad, and about not taking the ten years as a cast iron obligation, in which remark every sensible man in British Columbia would agree. With regard to remarks of the hon. gentleman in relation to the first appeal he agreed, but with regard to the second appeal he could not say the same.

With regard to the second appeal the case is this:—The Government had accepted Lord Carnarvon's arbitration, and had agreed to do certain things, among others to build the railroad from Esquimalt to Nanaimo. They now said that in consequence of the Senate throwing out the Bill, they were unable to build it, and offered a money compensation. Instead the Government of British Columbia had adopted the reasonable course of referring the matter back to Lord Carnarvon and leaving it to him to say what he considered the Dominion Government ought to do under the circumstances, and he hoped that when the answer came back it would be treated by the Government and even by the Hon. the Minister of Justice with the respect and consideration it deserved. The Hon. the Premier in Scotland, and since he returned, had made several speeches containing strong expressions of loyalty, and in favour of the continued connection of Canada with the mother country. He hoped the hon. gentleman would not belie these expressions by—to use an eastern expression—making the Secretary for the Colonies “eat dirt.”

With regard to the offer of $750,000 to the Province: it had been said that the money if distributed would be a large amount per head. Now, he thought as that money was to be expended on Public Works, that the size of the Province should be taken into consideration.

It was said in the Minute of Council that if a sum in proportion was given to Ontario it would amount to an immense sum. But he (Mr. Roscoe) thought it would be just as fair to take the size of the Province into consideration and exclude the population. If this were done, considering that British Columbia was at least twice as large as Ontario, $750,000 would only be equivalent to $275,000 being given to Ontario.

In British Columbia the sources of industry were so widely distributed that roads had to be made for immense distances. There were gold mines 800 miles from the sea, and away at the extreme north of the Province, and therefore the expenditure on public-works was very large in proportion to the population. Then, again, there was a balance sheet at the end of the Minute of Council, showing the immense benefits British Columbia had received since coming into the Union. Figures could be made to prove anything. He objected to that balance sheet as a specious and unfair statement. There were many considerations which could not be actually put into figures. The hon. member for Middlesex had remarked this railway was to be built as a matter of sentiment. That was a mistake. No undertaking could be more paying. The fact that the emigration from Europe had diminished of late did not touch this question at all. One reason for the diminution was this—in consequence of the war in the States, protection and other causes, living was so dear in the neighbouring country, that emigrants (especially artisans) found they could do better in England. But how did it happen there was such a constant emigration from Canada to the States. A manufacturer at Boston had informed him that all the men in his establishment were Canadians, and large numbers of our people were employed in other factories in the same neighborhood. Go where you would in the States you would meet Canadians, and it was evident there was a constant emigration from this Dominion. The only way to stop that was to open up the splendid country in the North-West and let our emigration flow there and to British Columbia. In a recent speech Mr. Disraeli alluded to the colonial policy of former Administrations in England as “that narrow, sordid, creeping policy which had governed England’s relations with her colonies so long.” There could be no better words to describe the policy advocated by some hon. gentlemen opposite, who undervalued the resources of British Columbia. That Province was larger than Ontario and Quebec put together, and possessed not only coal and iron which fitted her for a great manufacturing Province, but also other valuable minerals and inexhaustible forests of the finest timber. But the great value of British Columbia to the Dominion was, it gave Canada a frontage on the Pacific Ocean. With that, and a frontage on the Atlantic, the Dominion could stretch forth two hands to grasp the commerce of the world. Few people who had not been on the Pacific coast could imagine the enormous development of trade there within the last few years. An Austrian Commissioner, in a book recently published, remarked:—“The Pacific Ocean is the gigantic page on which is written the future history of the race." If hon. gentlemen opposite who talked of repudiation and allowing British Columbia to go, could have their way, he (Mr. Roscoe) could imagine a future generation calling down the bitterest curses on the memory of those men whose sordid, creeping policy had lost to Canada the only thing which could make a great nation of this Dominion.

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON said if the remark "there is nothing new under the sun" were ever true, it was certainly so with regard to this question. It had been discussed until the public were tired of it. The hon. member who had just sat down spoke of the great size of British Columbia. Without desiring to depreciate that Province he (Mr. Cauchon) would remind the hon. gentleman that if a country were valued according to its size, England and France would be very poor nations. It was as absurd to judge of the importance of a country by its size as to consider a penny more valuable than a sovereign because it was larger.

He (Mr. Cauchon) had tried to follow the hon. member for Terrebonne and see whether he could bring any argument to show that the present Government had not done their utmost to fulfil the engagements made by their predecessors. The hon. gentleman acknowledged the late Government had promised more than they could give. They agreed to build the road in ten years without adding to the taxation of the people, but it was impossible to accomplish the undertaking without increasing very materially the burdens of the public. The intention was evidently to deceive the British Columbians, because they knew the work could not be done in the time specified. At the same time another interpretation of that agreement was offered, showing that it meant nothing at all; they declared they were not to do the work by themselves but by a company. They stipulated that it should only cost thirty millions with fifty millions of acres of land added; but supposing that it could not be accomplished for this—and they had seen that it was impossible—it was not to be done at all. The consequence would be that if the company had failed to build the railway with the means proffered, they would have demanded further aid, and thirty millions more must have been granted, provided that the taxation were not thereby increased. This would not have been found sufficient, for the line ran over 2,700 miles of country, through remote regions, far from all communication by water and rail, and a further demand would have been made, with the lands granted probably mortgaged, and compliance therewith must have been the result. Was it not fairer and more honest to say that this course could not be followed, and that as the Government must bear the responsibility, they should conduct the undertaking. He knew that railways as a rule should be constructed by private companies, but this was an exception, justifying the policy pursued. This was the true state of things, and this was why the position was changed. The present Administration had never said that they would abandon the railway, but they had announced that they would stand in this relation by the declaration of their predecessors, forced on them by the latter's supporters from Lower Canada, after the Bill was introduced. These hon. gentlemen saw the danger to which they were exposed, and they felt that the undertaking would necessitate not only an expenditure of thirty but of three, perhaps of five times thirty millions. It was accordingly provided that the building of the railway must not increase the taxation; and this was a logical position. The crisis through which we were passing, and the difficulties of the times, however, were such that this could not be avoided by any Government; and here lay the point at issue. The hon. gentlemen opposite, nevertheless, said:—"You must do it; you have promised to do it; and you are pledged to do it, whether we are ruined or not in consequence." Why should they not swallow the whale? Suppose it was folly to undertake the operation, it was promised, and it should be done.

He would tell another anecdote: He was acquainted with a man (a prestidigitateur), who was called Carrabora, and who went to Havana. As the fellow wanted to attract a large audience, he promised that he would eat a man. An immense crowd in consequence collected, and the man went on with all his acts of legerdemain, in order to amuse and astonish the people. At this moment he heard a spectator, with as strong a voice as the hon. member for Terrebonne, shout: "Eat the man." The cry soon became general, and at length the juggler replied: "Let the man who is disposed to be eaten come up." A countryman of extraordinary size responded, and the prestidigitateur demanded of him if he were not afraid, brandishing before him a rusty sword. No, he was not; he was prepared to submit to the ordeal, and then Carrabora having retreated a space, jumped forward and hit him on the nose. The candidate for being eaten thereupon took to his heels, and Carrabora of St. Jean explained to the crowd that he could not eat a man in one mouthful, but he could accomplish the task if they gave him sufficient time.

This was what the Government desired; they could eat this elephant if time were allowed for the purpose. This night hon. gentlemen opposite had more solemnly than ever admitted that they could not have built this road in ten years; they knew nothing of the country, and the engineering difficulties to be encountered were very great. It had also been proposed to bridge the Sound between the continent and Vancouver Island, and this would incur an expenditure of $20,000,000. The entire line would cost them finished, he imagined, at least from $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 to Lake Nipissing, as first projected. Then the construction of the Ottawa Branch from Lake Nipissing downwards was urged solely in the interests of Quebec, as Ontario naturally desired to connect with the Pacific Railway proper—which should stop, it held, at the lake mentioned—branch lines to Toronto, Hamilton and other towns within its limits. The only thing that all should have sought to secure was a fair proportion of the benefits of the line to each Province. If he was not mistaken, however, the hon. member for Cumberland had opposed the construction of the Ottawa Valley Branch. He was subject to correction, and this he invited from the hon. gentleman, if he was in error.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER replied that his views on the question were that Parliament should have adhered to the original policy fixing the eastern terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway proper at Lake Nipissing, the point they had agreed upon, and that the building of the line from Red River to Lake Nipissing would have given a better subsidy, and have better secured the communication from lake Nipissing down to the Ottawa and also down to the Ontario lines, connecting with Toronto, than subsidising the line now proposed. Two years ago Parliament had provided a subsidy of $12,000 per mile, to extend a railway up to Lake Nipissing; but not a blow had yet been struck, nor a mile of the line graded. He had never objected to the connection being made, but he would say that the original policy of bringing the trade of the North West to Lake Nipissing would have secured the construction of lines both to Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal better than by any other means. He had maintained that the extension of the line from Lake Nipissing to the Georgian Bay, was unnecessary, because the latter was already connected with Montreal by shorter routes.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—No! no!

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—Yes. The waters of Georgian Bay were nearer Montreal, via Port Hope, Lindsay and Midland City, than by the line proposed by the Government and subsidized last Session. It would be better to spend a million or a million and a half, if necessary, to connect the waters of Lake Nipissing with Georgian Bay, by improved navigation, than to expend four or five millions in constructing a branch line from Lake Nipissing to Georgian Bay. These were his views.

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON—This explanation was satisfactory, because it justified what he had said. The hon. member favoured navigation improvements, which was a new idea; and the hon. gentleman said that the shortest route was by Port Hope, but this was not the case. He did not pretend that Quebec should get everything, but it ought to obtain its fair share of public benefits. The hon. member for Cumberland was at variance in this relation with his Lower Canadian supporters. The branch was meant for Lower Canada, and the question arose upon which side of the Ottawa it should pass. The report of Mr. Shanly had also been spoken of, which was mixing up the canal with the railway. That report was to the effect that the canal would cost $30,000,000, but he (Mr. Cauchon) told him that his calculation was within the mark, and that it would cost $50,000,000—a fact which he would not gainsay. But it was with the railway they had to deal, and it was his opinion that it would cost from $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 before it was completed. Where would we find the money? We owe $14,000,000 now, and we had to curtail our expenses and stop public works in order to keep within the limits of our revenue. The interest of the money which it would cost to build the Pacific Railway would amount annually to $8,000,000 or $9,000,000. They were not going to abandon the road, but it was wise to wait for an increase of revenue so as not to force the Government to increase the taxation of the people. The American Pacific roads, the speaker went on to show, had cost more than $200,000,000, and they were only 1,700 miles long, whereas our railway would be over 2,000 miles in length. To think we could construct the Pacific railway with only $30,000,000 and the lands, which might be bad or indifferent, was an absurdity. The argument to-night was that the Government could not do what it was not claimed the late Administration could have done. This was not the time to consider whether we had gained by the union with British Columbia; it was our duty now to stand faithfully up to the engagement we made. The hon. member for Charlevoix had stated that the railway was not to be built for that province alone, but for the whole Dominion. Possibly that might have been the theory at the time, but we found such theories only in novels, where the author could make the heroine as beautiful as he choose to describe. The fact, however, was not in the imagination, and we knew very well that the road, which must be built in time, would not be so much to our advantage as to that of British Columbia, which had a white population of only 8,000.

An Hon. Member—No!

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON said the hon. member who preceded him said the population had decreased owing to the depression in the United States. It was supposed to be 10,000 at one time, and of course in view of that fact could not be so large now. He would be pleased if the Province developed so that they could overwhelm the whole Dominion, and help us to build our canals and other necessary improvements. He did not accuse them for not doing it, for nature had not done for them what it had done for others, but the time would come when there would be a large trade from the west side of the Rocky Mountains, when that country had become opened up and developed by immigration. After that the railway could be built across the Rocky Mountains as far as the country was able to construct it. The difficulties of reaching the Pacific coast from the Rocky Mountains were very great, but we were bound in honour to build the road, the only difference of opinion being as to the time in which we should do it. How had the Government sacrificed the interests of British Columbia or of the Dominion? Was it in trying to improve the navigation of the West, and give greater facilities for the transportation of freight and passengers? On the Pacific Slope they were doing as much as the means of the country would allow; they were doing more than could have been done under the company system proposed by the late Government. Then what was the crime of the Government that there should be another vote of want of confidence. If there was no other accusation to be urged against the Government it would be better to abandon the charge of mismanagement altogether. There were gentlemen in this House and in the Government who were in a better position to settle the route to be chosen for the railroad than he was, and they were supported in their opinion that the route chosen on the other side of Lake Superior was as short as the other, and at least fifty per cent. cheaper; and our means were so limited that we could not afford to expend money merely for the pleasure of doing so.

As to questions of engineering, they were to be settled by engineers. Mr. Legge was spoken of as a man who made no mistakes; if so, he was the most fortunate man that ever existed. The French General Turenne had remarked once when he heard a general boast that he had never made a mistake in war: "That man is an ass." And he found it was the same with engineers. When engineers were employed by private companies they stretched their consciences a great deal in order to suit their employers; but when they were employed by the country they did their duty as independent men in the interests of the Dominion. The question before the House was whether they should build the work—and they were bound to do it—in a short time, or to do it as our means would permit; the next thing was in choosing the line to adopt—that route which would be in the interests of the Dominion and not in the interests of any particular Province.

Mr. WRIGHT (Pontiac) said he hoped that the Hon. President of the Council was not, under the garb of friendship, endeavouring to strike a blow from behind at the enterprise in which he, in common with himself, assumed to have a warm interest. He had thought the Georgian Bay branch was not proposed to be built in the interests of the Province of Quebec alone, but he had assumed that it was to have been constructed in the interests of the Dominion generally, and he as a Lower Canada representative, would be sorry to come to this House and invite assistance towards a road in which he and his constituents were interested, and place it on the selfish ground that it suited the interests of his Province at the expense of all the other Provinces of the Dominion. He thought it would be dangerous to advocate the construction of a road on such a ground. If he understood the words of the President of the Council this Georgian Bay branch would be inimical to the interests of Belleville, Port Hope, Kingston, and other towns along the St. Lawrence. He understood the hon. gentleman as appealing to the Lower Canada representatives and asking them how they could still occupy the position of followers of the hon. member for Cumberland against the Government, who were building a road to suit Quebec against the interests of a large majority of the people of Ontario. He would tell the President of the Council that he quite disagreed from the member from Cumberland if that hon. gentleman thought this road should not be built. He thought it was legitimate for the Province of Quebec to support it, as she had pledged her credit and her resources towards the construction of a line from Quebec to Aylmer, which was ultimately to extend to Pontiac; but she had a right to stop at the confines of her own territory and not extend her enterprise into a neighbouring province. But it was foolish to urge such reasons as the Hon. President of the Council had urged in favour of the Georgian Bay Branch, because it would bring down upon it the adverse vote of the Province of Ontario on the ground that the road was being built in the interests of Quebec alone. The Minister of Public Works dared not endorse the sentiments that had been advanced by his colleague, and say that he was working in the interest of our Province in the construction of this branch. It would be exceedingly dangerous to the interests of Quebec if they were to enforce the sentiments of the President of the Council, and he for one repudiated them and asked the House to agree with him in supporting the construction of the Georgian Bay Branch as a portion of the Pacific Road. He for one would support that policy, because he believed it to be a good policy, and because he believed it would not only advance the interests of his own Province, but the interests of the Dominion generally.

Mr. PLUMB said they were asked by the Government to vote a large sum for the Pacific Railway. On the other hand there were utterances from the Government side of the House with regard to the impossibility of building the Pacific Railway and maintaining it, after it was constructed, that from these contradictions he was inclined to doubt whether the Government were at all in earnest in their endeavors to carry out the work. We had been told a short time ago by gentlemen on the Ministerial side of the House that this Pacific Railway was only a sentiment, a sort of romance, an impracticability, as he understood the President of the Council to say, who had just spoken on the subject. They had been educated on this question of the Pacific Railway by the utterances of the press of the Dominion, particularly by the organ of the Government at Toronto, which, when this project of Union with British Columbia came up, and the railroad became a pressing question of public policy, in its attempts to lead public opinion, gave forth no half-hearted expressions, and did not argue that a Pacific Railway was a sentiment or a romance. No, it was then spoken of as a great, practical, immediate and pressing necessity, and in support of what he had said on the subject, he would read a few words published in that journal in the year 1871:—

"1. The Pacific Railway through British territory is a necessity, if the new Dominion is to have anything like a fair chance of fulfilling its destiny and developing its mighty and varied resources.

"2. The line through British territory must be carried through, if British authority is to be maintained on this continent, and our new Dominion made practically, as well as in theory, a great fact.

"The desire of the Canadian people to remain in connection with, and as an integral portion of the British empire, has its root in something far stronger than either tradition or romance, and to maintain this connection, they are prepared to make great sacrifices; but it so happens that in this case the sacrifice would have to be made and encountered not by putting through a costly line of railway over British territory, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, but by refraining from the work.

"3. Politically it is a manifest and pressing necessity, while commercially it is of the very highest importance for Canada. In this way alone can this country have any chance for her fair share in the lucrative trade with the North-West, which will assuredly spring up, and in the varied traffic with the Pacific world which, to a great extent, will pass through Canadian territory, if once what will be the shortest and easiest route from ocean to ocean is in working order.

"5. Our rulers will be traitors to their country and to British connections if they lose a single season in making it practicable and convenient for settlers to go to Fort Garry through our own territory, and in putting things in a fair way for the Canadian Pacific Railway.

"6. It is a question not only of convenience but of national existence. It must be pushed through at whatever expense. We believe it can be so pushed through, not only without being a burden pecuniarily upon Canada, but with an absolute profit in every point of view. Without such a line a great British North America would turn out an unsubstantial dream; with it, and with ordinary prudence and wisdom on the part of her statesmen, it will be a great, a glorious, and veritable reality.

The President of the Council had argued against building the road, referring to the financial history of the Pacific Railway in the United States, and had quoted its enormous apparent capital as a warning to us as to the cost of ours. He (Mr. Plumb) had already on a previous occasion referred to the precise figures as to these roads, and he might now say briefly that they were constructed during a period of high prices and depreciated currency in the United States, and the cost thereby was greatly enhanced. It was also notorious that the item of capital stock had been made to represent a far larger sum than the actual amount paid in, by what is called watering. These causes had increased the nominal beyond the actual cost of the road to the extent of at least fifty or sixty millions of dollars, reckoned upon a gold basis. He then proceeded to show that in the year 1874 the Pacific Railway paid 6 per cent. net upon the whole debt and capital stock, greatly swelled as these had been by causes referred to, representing the apparent, though not real, cost of the line. He had not the precise figures of the year 1875, but he understood that their net earnings amounted to about $3,000,000 more than in 1874. He thought they could not have a better argument than this, in so far as the practicability of building our road is concerned, and upon the construction of which we are called to spend large sums.

The hon. member for Middlesex had argued that the road should not be built in advance of population; but that we must wait till the North-West was fully peopled before we extended the road through that country. To this policy, he (Mr. Plumb) took the strongest exception, as being in direct opposition to the enlightened experience of the present age.

He did not think, however, that the route selected from Fort William to Winnipeg would enable the line to pay running expenses; but he was glad to learn from the First Minister that it would not be rendered still more unprofitable by the use of the great "water interests" that lay between Fort William and Winnipeg. When the charter was granted in 1873 there was a clause inserted which stipulated that in carrying on the work there should be no increased burthen of taxation thrown on the people. In the preamble of the Pacific Railway Act of 1874, which Mr. Plumb read, reference was made to the fact that taxation had been increased to provide for the construction of this railroad. That being the case, he failed to see that the large amount of taxation involved in the increased tariff of that year had been applied for the purpose of building the road. Some part of it may have been applied to the surveys, which he was glad to see were being prosecuted; but he did not regard the Fort William section or the Georgian Bay Branch, upon the construction of which we are called to spend large sums, as any part of the line of the Pacific Railway.

The hon. member for Middlesex had argued that the road should not be built in advance of population, but that we must wait till the North-West was fully peopled before we extended the road through that country. Now, it was well known to every one who had the most casual knowledge of the subject, that the settlement of the Western States would never have gone on so rapidly if such views had prevailed. It was impossible to settle any large population in Manitoba and the North-West without a railroad to carry people there. It was admitted that a large portion of the line could be constructed for ten to fifteen thousand dollars per mile at the present prices of railway iron and labour, and it was desirable, if the road was to be built at all, to push it forward from Winnipeg westward as rapidly as possible, instead of wasting the public money in carrying out the halting, temporizing policy now pursued—a policy dictated by a disposition on the part of the Government to abandon the work, on the one hand, and the well understood desire on the part of the people to proceed with it, on the other.

It had been said by the hon. member for West Middlesex, that emigration to the United States was falling off. That fact was patent to everybody, but it was due to the depression which had prevailed in that country for the past two years. Many emigrants, especially artisans and skilled labourers, on arriving there could find no employment, and they returned to Europe. It was admitted, however, that Canadians were being drawn to the United States, and he believed we could direct that emigration to our North-West country by the construction of this road.

He believed the road could be built without increasing taxation, because it would develop our resources, especially our coal and iron, and add to our population. Everybody admitted the Dominion was under sacred obligations to build the railway; but some hon. gentlemen asked why should such a great work be undertaken for the 10,000 people in British Columbia. The importance of British Columbia was not to be judged by her 10,000 inhabitants, but by her vast extent and unlimited resources. He always regretted to hear any taunt thrown against that Province or its representatives. If any mistake had been made it was not their fault. But the construction of this route was not a dream or a romance. It would be fulfilled, if not by this Government, by one that would succeed it. The road was a "manifest destiny," and the sooner this fact was recognized, the better for the interests and welfare of all parts of this Dominion.

Mr. THOMPSON (Cariboo) congratulated the Premier upon his able, exhaustive and comprehensive speech, in which he had shown the feasibility of the road. After hearing all this, and turning to the estimates he (Mr. Thompson) regretted to see the "lame and impotent conclusion" of that speech. After all that had been said about the willingness of the Government to build the road, and to carry out the agreement with Lord Carnarvon, why was there so small an appropriation in the estimates? On the opening of this debate the Minister of Justice was asked to explain the meaning of the celebrated Order in Council before the House? He said the sum total of it was in the following words:—“It remains only to endeavor to construct the Pacific Railway as rapidly as the resources of the country will permit.” This could not be called very satisfactory.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—Would the hon. gentleman want us to build the road faster than the resources of the country would permit?

Mr. THOMPSON desired the hon. gentleman to explain the limit of the resources of the country, and to state if the Ministry was willing to draw upon these resources to their fullest extent.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—Even if we have a little more taxation?

Mr. THOMPSON thought that we could bear a little more taxation, if necessary. By the Minute of Council, dated the 20th of September, British Columbia was offered $750,000; it was now stated by the Ministry that this was in lieu of the construction of the Nanaimo and Esquimalt Railway, but this had not been the belief of the Ministry and people of British Columbia. The Minute was written in language which was unmistakeable. It was stated that the Ministry did not wish to break any portion of the Carnarvon terms; but these were manifestly violated, as only $500,000 were placed in the estimates in this relation, when the amount should have been two millions according to the Carnarvon agreement, nor was any proposal submitted for expending even the smaller sum. The Government had acted in another instance towards British Columbia in a manner which was unworthy of them. Parliament had passed an Act in 1874, empowering the Governor in Council, at his discretion, to advance to any Province any sum of money not exceeding the amount on which the Dominion was paying interest to such Province, for prosecution of public works. On the strength of this assurance, British Columbia undertook to make extensive public improvements, believing they could draw on the Treasury for the sum of $900,000 or $950,000, on which they now received interest at the rate of five per cent per annum. They obtained something less than $200,000, and were then coolly informed that no more would be advanced, but instead a portion of the subsidy for the ensuing year was offered. And believing that the necessity of the Province would compel them to accept any terms they also proposed the $750,000 compensation. The Legislature and the people of British Columbia had spurned the offer of $750,000 indignantly; and had again appealed to England. Whatever might be the result he thought it would be generally admitted that they had acted in a manly and straightforward manner throughout. He was happy to see that the feeling among members on the opposite side of the House, in this connection, had in some degree improved; the bright and honorable example was the hon. member for Muskoka, who had tendered the people of British Columbia his sympathies, but this would not build railways, or make people prosper; they desired to obtain something more substantial. He also thanked the hon. member for North York for the remarks this hon. gentleman had made—which presented a striking contrast to those of the hon. members for Middlesex, Halifax, East York, and other constituencies, including the hon. member for Temiscouata, who had declared that British Columbia's secession from the Union would be hailed in his county with an illumination. It was no matter for wonder that the people of British Columbia thought that they were treated with unfairness. The President of the Council exclaimed that this Province only contained 8,000 people! But what mattered this? It had never been made a point in argument on their part. They simply demanded that the promises of Canada should be as fairly carried out as possible. They were perfectly willing to agree with the sentiments of Governor Trutch when he said, that if the road were not built within fifteen or twenty years instead of ten, they would be satisfied, provided work was earnestly carried on. The Hon. Minister of Justice had himself admitted that the resolution, with reference to taxation, was not binding on the Province. He agreed with what the hon. member for Victoria had said that evening; and this hon. gentleman's remarks were deserving of the greatest attention. The hon. member for Yale had gone very fully into the subject; but he regretted that the hon. gentleman had dwelt upon local questions, which were altogether foreign to this debate, showing his animosity towards the late Government of British Columbia. He (Mr. Thompson) thought that Ministry had acted in a very straightforward manner in their negotiations with Mr. Edgar and the Dominion Government. He agreed with the hon. gentleman that the people of British Columbia knew nothing of the resolution as to non-increase of taxation, but the latter were willing and anxious to do all they could to assist the people of the other Provinces in connection with the construction of the Pacific Railway. The hon. gentleman admitted that the terms of the Minute of Council of the 20th of September were mystifying; this being the case, was it surprising that the Government of that Province had been mystified by them? The Government should show that they were in earnest in this matter, and construct a portion of the line during the present year; they should not spend the time in surveying route after route, and keeping off apparently as far as possible the realization of this great project. This road would form a great highway, which would not be a mere subsidiary line for a small population in British Columbia. It would aid in building up the Empire, and would enable us to carry out great and national aspirations. It was an absolute necessity in the interests of the Dominion, and he implored the Government on behalf of the people of British Columbia to prove their sincerity by putting a portion of the line under actual construction at once.

Mr. FARROW stated that he had peculiar views regarding this railway project. The hon. member for Middlesex had viewed the scheme in two lights—from commercial and national points of view, and the hon. gentleman affirmed, that as a commercial speculation, it would prove unprofitable. The hon. gentleman did not tell them exactly how he came to that conclusion; he said the British Columbians were small in number, and that their total exports only amounted to $4,000,000. He thought the hon. member had a stunted idea of the question. If he had cast his eye westwards and taken in the vast trade of China and Japan, which would be attracted by our line, he would have come to a different conclusion. There was more to be looked to than the trade with British Columbia. If by building the road we could attract the western trade, amounting to $200,000,000 per annum, in addition to the trade of that Province and the local traffic along the route, it would be a commercial success. The question of interest had been adverted to, but the experience of the Americans, should in a great measure guide us in that respect. After an exhaustive war which entailed an enormous debt, they built two Pacific railways, and were contemplating the construction of a third. What was the use of those squeamish ideas which had been enunciated; they were belittling to the individuals who gave them utterance as well as the people who listened to them and the country? People talked glibly about this undertaking, about its grand results, and then added "But are you willing to pay for it." We had a Minister of Justice, who with clenched fists and the gestures of an orator, pounded the desk and asked "Are you willing to be taxed for it," and the poor farmers began to squirm under it, and not understanding the question, took all the hon. gentleman said for gospel, and swallowed it down as a gilded pill. But this was not a fair argument. What was the original proposition to build the road? An honorable company was formed, pledged to its construction for a certain amount of money and a certain quantity of land, and there was to be no increase in the taxation. It could be built even yet on this principle, although the plan was dishonourably allowed to fall through. We had the land and the money yet, and could build it without increasing the taxation. The delay in the construction of the railway was not only an injustice to British Columbia but to ourselves. Our young men were leaving the country to settle in the United States. We had better lands and could offer better inducements if we would only push this road into Saskatchewan Valley; but our Government had not shown statesmanship equal to the occasion. They were spending millions on the Georgian Bay and Pembina Branches, for which there was no pressing need. We ought to try and keep our citizens in the country, and with this object we should build the road from the head of Lake Superior right through to Fort Garry, and on into the fertile Saskatchewan. How long were we to wait for this, and see the public money thrown away on surveys? The Great Western had set the Government a good example by building a railway 70 miles in length in nine months, at a cost of $1,000,000. It was known that the United States looked with a covetous eye on British Columbia; they had their agents in the country, who would gladly report the dissatisfaction which prevailed. We ought to remove the cause of this dissatisfaction. The people were the most patient people in the world. They had suffered greatly, and were willing to suffer yet if the Government would only bestir themselves and proceed with the railway. The people were not afraid of the taxation. There was ground for the belief that it could be constructed without any increase in our burdens.

Mr. SCHULTZ said that when the question of a Pacific Railroad was first discussed in this House, so far as he knew every speaker admitted its value as a means of colonizing the North-West. There were those who doubted its value for the carriage of the produce of China and Japan, and who hesitated at the great cost it was presumed the British Columbia section would entail, yet upon the point of its value as a colonization road all were united. The value of the possession we had acquired in the North-West was just beginning to be appreciated, and when the first data shewed that we now had in the Dominion of Canada a larger wheat growing area than was possessed in the United States, a natural desire was felt to people these fertile valleys with the surplus population of the Old World, and entering fairly with the United States into competition, deviate at least a portion of that stream of immigration which was making our neighbours so powerful and wealthy. The Government of the day wisely followed the liberal policy of the United States in the matter of homesteads—It even did more. It passed such laws as regards citizenship and holding of these homesteads, as enabled our emigration agents to offer more inducements to the intending emigrant than could possibly be offered from the United States. We had the land, hundreds of thousands of acres of the best on this continent, possibly the best in the world. We had the prairies different from these of the Western States only in the fact that a very much greater portion of their surface was covered with wood, and we lacked only one thing—a means of communication. The time had passed when settlement meant the slow and toilsome cutting of waggon roads through timbered countries as a means of access to the scene of settlement. The colonization Railroads of the United States had changed all that. Preceding instead of following the settler they were to lighten his burdens and render easy the task which enabled him to write to Fatherland that in a year or at most two, he was enjoying the fruits of what the most scientific tillage in older and worn out lands could not give him, and to urge those with whom he had been associated in poverty to come and join him in plenty.

We needed communication. The fertile valleys of the Assiniboine and the Red River were three hundred and fifty miles from Lake Superior. The problem of the profitable growing of the cereals was sufficiently solved by the fact that wheat could be drawn five hundred miles by rail from Chicago at a profit; and Thunder Bay, as near tide water as the head of Lake Michigan, might yet become as great a depot for these grains as that place. The Canada Pacific Railroad solved the question of ingress and egress. When finished from Lake Superior to Red River we could send in the immigrants to that country and transport its produce with the same ease with which these services were being rendered by the western American Railroads. It was clear then that this portion of the Canada Pacific Railroad was to be the most important, and in view of this fact, he could not understand the action of the Government in regard to it. Last year in the House the Government policy was announced to be, short lines of rail at the ends, to connect the western water stretches that intervened with Lake Superior and the Red River, but condemnation of any such scheme had so often met it both in and out of the House that the Government were now compelled to urge that they would only use the water stretches till an all rail route could be conveniently built. Again it was urged against the extension of the railway West of Red River, that we had in that country a magnificent stream, the Saskatchewan, upon whose bosom the commerce of a nation might sail, and it was in such expectations as these that he (Mr. Schultz), saw the danger of delay in the first place, and the enormous expenditure of money useless in the second. The Saskatchewan River and Lake Winnipeg could no more do the work of a colonization railway to the West than the mixed land and water, or what the hon. member for Marquette, had aptly termed the "amphibious route," could take the place of the through rail communication from Thunder Bay to Red River. These views were utterly fallacious, and any attempt to economize their water stretches or the river referred to, would only delay the building of the road, cause a useless expenditure and damage to the whole country, to an incalculable extent. Let the road be completed between Thunder Bay and Red River. Let enough of the line West of this be built to satisfy the immediate wants of the settlers there, and then, and not till then, let the enormous amounts be voted for other parts which were conceded to be less important and often condemned as useless. The House had voted last

Mr. SCHULTZ.

Session five millions for the British Columbia section, and seven millions for the Foster contract, while the net result of a year's work in the line between Lake Superior and Red River seems to be about twenty miles of grading at each end.

Westward the star of empire is said to take its way, but ours seemed to move in that direction very slowly, in fact seemed likely to come to a full stop at the western boundary of Ontario somewhere about Shelandowan.

In the matter of the Pembina branch of the Canada Pacific Railway he felt that the Government were in error in not completing it, as that would, in his opinion, have the effect of inducing the Americans to make the connection with it, which is only broken by about forty miles, and in any case is needed for Provincial traffic and settlement. He thought also that the line from Winnipeg to the crossing of the Canada Pacific should be completed, and that it would be found, when all arguments were dispassionately weighed, that the true course was to cross with this branch at Winnipeg, and effect a junction with the Canada Pacific on the west side of the Red River. It had been found that it was only half a mile longer to do this. The City Council had made a most generous offer as regards the railway bridge, and the feelings of those who had been so disappointed by the moving of the main line should be consulted in this matter.

In conclusion he (Mr. Schultz) could only say that, without a railroad, Canada would be better without the Northwest, for the money spent in its purchase, in subduing its rebellion, and in establishing and maintaining its government, was simply thrown away, without the Dominion was in a position to expect that return which a rapid increase of population would cause, and which could only be obtained by the immediate construction of at least this portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said he thought the hon. Minister of Public Works would hardly expect the Committee to carry this item without further explanation. The item they were asked to vote was $2,810,000 for the Pacific Railway. He turned to the next page and found what that amount comprised. The first item was the telegraph line and construction of railway, $410,000; then steel rails and fastenings, $2,000,000, voted in 1875-'76, and nothing asked in the present year. The Committee would remember that the hon. gentleman had stated a year ago that the purchase of steel rails and fastenings for the Pacific Railway involved an expenditure of $2,665,000; and now he asked the hon. gentleman to explain why, as there were only $2,000,000 voted for that service last year, the balance was not refunded at the present time, although the contracts were laid on the table last year to the amount of $2,665,000?

Then he came to the Pembina Branch, $100,000. It had been explained that it was intended to go on with the work from Winnipeg down to the junction at Selkirk. But the item which required explanation was the Georgian Bay Branch, $1,000,000, to be voted at the present time. A year ago they had laid on the table of the House a contract with Mr. Foster for the construction of the Georgian Bay Branch, and providing for certain payments under that contract. That contract had been cancelled, and the Hon. Minister of Public Works had not offered to the Committee a single word of explanation as to how the Government proposed to deal with the subject; whether it was proposed to enter into a new contract, or on what understanding he asked this Committee to vote a million of dollars, to carry out a contract which the Government had announced to the House had been cancelled. If the Minister of Public Works asked the Committee to vote this sum under these circumstances, he would do what no Minister had ever done before, and what he hoped no Minister would do at the present time. He did not think it could be considered unreasonable on his part to ask, after the House had been informed that this contract had been cancelled and had the statement of the contractor that he had been unable to carry it out, that it was impracticable, and that the means provided were inadequate. If they were not to get an explanation their he knew of no possible object in Parliament being called together, or in there being asked to take into consideration the provision of supplies for the public service.

He found in the correspondence laid upon the table of the Senate the contractor was under the necessity of seeking certain modifications, that it would be impossible to carry out some of the stipulations of the contract; a proposal was made to substitute twenty-six miles of navigation for twenty-six miles of railway; that the proposal of the Government to have constructed ninety miles of railway over an unsurveyed country with certain grades and curves, was utterly impracticable; it was found so utterly impossible of fulfilment that the contractor had not located a mile of it and that the road could not be built for the amount of money proposed by the Government.

They had not only proposed to make a large number of concessions or alterations in this contract, but they had any announcement on the part of the Government that they had cancelled the contract, and he would ask the Government how they proposed to deal with the question. This was a subject on which they were bound to give information before the money was voted.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—A Minute in Council on the subject has been laid on the table in the other House, which shows the disposition of Government in the matter.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER mentioned that this House was entitled to the same information. He had not seen the document referred to.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the papers had not been asked for, but he was willing to give all the information the hon. gentleman desired, and he would do so when he resumed his seat.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said that as the hon. gentleman did not intend to carry the railway through Sault St. Marie, that portion of the line would receive the hearty co-operation of every gentleman on his side of the House. There was an item for $500,000 for expenditure on the mainland in British Columbia and he thought they had a right to know where that money was to be expended.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he was sorry in the first place that the hon. member for Cumberland should have felt his explanations were so very unsatisfactory the other night about the condition of the road. If they were unsatisfactory he could only ascribe it to what the hon. gentleman frequently characterized as his (Mr. Mackenzie's) incapacity, and he felt that an apology was due to the Committee, as he had done the best he could. There were three points on which the hon. gentleman demanded explanation specifically. He demanded to know why they were not asking for a vote for something they did not ask for. He did not know the hon. gentleman was entitled to any explanation on that point. As far as they were asking for money they were bound to state what it was for. If they did not put a vote on the estimates this year it was simply because they did not want any more steel rails. With regard to the Georgian Bay Branch, he found that the papers gave a full summary of the official document. He did not remember the precise words of his Minute, but he remembered that some modifications were required which the Department did not consider they would be justified in making without a new contract was entered into after proper tenders had been put in. The policy of the Government, then, was to invite new tenders for that branch.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—According to the proposition of Mr. Foster?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government were not in possession of information enough to know whether the precise spot at which they would terminate at the French River was Cantin's Bay. It might be further up or down the river, but they did not feel in a position to state precisely without further information what particular point of the river they should reach. As soon as they were able to get that, they proposed to put the work under contract. The hon. gentleman must remember also with regard to that million of dollars, it included payments that might be made of any subsidy to the Canada Central. The Government had an arrangement with that company, and they (the company) made the contract with Mr. Foster. That obligation had to be met, having been sanctioned by Parliament in the most formal manner. A part of this million was proposed to be expended on this extension. A good deal had been said about this being a link. By stretching a cord on the map from Montreal to Thunder Bay or Nipigon, it would be seen this line lay directly in the route of the the Pacific Railway. The Canada Central formed the straightest possible way from Portage du Fort and the Georgian Bay Branch formed a continuation of that line in nearly the same direction. He did not know the country between that point on French River and the Pic, but was familiar with the country from there to Michipicoten. He had always expressed his anxiety that the line should go on the south side of Nipissing. It was unquestionably the shortest route and traversed the best country. Whether it passed immediately south of the lake or at some distance from it was a matter of no concern, because it would be an exact link in the line. He had deemed it advisable, wise and proper, to have the country examined along the whole coast of Lake Superior for some distance inland, in order to ascertain, if they found it desirable or convenient at any time in the future to have a road built nearer the lake, coming pretty close to the Sault, and touching, perhaps, at Batchewana Bay, perhaps at Michipicoten Bay—perhaps at both, perhaps at neither—to have as perfect knowledge of the topography of the country as possible, not with a view to any present action (because they did not anticipate any for some years in that country) but that they should have all the information needed at the command of Parliament. By the Act of 1874 the Government were not required to submit the contract for the Georgian Bay Branch to Parliament for approval. When this contract was made it was convenient to lay it before the House, because the Session commenced soon after. If the Government should find it convenient to enter into a new contract before the next meeting of Parliament, it would be submitted in the same manner. If they considered it advisable to go on with the work before the Session, they would do so under the statute, without consulting Parliament as had been done before.

With regard to the next part, going west, the hon. member had expressed himself satisfied. The Government proposed before Parliament rose to ask authority to enter into new arrangements for grading certain portions of that line on what it was now determined should be the main line of the railway. With regard to the $500,000 asked for British Columbia he could not say how it would be expended. The Government expected to be able to have the line located in British Columbia during the year. It might be pretty early in the year, and they might in the course of the twelve months be able to place it under contract. The contract would have to be submitted to Parliament, but they were taking money that might be expended before the 1st of July, 1877, and if a contract should be entered into, it would be required before the end of the financial year. He was willing to tell anything he knew to the Committee. They were entitled to it, and he was quite prepared to give it even if they were not.

There was one remark of the hon. member for Yale that his (Mr. Mackenzie's) information led him to think was incorrect—that was as to the length of the Fraser line as compared with that to the Dean Channel. The Engineers reported—and their measurements were almost exact—the latter to be some miles the shorter. It was proper, of course, to say the distances on the Fraser route had not been exactly determined by instrumental measurements, and might be a little shorter or longer than they had been represented, but the distance in both cases was believed to be about the same. The grades of the Fraser River route were the best of the whole of the Pacific Road. Some hon. member had asked why nothing was said about the route to Howe Point. The reason was the route was utterly impracticable.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER took exception to the statement that no expla-ation was required to be offered for not asking for money for certain purposes in the estimates. The hon. gentleman was wrong there. He stated a year ago to the House that he had made contracts which would require an appropriation of $2,665,000, and the papers subsequently brought down showed that that amount would be considerably exceeded for the steel rails contract. The hon. gentleman said he would only require a vote of $2,000,000 last year, because he did not expect more money would be required before Parliament would meet again. The hon. gentleman was bound to make his statement of last Session agree with the statement of this Session. There was a difference of over $500,000 in the two statements.

With reference to the Georgian Bay Branch, he (Mr. Tupper) was exceedingly glad to learn it was not the intention of the Government to assent to the propositions made by Mr. Foster, and that new tenders would be invited. He could hardly imagine it possible that the Government would pay Mr. Foster for such improvements as would give 26 miles of navigation, two or three times as much as would be required to make navigation perfect up to Lake Nipissing. No explanation had been given to the House as to whether no alteration was proposed in the direction of the Canada Central extension, the contract made a year ago having stipulated for the completion of that work by the first of January, 1877:

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said the contract was made between the company and the contractor.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said he was aware of that, but he assumed the proposal of the Government to give a subsidy of $12,000 per mile to the Canada Central was not to last forever. The papers would show, he believed, that the work should be completed at that time in order to entitle them to the subsidy.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—The Order in Council stated that it should be done to the satisfaction of the Government.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—That is precisely the point—the Government required the company to make a contract involving the completion of that work.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—To their satisfaction.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—The contract has been made, and had to be made in such a manner as to satisfy the Administration, which bound the contractor to build the line by the 1st of January, 1877. This was now of course impossible; and he would like the Minister of Public Works to state what modifications were intended to be made with relation to the subsidy of the Canada Central; also whether the line was to be changed, as he hoped would be the case. Instead of Douglas and Burnt Lake, other points should be chosen. It should take a northerly direction to places south and east of Lake Nipissing. The word "near" should be made to mean it in reality, and not to signify 25 or 30 miles from the lake.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE replied that the only object the Government had in view in the first place in projecting the construction of the Georgian Bay Branch, and in subsidising the Canada Central, was to obtain the most direct line from Georgian Bay to Montreal and Quebec. The contract for the branch line had been awarded on information furnished by an engineer of the Department of Public Works, and they had no reason to doubt its correctness. If he discovered that it was inaccurate, and that a deviation from the line proposed would be shorter or better in any way, he would feel bound in the public interest to adopt this course.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—Great difficulties have been encountered on this line, have they not?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—No, never.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—Mr. Foster says so, however.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—But we do not accept Mr. Foster as an engineering authority at all.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—Do you question his accuracy?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE did not doubt that Mr. Foster considered his own statements accurate. His (Mr. Mackenzie's) information was furnished by Mr. Ryder—in which Mr. Fleming entirely concurred—to the effect that while a grade of 80 feet would be required for four miles, there was no necessity for so severe a general grade as 52.80 per mile; this he was bound to accept. They proposed to act like sensible men, and in the public interest; the route in question was chosen simply because it was the shortest, and because they believed it to be the best. Their object in every case was to secure the shortest possible line from French River to Montreal, connecting with Canadian roads, either at Portage du Fort or at Ottawa; this could be accomplished without any trouble at the former place, without incurring a more severe grade than 52.80, or one per hundred.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) regretted that party feeling should have been permitted in anywise to enter into the discussion on this subject—one of vast and general importance—a question, the solution of which must in any case be attended with great difficulty—an undertaking of such magnitude as to demand the cordial co-operation of the whole country to insure its successful completion, and which ought therefore to be regarded wholly outside of party considerations.

The people of Manitoba would be gratified by the assurance—the reassurance on the part of the Government that they intended to carry through, or rather that they did not propose to abandon their intention of constructing an all rail road from Lake Superior to Manitoba, for he distinctly understood that their purpose all along was to complete the road between these two points with all possible despatch, merely using the water courses in the meantime during the progress of the work, and not substituting them for any portion of the road—More than this it would be absurd to demand.

It was admitted on all hands that we have undertaken an obligation towards British Columbia to build a railway through to the Pacific, and he for one held that everything that is practicable should be done to carry out this engagement.

British Columbia, in view of its great natural resources, abounding, as it does in mineral wealth, was well worthy of their best attention and consideration—and although less generally known, its agricultural and pastoral capabilities were also of a high order. He considered that we had cause to congratulate ourselves on having added to the Dominion so fair a Province, and trusted and believed that however we might differ on minor points, the people of British Columbia, convinced by the determination of Canada faithfully to fulfil all her obligations to the utmost extent that the resources of the Dominion permitted, would never seek to recede from Confederation. British Columbia, with her resources fully developed, would greatly add to the importance and prosperity of the Dominion, and the main question then to be considered was how far the resources of Canada would warrant the vigorous prosecution of this work. And here he would give it as his opinion that if it was to be accomplished at all it must be directly by the Government, and not through the instrumentality of a Company, as at one time proposed. The hon. member for North Huron spoke of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company as having been composed of most honourable men, well qualified to carry out this great undertaking, and who would have accomplished it had they not been interfered with by outside influences. The gentlemen who composed that Company were doubtless men of the highest respectability, and some of them possessed of great wealth, but he (Mr. Smith) would have asked the right hon. gentleman from Kingston had he been in his place to-night, if the gallant knight who presided over that Company had not, before leaving this country, misgivings as to the success of the mission he was about to undertake, and he would now ask his hon. friend from Cumberland, and the other members of the late Government who sat near to him, whether within eight days after the deputation reached London, those gentlemen were not convinced that it was impossible to procure the money required on the terms proposed, and in fact that nothing short of a guarantee from the Government of interest to some extent on the whole amount of the bonds could induce capitalists to embark in the enterprise. This it must be borne in mind was before any party influence had been brought to play, if indeed such had at all been employed, which he was not inclined to believe, to thwart the scheme. He had been in England about that time, and had learned on what he believed to be the best authority that the capitalists with whom the Company wished to negotiate would not touch the proposition on any other terms than a Government guarantee, as just stated.

There was one point more on which he would like to say a word or two. The Hon. Prime Minister had stated that the principal reason for carrying the railway from the Red River north of Lake Manitoba to Fort Pelly was to shorten the distance; but he hoped now that the seat of Government for the North-West Territory was to be removed to a point some three hundred miles west and somewhat south of that first proposed. The hon. gentleman might see his way to reconsider the location of this portion of the line so as to bring it south of Lake Manitoba, an alteration which would confer a very great benefit on the Province of Manitoba, and would command the approval and hearty thanks of its people. He believed that the statement and explanation of the Premier would give general satisfaction.

Mr. McCALLUM asked if the hon. Premier could give any information as to the fall of snow in that county during the winter?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said it was very deep, but not so deep as generally imagined. He was sorry his hon. friend had not mentioned this matter sooner; if he had done so he would have procured some facts on the subject.

Mr. DYMOND remarked that there was some interesting information on that point in Mr. Fleming's last report.

Hon. Mr. ROBINSON would not have risen had it not been for a remark of the hon. member for Terrebonne in his able speech before recess. That hon. gentleman had been accused more than once during the Session of being the most extreme man in both politics and religion of the French Canadian members of the House. Addressing himself to the Hon. Premier, and referring to the Georgian Bay Branch, the hon.

gentleman stated that when the interests of the Dominion generally were concerned, as he thought they were in this case, he would be liberal, and if the Hon. First Minister thought fit to subsidize a road in the interest of Ontario to connect with that Branch he would not oppose him. The policy of the Hon. Premier in the inauguration of the Georgian Bay Branch was that it was to be constructed from the mouth of the French River and extend eastwards. This policy immediately excited attention throughout the country, or at any rate the Province of Ontario. Deputations from Toronto and other cities waited upon the Hon. First Minister to ascertain whether in the interests of Ontario he would assist a road to join the branch of the Pacific Railway. If he recollected right, the answer given was that it was incompatible with the public interests of the Dominion that such an extension should be made in the interests of that Province. He wanted the people to understand that if there was any illiberality in this matter it did not come from the French Canadian members, but from a source from which they were entitled to expect better things. It was to let the people of Ontario know where the blame rested in this particular that he rose on this occasion. What was the policy of the old Government as far as that province was concerned? It was said that when the road was completed from the eastwards it would stop at a point south of Nipissing, and that the provinces of Quebec and Ontario could come up to the point by their own energy and enterprise if they wished to take advantage of the commerce which was expected to flow over that road. But that state of things was changed. The Hon. Premier had declared it necessary to construct another road, and the people of Ontario could not help asking why they should be overlooked and a new route for this commerce be instituted. The inhabitants of that province had done much towards purchasing and peopling the North-West, and it was not right that at the dictum of the present Government they should be refused a share in the advantages of the Georgian Bay Branch. The colleague of the hon.

Hon. Mr. ROBINSON.

member for Muskoka had stated some months ago on his reputation as a gentleman that the trade of the North-West would never find its way over the French River Road supposing it were built. Why? Because owing to some change in the line, made by the present Government, the Northern and Midland Railways were as good a branch of the Pacific Railway. The road, that gentleman stated, would be longer than the Midland and not shorter than the Northern, and that the commerce of the North-west would only find its way to Toronto by the present lines. Under these circumstances, he did not think the road if constructed would warrant the expectations of the Hon. Prime Minister. There were two channels of communication from the North-west to the East—one from the Red River country through Winnipeg to Pembina, open all the year round, and the Georgian Bay route which was only open for about six months in the year. In the estimation of experienced men we were about to give $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 for accommodation which was already furnished by the Midland and the Northern. Some supporters of the Government might say that the road in time would command a good local trade. Business men of the country would say if this is a local road let it be built by local enterprises; why give to it the money of Ontario in order that the Government might not only have a local road there, but by their influence on the lake, and by their influence in the construction of this branch compel trade to go that way in opposition to existing and competing lines and the commerce of the country. This was a question that Ontario would require a satisfactory answer to. He contended if the road was constructed this Government ought to be liberal to Ontario, where they got the money from. He contended, too, that the Thunder Bay Branch had a right to commence at Prince Arthur's Landing instead of several miles up the Kaministiquia River.

Mr. COCKBURN (Muskoka) rose to explain that Mr. Miller had come to the conclusion before the present Ministry came into power that a short line from Georgian Bay east to Montreval was necessary for the accommodation of the traffic of the lakes, and he had applied for a charter for the Huron and Ontario Railway, but he opposed French River as the terminus, as he believed it had not a safe harbour.

Mr. BOWELL called attention to the fact that in the correspondence submitted to the Senate respecting the Georgian Bay Branch contract, the report of Mr. Shanly did not appear, although it was referred to in the Minute in Council.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Mr. Shanly made no report to us.

Mr. BOWELL—It was on that report of Mr. Shanly that Mr. Foster based his application for better terms, and that report should be laid before the House.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he knew nothing about it. It was a domestic matter between Mr. Foster and Mr. Shanly, who was Mr. Foster's consulting engineer. The paper, he supposed, was a mere running comment upon the others. He recollected Mr. Shanly reading a paper to him; but whether he kept it in the department or not he was not sure. It was a matter of no consequence, however; for he presumed the paper submitted by Mr. Foster was drawn up by that gentleman and his engineer. He had no objection to the report being brought down, if there was such a document.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said he wished to draw the attention of the Government to the position the Canada Central subsidy was placed in, and that there would be no power as the matter stood to carry out that subsidy. The minute in Council provides:—

"That the company shall within one month from the ratification of this order in Council by the House of Commons satisfy the Minister of Public Works that they have entered into a bona fide contract or contracts for the building of the railway, and have provided sufficient means with the Government bonus to secure the completion of the line on or before the first day of January, 1877, and also that the company shall from the date of such contracts make continuously such progress as will justify the hope of the completion of the line within the time mentioned."

That Minute in Council was ratified by resolution of the House.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he was aware of it.

On item $500,000, Pacific Railway survey and engineering, in reply to Mr. Schultz, Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the result of the survey of the extension of the Pembina Branch line from Winnipeg North, was that by going direct on the east side of the river it would shorten the line a mile and three-quarters, but by deflecting in towards Winnipeg it shortened it a mile and a half, while if they crossed the river at Winnipeg and continued the line up the west side it would lengthen the line two miles.

Mr. BUNSTER wished to know if they were going to cut off further discussion on this subject. He for one felt aggrieved. He deprecated the course adopted by many members of the House of continually insulting British Columbia, and quoted the statement of the hon. member for Quebec Centre that the road as proposed to be built by the late Government would cost five times $30,000,000. He showed by reference to the United States Pacific Railways that the Canadian railroad could be built and run profitably.

The rails on this line would last much longer than on the American road. The people of Canada should become alive to the extent of the interests involved, and to the quantity of trade which was being diverted from the country, even though the purchase of the Suez Canal by that able statesman, Mr. Disraeli. It was not in our interest that our public men should depreciate their own country, or any part of the country; this was not statesmanlike. The Province of British Columbia had been termed a sea of mountains—this was not the proper way to consider these matters.

The hon. member for Middlesex had stated that the exports of British Columbia were nil; but on the contrary, during the past Session, the gold exported was alone valued at four millions of dollars, while the shipments of coal, lumber, fish, &c., had been very considerable. He regretted the fact that a portion of the Canadian press disparaged this province, and remarked that the Standard, of London, England, had declared that Canada should fulfil the terms of the Treaty, and stated that Canada was the first British colony which had repudiated such a bargain.

The item was passed.

Several items under the heading of Militia were taken up and passed without discussion.

In this connection Mr. Schultz desired to say that the reduction of the forces in Manitoba had deprived very many worthy officers of their occupations. Most of these gentlemen had faithfully served the Dominion for six years, and he desired to know whether the Government intended to grant them six months additional pay, as in the case of the officers affected by the last reduction of the force.

Hon. Mr. VAIL replied that the Government would be disposed to take the same favourable view, and would, probably, grant them six months' additional pay.

The House adjourned at Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, April 6, 1876.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were read the third time and passed:—

To remove doubts under the acts therein mentioned respecting the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal, and to amend the same.

To amend the Railway Statistics Act.

To amend the Act 38 Victoria, chapter 23, respecting the Northern Railway of Canada.

To amend the Act respecting the Desjardins Canal.

THE INSOLVENT ACT.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on Bill to amend the Insolvent Act of 1875—Mr. Laurier in the Chair.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—With regard to the remuneration of assignees, of which complaint had been made that it was insufficient, proposed in amendment to the 43rd section, the insertion of the following words:—"The creditors may, in case in their opinion the remuneration of the assignee, under the preceding part of this section, is inadequate, at any meeting called for the purpose, fix such additional remuneration, to be paid out of the estate to the assignee, as they shall think reasonable."

Mr. BARTHE thought that the Official Assignees, since they were appointed by the Government should be paid by the Government; and hoped that the Minister of Justice would consider this matter during recess.

Mr. MACDONALD (Toronto) trusted that the entire clause would be allowed to stand over until next Session. The remuneration in question should not be made so great as to be burdensome for the creditors. It might be, under the provision suggested, that there might be twelve creditors, one or two of whom represented half the estate in value, yet their wishes with regard to expense might be over ruled by the minority, who would feel it less. He would prefer a fixed scale, according to which the assignee might demand remuneration of right.

Mr. YOUNG heartily approved of the clause, as in the country, under the present system, it was generally felt that assignees were not sufficiently paid for their services. The increase of 2½ per cent. to the 5 per cent. proposed was desirable.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE explained that the vote in this relation would be given not according to numbers, but according to the value represented; if these coincided, application was to be made to a Judge.

Mr. MACDONALD (Toronto) looked with great disfavour on appeals to Judges, as being extremely tedious. The law would be perfect in proportion as it was simple and speedy in its results.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE did not think that a satisfactory scale could be arranged.

Mr. WORKMAN approved of the amendment as a step in the right direction. He was also pleased to observe that an Inspector was to be appointed. He hoped that several of these officers would, next year, be appointed in the interest of the creditors.

Mr. WOOD did not agree with this suggestion.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) complained that the remuneration offered in Winnipeg was too low to secure the services of good men.

Mr. YOUNG held that at least for the country districts, the remuneration in the creditors' interests should be fixed at $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

Mr. MACDONALD (Toronto) urged that the discretionary was a dangerous power. During recess all these matters should receive most careful consideration, circulars should be sent to merchants and assignees, and all possible information in this connection obtained.

Mr. BARTHE maintained that the only true remedy for existing defects was to be obtained by repealing the whole law.

The amendment being so altered as to leave the power in question discretionary, with the five per cent provision retained, the section was passed. The Bill was reported with amendments which were concurred in.

THE MILITIA.

The House went into Committee on Supply, Mr. Young in the Chair.

On item, $29,400 to defray salaries of military branch and district staff,

Mr. BOWELL said he was not a little gratified on reading the report of the Major-General dealing with this particular branch of the service. When the Bill was introduced in 1868, he (Mr. Bowell) took exception to the clause which provided for the appointment of so many staff officers, and moved several amendments which had the support of hon. gentlemen who now occupied the Treasury Benches. At that time he had declared that the staff was "useless," for which he had brought down upon himself the condemnation of a former Adjutant-General, who went so far as to demand his (Mr. Bowell's) dismissal from the force for daring to give expression to such views in the House. He was the more gratified, therefore, to find so eminent a soldier as the present Major-General, after a couple of years experience in Canada, using still stronger language in reference to this staff. Now, did it not prove that he (Mr. Bowell) was right? He had hoped when the present Government found themselves in power they would carry out their professions when in Opposition, and reduce this useless and expensive staff. Every year the cost of it was increasing. At the present time, taking the staff in Ottawa and the outside staff, it cost the country nearly $100,000. In 1873-4 it amounted to $90,480; it was now $99,640, showing an increase of about $9,000, owing to the fact that there were two or three men to do the work of one in nearly every office. There was a reduction of half a million in the estimates for the militia this year; but it was not of a permanent character, being only in clothing, drill and other items which might be added again next year. The Major-General in his report of 1875 drew attention to the excess in the staff, to which he would draw the attention of the House. In his remarks respecting the staff the Major-General said:—

"My subsequent experience in Canada has given me no reason to alter the opinions then ventured on. I shall very briefly recapitulate some points, viz: Restriction of District Staff appointments to 5 years,—allowing re-appointment of officers of proved qualification.—Selection on account of professional qualification, apart from any claim on account of local connection or influence, Where the latter is applied, the best material is not always supplied, and the efficiency of the service suffers. The wide sphere of Canada requiring intelligent, active, well-informed staff officers in whom full professional reliance can be placed. Partial reduction of brigade staff. Some of the districts are overstocked with staff, most of whom have almost a sinecure for three-fourths of the year. The distribution also is unequal.

"It is suggested that the brigade staff should be absorbed, as vacancies occur, leaving one Brigade Major to every 3,000 men of the quota on the active establishment of each Military District. The money thus saved might be devoted to purposes more advantageous to the force. It is proposed that no appointments to the staff, unless in case of re-appointments, should be made without the officer having previously passed a qualifying examination and received a certificate of fitness from Head Quarters. The above reduction would leave ample and to spare for general purposes, it would give those left a more active life, and impress them with more responsibility. It would leave room for the temporary training of intelligent young officers, soldiers at heart, acting on the brigade staff at camps of exercise.

Some of the brigade staff have but slight qualification, and some are unsuited for the position. Two of those could be immediately spared without being replaced."

This report was true to the letter. The Major-General also expressed the opinion that the men should be recruited from the rural districts, and added that the "decayed gentlemen" were a failure. The battalions recruited from the rural districts were in ninety-nine cases out of a 100 the best soldiers that could be brought into the field. The late Government had been blamed for appointing a man who was between 60 and 70 years old, but he (Mr. Bowell) knew a case where a man between 60 and 70 was appointed a paymaster, although he had no claims for the position other than political, he never having been connected with the volunteer force.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—He marshalled his "columns" well.

Mr. BOWELL—Yes, he (the paymaster) had marshalled the columns of his newspaper so well in the interest of the Government that he received the appointment in preference to others who deserved the position better. It was that very policy which had been pursued, not only by this Government, but by the late one, that had done more injury to the force than anything else. It was downright injustice to those who had spent time and money in maintaining the dignity of their positions and keeping of the force together.

While he thought the claims and right of volunteer officers should not be overlooked in the distribution of these offices, he was not altogether in accord with the sentiments given expression to the other night by his hon. friend the member for Pontiac, that the office of Major-General should of necessity be filled by a Canadian born. He did not believe in the Canada First sentiments. Every Canadian was a British subject, and entitled to the privileges of the Empire whether in the army or navy. He was in favour of the appointment of a man who had served in the British regular army to the position of Major-General. He was decidedly in favour of the appointment of a Canadian, if one could be found who had had the necessary experience and obtained the rank required by statute to fill the office. He desired to know whether it was the intention of the Government to fill the vacancies which existed on the staff, and also desired information as to whether it was intended to retain the Deputy Adjutant General, or reduce the number of Brigade Majors. He thought it would add to the efficiency of the force to reduce this branch of the service.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said that he might state at once that that the policy of the Government was to fill no vacancies occurring in the staff until it was reduced to almost one half of its present proportions, and secondly that the positions vacant at Kingston for some months had not been filled, and it was not the intention of the Government to fill them. It was the intention of the Government to reduce the staff, and it was a matter of consideration in what way this should be done. They were undecided whether to wait for vacancies or reduce at once, which was always an awkward thing to do, as they would have to dispense with officers who had been in the service for years, or introduce a measure making some allowance to those whose services were dispensed with. They thought it well to take a vote this year without making any reduction, and reserve for early consideration the precise mode in which this reduction could be affected. That was the settled policy of the Government. With regard to the employment of Canadians in the higher offices of the militia, it was the intention of the Government when the Military School was introduced, as soon as that school furnished the material required to fill the staff vacancies, they should be furnished from that material. It was the intention of the Government, as the school was intended to furnish not merely a thorough military education, but also a thorough civil engineering education, that when there was a larger number of graduates than was required for the staff appointments, these officers should have priority to other departments of the Civil Service. It was intended to have a thoroughly trained body of gentlemen, thoroughly educated in the profession, and capable of doing field engineering either in fortifications or other works, so that at a moment's notice they might be called into active service if the events of the period called for action in the field by a trained body of officers. This of course would be a work of some years, but they desired to effect the changes as rapidly as they could, and at the same time deal consistently with the parties who had held these positions up to the present time. Perhaps eight or ten years might elapse before a sufficient number of men could be obtained to fill the vacancies. It was desirable that the offices in the various regiments of the force should be in the hands of those thoroughly trained for the work; and it was hoped that the military college would, in this way, exercise a beneficial influence in every department. The impression was that in this way we might get a skeleton force. As far as the higher officers were concerned they would be selected from among the young men of the country who received a thorough training at the military schools. A skeleton organization of this kind would be more easily filled up after organization with non-commissioned officers, and the rank and file which might be required for an emergency. The precise number of men that might be required, would be a matter they would reserve for future consideration, as it was a subject they were not prepared to speak on with positiveness at the present moment. The principal object the Government had kept in view was the obtaining of a thorough organization, so that they could officer the force in the best possible way, maintain it at the least possible expense and at the same time not have anything like a standing army, but to have the material from which a really efficient standing army might in a short time be put in the field. One of the great defects in the militia, developed by the Fenian raid, was that though the companies were officered by brave men, they had not sufficient military knowledge; and they did not understand field movements sufficiently, although they might understand ordinary battalion drill. He had no doubt that one fact caused what was very nearly a serious disaster, and which was a disaster when the Fenians crossed the Niagara at Buffalo. That would be prevented in the future, if once the scheme the Government had in view was put into practical effect. He was very glad to be able to frankly acknowledge that he had held the same views as the hon. member for Hastings, with regard to the number of officers on the staff, and the Government would endeavour to effect a reduction as speedily as possible—in the first place, by not filling the vacancies, and possibly in the second place, by the removal of the least efficient members of the staff.

Mr. WRIGHT (Pontiac) said he did not wish to be misunderstood with respect to the remarks he had the honour of offering to the Committee, and which had been adverted to by the hon. member for Hastings. He did not take the position of Canada First, but he did take the position that Canada should not be held continuously in the back ground. He did not consider that it was absolutely essential that the commanding officer of the militia of Canada should be a Canadian, but if a Canadian of the necessary rank could be found he should not be debarred from having the position. He was merely opposed to discrimination against Canadians who had seen the necessary service to entitle them to the position of Chief of the Canadian Militia Service.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the hon. member for Hastings had called attention to the great increase which had taken place between the years 1874 and 1876-7 in the Militia Department. If the items of these years were compared it would be seen that the increase was statutory and Parliament had no control over it.

Mr. SCHULTZ said by the reduction of the force in Manitoba quite a number of deserving officers would be thrown out of employment. In the case of a previous reduction the Government were liberal enough to grant them six month's pay. Would the Hon. Minister of Militia recommend the same liberality in the present instance.

Hon. Mr. VAIL said it had always been the policy of the Government to deal liberally with volunteer officers when dismissed. The matter had not yet been discussed but their claims would be fairly considered.

Mr. BOWELL said the great objection to the estimates was not the amount paid to efficient officers at headquarters, but the employment of an excessive number of clerks and messengers. He believed if the Hon. Minister of Militia would give his serious attention to his department, he could apply the pruning hook with great advantage to the finances of the country and the efficiency of the service.

Hon. Mr. VAIL said he was somewhat surprised to find so few hon. gentlemen in the house willing to acknowledge the debt of gratitude we owe to the volunteer service; and he was also surprised that the only one who had found any fault with the management of Militia Department was an old volunteer officer. That in the future, we would perhaps require a Volunteer Force to assist in the defence of the country, no one could deny; and that we required such a force at present to aid the authorities to carry out the law, would be acknowledged by everybody when he remembered that the Volunteers had been called out to assist the civil powers in three provinces, during the last year. In regard to the small increase in the expenditure referred to by the hon. member for Hastings, he thought the Militia Department was not singular in that respect. Every public office in the country, local and general, had been obliged to increase its expenditure within the last three or four years. Expenses of living had also advanced, and it was necessary that something additional should be allowed in order to enable people to keep up their old mode of living. A large portion of the increase could be satisfactorily accounted for. Since Confederation, Manitoba, British Columbia and Prince Edward Island had been included in the Militia system, which of course necessitated an increase in the outside staff. But the following figures would satisfy the hon. gentleman that the present staff was not large compared with previous years when the amount of work devolving upon them was taken into consideration. In 1871, the amount was $29,140; in 1872, $35,440, an increase of $6,000, consequent on the appointment of the Inspector of Artillery and the expenses of the staff of British Columbia and Manitoba. In 1873, the amount was $33,740, arising from a decrease of $1,700 being salary of Inspector of Artillery transferred to A and B Battery vote in 1874; and a decrease of $1,200 salary of one D. A. G., transferred to the Civil Branch. The following year the vote was $35,000, the increase being for the salaries of the deputy-adjutant general and paymaster in Prince Edward Island; and last year the amount was increased to the extent of $1,000, salary of the A.D.C. of the Major-General. It would thus be seen that although there was a slight increase from time to time, it was legitimate, justifiable under the circumstances, and could not very well be avoided. The hon. member for Hastings had referred to the appointment of an old man somewhere in the vicinity of Ottawa. He presumed the hon. gentleman referred to the paymaster at Brockville. This gentleman was somewhat advanced in years; but he scarcely considered his a strictly military appointment—its duties were more civil than military. Since he held office this was the only appointment which had been made outside of the militia forces. It was quite true the appointments should be confined as much as possible to the volunteer officers; but in this country there were not the opportunities for studying the profession as those trained in the Imperial service—hence it was thought for the benefit of the force to appoint a major-general who had qualified in England. Last year he had the opportunity of learning some little about our Volunteer system, and he thought it was working as satisfactorily as any system which could be introduced; the Militia officers and rank and file stand second to none on this continent.

The House then took recess.

AFTER RECESS.

PRIVATE AND LOCAL BILLS.

The following Bills were read the third time, and passed:—

To incorporate the Maritime Savings and Loan Society.

To incorporate the England and Canada Mortgage Security Co.

To incorporate the United Empire Forest Co. (Limited).

COUNTY OF LOTBINIERE.

A Bill, intituled an Act to detach a certain portion of the County of Lotbiniere, and to annex it to the County of Beauce, was read the second time; and the House having gone into Committee of the Whole, reported it with an amendment, which was read the second time, and concurred in.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT.

A Bill, entitled an Act to amend the Criminal Law, being taken up, Hon. Mr. ROBINSON explained that it was intended to empower municipalities to employ prisoners outside of the walls of prisons—a privilege which many experienced in municipal matters thought would be an advantage to the community. The rules and regulations necessary were to be adopted by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council of each Province. The Dominion Parliament alone could pass such a measure as this, and he hoped that its merits were sufficient to commend itself to the Minister of Justice, and that receiving the sanction of that hon. gentleman, it would become law. He begged to move the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE requested the hon. gentleman not to press the matter. The Bill had been introduced at a late period in the Session, and he had not had time to make the enquiries in this connection which he deemed desirable. He had already expressed his views with reference to the criminal law, and these had commended themselves to the sense of the House. The circumstances of our Provinces varied; such a power as would be conferred by this measure might be adapted to some of them, but he wished before making arrangements of this description, to ascertain by inquiry whether such a step as was proposed should be taken. He was aware that in one of the Provinces not long since, it was the custom to send prisoners out in chain gangs, and he had before him the case of a man, who having been imprisoned for a libel published in a newspaper, had so been obliged to labour on the roads.—This he thought would be regarded in Ontario as a shocking punishment under the circumstances. He would reflect very seriously on the question prior to coming to the conclusion that Lieutenant-Governors should have the power of framing regulations with regard to such employment of prisoners. Uniformity of practice in this relation was desirable. He was not in a position to say that this was possible, and a reasonable time should be allowed, as the Dominion was an extensive country, to pursue the requisite investigations regarding this matter. He hoped that this was sufficient to justify the request he made.

The Bill was withdrawn.

THE ICE BRIDGE AT QUEBEC.

Mr. LANGLOIS moved the second reading of Bill to prevent persons from breaking up the ice bridge between Quebec and Lévis. He said the object of the Bill was to prevent steamboats from destroying the bridge which formed every winter. This measure was asked for by the people of Quebec and Lévis and neighbouring country.

Mr. CURRIER said it seemed to him a most extraordinary thing to pass a law to prevent steamboats running up and down the river.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL thought the Government should deal with this matter. It would be a great calamity to cut off communication between Quebec and Lévis at any season of the year, by legislation of this kind. The Bill was dangerous in its character, and if necessary at all should be dealt with by the Government.

Mr. PELLETIER said he had no doubt that the hon. member for Northumberland took a great interest in the City of Quebec, but was surprised that representing a constituency so far from Quebec, and there being in the House so many members representing counties near the City of Quebec, he (Mr. Mitchell) was alone to oppose the Bill. All the members of the district of Quebec knew the advantage of this Bill, and he was sure no one would oppose it. The Board of Trade and the shipping interests of Quebec were in favour of the Bill. Telegrams had been received to-day to that effect. The population of the two cities of Quebec and Lévis desired very much the passing of the Bill, which was opposed only by the company owning steamboats which were breaking the ice bridge every winter. He hoped that the House would consider the Bill in the interest of trade and commerce, and pass it without opposition.

Mr. KILLAM said the Bill was a step backward. It was quite on a par with opposition to machinery. He hoped the Government would not permit such a Bill to pass.

At this point Mr. Speaker announced that the hour for Private Bills had expired, and Government Orders had precedence.

THE MILITIA.

The House resumed consideration of the estimates for Militia purposes in Committee of Supply.

Mr. BOWELL said when the House rose at six he was expressing his surprise at the line of defence which had been set up by the Minister of Militia. He (Mr. Bowell) would like to know what complimenting the volunteers on their efficiency had to do with an overstocked staff and the outside service. He was very glad that the Government had determined upon a policy which they had advocated in the past, when they were in Opposition. It would meet with the approval of everyone who had paid attention to the subject. The Minister of Militia would find ample room for retrenchment in his own department.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL complimented the Government on having made such a large reduction in this estimate. He entirely approved of the policy announced by the Premier on this subject and believed it would be satisfactory to the public. It was necessary to maintain some volunteer force for the purpose of meeting emergencies that might arise at any time in the country.

He did not agree with the hon. gentleman that the absence of any expression in relation to the volunteers was a mark of disapproval. He did not think that the time for praising the volunteers was when the militia estimates came up. The volunteers did not demand any fulsome expression of opinion from members of Parliament; their services to the country spoke for themselves. What the country wanted was that the skeleton of a force should be maintained, round which, when the time came, a strong form could be built. The people would always be ready to come forward in defence of Canada when required. He had never been in favour of military colleges, but he thought the suggestion of the hon. Premier, with reference to the Kingston School, was a good one. It was perfectly right that a young man who did not find an opening in the military profession should receive the first nomination for the civil engineering service.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) said no item was voted with more reluctance than this under discussion. He did not say this because the people had not sufficient military spirit to defend the country in a case of emergency, but such was the feeling of security at the present time that this expenditure seemed in a great measure to no purpose. He wished to urge upon the Hon. Minister of Militia the necessity of following out the line indicated by the Hon. Premier—the reduction of the militia estimates as fast as possible. There was a peculiar anomaly in the reduction of the pay of the volunteer officers, and the maintenance of the full staff; and had it not been for the explanations of the Hon. First Minister the item would be very reluctantly voted. Since Confederation $9,321,654 had been expended on military service, and of that sum, so far as practical service to the country was concerned, the amount expended was $2,985,682. The only object for which the service was established that he could see was to train our young men for military service, and if the money was expended in any other way there was to his mind a large waste of the public funds without the necessary results being secured. Take the case of the estimates of this year. They would notice that the Civil Service Department of the service was to be in full blast, with twenty-seven officials, Deputy Adjutant-Generals, Brigade Majors, and Paymasters, and all for what? Not that we should drill a large number of volunteers, but in order to keep up an organization which this year would accomplish practically nothing. He understood there was to be no camp drill, and little or no battalion drill, but we were to expend a large amount of money for the purpose of keeping up the organization. He admitted that the organization must be sustained perhaps for some time to come, but he would like to see the Minister of Militia exercise a little vigour in the management of the department to the extent of dispensing as speedily as possible with useless and unnecessary officers. He did not see why we should have Deputy Adjutant Generals, Brigade Majors and Paymasters for the management of a force which did not exist. If this staff was to be maintained for the interest of the force well and good, but let the organization be put upon another basis so that we might realize more practical benefit. The Hon. Minister of Militia had referred to what appeared to his mind to be a lack of enthusiasm in Canada in regard to the Volunteer system. In Ontario sufficient enthusiasm existed. In 1866 when orders were issued for 12,000 men, 20,000 offered, more than seemed to be necessary under the circumstances; and the House would remember how readily voluntary contributions were made in the large cities and towns for the maintenance of the families of the volunteers and to make up any loss they might incur through the service. The monument to the fallen at Ridgeway was also another proof that the people sympathised with those who suffered in the service. The general feeling in Ontario was this—that if we were to expend a large sum for the maintenance of a military force, it should be in a different channel than the expenditure of the last few years. Every one who had noticed the recent modes of warfare would understand that military training was tending almost entirely in the direction of rifle practice, and that was the most difficult part of the routine. Our clever Canadian youths could learn camp and battalion drills in 10 or 12 days, but rifle practice required great care and experience. If our service was organized in such a way as to have less camp drill and more of this modern essential, it would be made more effective; and if the hon. Minister of Militia would take into careful consideration the whole military system of the Dominion as well as the systems of other countries and the modern methods of warfare, he would render national service to the country in the reduction of expenses and secure a higher degree of efficiency.

Mr. BROWN thought all the money we had expended was amply repaid for the good service the volunteers did in 1864 and 1866. The service was pretty well reduced just now, and it should have every assistance to render it efficient and useful. He thought the staff had done its duty well and fairly, but it might be that its cost was larger than necessary. Under the old Militia Act the duties at Ottawa here were performed by Col. Powers at a much less expense than at present. He did not agree with the manner in which the reduction was proposed. If we were to economise at all we had better give leave of absence to the Major General, suspend the district staffs throughout the Dominion and relieve the volunteers from further service for a year at least.

Mr. McCALLUM said the objection had always been against what was believed to be an excessive and expensive staff both at Ottawa and in the outside service. Those at Ottawa were the locusts eating up the public money, and the grasshoppers were those of the outside service. He thought the money expended for drilling young men was well applied. In discussing the merits of this question we should consider the number of men in the country who had been trained to the use of arms. Everyone of those, if the safety of the country demanded it, would come forward, and then we would experience the benefit of money expended in past years in this respect. The objection to the staff items had always been because it was believed that the men who really did the work got little, while the large staff absorbed the money. It was time that this was stopped.

Mr. HIGINBOTHAM was surprised at the severe criticism of his hon. friend from Hastings, who he was sure must acknowledge the success of our Volunteer service. The Hon. Minister of Militia had regretted the few persons who had raised their voices in support of the force. That was not because the people did not take sufficient interest in it; he believed it occupied a warm place in the affection of the country, and was quite sure that the past success of the volunteers would never be forgotten. The hon. member for Middlesex had stated that rifle practice was only necessary for the efficiency of the force. He admitted that it was an important requisite, but camp and battalion drill were extremely useful in instructing the officers in field duties. There was no time when the volunteer force had received more attention, fair play and encouragement than during the three years of the present government. He had been connected with the force and knew the difficulties they had to contend with. At first they struggled for existence, but the last few years the volunteers had been encouraged, and were in a state of efficiency. The hon. member for Hastings appeared to think that the sooner the staff was reduced the better. He differed from the hon. gentleman, and believed the better plan would be to reduce the number of men and sustain the staff in its entirety, because it was an easy matter to form companies if we only had the means of officering them.

He could not approve of a general reduction of the force. The small amount placed in the estimates he considered insufficient to provide for the expenditure attending the annual drills. The position of Brigade Major or Adjutant General might be abolished, but a sufficient staff should by all means be kept up;—and the volunteers should be called out for drill, once every two or three years, at least, if it was not intended to do so yearly.

Mr. ORTON also agreed that one of the positions mentioned might properly be abolished. Great complaint had been made, and he believed very frequently with some reason, concerning the manner in which the arms were kept. Captains of companies might easily keep surveillance over these as well as over accoutrements. He thought that as reductions were being effected in this regard, the item of $125,000 for the annual drills might also be dropped, as it could not meet the expenses attendant on brigade or battalion drill, and company drill was considered to be of very little use. If retained, it would have another injurious effect:—if the volunteers were inadequately paid, it would create a great deal of dissatisfaction in the force and do more harm than good. Volunteering might be encouraged under a different system. We possessed large tracts of land at present, of which volunteers in the great North-West, and men who had creditably served in the force for five years, residing in this country during the whole of such period, might receive grants each of 100 acres. This would be an inducement for joining, and a better class of volunteers would thereby be obtained. Great complaint was made in some parts of the character of the men, and he had heard that it had been the custom of Americans in some quarters to come over, perform the drill, receive the money, and then return to the otherside of the river. Medals might also be awarded to men who served the term of five years. It was well known that if it had not been for the disinterested exertions of officers and men in the past, it would have been almost impossible to have kept up the system at all, and that the country should recognize those services by grants of some of our lands in the North-West, or by the distribution of honorary medals.

Mr. GORDON quite agreed with the hon. member for Middlesex regarding the expenditure of money on the force; and believed that in many instances the money spent in connection with annual drills had been badly expended, as the ranks were frequently filled with lads to make up the required numbers. He agreed also with the hon. member for Middlesex that it was especially desirable to encourage proficiency in rifle shooting, for which purpose medals might be offered to be shot for by companies. Liberal prizes should further be extended to country associations.

Mr. PLUMB, judging from the estimates, presumed that the usual annual drills were not to take place during the present year. He required a small appropriation in order to ensure the preservation from destruction of the barracks in his constituency; a very small amount would be required for the purpose. He was very glad to hear the hon. the First Minister say that it was intended to create the officers of the militia from the young men who studied at the Military Colleges. He was in hopes that the policy of the Government would have been to have offered some inducement to these young men, something such as was given to the students at West Point Academy. There they were given a salary of $30 a month, which was credited to them, and their clothing and their expenses were charged at the lowest possible rate. This sum was sufficient with proper economy to pay their expenses, and after they left the academy, they received an appointment in the army. The usefulness of this institution was exhibited in the great American conflict. All the men who came into prominence in the northern or southern army graduated at West Point. Many of these gentlemen served also in the civil service of the country. He trusted if it were found as he thought it would be found, that not sufficient inducements were offered to students, the Government would supplement the advantages by giving some moderate sum which would support them in a humble way. There was every reason in the world why they should secure the best possible talent in the formation of a skeleton army, and he thought the indications were that it would not be successful, unless the Government offered some further inducements.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN did not think a military college would be successful at once, but he hoped that it would be sufficiently successful to induce the Government to persist in their course and better that system. It had been suggested during the debate that there should be no office in the militia service that should be closed to the young men from the Military College, but they would find that besides the theoretical knowledge that the young men obtained, practical knowledge in the regular army would be required to fill the higher offices in the Military service. The Government, however, might find it necessary to select a number of the most able men to undergo the practical training which could not be obtained in a military college, and which must be acquired in the European States. Without going further into this subject he would ask the Minister of Militia, whether on concurrence he would be able to give the number of Militia men that were at that time enrolled in the different Provinces of the Dominion. He regarded it as necessary to obtain this information, in order that they might ascertain if each Province furnished a sufficient quota of men in proportion to the population.

Hon. Mr. POPE did not agree with the remarks that had been made, that this appropriation might have been left out altogether. He thought we, as a part of the British Empire, ought to be prepared to do something for ourselves. He did not believe the money appropriated was one dollar too much, and he was sure it was endorsed by the whole of the people of the country. He desired to see the volunteers better paid and the staff reduced to the lowest rate possible, which he thought cost too much. He was of opinion that every attention should be given to the company drill, as the men well up in this drill could easily be prepared for the field.

Hon. Mr. VAIL said in 1873 the whole enrolled militia from 18 to 60 years of age was:—Ontario, 352,145; Quebec, 236,285; Nova Scotia, 84,746, and New Brunswick 65,805; total 739,981. The quota for each Province was:—Ontario, 19,437; Quebec, 11,691; New Brunswick, 3,264; Nova Scotia, 4,284; Manitoba, 696; British Columbia, 194; Prince Edward Island, 694; total 40,260.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN wished to know whether the whole 40,000 would be drilled, or only a certain portion of them, or whether the number of days for drill would be diminished in proportion to the reduction of the vote.

Hon. Mr. VAIL said only 28,845 had been drilled out of the 40,000, with an appropriation of $375,000. It was evident the same number could not be drilled this year with only one-third as large an appropriation.

Mr. ORTON said the House should know how that $125,000 was to be expended.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said it was not always convenient to explain how a vote like this would be expended. It was well to provide against contingencies that the experience of the last four or five years had shown were likely to arise at any time in this country.

Mr. BOWELL said it was evident the Government had no policy. They did not know whether they intended to drill any of the men or not.

Hon. Mr. POPE said the Government would not condescend to tell the House what their policy was, if they had any; but they had the audacity to ask for this large sum without a word of explanation. The House had a right to know whether the men were to be drilled or not.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said it was very desirable the House should know what the Government intended to do with this money. The volunteers would like to know whether they were likely to be called out for drill this year as usual. He supposed it was not the intention of the Government to do so. If so, he approved of that policy for this year. If, however, it was intended to drill any of the force this year, he hoped they would not be exercised at their head-quarters. The companies that should be most drilled were those in cities and towns where the services of a trained force were sometimes required. The force in large centres of population should be kept together, and drilled, and the money so expended would be well spent. If this was the intention of the Government it would be well to let the House know.

Hon. Mr. VAIL.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE explained that the entry in connection with the item explained precisely how the $125,000 was to be spent. The Government could not, however, be required to state precisely what battalions were to be called out, for this was a matter reserved for the Administration to decide. In all cases they could spend more than was voted, but they could not communicate minute details concerning their arrangements. The hon. gentlemen who had last spoken knew perfectly well that they should not have put the questions they had asked.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL held that the Premier had gone back on the principles which the hon. gentleman had professed while in Opposition. The hon. gentleman would not at that time have been satisfied with the statements now made to the House. He thought that his friend from Compton was quite correct in maintaining that so far as they could judge of the declarations of the Hon. Minister of Militia, no definite policy had been arranged. The Premier said that this vote was entirely for drilling purposes, and the Finance Minister that it might be utilised for any contingency that might arise. The House as a constitutional Parliament had a right to know precisely the conditions on which this vote was asked, and the calculations on which it was based, as the money belonged to the people of this country. The hon. gentleman had either forgotten, or was ignoring the principles which he (Mr. Mackenzie) once enunciated on the floor of the House. He entirely approved of the Government's policy in this relation; it was a step in the right direction; and in consequence, he was willing to vote for the item, even though the explanations which should have been given were not offered.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE replied that he was sure, when in opposition he had never asked for any such details as were now requested by hon. gentlemen. He had then, in the interest of the men only urged that they should be paid better; also that if more of the money granted had been spent on drill, and less for other purposes, it would have been better.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—There we agree.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The Minister of Militia had stated that 28,800 men, out of the 40,000 were drilled. The report of the Department was before the House. If one-third of the amount voted last year was asked for, it follows that either one-third of the 28,000 odd would be drilled if paid at the same rate, or that two-thirds would be drilled if the time were reduced one-half.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—The hon. gentlemen may change their policy?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—No change whatever would be made. It was quite open for the Government under the law to fix the number of days for drill and the number of men to be drilled, and to decide whether it should be by battalions or in brigades.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—That is the information we would like to have.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—That information has been given.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—I do not think that I heard it.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I am certain that I heard it.

Hon. Mr. POPE stated that he and hon. gentlemen had vainly endeavoured to elicit information from the Minister of Militia, who they discovered knew nothing of the matter at issue. He had then appealed to the Finance Minister, who explained that the Government might do one thing, and again, that they might take another course; it seemed to depend altogether which way the wind blew. Next up jumped the First Minister to state that it was perfectly ridiculous for hon. gentlemen to make these enquiries, as they ought to be satisfied with the information obtained. When the hon. gentleman was in Opposition, he (Mr. Mackenzie) would not have been satisfied with the explanations made.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK did not desire to learn the minutiae of departmental arrangements, but he certainly thought that the House was entitled to more information than they had obtained regarding the intentions of the Government; they should know whether one-third of the force was to be drilled for the usual time, or whether the whole force was to be drilled for one-third of this period.

Hon. Mr. VAIL could not understand why so much more information was now required than had been demanded during previous Sessions. The item was simply reduced from $375,000 to $125,000—one-third the sum expended when the late Government was in power. After the House was prorogued a report was made by the Adjutant General or the General in command to the Minister of Militia, who submitted to the Government his recommendations, which had to be approved of by an Order in Council before they could go into force. It was then arranged how many men were to be drilled; where this would take place; and whether it would be performed in battalions or in brigades. These were mere regulations, which the Government could change from time to time as they pleased.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL stated that information in question had always been demanded by the Opposition, when the Government, of which he had been a member, was in power; and had always been given by the late lamented Sir George Cartier, who was ever prepared to do one of two things.

The late Government were always ready to state the settled policy of the Department frankly, but his hon. friend opposite was not prepared to take that course.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN said it was proper that the Committee should be informed as to the quota that would be required this year, whether it was intended to follow the rule laid down last year, and whether the militia would be taken from one or two Provinces.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The quota will be distributed as nearly as possible all over the country. The hon. gentleman might take that for granted.

Mr. SCRIVER did not think it devolved on the Dominion to provide police forces for the cities. He thought it was of much greater importance that the volunteers on the frontier should be encouraged to keep up their organizations, and he hoped that a portion of this money would be devoted to the drilling of country battalions.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said that he had only recommended the expenditure of a portion of the appropriation in drilling the men in large centres.

The item was carried.

IMMIGRATION AND QUARANTINE.

On item No. 55, appropriating $120,150 for immigration and quarantine,

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said that the Minister of Agriculture desired to have a vote that would enable him to take precautions against the introduction of contagious diseases among animals. He, therefore, moved that after the words "to meet expenses of further precautionary measures for the public health" that the words "for the prevention of disease among animals," be inserted. They did not desire to increase the vote for this purpose, which was $20,000.

The motion was carried.

Hon. Mr. POPE—We are not expected to pass this vote without an explanation.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT replied in the negative, and proceeded to explain the salaries of a few emigration agents and employés had been increased.

Hon. Mr. POPE asked what was the policy of the Government with respect to the change in the Agent-General's office.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said that the appointment of an Agent-General was only an experiment, and it had become quite evident that it was not desirable to keep up that agency in the same expensive manner in which it was being conducted, therefore they decided to discontinue the office and reduce the expense in that regard as much as they possibly could. Mr. Jenkins on finding the reduction had taken place probably did not deem it worth his while to continue in that position, and he accordingly tendered his resignation. He was not aware that there was any other information to be given on this subject.

Mr. SCRIVER.

Mr. BOWELL thought the only reduction in the department was the abolition of the services of the Agent-General. Did he understand the office was kept up in its entirety less the Mr. Jenkin's office?

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the office under Mr. Jenkin's supervision had swollen to somewhat larger proportions than usual. Of course in connection with the office there were agents for the other Provinces, but moreover, Mr. Jenkins, in addition to his duties as emigration agent, conducted certain minor matters for other branches of the Government, which the new agent would not have to perform. In this connection he incurred additional expenses, and his charges were considerably larger than it was intended the new officer should incur.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL asked whether the discontinuance of Mr. Jenkins was solely for the purpose of economy? Was it not a fact that his appointment was an entire failure, and that he got above his business and rather beyond the control of the Government in Canada?

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said Mr. Jenkins was Agent-General and that office was discontinued, but he himself resigned the other office of General Emigration Agent. With regard to the other matters he might just state that Mr. Jenkins was a very zealous and efficient officer, and only had the interests of Canada at heart. He honestly and sincerely strove to discharge his duty on all occasions to the best of his ability. He (Mr. Cartwright) did not think the hon. gentleman was as chivalrous as usual with respect to Mr. Jenkins.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said if the Hon. Finance Minister put it on the point of chivalry he had nothing more to say. He had seen communications in the public prints that led him to believe there was something besides economy which led to Mr. Jenkins' resignation.

Hon. Mr. POPE asked for explanations regarding the Agent-Generalship. He thought that Mr. Jenkins had tried to do his duty. He believed that that gentleman was carrying out to the best of his ability the instructions which he received from the Government, but while he held that view he could not say that those instructions were wise or judicious. He thought Mr. Jenkins had been dealt with in a very summary manner. In his report for 1874, the late Agent-General states he was appointed to reorganize the office, and that he found a loose, expensive and inefficient organization on the other side of the water. He presumed that when Mr. Jenkins made use of this language he considered that he had some justification for it, probably in the instructions he had received from this side; but when it was stated that a department over which he (Mr. Pope) had presided was conducted in that manner, he felt he had a right to ask this House whether the results of the Administration of which he was a humble member warranted that declaration, or that the results of the past two years record in contrast with it proved the assertion to be correct. He wanted the House to consider this matter carefully. What was the result in 1873? He had heard it said in another place that the present system was exactly the same as that pursued when he controlled the department. He knew that he was responsible for everything attempted while in office, and that in a certain sense he was responsible for those things which he bound his successor to carry out. This, however, could not apply to passenger warrants, as he did not bind his successor to continue the issuing of them, nor was it any excuse for giving 12,080 warrants in the year 1875, when not more than 10,500 emigrants arrived at all the ports of the Dominion as intending settlers in Canada. So far as the passenger warrant system was concerned, he was responsible, and was prepared to bear the responsibility for the two years that he occupied the position of Minister of Agriculture. He found the passenger warrants issued in London in 1873, when he had the largest immigration—some 42,000 souls—numbered only 9,000. In 1875 the number of immigrants arriving at Quebec and Portland, exclusive of Mennonites, was only some 10,500, while the number of passenger warrants issued in London was over 12,000. The Mennonites came under a different arrangement.

This required explanation. He (Mr. Pope) was responsible for having initiated the warrant system. He had done so with a view to bringing the employers of labour in this country nearer to the emigrating classes of the old world. We had cheap hands and dear labour. To make this country prosperous we needed people to occupy our waste lands. With this view he introduced the Bill organizing immigration aid societies, the object being to induce our people to employ labourers on the other side and bring them to Canada to work for them. To assist them the passage was reduced from £6 6s. to £4 5s., and subsequently in order to compete with Australia, New Zealand and other countries, to £2 5s. He was not at liberty to say how much that had cost the country. The arrangements were confidential, just as arrangements now were confidential, and he would not imitate the treatment he had received from gentlemen opposite, by pressing for explanations upon them. The agricultural labourers of England were unable to lay up money enough to take them to this country; and even when the tickets were reduced to £2 5s., the immigration aid societies had to subscribe and bring them out. The result was in 1873 the number that came to this country was 42,000—the largest immigration we had seen for many years. A great deal of that was due to the assisted passenger warrants. He learned that other countries were paying to all the steamship agents a commission to send emigrants to them. He at once instructed our agent in London to give as much to passenger brokers of standing and influence as was paid by any other country. They numbered some 1,200 men, and exercised a great deal of influence. His successor had carried out that policy. He (Mr. Pope) had also been charged with being responsible for the Mennonite immigration. Well, he was going to take that responsibility. He had received an intimation that there was a colony of Germans in Russia that desired to emigrate. There was a great deal of difficulty in organizing this immigration owing to the unwillingness of the Russian Government to permit the presence of agents or the distribution of pamphlets. It was only after an agent was sent to see them that he (Mr. Pope) received a notification from the British Government that it might cause trouble. He felt in an embarrassed position, but withdrew the agent, asking the Menonites to send a delegation to Canada, and promising to pay their expenses. They came, visited Manitoba, and certain conditions having been agreed upon, 5,000 of them came and settled in that Province, bringing with them some $400,000 in one year. Mr. Pope proceeded to explain the conditions, which were that the Menonites should pay $30 for their passage from Hamburg to Manitoba, they providing their own food. He had made such arrangements that $25 paid the passage to Quebec, leaving the other $5 to take them to Thunder Bay, whence they were to go on over the Dawson Road, the transport thus costing the Dominion practically nothing. He had also been charged with sending agents to Europe. Well, he had sent them, but there his responsibility ended. He was not responsible for the manner in which agents had acted, nor for the manner in which they had been handled. He had no doubt but the inefficient way in which they had been instructed, and the redtapeism of the Department through the London office, had done much to embarrass and discourage them. He would like to compare his policy with that of his successor. True, circumstances were different. It could not be expected there would be the same emigration in these times as there had been in the past. Still, the proof that the changes they had adopted did not meet with their own approval was in the fact they had abandoned them. His policy his successor condemned as loose, extravagant and inefficient. He sent his agents for short periods, as he didn't wish them to feel they had a vested right to the office, or that they had any claim on the Government, to which they were bound to look for approbation, and not to the London agent. Reports were required monthly. The policy of his successor was quite different; reports were to be made once a week to the London agent, who controlled everything. Here the great mistake in the system had been committed, for it was only by keeping a due and strict supervision on the part of the Department over its employees that they could be induced to perform their work properly. His successor, he supposed, desired to free himself from the trouble the system he (Mr. Pope) had followed entailed. He was not surprised at this, seeing that the continued absence from the department of its present head made it impossible that he could give it that constant supervision which was absolutely necessary. Nevertheless, these things must have given his successor a good deal of anxiety—more than the London agent would feel. His successor should have received the reports and paid strict attention to what Australia and other countries were doing in connection with the matter of immigration. Quite a large number of immigrants had arrived in this country during the year 1874, but this was largely and naturally due to the exertions made in 1873, as emigrants invariably made their arrangements the year before they left home. The extent of immigration in 1872 had exceeded his expectations. Mr. Dixon had audited accounts, and this was one of the duties of that officer. Mr. Patterson, Secretary of the Board of Trade of Montreal, had inspected all the European agencies, and had made a satisfactory and complimentary report on the subject to the Department. In 1873 the largest sum ever expended on the part of this country by the late Government on immigration had been spent: it nearly approached the figures for 1875. Forty-two thousand emigrants came from Europe to Canada in 1873, costing about $6.00 per head; in 1875 they numbered 10,000, exclusive of Menonites, and cost about $23 per head. These figures afforded sufficient justification for the policy he pursued, though it was termed "loose, extravagant and improper." Control had been of late left to too great a degree in the hands of the London agent, and a lack of energy in this respect had been exhibited in the management of the department. He would not say that the immigrants to this country were not worth all they cost, but he thought that his successor should place himself in more direct communication with his agents. The money judiciously expended on emigration was well spent. In the United States each immigrant was considered worth from $800 to $1,100 to the country, and for a number of years it was ascertained that each of these persons brought into the Union, on the average, $70. It might be considered that the present period was unfavourable to immigration on a large scale, but he wished to draw the attention of Government and of his successor to the points he had mentioned and to the necessity of regarding closely what was taking place in this connection in other countries. There was no reason why we should not have our fair share of the emigrating classes of the old world. He had read the report of Mr. Jenkins, and he believed that the late London agent had done the best he could to carry out the instructions he received from the Department; but he could not approve of those instructions nor of the extravagance inaugurated by them. It might have been a mistake to make the appointment, but nevertheless a good deal of useful information was contained in Mr. Jenkins' reports. The latter said he had been slandered and traduced, and he thought the Government should have defended their late official. While Mr. Jenkins was extravagant, this expense was incurred with the concurrence and support of the Administration, who ought, in consequence, to be held responsible. He requested the House not to pass too suddenly a condemnation on Mr. Jenkins for the acts in question. He was afraid that the latter had been sacrificed by the Government before Parliament met, to save themselves. He had but very recently, a few hours previous, in reading Mr. Jenkins' report, obtained the information which led himself to express these views with regard to the late Agent-General.

Mr. BOWELL remarked that there was very little reduction in this item. In the old country, at present, there was great objection to emigration on the part of the employers. The only reduction shown was in the Agent-General's salary; contingencies instead of being lessened, were increased some $1,800.

Hon Mr. CARTWRIGHT—The contingencies are not increased.

Mr. BOWELL—They are increased. The estimates asked an increase for the London office of $1,800, just where reductions should take place. He noticed that large amounts had been paid to the Canadian News of over $600, probably for advertisements and literature. He hoped that the Minister of Finance would explain why £226 10s., sterling, had been paid for sending the Toronto Globe to this agency in London. One man had been paid £596, and then for maps, &c., £622. For the holding of meetings the most extraordinary charges had been made: one at Manchester had cost £53 19s. 2d., and another at Birmingham £24 6s. 9d.

Mr. DYMOND—I would remark that the Free-Trade Hall at Manchester costs £25 per night.

Mr. BOWELL was very glad to learn this, as it showed how reckless was the expenditure in this relation, in order to secure an opportunity for delivering speeches. In the rural sections the cost would have been much less; and the result might have been much better—the emigration of that class of people which was really required in Canada. He hoped that the Minister who had charge of this department would in the future see that money was not squandered after this fashion—such, for instance, as £50 sterling for a door-plate, and £20 sterling for a die in which to cast buttons for the servants in the office. He did not say that we did not wish artisans to emigrate to Canada; but he did maintain that to a greater extent we were in need of men who could settle upon and till our unoccupied lands. He desired an explanation regarding the payment of the expenditure of £226 10s. for Toronto Globes sent to this one agency in the city of London. Was it to circulate Grit literature in England.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT replied that these Globes had been distributed in various quarters in England, among emigrants and persons interested in promoting emigration. As for other items, these expenditures had been made by Mr. Jenkins with the best motives no doubt, but without previous consultation with the Government. Everybody knew, that at present, considerable indisposition to aid the work of emigration was shown, and consequently it was necessary to make greater expenditures, in connection with lectures, and the distribution of desirable information respecting this country, than had been the case for years. On the accession of this Ministry to power, a most extraordinary panic took place in the United States, and the result was the most widespread distress, affecting in the most serious manner emigration from Europe to this continent. For the first time in history, a steady stream of artisans and even of agricultural labourers, had been seen returning to the British Isles. In every steamship that had crossed the Atlantic during the past two years and a half, numbers of these persons of all classes and creeds, unable to find employment in the United States, had forsaken the shores of this continent. In addition, very great and extraordinary inducements were offered to British emigrants by Australia, and it was known that they had always been considerably disposed to go to that portion of Her Majesty's Dominions. Now, that had been by far the most important reason why emigration had diminished. It was utterly impossible under the conditions which had prevailed in this country and in the United States during the last two years, to encourage emigration here. Nor was it probably desirable to encourage a large emigration of artisans who would merely be taking the bread out of the mouths of those already in the country. There was an admirable opening for the Menonites in the North-West, and the policy of the late Government in that respect the present Government had carried out. He did not think it was fair that Mr. Jenkin's should be blamed on a comparison of the emigration which flowed into Canada and the United States during years of extraordinary prosperity, with the decreased emigration which naturally and inevitably resulted from an extraordinary depression. No doubt some items should be retrenched, and to these the attention of the Government had been directed, and precaution would be taken to reduce them in the future.

Mr. BOWELL said that inasmuch as the Hon. Minister of Finance admitted that the expenditure would be unproductive, would it not be advisable to omit the item altogether?

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the hon. gentleman would see that at least $40,000 was for quarantine purposes, and in connection with the public health, and a large proportion of the $170,000 remaining was intended for the transfer of Menonites, and the Government was obliged to be prepared to spend the money under the arrangement made by the late Government. And in addition to this, if they were to have an emigration system at all they could not upon a temporary check disband the whole emigration staff. Such a course would be of a most unwise character.

Mr. DYMOND regarded it as a great misfortune that an important question of that kind should have been taken up at that late hour and under the existing unfavorable circumstances. In commenting on the remarks of previous speakers, he stated that nothing would be more injurious and fatal to the interests of the Dominion than an appearance of weakness on their part. While the emigration to this country during the past two or three years had not been so extensive as previously, they had the satisfaction of knowing that the men who had been brought hither were the persons best adapted to the industries for which their labour was required. He showed that the number of steerage passengers which arrived in New York during the first nine months of 1873 and 1874, respectively, was 237,921 and 124,000. This exhibited a decrease of nearly one-half under an unchanged system of passage warrants and European agents, and there was no doubt that every American agent was just as active as ever. This was a larger falling off in proportion to the population than had taken place in Canada in the same period. With regard to Mr. Jenkins, he thought that there was nothing at home or abroad more likely to discourage those in the emigration service than the manner in which he had been treated, and he was satisfied that he had endeavoured to do his duty faithfully. An outcry had been raised because some of the meetings in Manchester had cost £30 or £40. That sum might seem extravagant, but when it was considered that it would tell all over England and no small part of Scotland, it ought not to be so regarded. He was satisfied that the amount of information conveyed to England with regard to this country, had been enormously increased by Mr. Jenkins' services. With reference to the emigration policy required at the present moment, he deemed it desirable that we should have a steady flow of emigration into the country, and that it should be of the particular class required most in Canada. He believed the present system was most conducive to these results, and that for a time at least it would be most politic for the country to proceed with it.

Mr. KILLAM said he had visited the London Agency, and he found it, as far as his judgment went, well conducted in every respect. He, however, did not like the location, and thought it might have been placed in a more central position.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the Imperial Government required the present site of the London Agency, and that a more central position would soon be occupied by the Agency.

Mr. WALLACE (Norfolk) did not know why the member for North York should enter into a defence of Mr. Jenkins, as the member for North Hastings had not said one word against that gentleman; he did attack the extravagance of the London office, and he fully concurred in the opinion that it was not desirable to expend so much money in bringing emigrants to Canada in view of the present condition of the country. The only agricultural labourers that were required in this country were men with sufficient capital to settle in our wild lands, and he thought the vote for this expenditure ought to have been considerably reduced.

Mr. McCALLUM was surprised to hear the remarks of the member for North York justifying the appointment of the Agent-General Jenkins; he was the only man who had ever justified that appointment, either in the House or out of it even. The Government had not defended it. The whole scheme has proved a failure as predicted by the right hon. member for Kingston. He was astonished to learn that over $1,100 has been squandered in circulating the Globe newspaper in England. Now, what was it they paid this money for, if not to form the political opinions of the emigrants before coming to this country? It was wrong. It was using the public money to poison the minds of emigrants in favour of the party in power.

Mr. PLUMB said the expenditure had increased as emigration had diminished. If the Government could not bring out more than twelve or thirteen thousand emigrants for the large amount they asked, it could be better expended.

The item passed.

On the item $170,000 towards assisting immigration and meeting immigration expenses including estimated expenses of transport of Menonites,

Mr. KIRKPATRICK asked what part of this would be required for the Menonites?

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said it was utterly impossible to say.

Hon. Mr. POPE—What is the cost of sending the emigrants via Duluth?

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said it would be something like twenty to twenty-five dollars over and above the fixed amount they had to pay themselves.

Mr. DESJARDINS asked if any portion of this was intended to aid in the repatriation of Canadians from the United States?

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—I am not aware any application has been made to the Department on the subject.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN said this was a favourable time to induce the Canadians in the United States to return home and settle on our waste lands in Quebec and Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. POPE said in his time he had sent an agent—the Rev. Mr. Gendron—who made a very valuable report. Through the exertions of that gentleman 100 families had been induced to return to Canada from the United States. He had not received the credit he deserved for that work.

The item was passed.

SPRING HILL BRANCH RAILWAY.

On items for Lower Province Railways, $1,600,000,

Mr. KIRKPATRICK asked if it was true the Government had given away the Spring Hill Railway, and on what terms?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the road was built and graded by that company, and the late Government had agreed to put on the iron and work it. They finished the road and worked it at a heavy loss. The present Government agreed to re-lay the road (taking away the old rails and replacing them with new) and gave it up to the company, they agreeing to work it to the junction and give all their freight to the main line. By this means the country was saved from eight to ten thousand dollars per annum.

It was proper he should give a few figures regarding the nett results of working the roads mentioned in this item during the last two or three years. The revenue in 1872-3 was $704,557; in 1873-74, $893,430; in 1874-5, $861,591. This showed an apparent reduction in the last year, but of the amount for 1873-4 the sum of $89,332 was credited in the receipts, which was not, of course, received. The nett cash earnings for the year ending June 30th, 1874, were $804,097; the nett cash earnings for the year ending June 30th, 1875, were $861,593.43. The expenditures for the same three years, for working expenses alone, were:—In 1872-3, $1,011,893; in 1873-4, $1,301,550; in 1874-5, $1,143,157. For the Intercolonial Railway, in the Province of Quebec—from St. Flavie to Rivière du Loup, 83½ miles—the gross receipts during the eight months it was in the possession of the Government, were $18,320.37, and the working expenses $47,574.50, showing a deficit of $29,254.13. The stores on hand on June 30th, 1874, were $381,757; on June 30th, 1875, the amount was reduced to $90,852. This showed they were effecting a saving in interest on some $298,905.

In 1875 there were laid altogether 3,583 tons of steel rails; in 1875-6, 3,528 tons, and 1,800 tons of iron rails were laid down in the course of narrowing the gauge of the Windsor branch. It would require for relaying during the next two years altogether about 12,428 tons of rails. A considerable quantity—perhaps one half—of this amount would be laid during the current year. A very considerable saving in the working expenses had been effected in the price of coal. The Albion Mining Company delivered it at the pits' mouth for $2 per ton; the Spring Hill Company delivered it at the branch junction, upon the Government road, for $2.10.

A question was asked by the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville) about the manner of purchasing stores and selling old material. The statement he then made was correct—that it had been the invariable practice to purchase all stores by tender, even the small quantities, unless for minute things in a particular hurry. For such articles as castings they had almost a permanent contract for the year, with the right to renew tenders when they pleased. It so happened, in reference to the system of tendering, that the hon. gentleman who was making the complaint of tenders not being asked for properly, received a contract for bar iron recently, being the lowest tender.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—You mean the company of which the hon. gentleman is a member?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I presume so; at all events the factory he manages. The price, I think, was $2.37½ per 100 lbs. The practice with all smaller stores is to send slips round to all parties in the trade, and the lowest selected when they are returned. The slips are placed on file and subjected to a regular audit by the auditor of the road and to inspection by the Local and General Superintendent. Any member might look at the books any time he liked to inspect the stock. When quantities of rails and other old stores are to be sold tenders are invited and they are sold invariably to the highest bidder. The invitation is generally by placard and advertisement if large quantities are required, if only small quantities are wanted slips are sent to the ordinary dealers.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said the member for King's had stated that a large quantity of old iron had been sold, and that he had seen no advertisement of the sale.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said that was a sale of old iron at Richmond Station; notice was given both by placard and advertisement in the papers.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said the hon. member (Mr. Domville), had asked the Hon. Finance Minister to get the returns down. He alleged that he had never seen or heard of anything of the sale.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The papers were not asked for here, but in the Public Accounts Committee, and they were brought down.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—They were placed in the hands of the Chairman of the Committee.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL explained that the hon. member had gone away yesterday and had no opportunity of seeing the papers.

Mr. WOOD asked if it was a fact that a member of the House had a contract with the Government.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—It is the Holbrook Iron Co., of which the hon. member referred to is managing director. Of course that is a very different thing from a newspaper proprietor doing printing for the Government. I commend the hon. member for Hastings for his investigation.

Mr. BOWELL—Probably the hon. member for North Hastings will test the opinion of the House on that question, and he had no doubt the Hon. Minister of Public Works would do precisely what he did when he and the Hon. Minister of Justice moved his motion on a similar question—give it not only his earnest consideration, but use his eloquence and logic on what he then termed a great principle—and record his vote accordingly.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL thought there was nothing improper in a stock company of which an hon. member might be a director or president accepting a Government contract; he did nothing contrary to the rules of the House, or that invalidated his seat. It was, however, quite different in the case of a newspaper proprietor accepting Government printing.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE quite agreed with the hon. gentleman; a member of a stock company was exempted by law from any liabilities of that kind. He did not throw the slightest reflection on the hon. member when he mentioned the fact, and if his words implied anything of the kind he had no such intention.

Mr. McKAY (Colchester) said it would be seen from the returns that there had been a large falling off in the receipts as compared with the previous year. This was a serious matter considering that it had occurred under an increased tariff. He thought the advanced tariff had been a great injury to the industry and trade of the country; it had caused several establishments to close during the season, and material intended for use was lying all along the railway. Besides, farmers in his district had gone to market with their teams solely on account of the increased rate. The tariff should be made to suit the wants of the country; by encouraging traffic in that way the receipts would increase. Then, again, the system of special freight was a grievance which should be remedied. He knew instances where a difference of $4 had been demanded on the same class of freight. This was unfair, and had created a great deal of uneasiness and dissatisfaction. The Government should impose a reasonable and uniform tariff, so that any one could understand the freight he would have to pay, instead of being in dread of unjust discrimination.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman was mistaken in thinking the revenue was less; it was $56,469 larger in 1874-5 than in 1873-4.

The figures he first read, as had been pointed out, were fallacious. They included $54,951 for freight, for which no cash was received; whereas, the $861,591 of last year represented the cash receipts of the year. In regard to the special rates, the hon. gentleman would perhaps be surprised to learn that no individuals got special rates; those rates were from station to station, and everyone who had the particular class of freight to which they applied would be treated as others were. As to the general rates being too high, he could only say they were 20 to 25 per cent. lower than on any other road on the continent.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—How do they compare with those of the Grand Trunk.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—They are much lower than any on the continent. Anybody can see this by looking at the table.

Mr. McKAY (Colchester) said when he referred to the decrease, he took the figures from the returns; the Hon. Minister of Public Works had given the House figures which did not appear in the returns. He maintained that his statement with regard to special rates was perfectly correct. He had made strict enquiries, and went to a station with a gentleman and inquired the freight on iron knees to a certain point. He was told $7, but another gentleman shipped the same freight to the same place at $2.55. That was the case on the 1st February, and he presumed it was the same still.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—There is some mistake about that, and the hon. gentleman had better make the statement specifically in a letter and send it to me. If it turns out correct, we will soon call that station-master to account.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK asked if the Spring Hill Co. agreed to give their railroad to the Government in consideration of the latter finishing it and putting on the rails?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Yes.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said the road then became a public work of the Dominion, and he would like to know if it was formally conveyed back?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—There was no formal conveyance of the road.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said the public money had been expended on the road, and it was just as much a public work as any other part of the Intercolonial or the Welland Canal. He held that the Government had no right to give it away. He would like the opinion of the Hon. Minister of Justice as to the legality of the transaction, and whether the Government should not have come down to the House and asked some authority or ratification of the bargain.

Mr. McLEOD said the company would gladly make a present of the road to the Government if they work it on the same tariff as they are working the Intercolonial.

In reply to a question by Hon. Mr. Langevin,

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he had stated that the company built the road themselves and the late Government agreed to iron and work it. The present Government put an end to that arrangement, although losing money by it, and decided to change the rails to steel. The company then agreed to work the road themselves.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN enquired whether the Minister of Public Works would inform the House of the monthly disbursements and revenue of the railway.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I will send it to the hon. gentleman.

THE WINDSOR BRANCH RAILWAY.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL asked whether the Windsor Road had been transferred to a company.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE replied that this had not yet been done. The late Government, when he was sure they were otherwise fully occupied, had in October, 1873, made an agreement with the Western Province Railway Company; this was afterwards in the spring of 1874 embodied in an Act. It was then expected that within a year such progress would be accomplished towards Annapolis, as to justify the transference of the road; this was not the case, however. The Windsor and Annapolis road, in the meantime, had been worked on a lease, though the company was all but insolvent, and had always been in a state of impecuniosity. It became absolutely necessary to change the gauge on this line, and also on the Windsor branch, or else to run a third rail from the Junction into Halifax. The road was in such a bad state of repair, that it was absolutely dangerous to run trains over it; and as the Government might have been legally held responsible for accidents, he was obliged to purchase 2,000 tons of iron rails to renew and render it safe for travel. The Windsor and Annapolis Company had in the meantime leased the road on the terms arranged by the late Administration; when the former were able to take it over, it would be so delivered, but no particular time was specified for the transferment.

THE PICTOU BRANCH.

In reply to an enquiry of the Hon. Mr. Mitchell respecting the Pictou Branch,

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE explained that its position was as follows:—The hon. gentleman would remember that the Government in 1874 had obtained power to make arrangements with any company for the transfer of this branch, on condition of completing the railroad eastward to the Strait of Canso, and farther, if possible, to some point on the eastern coast of Nova Scotia. The House unanimously agreed to this proposition, and a company did make an offer through the Local Government. This offer was, however, withdrawn, and no company appeared inclined to accept the transfer of the branch on condition of its extension to Louisburg, or some port in its vicinity. The Local Government and the local members of both this and the other House, seemed, moreover, to be under the impression that no company could be induced to extend the line beyond the Straits of Canso. He had suggested another plan to this effect—that the transfer should be made on condition that the company extend it to the Straits of Canso; and that if any other company would agree within a certain time to build a railway from thence to Louisburg, or some other point in that neighbourhood, they should become pro rata proprietors of the Truro and Pictou Branch. He hoped that this design would be carried out. Mr. Kenealy and his colleagues had had a number of interviews with him (Mr. Mackenzie) on the subject in London, England, but he was unable to assent to their conditions for want of authority. Recently an Order in Council had passed, recommending Parliament to transfer the road on condition of its being extended to the Straits of Canso, which would be ferried, if the company accepting these terms would not undertake to build the line farther in that direction. He believed that the local Government had granted a subsidy of $7,000 per mile to any company that would construct a line from Campbellton to Louisburg, or some other place in its vicinity.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL regretted to learn that this was the state of things. The branch from Pictou to Truro was one of the principal arteries of communication between western Canada and Halifax, and more particularly the eastern portion of Nova Scotia, and he thought that it would be exceedingly unfortunate if a portion of the line fell into the hands of a private company. A very large proportion of the flour and provisions shipped eastwards from Montreal passed over this line, and such an arrangement would add to the coast and interfere with trade very materially.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE did not think that any such trouble would arise. Traffic must pass over about 60 miles of the Government line, and the Government would control the rails and running arrangements.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL enquired what quantity of old rails were on hand, and to what extent they could be utilized for branch lines?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE replied that he could not give an exact answer until he was in possession of correct returns. He could at present only give an approximate statement of the quantity on hand; probably it would not lay more than 65 miles of railway. A considerable quantity of them were already engaged for the Elgin and St. Martin and Upham Roads.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL asked how much business was done on the Monckton and Miramichi branches?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE replied that a statement at present would hardly be fair to the District, as the Miramichi line had only been open for three months during the winter. The traffic, as indeed they had expected, had been very light, and the receipts were not quite equal to one-half the expenditure.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK protested against the promiscuous granting of rails for the use of branch lines. The Government claimed that by the reduction of the stores from $360,000 to $70,000, that a saving of $230,000 had been effected.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—No! no! I said the interest was saved on the difference between the large and small amount.

Mr. PLUMB asked why this policy was adopted?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said that they not only found the stock absolutely unnecessary, but absolutely prejudicial to the interests of the road. Vast quantities of stores had been lying there for years, and many were utterly ruined. There was no necessity for keeping so large a stock, as they could get the ordinary supplies with the greatest possible celerity from St. John or Halifax.

The item was carried.

The Committee rose and reported progress.

THE SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK asked if the Government intended to bring down any Supplementary Estimates.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the Supplementary Estimates would be brought down as soon as they could be got ready. That was all the information he could give.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK—That is not satisfactory. I would like to know on what day they are likely to be brought down.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The Supplementary Estimates, as the hon. gentleman well knows, are both for the current and approximate year, and it is very difficult until the last two or three days of the Session to get all the items in, and it is rather unreasonable to press for a statement of the day on which they would be brought down.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL protested against the answer of the Hon. Minister of Finance as unreasonable.

The House adjourned at Two o'clock, a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, April 7, 1876.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at three o'clock.

THE INSOLVENT ACT.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE moved that the Bill to amend the Insolvent Act of 1875 be referred back to Committee of the Whole to strike out clause 15.—Carried.

The Bill was reported with the amendment, which was concurred in.

Mr. CARON moved that the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be referred back to Committee of the Whole for the purpose of making the following amendment:—

“That in the statement of liabilities and assets which the insolvent is required, under the seventeenth section of the Act hereinbefore cited, to furnish to the assignee, the insolvent shall discriminate between his liabilities to traders and to non-traders. At any time after the making of the assignment, or the issue of the writ of attachment, and previous to the first meeting of creditors, any creditor who is a non-trader may notify the assignee in writing that such is the case, and that he purposes to avail himself of the provisions of this Act; and no non-trader who shall have so notified the assignee shall be bound to accept the composition, or sign the discharge of the insolvent, but the claim of such non-trader shall nevertheless be ranked by the assignee upon the dividend sheet for a dividend or dividends in like manner as the claims of other creditors; and the receipt signed by the non-trader for such dividend shall be a receipt pro tanto in respect of such claim as aforesaid.

“That a non-trader—that is to say, any farmer, grazier, common laborer, workman for hire, or other person, who cannot be declared an insolvent under the Act hereinbefore cited—who has availed himself of the provisions of this Act may attend at meetings of the creditors of the insolvent, and may vote thereat in the same manner as other creditors, except that such non-trader shall not vote upon any question touching the acceptance of any offer of composition, or the granting of the discharge of the insolvent; and in calculating the number of creditors and the amount of the claims against the insolvent upon which the acceptance of a deed of composition and discharge, or the consent to the discharge of the insolvent is based, non-traders who have availed themselves of the provisions of this Act, and the amount of their claims shall not be computed; and no deed of composition and discharge, nor any discharge from the Court or Judge shall in any way impair the right of a non-trader who has availed himself of the provisions of this Act, to recover from the insolvent any balance that may remain unpaid upon the claim of such non-trader, but the said balance may be recovered in like manner as if no proceedings in insolvency had been entered into, notwithstanding the acceptance by the non-trader of any dividend from the assignees as hereinbefore provided: Provided always that no non-trader shall avail himself of the provisions of this and the preceding clause in the case of an insolvent, whom such non-trader has required or forced to go into insolvency."

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said there were two grounds on which the Government desired this amendment should not pass. It was a proposition to change the Act in a vital part before it had been fairly tried. As at present advised, the Government did not see its way to assent to this amendment, inasmuch as it would practically destroy the effect of the Insolvent Act altogether. He looked to the House to vote down this amendment.

The members were called in, and a vote was taken on the amendment, which was rejected on the following division:--

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said he had always been opposed to this Insolvent Law. He had opposed it whenever he thought opposition would bring about any good result. His experience had been, instead of promoting commercial integrity or success, it had had an exactly contrary effect. That was his opinion, and though he was aware no immediate good could result from expressing it, he felt it his duty to announce that he still was opposed to the Insolvent Law, and would be glad to see it removed from the Statute Book. He had voted for the amendment for the purpose of expressing his opposition, not only to the existence of the Law, but the very principles on which it was based.

The Bill as amended was then read the third time, and passed.

CONCURRENCE.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT moved concurrence in the reports of the Committee of Supply.

On item $10,000 for slides and booms,

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew) said he observed the item for the Des Joachim works, which appeared in last year's estimates, was not revoted this year. He wished to know why it was not?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the engineer's report was as follows:—

“At present I am under the impression that a flat dam and boom will answer the purposes required, but it is impossible to give any decided opinion until I have had an opportunity of examining this portion of the river at the season of the highest water, which will be done.”

Mr. WHITE—Will the sum which appeared in the estimates last year be put in the Supplementary Estimates to be expended if the engineer considers the work should be proceeded with?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—It will not. Although it is a useful work it is not looked upon as a necessary improvement.

The item was concurred in.

Item 146, providing $37,000 for meteorological observations, including instruments, and cost of telegraphing weather warnings, being taken up,

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL regretted that it was not increased in order that the staff might be rendered more efficient, which at present was impossible. The United States in this connection, spent hundreds of thousands, and he hoped that the item would next year be increased.

The item was concurred in.

Item 148, providing $23,000 for the Marine and Emigrant Hospital, Quebec, being taken up, Hon. Mr. MITCHELL enquired whether the Government intended to take the management of this institution into their own hands?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE replied in the affirmative. As to the inmates it would be conducted precisely on the same principle as Rockwood Asylum at Kingston, under the jurisdiction of the Local Government. Various communications had been sent to the Government of the Province of Quebec, pointing out the absolute necessity of changing the mode of admitting patients into this hospital; but he believed that no reply had been received. As soon as Parliament rose, they intended to place it on a proper footing as a Dominion Government institution, and if advantage was taken of its facilities for treating the ill, and persons who had met with accidents, for whom it was bound in no way to provide by the local authorities, their payment must be made pro rata.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL.

The item was concurred in.

Item 157 being taken up,

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL stated, he thought that the grant of $500 simply to provide for expenses with the view of inspecting Prince Edward Island steamers, was excessive, as the steamers to be inspected were few in number, and the distance not so great as to necessitate the payment of so large a sum.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD replied, that the steamers were not very few in number. He presumed that it provided for contingencies and travelling expenses.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL remarked, that the Inspector for Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, who performed this duty, was only required to cross to the Island to inspect five or six vessels and ferry-boats; this could be done in a week, and the amount was altogether disproportionate to the necessities of the case.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT replied that he would call the attention of the Ministry who had charge of this department to the matter.

The item was concurred in.

Item 178, providing $40,000 for probable expenses in connection with new treaties, being taken up,

In reply to Mr. Smith (Selkirk),

Hon. Mr. LAIRD stated, that they expected to make a treaty with the Plain Crees during the present year; and with the Indians on the line of the Pacific Railway over the Rocky Mountains.

The item was concurred in.

Item 183, providing $50,000 for unforeseen expenses, being taken up,

In reply to Hon. Mr. Mitchell,

Hon. Mr. BLAKE explained that the services of four counsel, two senior, and two junior, had been engaged in connection with the Fisheries Commission enquiry; the former, Messrs. Doutre & Co., were paid $1,000 each, and Thompson & Co., $600 each. No progress had been made in this relation, as had been announced in the Speech from the Throne.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL remarked that he had noticed in the Washington correspondence of the Philadelphia Enquirer, the statement that the American Government had refused to appoint the third, their arbitrator, on the ground that some provision of the Washington Treaty had not been observed. He would like to know whether there was any truth in the report.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I have not seen the article, and there is absolutely nothing which I can communicate to the House on this subject at the present time.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—No progress has been made, I suppose?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—No progress has been made.

The item was concurred in.

CANADIAN VESSELS IN AMERICAN WATERS.

Item 186, under head of Customs, being taken up,

Mr. CURRIER enquired whether any representations had been made to the United States Government with reference to the extraordinary charges at present levied on Canadian vessels in the American canals. The charges per barge were as follows:—Custom House at the first port of entry, $1.60; war tax, $4; administering oath, 20 cents; inspector's fees, for each trip, $3; custom's dues at Whitehall for clearance, $1.60, and light-house charges, $1, the total being $11.40 from Rouse's Point to Whitehall and return, while in our canals less than a dollar was paid on American barges.

Hon. Mr. BURPEE replied that these were matters lying wholly within the province of American affairs, and of the American Government. No correspondence whatever with the Custom's Department had taken place on the subject. He did not see how the Government could interfere.

Mr. CURRIER thought that if there was no other remedy similar charges should be levied on American vessels in our canals. He also remarked that an American coal mining company had obtained the monopoly of bringing coal to Canada via this route, lumber being taken back; and in consequence, our forwarding companies were unable to obtain coal as return freight.

Hon. Mr. BURPEE said that negotiations had been going on with the Federal Government in regard to the impositions placed on Canadian vessels going to New York. That correspondence was going on now, and while they could place restrictions on American vessels making use of our waters, they did not want to put any unnecessary restrictions on the trade of the Canadian people simply because they did so on the other side. The Government hoped that the correspondence which was then being proceeded with would terminate in an amicable and reciprocal traffic between the two countries.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said this was a most important subject, and recent negotiations had shown that it was not the State Government that controlled the canals, but the Federal Governments. That statement he had seen published on good authority. The late war had given rise to a bitter feeling against this country, which feeling he thought should be now removed. If Canada permitted American vessels to navigate Canadian canals, Canada ought to be granted the same privilege on American canals. He trusted the negotiations with the United States Government would be proceeded with energetically with a view of getting the required concessions made.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said that the papers brought down the previous day on the subject gave the fullest information, both on the ground taken by the State and Federal Governments. The State Governments were admitted to have control of the State canals. The State Governments had no objection to the navigation of their canals by Canadian boats, but difficulties were thrown in the way by the Federal Government.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL trusted the Government would follow up the matter energetically. The Federal Government were not only bound in honour, but by treaty, to endeavour to use their influence to obtain that concession from the State. If these concessions were not to be obtained, he thought the Canadian Government should place on American vessels coming into our waters such restrictions as they could, legitimately and fairly, for the purpose of compelling them to adopt a more liberal system in regard to Canada.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the Federal Government did faithfully fulfil their obligation under the Washington Treaty to use their influence with the State Government. The State Government acceded to the request, but the Federal Government shut the Canadians out from the canals by the operation of their own laws. The Washington Treaty was so ingeniously constructed that if Canada refused to allow American vessels to navigate Canadian canals she was subject to the imposition of certain penalties, but no penalty was imposed on Americans if they did not allow Canadians to use their canals.

Mr. JONES (Leeds) said he noticed by the papers which had been brought down that no restrictions had been placed on the navigation of these canals by the State Governments. The difficulty had come from the Federal Government itself upon the authority of an old law passed in 1799. But it was stated in these papers that a law had been passed in 1850, by which the former law had been abrogated, or by which the old law could be over-riden, and compel the carrying out of the Washington Treaty. The principal reason the American Government gave for their present action was that Canada had no right whatever to the navigation of their rivers and canals in the interior of their country, and that Canada had a right only to the navigation of those waters and canals which lay contiguous to the Canadian boundary lines. The 27th clause of the Treaty, on which the contention was grounded, ran as follows:—"And the "several canals connected with the "navigation of the lakes and rivers "traversed by or contiguous to the "boundary line between the possess- "ions of the high contracting parties." The Americans held that Canadian vessels could not go further than the first port of entry where they must make their entry and unload. He was glad the Government had taken action in this matter, but he was afraid their negotiations would not be brought to a favourable termination.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) would ask the Hon. Minister of Customs if it was intended to establish Customs stations on the Doulin near to Barton, and on the Peace River District where it joins British Columbia. He would remind the Hon. Minister of Customs that the Premier had stated in the House some time back that duties to the extent of several thousand dollars had been collected within the past year in the Bow River District of the country--and it is well known that supplies to a considerable extent are brought into the territory by way of Minsa and Barton. It is also reported that an English merchant, having a business connection with the North-West, proposes this ensuing summer to have his goods entered for sale in the Saskatchewan District introduced by that route, and in view of this he trusted the Hon. Minister would consider whether there ought not to be a regular Customs station there, as well as on the Peace River, by which latter channel supplies were also taken in to no small extent.

Hon. Mr. BURPEE said this was something new, and the matter would be looked into carefully.

The item was concurred in.

EXCISE.

On item No. 187, appropriating $235,800 for Excise Department,

Hon. Mr. BURPEE said he desired to state, in answer to a question put to him in regard to the reduction of the salary of the collector of Inland Revenue at Monckton, New Brunswick, from $700 to $600, that that officer was appointed in July, 1870, at a salary of $500 a year; and in July, 1871, the factory ceased a portion of its operations. In the month of July, 1872, his salary was increased from $500 to $700, notwithstanding that his labours were reduced. The Government, therefore, considered they were justified in making the reduction.

The item was concurred in.

CULLER'S FEES.

On item No. 188, appropriating $81,500 for salaries, culler's fees and contingent expenses,

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew) called attention to the excessive charges made in this branch. The Hon. Finance Minister had stated last year that the receipts of the Quebec office were very little in excess of the expenditure. He found by examining the public accounts that the receipts in the Quebec office were $86,486, whilst the expenditure was $77,465; leaving an excess of upwards of $9,000. As the season of navigation was about to open, he thought it would be extremely desirable that the fees should be put on such a basis, as early as possible, that they would only meet the expenditure required.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT explained that his former statement was made whilst under a slight misconception as to the receipts. He had called the attention of the Secretary of State for the Provinces to the matter, and he had promised to give it his early attention.

Mr. CURRIER wished the Hon. Premier to direct his attention to the Culler's office at Quebec. He was sure that if the Hon. Premier did so he would find some other mode of carrying on this office than that which already existed. The management could be so changed as to reduce the expenditure by one-half, without interfering with the efficiency of the service.

Mr. WRIGHT (Pontiac) said when this was up before he had urged the Government to abolish the office and allow free trade in this matter. He found many in the trade approved of that idea. Some of the largest firms doing business on the Ottawa and its tributaries never employed the cullers of this office when they could avoid doing so.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew) said the object for which this office was established was to prevent disputes between buyers and sellers. It would be a great misfortune if it were abolished. Although there were many abuses in the office, he would be very sorry indeed to see it taken from under the supervision of the Government.

Mr. CURRIER said he did not think it was possible to abolish the office. The Government required it to keep a check of the lumber that went down. The office could, no doubt, be greatly improved, and the charges reduced.

The item was concurred in.

POST OFFICES.

On item $1,732,500, for post-offices,

Mr. WRIGHT (Pontiac) urged the Government to secure an additional thirty feet for the lane back of the new post office at Ottawa. It would not only give greater security to the building, but it would induce holders of property on the West side of it to put up good structures.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said there was a very wide and handsome street opposite the Parliament buildings and the people of Ottawa had put up a row of shanties on it.

Mr. WRIGHT had no doubt the owners of the property referred to had done the best they could. The people of Ottawa had shown themselves able to erect as good buildings as the Premier's constituents owned.

Mr. CURRIER did not think it was necessary to have the thoroughfare wider than forty feet, but thirty feet was too narrow.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government had bought all they intended to use. If the parties who owned the adjacent property wished to give 30 feet of it for a street, the Government would consider whether the 30 feet that belonged to them would be added to it for thoroughfare. At present it was intended to enclose it.

The item was concurred in.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

On the item $72,000 for salaries of 92 inspectors of weights and measures,

Mr. GORDON complained of the smallness of salaries paid to those officials. Five or six hundred dollars was not enough for their services. He hoped the Government would increase the appropriation.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said it was not intended that the persons engaged in this work should be engaged all the time at it. The Government did not expect the fees would at all recoup them for the amount they would have to pay in salaries.

Mr. GORDON—The fees now charged are much higher than under the Local Government.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—They are not going to meet the expenditure, however.

In reply to Hon. Mr. Langevin,

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE explained that it would never do to give large salaries in small towns; in large cities, however, it might be different. In the country districts, for the inspection of weights and measures, $500 would be the minimum; and this amount would vary to $1,000, according to the extent of population.

The item was concurred in.

GAS INSPECTION.

Item 191, providing $18,600 for the salaries of 32 Gas inspectors, being taken up, Hon. Mr. MITCHELL remarked that it was a new item, and enquired whether this expenditure would be recouped by fees?

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT replied that it was impossible, at present, to know what the fees would be. This would depend in a large measure upon the extent to which the inhabitants of towns chose to avail themselves of the services of inspectors, of whom as yet very few had been appointed.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—Are appointments to be made in every town that has a gasometer?

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—I do not think that this will be done. These officers will be appointed as necessity requires.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—Do the fees come into the Treasury?

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—Yes. The item was concurred in TELEGRAPH LINES.

Item 201, providing for the payment of $194,666, for telegraph lines between Prince Edward Island and the mainland being taken up,

Mr. KIRKPATRICK remarked that the Premier had promised to bring down the contract in this relation.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I did, supposing that there was a contract; but I find that the payment is necessary under the terms of Union.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK—Is it settled in the terms of Union?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Yes.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK—And how was it that it was never paid before?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I suppose that it must have been paid under general telegraphic expenses. I asked Mr. Langton for an explanation, but I have not seen him since.

The item was concurred in.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS.

THE TELEGRAPH LINE ON THE INTER-COLONIAL.

Mr. GOUDGE asked whether the Montreal Telegraph Company have the privilege of constructing a line of telegraph, for general purposes, upon the Intercolonial Railway from the Province of Quebec to Nova Scotia? If so, whether the privilege is confined to the Montreal Telegraph Company? Have the above-named Company built, and are they operating a line upon said Railway? What were the conditions upon which (if granted) the privilege was given, and if they have fulfilled these conditions?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The Montreal Telegraph Company have the exclusive privilege by perpetual contract with the Government, entered into three or four years ago, to construct a line of telegraph along the Intercolonial Railway. That privilege has been exercised, the Government paying a certain proportion per mile—my impression is $16 per mile. This amount has been paid, and the Montreal Telegraph Company have the right by the specific agreement regularly entered into with the Government of operating the line. On some portions of the road the Western Union Co. have a line also, but I presume they work in harmony with the Montreal Telegraph Co. The precise conditions I have no objection to state, and I am willing to bring down the papers if anyone wants them. We cannot terminate the contract with the company except by purchase. The Dominion Telegraph Co., some months ago, applied for the right to erect a line along the Intercolonial, but I did not feel we could grant their request without terminating the existing contract.

Mr. GOUDGE—How is it the Western Union has a line there?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I presume by agreement with the Montreal Telegraph Co.

Mr. GOUDGE—How is it they do work cheaper for the Government than for the public?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—They are bound to do the railway work without charge.

THE CARNARVON SETTLEMENT.

Mr. DECOSMOS asked whether any despatches or telegrams have been received from Her Majesty's principal Secretary of State for the Colonies respecting the Address to Her Majesty the Queen, from the Legislative Assembly and Government of British Columbia, forwarded February last, urging Her Majesty's Imperial Government to move the Dominion Government to carry out the Carnarvon settlement in reference to the Pacific Railway? If so, what is the nature of the said telegrams, despatches, etc.; and will they be laid before the House this Session?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—There is no despatch that can be laid before the House this Session.

SOREL CUSTOM HOUSE.

Mr. BARTHE moved an Address to His Excellency the Governor General for copies of any petition, correspondence or other documents in the hands of the Government in favour of the building of a Custom House in the town of Sorel, district of Richelieu.—Carried.

ST. VINCENT DE PAUL PENITENTIARY.

Mr. OUIMET moved for an order of the House for copies of all official correspondence and of all instructions issued in relation to the completion or finishing of the building and outbuildings of the Penitentiary of St. Vincent de Paul (Quebec), and in relation to the building of a house for the keepers and employés of the said Penitentiary; also a statement shewing the amount expended for repairs on the residence of the Warden of the said Penitentiary—the whole from the establishment of the said Penitentiary to 1st January, 1876.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he could only agree to this motion in a qualified way. He had no objection to bring down all that was necessary to give the information the hon. gentleman wanted as to the expenditure and other points, but he would not bring down everything.

Mr. OUIMET said his object was to know whether the Government had decided to finish the addition to the building in order to avoid the necessity of transferring the convicts to Kingston.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government were making preparations for building the wing.

The motion was carried.

MONTREAL HARBOUR COMMISSION.

Mr. OUIMET moved an Address to His Excellency the Governor General for a statement of all salaries, fees and indemnity paid by the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal to any member or employé of the said Harbour Commission since 1872.—Carried.

LICENSING OF ENGINEERS.

Mr. COOK moved an Address to His Excellency the Governor General, for copies of all correspondence with the Quebec Board of Trade, Mr. Risley, the Chairman of the Board of Steamboat Inspection, and the Government in reference to the passage of an Act for the Licensing of Engineers elsewhere than on Steamboats.—Carried.

TONNAGE DUES IN AMERICAN PORTS.

Mr. NORRIS moved an Address to His Excellency the Governor General for all correspondence between the Government of Canada and the United States, in reference to the regulations imposed compelling foreign vessels to call and report at Duncan City, in the Straits of Mackinaw, before being allowed to enter Lake Michigan; also in reference to the payment of tonnage dues on all foreign vessels in American ports.—Carried.

PACIFIC RAILWAY CONTRACT NO. 15.

Mr. HIGINBOTHAM moved for an Order of the House for copies of all tenders for the construction of contract No. 15 Canadian Pacific Railway; also all correspondence with reference thereto, together with copies of instructions, if any, issued by the Department of Public Works to the Engineer in charge having reference to said contract.—Carried.

SECTION EIGHT,—INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. FISET moved for an Order of the House for copies of all correspondence between the workmen on section 8 of the Intercolonial Railway and the Government, in relation to the non-payment of their wages for work done under the direction of John O'Donnell, agent of Duncan McDonald, contractor for the said section; copies of their sworn accounts transmitted to the Department of Public Works by divers persons; also copies of all correspondence which may have passed between the Government and the Superintendent of Dominion Railways for the Government, between the Government and the parties interested.—Carried.

THE CHARGES AGAINST JUDGE LORANGER.

On the order being called for the motion for a Committee to enquire into the charges alleged in the petitions respecting Judge Loranger,

Mr. COOK.

Mr. BECHARD said he would not, at this late period of the Session, proceed with a motion involving so important an investigation; but he gave the House an assurance that the subject would be brought up next Session.

THE RAILWAY STATION AT BIC PARISH.

Mr. FISET moved for an Order of the House for the correspondence between the Government or the Intercolonial Railway Commissioners, and the interested parties of the Parish of Bic, with reference to the change of the site of the Railway station at the said place; also for the correspondence between the interested parties of the parish of St. Octave de Métis, and neighbouring parishes, and the Government asking that the station of St. Octave be placed in a more convenient situation.—Carried.

THE ALASKA BOUNDARY LINE.

Mr. ROSCOE moved an Address to His Excellency the Governor General, for copies of all correspondence between this Government and the Government of the United States regarding the settlement of the boundary line between Alaska and British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the correspondence was of a semi-private nature, and he was not sure whether it could be brought down.

The motion was carried.

THE DISTRESS AMONG THE FISHERMEN

Mr. CIMON moved for an Order of the House for all correspondence with the Department of Marine and Fisheries, in the course of last autumn, in the matter of the distress among the fishermen of the North Shore of the St. Lawrence, and the replies of the Department to such correspondence.—Carried.

GOVERNMENT PROPERTY AT SOREL.

Mr. BARTHE moved for an Order of the House for copies of all correspondence of whatsoever nature, telegrams, &c., between the Government and the Reverend M. Dupré, priest, Curé of Sorel, President of the Board of the Directors of the Classical and Commercial College, Sorel, Robert Sewell, S. Hayden, Esquire, Provincial Land Surveyor, and any other person; of any report by the said Hayden or any other person, respecting offer to purchase a piece of land belonging to the Government, situated in the town of Sorel, by the Corporation of the said College of Sorel, together with copies of all communications from any person whomsoever, of whatsoever nature, in relation to this matter, between Colonel Coffin, an employé of the Government, or any other employé of the Government and any other person whomsoever, residing in the town of Sorel or elsewhere, in relation to the said offer to purchase the said piece of land.—Carried.

DREDGING AT LAKE ST. CLAIR.

Mr. STEPHENSON moved for an Order of the House for a return of all expenditure in detail incurred in dredging a channel at the entrance of the Chenal Ecarté, into Lake St. Clair; also, the dredging at Johnson's Bend, as well as in the River Sydenham, together with the Engineer's Reports connected therewith.—Carried.

THE POSTMASTER AT GLENCOE.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) moved for an Order of the House for copies of all the evidence taken by the Post Office Inspector in regard to charges brought against the Postmaster at Glencoe, together with all reports made to the Post Office Department in connection therewith.—Carried.

COUNTY OF LOTBINIERE.

The third reading of the Bill entitled an Act to detach a certain portion of the County of Lotbinière and to annex it to the County of Beauce, being moved,—

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN moved that it be not read the third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the whole House to be amended as follows :—

“Whereas the parish of St. Séverin, in the county and district of Beauce, including therein a portion of the seigniory of Beaurivage, in the county of Lotbinière, has lately been constituted, and whereas the said parish of St. Séverin forms a separate and distinct municipality, and it is expedient to detach the said portion of the seigniory of Beaurivage from the county or electoral district of Lotbinière and to attach it to the county or electoral district of Beauce, for the purposes of representation in the House of Commons; Therefore Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows :—

From and after the coming into force of this Act, that portion of the municipality of the parish of St. Séverin, now forming part of the County of Lotbinière for the purposes hereinafter mentioned, shall be detached from the said county of Lotbinière, and shall be annexed to the county of Beauce for the purposes of representation in the House of Commons.”

Mr. JONES (Leeds) explained that he had opposed the second reading of the Bill, on the ground that Bills of this nature should not be brought in by private members, for if hon. gentlemen began changing their constituencies, to suit their own convenience, he did not know where this would end. It had been said that there was a precedent for it in the proceedings of the Parliament of 1873; but the precedent was bad; and he had objected to the measure because he had frequently heard rumours about the House, to the effect that alterations were to be proposed with regard to electoral districts in Ontario. Constituencies in Quebec were, however, to a certain extent different from those in the sister Province; and under present circumstances he withdrew his opposition.

The amendment being carried, the House went into Committee of the Whole. The Bill was reported with the amendment, which being read the first and second time, and concurred in, the Bill was read the third time, and passed.

CONCURRENCE.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT moved concurrence in the reports of Committee of Supply.

THE WELLAND CANAL.

On item No. 87, appropriating $2,000,000 for the work of construction on the Welland Canal,

Mr. McCALLUM said he was of opinion that it would be much cheaper to raise the masonry of the locks during construction, so as to prepare for a fourteen feet draught, instead of a twelve feet draught. He wished to know whether it was the intention of the Government to do this, as it could be done much cheaper now than afterwards; and, also, if they intended to build a new aqueduct across the Welland River or deepen the existing one. He asked whether the Government intended to deepen and complete the feeder, as formerly intended. It was totally useless as it was, and unless about $100,000 more was spent upon it the money which had already been expended would be lost to the country.

He also wished to get information in regard to the rock excavations—if they would be able to complete this work within a reasonable time, and at a reasonable expense—and wanted to know why the work was not let before.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he did not think the Government intended to deepen the feeder. They expected to get the rock excavations at Port Colborne executed as soon as possible. It was intended to deepen the aqueduct so that it would allow 14 feet of water ultimately, and this work would be placed under contract as soon as the engineer could get his plans ready. It was not the intention of the Government to construct any of the works for 14 feet that could as well be done afterwards. In places where it was necessary to do any sinking to attain the depth of 14 feet the excavation would be done.

Mr. McCALLUM contended that the rock cutting was a work that ought to have been let because it would take a long time to complete it, and it was questionable whether the work could be done at anything like reasonable expense. Mr. Page in his report on this subject said as to the aqueduct, it was questionable whether they could obtain a depth of 12 feet without injuring the present structure, and he thought it would be better to build a new aqueduct at once than to make these alterations at an expenditure which would be thrown away. Now, in regard to the feeder, the action of the Government had been the means of squandering $150,000 or $200,000 of the people's money. Mr. Page said on this point:—

“During seasons of very low water there are, however, occasionally for short periods, less than 12 feet of water on the present lock-sills at Port Colborne. It is therefore proposed when increasing the length of that structure, or building another one, to lower the sills say 12 inches.

“The contemplated depth of the aqueduct can be obtained by cutting down the crown of the arches from ten to twelve inches for a space of about 20 feet in the centre of the channel through it.

“This can be done without injuring the stability of the structure, if strong bands of wrought iron are let into the stone, extended down into the haunches of the respective arches, and throughout well fastened to the masonry.

“The space above mentioned might then be covered between the abutments with heavy plate iron, well fastened to bands and bearers and otherwise secured so as to prevent displacement from any cause whatever.

“By adopting this course the present aqueduct can be made available for the passage of vessels of the full draft of the enlarged canal, and in this way one of the chief difficulties in carrying out the enlargement at this important point would be obviated at a very moderate outlay.

“Means must, however, be provided for supplying a large volume of water for canal service than could pass through the aqueduct.

And again Mr. Page says:—

“It is, however, important that the feeder should be thoroughly cleaned out, the bottom lowered about two feet, and some additional passing places made.

“By doing this, it is believed that a much greater volume of water could be drawn from the Grand River at its low stages, even in dry seasons, and in this way the difficulties hitherto arising from short supply would doubtless in a great degree be obviated. In case of a wet season occurring during the enlargement of the main line, the deepening of the feeder would admit of the trade passing temporarily by that route, as was done when the construction of the present canal was in progress.

“By adopting this course, it is probable that the work connected with the rock cutting below Port Colborne, instead of being confined to the winter months of several years, might be carried on at least one year continuously, and would greatly facilitate the operations and enable the pressing demand of the trade to be met at the earliest possible period.

“From this lock to Stone Bridge, and below the latter place, there are rock cuttings, in the aggregate fully $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length, and 58 feet in width, the bottoms of which are from $1\frac{1}{4}$ to $1\frac{1}{2}$ feet higher than the present mitre sill of the lock. To deepen this will be a work of great difficulty, and will require several winters for its performance, as the cuts are so situated that water pours in in every direction from fissures in the rock, and no drainage from them can be formed within the limits of anything like a reasonable expense. It will therefore be necessary to divide the work into short sections by means of coffer-dams, and have powerful steam pumps at each end of a section so as to unwater it. In fact, it may fairly be assumed that the indispensable unwatering of the work will cost fully as much as the actual cost of removing the rock."

The Hon. Minister of Public Works had told the House last year, in answer to a question by the hon. member for Toronto, that this work was to be finished by 1876, and yet they had the statement of the engineer that it would take several years to finish works that had not at the present been commenced. It was doubtful to his mind whether they would be able to excavate the rock or not, but he thought they should go to work at once deepening the feeder as was recommended in the engineer's report. $100,000 more expended on the feeder would be well expended. He was of opinion that it would be years before the carrying trade of the country would be able to take advantage of the benefits accruing to commerce by the enlargement—and the present Government is very much to blame in this matter.

Mr. NORRIS was satisfied that the Welland Canal would in future have to be deepened to the extent of 14 feet, and he would suggest that while they were building the banks of the canal they should build them so as to allow a depth of 14 feet, as they could not be so well raised afterwards as at the present time. If they did not do this, a large sum would be lost in casting aside the lock gates. He hoped this would be taken into consideration. As to the water in the feeder, he agreed that the money that had been expended there had been thrown away, but the hon. member for Monck forgot to tell the House, when he was speaking on the subject, that a large portion of that work was done before the present Government came into power at all. He had no confidence in the scheme when it was proposed by the late Government, and it had turned out as he had anticipated.

Mr. McCALLUM did not wish to deny that the work was commenced by the late Government, and that undertaking was creditable to them, but it was commenced at the recommendation of their own engineer, and he supported the Government in their Canal policy long before the hon.

member for Lincoln had a seat in this House.

THE PARLIAMENT GROUNDS.

On item No. 66, appropriating $331,000 for the Public Buildings at Ottawa, Hon. Mr. MITCHELL asked what course the Government intended to pursue in regard to the embellishment of the grounds in front of this building.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said that immediately in front of the terrace wall would be simply grass. Some trees would be placed in the open angles between the departmental buildings and the central building. Around the building gardens would be laid out, but it was deemed advisable to have an unbroken lawn in front.

MILITIA.

On item No. 12 appropriating $20,000 for drill pay and other incidental expenses connected with the drill and training of the Militia,

Hon. Mr. VAIL explained in regard to the cloth that had been selected for the uniforms that some of it had not given satisfaction.

Mr. MACDONALD (Toronto)—Is that the grey cloth manufactured at Cobourg?

Hon. Mr. VAIL replied that it was not. The cloth he referred to was the scarlet and green which had been manufactured at Cornwall and Ottawa. So far as he could learn, the grey cloth manufactured at Cobourg had turned out satisfactorily, but it had been found that the red cloth could not be dyed nearly so well in Canada or the United States as in England.

Mr. MACDONALD (Toronto) submitted that if an inferior article was manufactured in Canada, the defect must be in the dye. It would be only fair to our manufacturers to afford them an opportunity for seeing whether they could produce good scarlet cloth or not.

In reply to Mr. Bowell.

Hon. Mr. VAIL stated that every yard of the cloth had been inspected by Mr. Fingland, a merchant of Ottawa, who had performed this duty in the most satisfactory manner. The services of a military tailor, who was employed in the Department of the Minister of Justice, had also been obtained in this connection. The cost had been light.

Mr. BOWELL—What did Mr Fingland receive?

Hon. Mr. VAIL—$800.

Mr. BOWELL—How long was he employed?

Hon. Mr. VAIL—I cannot say.

Mr. BOWELL—Had he a clerk?

Hon. Mr. VAIL—He had an assistant for a short time.

Mr. BOWELL—What did he obtain?

Hon. Mr. VAIL—$320.

Item 66 being taken up,

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN hoped that a company of artillery at Gaspé, which had been waiting for guns for four years, would be shortly supplied with them. The officers had passed through the Military and Gunnery Schools in Quebec. When he was in office, the application was made, but could not be satisfied at the time, though the guns were promised as soon as the Government had any at their disposal for this purpose. He hoped that the matter would be taken into consideration.

PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Item 83, relative to the Pacific Railway being taken up,

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) stated that he had taken occasion to express his opinions in this relation, when the House was in Committee of Supply. There was but one opinion on his side of the House; and this was, that faith should be kept with British Columbia. He was also exceedingly anxious that no undue burdens should be thrown on the people; and so strongly did he possess this feeling that he wished to place his views on record—and, accordingly, he moved that there be added the following words:—

“But while granting this sum this House desires to record its view, that the arrangements for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway shall be such as the resources of the country will permit, without increasing the existing rates of taxation.”

Hon. Mr. VAIL.

Mr. PLUMB did not doubt that the hon. gentleman was personally sincere in his desire to prosecute the building of this railway. He was very glad to say that the policy proposed had been adopted by the late Government, and expressly stipulated in all the arrangements they effected with regard to this great national work. In subsequent legislation this very important clause was conspicuous by its absence; and in the preamble of the Act of 1874, special reference was made to increased taxation as necessary to meet the expense to be incurred in the prosecution of this important undertaking. There was no recognition in it of the cardinal principle of the Act of 1872. The railway should be built from ocean to ocean within our own territories in the interest of the people of this country; and this the latter demanded. They never supposed, expected, or intended, as far as he was aware of the intentions of the late Government, to embarrass in any way the public credit, or place undue burdens upon our population, in order to build this line. He believed that it was admitted that the portion between Winnipeg and the Rocky Mountains could be built at less cost than was estimated when the Act of 1874 was passed; indeed it has been stated that with the present price of material and labour it could be constructed for less than $18,000 a mile, but if it was located and ready for contract to-morrow, he undertook to say that, under the obscure terms of the Act of 1874, no one could be induced to tender for it. If the Government were in earnest as to building this road—and he had very grave doubts about it—he, knowing something of railway enterprise and of railway contracts, did not hesitate to say that it would be impossible for an ordinary contractor to understand the statutes clearly enough to make a close tender. He would be compelled to tender high in order to make himself safe. If the Administration were willing to take advantage of the present opportunity when the price of railway material was low, as they seemed to be, of the low price of steel rails in 1874, he had no doubt that low offers would be made, if invited, for the building of the road, as would almost render their refusal impossible.

In view of the number of railroads being built across the continent he could not see why there was such persistence in urging the difficulties in the way of constructing our Pacific Railroad. The Union Pacific had proved a success, notwithstanding the fact that it passed through a country inferior to ours. Population followed railroads, and it was only by running a road to our great North-West that we could get any adequate return from it.

Mr. DECOSMOS said the future historian of the Canadian Parliament would treat this resolution with perfect contempt. Its mover would be regarded as one who was willing to repudiate the solemn obligation of the Dominion with one of its provinces.

Mr. ROSS—No! no!

Mr. DECOSMOS said the question of taxation should never be taken into consideration in carrying out the obligations of the country. Taxation could only reach a certain maximum. If it exceeded that, it became oppression. It never was the wish of the people of British Columbia that such a burden should be placed on the Dominion. Year after year the resolution passed by the late Government had cropped up and been represented as part of the terms of Union. The Minister of Justice had denied the correctness of that idea, yet one of his followers came forward now with an amendment which was equivalent to repudiation. If it did not mean that, it was worthless.

The speech of the Premier was excellent, but when the hon. gentleman took his seat he left the House in a fog. He had not said where the railway would be commenced on the Pacific coast. The hon. gentleman gave new evidences every day of an intention to build the road, but he should state where it would begin and whether work would be commenced this year. The hon. member for Yale had put down the entire cost of building the road from the Ottawa to the Pacific coast at $71,000,000. That was undoubtedly a more correct estimate than had been hitherto made by other members; but when he stated the portion west of that, extending to Victoria, would cost $27,500,000, he greatly exaggerated the cost. It would cost half that amount. The hon. member for Yale had also stated that Burrard Inlet was a better harbour than Bute Inlet. It so happened, however, that it could not be entered like other harbours. For the Vancouver Pilot, issued by the Admiralty, says:—

“The strength of the tide in the narrowest part of the First Narrows is from 4 to 8 knots. The only directions for a steamer are to keep the south shore aboard and to be quick and careful with the helm; small craft may go through with ease, the tide being favourable; to a sailing ship a knowledge of the locality is necessary as well as a commanding breeze, and should never be attempted with the full strength of the stream.”

There were two large saw mills from which a large quantity of lumber was shipped. Vessels came to anchor off Victoria in the first place, were tugged into Burrard Inlet, and when they had received their cargo they were tugged into the Straits of Fuca opposite Victoria, or into the open ocean. That was conclusive against Burrard Inlet that it was not a first-class port, suitable for the terminus of the Pacific Railroad. If it were suitable for a terminus, vessels would never take a tug to reach it and leave it, whether with or without a cargo. This is the best evidence that Burrard Inlet is unsuitable. The hon. member for Yale had referred to Bute Inlet, and he would read his utterances on the subject. They were as follows:—

“Last year Admiral Cochrane made a trip to it in a small gunboat, admirably suited for this purpose, in company of Lieutenant Governor Trutch, and on his way the former remarked that if Bute Inlet became the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway it would be impossible for the Eastern trade to pass by it, as accommodation for steamers 300 or 400 feet in length should exist, and it was difficult for that small boat to make the passage.”

He desired to call the attention of the House to the statement of the Vancouver Island Coast Pilot which said:—“The harbour at the head of the inlet is about two miles in extent.” Now, it was a great absurdity to state that a vessel 300 or 400 feet long could not move round in a harbour two miles in extent. He knew Admiral Cochrane too well to suppose he made such a statement; so there must be some misapprehension on the subject, inasmuch as a vessel of that size could move round in Waddington Harbour as easily as she could in the harbour of San Francisco. The hon. gentleman had also said that Burrard Inlet was approachable at any time; but the statement he (Mr. DeCosmos) had made on a former occasion as to vessels going there for lumber, proved conclusively that, in the judgment of ship captains and shipowners, it was not approachable at any time. The hon. gentleman had made another statement as reported in the Montreal Gazette, that the delta of the Fraser contained 11,500,000 acres of arable land. He hoped the hon. gentleman would withdraw that statement. He knew the delta of the Lower Fraser well, and in his judgment there were not more than 1,000 square miles, or 640,000 acres. He did not think there should be any exaggeration in regard to the resources of the country. The hon. gentleman had also said: "He would refer to the British Columbia question generally; he deeply regretted the step taken by the hon. gentleman from Victoria last week, and he thought that this hon. gentleman's resolution deserved its fate." That was candid on the hon. gentleman's part, but at the same time he was satisfied the people of British Columbia would think differently. The hon. gentleman had further stated that "it was well known when the contract of the late Administration failed, that it would be impossible to carry out the terms of the union. It had been stated that unless the resolution of which they had heard so much, had been inserted, the Address to her Majesty would not have been passed." He, however, knew as a fact that the leader of the late Government, when the House was summoned in October, 1873, was in favour of constructing that railway as a Dominion public work. They had heard it stated by the hon. member for Charlevoix, that the road should be constructed by a company with a subsidy of $30,000,000 and $50,000,000 acres of land; and he had no doubt the hon. gentleman had an object to serve when he made the statement. His party apparently were afraid that if it were constructed as a Dominion Public Work it would place in the hands of the Government so much patronage that they would be able to retain office as long as they desired. In reference to Governor Trutch, the hon. gentleman had said:

"It had been alleged that the said Government was forced to assent to the passage of this resolution, and he believed that this declaration had never been contradicted, and he had heard both members from Victoria say that they had the authority of Lieutenant Governor Trutch for the statement that he (Mr. Trutch) had never been in a position to give his consent to this resolution."

There were two witnesses, members of the House, against the hon. member for Yale, in regard to this statement, and he would leave it to the House to decide with whom lay the weight of evidence. He was surprised to hear the hon. gentleman state that he (Mr. DeCosmos) had said he had never heard of the resolution with respect to taxation. The hon. gentleman was incorrect. He had never made that statement, for he well remembered having read the resolution as soon as the papers containing the debates of Parliament came to British Columbia. As far as the Legislature of British Columbia was concerned, when they passed the address they knew nothing of the resolution, and they were not then bound by it, nor were they at the present time. The hon. member had further said that the petition to the Queen that resulted in the Carnarvon settlement was carried at a large meeting packed by Mr. Walkem's friends. It so happened however, that the Treasurer of the present Local Government was a member of that league, and had advocated the position taken by the Walkem Government in the hon. gentleman's own constituency whilst on a special mission. The existing Local Government had endorsed the same thing, but so far as he (Mr. DeCosmos) was individually concerned, he always thought the wisest course would have been to have come to the Federal Government and let by-gones be by-gones and endeavour to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion before going to England. With respect to the construction of a railway he would say that there had been a great deal of disappointment and loss to the Province through the non-commencement of the work. He showed that the terminus selected for the Northern Pacific Railway only contained one or two houses, whereas, had the Northern Pacific Railway Co. decided at the start where the terminus should be, they might have had a large town there now, and be deriving a large revenue from the town lots sold to settlers. The same thing, the vacillation with respect to the terminus in British Columbia, affected Victoria to-day. Had the Government carried out the original policy fixing the terminus at Esquimalt, he had no doubt that the population of Victoria to-day would have been double what it is. The statement of the hon. member for Chalevoix that Esquimalt was the only point for the terminus of this road, would meet with the hearty sympathy of the people of British Columbia. With regard to the question of routes, the Fraser River route he found had been abandoned. The question then was narrowed down to the Bute Inlet route and the route by way of Dean's Channel. If the Government were foolish enough to bring the railroad to Dean's Channel they would affect little or no good for the Province of British Columbia, but some of the greatest benefits would be derived by the Dominion if Bute Inlet were selected. Bute Inlet was so situated in respect to Vancouver Island that vessels going to China or Japan might pass through Johnson's Straits to Queen Charlotte Sound as easily and as quickly as from Dean's Inlet through Milbank Sound. If the road were taken to Bute Inlet it would pass through the best and most accessible portion of British Columbia, where settlement could be easily effected. The region to the north of Seymour Narrows was rich in coal, iron and other minerals. The climate there was not surpassed in any country, not even in England. If it ran by Dean's Channel it would not so benefit and ensure the settlement of the country. If this were accomplished it would be an unfortunate act on the part of the Government, as the land in that quarter was sterile. If the line was taken to Bute Inlet, the Government might afterwards at any time extend it to the head of the inlet, to Vancouver Island. From Nanaimo to the head of Bute Inlet was a water stretch which the Government might utilise. If the road was brought to Dean Channel, the transpacific business would not be so large as if it was run to Alberni or Esquimalt. The Japanese current flowed into and almost struck the shore of Vancouver's Island nearly opposite, thus making it most favourable to ships passing eastwardly from Yokohama or Hong Kong to Esquimalt; while, if going westward, they would have to, undoubtedly, go south of the Japanese current, as did the Pacific mail steamship running to China and Japan, which took this route in order to enjoy milder weather. The prevailing winds were, besides, in favour of vessels passing westward along the south route. If the Government fixed the terminus at Alberni and Esquimalt, it would not only be in the interests of the Province of British Columbia and of the Dominion, but also of the commerce of the world. He hoped that the Government would obtain the sanction of Parliament before the Session closed to the commencement at an early date of the railway within the Province of British Columbia.

The members were then called in, the House divided, and the amendment was carried on the following division:—

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL rose to explain why he had cast the vote he had given on this motion. He had been prevented doing this previously, and had been obliged to vote apparently against views he had supported several years ago, when this question was before the House, in connection with the entrance of the Province of British Columbia into the Union. What was the motive which inspired the present motion?—It would be unparliamentary to state it; but he would say that he believed that its effect would be to place in the hands of the Government the right to say:—"By the vote of the Conservatives in support of the resolution of the hon. member for Middlesex, which stated to the House, that if there was the slightest increase in taxation involved in continuing the construction of this road, we are absolved from the obligation of carrying out the agreement with the Province of British Columbia." He regretted that the members of the great Conservative party, who were around him, though he had no claim on their consideration, had fallen into the trap set for them, and placed in the hands of the Cabinet a resolution which would be an excuse for inaction. He was one of those who desired to see the compact with British Columbia carried out in its integrity, in all its honesty, and to the letter. While he entertained these views, he was compelled by the force of circumstances to vote practically against them. He had voted for the admission of British Columbia into the Union; he had supported the terms in question; and he thought, that if this step had not been then taken, another flag would to-day float over Victoria and Nanaimo.

He did not blame the Government for its action; he would make no reflection on the Ministry; they might have erred, and he believed they had erred; they had been appalled by the enormous expenditure which they imagined was required to carry out this policy. They were weak-kneed; for if they had a little more firmness, stiffening in the back, self-confidence and self-reliance, they would believe in the ability of Canada to fulfil the engagements which she had contracted. If an opposite course were pursued, more confidence would be created in the outlying Provinces than to-day existed, and a better feeling would prevail between the different sections of the Dominion. He had faith in Canada's ability to carry out the compact in question.

Mr. DECOSMOS.

Hon. Gentlemen--Hear! hear!

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL--Hon. gentlemen might say hear! hear! derisively, but such a faith he possessed; and if the Government did not carry it out, the time would come, and before long, when men would take their places who would do so.

What was the present position? the Government asked the House to vote half a million for the completion of surveys, and to fulfil the terms of the engagement; and what did they find the Administration doing under these circumstances? An hon. gentleman who was known to be one of their out-and-out supporters submitted an amendment, the effect of which was practically to enable the Government to postpone indefinitely--simply because it would increase the taxation of the country--the building of this trans-continental railway. Did they not know that the Finance Minister looked with fear and trembling on the prospect for next year. Did they not know that the hon. gentleman anticipated that the imports would not equal the estimates made; and if in order to meet the expenditure required on the Pacific Railway, an additional fifty cents had to be levied on the imports, was there not sufficient in the resolution adopted to justify the Administration if they would not proceed with the construction of this line. He regretted that the representatives in this House of the great Conservative party of the country had chosen to adopt the policy of the hon. gentlemen from Middlesex. He would not say that this was suggested by the Government; he would not affirm that the Premier had advised and counselled the hon. member, and suggested the wording of the motion; but he would declare that if there was any amendment which could possibly be moved, that would play more effectively into the hands of the Administration in carrying out their do-nothing policy, it was this. He was prepared to stand almost alone in the position he had taken, though he was sorry that this was the case, but he had voted as he had done, not because he was against the carrying out of the railway policy, or in favour of the repudiation of our engagements, but for the reasons he had mentioned. The resolution would be used as an excuse by the Administration, to delay indefinitely the progress of the work. He might be wrong; he trusted that he was; but he feared that he was right. He predicted that there would be next year a deficit of five millions, and he based his opinion on the views of experienced commercial men. As a member of Parliament, who was in some measure responsible for the entrance of British Columbia in Confederation, he desired to place his views on record.

Mr. OUMET regretted that he had not been able to vote with the hon. member for Northumberland. If he remembered rightly, the amendment moved by the hon. member for Middlesex, was inserted in the Act introduced some years ago with regard to the Pacific Railway. This had been done by the Conservatives, not because they were opposed to the construction of this road, but because they did not desire that the country should be overburdened with debt in consequence. They were still anxious, as a party--he would venture to say--to have this railway finished; but they did not want to have too great an expenditure incurred. For his (Mr. Ouimet's) part he had voted for the amendment for the reasons he stated, and because he regarded it as a want of confidence motion against the Government and their project. The Government had voted against themselves, and in such a way that they could not build the road which they had Session after Session asked the House to vote millions to survey. The Government knew it would require a large amount of money to carry out their project, and an increase of taxation would be necessary, and the result of the adoption of this amendment would be to stop the work. The Government, by their actions in the past, had shown they were not in earnest--they did not want to build the road. They had abandoned the through route and were constructing one which would be useless for seven months in the year, and which, the Premier admitted, would have to be replaced with another. The Conservative Party were consistent. By their policy they would have built the road without increasing the rate of taxation. The hon. gentlemen opposite, however, after expending millions every year on surveys and declaring their intention to build the road, had put themselves in a position that would prevent them from prosecuting the work.

Mr. MACDONALD (Toronto) felt that the hour was late, the House impatient, and the subject exhausted. The resolution affirmed "that the arrangement for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway should be such as the resources of the country would permit without increasing existing rate of taxation."

If he understood the remarks of the hon. member for Northumberland, they meant that this country should undertake obligations beyond its resources, and should be subjected to rates of taxation which would be oppressive. Much had been said about the cost of the road. He was not going to discuss its cost, whether that would be as some said \$75,000,000, or \$150,000,000, or \$200,000,000 as was claimed by others. To his mind the case appeared to be something like this: A contract is made between two parties. The one agrees to deliver in Montreal say $\frac{1}{4}$ of a million of bushels of wheat in a vessel of a certain size. He discovers, however, that this vessel draws several feet more water than will enable her to reach that destination, that in fact to do so means the destruction of ship and cargo. In smaller vessels and with longer time, the cargo could be not only fully but safely delivered, neither vessel nor cargo being subjected to loss.

The other party insists that the contract shall be carried out, and carried out as arranged and in the larger vessel, although he knows that loss must be the result to all concerned.

Now what are the facts in reference to the Pacific Railway? Not a word said about repudiation. The Government are ready to build the road. To build it in such a way as would ruin the country? No; but in such a way and in such a time as would most effectually preserve the country from ruin.

The hon. member for Northumberland desired to have the work carried out as originally proposed; no one knew better than that hon. gentleman how unable this country was to bear such a strain. Whether was it more honourable when one found he had made a ruinous bargain to acknowledge it, and to do what he could to rectify it—or to continue madly in the vain effort to carry it out, though he knew it would result in the ruin of the contracting parties.

He (Mr. Macdonald) believed that the passing of this resolution was one of the wisest and best things that had been done this Session, thereby affirming, not on the part of the Government only, but by so large a majority of this House, its policy on this matter—a policy which could not but conduce to the best interests of the Dominion; and he believed that in the morning when the action of this House would be known, there would be a feeling of satisfaction throughout the length and breadth of the land, extending to British Columbia.

Mr. THOMPSON (Cariboo) said he had supposed from the expressions used by the Premier and some of his leading supporters the other evening, it was the bona fide intention of this Government and the people of Canada to carry out the Terms of Union with British Columbia, so far as the building of the railroad was concerned, in such a manner as would not be detrimental to the interests of the country. It was never expected or desired by British Columbia that the Government should be bound by a cast-iron rule to build that railroad in ten years, but the people of that Province did expect that it would be constructed within a reasonable time. From the motion just now passed, he had no hesitation in saying that the people of Canada had no intention ever to build the road in this century or the next. He had hoped they would show some respect for the plighted faith of the country, but his confidence was now shaken, and he was forced to the conclusion that it was their deliberate intention to repudiate the obligations they had so solemnly incurred. This vote had convinced him that the people of British Columbia could place no faith in the promises or professions of either the Government or the Opposition. It was fortunate there was an Insolvency Act on the Statute Books, and this Dominion ought to take advantage of it to rid itself of its obligations. He was surprised to find the Conservative Party sustaining the Government in their policy of repudiation.

The hon. member for Centre Toronto had said that the Government were willing to complete the road so long as they could do so without increasing the taxation of the country. He did not see that a slight addition to the taxation could ruin the country; the money expended for this purpose would be returned with interest. He hoped he should never see the day when British Columbia would be under a foreign flag; but if such conduct as had taken place to-night was repeated—if the people were deliberately insulted, and the Government refused to carry out their plighted faith—the people of Canada, much as he would grieve over such an occurrence, need not be surprised to see another flag than that of the Dominion flying over that territory.

Mr. LANGEVIN said his hon. friend from Cariboo was quite mistaken about the result of the vote they had just given. The hon. gentleman should remember that the Conservative party, to which he had alluded, were in office when the law of 1872 was passed, which secured the construction of the Canadian Pacific, not for British Columbia alone, but for the whole Dominion. The promise to build the road, the hon. gentleman should remember, was made to the whole country after great deliberation. The hon. member regarded the resolution as a repudiation of the Terms of Union with the Province; if he reflected a few moments he would find he was mistaken. This resolution went further than the Act of 1872, which proposed to construct the line by liberal grants of land and subsidies of money without increasing the rate of taxation. When that law was passed the hon. gentleman had full confidence that the Government would build the road in accordance therewith. By the passage of this resolution we adopted the present rate of taxation, which on a large number of articles was $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. more than in 1872. The taxation was \$3,000,000 more than in that year, and they had decided by the resolution that the railway should be constructed under the present rate of taxation. The hon. gentleman would thus see that his speech was a reflection upon the whole House and an injustice especially to the Conservative Party. This resolution more strongly affirmed the principle of the former resolution than anything previously adopted. He was happy to hear the hon. gentleman say he hoped never to see any other flag floating over British Columbia, but the hon. gentleman could scarcely have been serious when he gave expression to the sentiments contained in the last portion of his speech. He (Mr. L.) had been among the people of the Province, and they were as loyal as any in the Dominion. They never spoke of changing their nationality; they might grumble, but that was the prerogative of every Briton. If the resolution was well understood by the British Columbians it would reassure them that Parliament was determined to build the road, and had gone a step in advance of the previous resolution by agreeing to do it with an increased taxation of \$3,000,000.

Mr. BOWELL desired to take exception to the remarks his hon. friend, the Leader of the Left Centre. He must confess he looked upon the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Middlesex in quite a different light to that in which it was viewed by that hon. gentleman. Its principle was affirmed by the resolution of the late Sir George E. Cartier in the Act of Parliament introduced in 1872, and passed, and recited again, in the Act of 1874. Why the resolution of the hon. member for Middlesex was brought up at the present moment was somewhat incomprehensible to him, unless it was to elicit remarks from those who had as little knowledge of what had taken place as his hon. friend from Centre Toronto had displayed. He was surprised to hear that hon. gentleman say the "vote would be received with great satisfaction" and delight throughout the whole "Dominion." One would suppose that the principle of the resolution had never been affirmed before, and that the people of the Dominion knew nothing about it. The Hon. Minister of Justice, as usual in such cases, greeted that statement with applause; but he could scarcely suppose that the hon. gentleman did not know that those resolutions existed; nor did he suppose he held so low an estimate of the intelligence of the people of this country that they did not know the position the Dominion held in regard to this great enterprise. He knew the party of which he was a humble member was desirous of seeing that great work carried on, and they were not only desirous that the road should be built as rapidly as possible, but he believed the vast majority of the people would vote down the scheme which was proposed to be carried out, of a half railway and half water communication, more particularly when the resources of the country were being absorbed in the construction of branch lines, and subsidising other lines not necessary to the completion of the main road. If the Government were really desirous of building the road at as early a period as possible, and if they could not complete the whole road of the Westward route, they might at least have connected the head waters of Lake Superior with Manitoba at Fort Garry, and with very little more expenditure, if any, than was being made in subsidising the Canada Central road and building the useless Georgian Bay branch. If the road was run to Sault Ste. Marie the Americans would soon make connections on the south side of the lake with Duluth, and then any one travelling to the great North-West would take advantage of that direct all-rail route in preference to the route the Government proposed. He believed the more the matter was investigated the greater would be the objection to these pieces of railroad and water stretches. With reference to the interpretation put upon the resolution by the hon. member for Cariboo he protested against it. They had already affirmed the principle three times before, and if it were submitted to the House fifty times more by the Government it must receive the cordial support of the Opposition. No doubt the Government hoped when they put the resolution in the hands of their supporters, that the Opposition would vote against it, so as to enable them to go to the country, and declare that they wished to build the road no matter how heavily it trenched upon the resources of the country, but it was too transparent a trap to catch any one.

Mr. DECOSMOS was sorry that the motion in amendment of the hon. member for Middlesex had been supported by the Government, and he thought they might have advised their loyal follower from Middlesex to withdraw it. The explanations of the Premier in regard to this railroad produced a better feeling than had been prevalent for some time previously, but this amendment just passed was calculated to shake the new confidence that was springing healthily into existence. He regarded it, therefore, as an injudicious step.

Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House had a short time previously, with two or three exceptions, voted against the resolution asking for the immediate commencement of the railway in the Province of British Columbia. The defence offered for their attitude this evening was that they were bound by the resolution respecting construction of the railway and the rate of taxation in 1871; but the resolution introduced by Sir George Cartier only extended to the building of the railway by private enterprise and not to its construction as a Dominion public work, and as such the Government had resolved, and were now carrying on this undertaking. He regretted that his hon. friend from Charlevoix, who alone of the representatives of the other Provinces, had visited British Columbia, should have spoken what was reported in the Montreal Gazette :—

“The policy of the late Government was to build the road by means of a private company, aided by land grants, and the money subsidy. He was still of opinion that the lands of the North-West should contribute largely to the building of that railway; and that the country should not be called upon to aid it with a larger sum of money than thirty millions of dollars.”

The state of the money market in England now, and on the continent as well, was such that no company, no matter how good the names of its promoters might be, could form a syndicate and float the bonds necessary to raise the money for the construction of this road. The position taken by the hon. gentleman amounted to nothing more or less than the sheer repudiation of the contract made by the Conservative Party with the people of British Columbia.

The present Government had taken the only course left open to them, that is as far as the construction of this railway as a Dominion public work was concerned. It was wise and statesmanlike.

When this matter came before the House in 1872, he believed that he was the only member who had dared to say that this road ought to be so built. When he returned the following Session he found that the Allan charter had fallen to the ground, even the Leader of the hon. gentlemen opposite favoured this view, and prominent gentlemen in the other branch of the Legislature, who were also interested in securing a charter, had taken the same position. It would never be built for thirty millions of money, and the balance in land. So large a sum of money as 200 or 300 millions of dollars would not, however, be required; 75 or 80 millions would be sufficient for the purpose. The hon. member for Hastings also spoke of the traditions of the Conservative Party, in which, even when rotten and worthless, the hon. gentleman had more confidence than in a principle practicable and workable, which it was the duty of this Government to carry out. Allusion had been made by his hon. friend from Charlevoix to the utterances of his hon. friend from Cariboo. He sincerely hoped that he (Mr. DeCosmos) would be the last to favour secession; but without wishing to threaten, he would tell the House and the country that if faith was not kept with British Columbia, and if the Government did not act rigorously in accordance with the resources of the Dominion, the people of British Columbia would demand of the Imperial Government separation from the Dominion. They would not favor annexation. They would never haul down the British flag; but if the Dominion did not keep faith, the Province would secede and drag down the flag of Canada.

They would have a just and constitutional right to go to Great Britain and say—"You have been a party to this contract. You placed your seal on it; we cannot prevail on the Government of Canada to do its part, and its duty; we have done ours, and we ask you by an Act of the Imperial Parliament to separate us as free as we once were."

Mr. WHITE (Hastings) stated that the arguments of the hon. member for Vancouver were worthless. No one was anxious to see the Province of British Columbia leave the Confederation; but what did it want? Canada was pushing to completion the erection of a telegraph line, and was spending millions in surveys. Since the Union taxes had been increased from 20 to 24 millions; and the hon. gentleman must not forget that at the same time, we were building the Intercolonial Railway, and deepening canals. In a year or so, our expenditures in other respects would be reduced; and with a more numerous population, and the present rate of taxation, from six to seven millions would be spent annually on the line. He thought that British Columbia should be satisfied, as it was receiving from four to five dollars for every dollar it paid into the Treasury, and from $25 to $30 would be expended during the next ten or fifteen years for each dollar so paid. Did they suppose that we had nothing to do but plunge into debt to build this road? The country was doing its duty by British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL had listened to the remarks made by different hon. gentlemen, and had waited for some expression of opinion from some member of the Government,—but in vain. He had been surprised to hear the observations of his hon. friend from Toronto Centre, who gave an illustration—about the only point to be found in the hon. gentleman's statements. His hon. friend had asked whether any merchant would deliberately send a vessel down the River, which drew too much water to permit its passage through the Lachine Canal, knowing that if it descended the rapids it would be dashed to pieces on the rocks. But how did this House or his hon. friend know that this country would be unable to carry out the terms of this contract? And if the hon. gentlemen opposite entertained this opinion, why had they voted two and a half millions for its construction, and the vote of another half million was to be asked to defray the expense of surveying and engineering. If the view in question was correct these three millions would be thrown away; and the Government should not countenance such a proceeding.

British Columbia would not have insisted on the observance to the very letter of the agreement made; and if it had not been for the course taken by the hon. gentlemen opposite, and for the Grand Trunk Railway Company, whose interests were, unfortunately, enlisted against the late Administration, he believed that Canada would have been able to have carried out the arrangement made with British Columbia substantially in its integrity. The hon. gentleman spoke of a bad bargain having been made, but there was no bad bargain. If the Government thought that Canada could build this Railway why did they act as they were doing to-day? and if they entertained an opposite belief, why did they ask for the vote of three millions, which, under such circumstances, would be virtually thrown away?

He deeply regretted the action of the Conservative Party that evening; and also the fact that the good faith of Canada had been, with so much reason, impugned by the hon. member for Cariboo.

Mr. FLESHER said he was not at all deceived by the little by-play on the other side of the House. The resolution was never submitted without a distinct understanding between the mover and the Government, but his (Mr. Flesher's) impression was that no other course was open than to vote for it. To have voted against it would have been to declare that a larger sum of money should be given to the Government to carry on the work than the country could afford. In voting for the resolution he had not the most remote idea of repudiating the arrangement with British Columbia. He had no idea it would result in repudiation, or as the hon. member for Northumberland had said it would.

Mr. SINCLAIR felt pleased at the vote the House had given. It was time that Parliament should express clearly its opinion upon this important question. He did not wish to see the railroad abandoned, but if this country should attempt to comply with the terms made either by the late Government or the present one, within the time specified, it would be doing an injustice to the country. There was some excuse for the late Government. They did not realize the gigantic nature of the undertaking, and it was quite possible they imagined it could be completed in ten years at a maximum cost to the country of $30,000,000 and 50,000,000 acres of land. But the present Government, with larger experience, had consented to have the time limited to fifteen years. They should never have submitted the case to the arbitration of Lord Carnarvon. No country could build the road so cheaply as England, yet the Government of even that wealthy country would not undertake a work which would cost seven times as much as the annual revenue. He was very glad both parties in Canada were beginning to see it was in vain to attempt to build this road within a limited time. All the Government should undertake to do was to go on with the work as fast as the resources of the country would warrant. However much people might differ on public questions, when they found the credit and character of the country at stake, it was well they should throw aside party feeling and act in harmony for the good of the whole community. For that reason he had supported the amendment.

Hon. Mr. POPE was understood to say he would not vote for a resolution which would place the Government in such a position that they could say to Lord Carnarvon, after failing to build the road: "We were anxious to comply with our agreement, but we have had this resolution of Parliament staring us in the face." The Ministry had put forward one of their own followers to shelter them from the consequences of their own agreement with British Columbia and the Imperial Government.

The item was concurred in.

On the item, $500,000 for Pacific Railway surveying and engineering,

Mr. PLUMB moved the following amendment:—

Resolved, That while concurring in this vote, this House desires to record its opinion that the country is pledged to the construction of the Pacific Railway in its agreement with British Columbia, and that it is in accordance with that agreement and with the public interest that its construction should be proceeded with as rapidly as the resources of the country will permit without adding to the burden of taxation."

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said this vote was for the survey of the railroad, while the resolution referred to the work of construction.

After a brief discussion, Mr. Speaker ruled the amendment out of order.

Mr. PLUMB then moved that the following words be added to the said Resolution:—

"That while concurring in this vote, this House desires to record its opinion that the country is pledged to the construction of the Pacific Railway in its agreement with British Columbia, and that it is in accordance with that agreement and with the public interest that the surveys be energetically proceeded with, in order that the construction of the road should be prosecuted as rapidly as the resources of the country will permit without adding to the burthens of taxation."

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON said this was open to the same objection as the other resolution.

Mr. SPEAKER ruled that it was in order.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE--If it is in order it simply means this. Neither Government has carried on the work of surveying as fast as it could. This Government has expended a great deal more money in surveys in the last two years than the late Government did altogether. If this amendment means anything, it is a censure on the Government for not having spent more on surveys, and we accept it as that and shall vote against it.

Mr. MASSON asked if this was a vote of censure, what was the resolution that preceded it, yet the Government had voted for it. One of their followers had come forward and declared: "We have no confidence in the Government and we must bind them not to act in a manner that would be detrimental to the interests of the country." They did not consider that a want of confidence motion.

Mr. GOUDGE thought the resolution of the hon. member for Middlesex in the present state of this question was most opportune, and he (Mr. Goudge) had voted for it because the Senate had placed on record a vote of censure against the Government for not proceeding more rapidly with the work. It was apparent that the Senate or that portion of it that voted to censure the Government did not represent public opinion, and had gone beyond their province, for we find in this House to-night both Government and Opposition members almost unanimously re-affirming the resolutions of 1871, subsequently enacted on the Canadian Pacific Railway Act of 1872, and re-enacted in the Canadian Pacific Railway Act of 1874, viz: that the public aid to be given to secure the accomplishment of this undertaking should consist of such liberal grants of land and such subsidy in money or other aid, not increasing the then existing rate of taxation. When such an attempt had been made to place the Government in a false position, it was proper for the hon. member for Middlesex to move a resolution in this House to re-affirm the policy it had previously announced. He knew that public opinion in the Maritime Provinces approved of the course pursued by the Government. He did not believe the Government had any intention to break faith with British Columbia, but that, in this undertaking, they were proceeding with the work as any prudent business man would in the management of his own affairs.

A vote was then taken on the amendment, which was rejected on the following division:—

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. GOUDGE desired to ask at this point if it was proposed to consider the reduction of the present tariff of the Intercolonial railroad? There were a number of items in connection with that tariff that required revision and, he would be happy to learn that a revision was to be made.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said it was stated last year that there were some anomalies in the rates, and when over the road a few months ago he requested the Superintendent-General of railways to make a note of such matters as were complained of with a view to a consideration of the abuses and grievances that might exist. The road would be open some time in June or July, and by that time they would have reviewed everything as regards the tariff.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL asked what was the policy of the Government in regard to the running of the road? In order to make the road attractive to tourists they ought to have a rate of speed that would, with as much comfort as could be had, enable the journey between Montreal and Halifax to be completed within 36 hours. He thought a rate of speed of 30 miles an hour could be obtained. The stream of travel which came to this country every season from the States would be attracted to the Intercolonial as the return route.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said they had not yet completed their preparations for the road. They had made arrangements to have Pullman cars on the entire route. A reasonable rate of speed would be maintained, but not larger than any other road in the country. A high rate of speed, as was well known, was expensive to maintain, but he thought it would be sufficiently high to reach the two points within the time named by the hon. gentleman. The tourist traffic of course must necessarily be looked to, because on a large portion of the road there would be very little local business to transact. There were many points of interest to the tourists, and they must necessarily depend to a certain extent on the accidental passenger traffic.

Hon. Mr. ROBITAILLE stated that the nearest point at which the inhabitants of the district of Gaspé could reach the Intercolonial Railway was Dalhousie or at Campbellton, New Brunswick, and had to cross the River Restigouche. He wanted to know if the Government intended to place a ferry steamer at either of these points?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said they must, to a certain extent, depend on private enterprise to make these connections. They could not undertake to put on ferry boats in all directions; it would absorb all the resources of the road.

The subject then dropped.

FISHERY REGULATIONS.

On the vote appropriating $78,820 for the Fisheries,

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said that the Fishery Regulations which had been enforced the fishermen thought were unjust, and they would give rise to a good deal of litigation and trouble, and litigation which every one would desire to avoid. He suggested that the matter be allowed to remain in statu quo, and the regulations remain in force which existed prior to the present regulations, and that in the meantime a test case should be submitted to the consideration of the Supreme Court. If the Supreme Court decided the fishermen had not the rights they claimed they had, they would have to accept whatever policy the Government would determine upon.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he would call the attention of the Hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the question, and the matter could be discussed on the Supplementary Estimates.

The vote was carried.

THE GLENDON.

Item 129 being taken up,

Mr. DEVEBER said he wished at this stage to correct a statement made on the floor of the House by the hon. member for Northumberland, to the effect that one of the owners, or the owner of the "Glendon" had told him (Mr. Mitchell) that one-half the amount—$20,000—paid by the Government would have been accepted, rather than have lost the sale. With the consent of the House he would read a telegram from the owners of the vessel contradicting that statement. It ran as follows:—

"St. JOHN, N. B., March 30, 1876.

"To H. B. DEVEBER, Ottawa :

"We never stated to Mitchell would rather sell at ten thousand ($10,000) : sold at twenty very reluctantly, and will make affidavit to that effect."

The telegram was signed by the owners.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—Who are they ?

Mr. DEVEBER—Daniel W. Clarke, J. D. Macdonald and Robert J. Leonard.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—I repeat that one of the gentlemen whose names are attached made that remark to me.

Mr. DEVEBER—Which one ?

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—Robert J. Leonard.

The item was concurred in.

The House adjourned at 1:40 o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

SATURDAY, April 8, 1876.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

OLD RAILS ON GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on Monday, to consider the following resolution :

"That it is expedient to authorize the Government to make a temporary disposition of the Iron rails as they are removed from the Government Railways by loaning them to companies constructing railways which may be regarded as feeders to the Government Lines, such rails to be returned weight for weight to the Government stores at the junction of such lines when taken up."

The motion was carried.

THE SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT, in moving that the House go into Committee of supply, said a very large proportion of these estimates consisted either of revotes or sums that had been already expended, with the exception of three items, for which special warrants were taken and which were laid on the table of the House. The most important item as to magnitude was for the additional rolling stock on the Prince Edward Island Railway and for changing the gauge of railroads in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. A considerable amount of the cost of this change of gauge estimated for would be repaid by the sale of old rails. The next item in magnitude was $169,000, which was the unexpended balance of the boundary survey between Canada and the United States, and the unexpended survey between Ontario and the North-West. The former survey had been conducted under the direct superintendence of the British Government. Another item of considerable magnitude consisted of several sums for public works chargeable to income, amounting in all to $135,000. These had already been expended and appeared in the statement which he had submitted to the House when making his budget speech. The other large item was for mounted police. It included $41,000 for arrears from 1873-4 and 1874-5. The House would easily understand in carrying out the organization of this force at such a distant part of the country, where communications were often several months reaching the department at Ottawa, there was very great difficulty in obtaining an accurate estimate of what was required. It took about $1,000 per head per annum. This was not excessive when the enormous cost of transporting provisions in the North-West was taken into consideration. In the United States service the average cost per head was about the same, and the cost of their service in the far West was considerably in excess of that. He had taken a larger estimate for the future. A very considerable part of these sums might be said to replace other items they did not want. For instance, the $100,000 for the boundary between Alaska and Canada had not been expended and it was not intended to use it. He submitted a statement of the receipts and expenditure on account of the Consolidated Fund, made to the 1st of April of the present year. The receipts to that date were $17,231,546; expenditure, $16,489,828. A certain number of items, brought down under the head of unforeseen expenses, were placed among the supplementary votes.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK wished to call attention to a matter of importance. They had been under the impression that they lived in a country which had the benefit of a responsible Government, and that this Parliament was capable of enacting the laws required by the people of Canada. It appeared, however, from a return brought down by the Government, that they had gone back on the principles they had previously professed. He found that on the 18th of February, 1875, when this House was in Session, the Government had passed a Minute in Council recommending that the Imperial Government should be asked to pass an Act to amend the "British North American Act," and to remove all doubts as to the construction of one of its sections. The Imperial Government had accordingly passed an Act repealing the section in question—Sec. 18—and re-enacting another in lieu thereof, thereby legislating with regard to this country without any wish to that effect, being expressed by this Parliament. This was a most extraordinary assumption of power on the part of the hon. gentleman opposite. This was not the first time that such a matter was brought up before the House. In 1871, when doubt was entertained as to the power of this Parliament to pass the Manitoba Act, the Government of that day thought fit to assume to themselves the same power that had been assumed by the present Ministry. When attention was called to this fact the Administration, led by Sir George Cartier, in the absence of the right hon. member for Kingston, was compelled to acknowledge that they had done wrong, and to ask the House to pass an Address to Her Majesty, asking for such legislation as was in question. On March 23rd, 1871, the present Minister of Justice in his usual able manner, said:—

"He proposed, in these resolutions, to establish the principle that legislation on matters affecting this country should only be undertaken, by the Imperial Government, when sought for by the people of this country, through their representatives. This principle became of still greater consequence when the legislation sought for was of a character which would alter in a material point the compact upon which the union itself was formed—which violated, in its most important ingredient, the question of the distribution of power—to reintroduce the former evils from which the people of old Canada suffered, and which led to the introduction of the Constitution under which we now lived. Not only that, but that it should be done at the instance of a Minister of the Crown, when there was nothing to prevent them from asking the people of this country, through their representatives, what change, if any, should be made in the constitution of the country. That a Minister of the Crown under such circumstances should have ventured to apply to the Home Government, and should have sent home a draft of a bill which they asked Earl Kimberley to make law, was without precedent, without parallel, without excuse, without palliation. He asked the House to agree that it was their duty to take care that they should determine what legislation the Imperial Parliament be asked to enact on their behalf. Hon. gentlemen opposite might say that the sense of the Parliament of Canada had already been taken on the Bill.

"SIR GEORGE E. CARTIER—Hear! hear!

"Hon. Mr. BLAKE thought that was the paltry evasion they would make, but he would tell them that the draft sent to England went far beyond the Manitoba Bill.

"The question was whether the people were prepared to surrender into the hands of the Government of the day, that power which the Government of the day was assuming it possessed—the power to ask the Imperial Parliament to make laws for us; or whether the House did not think that every sense of duty called upon them to determine that their sense—that was the sense of the people—was to be taken upon, and was to form the basis of that Imperial legislation.

"Sir ALEXANDER T. GALT spoke in the same strain, and thought that the Government, before taking the vote, should consider whether it would not be better to decide that for all time to come, no change should be made in the British North America Act, except in the usual approved mode of address to the Queen.

"Hon Mr. HOLTON had remarked that, if the Government could take such action with reference to an unimportant measure, there was no reason why this could not be done with regard to the most important.

"Mr. Speaker, (who then had a seat on the floor of this House,) had expressed his views in his usual trenchant manner, and had ably indicated the right of the House to ask for any legislation which was to be undertaken.

"Hon Mr. HOLTON then moved, seconded by Hon. Alexander Mackenzie,—“and this House is of opinion that no changes in the provisions of the British North America Act should be sought for by the Executive Government without the previous assent of the Parliament of this Dominion.”

"The vote was :—Yeas 137; nays none."

If the action that the Government had taken, were permitted with reference to unimportant matters, the power might be assumed in regard to questions of extreme importance to the country. It was to be remembered that Parliament was actually in session when this violation of the constitution occurred. They had read for the first time this day a Bill sent down from the Senate, to enable witnesses to be examined on oath before both Houses of Parliament. In 1873, Parliament passed an Act to enable Committees of both Houses to administer oaths to witnesses; and it was disallowed, thus ceasing to be law. Yet in this Act, they actually found that the Imperial Parliament was legislating for Canada. He would like to learn the opinion of the Minister of Justice regarding this matter. They had gone further, and added this clause:

"The Act of the Parliament of Canada, passed in the 31st year of the reign of Her Majesty, Chap. 24, entitled, An Act to provide for oaths to witnesses being administered in certain cases for the purpose of either House of Parliament, shall be deemed to be valid, and to have been valid as from the date in which the Royal assent was given thereto by the Governor General of the Dominion of Canada."

The Imperial Parliament had no right to legislate in this manner, without the previous assent of the Parliament of Canada. In order that some record might be had of this circumstance, he moved, seconded by Mr. BOWELL :—

"That it appears from papers laid before this House, that the Executive Government by Order in Council, passed on the 18th of February, 1875, while this House was in Session, recommending the passage of an Imperial Act, to remove all doubts as to the right of the Parliament of this Dominion to possess the power of passing an Act, providing for the examination of witnesses on oath, by members of the Senate and the House of Commons;

"That in pursuance of such recommendation, the Imperial Parliament passed an Act, Chap 38, Vic. 38 and 39, whereby section 18 of the British North America Act of 1867 was repealed, and another section was substituted for the section which was repealed;

"That this House on the 27th of March, 1871, on motion of Hon. L. H. Holton, and seconded by the Hon. A. Mackenzie, had resolved as follows :—“And this House is of opinion, that no change in the provisions of the British North America Act should be sought for by the Executive Government without the previous assent of the Parliament of this Dominion; that the previous assent of the Parliament of Canada to the change in the provisions of the British North America Act sought for by the order in Council as aforesaid, was not obtained; and that this House regrets that any Imperial legislation affecting the British North America Act of 1867 should have been sought by the Executive Government without the previous assent of the Parliament of Canada expressed in the usual manner by addresses from both Houses of Parliament to Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen.”

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said as to the general principle enunciated by the hon. gentleman, of course he gave his entire assent to it, but there was a great difference between the two cases cited. The proceedings of a former Parliament were entirely different to those connected with this motion; in that case Parliament had expressed its opinion in a most deliberate manner on the passing of an Act, the legality of which was regarded as doubtful. But this was not a change in the sense the hon. gentleman had referred to. It was adding to the powers that Parliament possessed instead of changing any powers they had. The position then was that the Imperial Government were simply asked to implement an agreement to which both houses of Parliament had unanimously come and which it was decided they had not the power to come to. Therefore it was simply legalizing their previous action. It might have been better even then to have proceeded by address. And he admitted frankly it should be so whenever a change was wanted. If the hon. gentleman pressed his motion they could only say they must treat it in the usual way as one that seemed to be entirely uncalled for.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said as the hon. gentlemen had admitted that they had done wrong and were sorry for it, he would withdraw his motion as his object had been accomplished by bringing the matter before the House.

Mr. BOWELL objected to the withdrawal of the motion. He thought it was well to consider the position of the present Minister of Justice and the present Premier on this subject when they were on the other side of the House. They did not now appear to be so anxious to carry out the principles they advocated then. He could not see that any distinction could be drawn between the positions in which the hon. Premier had placed this question. He said that the Imperial Parliament had only made law that which was not law and which was ultra vires in its character. Therefore, they asked the Imperial Parliament, without the consent of this Parliament, to make that law which they had no right to make law.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—No!

Mr. BOWELL said it would not have been law unless this course had been taken, and it was conceding the point that the Imperial Government had a right to legislate for Canada.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said the Act in question was not referred to the Minute in Council, and no recommendation was made by this Government with regard to the Senate Bill for the legalization of oaths.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD deprecated any infringement upon the provisions of the British North America Act in a manner in which would interfere with the rights of the different Provinces of the Dominion. He believed, however, that there were occasions when this Legislature might fairly address Her Majesty in regard to Bills, the validity of which were questioned, without reference to the Provinces, but with the greatest circumspection.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE pointed out that that they had a common object in this matter, and suggested that it would be more advisable to withdraw the motion than to allow it to be lost on a division.

Hon. Mr. BLANCHET said the design of the Imperial Act was to increase the power of the Dominion Parliament, and it was in the increase of power that he saw the danger. For instance, if the Dominion Government passed an Order in Council asking the Imperial Government to give them power to deal with questions of education which were within the purview of the Provincial legislatures, what would the people of the provinces say?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I admit the danger of it in relation to the provinces, but this was not of that nature at all.

Mr. BOWELL, in answer to the statement of the Hon. Minister of Justice that the Act in question was not referred to in the Minute in Council, said that in the despatch signed by Lord Dufferin and forwarded to Earl Carnarvon, he found the following language:—

“Although the point has not been touched upon by my Privy Council, I am anxious to draw your Lordship’s attention to the fact that the same considerations which led the Crown to disallow the Oaths Bill of the Session of 1873 seem also applicable to the powers which for some time past have been vested in the Senate under an Act of Canada of 1868 [31 Vict., cap. 24.]”

In the report of a Committee of the Privy Council, he found the following:—

“The despatch further stating that ‘by an Act of the Canadian Parliament of 1868 [ch. 24], provision was made by the first section for examining witnesses upon oath at the Bar of the Senate, and that Act had been allowed to remain in force,’ and pointing out that that section was void and inoperative as being repugnant to the provision of the British North America Act, and cannot be legally acted upon.”

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE.

This showed that although the Imperial Government was not directly asked to legalize that Act their attention was called to it in such a way as to indicate to them the necessity of allowing it to remain law. He did not desire to place Parliament in a false position on the question. It should be remembered that when the hon. member for Chateaugay made his motion in reference to the North-West Territory Bill the Ministry rose in their places and acknowledged the error they had committed by the fact that they voted in favour of the motion. They had the same power to have rejected that motion as the hon. gentleman had to reject the motion before the House. But the Government did not wish to have their names recorded against a motion, the principle of which they themselves had affirmed. They said: "If you put it in the manner you now put it, it must be regarded as a vote of want of confidence." Now the late Government accepted motions on going into Committee of Supply, and declared that they did not regard them as votes of want of confidence.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—But they were not motions censuring the Government.

Mr. BOWELL said it was always contended that this was the way in which they could bring such questions before the House, and that the Government of the day had no right to regard them as votes of want of confidence.

The House had an example that the Government could, when it suited their convenience, accept such motions as votes of want of confidence. Only last night they had voted down the same principle they had before affirmed. However, if those who had more experience than himself did not believe this motion should be pressed, he did not object to its being withdrawn.

The motion was accordingly withdrawn.

THE BAIE VERTE CANAL.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury) said he wished to draw the attention of the House before going into Committee of Supply to the absence of any item in the estimates for the Baie Verte Canal.

Mr. BOWELL—Another want of confidence motion?

Mr. BURPEE said it was not, but it was quite as important as any subject which had been brought before the House this Session. It had occupied public attention in the Lower Provinces for many years. It had been brought before this House several times, and sums had been placed in the estimates for its construction. The utility of the canal would strike any person who would take the pains to look at the map of the country. It was requisite to facilitate intercolonial trade, without which the union of the Provinces would be but nominal. Before Confederation a proposition was made to the Local Legislature to charter a company to build this great work. The argument used at the time against granting the charter was that Confederation was about to take place, and the Federal Government could undertake the work. The two great improvements spoken of in New Brunswick before the union, were the Intercolonial Railroad and the Baie Verte Canal. The Intercolonial was made a condition of Confederation, and although the canal was not, it was understood it was also to be constructed. Great stress was laid on the Intercolonial railway particularly, and it was distinctly understood that a commercial route would be selected. Mr. Tilley refused to become a member of the Government until an assurance was given that the road would be built as a commercial work. He (Mr. Burpee) did not hesitate to say, if the people of New Brunswick had not been satisfied that this point was settled and that the construction of the Baie Verte Canal would be proceeded with, they would never have consented to the Union. It was well known that for the Intercolonial Railway a military and not a commercial route had been chosen. The line might have been run by the southern route, which would have brought it much nearer to St. John without increasing the distance to Halifax. If that route had been chosen on line No. 3 of Mr. Fleming's Report, which is known as the Northern line, the road would have been 185 miles nearer St. John and one mile nearer Halifax. By line No. 10, one of Fleming's centre routes, 64 miles nearer to both cities; No. 8 line of Fleming's report, 142 miles nearer St.

John and 21 miles nearer Halifax; No. 6 line, 106 miles nearer St. John and 12 miles further from Halifax.

The advantages to be derived from the Baie Verte Canal were unquestioned at the time of Confederation. Scarcely anybody raised a voice against it, and Mr. Young, at the meeting of the Dominion Board of Trade in 1871, spoke as follows:—

“But there can be no doubt that the inland propeller can descend the St. Lawrence and go direct to Halifax, in Nova Scotia; and this fact brings up other important considerations. Among projected canals there is the Baie Verte Canal, to connect the Bay of Fundy, on the Atlantic, with the Straits of Northumberland in the Gulf, and the Murray Canal, to connect the Bay of Quinte with Weller’s Bay on Lake Ontario. If the Baie Verte Canal is possible of construction, the work will be highly important, and, in its results, of a truly national character in all its respects. The City of St. John, in New Brunswick, as well as all other places on the Bay of Fundy, would be brought 430 miles nearer Montreal, Quebec or Toronto for the water-borne vessels, than at present; and if such a canal were constructed, the propeller of 900 tons sailing from Lakes Superior, Michigan, or Ontario, could proceed direct to Halifax or St. John with Western States or Canadian products.

“It would be difficult to point out all the advantages which would result to Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, by the construction of the Baie Verte Canal. If the 900-ton propeller could deliver western or Canadian products at Halifax or St. John, these places would thus become cheap depots for such products. Assorted cargoes of fish, hoops, shooks, lumber, &c., could be made up at these ports for the West India Islands and South America, and could bring back return cargoes from these countries of sugar, coffee, hides, tallow, etc., to be again re-shipped as return cargo to Canada and the Western States by the inland propeller, and thus be delivered at less cost by such means than by any other possible route.”

He also quoted from the report of Mr. Patterson, in his report of the commerce of Montreal, for 1869, as follows:—

“The value of the proposed canal, in more intimately connecting all the Provinces, must be evident to all who have examined the geographical situation. At present there is little or no community of interest between the portions of the Provinces on the Bay of Fundy and those on the Gulf,—although separated by but a narrow strip of land. For want of a few miles of canal navigation, a profitable development of the fisheries by the people of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia is seriously hindered; the fishermen of Cape Ann, in Massachusetts, being nearer the valuable mackerel fisheries of the Gulf of St. Lawrence than the Canadian fishermen who live on the Bay of Fundy. By means of the proposed canal the waters of the Bay and Gulf would be united, and the fisheries brought within the reach of the fishermen of all the Provinces;—passing easily, so to speak, from one sea to another as the fishing season might render necessary.

In 1870, Messrs. Allan, Gzowski, Calvin, Laidlaw, Garneau, Stairs and Jardine, were named, by the Dominion Government, Commissioners to institute and make a thorough enquiry on a comprehensive improvement of the canal system of the Dominion, and were instructed to report “On the construction of a canal through the Isthmus dividing the Bay of Fundy from the Gulf St. Lawrence at Baie Verte.”

Those gentlemen in their report stated:—

“Inseparably connected with the growth of intercolonial trade is the construction of the Baie Verte Canal. The advantages that must accrue, not merely to the Dominion as a whole, but to the commerce of the Maritime Provinces, are so clearly pointed out by the Boards of Trade of all the leading cities of Canada, and by men interested in the development of our commercial cities—not simply the merchants of St. John and other places in the locality of the proposed canal, but merchants of Hamilton, Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal and Quebec—that it is superfluous for the Commissioners more than briefly to refer to a few salient features of the scheme.

“A steamer laden with flour for St. John, N. B., now goes down the Gulf as far as Shediac, where the cargo is transported by rail to its destination. The total distance by water from Shediac through the Gut of Canso and round the coast of Nova Scotia to the Bay of Fundy, as far as the commercial capital of New Brunswick, is about 600 miles, and the consequence is that there is little or no direct communication between the Bay of Fundy ports and those of the River St. Lawrence.

“By a canal through the Isthmus, from Shediac, the distance to St. John will not be more than 100 miles. This fact will show the insuperable obstacle that now exists to anything like extensive commerce between Montreal and the Bay of Fundy ports of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and the great impulse that must necessarily be given to the trade by the opening out of a route which will shorten distance so considerably, furnish an inland navigation from the lakes to Boston, and consequently lessen freights between those points at least twenty-five per cent.”

In consequence of this report, surveys were ordered and a vote was put in the estimates. The Government gave notice in the Canada Gazette that at a certain date they would advertise for tenders for construction of the work. He confessed he was surprised at the Opposition to that work developed in the House by some members from Nova Scotia. It was also said some of the promoters of the Coughnawaga Canal lent aid to that Opposition.

Mr. BURPEE.

In this House the hon. member for Halifax gave the work his unqualified opposition, and other hon. members from the same Province, one after another, rose in their places and denounced it, and were supported by some influential members from other Provinces. Members from Cape Breton gave as a reason why Government should consider liberally the improvements on St. Peter's Canal, and other Nova Scotia public works, that they had combined and killed the Baie Verte Canal. Witnesses from Nova Scotia, before the Commissioners, had said that they would rather have the $8,000,000 spent upon their own public works; and this avaricious principle did more to destroy and weaken this great work than all that was urged against it. The canal, if built, would cross the narrow neck of land near the line between the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and the scheme was opposed by Nova Scotia members, because they feared that its construction would cause the loss of considerable trade which Halifax and various ports in that Province at present enjoyed. Vessels were now compelled to pass around the dangerous coast of Nova Scotia to reach St. John, the western ports of Nova Scotia, small ports of New Brunswick, and ports east of New York on the American side. A strong rivalry naturally existed between the cities of Halifax and St. John, and this had its effect in strengthening the Opposition in question. The opponents of the scheme had canvassed against it; and a memorial signed by nearly all the members for Nova Scotia, directed against it, had been presented to the Government. The inducement very generally held out was, that if this project were killed the appropriation of eight millions could be utilized for the construction of local works in the Maritime Provinces; and this was a most vicious and mischievous argument. He, with certain hon. gentlemen from New Brunswick, had asked the Premier if the canal was to be abandoned, and the money appropriated for it so distributed; and the answer had been, that if the project was given up it would make no difference with regard to the treatment of claims for the construction of public works. The result of the Opposition had been this: a commission was appointed to enquire into the matter. The Commissioners were Hon. Mr. Young, of Montreal; Hon. W. P. Howland, of Toronto; Mr. C. W. Lawrence, of St. John's, N. B., and Mr. Jack, of Halifax. Their conclusions were:—

“That the canal, if built, will be 15 feet deep and 100 feet at bottom, and cost $8,000,000.

“That, for the trade of Great Britain, South America, the West Indies and Newfoundland, the canal is not required.

“That the trade of Prince Edward Island with Great Britain does not require the canal, which would not be of much advantage to that Island.

“That it would be difficult to say what would be the effect of the enlargement of the Welland and St. Lawrence Canals when completed, on the question of transportation between the Upper Lakes and the Maritime Provinces.

“That it was doubtful whether a route via the canal could successfully compete with railroad routes now built and being built, or routes by railroad and water mixed in vessels now being used in those Provinces; and that the evidence taken and observations made impressed them deeply with the vast resources of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, and the large increase that may be reasonably looked for in their trade and commerce.”

He would remark that the Chairman of the Commission, Hon. John Young, signed the report without any reference to any other report, though one of the Commissioners, Mr. Lawrence, dissented from it, and published his reasons for doing so. He (Mr. Burpee) had read the minority report with a great deal of interest, and he thought that the Chairman had done this Commissioner an injustice in abstaining from making either a direct or indirect reference to his report.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Allow me to state that Mr. Lawrence was requested to send in a minority report to be printed with the other. He refused to do so, and no one is to blame for the omission save himself.

Mr. BURPEE said that might be true, but, notwithstanding, Mr. Young should have given the fact in his report that the Committee were not unanimous. He could not understand why the question of trade with South America and Great Britain had been considered by the Commissioners, as no one had ever claimed that the canal, if made, would be of any advantage in this relation. With regard to trade with Newfoundland, it was a disputed matter, but parties claiming to be good authority on the trade with Newfoundland gave it as their opinion that if the canal was constructed a considerable trade would spring up between the Bay of Fundy and that colony. The report stated that the canal would be of no benefit in regard to the West India trade, but other high authorities took opposite ground.

As far back as 1827, the New York Albion wrote:—

“Would not the Mother Country grant a sum in aid of the Baie Verte Canal, since it would make St. John an excellent depot for articles of prime necessity in the West Indies? If once opened, the produce of Canada, Prince Edward Island, the coast of Labrador, and that of her own soil, would concentrate at the Capital of New Brunswick, it would be equally the mart for return cargoes of West Indian Produce.”

The agreement in sentiments between the President of the Dominion Board of Trade, 1871, and the New York Albion of 1827, is as striking as the views are reasonable.

The Canal Commission, 1871, says:

“The Ontario and Quebec merchants can supply the firms of St. John interested in the West India trade, with the description of merchandise for which there is an ever ready and remunerative market in the tropics, and in that same way get back sugar, molasses, and other West Indian and South-American produce, which is now supplied indirectly to so large an extent through the United States.

“In the enquiry as to the probable prospective increase of trade with the West India Islands and South America, the views of the authorities cited above must carry great weight. In their opinion, if Canada is to build up a British and Foreign West India trade for her Western products, she must have Maritime depots.

“The Baie Verte Canal is regarded by them as indispensable to the extension of the commercial relations of Canada with the British and Foreign West India Islands.

“The construction of the Canal should not be dependent on the extent of the existing trade between the Dominion and these Islands, but on the trade which the Canal will create.”

Mr. Young also gives it as his opinion that very little trade would go through the Canal from Prince Edward Island at present. If there was reciprocity with the United States there would be a large trade through the Canal. At present there was not very much trade there, although there was a considerable amount of trade between Prince Edward Island and St. John. Reciprocity with the United States was almost indispensable to the trade of Prince Edward Island. With reference to the trade with the Bay of Fundy he had already referred to that. The fact was that trade with the Bay of Fundy with the Upper Provinces was almost entirely shut out for the want of this canal.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said that, perhaps his hon. friend would postpone his remarks until Monday. He did not anticipate the hon. gentleman would occupy so much time, and as there was so much other business before the House, he would ask the hon. gentleman to proceed with his speech on Monday.

Mr. BURPEE acceded to the request, and the matter was postponed.

THE SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT moved the House into Committee of Supply on the Supplementary Estimates,—Mr. Young in the Chair.

THE NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE.

On item No. 6, appropriating $119,435.32, to provide for further expenses for current fiscal year, in relation to the North-West Mounted Police, Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said this seemed to be a very large amount. He found that the sum already voted for the militia service this year, showed an increase of $107,000, and the sum asked for now, added to the former vote, would show an increase of over a quarter of a million.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said that these votes were up to the 30th June. The votes the hon. gentleman had referred to were for after 30th June.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—Then the amount actually expended during the current year will be $345,000.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—Nearly so, including arrears which were carried forward.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE pointed out that owing to the difficulty of getting in these accounts they had run from one year to the other, and stated that there really was only a slight increase this year. This year they hoped to be able to reduce the expense by raising grain themselves.

Mr. BLANCHET asked what was the approximate expense of the Mounted Police since their formation.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said the actual expenses for the three years including the current year, amounted to $878,803, as nearly as they could make it out. That included a considerable amount for supplies for buildings which had been made by the men, and which it had been impossible to disentangle from the accounts.

Mr. BABY said the United States' troops sent out to the West during the Indian War, cost $1,000 a head per year. He desired to know if the Mounted Police had cost as much.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said if he had anything to regret, it was that they had not been supplied enough. All that could be done was being attempted to raise grain around the posts or to purchase it in the Territories. The Government were doing what they could to induce people to settle there, but for a year or two supplies would still be very high.

Hon. Mr. POPE asked if the horses of the North-West would not live on the grass of the prairies where our horses would die.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said he had instituted enquiries as to the horses of the North-West, British Columbia and the Western States. They were not yet completed, but the information he had led him to the belief that, except to a very limited extent, they could not use the native horses. They did not possess the size or the other qualities requisite. Oxen were largely used, but it was represented to him horses would also be required.

The item was passed.

Items 8 and 9 passed without discussion.

On item 10 to provide for cost of increased staff, &c., for Parliamentary Library, in accordance with the report of the Committee, $4,000,

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said this was apparently a small sum of money, but it was an unnecessary appropriation. A return had been brought down on his (Mr. Kirkpatrick's) motion, and if the Premier was acquainted with the condition of affairs which it revealed, it would be well the House should have his opinion on the subject. In 1868 a Committee sat to investigate the expenses of the internal economy of the House. They reported that the number of extra clerks should not exceed ten. Since then election committees had been abolished, yet there were 37 extra Sessional clerks, five of whom were permanent. The same report also recommended the number of messengers should not exceed 40; there were now 48. Now, where was the necessity of having so many extra clerks and messengers. This vote was unnecessary. The amount could be taken out of the contingencies vote. He was so astonished at the facts revealed in the return brought down, that he thought it would be well to appoint a Committee next Session to ascertain whether the abuses could be remedied.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the hon. gentleman could not have read the report of the Library Committee. It showed this appropriation was necessary.

Hon. J. H. CAMERON said it was not enough. If the hon. member for Frontenac had any Augean stable to cleanse, he should not turn the stream into the library. Both Houses had unanimously resolved to give this additional assistance to the librarian, believing it would be necessary.

Mr. BABY said the Library Committee had carefully considered the question, and had recommended nothing that was unnecessary.

Hon. Mr. BLANCHET wished to know if the officers to be appointed were to be paid by statute or under the supervision of the Speaker?

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said it was probable the new Library would not be occupied for some months yet, but he had no doubt the additional officers would be paid under Statute.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said he did not complain of necessary expenditure. What he did complain of were the abuses in the internal economy of the House. The Commissioners were not expending the money entrusted to them wisely or well.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said there was a decrease in the estimate for extra clerks and messengers for the coming year.

Mr. BOWELL wished to know who had given the Clerk authority to employ 32 extra clerks?

The SPEAKER—I gave him the authority.

Mr. BOWELL said if the rule meant anything, it signified that when the clerk found extra clerks necessary, he should employ them, or call the attention of the Speaker to the fact, and select them with the Speaker's approbation. It had been stated in the lobbies that persons were kept on duty until otherwise provided for, and also that men were put on the staff who really did, and had done, nothing. It was time that the House should take this matter into its own hands, and, following the example of the Imperial Parliament, appoint a Committee to enquire into the question. The salaries paid to these extra clerks were enormously high; some received $600, others $500, and others $400. He objected chiefly to the system, because these clerks were shuffled in by the scoop-full without regard to the necessity for their appointment.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON (Cardwell) thought that if these statements were correct, they revealed the existence of an extraordinary state of things. He had always been under the impression that the clerks were fully employed, and that they did their work well. He was informed that at least one sessional clerk had not even made the pretence of doing anything for his pay, but was attending all the Session to his duties in the press gallery.

Mr. SPEAKER stated that he was surprised to hear these comments. He was not aware that any employé drew pay who did not work for it. Sessional clerks were paid, he believed, $4 per day, and compared with former years, their numbers were not materially increased. He and the Commissioners of Internal Economy had done their utmost to reduce, as far as possible, expenditure in this Department; and offices becoming vacant had not been filled up. He could not imagine any point to which the slightest objection could be taken, save to the number of extra clerks which was perhaps larger than there was necessity for; but he believed it was not larger than it had been for many years. It was difficult, however, to induce officials to accept positions in the post office even with increased pay, so hard was the work. He had been under the necessity of ordering one sessional clerk to take a position in the Post Office on pain of losing his appointment altogether. He had no difficulty in obtaining clerks, he was sorry to say; applications were extremely numerous, and many were the tales of distress which he heard. He would be delighted to be relieved from the very grave responsibility and annoyance attendant on the performance of these duties.

Mr. BOWELL thought that this difficulty was easily solved, as the 110th rule provided that the Speaker had nothing to do with these appointments unless his attention were drawn to them by the Clerk of the House.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL hoped that if these evils existed—and he did not doubt it—they would be remedied, now that the attention of the Speaker was drawn to them. He thought that the appropriations in connection with the library, particularly for legal works, were rather large.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT replied that they had found law books to be very expensive.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON (Cardwell) stated, that during recess the First Minister had asked him whether he would have any objection to assist the librarian to go over the whole list in the library, and give any aid in his power to complete as far as possible the list of legal works which it was necessary to purchase.

He told his hon. friend that the amount, he thought, which would be required would be infinitely larger than anything he had yet put in his estimates. The expense of law books was very much greater than that of ordinary books, and the amount asked for was not nearly sufficient to make the law library as complete as was necessary for the judges of the Supreme Court. He was quite sure his hon. friend would only require that explanation to know that it was not an unnecessary item.

In compliance with the request of the First Minister, he had given the librarian, during the past summer, what advice and assistance were in his power in respect of the necessary selection.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said he was glad of the explanation that had been made by his hon. friend, but he wished the Government to bear in mind that that was not a permanent vote.

The item was carried.

MILITIA DRILL.

On item No. 12, appropriating $20,000 for drill pay and other incidental expenses connected with the drill and training of the Militia,

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT explained that last year, owing perhaps to the hard times, or perhaps other accidental causes, the number which presented themselves for drill was larger than usual. Consequently the appropriation was exceeded by about $20,000, for which amount they now asked.

Mr. POULIOT considered this expenditure, money thrown away, while there were so many useful things on which it might be expended. He suggested that the Minister of Public Works should be favoured with the appropriation, then he would be able to do something for the good of the Dominion. In his constituency there was a harbour which needed improving, and he hoped the attention of the Government would be given to the matter.

Mr. ROSS (Prince Edward) was of opinion that the bone and sinew of the Volunteers should be better paid than they were. He saw an item of $50,000 for Rifle Associations, but he thought the money of the country should rather be spent on those who knew how to use the rifle in an expert and practical manner, than on those silver-headedcaned, patent-leather-booted and kid-gloved gentry to whom he regretted this appropriation was being made. The men on whom so much money was expended were not the men that would do the most service to the country. It was the men who had served their country in 1865 and 1866; and if they were called out he would venture to say that an army of 25,000 or 30,000 of them could be obtained within ten days. He thought that the veterans of 1812 should be paid larger pensions, and that the men who lost their health at Erie should be taken into consideration by the Government next year.

Mr. CASEY said he could not agree with the remarks which had fallen from the hon. gentleman who had just taken his seat, but he thought there was some truth in the view he had expressed in regard to drill. A good deal of money was wasted, for the reason that it was utterly impossible, with the amount of money annually voted for militia purposes, and in the time allotted, to make efficient soldiers out of raw recruits. He considered that if the Government decided to take out only a small proportion comparatively of the volunteers of the country and drill them for a considerable time this year, not at battalion head-quarters, but in the usual brigade camps, the money would be most economically expended. He was sorry to hear the hon. gentleman make the remark he did in reference to Rifle Associations.

Mr. ROSS—I repeat it.

Mr. CASEY said the only instrument they had of keeping up enthusiasm amongst the volunteer corps was rifle shooting, and many joined the regiments for the purpose of practising rifle shooting and being allowed to take part in rifle matches. These matches did more to keep volunteer corps together than any other agency. And again, people called on suddenly, not trained in the use of the rifle, would be practically useless in the field although they might be sufficiently enthusiastic.

Mr. ROSS said he did not mean the Rifle Associations in the rural districts, but those at head-quarters, where the kid-gloved soldiers luxuriated.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) considered rifle shooting of more importance to our volunteers than drill, because the amount of place at the disposal of the militia for this year was altogether inadequate to the wants of the country.

The item was carried.

On item 77 to provide for the cost of building and equipping a steamboat to maintain communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland during winter months, in accordance with the terms of Union, $30,000,

Hon. Mr. BLANCHET asked whether any contract had been given to Mr. Sewell?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—There will be.

Hon. Mr. BLANCHET wished to know where the engines would be obtained?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said enquiries had been made to ascertain whether compound engines could be made in this country. He believed the machinery would be got in Montreal.

Hon. Mr. BLANCHET—Will the vessel be ready this year?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Yes.

Hon. Mr. BLANCHET said he was in Quebec not long ago, and was told by a gentleman there that the vessel that was being built for this service was wholly unfit for it. He did not wish to find fault with the Government; he merely desired to call their attention to what had been told him.

Mr. DAVIES understood the vessel was to be built under Lloyds survey. He considered the model was perfect. With regard to the engines he would like to have them built at some place where they had more experience of building such machinery than in Montreal or Quebec. It would be better to go abroad for the engines.

Hon. Mr. BLANCHET said there were manufacturers in Montreal and Quebec who could turn out the very best machinery.

Mr. FRECHETTE said there was one of the best establishments in Lévis.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said there never was a compound engine built there. He had letters from several manufacturers declining to build the engines because they had no experience in the manufacture of them, and had no patterns. There had been very few such engines built in this country. Only two or three shops had models of the kind that would suit. The Government would take good care that nothing should be made out of the country that could be made in it.

The Committee rose and reported progress.

LIQUOR TRAFFIC IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Bill to amend an Act intituled: "An Act to make further provision as to Duties of Customs in Manitoba and the North-West Territories; and further to restrain the importation or manufacture of Intoxicating Liquors into, or in the North-West Territories," was read the third time, and passed.

The House adjourned at 5.30 P.M.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, April 10th, 1876.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at 1.30 o'clock.

ORDERS DISCHARGED.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD moved that the following Orders be discharged:—

Bill respecting Dominion Lands reserved for Railway purposes.

Resolution—That it is expedient to make special provision respecting Dominion Lands withdrawn from the general provision of the Dominion Lands Act, as to sale and settlement, for purposes connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway; and to provide that two-thirds of all cash received for such lands shall be carried to a special fund for such purposes as aforesaid, to be dealt with in such manner as may be deemed expedient by the Governor in Council.

The motion was agreed to.

LENDING IRON RAILS.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—"That it is expedient to authorize the Government to make a temporary disposition of the iron rails as they are removed from the Government railways by loaning them to companies constructing railways which may be regarded as feeders to the Government lines, such rails to be returned weight for weight to the Government stores at the junction of such lines when taken up."

Mr. BOWELL asked what railways were referred to from which the rails were to be moved and loaned to private companies?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the road from St. John to Halifax was the railway. The road from Moncton was already laid with steel rails, and the Government were replacing the iron rails on the other portion as fast as they could.

Mr. BOWELL wished to know if the House was to understand from that that the rails which were being taken up were unfit for use. If so, they would not be required by other companies; if they were not worn out they should not be taken up. He was aware the Act declared this line should be laid with steel rails, but that referred only to the new portion of the road; on the other portion the iron was to be replaced with steel as soon as it became necessary to renew the rails. The principle involved in this resolution was vicious. He did not see why these rails should be given to local roads, though they might be feeders of Government railways, any more than to others in different sections of the Dominion. He could easily see how the adoption of such a scheme as lending these rails would lead to abuses. No doubt the Government were honest in their intention, but the experience of the past did not justify a reasonable expectation that rails once loaned to private companies would ever be returned. It would be something like the municipal loan fund. When the time would come to demand that the rails be returned, the companies would plead they had been used in the public interest, and claim exemption from returning or paying for them. If it were the policy of the Government to subsidize private companies throughout the Dominion, he had no objection to it. He would cast his vote in favour of assisting all railroads running into the interior of the country, but he did not see why companies in a particular part of the Dominion should be specially favoured at the expense of other sections. If they wished to avail themselves of these rails which were being removed from the Government roads, let them buy what they required and pay what they were worth. Such rails as it was found necessary to remove should be sold for what they would bring, and there would be an end of the matter. He did not think the principle involved in this resolution was a correct one, and in order to prevent the Premier, in case anything should arise out of the lending of these rails, saying no objections were raised to this measure, he (Mr. Bowell) wished to place his protest on record.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said there were about ninety miles of iron rails to be lifted yet. Of these about fifty miles might probably be used for some years longer, but they would have to be patched and it would never do to repair with steel rails. The track must be laid entirely either with iron or with steel rails. It was quite impossible to mix the two kinds. It was easier for rolling stock to pass over steel rails, and there was less liability to breakage. These reasons had induced the late Government to commence the process, of which he quite approved, and which he was carrying out as fast as possible. As to the policy of giving these rails to private companies, which would act as feeders to the road, he thought it was a good one. The cash value of the available rails at present was about $117,000, assuming they would command as high a price in the future as in the past. These feeders would bring a large amount of traffic to the road. He thought this policy would accomplish a great deal of good.

Mr. McCALLUM held that if this power was given to the Government, they could use it to keep themselves in power. He opposed the resolution; and though he knew the Government would not make support a condition for the loan of rails, it would be well understood that they would expect the support of companies getting the rails. It was said that companies thus favoured would give good security, but such security had been supplied by the Grand Trunk, Great Western, and Northern Railway Companies, yet last year the Northern Railway Company had been forgiven three millions. It was agreed that the other million was to be paid within a certain time; but only the other day the Premier had requested an extension of time touching this matter. The Premier had not always been of the opinion that it was necessary to use steel rails on the Intercolonial Railway. He remembered the time when in 1871, the hon. member for Lanark had moved that it be laid with iron; and the hon. member for Lambton, had voted for this resolution.

The purchase of certain steel rails was a monument of the Government's folly; and to hide their blundering they now wished to make it appear, that if these rails were not required for the Pacific, they were needed for the Intercolonial Railroad. He entered his protest against the passage of the resolution which was wrong in principle and would be wrong in practice. Our revenue was not too abundant, and if we did not want the rails in question, they should be sold, after giving proper notice.

Mr. MASSON enquired the meaning of the following portion of the resolution, "such rails to be returned weight for weight to the Government stores" "at the junction of such lines when taken up."

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE replied that when taken up, they were to be returned to the depots at the junction of their lines with the Intercolonial Railway.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL thought that the wording of the resolution was perfectly clear. If transient travel was to be secured, a high rate of speed had to be secured, and to ensure this, the line should be laid from end to end with steel rails. He was surprised to observe the position taken by the hon. member from Hastings, and he heartily approved of the policy of the Government in extending assistance to feeders of the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. McCALLUM.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings) could not see how the rate of speed could be effected by the fact that a portion of the road was laid with iron, and a portion with steel rails; a long delay would take place in the construction of the Pacific Railway if the policy proposed were pursued. The business of the country should be conducted in a sensible practical way, and these rails, if they were not required, should be sold.

Mr. IRVING maintained that the Government proposed to follow the course pursued under similar circumstances by the Great Western, Grand Trunk and Northern Railway Companies.

Mr. PLUMB was not aware that in order to properly inaugurate this railway and establish a uniform rate of speed, it should be laid entirely with steel or iron. He was also not aware that such competition was offered by the great central lines as to necessitate the preparations of which mention was made. He thought that the rails in question should be sold to the branch lines. He could not understand exactly how they could be loaned on principles untinged with partizanship or favouritism. He was of opinion that the Government should not be too hasty with regard to the laying of the line with steel rails, as it was conceded that their use was still a matter of experiment, as far as advantage conferred equal to the additional price compared with the price of good iron rails was concerned. He considered that the objections raised to the policy of the Government were well taken.

On motion of Mr. MACKENZIE, the House went into Committee on the resolution, Mr. Ross (Middlesex) in the Chair.

The Committee reported the resolution without amendment.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE moved the resolution be read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. BOWELL moved, in amendment:—"That the resolution be not now concurred in, but that it be referred back to the Committee of Whole for the purpose of amending the same so as to provide that the iron rails moved from the Government railways shall be sold to the highest bidder, after due notice shall have been given of such intention to sell the same." He moved the motion because he dissented entirely from the principle and also from the reasons given by the Hon. Prime Minister in moving the resolution. He objected to the loaning out to private companies of rails which were now worth $25, $30 or $35 per ton, and having them returned weight for weight when they would only be of the value of scrap iron. If it was to be the policy of the Government to subsidize local lines that policy should be made applicable to all sections of the country.

Mr. FLESHER, in seconding the amendment, said he objected to the motion on the ground that he regarded it as a subsidy of local lines. He thought great difficulty would be experienced in ascertaining when the rails were to be taken up by the local lines.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he should certainly vote for the amendment, as he did not approve of the principle contained in the original motion. Property for which the country had no longer any use ought to be sold to the highest bidder in the open market. The principle of the resolution was contrary to the policy the Hon. Premier had advocated both in this House and the Legislature of Ontario. When Mr. Sandfield Macdonald introduced a Bill asking for the sanction of Parliament to a Bill providing for grants to railways, the hon. gentlemen then said that Parliamentary control was a farce unless they had power to vote on each specific appropriation, and the principle of the motion before the House was a complete abnegation of Parliamentary control for the convenience of the Government. If they wanted to make a present of these rails, the companies should be specified. The rails would, most probably, never be returned, for as each rail became worn out it would be thrown aside.

Mr. WORKMAN said that it would be a very unprofitable transaction if the Government were to dispose of these rails now. Owing to the market being over supplied, the price of iron rails was only one-half what it was three years ago. If they lent them out now and sold them four years hence the price that would be obtained for them would be much greater than that which could be got now.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said it was a question of public policy whether it was fit and proper to aid these connecting local roads which served as feeders to the Government roads, and whether they should not, in the least expensive and least objectionable manner, aid these lines. He was prepared to vindicate his vote on that ground.

Mr. MILLS did not see a very great deal of force in the observations made by the right hon. member for Kingston. All the railways of this country might be regarded more or less as public corporations. They were granted powers which were not conferred on any other companies. They were authorized to take away the property of private individuals in the same way as the State. What the Premier proposed to do in this case was to take iron rails and loan them to corporations whose existence was only justified on public grounds. Those rails would cost the public nothing, since the Government were to receive the same quality in return, while the country would be the gainer.

Mr. WALLACE held that if these rails were of any good they could be used where they were, and the country would have the advantage of them for some years. This resolution was for the purpose of subsidizing local railways. In Ontario the way railroads were built was by private companies which were aided by municipalities and the Local Legislature. The same principle should be adopted in the Lower Provinces.

Mr. PLUMB said there could be no objection whatever to granting aid to the lines which would be feeders to the Government railways; but before any such subsidy was granted, no matter how much it was, the names of the lines thus aided should be given together with the amount of rails they were to receive. He had no doubt such a proposal would receive every consideration if rightly presented to Parliament, but it was too much to ask the House to vote these subsidies blindly.

Hon. Mr. ROBITAILLE wished to know the railways to be subsidized.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he would give the names of all the railways that could in any sense be considered as feeders. There was the branch which might be necessary to reach deep water at Dalhousie, six or seven miles long; the road starting from Chatham, crossing the Intercolonial, and running towards Fredericton; the road from the harbour of Richibucto to the main line; the road from the main line crossing the counties of Queens and York to Fredericton; the St. Martin and Upham road, and the road from Parrsboro' to Pugwash. These were the whole of the roads he knew of that had connection with the Intercolonial by crossing it.

Hon. Mr. ROBITAILLE said there was the Baie de Chaleurs Railroad, which was intended to be a feeder of the Intercolonial, and was intended to open up the whole district of Gaspé, with a population of 36,000 souls and an immense trade. The hon. gentleman seemed to know nothing about that road. He (Mr. Robitaille) wished to inform the hon. gentleman about it, so that he could furnish a few of those rails to the Company.

Mr. ROCHESTER was of opinion that the mode of disposing of those rails proposed by the Premier was a good one. When they were worn to a certain extent they must be removed, and if laid on the feeding lines the Government roads would indirectly have the benefit of them. It could hardly be expected they would be taken from that country and loaned to railroads in Ontario.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings) thought it would be better to sell the rails to the companies for old iron.

The House then divided on the amendment, which was rejected on the following division:—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—Does the hon. gentleman intend to found a Bill on that resolution?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—No, I do not.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—This will be a breach of the Constitution.

NEW BRUNSWICK FISHERIES.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT having moved that the Speaker do leave the Chair, and the House go into Committee of Supply,

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL stated, that before the motion was carried he wished to call the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the question of certain rights and privileges claimed by fishermen of his County and Province, in connection with the enforcement of certain rules and regulations issued by the Government. He had allowed the matter to stand over to so late a period in the Session, owing to the absence of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, to whom he had a suggestion to make which, if accepted, would save a great deal of ill-feeling and bad blood, and perhaps more serious results, as feeling ran very high in this relation. The fishermen had enjoyed these rights for seventy-five or eighty years—in some instances longer—and they believed that they ought not now be deprived of them, and it would be impossible to remove this impression from their minds unless a decision contrary to their views was rendered in a court of law. His proposition was that a case should be selected for submission to the Judges of the Supreme Court, whose ruling would be binding. He made this proposal in the interests of peace and order, right and justice, and he trusted that it would be accepted. In case it was not considered favourably he would move, "That it be resolved that the Speaker do not now leave the chair, but that this House do take into consideration the regulations made by the Government in May last, with relation to the fishery question, and the fishermen's interests in New Brunswick."

Hon. Mr. SMITH presumed that his hon. friend had authority to speak for the fishermen of his country regarding this matter. In framing the resolutions, there was no intention and no desire to interfere with any of the riparian rights in question; and he still held that these regulations did not contravene any such right. He would be glad to solve the difficulty in any reasonable manner; and he would request his hon. friend to postpone the matter until to-morrow, in order that he might consult with his colleagues.

At the same time he might say that the proposition would probably be accepted; but if it turned out that they could not agree on the statement of facts to be submitted to the Court for decision, it was to be understood that this arrangement would go for nothing.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL observed that he had been frequently consulted by the fishermen in this connection. He had been present at four large meetings; and he had advised them to secure the best legal counsel. He was satisfied that if his proposal was accepted, as it was proposed—in good faith—it would be accepted by the people of his county.

Mr. POULIOT urged that fishermen living on the banks of the St. Lawrence, in his county, possessed in this connection a stronger claim for consideration than the fishermen whose case was advocated by the hon. member for Northumberland; he strongly recommended this matter to the favourable attention of the Hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

THE BAIE VERTE CANAL.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury) proceeded to resume his speech on the question of the Baie Verte Canal.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL wished to be understood that if the hon. gentleman proceeded he should claim the right of reply.

Several members objected to the hon. gentleman proceeding with his remarks.

Mr. SPEAKER ruled that the hon. gentleman was out of order in speaking on a motion to go into Committee of supply on a subject of which notice had been given.

Mr. BROUSE moved the adjournment of the House in order to put matters right.

Mr. SPEAKER ruled that it was irregular to speak on a motion for the adjournment of the House on a subject of which notice had been given.

Hon. Mr. VAIL said the matter was of considerable importance, and that if the hon. gentleman was allowed to go on, a full discussion should be permitted. He regretted that it had been brought up at so late a period of the Session, as the subject was of a character that entitled it to full and earnest consideration.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said that as the discussion of the subject was likely to develop into a long debate, he would ask the hon. gentleman not to proceed now, as a long debate could not be indulged in without blocking the pressing business of the House.

Mr. BURPEE consented not to proceed with his speech, and the matter dropped.

THE AMBROSE SHEA CLAIMS.

On motion of Mr. Cartwright, the House then went into Committee of Supply.

On item 37, appropriating $11,866 for the purpose of meeting the probable claims of Hon. Ambrose Shea, Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT explained that this item was put in the estimate to meet the possible expenditure which might be necessitated by the report of the Committee of the House which considered the matter. Of course the Government would consider it their duty to enquire into the grounds on which the claim was based. The amount in the Supplementary Estimates was the exact amount without either interest or commission on the sum claimed by that gentleman.

The item was passed.

CHANGE OF GAUGE ON RAILWAYS.

Items 39 and 40 were passed.

On item 41, to pay for balance of cost of change of gauge on railway lines, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick ($38,758.12 from 1874-75) $168,768.12.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN asked what the change of gauge would cost altogether?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said there had been expended up to the present time $821,124, but there were credits for old material sold, which would make a considerable reduction on this amount. There was expended on the Windsor and Annapolis Railway in repairs as well as in change of gauge, very nearly $105,000. The reduction in the expenditure would be about $80,000, by the sale of old material. The expenditure on the Windsor and

Hon. Mr. VAIL.

Annapolis Railroad altogether was $926,000, of which $126,000 was yet to be voted, but the 80,000 was to be taken from that amount for old material. They had obtained 37 new engines, and other new stock of the very best description, and he supposed there was no road on the continent better supplied with rolling stock and other material.

The item was passed.

Item 42 was passed without discussion.

WHARVES ON LOWER ST. LAWRENCE.

On item 43, $124,777 (Vide public accounts 1874-5, part 2, page 398), Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN said he did not see in the details of this amount anything about the surplus sum required for the wharves on the Lower St. Lawrence. The amount voted by Parliament was $23,000; the amount expended, $36,383, making a surplus expenditure of $12,883, or more than fifty per cent. If the Premier would investigate this matter he would see the money had been squandered. There were too many clerks, overseers and foremen for the number of men employed. The reason was the work had been done by days' labor. The Premier must have been deceived or he certainly would not have allowed the work to be done in that way.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he was obliged to the hon. gentleman for the manner in which he had called attention to the matter. He promised to look into it. He was desirous to have the work of the Department done most carefully and economically.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN said if the work had been done by contract the appropriation would not have been exceeded. When other work was to be done down there—and he hoped the Premier would see his way to making some needed improvement in that direction—he hoped it would be performed by contract.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) said he would not be present when the vote for boundary surveys would be reached. He wished to ask if it was intended to have the boundary line surveyed and defined between Alaska and Canada. A good many Americans were encroaching upon our territory while they were very jealous of Canadians going into theirs.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government had made every effort to get the United States authorities to join them in obtaining a survey of the boundary in that particular part, but it was very difficult to get them to move in the matter. That was the only thing that had stopped them.

The item was passed.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES — MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.

The Supplementary Estimates for 1877 were then taken up.

Item 1 was passed without discussion.

On item 2, for the salary of one Stipendiary Magistrate, or County Court Judge, to provide, if necessary, for the vacancy created by the death of the late A. T. Bushby, Esq., in British Columbia, $2,425, Hon. Mr. BLAKE, in reply to Sir John A. Macdonald, said this was simply for one year, until the question of the County Court Judges in British Columbia was settled.

The item was passed.

With reference to item No. 8, providing for the payment of $200 to Ensign Fahey, in accordance with a report of the Medical Board,

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT explained that this was the renewal of an old grant. Ensign Fahey had been injured at Ridgeway, and had been granted a pension of $200 for five years, with the understanding that if he (Fahey) remained in a disabled condition at the end of this period, it would be renewed for a similar time. The Medical Board reported that this was the case, and accordingly the pension was continued.

Mr. IRVING trusted that when occasion arose, these graceful tributes for services rendered the country would be made more general in order to afford encouragement to our volunteers.

The item was passed.

Item No. 9, providing $10,000 to purchase forage for, and for contingencies in connection with the North-West Mounted Police, being taken up, Hon. Mr. POPE thought that this service was managed at present in a very extravagant manner.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE replied that he would be glad to hear any suggestions as to the way in which the appropriation could be reduced. The original estimate comprised only $4\frac{1}{2}$ lbs. of oats per day for each of the horses, based on the supposition that large quantities could be raised at the posts, but further information led him to believe that this hope could not be realized; and this sum was in part intended to provide for the deficiency.

Hon. Mr. POPE—Could not the force be reduced?

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—I do not think that it could be reduced at present. The military force in Manitoba has been lessened one-half during the present year, and that is something.

Hon. Mr. POPE urged that the volunteer system should be introduced in the North-West Territories, and if such provision were made he thought a reduction in this force would be quite feasible.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) held that they must be dependent for some years for protection on the Mounted Police Force.

The item was passed.

Item 10, appropriating $200,000 for the Cornwall Canal, being taken up,

In reply to Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN,

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE explained that originally they had not intended to do anything in connection with this work during the present year, but they had subsequently thought it advisable to make a commencement, in order that they might next year proceed with it more vigorously.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) enquired whether it was the intention to make any appropriation for the improvement of navigation on Red River, between Winnipeg and Lower Fort Garry. Were an interruption which existed removed—vessels could pass from Winnipeg and Fort Garry direct to the mouth of the Saskatchewan. This would be a very great convenience, and he thought that it could be secured with the expenditure of from $5,000 to $8,000.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE replied that they were not in the possession of information which would enable them to present an intelligent estimate in regard to this matter to the House. It was also to be remembered that a bridge, which would not be a swing bridge, was to be built across the river some 23 miles below Winnipeg and between this place and the Lake. The vessels used on the river were utterly unsuited for lake navigation.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL hoped that it was not intended to erect a bridge which would interfere with the freedom of navigation, compelling the transshipment of cargoes, a very serious matter. He trusted that the Government would reconsider its decision, if such was its object.

Hon. Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) held that the interruption of navigation by means of such a bridge would cause great inconvenience and hardship. A boat at present plied between Lower Fort Garry and the Saskatchewan.

The item passed.

MONTREAL EXAMINING WAREHOUSE.

Item No. 11, providing for the expenditure of $50,000 in connection with the erection of Montreal Examining Warehouse, being taken up,

Mr. DESJARDINS made reference to the Martin Contract. He stated that while Bourgoin and Lamontagne—to whom the contract had since been awarded—had tendered for excavations at the rate of $6.50 per yard, Martin's tender for this portion of the work had been $4.30 per yard. A telegram was sent to the former requesting them to come to Ottawa on this business; and on the 13th of May a similar dispatch was sent to the latter. On the 21st of May, notification from the architect, of a change in the conditions of the contract with reference to the excavation work, was received, and on calculation being made, Martin's tender was found to be the lowest by $1,084; nevertheless, a memorandum of the Minister of Public Works, of date the 25th of May, stated that the tender of Bourgoin and Lamontagne had been accepted, on condition that the rate for the excavation, walls, and foundations, was reduced from $6.50 to $5. A letter was sent from the Department of Public Works on the 28th, informing Martin that his tender was the lowest; but, notwithstanding all this, the contract was given to Bourgoin and Lamontagne. Martin wrote desiring to know why the Government had changed its first decision, and rejected the tender which had been accepted; and this letter was dated the 2nd of June. It remained without reply. On the 8th of June Martin wrote a second letter requesting the reasons why a change in the conditions had been made, and why such action had been taken as was mentioned: but acknowledgment was simply made of its acceptance. This note was dated the 10th of June. On the day following, Martin wrote, stating that on the 13th of May he had received a telegram desiring his presence at Ottawa. He had gone to Ottawa, and had been informed by Mr. Trudeau, the Deputy Minister that his tender was the lowest. He was asked several questions, amongst others, what security he could furnish. He had offered either a money deposit or a mortgage. He then wished to know why the contract had been taken from him; and he asked whether this was due to the fact that he had the misfortune to be a Conservative. To this letter no reply was vouchsafed. On the 2nd of June the tender of Bourgoin and Lamontagne was accepted, on the 4th of June the report of the Committee of the Privy Council was approved of by the Administrator of the Government, and on the 25th of May an Order in Council was passed, accepting the tender of Bourgoin and Lamontagne on condition that the price for extra work was reduced to $5 per yard. He did not pretend to say that Bourgoin and Lamontagne were not as competent as Martin to perform the work; but the matters of justice and impartiality were in question. He hoped that the Minister of Public Works could give an explanation that would satisfy the public. These questions had been discussed in the press, and on the hustings during the late local elections, and it had been charged that the change had been made owing to political motives. When it was found that the works would be more considerable than the architect had at first foreseen, it would be seen that Bourgoïn and Lamontagne had been informed that they could change their contract prices, while Martin had not been placed in so advantageous a position, although the latter's tender was the lowest by the amount of $1,084. Bourgoïn and Lamontagne did change their rates, and they had received the contract.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE replied, that it being discovered that extra excavations would have to be made, a second provision was made in the tender to obtain the schedule of prices at which these extra depths, which were assumed, not positively known, might be taken. Bourgoïn and Lamontagne were the lowest tenderers for the superstructure, the main point, by nearly a thousand dollars; and provided that the outer work was taken at lower prices, they considered those persons were entitled to the contract. Bourgoïn and Lamontagne at first refused to accept the price mentioned, considering it was too low; and the next tender was that of Martin, with whom they communicated. Shortly afterwards, however, the former returned, and accepted the conditions which were in question. He knew nothing about either of the contracting parties; he made it his business never to know anything about people under these circumstances, and contracts were awarded on principles which admitted of no challenge.

Mr. MASSON remarked that Martin was telegraphed to come to Ottawa; when the latter arrived he was told by the Deputy of the Department that he had received the contract, which almost immediately was transferred to Bourgoïn and Lamontagne. He did not wish to touch on the political question, but he would observe that Martin had a reputation to maintain. They were aware that a kind of rivalry existed between these contractors, and he could not but think that Martin, under such peculiar circumstances had a right not only to demand, but to obtain an explanation of the reasons which had actuated the Government with reference to this matter. He asked whether the Administration had acted in a business like manner. Martin's tender was the lowest, but despite this fact, Bourgoïn and Lamontagne had been placed in a more advantageous position, and to them the contract had been transferred. Should such action be taken with reference to contracts generally? He thought not. Martin had offered satisfactory security, and who knew but that if he (Martin) had received the same offer that had been extended to Bourgoïn and Lamontagne, he would not have lowered his rates for making the superstructure, and thereby a real saving for the country would certainly have been effected. He considered that the Government had taken an improper course. His hon. friend from Chateauguay remembered the question which came up last year, when a Sub-Committee was appointed by the Public Accounts' Committee to investigate the contract awarded for supplying with wood the Penitentiary of St. Vincent do Paul. A gentleman had tendered at a certain price, and had every expectation of securing the contract, but he was ultimately informed that a party who had tendered at a higher rate would obtain it on condition of lowering it, and this was certainly not just. It was a system which was consistent with the duty of a Government towards the tenderer that he should know that if he were the lowest tenderer he should have the contract, provided he could give sufficient security. In this case the gentleman was not only to give security, but to deposit the money required as a guarantee that he would carry out his contract. Mr. Martin's contract was proved to be $1,000 less than the successful tenderers', who were political friends of the existing Administration.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he knew nothing about the Penitentiary contract the hon. gentleman had alluded to, further than it was let by one of the hon. gentleman's political friends. In this particular case he contended the contract was let to the lowest tenderer. It was exactly as he had stated it, and further explanation he did not feel himself called upon to give.

Mr. DESJARDINS pointed out that the architect had said that on the whole it was not only fair to assume, but it was a real fact, that by a correct computation it was shown that the Martin tender was $1,084 less than that of Bourgoin and Lamontagne.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE stated that in a tender let at Kingston, a political friend of the hon. gentlemen opposite tendered three dollars below a political friend of the Administration, and the lowest tenderer got the contract. It was precisely so in this case.

Mr. MASSON said he had no complaint to make in reference to the St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary contract for wood, which had been given to friends of the Administration.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the contract was given out by a political friend of the late Administration.

Mr. MASSON said that gentleman had no doubt changed his political principles lately. When gentlemen from the Lower Provinces and the Province of Quebec and members of the Crown changed round, it would not be surprising that the Warden of a Penitentiary should allow his political opinions to change. It had been proved that the Warden of the Penitentiary had awarded the contract upon the urgent representations of the hon. gent's political friends. Mr. Masson here read extracts from the report of the Committee which inquired into the matter, and said that at one of the meetings of that Committee the hon. member for Chateauguay asked if it was not the custom of the late Government to give contracts to their political friends? To this inquiry the witness replied that they invariably gave the contract to the lowest tenderer. He next stated that under the late Administration the Government had always given the contracts for supplies for the Government institutions to the lowest tenderers, and he could prove by the record that in the majority of cases the contracts were given to Reformers.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said, as the hon. gentleman had referred to this matter, he thought he should have gone a little further and referred to the enquiry which was made respecting the purchase of a quarry at St. Vincent de Paul.

Mr. MASSON—It is not in point.

Mr. DESJARDINS.

Mr. HOLTON said it was perfectly in point, and he called upon the hon. gentleman to read that report. With regard to the wood contract, the Warden stated emphatically that he regarded the party who had made the lowest tender as not qualified to fulfil the contract, but it had been awarded to one who had put in a higher tender, on his accepting it at the figure of the lowest tender. The public had suffered no wrong, and the Warden who had awarded the contract was, when in this House, a supporter of the former Administration, and had been appointed to his present position by the right hon. gentleman himself. As the hon. member for Terrebonne would not read the report in regard to the quarry purchased, he would do so himself. The sub-Committee examined Mr. F. X. Auclair, the proprietor of the farm on which the quarry was situated, and other witnesses. The report was as follows:—

“It appears from the evidence that the quarry in question was offered to the Government by its original proprietor late in November 1872, for the sum of $9,000; that no answer to this offer was received; that early in the following month of December Mr. E. H. Lemay purchased the quarry from Auclair for the sum of $9,000; that later in the same month of December, valuers were appointed by the Government or by the Directors of Penitentiaries, under instructions from the Minister of Justice, to report on the value of the quarry, which was variously estimated at $29,750, and at $25,750; that the quarry was offered by Lemay to the Government for $18,000, at which price it appears to have been finally accepted by the Government in the month of January 1873, and a vote for the money was obtained at the next Session of Parliament; that Mr. C. A. Dansereau, chief editor and co-proprietor of La Minerve, a journal established in Montreal, took an active part in the negotiation of the Lemay, sale of the quarry to the Government by and in consideration of his supposed influence, or the influence of his firm and journal, he was to receive individually, according to Lemay's evidence—but for his firm according to his (Dansereau's) own evidence—one-sixth part of the profits arising from the transaction; that over and above one-sixth share of the profits so stipulated for, Dansereau demanded of Lemay the sum of $2,000 for an election fund, which he (Dansereau) says Lemay had previously agreed to pay, and that this demand was made pending the election in the County of Laval, in October 1873, and the money was intended to be used in connection with these elections, but it does not appear that Lemay ever paid this sum of $2,000 or any portion thereof. It seems to be established beyond dispute or doubt that double the sum was paid for the quarry that it was offered or might have been purchased for; that the sale by Lemay was effected through the influence of Dansereau with the Government, and that a considerable portion of the sum paid for the quarry in excess of the price at which it was offered to the Government by Auclair was intended to be used in the promotion of elections in the interest of the political party then supporting the Government."

He (Mr. Holton) did not intend to go any further into this matter than to call attention to the facts connected with it.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN wished to know why the hon. member tried to connect his (Mr. Langevin's) name with this transaction.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said it was because reference was made to the hon. gentleman in the evidence.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN said there was malice in the hon. gentleman's attempt to represent him as being implicated in the matter. It was not in accordance with the evidence to say the quarry was offered to the Government for $9,000. It never was communicated to them, and that fact changed the appearance of the matter altogether. The Government having been ignorant of any such offer, the course they pursued was perfectly right. If they had known it could be bought for $9,000 they certainly would not have paid more for it. Experts were appointed to value the property, and the matter was regularly brought before Parliament. But this transaction had nothing to do with the question before the chair, and he hoped the House would not be diverted from it by the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON quoted from the evidence of Messrs. Moylan and Lemay to show that reference was made to the Hon. Mr. Langevin by them.

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN said this was brought up as a screen to the other matter. When he, a short time before, had brought to the notice of the Premier the fact that money had been squandered on public works on the Lower St. Lawrence, instead of imputing wrong motives to the Government, he merely directed attention to it. The Premier had thanked him for the manner in which it was referred to. He (Mr. Langevin) had been a Minister of the Crown himself, and he treated hon. gentleman opposite as he desired to be treated himself.

Mr. DESJARDINS said the hon. member for Chateauguay had attempted to justify one wrong by another.

The matter then dropped.

RAILWAY LANDS IN VANCOUVER ISLAND.

Mr. DECOSMOS asked:—Do the Government intend to surrender to British Columbia the belt of land reserved for Railway purposes on Vancouver Island, or do they intend to perfect their title and offer the same for sale in conformity with the Dominion Lands Acts?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—We do not pretend to have any claim to the land.

THE DEBT OF BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. DECOSMOS asked:—Do the Government intend to carry out the agreement made in 1873 by and between the Province of British Columbia and the Dominion of Canada, respecting the advance by the latter to the former, of the difference between the actual and allowed debt of the said Province at the date of Union? And why did the Government refuse to carry out the said agreement in 1875?

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—The agreement made by the Government is defined very clearly in the Act of Parliament of 1874, for regulating the advances to all the Provinces. As to the second Branch of the hon. gentleman's question, the sum of $189,000 was advanced to the Province of British Columbia, but it was not considered expedient to advance any further sum.

FISHERIES ON THE ST. LAWRENCE.

Mr. POULIOT moved an Address to His Excellency the Governor General for a statement of the fishing licenses granted since Confederation for setting up fisheries on the beach of the St. Lawrence in front of the parishes of Notre Dome du Portage, River du Loup and Cacouna, shewing:—1st. The names of the persons to whom licenses were granted, together with the amount paid for each such license. 2nd. The amount of fines and penalties paid for infractions of the law in set ting up such fisheries, with the names of the persons who paid such penalties and the amount paid by each of them.—Carried.

THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) moved an Address to His Excellency the Governor General for copies of all correspondence between the Government and the Lieutenant Governors of the different Provinces regarding the relative jurisdiction of the Dominion and Provincial Parliaments over the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors; together with all decisions of the Courts in the different Provinces bearing upon this matter. He said it was within the knowledge of every member of the House that the question of a Prohibitory Liquor Law had been for the last two or three years spoken of everywhere as one of great importance. Statistics had been laid before the House from foreign countries bearing on the liquor traffic. In coming down, however, to legislation, the advocates of prohibition had encountered difficulties of a nature to which he proposed to call attention. It was not within their power, until the establishment of the Supreme Court, to settle the question of jurisdiction. Owing to the peculiar nature of our Constitution the powers of the Dominion Parliament and Local Legislatures were so stated that it was impossible to say whether this House could pass a prohibitory liquor law or not. This question had been before the Courts in New Brunswick, where the power of the Provincial Legislature was decided by Mr. Justice Ritchie in the following words:

“To the Dominion Parliament of Canada is given the power to legislate exclusively on ‘the regulation of trade and commerce’ and the power of ‘raising money by any mode or system of taxation.’ The regulation of trade and commerce must involve full power over the matter to be regulated, and must necessarily exclude the interference of all other bodies that would attempt to intermeddle with the same thing. The power thus given to the Dominion Parliament is general, without limitation or restriction, and therefore must include traffic in articles of merchandize, not only in connection with foreign countries, but also that which is internal between different Provinces of the Dominion as well as that which is carried on within the limits of an individual Province. As a matter of trade and commerce, the right to sell is inseparably connected with the law permitting importation. If, then, the Dominion Parliament authorize the importation of any article of merchandize into the Dominion, and places no restriction on its being dealt with in the due course of trade and commerce, or on its consumption, but exacts and receives duties on such importation, it would be in direct conflict with such legislation and with the right to raise money by any mode or system of taxation, if the Local Legislature of the Province into which the article was so legally imported, and on which a revenue was sought to be raised, could so legislate as to prohibit its being bought or sold, and to prevent trade or traffic therein, and thus destroy its commercial value, and with it all trade and commerce in the article so prohibited, thus rendering it practically valueless as an article of commerce from which a revenue could be levied.”

According to the opinion given by Mr. Justice Ritchie, it would appear with the Dominion Parliament rested the jurisdiction wholly. In a case tried in Ontario a different opinion seemed to be expressed by one of the judges. This was a case in which the power of the Local Legislature to pass such a law was decided. Chief Justice Richards made the following remarks:—

“We think, looking at the legislation by the Province of Ontario as applicable to the giving the powers of limiting the number of taverns in a municipality or prohibiting the sale by retail of spirituous liquors by shopkeepers in such municipality, that this is a power which may be properly exercised by the Local Legislature as a matter chiefly of policy, of a merely local and private nature, when it does not interfere with the sale of imported or manufactured liquors otherwise than as by retail.”

In their efforts to secure legislation with a view to finally prohibit the liquor traffic, the advocates of prohibition were met with the conflicting opinions of two learned Judges. In view of these facts, and in view also of the fact that by one clause of the Supreme Court Act, the power is admitted by the Government of referring cases of doubtful jurisdiction to that Court, it was thought desirable, in order to prepare the way to further action, to ascertain whether this Dominion Parliament or the Local Legislatures could prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors. That clause of the Supreme Court Act was as follows:

“It shall be lawful for the Governor in Council to refer to the Supreme Court for hearing or consideration, any matter whatsoever, as he may think fit; and the Court shall thereupon hear and consider the same and certify their opinion thereon to the Governor in Council."

It would be universally admitted, so far as the importation of intoxicating liquors was concerned, this House alone had jurisdiction, but in the matter of the manufacture and sale the conflicting opinions of the two judges justified them in seeking for the decision of the Supreme Court. It might be said in taking this course, the advocates of prohibition were abandoning the ground they had taken. He contended they had not. They had always insisted that the liquor traffic, like others, was capable of being regulated by law, although it was surrounded by many difficulties. They thought the power of the law on behalf of temperance and sobriety was sufficiently important to justify them carrying on this agitation to accomplish the object they had in view. Every right-thinking man would agree with him, that if this question belonged of right to this Parliament, they should know it as early as possible, but if it was not within their power to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor, they should know this also, in order that the time and attention of hon. members might not be occupied with the discussion of subjects beyond their jurisdiction. In moving the resolution, he hoped that hon. members would consider that he proposed taking the proper course, preparing the way step by step for the legislation which they and so many in this country considered to be advisable, and which he thought hon. members would sustain the very moment they felt the country was ready for the inauguration of a prohibitory liquor law. Without further remark he begged to move the resolution.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE was not aware that any correspondence on this subject existed, and of course over the decision of the courts they had no control. Steps however would be taken to procure reports of such decisions as could be ascertained to have been pronounced. As far as this was concerned, the Government had no objection to the motion; but with reference to the suggestion thrown out, and which he begged pardon for supposing was the principal object of the motion, he had to point out that it was a very serious question indeed to propose to utilize for the purpose which the hon. gentleman mentioned the power by which the law enabled the Governor in Council to refer matters to the Supreme Court for consideration. This was an Appellate Court, formed for the purpose of determining the correctness or inaccuracy of the decisions of the various provincial tribunals and that class of cases which might be brought before these tribunals for adjudication, and which might afterwards come before it in the proper and normal discharge of its functions as a Court of Justice. It was obvious that it would be a serious matter, in the performance of these duties, for it to give a preliminary opinion under this exceptional power, without all the advantages, and without those aids to arriving at a correct conclusion, to be found in the presentation of a case—narrowed, if you will, but also made more clear by the ordinary forms in which cases were presented to the courts, both as to issue and as to argument; also by the process of decision and of judgment in the inferior courts; and lastly made more clear by the argument in the court above. All our notions of the dispositions of our rights before the courts, were based — and rightly in his opinion — on the theory that even the most learned and most intelligent of judges would but very imperfectly discharge their duty if unaided by the reflections of counsel on either side. No one, or few at least, would be willing, he fancied, in important and delicate matters, to entrust their interests into the hands of a judge for his decision, on the bare statement of the case, without taking care to present an argument; and yet he knew of no means by which, in the exercise of this peculiar power invested in the Governor in Council, they would be able to have an efficient argument before the Judges of the Supreme Court, and present all sides of an important question like this, so as to be sure of a judgment after a full discussion of the matters at issue. There was another strong objection to submit, as a general rule, to such reference to the Supreme Court. A similar Court was established at a period almost coeval with the establishment of the Constitution of the United States; and the principle had there been jealously preserved, that constitutional questions of this description ought to be adjudged of by the Court only on the presentation of a particular cause between parties. Indeed there is no power, and he believed that there should be none, to dispose of a question on the submission of a general case, as now proposed. This point had been considered on more than one occasion. It was presented the other day with reference to a provision in a Bill, when he gave his opinion as to its inconvenience. He observed that the other branch of the Legislature had come to a resolution in that sense on the subject; and he believed that it was this day presented with regard to another important question. He had ventured to observe, although he did not say, that a circumstance might not arise in which it might be useful to avail themselves of this power with respect to such questions as might come before courts of law, that the precedent set them in connection with the United States' Court, and also invariably, or almost invariably observed with reference to the Judicial Committee—and it was a wholesome precedent, only departed from on pressing emergencies—that in all cases in which a matter could come judicially before the Supreme Court, it ought to be represented to come before it judicially, and not in any other way and should be followed faithfully in this country. With regard to this class of cases, there could be no difficulty about their coming before the Court judicially; they could be raised in reference to any Acts of a Local Legislature—as had been done before local Courts. This question had so been raised in New Brunswick and Ontario, as his hon. friend had said; and he had some reason to believe that an appeal would be taken from one of these decisions. At any rate, if this were not proposed, nothing would be easier than to find a case in which an attempt could be made to quash a municipal by-law; or the object could be effected in some other way with the view of testing the validity of the local law involving this constitutional point. He would venture to suggest that his hon. friend, and those who were similarly interested in this subject, should see that use was made of the ordinary methods for bringing this question before the Supreme Court; and he thought the House would agree with him in the opinion that they ought to hesitate before they proposed to bring it in this extraordinary and necessarily perfunctory manner—before the consideration of that Court. The motion was agreed to.

MR. ROCHESTER'S CLAIM.

Mr. McDUGALL (Renfrew) moved for the appointment of a Committee to enquire into a claim made by George Rochester and which had been considered by the Dominion arbitrators, before whom a considerable amount of evidence taken. The claim he explained arose from the loss of timber belonging to Mr. Rochester owing to the breakage of a boom at Arnprior in the year 1871. The booms there were owned and under the charge of an officer appointed by the Government. It was quite true that it would be hard in all cases to make the Government responsible for damages occasioned owing to exceptionally high water, or other extraordinary causes. He would show that on this particular occasion, the person who had charge of the booms had neglected his duty; this was clearly shown in the evidence. The Hon. Jas. Skead was one of the witnesses and he quoted from that gentleman's evidence, as well as from the evidence of several other witnesses, to show that the officer in charge had been warned that the boom was likely to give way. One of the Arbitrators had, however, favoured Mr. Rochester, and seemed to feel that a very considerable injustice had been done this gentleman. He asked the House to consider whether or not this had been the case, and whether the neglect was wilful or otherwise; he thought that under the circumstances a Committee should be appointed. It was true that the evidence might imply that an injustice had been wilfully done to this individual, but he made no such charge, let the inference be what it might.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE.

The fact was—as every right-minded person would admit—the decision was certainly extraordinary; and if it were proved that the decision should have been different, he thought that justice should at any rate be done to persons who deserved it. He moved that the Committee be composed of Messrs. Galbraith, White (Renfrew), Wright (Pontiac), Archibald and the mover.

Mr. ROCHESTER supported the resolution. Some five or six individuals were directly interested in the matter. From what he knew and had seen, he thought that a Committee should be appointed; and if owing to the fact that the Session was on the point of closing, this request was not granted, he trusted that the Government would take this matter into consideration and ascertain whether justice had been done. The Government had an officer at Arn prior to take charge of the booms and slides and see that they were kept in proper repair; and from the evidence it would be seen that this official had not performed his duty on this occasion. This officer had been repeatedly warned that the boom would break, and also that the east wind—which had been blowing at the time for some days—had kept the logs of lumber so close to the head of the boom, that the timber could not be got away. He was told not to let down any more and, as far as the evidence went and they knew, this person paid a deaf ear to all these warnings. Further, he left the place and came to Ottawa, where he remained for two days before, and two or three days after the breaking of the boom, to which occurrence he paid little heed. He (Mr. Rochester) fancied that, if the circumstances had been different, the award of the arbitrators would not have been what it was. An election was in progress in the County, and the Chairman of the Board had repeatedly expressed himself strongly in favour of the Conservative candidate, Mr. O'Rielly. He did not hesitate to say that the Chairman had acted in a very partisan manner on that occasion, and political feeling was apparent throughout the entire proceedings.

Five or six of the persons examined before the Arbitrators were friends of the present member for South Renfrew, and he had no hesitation in saying not only from what he had read of the evidence, but what he saw himself, it was turned into a political affair, and that was the consequence of the award being given as it was. The amount that was claimed was not much, and from what he could learn the claimants asked simply for what they had lost. Their losses direct and indirect would amount to $14,000, whereas they had only claimed $7,000. He did not see that there would be any necessity for appointing a Committee at this late period of the Session, but he trusted the Government would look into the matter, and they would find that right and justice had not been done to these people. He regarded it as the duty of the Government to see that justice was done them.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said this was a motion to obtain a select Committee for the purpose of reviewing the judicial decision of one of the bodies created by Parliament to adjudicate on certain matters. He explained that this question was submitted to the Dominion arbitrators some years ago, they rendered an adverse verdict, and as he was desirous of having justice done in this matter it was recommitted to the arbitrators, there being a change in the meantime in the Board. The arbitrators again came to the same decision and refused to reverse the verdict, the Chairman dissenting from the award. To ask for the appointment of the Committee under these circumstances was what they could scarcely assent to. If it were to become a practice in this House that a judicial decision should be referred to a Committee of Parliament with a view to its reversal or with a view to sustain it, such decisions in themselves would become a farce. While he had given every opportunity of justice being done, it was quite impossible that they could go any further in the matter. If there had been an injustice done, he regretted it very much, but there must be some mode of obtaining a settlement in such cases, and that mode of settlement having been resorted to, these cases could not be brought to Parliament, merely because parties were dissatisfied with the decision.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Renfrew) said that as it was so late in the Session they would only be able to make a partial investigation if a Committee were appointed, and, therefore, he would not feel justified in going into the matter now. However, he did not think the parties had had justice dealt out to them, whether intentionally or otherwise, by the arbitrators. With regard to the statement of the Premier that under no possible circumstances might they review a decision of the official arbitrators, he hoped that between this and the next meeting of the House the Government should have reason, on proper representation, to change the view they had taken on this subject.

The motion was withdrawn.

THE AGRICULTURAL INTEREST.

Mr. ORTON begged to move the adjournment of the House in order to place on record a very important matter in connection with the agricultural interests of the country.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON called attention to the fact that the hour for private business had expired.

Mr. MASSON said the hour for private business had passed ten minutes, and that a motion for adjournment was always in order.

Mr. SPEAKER—I have not called the hon. gentleman to order.

Mr. ORTON, in proceeding, said he desired to call attention to the action taken by the Agricultural Committee. He found by the report of that Committee that an immense amount of testimony had been given by gentlemen, both from Ontario and Quebec, and some from Nova Scotia, setting forth the views of the leading men in those Provinces, in regard to the agricultural interests of Canada. The Printing Committee had seen fit to decline publishing that evidence, which he thought was very weighty, coming as it did from the presidents and other officials of agricultural societies, or from leading members of the grange associations of the country. There was also the evidence of the leading millers of the country, and the reeves of Township Councils, together with the views of large meetings of farmers, called for the purpose of answering questions which had been promulgated with a view to eliciting information necessary for the Committee to become possessed of. He would endeavour to give to the House a digest of that evidence.

Mr. YOUNG rose to a point of order. The hon gentleman was not speaking to the motion of adjournment, and he would ask if this was the proper time to discuss that report.

Mr. SPEAKER ruled that the hon. gentleman had not up to that point transgressed the rules of order.

Mr. ORTON then read the following summary of the evidence to which previous reference has been made:—

He wished to read some of the names of those who had given testimony upon this important question, and he thought it would be conceded that the evidence of these gentlemen was quite as weighty as the evidence taken orally before that Committee, which consisted chiefly of the evidence of Members of Parliament, and only two outside the House from any distance were summoned. One was the Master of the Dominion Grange, and the other the President of the Agricultural Society of Essex. The names were as follows:—

John Shapman, County and Township of Leeds, Gananoque Station; Joshua Legge, Jr., Leeds and Landsdowne, County of Leeds; S. Stanley Howell; Robert Garbutt, President East Hastings A. S.; John Fuller; John A. Kirk, Secretary-Treasurer, Glenelg A. Among the replies was the following from Mr. Joly:—

“QUEBEC, 24th March, 1876.

“G. T. Orton, M.P., Chairman Agr'l. Com.

“MY DEAR DOCTOR,—I only received to-day a printed form of questions from your Committee, in the labours of which I take a deep interest, and hasten to send you my answers. I am afraid they are rather lengthy, but I must acknowledge that I feel some satisfaction in being allowed to give my views on the subject, however little weight they may carry.

“It is a sort of a protest against the accusation of inconsistency which has been brought against me during this Session in the House of Commons and in the Press, for having given up the main plank of the platform of our Parti National. We claimed, above all things, a National Commercial Policy. My friends have been twitted with having given it up, and I was brought in as the leader of the Parti National, but I have not given it up.

“If I remember correctly, you helped me in 1873 to obtain the exemption of duty for the beet-root sugar manufacture, and I hope you will approve my views on the subject.

“I remain, my dear Doctor,

“Yours sincerely,

“H. G. JOLY.”

Mr. Joly's replies were as follows:—

Is it in the interest of the Dominion that we should continue to admit American produce free, while Canadian produce exported over the border has so heavy a tax levied on it?

A.—No, it is against the interest of Canada. I humbly think we should not admit anything free of duty except the raw material required for our manufactures.

What duties, if any, would you impose on flour and various grains and other foreign farm products; or what guiding rule as to such impositions of duties would you advise?

A.—I would respectfully recommend to lay aside all abstract theories and to adopt no other rule but that of our own interest.

What effect has free admission of Indian corn on price of coarse grains in your section of country?

A.—We are not much affected in our part of the country, because unfortunately we do not produce much more than what is required to supply our own wants; but it appears to me that wherever the farmer produces more than he required for his own use, and has a surplus for sale, he must suffer by the competition. It is true the purchasers, among whom the manufacturers and the workmen ought to count for a very large proportion, may buy a little cheaper than the farmer, but as a natural consequence, they will have to sell their goods cheaper to the farmer, whose purchasing powers are diminished. It is not by cheapening everything we can hope to attain national wealth. The dearer we pay, the better for us, provided our paying power keeps pace with the increase of price. Ask a workman which of the two he prefers—flour at $4.50 a barrel and no work or flour at $6. and plenty of work. Farming and industry are a good strong team when they are driven together. Divide them and you have a one horse concern or rather two that will not do anything like the work of a good strong double team.

Do you advise legislation with a view to establishing and promoting in Canada, the cultivation of sugar beet, and the manufacture of sugar therefrom; also cultivation of tobacco and flax? And what legislation would best conduce to the end in view?

A.—The House of Commons in 1873 expressed itself in favour of exemption from duties for a certain number of years of the beet-root sugar manufactured in Canada. I think nothing could be more efficacious for promoting that industry. True that, so far, it has not taken root in the country, but strenuous efforts are made to introduce it. The difficulties are great, greater even than in France, Belgium and Germany, but I trust they will be overcome, and rely especially on that exemption from duties as the greatest encouragement that can be given. As regards tobacco the tax on Canadian grown tobacco yields but a very small revenue while it hinders the cultivation. It ought to be abolished and the tax on imported tobacco increased. We can produce very good tobacco in Canada. I see no reason why ours should be inferior to the Connecticut or Kentucky. All we want is experience, which can only be acquired by practice, and no one will grow tobacco on a large scale with the present tax.

As for flax its cultivation will never be profitable without linen factories, and those who have a practical knowledge of the subject know how difficult it is to work profitably a linen factory in Canada under present circumstances.

Do many of the sons and daughters of farmers in your locality, whose taste or physical capacity lead them to desire other employment than farming, seek employment in the United States? If so, what remedy would you advise?

A.—A great number of people leave our part of the country every year for the factories in the States, and will continue to do so as long as we cannot give them work. Of course our market is too limited to employ them all; but, limited as it is, we could employ a good many more than we do if we kept our market to ourselves, which we ought to do, since the United States refuse to open their market to us.

Does the free importation of American flour, with ut reciprocity, put you at a disadvantage as compared with American competitors? And if so, state reasons.

A.—I think those who have grain for sale must feel it seriously.

Have you found grinding in bond convenient and practicable and fair to all parties concerned, and would you recommend it in case of the imposition of a duty on foreign wheat?

A.—No.

As an ad valorem duty of 20 per cent. imposed in the United States on flour against the fixed specific duty of 20 per cent. per bushel on wheat, generally operates as a discriminatory tariff against the Canadian miller, would the establishment of discriminatory duties by the Parliament of Canada, in your opinion, be advisable?

Mr. ORTON.

A.—Yes.

Do you think the admission of American horded cattle, horses and sheep into Canadian markets at a 10 per cent. duty, while the United States impose a 20 per cent. duty on similar animals sent from Canada, acts injuriously on Canadian farmers? And would you recommend a similar duty to that imposed by the United States?

A.—Yes.

Can the Canadian farmer raise profitably all the grain required to fatten his stock, or will it pay him better to buy Indian corn?

A.—With a good system of farming we ought to produce enough to fatten our cattle.

What articles produced on the farm require a home market for their sale?

A.—All bulky articles.

What changes, if any, are required in legislation to make agriculture a more desirable and profitable occupation for the people?

A.—Give up all abstract notions and study the real interest of the farmer and manufacturer; they ought to go together.

Mr. ORTON, having read this statement, withdrew his motion.

THE BOURGOIN-LAMONTAGNE CONTRACT.

The House then resumed consideration of item 11, in Committee of Supply.

Mr. DESJARDINS observed that the prices were so nearly alike that it was difficult at first sight to say whether Mr. Martin or Messrs. Bourgoin and Lamontagne should have had the contract; but, nevertheless, to the former should have been confided the construction of the building. If we were to admit the principles laid down by the Hon. Premier that such works as the foundation of a building must be considered as an extra work, it would lead to many abuses, because it would always be easy for a man abiding by his political feelings to deprive a tenderer of his rights in a contract. In this particular case the Hon. Premier admitted that Bourgoin and Lamontagne had at first refused to accept the contract; that Martin was called for; that he accepted the undertaking according to tender, and yet we find that not only are Bourgoin and Lamontagne intrusted with the contract, but that they are even admitted to modify their tender so as to put themselves in a like position as Martin.

STEAM COMMUNICATION TO PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Item No. 15, providing the sum of $25,000 for the cost of building and equipping a steam boat to maintain communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland during winter months, in accordance with the terms of Union, being taken up, Hon. Mr. BLANCHET asked for information in respect to the conditions of the contract made with Mr. Sewell in this connection.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE regretted that he was unable to comply with the request at the moment; he would do so, however, to-morrow.

Mr. MASSON—Will the boat cost $55,000.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—That includes everything.

Mr. MASSON—Is the boat purchased from Mr. Sewell?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I stated distinctly on Saturday last, that no contract was as yet signed, but that it would be signed in a few days.

Hon. Mr. BLANCHET—Has any report, or survey of the vessel which is to be sold by Mr. Sewell, been made for and to the Government.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I do not think that the Government want any such report. There is nothing up as yet but the frame of the vessel, which is, moreover, to be built under the eye of Lloyd's officer, and of an inspector to be appointed by the Government.

Hon. Mr. BLANCHET—Was the price paid to Mr. Sewell, without any report having been made to the Department?

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—The price is not paid.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The price is $50,000.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—Is the model of the boat such as is suitable for the purpose; and has there been a specific statement of the cost received?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The price will be $50,000, and the model has been specially designed for the purpose in view.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—Have you a report on that point.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I presume that we have the ordinary report of the departmental officer at Quebec, and of the Deputy Minister, Mr. Smith. I do not know that any report has been made by a shipbuilder; that is a matter of detail to be attended to afterwards.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—Neither one nor the other of the officers named know the first thing about the suitability or unsuitability of a model. The points are—first, whether the contract has been signed, or any sum fixed, and secondly, whether the model is reported to be fit for the service contemplated. I ask the Premier whether he has finally closed the contract; and whether he is in possession of a report, not alone as to the extent to which the work has progressed, but as to the capacity and room allowed in the frame for the necessary engines, equipment, and machinery; and whether the model shows that the vessel will be suitable for the work required. He should have the advice of able and experienced men in this matter like Lloyd's Surveyor, or practical shipbuilders of Quebec, and not of a departmental officer, and of the Deputy Minister.

Mr. BOWELL—Then the telegram which the hon. member for Frontenac read the other day, and which the Minister of Finance said was not true, was literally true.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—It was not.

Mr. BOWELL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—It was not.

Mr. BOWELL—The telegram was to the effect that a contract had been entered into, and when the question was asked, whether the statement was correct, the reply was that we had better look to better sources for information, certainly leaving the impression that not only did no contract exist, but also that there was no truth in the telegram at all.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—Then the statement was not correct, for no agreement at the time had been made.

Hon. Mr. BLANCHET—Has Mr. Sewell given any security for the due performance of the conditions of the contract?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Of course he has.

Hon. Mr. ROBITAILLE—I think that this will be a useless expenditure as we have an excellent steamer called the Glendon, which would be useful for the purposes in view, and which is fit for no other purpose.

The item was agreed to.

INDIAN ANNUITIES.

On item No. 18, appropriating $11,000 to bring up the annuities payable under the Robinson Treaty to the Chippewas of Lake Huron and Superior from 96 cents to $4 per head,

Mr. BLAKE explained that under this treaty the Dominion was responsible for the payment of the money as it was one of the debts of the old Province of Canada. The money would be first paid by the Dominion, and afterwards it would be adjusted by the Provinces of Quebec and Ontario.

Mr. BOWELL said in connection with this he desired to call the attention of the House to some money that should have been paid to the Mohawks settled on the Bay of Quinte. He had called the attention of the late Administration to it, and the then Minister of Justice reported in favour of the payment of the money. Before the clergy reserves were set apart certain concessions in the Township of Tyendinaga were surrendered by these Indians to the Government. The proceeds of that sale were to be invested and the interest paid by way of annuity to the tribe, and was paid on certain portions of the land. When the clergy reserves were set apart a portion of these Indian lands, as well as Government lands, were taken for the clergy reserves. The clergy reserves had been sold and the whole amount had been put into the general fund. The sum realized on account of that portion of the clergy reserves which had been Indian lands should have been put into the Indian fund.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said he was not able to discuss the subject to which his attention had been called, but if the hon. gentleman would give him a memorandum in regard to the matter he would look into it.

The item was agreed to.

THE ARCHIVES.

On item No. 29 of the Estimates, appropriating $3,000 to meet expenses in connection with the care of Archives,

Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN called the attention of the House that there were important documents, both in France and in England, in relation to the history of this country, under the French and the English regime. He desired to know whether the Government desired to have any of these documents copied, and observed that the expenditure of a small sum of money for the purpose, for one or two years, would considerably enrich our sources of information on the subject.

Mr. BABY said there was a large amount of correspondence of a historical character in the British Museum which should be copied. The United States had been allowed to copy all the documents in the British Museum in relation to their history, he trusted that the Government would grant a small sum for that purpose.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the subject was an interesting one, and he could imagine that both in the British Museum and the French Archives interesting documents with reference to the early history of this country might be found. A sum voted for this purpose would be well employed. A portion of the vote under consideration would no doubt be at the disposal of the Government, and might be used in this direction, and if it were found insufficient, hon. gentlemen would not probably object if they took a few hundred dollars out of the amount voted for unforeseen expenditures.

The item was carried.

THE DAWSON ROAD.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) said before the Committee rose, he desired to call the attention of the House to a statement made by the hon. member for Terrebonne in relation to Mr. Carpenter of the Dawson road. That hon.

gentleman had said that Mr. Carpenter had paid the Superintendent of the American Line to take emigrants to Manitoba by their line in preference to taking them over the Canadian line. He (Mr. Smith) had telegraphed to Mr. Kittson of St. Paul, Minn., as follows:—

“Asserted here Carpenter, Dawson road, paid you to carry emigrants rather than take them himself. Is this true.”

In answer to this telegram he received the following reply:—

“St. Paul, Minn., 11th March.

“To Hon. Donald A. Smith, M. P., Ottawa :

“I was under impression that such an arrangement was made at Winnipeg, but on consulting our Superintendent, Halcomb, I find that it is not the case.” (Signed)

“N. W. KITTSON.

He regarded it as a matter of justice to Mr. Carpenter to mention this, and no doubt it was exactly the true state of the case.

Mr. MASSON did not think he ever spoke of an arrangement being made with any company. His information was that Mr. Carpenter paid a certain sum, $11 he believed, to induce emigrants not to go by the Dawson road, and to go through the United States. He believed that the hon. gentleman could get information on that point in his own constituency.

Mr. TROW said this telegram bore out what he had already stated. The contractor could have no object whatever in inducing emigrants to go by another line when they were a source of profit to himself.

The Committee rose and reported.

THE MENONITES.

On the motion for concurrence in the item $15,000, part of unexpended balance of 1874-5 for immigration and quarantine,

Mr. YOUNG said he had seen it reported that in another place a distinguished gentleman hailing from Toronto had indulged in remarks condemnatory of the introduction of the Menonites into Manitoba and the North-West Territories. Those remarks were calculated to give rise to fears in the minds of the Menonites and prevent them from settling in our country. He was amazed to find such language used in such a quarter. He knew, as a matter of fact, from experience, there was no class of settlers more desirable than those very Menonites. They were a most industrious, thrifty and honest people, and made the very best settlers. The objection was urged that they were settling in townships contiguous to each other. He could see no objection to that. It was done with other classes of immigrants with the best results. But the main objection to the Menonites was that they were granted the privilege of exemption from bearing arms. It was because they wished for such an exemption that they had emigrated from Europe, and they had a special agreement with our Government securing to them that privilege. Although it was secured to them, there were many of the young people who held different views, and in case of war it was probable they would take up arms in defence of their homes. It was most unfortunate that such a question should be raised. If any doubts were created on this point, it would prevent the immigration of those valuable settlers. The members from Manitoba would admit that the influx of Menonites into this Province had done much to relieve the distress prevailing last year by the large expenditures they had made in purchasing the necessaries of life. His own German constituents, who had never seen and did not know them, had taken such a deep interest in those people that they had generously offered to become security to the extent of $100,000 for the repayment of the money advanced to them by the Government. The statements made in another place were too important to be allowed to pass without a protest from some one on the floor of this House. He desired to state what he believed to be the general feeling throughout the Dominion, that these people should be encouraged to settle in our country. If there were 100,000 of them in the North-West, they would soon make our waste lands blossom like a rose.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) had much pleasure in endorsing all that the hon. member for Waterloo had said with regard to the Menonites in the North-West. From the moment of their arrival they had shown themselves a useful and industrious people. Their presence had sensibly affected the trade of Winnipeg, largely increasing the business of the merchants. The Menonites had shown themselves to be a well conducted people. He had not heard of a single case of disorder among them since they came to the country. As to their objection to bearing arms, he trusted there would never be any necessity for it, but if it should come, they lived on the frontier and would be likely to help to defend themselves. No better people had been brought into the country and no settlers could be more desirable.

The item was concurred in.

THE PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Last year before the House adjourned the Government asked authority to place that portion of the Pacific Railroad extending from Rat Portage to Cross Lake, under contract. We expected at that time the re-survey would be completed in time to do so during the season. It took the whole summer to accomplish that and we are not yet in a position to invite tenders. I have again to ask the House for the authority we obtained last year. We have had the contract ratified from Fort William to the neighborhood of Shebandowan, a distance of 45 miles. As I said a few nights ago in the House, we diverge from that line some 23 or 24 miles from Fort William, so as to reach the North-West Angle of Lac des Mille Lacs, from which we proceed in a straight direction, and we have the survey completed to Rat Portage. I want authority to place that portion under contract. We offered for the contractors a distance equivalent to that under the former contract in the new line chosen from the point of departure on the line from Shebandowan. This they have declined, as they have a right to do, and we want authority to accomplish this. I give notice of the following motion:—
 “That the Government be authorized “to enter into contracts during the “Recess with parties sending in the “lowest available tenders for the works “of construction of the following portions of the Canada Pacific Railway,

Mr. SMITH.

“viz: From Fort William westward “towards Lac de Mille Lac and the “crossing of Steel River from Rat “Portage to Cross Lake.”

Mr. CURRIER—Is that intended to make an unbroken line, or is any portion of the route to be by water?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—This is the main line. It will be all rail when it is built, but it will pass by the lake in the meantime, but will not go an inch off the main line. We do not propose to place any under contract but these two ends in the meantime, because we hope to have an arrangement made a year hence that we can get contractors to take the line.

The House adjourned at 10.40 p. m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, April 11, 1876.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Two o'clock.

FEEES ON PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. BLAIN moved that the fees on the Bill to incorporate the United Empire Loan Company be refunded, it having been withdrawn in consequence of the rough handling it had received in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said he would not oppose the motion, but he did not approve of the principle of returning fees for Private Bills withdrawn under such circumstances.

Mr. YOUNG said it was asserted that many persons applied for charters of this kind for speculative purposes merely. He thought care should be taken to prevent this, and to see that they were not granted to men of straw.

Mr. PLUMB thought care should be exercised to see that those charters did not fall into the hands of parties who merely sold them for what they would bring. He hoped the suggestion of the hon. member for Chateauguay, to employ an expert to look through those Bills and put them in proper shape, would be adopted.

Mr. BLAIN held it was the duty of the House to pay no regard to any man that applied for a charter, but to grant every application that was properly made when all necessary formalities had been complied with.

The motion was carried. •

THE PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE moved that the Government be authorized to enter into contracts during the Recess with parties sending in the lowest available tenders for the works of construction of the following portions of the Canada Pacific Railway, viz:—From Fort William westward towards Lac de Mille Lac and the crossing of Steel River from Rat Portage to Cross Lake.

Mr. THOMPSON (Cariboo) asked whether it would not be advisable in making this suggestion the hon. gentleman should also include the western portion of the road? It might be advisable before next Session to do some work there.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he had already stated the only thing that prevented them having a general tender asked for, was their inability to present anything to tenderers in British Columbia. Although the line for some distance was presumably located permanently, an instrumental survey had not been made. A vote had been taken for the purpose, so that, if possible, they could have a portion of the work commenced during the coming season. It would be asking authority they had no probability of exercising until late in the fall when they could submit the tenders to Parliament as provided for in 1874, if the hon. gent.'s suggestion were acted upon.

Sir. JOHN A. MACDONALD did not see why the hon. gentleman did not ask this authority when the House was full.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he had mentioned, in making his explanation, that he intended to ask for this authority. It was put off in order that they could get all the information possible.

Mr. CURRIER thought it was a great pity the Government should propose to expend money on this route between Thunder Bay and Fort Garry. A land and water line could never compete with the all-rail route between Duluth and Fort Garry. This was a matter every practical man must understand. Therefore, he thought it would be much better to delay expenditure on that road until the time arrived when an all-rail route could be constructed to Fort Garry.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE replied that it was to be an all-rail line from end to end.

Mr. CURRIER—I understood the hon. gentleman the other night to say that it was not to be so.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Not at all; I never said so.

The motion was carried.

THE JESUITS' BARRACKS.

Mr. MASSON enquired of the Minister of Public Works when the papers for which he had asked, with reference to the Jesuits' Barracks of Quebec, and their transfer from the Local to the Federal Government will be brought down. They should have been brought down ere this, he remarked; and it was a matter of importance, that when this was done, they should be printed.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE stated that it was quite impossible as yet to bring them down. The last communication from the Government of the Province of Quebec on this subject was dated the 5th of April; and this they had not had time to consider. They might bring down the papers as they were, but the correspondence would be entirely incomplete. He had no objection, however, to do so.

Mr. MASSON—Do I understand that we are not to have these papers at all while the correspondence is going on?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—We cannot bring an incomplete correspondence before the House.

Mr. MASSON—The Premier will remember that my motion was carried, and under the circumstances, he is bound to bring down the correspondence up to date.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I stated explicitly when the motion was carried that I was unable at the time to say what correspondence existed on the subject, and that I could only bring down what was consistent with the public interests. I guarded myself carefully on that point. The hon. gentleman can see any of the papers he desires; but I think it would be absurd to place an incomplete correspondence before the House.

Mr. MASSON—It can be retained for a century if that course be pursued. The question of title that is at issue can only be decided between the Imperial and Federal Governments, but I did not ask for correspondence that had passed between these Administrations. There can be no secret to be concealed, and I hope that when the correspondence is brought down it will be printed.

CONCURRENCE.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT moved concurrence in the reports of Committee of Supply, and the first item respecting fisheries being taken up, Hon. Mr. MITCHELL remarked that he had the day previous called the attention of the Government and more particularly of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, to the state of the case, with relation to the fishermen of New Brunswick. He had made a proposition which his hon. friend had kindly consented to consider, and he would like to hear what his hon. friend had to say on the subject.

Hon. Mr. SMITH replied that the matter had been under consideration. He had also consulted with the Minister of Justice, who had no objection to the acceptance of the proposition in question. It was to be understood, however, that convenient despatch would be made in this connection with regard to the submittal of the case.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL believed that it was in the interest of the Government and of the fishermen that a case should not be chosen until he had had an opportunity for visiting his constituents, and making personally an explanation to them of the difficulties of the position which both they and the Government occupied. He thought that if this was done, and if the view entertained by the Government on the one hand were contrasted with their claims, this would lead to a proposition that would bring about a more easy reconciliation of present differences than would be otherwise possible. He did not think that he could pay a visit to his county for this purpose until some time during the present summer, but he would endeavour to do so as soon as possible, and secure the nomination of some person authorized to act for the fishermen, to prepare a case for submission to the Minister of Justice, and his hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, for their assent, concurrence, amendment or suggestions, prior to being laid before the Judges of the Supreme Court. He fancied that this would be satisfactory to his hon. friend.

Hon. Mr. SMITH had certainly understood that the hon. gentleman spoke on behalf of the fishermen, and that the latter would undoubtedly assent to the terms of the proposition.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL replied that on the day previous he had stated that he had visited his county last year; that by request he had attended public meetings in four leading fishing districts; that he had been asked to give his advice and counsel, and that he had complied; that he had no positive authority to make a distinct proposition, and also that he had no doubt whatever that the proposal he had made, being as it was in the public interest, and in the interest of peace and order, right and justice, would be accepted by the fishermen when matters were explained. He had never pretended that he was authorized to make any proposition; but he did feel confident, from what had occurred between the fishermen and himself, that any proposal he might make would be accepted by his constituents. He requested his hon. friend not to be too hasty, but to afford him opportunity for going down and placing the facts before the fishermen. Under these circumstances he entertained no doubt whatever as to the acceptance of the proposition in question.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—I understand that this is a question of law. The fishermen have some rights, the hon. gentleman asserts, and this is to lead to a final termination of the question.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—I did not assert it—the fishermen assert it.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—The hon. gentleman has raised a storm which he is now prepared to calm. He told the fishermen to assert it. I understand that it is a simple question of law which it is proposed to refer to the Supreme Court.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—It is not a simple question of law which is to be referred to the Supreme Court, and I wish my hon. friend to understand that I did not rise a storm which I now desire to calm. I never raised a storm; and further, I never did assert that the fishermen had rights, but that I believed they had rights. Being a layman I offer no legal opinion.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—I would call attention to the correspondence which passed between us, in which he asserts, most positively, that the fishermen have rights with which the Government should not all interfere. I have no objection to giving the hon. gentleman a reasonable time. I suppose that a month or two will be all that is necessary; I do not want any unnecessary delay to take place, as I desire the question to be set at rest.

The item was concurred in.

On item No. 52, appropriating $3,000 to meet expenses in connection with the care of Archives,

Hon. Mr. POPE said he was most anxious that something should be done in regard to the archives. There were many documents of great importance in England and France which ought to be copied, and they could be copied as easily and as cheaply this year or next as they could 10 years hence. The sum in the estimates was not sufficient to do this, and he would strongly urge a larger appropriation for the copying of these documents.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he had informed the House on the previous day that a considerable portion of the $3,000 would be available for that purpose, and he also intimated that if that money was not found sufficient that they might supplement it from the vote for unforeseen expenses. He understood that the Minister of Agriculture intended to have some of the documents copied. It was not, however, desirable to give indiscriminate authority to copy everything relating to Canada.

The item was concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS.

On motion of Mr. CARTWRIGHT, the House went into Committee of Ways and Means.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT then moved the following:—

“Resolved, That towards making good the supply granted to Her Majesty for the year ending 30th June, 1876, the sum of $1,139,338.28 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

“Resolved, That towards making good the supply granted to Her Majesty for the financial year, ending 30th June, 1877, the sum of $19,486,602 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.”

The resolutions were adopted.

The Committee rose and reported the resolutions without amendment.

The resolutions were read the second time and concurred in.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT introduced the Supply Bill founded on the resolutions.

The Bill was read the second and third time, and passed.

The House then adjourned.

EVENING SESSION.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at 9 p.m.

A Message was received from the Senate, agreeing to the following Bills, with amendments, viz:—

No. 76. To amend “The Insolvent Act of 1875.”

On motion of Mr. Blake, the said amendments were concurred in.

No. 30. To amend and consolidate the Laws respecting Indians.

On motion of Mr. Laird the said amendments were concurred in.

No. 27. To incorporate "The Scottish Canadian Loan Company."

On motion of Mr. Cameron (Cardwell), the said amendments were read the first time.—Further consideration to-morrow.

No. 75. To incorporate "The England and Canada Mortgage Security Company."

The said amendments were read the first time.—Further consideration to-morrow.

The Bill (No. 100) from the Senate, intituled: "An Act to provide for the examination of witnesses on oath by Committees of the Senate and House of Commons, in certain cases," was read the second time, considered in Committee of the Whole, reported, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie it was resolved, that when the House adjourns, it do stand adjourned until to-morrow, at 12 o'clock, noon.

The House adjourned at 10:15 o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, April 12, 1876.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at 12 o'clock noon.

TRUST AND LOAN COMPANIES.

A message was received from the Senate informing the House they had made certain amendments to a number of Bills to incorporate Trust and Loan companies.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said if the companies had no objections to these amendments, the Government had none. He disapproved, however, of one amendment which extended the time for the sale of real estate from five to ten years. He wished it to be understood that in the general act which the Government would introduce next Session they would adhere to the five years limit.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said it was with the very greatest doubt and hesitation the Committee or himself had allowed these companies to take power to borrow money on deposit in conjunction with the power to borrow on debentures. He wished it to be very distinctly understood that the Government did not hold themselves in any way pledged to concur, in future legislation, in that double borrowing power. The matter required careful consideration, but he could see great risk and danger in the powers attempted to be exercised.

Mr. PLUMB trusted that all such companies would be brought under the provisions of a general law, enabling the Committee to deal with all bills on the same basis.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE presumed that the various bills in question had better be finally read, as the Government had no objection to any of the amendments.

They were accordingly read the third time, and passed.

THE OFFICIAL REPORTS.

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON moved the adoption of the report of the Committee charged with the management of the debates.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON—I do not think that notice has been given of that motion, and at this stage of the Session I must take upon myself the unamiable responsibility of objecting to any motion being put of which notice has not been given—at all events, with reference to this important subject.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—Surely the hon. gentleman will not oppose the Government in this matter.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON—This is not a Government measure.

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON—If this report is rejected there will be no Hansard next year.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON—That is precisely what I desire.

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON—Then the hon. gentleman must take the responsibility.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON—I will take the responsibility.

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON—I cannot make the motion, if there is an objection raised.

Mr. SPEAKER—The motion is not in order.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—I hope that my hon. friend, in a spirit of fair play, will withdraw his objection.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON—On this subject I have made up my mind unalterably; and nothing will induce me to withdraw my objection at the present stage. My deliberate opinion is, that a large majority of the members of this House are opposed to the continuance of the Hansard. The subject has been postponed until only a mere handful of members is present. I know the frequency with which important matters are brought up at this period, and if I am here to-day, it is because this is the case. I take the responsibility, sitting on this side of the House,—which I often took, when on the other side—of insisting on the observance of the rules respecting matters I deem of sufficient importance to justify that course.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—I regret the fact that a disposition is shown to strangle this infant child of the Printing Committee. I am not aware that the report is adverse to the continuance of the Hansard. The reports may not have been as copious in reproducing speeches as some hon. gentlemen might have desired; but I would only say this—the managers of it have very fairly done what they could to give a correct representation of what has occurred in this House.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON—That is quite true. The work has been very well done; I do not complain of that at all.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—If there is anything defective it is to be found in the carrying out of the details of the system, which we should rather try to improve. The hon. gentleman states that owing to the thin attendance we should not now deal with so important a matter; but Parliament has already sanctioned the establishment of the Hansard. Two years ago we voted a sum of money for the purpose; and we did the same thing last year. Therefore, if there is any endeavour to obtain a snatch judgment on the question, it is not shown by those who wish to continue the system, but by those who wish to prevent the carrying out of so useful an institution—an institution of which I am decidedly in favour. I believe that we ought to continue it, and improve on it; and in the interest of good Government, that a true and faithful record should be had of the statements of hon. gentlemen on either side of the House. I cannot imagine any other reason for the attempt to kill it off, than a wish to prevent the existence of such a record. As to the expense, I do not think that the country should complain of it, for it is a mere bagatelle compared with the usefulness of the Hansard, which enables hon. members authoritatively—if the occasion presents itself—to quote the hon. member for Chateauguay versus the hon. member for Chateauguay, or the hon. member for Northumberland versus the hon. member for Northumberland.

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON—When I discovered that the hon. member was opposed to the consideration of the report, I endeavoured to obtain a meeting of the Committee, which I think has the right to continue the system under the existing Order of the House; but I was unable to secure a quorum. Under the circumstances, we can have no Hansard at all.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—The expression of the House, communicated to the Committee, is sufficient.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON—There is no House.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—The Government represent the House.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON—I believe that the majority of the House are opposed to the continuation of the Hansard. If I were not of that opinion, certainly I would not assume the responsibility of taking the course I am now pursuing. With reference to the manner in which the reporters have discharged their duties, I have no fault whatever to find. I think that these duties have been fairly and faithfully performed. I strove with others for many years to have this system tried. It has been tried; and to my judgment, it is a failure. We are better without than with it; and I think that this is the present sense of the House. Those who are in favour of it ought to have moved earlier in the matter. They had abundant time, and this is one of the Standing Committees of the House. They have always the ear of the Chamber; and there would have been no difficulty in bringing up the report at an earlier period when the benches were filled. If this had been done, I should have explained my views, and acquiesced with the decision of the majority if adverse to my opinions with the best possible grace.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—Why did you not take the legitimate way to ascertain what the opinion of the House really was; you may be wrong?

Hon. Mr. HOLTON—It was not for me to take the initiative. I repeat that I take the perhaps unamiable responsibility of enforcing the rules of the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—The hon. gentleman from Chateauguay has pronounced a most severe censure on the Committee to which this subject was relegated. The hon. gentleman has pointed out that this Committee wilfully allowed this very important subject to pass over until the last moment, when everybody must know it was too late to come to any conclusion on it. It was the duty of that Committee not only to see that the Hansard was attended to for this Session, but that some policy should be arrived at for its continuance next Session. My hon. friend says he feels that the majority of the House are against the Hansard. I beg leave to differ with him, and to say I believe that when the House meets next Session the majority will be found to be in favour of its continuance. The country is in favour of it, and will not be willing to give it up. This will be a retrograde step in respect of a most important subject. I am convinced, now the country has had the advantage of an official record, it will insist on its continuance. The people have a right to have a report of the debates of their representatives which has some official character, and which is not tainted by the supposed political proclivities of the different newspapers which would otherwise be the sole repositories of the proceedings of this House. It would be a great mistake, an abnegation of the only means the House have, as representatives of the people, of obtaining a legitimate influence with the country, to stop these reports. In England the Hansard is sustained by private enterprise, but I believe if it were found that this were not sufficient to keep it up, the people of England would call upon the House to grant a sum of money for the purpose of having an official report of the proceedings of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL.

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON said they never supposed the report of the Committee would have been opposed. It was thought that by making a change in the organization of the staff they would get a better report. When he saw the danger that it would be opposed, he tried to get a quorum of the Committee together in order to continue the existing arrangement, but failed. He hoped the hon. gentleman would not oppose the motion.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON—I do object.

Hon. Mr. POPE thought he could convince the hon. member for Chateauguay that he was wrong in stating that the majority of the House was opposed to the Hansard. The hon. gentleman said he did not like to take the responsibility in this small House of allowing this thing to go on. He wished to assure the hon. gentleman that he had accepted a much graver responsibility. The House had decided that they should have the Hansard, and it was not right for that small House to reverse the decision. He was sure his hon. friend was wrong in taking the responsibility he did at the present time. Although he (Mr. Pope) was one of those opposed to the establishment of the Hansard, he would not do anything to prevent the carrying out of the expressed will of the House.

The point of order was sustained, and the House adjourned at 1.15 o'clock until 3 o'clock, at which hour the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod entered and informed the Speaker that His Excellency the Governor General requested the presence of the House in the Senate Chamber, to which the members repaired with the usual ceremony.

To these Bills the Royal Assent was pronounced by the Clerk of the House in the words following:

"In Her Majesty's name His Excellency the Governor General doth assent to these Bills."

THE SUPPLY BILL.

Then the Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons addressed His Excellency the Governor General, as followeth:

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY:

The Commons of Canada have voted the Supplies required to enable the Government to defray the expenses of the Public Service.

In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Excellency a Bill intituled: "An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money required for defraying certain expenses of the Public Service, for the financial years ending respectively the 30th June, 1876, and 30th of June, 1877, and for other purposes relating to the Public Service," to which I humbly request Your Excellency's assent.

To this Bill, the Clerk of the House, by His Excellency's command, did thereupon say:

"In Her Majesty's name, His Excellency the Governor General thanks Her loyal subjects, accepts their benevolence, and assents to this Bill."

THE SPEECH.

Then His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to deliver the following speech.

*Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :
Gentlemen of the House of Commons :*

I thank you for the care and deliberation with which you have discharged the duties that have devolved upon you during the Session.

The Bill you have passed relative to the management of Indian affairs and the gradual enfranchisement of Indians will not only be useful as a consolidation of existing Statutes, but will afford further evidence of the interest taken by the people of Canada in the welfare of their Indian fellow-countrymen. It is interesting to know that many of its provisions were suggested by the Indian Councils of the older Provinces.

It is my intention during the recess to make treaty arrangements with the Indian Tribes in the Western Saskatchewan country for the extinguishment of their title, and thereby open another large tract of fertile territory for settlement and cultivation.

The formation of the new District of Keewatin in the Eastern part of the North-West country, and the progress made in opening up railway and telegraphic communication to the interior will, with the improvements effected in our land system, further prepare the way for the rapid settlement of those vast regions, and will, at no distant day, materially contribute to the trade, and extend the prestige of the Dominion. I am glad to be able to say that we have now over 700 miles of telegraph in operation west of Red River.

The amendments made to the laws relating to elections for the House of Commons will, I trust, have the result of obtaining an unbiassed expression of the opinion of the electors in selecting their representatives.

The measures you have passed for the purpose of securing a careful return of Criminal, Insolvency, and Railway Statistics will, I doubt not, be of essential service in promoting important objects, as well as in providing much needed information on each of these subjects.

Gentlemen of the House Commons :

I thank you for the supplies you have voted for the Public Service. I shall not fail to consider the clause you have attached to the vote for the works of construction on the Pacific Railway.

I am glad that a wise economy obviated the necessity of imposing any fresh taxation on the people; and I trust that increased commercial prosperity will justify your confidence in the future.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

I regret I am unable to announce that any further progress has been made with the arrangements for the settlement of the compensation to be paid for our Fisheries, in accordance with the provisions of the Treaty of Washington.

I trust that on your return to your respective homes you may find the promise awaiting you of a prosperous season, and that your labours out of Session may be as useful and beneficial as they have been during your attendance in Parliament.

Then the Honourable the Speaker of the Senate said:—

Honourable Gentleman of the Senate ;

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

It is His Excellency the Governor General's will and pleasure that this Parliament be prorogued until Monday, the twenty-second day of May next, to be here holden, and this Parliament is accordingly prorogued until Monday, the twenty-second day of May next.

ERRATUM.

In the report of the Debate, in Committee of Supply, on item 77, $30,000 for pay and maintenance of Dominion Force in Manitoba, page 722, second column, and between the third and fourth paragraphs, the following remarks of Hon. Mr. Tupper were accidentally omitted:—

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said the present Government, by issuing advertisements to the effect that those who enlisted and served for two years would be entitled to 160 acres of land, and drawing no distinction between those who enlisted for the first time and those who rejoined, were guilty of getting men to serve under false pretences.

Motion—That the House go into Committee of Supply, (Hon. Mr.
Cartwright), 124.

Debate thereon adjourned, 288.

Debate resumed, 306.

"Resolved, That this House in maintaining the policy adopted by the present and past Governments in limiting the rate of duties upon the importation of these classes of articles which are produced in the country, to the extent required to meet the wants of the revenue, fully appreciates the national benefits arising from the degree of protection to the existing manufacturing industries of the Dominion afforded under that system, but observes with regret that the fluctuations in price, resulting from the uncertain condition of foreign markets, affecting the Canadian markets, and incapable of being foreseen by the Canadian manufacturers, exposed our manufacturing interests to unfair competition, and this House, while now ready to record its approval of the general policy of the present Administration, is nevertheless of opinion, that the said manufacturing interests deserve the continued fostering care of Parliament, and that the time has arrived when the Government of the Dominion should inform the Imperial Government that the Parliament of Canada deems it necessary to revive some of the features of a former policy by imposing differential duties; and to indicate, further, that in order to meet the difficulties against which Canadian manufactures are struggling, and in the general interests of the Canadian public, and to bring the British and foreign manufacturer on nearer terms of equality in the Canadian market, this House would be prepared to approve of any measure to be submitted to them by the Administration whereby a rate of not less than ten per cent. should be added to the existing importation tariff against such articles of foreign manufacture, of which the same classes are manufactured in the Dominion by way of difference to that extent in favour of like classes of productions of the Mother Country."—Mr. Irving, 31.

Motion in amendment to the amendment—

"That all words after "that" be struck out, and that it be Resolved, That this House deeply regrets to learn from the speech of the Hon. Minister of Finance on Friday last, that the Government has not proposed to this House a policy of protection to our various and important manufacturing industries; and that the large amount of capital now invested in these industries, and their present depressed condition, render such a policy necessary to restore them to a condition of prosperity. (Ruled out of order.)—Mr. Workman—318.

Mr. Langevin*, 175.
- Motion—
 "That the Honourable Hector Louis Langevin, the Member representing the electoral district of Charlevoix in this House, having stated from his place in this House that he is credibly informed and believes that he can establish by satisfactory evidence that the Honourable Joseph Edouard Cauchon, the Member representing in this House the electoral district of Quebec Centre, and the President of the Privy Council of Canada, was instrumental in hiring, or causing to be hired, a number of men who are employed in summer as members of the River Police at Quebec, and in sending them or causing them to be sent to the electoral district of Charlevoix during the recent election of a Member to represent that district in the House of Commons; and that the said men were headed or accompanied by one Edmund Trudelle, an officer or employé of the Customs Department at Quebec, and that the whole or a large portion of said body of men were conveyed to said district in vehicles, the cost of such hire being charged to the said Honourable Joseph Edouard Cauchon, who has promised to pay, or directed or caused the same to be paid, the said men so headed or accompanied being sent to said electoral district to interfere illegally in said election, to disturb said election, and thus to deprive the electors or a portion of the electors of said district of their freedom as such electors; and the said Honourable Joseph Edouard Cauchon having denied these charges; it is ordered that the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections do enquire into all the circumstances connected with the above charges, with power to send for persons, papers and records, and with instructions to report in full the evidence taken before them, and the proceedings of said Committee on the subject"—Hon. Mr. Langevin, 737.

- Motion in amendment—
“That all the words after ‘that’ in the original resolution be struck out and the following inserted instead thereof: ‘That the early revision of the tariff is very desirable, and that a revised tariff discriminating to a greater degree than the existing tariff in favor of home industries and manufactures, but not unduly stimulating one section of the country or one industry against other sections and industries, would be productive of great benefit to the whole Dominion.’”—Mr. DeCosmos, 125.
- The amendment of Mr. DeCosmos having been withdrawn, it was moved in amendment—“That the word ‘financial’ be struck out of the resolution, and the words ‘manufacturing and commercial’ be inserted in lieu thereof.”—Mr. Blain, 143.
- After debate this amendment was agreed to, 148.
- It was moved in amendment to the resolution as amended (by Hon. Mr. Tupper) that the word “Mining” be inserted, which was also agreed to, 149.

 Motion in amendment—
 "That the Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be resolved that whereas this House did on the 13th day of February, 1878, vote an Address to Her Majesty praying that a full amnesty should be granted to all persons connected with the North-West trouble, for all acts committed by them during the said troubles, saving only Louis Riel, A. D. Lepine and W. D. O'Donoghue, and that a like amnesty should be granted to L. Riel and A. D. Lepine, conditional on five years' banishment from Her Majesty's Dominion, thereby excluding W. D. O'Donoghue from the benefits of such amnesty—and whereas the said W. D. O'Donoghue has since written the following letter, &c. In the opinion of this House the Government should at one institute a thorough enquiry into statements contained in said letter, in order that justice may be done in the premises."—Mr. Costigan, 797.

 "That it is expedient to authorize the Government to make a temporary disposition of the iron rails as they are removed from the Government Railways by loaning them to companies constructing railways which may be regarded as feeders to the Government Lines, such rails to be returned weight for weight to the Government stores at the junction of such lines when taken up."—Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, 1139.

On the motion for concurrence in the foregoing resolution, it was moved in amendment,—

“That the resolution be not now concurred in, but that it be referred back to the Committee of Whole for the purpose of amending the same so as to provide that the iron rails moved from the Government railways shall be sold to the highest bidder, after due notice shall have been given of such intention to sell the same.”—Mr. Bowell, 1153.

Motion—

“That the House go into Committee of Supply”—Hon. Mr. Cartwright, 872.

Motion in amendment—

“That the Speaker do now leave the Chair, but that it be—

“Resolved, That in 1871 the public faith and honor of Canada were pledged in the most solemn manner to British Columbia, to secure the commencement, simultaneously, within two years from the date of Union, of the construction of a railway from the Pacific towards the Rocky Mountains, and from such point as might be selected east of the Rocky Mountains towards the Pacific, to connect the seaboard of British Columbia with the railway system of Canada; and further, to secure the completion of such railway within ten years from the date of Union.

“That owing to divers causes the construction of the said railway was not commenced in British Columbia or elsewhere at the time agreed upon.

“That in 1874 the Government of Canada applied to British Columbia for, and afterward secured and accepted, through the intervention and upon the recommendation of Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for the Colonies, an agreement for the relaxation of the railway clauses of the terms of Union; and the public faith and honour of Canada now stand pledged to carry the said agreement respecting the said relaxation of the railway clause of the terms of Union, forthwith into operation.

“That notwithstanding the public faith and honour of Canada stand twice solemnly pledged to construct the said railway and commence the actual construction thereof in British Columbia and elsewhere, and notwithstanding nearly five years have passed since the date of Union, and nearly three years have elapsed from the date at which Canada agreed first that the actual construction should be commenced, and nearly eighteen months since she agreed the second time to commence the construction, yet the Government have not, up to the present moment, commenced the actual construction of the said railway in the said Province.

“That, therefore, this House is of the opinion that the Government should forthwith promptly commence and vigorously and continuously prosecute the work of the actual construction of the said railway within British Columbia in accordance with its solemn pledges to that Province.”—Mr. DeCosmos, 873.

After debate, the House divided, when the amendment was negatived—154 votes to 7, 904.

The House divided, when the motion of Mr. Ross was carried—149 votes to 10, 1130.

Motion—

“That item 84 (Pacific Railway Survey) be concurred in.”—Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, 1137.

Motion in amendment, That the following words be added to the resolution :—

“That while concurring in this vote, this House desires to record its opinion that the country is pledged to the construction of the Pacific Railway in its agreement with British Columbia, and that it is in accordance with that agreement and with the public interest that the surveys be energetically proceeded with, in order that the construction of the road should be prosecuted as rapidly as the resources of the country will permit without adding to the burthens of taxation.”—Mr. Plumb, 1137.

The House divided, when the motion of Mr. Plumb was negatived—89 votes to 36, 1138.

Section stretching from Rat Portage to Cross Lake, 1174.

Resolution—

Res.—

“That a humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that there may be laid before the House of Commons a statement shewing what steps have been taken by the Government touching the opening up of regular steam communication between Canada and the British, Spanish and French West Indies, with a copy of the tariff of any of these islands which may be in possession of the Government, with such other information, if any there be, calculated to increase the interest in, and promote our valuable commerce with these prosperous Islands.”—Mr.
Young, 293.

Steel Rails Purchase, 362.

Motion—

“That the House go into Committee of Supply.”—Hon. Mr. Cartwright, 955.

Motion in amendment—

“That the Speaker do not now leave the chair, but that it be resolved, that the purchase by the Government of 50,000 tons of steel rail, without the previous consent of Parliament, was an unconstitutional exercise of the Executive power, and that such purchase was premature and unwise, and has caused great pecuniary loss to the country.”—

Mr. Bowell, 956.

After debate, the House divided, and the amendment was negatived—124 votes to 54, 979.

Motion—

"That the House go into Committee of Supply."—Hon. Mr. Cartwright, 472.

Motion in amendment—

"That all the words after 'that' in the original motion be struck out and the following inserted thereof:—'This House deeply regrets that the Government has not proposed to Parliament a policy of increased protection to our various and important manufactures, the large amount of capital now invested therein, and the present depressed condition of the country rendering such a policy necessary to restore them to a condition of prosperity.'—Mr. Workman, 472.

After debate, the House divided, when the amendment was negatived—119 nays to 64 yeas, 504.

Motion—

"That the House go into Committee of Supply."—Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, 568.

Motion in amendment—

"That the Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be resolved that this House regrets His Excellency the Governor General has not been advised to recommend to Parliament a measure for the readjustment of the tariff, which would not only aid in alleviating the stagnation of business deplored in the gracious speech from the throne, but would also afford fitting encouragement and protection to the struggling manufactures and industries, as well as to the agricultural products of the country."—Sir John A. Macdonald, 573.

After discussion, the debate on the motion and amendment was adjourned, 601.

Resumption of the debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, that the House go into Committee of Supply, and the motion of Sir John A. Macdonald in amendment thereto, 626.

The debate again adjourned, 651.

Resumption of the debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, that the House go into Committee
